The Douglas A4 Skyhawk was a single seat light attack jet flown by both land-based and carrier squadrons, and was the U.S. Navy's standard light attack aircraft at the outset of the war. It was the only carrier based aircraft that did not have folding wings, as well as the only one which required a ladder for the pilot to enter/exit the cockpit The Skyhawk was used to fly a wide range of missions throughout Southeast Asia, including close air support to American troops on the ground in South Vietnam. Flying from a carrier was dangerous as many aircraft were lost in operational incidents as in combat, according to the Marine Corps

This photo shows First Lt. Bernie Plassmeyer in the A4E Skyhawk, which he flew on more than 100 missions during his time in Vietnam before being shot down by anti-aircraft artillery in September of 1970.

Eighteen months ago, a search team returned to the crash site. Norb Plassmeyer said excavation of the site was considered "They don't think there's enough evidence that they'll find anything, so it probably won't happen," said Plassmeyer, adding he was very happy with the memorial presentation, and the interaction with others there, "It was more than a dedication. They provided bus transport to the Vietnam Memorial Wall, and we spent time there. My brother name is on that wall as well".

A banquet was held April 26. "It was a great opportunity to get acquainted with those people who knew my brother. They thought highly of him," said Plassmeyer. "It was an excellent experience."

Norb Plassmeyer, brother of Bernie Plassmeyer, who was killed during Vietnam in 1970, attended the unveiling of fhe special monument at Quantico, Va., and also went to Washington, D.C., to see the Vietnam Memorial Wall, on which his brother's name is etched as well.

Bernie Plassmeyer, a native of Westphalia, was one of 43 men killed during Vietnam from the Class of 1967, for whom this monument was erected April 25

MARINE CORPS BASE QUANTICO, VIRGINIA

Dabbing tears trickling from her eyes, Nell Hannah, the mother of one of the 50 names etched in front of her, looked up with gratitude at the memorial which contained her son's name.

Hannah was just one of the scores of people who participated in the dedication of The Basic School Class 6-67 monument at TBS on April 25, 2014. Class 6-67 was the sixth class to graduate from TBS in 1967.

"This monument is dedicated to the 498 officers of Basic Class 6-67, and their families and friends, whose lives were changed forever by the war in Vietnam," reads an inscription on the memorial. "Forty-three men from our class were killed in Vietnam, one man was killed in Lebanon, and six lost their lives in training. Over 200 members of our class were wounded in combat."

Donnie Shearer, retired gunnery sergeant and photographer of the image that was used on the memorial, fought in Vietnam while capturing photos of the conflict. He shared his perspective on the lieutenants of the 6-67.

"So many were killed within three to four months," said Shearer. "It was open season on lieutenants and platoon commanders. It was horrible. These are the Marines of the past."

To honor the class, specifically those who paid the ultimate price, two years' worth of work and more than 100 financial contributors produced a final product that sits along the TBS sidewalk for today's lieutenants to see.

"And so this memorial, we dedicate here, honors our brothers who gave their lives for our country and our Corps," said Father John Cregan, dedication speaker. "And they have become forever a part of the legacy of the United States Marine Corps, a legacy that simply reflects to this country and beyond all the best that is America."

The memorial is adjacent to Lopez Hall at TBS.

THE TIP OF THE SPEAR

Lt. Col. Jack Wells, USMCR(Ret)
Reprinted from the November issue of The Marine Corps Gazette, with permission

Marine Officers Sixth Basic Class of 1967 (BC 6 67) convened on 7 June and graduated 498 second lieutenants on 1 November. BC 6-67 sent more lieutenants off to battle and suffered more officers killed or wounded than any Basic School class since the Korean War. The huge size of BC 6-67 was the result of the Joint Chiefs' request to the White House early in 1967 for an additional 200,000 men for the escalating war in Vietnam, plus the activation of the 5th Marine Division at Camp Pendleton in June 1966. In July 1967, President Lyndon B. Johnson reluctantly agreed to an increase of 50,000 men for the war effort. The Marine Corps had long been under pressure trying to deal with the acute shortage of officers caused by the number of Marine forces that had been committed to Vietnam. The number of Marines serving in Vietnam had increased a staggering 45 percent from July 1966 to July 1967.

The Marine Corps Commandant at that time, General Leonard Chapman, Jr., aptly described the manpower headaches that the Marine Corps was experiencing when he stated, "There are just three kinds of Marines: those in Vietnam, those who have just returned from Vietnam, and those who are getting ready to go to Vietnam!"

Most of the officers in BC 6-67 came from the huge 44th Officer Candidates Course (44th OCC) that started in March 1967 with 715 officer candidates, and graduated 585 new second lieutenants on 2 June 1967. In the 44th OCC class were 187 officer candidates from the newly expanded enlisted commissioning program that was used to fill the critical shortage of officers. Joining BC 6-67 were 67 officers that came from the Platoon Leaders Class, about a dozen "fallen angels" (lieutenants who had not completed flight school in Pensacola), and 20 other officers from various Naval Reserve Officers Training Program.

The Basic School in 1967 was commanded by Col. E.H. Haffey, and the class was made up of Companies N and O with 250 officers each. Major Russell Kramer commanded Company N, and Major Carter Swenson commanded Company O.

The Basic School in 1967 had been condensed to 21 weeks of instruction which meant that the workweek included half days on Saturdays with just a few exceptions. The course syllabus had been modified to double the number of hours allocated to land navigation based on feedback coming from the Western Pacific (Westpac) that new lieutenants needed greater proficiency in map reading.

The demand for infantry officers in Vietnam had mandated that fully 70 percent of the class had to be designated as basic infantry officers (0301). Retired Col. Swenson recalls not feeling comfortable in having to assign some of the officers to infantry military occupational specialty and more than several in the class did not want to be platoon leaders but had no choice. Unbeknownst to U.S. military leaders at the time, Communist leaders in Hanoi had made a decision early in July 1967 that would directly impact BC 6-67 and change the course of the war. This decision was to launch an all-out offensive in South Vietnam in January or February 1968.

Preoccupied with the long hours of classroom and field instruction, plus late nights on night patrols and compass marches, not many of us realized what we would face in 1968. We were confident of the fire power and technology that was on our side but could not imagine the stealth, deception, and surprise tactics that we would see in doing battle with the North Vietnamese Army (NVA). The NVA were particularly adept at constructing mutually supporting firing positions that were almost undetectable until too late.

After graduation from The Basic School on a crisp fall day on November 1967, approximately 300 new second lieutenants had West Pac orders, either after a short leave or after completion of a formal school such as field artillery or the combat engineers course. Ninety-four officers in the class went on to flight training, including 15 ordered to U.S. Air Force flight schools because of the backlog of officers waiting to start flight training at Pensacola. BC 6 -67 officers setting foot in Vietnam in December 1967 and January 1968 were soon to enter a hellish maelstrom of fighting that was inconceivable during our final weeks at Quantico. In 1968 there were more Marines killed or wounded in Vietnam than during any other year of the war.

By mid-December some of, the single or more eager lieutenants were arriving in Da Nang en route to either the 1st or 3d Marine Divisions. A short time later, names of our classmates started showing up on the Casualty reports being sent out. On 18, December 1967, 2ndLt. Michael Ruane from Brooklyn, NY was the first t~3 be killed after just 9 days as a platoon commander with Company M, 3rd Battalion, 7th Marines (M/3/7) in Quang Nam Province. Thirty days later, two more officers were killed in action, 2ndLt. Randell Yeary's reconnaissance patrol was ambushed on Hill 881 North and 2dLt. Thomas Hoare would posthumously be awarded the Silver Star medal for heroic action leading his L/3/4 platoon against an NVA company west of Gio Linh near the demilitarized zone.

A number of BC 6-67 officers found themselves in the 77-day siege at Khe Sanh and the deadly hill fights on Hills 861,881 North, and 881 South. Marines at Khe Sanh Combat Base would be subjected to days during the siege when over 1,000 enemy artillery rounds would land inside the perimeter. Several of our classmates would also experience the terrifying nightmare of having their platoons or artillery batteries overrun by North Vietnamese sappers. In The Basic School an often heard refrain from the instructor staff was, "What do you do now, lieutenant?" On 16 February 1968, 2ndLt. Terrence Graves was brutally confronted with that phrase when he was seconds away from safety as he and his 3d Force Reconnaissance team boarded the UH-34 helicopter that was going to extract them away from over 200 pursuing NVA soldiers. When 2ndLt. Graves realized that one man was unaccounted for, he immediately jumped off the helicopter. Graves was joined by Cpl. Danny Slocum and PFC James Honeycutt who did not want to leave 2ndLt. Graves alone in the search for the missing team member, whom they found severely wounded. 2ndLt. Graves and his men were hopelessly outgunned in spite of calling in supporting arms from every source available. When a second rescue helicopter from VMO-6 came in to extract the four Marines, it was riddled with gunfire as it was lifting off the ground and crashed, killing all but Cpl. Slocum who managed to evade the NVA soldiers until he was rescued a day later.

In July of 2001 at The Basic School, Graves Hall, student officer housing, was rededicated in honor and memory of 2ndLt. Graves. Terry was posthumously awarded the Medal of Honor for his actions on that fateful February day. At The Basic School, we received instruction on combat in a "built-up area," and all of us knew well the few cinder block two-story structures that made up "combat town.

Instead of the make-believe combat town at The Basic School, 2ndLt. Leo Myers from Alva, OK found himself in the ancient city of Hue, the third largest city in Vietnam with a population of 140,000 people. More than 5,000 NVA troops comprising 16 battalions had taken over the city on the second day of Tet -- 31 January 1968. For 12 days, 2ndLt. Myers led his 1st Platoon, H/2/5 Marines in the bloody street-by-street fighting against an enemy that was so fanatical that some NVA soldiers were found chained to their heavy machine guns to ensure that they would not flee against the attacking Marines. 2dLt. Myers would be the second classmate to be awarded a Silver Star for his heroic actions on 11 February 1968.

BC 6-67 officers were now being killed at a rate of more than one per week through April 1968, and the second NVA offensive, labeled "Mini-Tet," was still to erupt in May. 2ndLt. Thomas Keppen was a platoon commander with B/1/3 that was operating with Battalion Landing Team 2/4 (BLT 2/4). The Marines of BLT 2/4 found themselves in one of the boodiest battles of the war where they went up against two NVA battalions that were spread out along the Bo Dieu River northeast of the Marine Combat Base in Dong Ha. During this heavy fighting in what would be known as the "Battle of Dai Do," the Marines would suffer 81 killed and 300 wounded in the 3-day battle during 30 April to 2 May 1968. On the first day in this battle, 2ndLt. Keppen's company came under withering machine gun and rocket-propelled grenade fire while crossing the Bo Dieu River in an amphibious assault on top of an LVTP-5. Before that day ended, all of the officers in B/1/3 had been killed or wounded an~l six months after The Basic School, 2ndLt Keppen turned over command of his platoon to SSgt John Gavel, who at the young age of 22 assumed command of Bravo Company. 2ndLt. Keppen would live through this battle only to die from wounds received in a mortar attack early in July 1968.

From January to November 1968, BC 6-67 lieutenants would be awarded 17 Silver Star Medals, 2 Navy Cross Medals, and 1 Medal of Honor. Another nine officers would be medically retired from wounds suffered in Vietnam in 1968. By late summer of 1969, BC 6-67 officers who had gone on to the Navy flight school in Pensacola or Air Force flight training in Texas began to be assigned to Vietnam. Four of these aviators would be killed during the next 12 months, including lstLt. Bernard Plassmeyer, flying with VMA-311 when his A-4E went down near the A Shau Valley southwest of Hue. lstLt. Plassmeyer had been the honor graduate for the entire BC 6-67 class.

The last classmate to be killed, LtCol. William Higgins, had returned safely from two tours in Vietnam and in 1988 was serving with the United Nation peacekeeping mission in Beirut, Lebanon, when he was captured on I February and executed by terrorists while in captivity. In April 1999, the USS Higgins (DD 76) was commissioned and named in his honor. Any one of the rest of us in BC 6-67 could have ended up with our names on the Vietnam Me morial Wall along with the 44 fellow officers and friends that we lost. The men in BC 6-67 were long ago stirred by President John E Kennedy's inaugural words: "We shall pay any price, bear any burden, meet any hardship...to assure the survival and success of liberty." Let us never forget our classmates who did not return home.

He that outlives the day, and comes home safe... will yearly on the vigil, feast his friends... he'll remember, what feats they did that day." William Shakespeare, Henry V"

LtCol. Wells lives in Cupertino, CA In Vietnam then, 2ndLt. Wells was a forward observer with H/3/11 operating with A/1/7.

HOW I GOT TO VIETNAM
By JOE OLIVER

I was stationed at Camp Smith Hawaii in the G-2 section; Hawaii was a two year duty station. When I finished my time there I would not have had the time for a Vietnam tour.

The Intelligence field was new to me and I was busy learning my trade. My responsibilities were keeping the friendly and enemy order of battle and statistics on Marine Operations taking place in Vietnam. We tallied every item captured during an operation. All intelligence was then briefed to the General.

The General at Camp Smith was the CG of FMF PAC, he received daily briefings from our G-2 as well as the other G sections.

I was the bottom man on the totem pole and made E -5 once my MOS was changed to 0211. So all the shit details fell on me, but there was a nice E-6 Women Marine with me and she helped with all the important tasks assigned an E-5 Intelligence Sergeant. My biggest responsibility was making sure the coffee was made before the lifers (sorry about that) showed up in the morning and of course empting trash cans.

It was interesting learning how to keep the Order of Battle and I was enjoying my new trade.

Of course every other weekend we were in the field doing real Marine stuff. I was also in the Color Guard, at Camp Smith they had a drill team/band we did parades and ceremonies at the Punch Bowl and Pearl Harbor. Not bad and getting out of the office was always nice.

Remember now I was 18. When I received word of my childhood friend's death (LCpl Roger Michael Hurd) my first reaction was I wanted to go to Vietnam to avenge my friend's death. So I submitted a request and was turned down, the reason stated I was at a 2 year duty station and my 2 years were not up.

On my second request I added if I did my 2 years in Hawaii I wouldn't have the time for a 13 month tour in Vietnam. I got turned down again and again and again.

Then I got the idea to just do one request after another, I wouldn't wait for the rejection I would submit a new request twice a week. I figured I would kill them with paper work and they would let me go.

Months went by and I was worried I would be stuck in Hawaii for the whole two years. Funny now that I think about this, I was worried about being stuck in Hawaii. I know you must be thinking too bad youth is wasted on the young.

I worked directly under a Master Gunnery Sergeant and he was a great guy, a Korean Marine. He knew what I was doing and figured to let it run its course. One day we were having a heart to heart and I explained that my childhood friend and fellow Marine had been killed and I just had to get to Vietnam for my friend if for no other reason.

My Gunny told me to request Mast (going through the chain of command) and directed me not to talk to the Company Commander in fact he told me not to talk to anyone until he gave me the word.

I like the good Marine I was followed his orders. The Company XO put a lot of pressure on me trying to find out what the reason was for my requesting Mast. I kept silent and he passed me onto the CO, once again pressure but I wouldn't discuss my problem with him.

Up the chain of command I go, word spread of my requesting Mast and the Colonel in charge of my G-2 section called me into his office, he wanted to know what was up. I should have told him I was tired making coffee for all the lifers just to see what his reaction would have been! I told him I would not discuss the matter with him and he was sort of pissed. I then told him it had nothing to do with the G-2 section or my work within the section. This cooled him down and my journey up the Chain of Command continued.

I am working my way up and now I am going to see a full bird and my Gunny tells me after this guy I will be talking to the General. I was a little nervous about talking to a real General, but was relieved when Gunny told me I could discuss my problem with the Colonel and that he knew the Colonel and knew he would solve my problem.

I reported to the Colonel, the first time I am in a room alone with a Full Bird, he tells me Marine whatever your problem is I will solve it here and now. He told me there would be no reason to go any further up the chain. The Colonel looks me square in the eyes (I can still see him giving me that death look) and says Marine whatever it is let's get it solved right now.

I take a deep breath and say, "Sir I want to go to Vietnam'! He looks at me and bellows.....what!!!!!! I repeated myself and after he collected himself he says no problem you will begin checking out tomorrow. True to his word I started checking out the very next day.

I think he was relieved when I told him my problem, I am not sure what he was expecting but it wasn't my request to go to Vietnam. Remember this was 1967 and Vietnam wasn't that popular, although in Hawaii with all the military it wasn't bad there. I don't remember any protests or anything like that.

I arrived In Country (Vietnam) Nov 1967. It seems very childish now that I think back on my thoughts, but I was very sincere. I mean they killed my friend and there I was sitting on a tropical island. That just wasn't right.

After arriving in Vietnam to be honest with you more than once I wished I was back in Hawaii making coffee for those lifers!

Today if I met a Marine who was in during Vietnam and didn't serve in Vietnam I look at him differently.....know what I mean? I know he is still a fellow Marine, but he is not a combat Marine if you know what I mean?

Ok that's my story and I am sticking to it!

R&R IN BANGKOK

By Joe Oliver

Summer 1968 I had been in Vietnam for several months and was headed to paradise for a week of rest and relaxation. Words could not fully describe what I had been through in Vietnam, also the same would hold true for Bangkok. My week spent there was magical!

I had a "To Do List," which looking back years later, the items seem a little strange. My to do list in no particular order:
Flush a toilet.
Have real food.

Turn on a faucet and watch water run.
Flip a switch and turn on a light.
Sleep in a bed.
Take a hot shower.
Have a cold drink.
See a movie.
Go for a swim.
Have a cold beer.
Sleep without my boots on.
Spend as much time with a woman as possible.

My mind set, I had been through some intense combat in Vietnam. I survived TET 68, the major enemy offensive of the ten-year war. I had been shot down twice and wounded (where?) While flying as a gunner on Med Evac missions south of Da Nang in the area of Hill 55 South (Beth Hill 55 south is a famous combat area for Marine's a lot of action during 1968)

First time on a Med Evac mission for a South Vietnamese soldier. Pilot lost control due to damage from small arms fire, we landing in a field near a rice paddy. Our Huey Gunship came in and we passed off the wounded soldier, before heading for Delta Med they made a gun run in the direction of the LZ where we had picked up the WIA about a click away (1,000 meters). Our gunship escort was shooting up the area and shooting 2.5mm rockets. They then left the area heading for the hospital. All of a sudden it was completely quite sort of eerie.

I grab my M-60 machine to set up a defensive position. The co-pilot grab the extra ammo boxes I always flew with and acted as my ammo carrier. The pilot and crew chief started working on the damaged. I set up on a little mound and started looking around with the co-pilot who was on his first mission if you can believe that. I then tell him that the mound we were set up on was a Vietnamese Grave! Next thing I see is a Marine Fathom Jet coming in on a bomb run. He dropped Napalm we could feel the heat. Thinking back it was the coolest thing I ever saw my own personal seat to watch a Napalm show brought to us by the USMC. Pilot & crew chief manage to repair the damage and we flew out. The pilot was only able to fly at twenty feet above the ground at a slow speed. I felt like a duck in a shooting gallery, but made it to the coast and headed north back to our base at Marble Mountain.

Second time for a Marine Recon team, the team had eight Marine with serious wounds. They were located east of Hill 55 South, they told the pilot the enemy had withdrawn from the area. We approached the LZ flying along a tree line and the enemy had reinforced positions in that tree line. The whole tree line lite up. We were flying low and fast and all I could see were muzzle flashes the whole length of the tree line....it seemed like it lasted forever and I could hear the rounds hitting the helicopter making a pinging sound that continued for what seemed like a lifetime. I was firing my M60 machine out of the corner of my eye I catch the crew chief who was also firing, I look and all I see is red all over his face. I thought he had been hit in the head or face. It turned out to be hydraulic fluid flowing from the control lines after they were hit. Then we started to rock N roll as the pilots starting losing control. We always had a Huey Gunship as our chase (meaning they followed us on the mission and provided cover when we were on our approach to the LZ). The Huey was making rocket and gun runs on the tree line as we were taking hit after hit. We hit the ground hard, but the pilot had managed to avoid crashing into a tree line and we crashed into a small clearing. Crew Chief and I grab the machine guns he on one-side and me on the other to provide cover for the Pilots so they could get down and out of the Helicopter. Luckily there was no fire and both pilots were OK, the crew-chief and I were wounded.

I was the S-2 Sergeant of my helicopter squadron HMM-163, also flying as a door gunner. The majority of our missions were Med Evac and we had a saying, "Med Evac to Hell and Back! " The war was cooking during 1968, seventeen thousand American men and women were killed in action, the highest number of casualties of the war.

Arriving in Bangkok I started working on my to do list immediately. I met a couple of Marines and they also had a similar to do list. Imagine that! We shared a rented taxi driver for the week--he was our personal driver at our beck and call.

Our first trip was to a Steam House. It was there that I met Number Thirty-Two, who became my girlfriend for the week. Did you ever find out what her real name was or did you call her 32 the entire time? (I am sure she had a name but it was so long ago I have forgotten) No I called her thirty after we got to know each other REAL good.....To put R&R in perspective I was nineteen and had not been in the company of a women for months and could have been killed when returning to Vietnam.

Between the taxi driver and my girlfriend I received a taste of their culture. We did everything from going to the movies and having sugar cane not popcorn for a snack to watching elephants move logs into the river.

I had to purchase clothes and wanted to send gifts home. The local shops had two prices one for the locals and one for US Servicemen. What we would do is I would pick out an item in one shop, then we would go to another shop and #32 or the Taxi driver would go in and buy the item at the local price.

I had taken five hundred dollars with me. In Vietnam the Marines (S-1 Admin Clerk.... where we were no paymaster would come.....paymaster?) pass the payroll around and you could request any dollar amount. There was no place to spend money and nothing to buy so I had most of my pay on the books. After I finished my R&R whatever money I had I gave to #32.

We arrived and converted our money MPC is what Americans used in Vietnam. Military Payment Certificates.....I think I have some place ...I HAVE A METAL TRUNK THAT I HAVEN'T OPENED IN OVER 40 YEARS I GUESS I HAVE TO OPEN IT????

We all got on buses that were going to certain hotels, you got on the bus and they made about four stops along the way. At each stop people got off and the hotel staff came out with big bottles of local beer and the bottles were passed around. The beer was very strong and was called "Tiger Piss" I think the alcohol rating was over 20%. I had not had any alcohol for several months like most of the bus. My hotel was stop number four or five and I was drunk when I arrived there.

We checked in and the first item was renting a cab and driver for the week, cost $25 a day and he was available 24 hours a day. The driver gave us a large bag of Pot and told us it was included with the $25. The deal was we had to give him back whatever was left at the end of the week.... There was a major drug problem in Vietnam and they were checking to make sure no drugs were brought back to Vietnam.....I split the cab with another Marine and the first stop was a steam house. They had a long one way mirror maybe 20 feet long and about two feet high. On the other side of the mirror was some benches and sitting on the benches were the most beautiful girls in the world. They were all dress in the same outfit, short hot pants and tight sweaters all white. They all had red buttons with white numbers on them. The Momma San was standing by and you could have a girl come out and talk to her or whatever. My request was to have number 32 (I just picked her...they were all so beautiful and remember where I had come from) stand up and turn around...that was it for me it was love at first turn around....

Next step was to go upstairs and have a bath, man it was GREAT...a big tub and 32 washed me all over with a huge sponge and this soapy water.....the water was hot and the tub was deep.....I had had maybe one or two showers in several months, mostly I washed myself from water in my helmet.....next came a message and it was really deep love at this point. After that she took me to this large room that was filled with dresses and shoes. I could pick out whatever outfit I wanted and that is what she would wear. All the girls were the same size maybe zero dress size I am not sure.....it was really cool picking out the dress I had never done that before.....little things one remembers....and the smell of perfume it was WONDERFUL!

The rest of the day was spent in the room..... then a bar..... then back to the room..... then a bar.... then back to the room ..... back to the room again.....
After leaving the room the first time I wanted a steak. We ate at the hotel and man the steak was WONDERFUL!!!!!

Each night we went to a night club and danced the night away, drank, smoked dope and so forth. (Don't put any dope stuff I am just telling you how it was) I had never smoked weed before. The first morning waking up I noticed my wallet lying on the table empty and my clothes were neatly hung up. Number 32 grabbed my money at the night club as I had no control over myself and held it for me for safe keeping.....if not I would have been broke and probably waking up in an alley. The cab driver and 32 keep us safe and sound during the week.

Shopping we would go into a shop and look at when I wanted to send home to my family as gifts. The items had two prices the local price and the American price. So I would show 32 what I was thinking of and then we would go to another shop and 32 and the cab driver would go in and buy the item at the local price…..

We spent a day at a sort of amusement park only in the park they had local life exhibits. We watched elephants working moving logs to a river, saw a cock fight and was some kick boxing matches. Stuff like that, we watched how they made grass huts and how they farmed with water buffalos. Sort of how the people worked and lived. I thought it was pretty cool and you can asked Joanne what my favorite jungle animal is and she will tell you I love elephants. It was amazing watching them work.

They asked is we wanted to visit the Bridge on the river Quay, but it would of taken twelve hours or more. The roads weren't that good in 68 and we didn't want to spend all that time traveling….now of course years latter I wish I did make the trip, but I had my priorities rights and didn't want to waste all of that time.

One day we went to this place that had all hand dug little ponds. We all sat around the pond and ate local food and fished in the pond. Doesn't sound like much, but it was a great time. We were sitting on straw mats drinking and eating and fishing. Relaxing and taking little cat naps. I am not sure what I was eating, but I knew it was better than anything I had been eating in Vietnam.

One day we went to see a movie that had English subtitles. We bought small bags of cut up sugar cane for a snack. No buttered popcorn….The sugar cane was delicious… in the movie you could smoke and drink all of which I thought was pretty strange….It was a great day like all the days I spend on R&R.

When my week was up whatever money I had left I gave to 32 after I tipped the cab driver. It was the best week of my life!

Returning to Vietnam put me into a sad state for the first few days, but then I just got back into the daily grind.

PARRIS ISLAND, SOUTH CAROLINA
Joe Oliver

Training lasted three of the longest months of my life, PI was a life changing event. There is a Marine saying, "The Change is Forever" so true.

It was June 1965, I was seventeen years old and considered myself a tough city kid. That thinking lasted about one second after arriving at Parris Island and meeting my first Marine Corps Drill Instructor.

I love the traditions of the Marine Corps now, but my introduction was shocking. The bus arrives, the door opens, and a Wildman (DI) comes on the bus yelling and screaming and thumbing guys on the head. He wanted us off that bus now, we were told to put our feet into the yellow painted foot prints on the deck. None of us knew what a deck was, but we figured it out after seeing painted foot prints on the ground. I mean deck. Those Yellow footprints are one of the most lasting memories I have of my first few moments at PI and on the road to becoming a United States Marine.

Waiting for us at the Receiving Station once we exited the bus were a bunch of other screaming Wild Men. I had never experienced anything like it, it shocked me all I could think about was what kind of a place is this?

After some time in which they yelled and screamed and tried to have us stand at attention they brought us into a barracks, they called us all sorts of names like Maggot, Ladies and some that I can't repeat here.

We stayed at attention for hours staring at a spot on the wall. I wasn't sure why I was staring at the spot on the wall, but I knew that if I didn't one of those wild men would kick my ass.

All of a sudden I heard a bang, one of my fellow recruits passed out and hit what use to be call the floor, bang! I heard footsteps walking across the deck, I wanted to look but hey I had this spot on the wall I had to watch. I kept staring at my spot, if I didn't I would receive a beating and have DI's yelling and screaming at me.

Next I heard the DI screaming at the passed out recruit for bleeding on his deck! He didn't care about this guy or his injuries all he cared about was the blood dripping on "His Deck". That was it for me I would do whatever the DI's told me to do without question. Or course I would also try not to bleed on his deck!

Next I heard a scraping/dragging noise, it's the DI dragging the injured man, and the guy was passed out cold and bleeding from the face. The DI dragged him in front of the line of us Ladies just to make sure we all got the message. It was a statement written in blood, DI's must be obeyed. For the first time in my life I would follow orders no questions asked!

They form our Platoon #235, 2nd Battalion there were approximately seventy of us and not everyone would make it to graduation day, we are now called a new name, "A Herd". Of course ladies, maggots, and some other choice words describing us sub humans are also used.

We spent one week going through processing, haircuts, injections, uniforms called Utilities which become our daily work attire. We are put through grueling mental and physical cruelty, it's a mind game and the DI's are master at breaking you down so you begin thinking hey maybe I am a maggot after all. Then we head for twelve weeks of training.

We meet our Drill Instructors that will lead us around by the nose for twelve weeks. They will control our every minute for twelve weeks. They control when we eat, shower, sleep, smoke and how we walk and talk. They take complete control over our minds and bodies.

They will teach us everything from the proper way to brush our teeth and cut our nails to how to fire an M-14 Rifle. Their biggest tasks is to make us follow orders without thinking, move when they say move. Jump when they say jump.

Sir better be the first and last word out of your mouth when addressing a DI, if not a thumping will come quickly. The DI's seem to be made of steel, they were the real deal. They could have chewed me up and spit me out at the drop of a hat.

Remembering some of the beatings I had received as a kid from my Mother and The Sisters of Saint Joseph helped me survive the Parris Island beatings. The DI's never really hurt me physically, but what they dealt out hurt my feelings more than anything. I wanted to do good for them for myself and of course for the Marine Corps. They instilled a spirit of confidence that I never knew existed, it helped me at PI and throughout my life. Surviving Vietnam would of never been possible without the foundation my DI's installed in me.

Our Senior Drill Instructor SSgt Francis X Muldowney tells us, "There are two ways to leave this Island, in three months as a United States Marine or in a pine box, he meant it! The choice for me was simple I would give all my effort to leave as a Marine. I didn't like the pine box option, but I believed him when he told us.

Parris Island taught me many things, basic marksmanship, discipline, how to clear toe jams, wash my uniforms, close order drill. Most importantly it taught me Duty, Honor, Courage, love of Country and Corps. Most importantly how lucky I was to be part of The United States Marine Corps!

My time at PI is coming to an end, we are finishing up at the Rifle Range. We receive a special treat we go to see a movie. Not any movie, but a Marine Corps movie called, The Sands of Iwo Jima staring John Wayne. The movie was the biggest treat we had received in almost three months. I sat there mesmerized watching John Wayne and the Marines on Iwo Jima.

The battle of Iwo happened before I was born, but to me the flag raising on Mount Suribachi is the Marine Corps. As I watch the movie it dawns on me hey I am almost a Marine just like the Marines in the movie. This thought overwhelms me! I am reminded of the proud history of the Marines and wonder will I be able to cut it? I want to make my DI's and the Corps proud.

Vietnam was heating up in 1965 and our DI's had us convince we were all going straight from PI to Vietnam. One day a plane is flying overhead the DI tells us this could be the plane coming to take us to Vietnam. That along with whatever else they told us was believed. After that every time I hear a plane overhead I hope it will land and take me to Vietnam.

Graduation day is two days away, man I am thinking two more days and I have made it. I survived at the time what was the biggest challenge of my life, not only that but in two days just two days I will be a United States Marine!

My family drives down from Boston for the graduation, during my High School years I was what some might consider a hoodlum heading down the wrong path. Now however thanks to my DI's I have proved them all wrong.

My parents, sister along with my high school sweetheart and a friend make the trip. Day before graduation is family day, I joined with my friend Mike Lopez and his family is unable to make the trip. So my parents ask for Mike to join us, this is the first day I am without my drill instructors in three months. I feel like a fish out of water.

In the reception center I am standing at attention waiting for my parents. I see my family standing there looking at all the recruits. There were a bunch of us waiting and my parents are looking right at me, but I see no recognition in their eyes. They don't recognize their only son, the change is forever alright. I break the line and walk over to them, they still don't recognize me it was unbelievable. Finally when I talked to them they looked and wonder if I was their son. I guess I had changed during my time at PI.

Mike and I spend a great day touring PI with my family. Of course I am ram rod straight answering yes sir no sir out of habit. I know my parents are wondering what happened to their son? My mother must be thinking why she didn't send me to PI earlier.

Graduation day was like being born again! This was the day I would no longer be called any names, I would receive the title of United States Marine! Looking back today to that day which was over fifty years ago I can still remember part of the Generals speech, "Three months ago you sent us a boy and today we give you back a United States Marine"! I can still hear those words!

I GET MAIL

CORPSMAN & MARINES

We Corpsmen have a special relationship with our Marine Brothers. When people ask me what branch of the service I was in, I tell them I was in the Green Navy. That usually confuses most of the non-Marines and Corpsmen but we know what the Green Navy is and any Corpsman or Chaplain who has worn the FMF Badge is darn proud of it.

We could not do ours! Do we get a lot more credit than we deserve...probably but the question should really be, do the Marines get a lot less credit than they deserve? The answer is and always has been, YES!

As I have heard said many times before, I ain't no hero but I served alongside many a one and most of them were United States Marines.

ORRRAAAHHH!
Hope you all had a marvelous 4th of July...I sure did. They just keep getting better and better. Semper Fi...and I mean it,

CORRECTIONAL TRAINING FACILITY SOLEDAD VETERANS SERVICE OFFICE SERVICE CENTER

Highway 101 North P.O. Box 689
Soledad, CA 93960-0689

March 19,2014
Thomas Eichler,
Dear Tom,

I received the latest Red Clay last PM. and I wanted to take a minute to thank you for the consideration. I am very impressed by the growth of the publication and the professional presentation. I read it from end to end each time. It is enjoyable to read about a period of time so distant, but so lasting in our memories.

It is rather sad that such a small period of time can have such a lasting effect on the rest of my life. In this fine facility that I reside in it just exacerbates the latent PTSD, or as my office partner call it, PMS-TD.

Starting this office and assisting other veterans is, as our slogan states," helping ourselves by helping others". It is far more than just a slogan, it is our therapy.

We also started a Incarcerated Vietnam Veterans of America group that is functioning as a "self-help" group in here. I have facilitated a couple seminars on PTSD, as well as other classes on employment, housing etc. for our parolee's, and had the privilege of having Ken and Betty Rodgers here so we could screen their new video "Bravo", common men, uncommon valor. It was very hard to set through, but well worth it. We also obtained a copy of the video to show on our close-circuit TV system so that the rest of the inmates could enjoy it and possibly have a little empathy for what we went through. I hope that you have had the opportunity to see this fine film; they did a good job on a painful subject.

Two years ago through a three year process, we were fortunate to have the mobile Vietnam Memorial Wall presented at our facility. As far as we have been told, we are the only prison that it has ever been seen at. We had over one hundred veterans and a population of over five thousand inmates able to pay their respects to their fallen comrades. It was on our exercise yard for two days, and two days in the parking lot outside for the general public to see. It was also the first time that it had been viewed in Monterey County. That rather surprised me as they have several military bases in the close proximity.

We are working feverishly on our annual celebration scheduled for the 26th of May. We will be fortunate to have a Federal Associate Justice Eileen Moore here from Southern California to speak during our celebration. She has been a strong supporter of incarcerated veterans (1170.9) as well as being a veteran herself and a member of Vietnam Veterans of America, Inc.

In 1967 she and my partner crossed paths when she was working as an Evac nurse in Chu Chi, and they have been communicating on occasion since. It will be very interesting to hear what she has to say. She will be escorted by the California Highway Patrol when she comes in, and it is a well known fact that California Department of Corrections and the Highway Patrol do not see eye to eye. It will be fun to watch anyway. I just wish we could get more press coverage. We will be having Terry Hubert from the Vietnam Veterans of America, Inc. attending as he has for a few years now, as well as several members of the California VVA. I did not run for reelection this year as the commander of our group so I hopefully will have more time for other projects, as there never seems to be a shortage of projects. (Isn't that what retirement is for?)

We have also been very instrumental in initiating several State Assembly bills and legislation in support and function of incarcerated veterans. Presently my office partner Ed Munis and myself are the only certified incarcerated veterans service representatives in California, certified by Monterey County Military and Veterans Affairs. We have had our application in Washington, DC with William Gunn for a few years now awaiting certification. Quite frankly, we could use any political help we could find to enable us to get Federally certified. If you have any suggestions, they would be well accepted and appreciated.

Through our legislation, the assembly bill directs California Department of Corrections to establish a veterans service office in every one of their thirty three prisons; with our office as the processing hub. We currently have over seventeen hundred veterans that we are actively assisting and at present we have been directly responsible for over twelve million dollars in earned compensation for our veterans and their families; we are serving twenty-two other states as well as federal prisons. We even have a veteran in Puerto Rico that we are assisting.

In our spare time, we had a "Four Chaplain" ceremony last month for the first time. It was well received and we will probably be doing it annually. I am given to understand that our own Rev. William Stubbe has been presented with an honor from four chaplains also. I would like to learn more about it. Rev. Stubbe has been very supportive through the years. Quite a guy for his age, and still boxing frequently.

I had better close this for now as it sounds like all I am doing is bragging; I need to humble myself and get back to work. Again, thank you for the consideration and the great publication. Keep up the good work.

CTF chaplains, inmate veterans honor 4 heroic WWII chaplains

Posted on Monday, March 10, 2014
By Lt. Roland Ramon, PIO/AA
Correctional Training Facility

The chaplains and inmate military veterans at the Correctional Training Facility (CTF) conducted a ceremony last month to honor four heroic chaplains who gave their lives to save others during World War II.

Inmates provided the color guard and CTF chaplains gave the invocation and benediction at the ceremony. During a bell-ringing ceremony, four CTF chaplains read a biography of the WW II chaplains. The WW II chaplains gave up their life jackets to others alter the troop ship they were traveling on was torpedoed on Feb. 3, 1944, by a German submarine in the Atlantic Ocean.

The chaplains were Methodist Minister George L. Fox, Reformed Church in America Minister Clark V. Poling, Catholic Priest John P. Washington and Rabbi Alexander B. Goode.

Some CTF inmates said they were struck by the varying backgrounds of the four men. Rev. Washington was the leader of a New Jersey street gang before he became a priest. Rev. Fox worked alongside the infantry as a medic in World War I before becoming a minister.

After the ceremony, inmates and staff expressed a desire to continue the service as an annual event.

Snakes Cousin waits over forty years for Vendetta on Khe Sanh Vietnam Veteran Steve Wiese

Steven Wiese is lucky to be alive after being bitten by a rattlesnake during his golf game. He had no warning sounds, just a swift snake bite that landed him in the hospital.

Wiese was golfing when he sent the ball in the wrong direction. He went off into some taller grass just off the fairway and just a few moments after he decided to give up on finding it, a snake bit into him.

He felt the bite and discretely told the person he was with. The golf club addressed the situation by flushing the snake out of the pipe it was hiding it and eventually trapping it in a trash can. They plan on releasing it into nature, far from the golf course.

"You can't blame the snake, basically he was telling me to get away from him," said Wiese. "I suppose it would give me a little more incentive to learn to hit the ball on the fairway. Haha."

A golfer was playing at the Catta Verdera Country

Club in Lincoln when a rattle snake bit him. Steven Wiese said the snake didn't even make that infamous "rattling" sound when it happened. "No sounds, no warnings, it was just 'bam' and the minute he hit me, I knew I had been hit," Wiese told FOX40.

A bad shot off the 11th tee almost cost Wiese his life, as the ball bounced off a tree and into some tall grass behind it.

Wiese got into trouble when he decided to go looking for it.

"Kind of walked around for a couple of minutes and went, 'O.K., let's forget it.' Started to walk back to the cart and bam," Wiese said.

But being a Marine Corps Vietnam Veteran, Wiese knew not to panic. "I had the ability to stop and go, 'O.K., what do I need to do here?' So I just started calmly walking back to the cart path and told the gentleman I was with that I had just been bit by a rattlesnake," Wiese said.

Once Wiese was off to the hospital, course manager Jeff Wilson and his staff quickly tracked the culprit to a nearby drainage pipe.

"We used the hose and flushed him out of the drain. We put him in a container and will relocate it to a non-populated area," Wilson said.

But David Rosen with Splash Sacramento, a non-profit nature education organization, told FOX40 as it gets warmer outside, more rattlesnakes will come out, and humans need to be aware.

"Look on the other side of the log before you set your feet down, or before you reach over it. If you're climbing on rocks watch where you place your hands," Rosen said.

Meanwhile Weise says he's taken the experience as a lesson to work on his golf game.

"I suppose it would give me a little more incentive to learn to hit the ball on the fairway... You can't blame the snake, basically he was telling me to get away from him," Weise said.

MICHAEL BROPHY USMC KHE SANH VETERAN HQ CO 2/26 HILL 558

From: Mark Brophy
Brother of: Michael Brophy

It is with great sadness I report the passing of my brother, Michael Brophy, after a twenty year battle with Parkinson's and other Agent Orange related diseases. Mike was assigned to HQ Co 2/26. I was by his side when he passed , in his sleep, on May 5, 2014 in Redlands , CA

Mike told me when he arrived at Khe Sahn, about New Year's Day of 1968, his NCOIC advised him " You are gonna love it here, nothing every happens"! Mike's service will be at 09:30 on May 15th at Emerson-Bartlett Chapel 703 Brookside ,Redlands, CA 92373.

Burial was at 11:30 Riverside National Cemetery , LeMay Blvd, March AFB, CA 92518. Mike will had a Marine Honor Guard. Mike was a wonderful brother and was loved by many great friends and relatives. He had to go into assisted living two years ago and charmed the ladies until the end.

Mike put up a brave fight until the end, I would expect nothing He struggled for 45 years, as have most of you, with the problems brought home from that terrible war. He had many happy times, especially attending KSV reunions of which I was able to attend several. Mike put up a brave fight, I would expect nothing less, he was a Marine to the end.

I would expect nothing less, even though Mike served 4 years in the CA Air National Guard as a C-130 Loadmaster, he was a stubborn Marine until the very end...is there any other kind If you need more info, contact me @ 509-879-4323 or mwbrophy aol.com

US VETS BUILD KINDERGARTENS IN FORMER VIETNAM BATTLEFIELD

Two veterans of the United States Marine Corps (USMC) fulfilled their wish to build two kindergartens for Vietnamese children, last month, in a mountainous village in Quang Tri Province where they served during the Vietnam War, Tuoi Tre reported.

George Barczay and Judd Kinne, both in their 70s, contributed VND700 million (US$33,230) to build the Ta Rui and Ta Ria 2 kindergartens in two villages of the same names in Huong Hoa District. The remaining VND300 million for the two projects came from the provincial budget.

With the new kindergartens, children from the Pa Co and Van Kieu ethnic communities in Ta Rui and Ta Ria 2 villages will no longer have to study in makeshift schools made from bamboo leaves and tree branches. Barczay and Kinne spent days climbing mountains in Huong Hoa to find the locations for the kindergartens, which they said is the least they can do for Khe Sanh, the district capital of Huong Hoa, their former battlefield.

In 1967, Barczay's corps was assigned to take a number of high points around Khe Sanh there to prevent attacks from Vietnamese soldiers streaming down from the north.

In 1968, he was stationed at Hill 881 South. He recalled thousands of tons of bombs being dropped into the region, ravaging peaceful villages and killing innocent people en masse. He was stuck in a bunker at Hill 881 South for more than one month, suffering from hunger, thirst and fear. After the war ended, he remained obsessed by the scenes of bombing and killing. He dared not watch the films about the Vietnam War on the internet.

He told his wife that Khe Sanh used to be a peaceful land until the US brought bombs to it. He wanted to do something to heal the wounds of war there. He and Kinne first met after they were discharged from military service, while signing up for a college.

The two vets became close. They realized they had the same wish: to go back and do something for Khe Sanh. For the last 20 years, Barczay and Kinne have saved money for a fund they established to "heal the wounds of war for Khe Sanh."

When they encountered any former soldiers from the USMC, they told the vets about their fund and asked for their support. Late last year, Barczay's health took a turn for the worse and he began to walk with the help of a cane. At that point, the pair decided to return to Khe Sanh to do something before it was too late. When they started raising funds, they had no idea what exactly they would do with them. Then one day, they happened to watch a video clip about children in Huong Hoa District studying in makeshift schools.

During the flood season, the schools were abandoned, forcing the children to quit classes. Teachers and villagers had to go into the forest and cut down bamboo to rebuild the schools.

Barczay decided to use the funds to build two strong, solid schoolhouses for the children.

After Barczay and Kinne cut the ribbons during an inaugural ceremony at the two kindergartens, they returned to Hill 881 South. With the help of Kinne and two canes, Barczay reached the site of his former battlefield after three hours of walking and climbing the mountain.

Belleau Wood WWI
Joe Oliver HMM-163

The Battle of Belleau Wood (1–26 June 1918) occurred during the German 1918 Spring Offensive in World War I, near the Marne River in France.

The battle was fought between the U.S. Second (under the command of Major General Omar Bundy) and Third Divisions and an assortment of German units including elements from the 237th, 10th, 197th, 87th, and 28th Divisions.[2] The battle has become a deep part of the lore of the United States Marine Corps.

Several years ago while on a cruise my wife and I met a wonderful couple from England Angelia and David. We became friends and have stayed in touch throughout the years.

Recently David and one of his friends Steve toured WWI Battle Fields, knowing my deep Marine Corps roots he sent the following.

Hi Joe

I was in France for 6 days over last weekend visiting some WW1 battle sites with my pal Steve. We headed for Ypres in Belgium first and did a tour round half the sites because that was all we could manage.

Visited the largest commonwealth war grave site which was very thought provoking. In addition to the 13,000 headstones there were inscribed on the walls thousands of names of soldiers who had no known grave and had died in the vicinity.

In addition we visited the Menin gate in Ypres. This has the names of 80,000 (eighty) men who died in the 3 major battles around Ypres and who have no known grave.

From there we travelled to the Somme, again this was very thought provoking with war grave cemeteries literally around every bend in the road. Sometimes as you looked around you could see 4, 5 or 6 cemeteries all in view at the same time, in fields, besides roads, up hills. Some had a few dozen headstones others up to 10.000.

All the cemeteries were immaculately kept with uniform white headstones and all had the same entry arch and large white cross and stone alter. We visited two sites that have been left as they were in 1916.

One was the battle site of the Newfoundland regiment from Canada. This was a preserved site and was treated as a burial site as bodies were still believed buried there. There were trenches, fox holes and mortar holes all over the place - you could only imagine the horror of living in those trenches for 2 years with all that ordinance going off.

Nearby was the main British memorial at Thiepval - this memorial has engraved on the walls the names of 85,000 British Soldiers who died in the Somme offensive from 1916 - 1917 who have NO known grave. It's hard to think of numbers like that, a whole generations wiped out.

In the area there are also similar memorial to the Canadian, Australians, New Zealanders, South Africans and Indians. All with thousands of names inscribed of soldiers with no known graves!!!

From here we were going to travel to the Marne and Aisne Battle fields near Meaux just a few miles East of Paris. My first wife Joan's Grandfather was killed at the first battle of the Marne which was in August / September 1914 it was the last line of defense to stop the Germans entering Paris. He was killed September 9th 1914 shortly after war broke out. We were able to find his grave.

On the way to the Marne as we were just a few miles from Belleau Wood we called in there, and I have attached over the next 3 emails some photos from there.

Belleau Wood has also been preserved as a sort of park in honor of the battle. The woods are full of foxholes and bomb craters and there are the remnants of many defensive German trenches.

Belleau Woods basically sits atop a hill with steep slopes to 3 sides and a gradual slope on the remaining side. This is the side the US Infantry and Marines launched their attack approaching across a wheat field. You can see all the trench's and fox holes were the Germans were dug in. I have enclosed about 20 photos and have attached some text to most of the photos.

We also paid a visit to the visitor center which is near the memorial, The Superintendent was a nice guy from Pennsylvania who was ex-military and I think was in the infantry, because he kept pushing the role of the infantry in the battle. However he did say the site was the Mecca for the Marines and he was expecting thousands of visitors from the USA in 1917/1918 the centenary of the battle.

Before leaving I wrote in the visitors book, I had done the same in all the visitors books in all the cemeteries we had visited. I just simply left a noted 'NOT FORGOTTEN' and signed my name.

I hope you don't mind but in the Belleau visitors book I wrote ' David Edwards - Chester, UK representing Joe Oliver, Boston and Florida -Not Forgotten- Semper Fi' (Note you can see why I am friends with this guy, very thoughtful)

Pic 1 the Memorial at Belleau Wood. The wood lies on the hill behind the memorial and was built on the Germans last line of defense.

BEAR CREEK VET VOWS TO FIND REMAINS OF FELLOW MARINES LEFT IN VIETNAM

Local man hopes to help find remains of 2 Fellow Marines in Vietnam

May 24. 2014 10:55PM
By Joe Sylvester jsylvester@civitasmedia.com

BEAR CREEK TWP. — It took nearly 40 years, but when Edward Zimmerman realized two of his fellow U.S. Marines were still missing, he had to do something about it.

He could not rest until he knew someone would bring back the two Marines who died in the 1968 siege on Khe Sanh, Vietnam, in early 1968.

Three days after Memorial Day, he will fly to Oahu, Hawaii, to meet up with a team from the Joint POW/MIA Accounting Command, or JPAC, which searches for, recovers and identifies the remains of missing Americans from past wars for the U.S. Department of Defense.

Zimmerman then will accompany the team to Vietnam to search for those Marines' remains, who are among the 1,642 U.S. soldiers still unaccounted for in Southeast Asia decades after public sentiment stateside forced a pullout.

The mission is happening because of Zimmerman.

After he learned in recent years one of the men still was missing, he contacted the Scranton Vet Center, which got word to the Pentagon.

Zimmerman, 65, an Edwardsville native who now lives in Bear Creek Township with his wife, Cathy, said the two bodies were at the bottom of a ridge at Khe Sanh but never recovered.

He knows. He saw them there after the battle, but due to circumstances afterward, he didn't report what he had seen.

Bloody siege

Zimmerman always assumed the recovery teams that swept the area afterward had recovered the bodies of all of the Marines who died in the 77-day siege, one of the longest and bloodiest battles of the Vietnam War, where Zimmerman earned a Bronze Star for saving a fellow Marine and a Purple Heart for a wound he suffered.

"I was told all of the guys were accounted for," he said.

It wasn't until 2007 that Zimmerman, while looking at a Khe Sanh veterans website, saw a photo of a memorial for PFC Anthony John Pepper of Richmond, Virginia. It said he still was missing.

The other Marine was Cpl. James Mitchell Trimble of Eureka, California. Both of the missing were from the 2nd Battalion, 26th Marines, 3rd Marine Division — the same as Zimmerman — but they were with G, or Golf, Company. Zimmerman was with F, or Fox, Company.

He swung into action.

He contacted Tom Ford from Long Island, New York, the Marine he pulled to safety after Ford was shot in the legs, to get coordinates of the area when Ford traveled to Vietnam as a tourist.

Zimmerman told the Vet Center, where team leader Dave Ulkoski, whom Zimmerman credits with helping many veterans, passed on the information.

Then, in March, he received a call from two guys from JPAC who were at the U.S. Army War College in Carlisle. They asked questions. They later came to visit. They asked a lot more questions.

"They talked with guys from Golf Company," Zimmerman recalled. "They put them right where I was" when he saw the bodies.

He said he had earlier seen Pepper and Trimble sitting on a boulder just days before seeing their bodies.

Search team

So after answering a lot of questions and convincing JPAC his information was legitimate, Zimmerman was approved for the trip. He said the Vietnamese government cooperates with JPAC searches for the missing.

"My job is to get them there," he said. "I'm what they call a 'living survivor.'"

He said he recalled seeing the bodies after the battle, when he was sent to search for any North Vietnamese soldiers who still might be in the area.

"I went down the side of the ridge where they (the missing Marines) were," he said.

Then he saw their decomposing bodies, which had been lying in 90 to 100-degree heat for about three days.

That was too much for Zimmerman, who went on to take part in 22 major battles in his 13 months in Vietnam in 1967 and 1968.
"I kind of lost it," Zimmerman recalled.

"When I came back up, I got into it with my sergeant," he said. "He started ordering me to pick up more bodies. I told him I couldn't do it anymore."

He explained what led to that: "It was bad there. There were body parts. ... You didn't know who belonged to what."

The fighting in Khe Sanh in northwest South Vietnam, started on Jan. 21, 1968, when soldiers of the North Vietnamese Army, referred to as NVA, began a massive artillery bombardment of the U.S. Marine garrison, according to historical accounts.

The siege lasted for 77 days. Accounts put American deaths at 205 and NVA deaths anywhere from 10,000 to 15,000.

The 6,000 Marines, joined by South Vietnamese soldiers, fought against the 35,000 to 40,000 NVA fighters who surrounded them, Zimmerman said.

"That's why the B-52s came in," Zimmerman said.

Napalm dropped

They repeatedly bombed the NVA, and American Phantom jets dropped napalm, sometimes a little too close to the U.S. forces, Zimmerman said.

"When they dropped the napalm too close, you could feel it take the air out of your lungs," he said.

And then there were the rats.

"There were thousands of rats, because of the dead bodies," Zimmerman said. "They were like dogs." He said some ran through the wooden pallets on the floor of the bunker.

Still, at the time, the Marines didn't realize just how bad it was.

"You look at it now and find out it was a lot worse than you realized," he said of the siege.

That's not to downplay the initial terror of coming under the fire of artillery and sniper fire.

"At first, it's like an 'Oh, Jesus!' moment," Zimmerman said of his thoughts during battle. "You lose control of your insides. But after the initial shock wears off, your training kicks in."

On April 7, 1968, when he was dragging Ford to safety — Zimmerman, 5 feet, 10 inches and 133 pounds at the time, had strapped a belt to his own legs for the 6-foot, 3-inch Ford to pull himself along — a bullet struck one of the ammunition magazines Zimmerman had strapped to his chest.

He still has the magazine with the bullet entrance and exit holes in it. At the time, he didn't even realize the bullet had hit and caused a minor wound to his chest and right arm.

"There was so much blood, you don't know if it's yours or somebody else's," he said.

Zimmerman was awarded the Bronze Star for his heroics in saving Ford.

He never sought recognition for getting wounded, but in 2001, Ford began seeking the Purple Heart for the man who saved him. Zimmerman received the medal two years later at the Vet Center.

War still with him

Zimmerman doesn't talk about his heroics so much, but his time in Vietnam, especially in Khe Sanh, is with him every day.

When he returned from the war, he began dating Cathy, and two years later they were married.

But when he first returned, he had a hard time finding a job. He landed a job operating heavy equipment, taught diesel repair. At times, he was working two or three jobs to support his wife and three daughters.

It wasn't until 30 or 35 years after returning home that the war caught up with him. There were the thoughts, the nightmares. He had trouble trusting people, and the war took away his ability to feel, he said.

"I was ready to hurt somebody," he recalled.

He sought help, and through the Vet Center, he was referred to a treatment center in Coatesville after he was diagnosed with post-traumatic stress disorder.

"They brought out things I knew were there," he said.

PTSD, a psychiatric disorder, can occur after someone experiences or witnesses a life-threatening event, such as military combat, natural disasters, accidents, or physical or sexual assault, according to the Department of Veterans Affairs.

People who suffer from PTSD often relive the experience through nightmares and flashbacks, have difficulty sleeping and feel detached or estranged.

About 30 percent of the men and women who have spent time in war zones experience PTSD, and more than half of all male Vietnam veterans and almost half of all female Vietnam veterans have experienced "clinically serious stress reaction symptoms." PTSD among Vietnam veterans is one of the main conditions treated by the VA.

Zimmerman, who also had suffered ear damage from the explosions and shoulder problems, retired at age 54 from his job as a mechanic for UPS due to his PTSD.

Sometimes Zimmerman, who also has nine grandchildren, is back in Khe Sanh, and he has to go outside of his house and only allow the memory a certain amount of time.

He gives much credit to Ulkoski at the Vet Center for his help and for providing a welcoming home away from home at the center.
"Without Dave and without church, I couldn't handle it," Zimmerman said. "It doesn't go away."

Healing and peace

But maybe, returning to the scene of the battle to help bring home two fellow Marines will bring him some healing — and some peace.

He said he'll be in Vietnam anywhere from two weeks to a month.

"It all depends on how good the Vietnamese government clears the ridge," he said, noting the Vietnamese are supposed to clear some of elephant grass there that grows 8 feet to 10 feet high.

His own mission is clear.

Although he has no regrets about joining the Marines and fighting in Vietnam, Zimmerman said he never had a need to return to the site of those battles. Until he learned he could help bring a couple of comrades home.

"I have no use to go back there except for this," he said.

VET FROM BEAR CREEK TOWNSHIP FINDS LOCATION OF REMAINS OF MISSING MARINES, FAMILY SAYS

PITTSTON TWP. — The Vietnam vet from Bear Creek Township who traveled back to the Southeast Asian country two weeks ago to locate the remains of two fellow Marines found the location at Khe Sanh where he believed they were, his wife and daughters said Thursday.

Edward Zimmerman poses in Khe Sanh, Vietnam, the site of one of the bloodiest battle of the Vietnam War. He was there for two weeks with a search team from the Joint POW/MIA Accounting Command, or JPAC, which searches for, recovers and identifies the remains of missing Americans from past wars for the U.S. Department of Defense. He found the location of the remains of two of his fel-

Edward Zimmerman, who was helping a Joint POW/MIA Accounting Command, or JPAC, search team, was due to land at the Wilkes-Barre/

Scranton International Airport at 5:30 Thursday evening, as his family waited with signs, balloons and American flags. But he faced a delay with a connecting flight in Chicago.

His wife, Cathy, and daughters Lori Kosierowski and Leah O'Boyle had been in touch with Zimmerman by iPhone while he was in Vietnam and learned he located the site based on his memories of the battle.

"They found the spot," Cathy Zimmerman said. "There was nothing there to see."

Ed and me with our backs to the crater on ridge line facing where Ed saw the two bodies

Nearly 50 years since the 77-day siege, one of the longest and bloodiest of the Vietnam War — and where Zimmerman earned a Bronze Star for saving a fellow Marine and a Purple Heart for a wound he suffered — the remains would be in the ground. But Mrs. Zimmerman said the JPAC team would have to secure funding to excavate for the remains, and that likely would not happen until next year.

She said the JPAC team is conducting other searches while over there, but they did this search first because her husband is considered an eyewitness.

Kosierowski, of Avoca, said her father brought the search team within two feet of the site.

"He even mentioned a stream that was in the area and they told him that there was no stream on their maps," she said in an email earlier this week. "But dad said to them that when they came around to that spot (during or before it got bad during the battle – don't really know) that they had been out of water and were glad to have that stream. So, after dad told them that they went to where he told them where the stream to be, some guys with him went and looked for it and found it. It totally validated everything dad said. He buried the marker and can now go forward with the mission."

As she and O'Boyle, of Duryea, waited at the airport with their mother and other family and friends, they recounted how proud they were of their father and relieved that he was coming home

Zimmerman, 65, flew to Oahu, Hawaii, three days after Memorial Day, to meet up with the JPAC team — which searches for, recovers and identifies the remains of missing Americans from past wars for the U.S. Department of Defense — to accompany them to Vietnam.

He was looking for the location of the remains of Pfc. Anthony John Pepper of Richmond, Virginia, and Cpl. James Mitchell Trimble of Eureka, California. Both of the missing were from the 2nd Battalion, 26th Marines, 3rd Marine Division — the same as Zimmerman — but they were with G, or Golf, Company. Zimmerman was with F, or Fox, Company.

O'Boyle said her father told her he learned Pepper was a radioman and Trimble had the unit's map, and the North Vietnamese killed them, hid their bodies and took the radio and map.

Zimmerman had always assumed the recovery teams that swept the area afterward had recovered the bodies of all of the Marines who died in the siege. But in 2007, while Zimmerman was looking at a Khe Sanh veterans website, he saw a photo of a memorial for Pepper.

So he made some contacts, and JPAC representatives contacted and visited him. After verifying the locations of where Zimmerman said the units were at the time, he was approved for the trip.

Cathy Zimmerman said her husband plans to return to Vietnam next year when JPAC excavates for the remains.

Cathy Zimmerman organizes welcome home signs at the Wilkes-Barre/Scranton International Airport meant to greet her husband, Edward Zimmerman, on Thursday evening after his long trip back to NEPA from Vietnam. But he faced a delay in Chicago.

GOLD STAR LAPEL BUTTON AND NEXT OF KIN DECEASED LAPEL BUTTON

By Betsy Beard
Editor "Taps" Magazine

Much confusion surrounds the significance of the lapel pins given to surviving family members shortly after the interment of their loved one who died while serving honorably in the Armed Forces. Although there may be differences in presentation between the branches of service, there is only one law that governs the procurement, awarding, and wearing of the pins. Each of the two lapel pins have been authorized by Act of Congress. The legal and military distinctions between the two are based on the place, time, and circumstances of the death, as well as the survivor's relationship to the deceased. For either pin, eligible family members include: widow, widower, mother, father, stepparent, parent through adoption, foster parent in loco parentis, son, daughter, stepchild , child by adoption, brother, sister, half brother, and half sister. No other family members are legally eligible to receive the pin.

GOLD STAR LAPEL BUTTON

The Gold Star Lapel Button was designed and created in 1947 for family members of those who died in combat. It is a gold star on a field of purple surrounded by laurel leaves. Gold Star Lapel Buttons are awarded to surviving family members of service members who have been killed in the specific conflicts listed in the "Information" section on the back of DD Form 3. The award authority is retroactive to World War I, and includes most subsequent conflicts. The law stipulates that only one button is furnished to each recipient, but a request for replacement of the Gold Star Lapel Button (lost, destroyed, or unserviceable) can be submitted on DD Form 3 (Application for Gold Star Lapel Button) to NPRC, 1 Archives Drive, St. Louis, MO 63138. If your loved one was killed during the time period of one of these conflicts, but not in the official area of the conflict you would receive the Next of Kin Deceased Personnel Lapel Button.

NEXT OF KIN DECEASED PERSONNEL LAPEL BUTTON

The Next of Kin Deceased Personnel Lapel Button was approved in 1973 for the primary next of kin of armed services members who lose their lives while serving on active duty or while assigned in an Army Reserve or Army National Guard unit in a drill status. It is a gold star on a gold background surrounded by four oak sprigs. The pin is authorized for issue retroactive to March 29, 1973. If you are a relative listed above and your loved one died while on active duty, but under circumstances that do not qualify you for the Gold Star Lapel Pin, you are entitled to the Next of Kin Deceased Personnel Lapel Button. The next of kin may request issue of the button by writing to the NPRC, 1 Archives Drive, St. Louis, MO 63138. Furnish the name, grade, SSN, and date of death of the deceased soldier. The names and relationships of the next of kin must also be provided.

BATTLE-SCARRED CORPSMAN BECOMES MARINE OFFICER

"He feels proud to return to the fight"

It's not often you see a midshipman hustling down Stribling Walk to get to class with a Combat Action Ribbon and a Purple Heart pinned to his dress uniform, but that was the last four years for Marine 2nd Lt. Jefferson Talicuran.

The 25-year-old former Navy corpsman, who was nearly discharged for a combat wound only years before, strode across the stage May 23 to accept his Naval Academy diploma and commission as a Marine Corps ground combat officer, more than seven years after he originally joined the Navy straight out of high school in San Diego.

Talicuran had known since boot camp that he wanted to attend the academy. He'd read about officer programs on the back of a professional development textbook, looked through the academy's requirements, and decided, hey, I can do this.

"That's how my quote-unquote 'American dream' started," he said in a May 20 phone interview.

But he had no idea he'd have to survive an Afghanistan deployment and the blast of an improvised explosive device to get there, making him one of a cadre of former sailors and Marines who are bringing their war experiences into the halls of the Navy's most prestigious institution.

'Out of your control'

Talicuran had joined the Navy at the urging of his uncle, a retired chief hospital corpsman, whom he lived with after emigrating from the Philippines in 2005. His uncle told him stories of caring for sailors underway and in clinics ashore. He decided to complete his professional training and get one deployment under his belt before applying to the academy, to make himself more competitive.

After "A" school, Talicuran got orders to Twentynine Palms, California, with a Marine Corps light infantry battalion. "I never thought that I was actually going to be attached to a Marine unit," he said. "That part of the story [my uncle] left off, because he was never with the Marines. I had no clue what I was getting myself into."

Talicuran deployed with 2nd Battalion, 7th Marines, in April 2008 to Sangin, a town in Afghanistan's southern Helmand province that became an epicenter of the fighting. Two months in, his squad walked past a bicycle on a foot patrol, and that was the end of his deployment.

"I was probably the fourth person to pass the bicycle and by the time I passed it, when I was about six feet away from it, it exploded," Talicuran said. "We never thought that a bicycle could be used as an IED."

Talicuran was badly injured, but he was conscious and able to walk away. He told his battle buddies how to patch him up so he wouldn't bleed out through the axillary artery under his arm. Talicuran now sports a massive scar on his left arm, but luckily no brain injury, he said.

After a short stint at Walter Reed National Military Medical Center, the Navy sent him to Balboa Navy Medical Center in San Diego to be closer to his family. He was on his way to a medical discharge, he said, but the academy dream was still there.

"Every single day, I would go do occupational therapy, do my exercises. I did that for a year," he said. Toward the end of his medical board, he recalled, he passed his fitness and medical tests, restoring him to full-duty medical status, the last milestone he needed before he put in his application to the academy.
"I guess you just have to realize that there are things that are out of your control, there are things that are in your control," he said. "Things that are in my control are to move on."

'The best thing'

TALICURAN IN AFGHANISTAN

He began his plebe year in the fall of 2010, at age 22 — four years older than most of his classmates. He said that boot camp was physically more difficult, mostly because he'd been much younger at the time, but that he wasn't prepared for the academy's academic rigors.
"I wished I went through preparatory school, because that would've helped me in academics," he said. "I graduated [high school] in 2006 and then I came here in 2010, so that's a while to be out of school."

Plus, Talicuran said, he'd never considered going to college before he decided to become an officer. On top of his age, his ribbon rack immediately set him apart from his fresh-out-of-high school shipmates.

"If I'm asked about my service, I would share my experience with my classmates or my company, but not necessarily put it in their faces," he said.

When it came time to pick a career track, he decided to stick with what he knew.

"I think it just happened because I joined the Navy, but I was really not familiar with the Navy side," he said. 'Of all my enlisted years, I've been with the Marines, and working with them was actually the best thing that happened to me."

He said he thinks his experience with junior enlisted Marines will make him a better officer, and that the guys from his own unit have told him they're proud that he's making the switch — and signing up to return to the fight.

"I think that coming back as a Marine officer is another way of serving them, again," Talicuran said.

TO MY FELLOW VIETNAM VETERANS "WELCOME HOME".
Michael O'Hara

On Monday, May 26, 2014 the Brown County Veterans of Foreign Wars Post 6195 hosted a Memorial Service on the Brown County Courthouse lawn to honor our fallen heroes. Below is the speech that guest speaker, Michael O'Hara gave to an audience of over 350 people.

I am duty bound to dedicate my remarks here today to the 120 Marines from my Bravo Company 1st Bn, 26th Marine Regiment, 57 of whom sacrificed everything during the eleven week period known as "The Siege of Khe Sanh". Like the Spartans at Thermopylae in 480 B.C. they fought for the greater good, yet, in the end, they died, like the Spartans, for each other. They would earn 3 Navy Crosses, 10 Silver Star Medals, 14 Bronze Star Medals and over 200 Purple Heart Medals for their valor. They contributed greatly to the Regiment being awarded the coveted Presidential Unit Citation. Their Heroism would have inspired Tennyson.

Like Marines before them and like those Marines who would follow, they were and are Semper Fidelis.

This morning we acknowledge the 50th anniversary of the Vietnam War. Let us be clear! This war was not started on the battlefield or on the high seas, but rather in a Joint Session of Congress, on 7 August 1964 with the passage of the Gulf of Tonkin Resolution. It should be noted only two Senators voted against it.

Effectively, the war ended for the American people, in Congress as well, with the passage of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1974 in the 93rd Congress. With our ground troops gone by then and our POWs home, the defunding of the Vietnamese government was the death nail in their coffin. With the passing of that act, the North then knew, the end was near. What they thought would take 24 months barely took 16 weeks before the tanks rolled into Saigon. The Socialist Republic of Vietnam was born.

Vietnam Veterans are somewhat different than most folks. Sometimes our families don't understand us. Maxine still complains because all those trip flares in the yard scare her cat and why does she still have to put up with all those sand bags piled around her doors and windows when the war has been over for 40 years.

Long before the Vietnam War was begun most of us who fought in that war were just young boys. Our heroes, our mentors were our fathers, our uncles, our teachers and our neighbors. They were the WWII generation. They taught us about the evils of Imperialism, Nazism and Communism. We learned from them about Mao Se Tung and the 1949 takeover of China and how the folks who helped our pilots in WWII were forced to flee to Taiwan. As young boys we learned of the Berlin Airlift and that awful wall which stood for nearly three decades imprisoning its citizens. By 1950 we would be at war with the Communists on the frozen tundra of the Korean Peninsula where we would give up over 35,000 of our finest young men holding back the Communists hordes.

L-R Annie Hunsinger, Commandant Marine Corps League, State of Indiana, Mrs. Rae McQueary, widow of fallen Marine Sgt Jeremy McQueary, Afghanistan 2010, Hadley McQueary Son & Michael O'Hara, B CO 1/26.

We watched the fall of Cuba into Communist hands with led eventually to the famous Cuban Missile crisis three years later. We saw how evil communism can be. We watched our young President, a decorated WWII veteran himself, back the Soviets down with the threat of force. We understood what they feared was not our missiles but our strength as a nation when we were united.

When our President called, we answered. We understood what our duty was when we came of age. Like our fathers our duty was to serve. We understood communism was evil. It was evil in 1917, it was evil in 1947 and it was evil in 1967 and is just as evil to this day.

Nothing in all these years has changed my mind on this issue. Nothing ever really changes.

In 1968, as I was fighting the North Vietnamese Army regulars at the remote combat base at Khe Sanh other NVA units rolled into the Imperial Capital city of Hue. In short order they rounded up all government officials, professors and teachers, 6,000 in all.

DON BIRDEN COMMANDER OF VFW POST 6195 PUTS FLAGS AROUND MEMORIAL ON COURTHOUSE LAWN

They were marched outside of the city limits and into pre-dug pits and summarily executed, buried in mass earthen unmarked graves.

Last November, as we were all enjoying our freedoms at the Larry C. Banks Memorial Gymnasium, while we were all breaking bread afterward, an event unfolded half way around the world. In communist North Korea, Kim Jong Un, ordered, and carried out, the execution of over 80 of his fellow citizens who had been deemed dissidents. It was reported he had the local citizens ordered into a stadium to witness this horrible event. Their crime you ask? They were said to have been caught with a copy of the Holy Bible in their homes. Things never change. Communism is evil. Communism does not allow human rights.

That's what it was about for most of us who went to Vietnam. It was a cause greater than ourselves and we felt then as we do today it was a righteous cause. Most if not all of us would do it again without hesitation.

Few people are even aware that the Vietnam War was the costliest war for Marines in the history of the Corps. It would have been far worse had it not been for the boys in blue. Did you know that in 1968, at the combat base at Khe Sanh, the USAF, in less than eleven weeks, dropped, in a five mile circle, more tonnage of high explosives than was dropped throughout the Pacific during the whole of WWII? Did you know it was the USAF that brought the North to its knees in December of 72 which brought about the signing of the Paris Peace Accords which provided for the release of our POW's and the withdrawal of our forces. That's right. North Vietnam capitulated, contrary to popular belief. The North only fully resumed their efforts after the signing of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1974 nearly two years later.

MICHAEL O'HARA AND CONGRESSMAN TODD YOUNG

The Vietnam War will be debated long after we all leave this earth. That is really not why we are here today. We come here on this Memorial Day to honor the sacrifices of those who fought for a cause greater than themselves and to always hold their memory near and dear to our hearts. They were as their forefathers were, great American heroes.

A noted journalist wrote a now famous book about a generation of great American heroes. Some would say he got it just right. May be! I would have chosen a different title. I would have called it The Greatest of a Generation. Great they were each and every one. But so too were those brave young Militiamen who stood at the Concord Bridge in 1775 who fired the shot heard round the world. Those who fought at Mexico, Gettysburg, Cuba and Belleau Wood, our young sons who lie buried yet in Belgium beneath the poppies of Flanders Field, each one a brave American Hero, each of their own generation.

Today it is my privilege and high Honor to introduce to you a "Few Good Men", men who offered their lives in defense of freedom of others, men who fought for a cause greater than themselves, men from my generation. They too are great American heroes.

Every generation has its "Captains of Industry". James V. Kimsey, West Point graduate served two tours in Vietnam as an Army Ranger. Inducted into the Army Ranger hall of fame he was the cofounder of AOL. Bob Parsons, served with the 26th Marines in 1969 and is the founder of GoDaddy.com.

Fred Smith is a highly decorated Marine Officer. SSM, BSM, 2 PHM. He graduated Yale in 1962. He also wrote a college paper on package delivery in the computer age. His professor gave him a C and laughed at him. He built one of the world's largest corporations. Last year they did $40 billion in sales and employed over 300,000 employees which is larger than our entire U.S. Navy. With his leadership skills developed in Vietnam leading Marines in battle Fred Smith built Federal Express.

Rick Rescorla watched, as a young boy, our Army paratroopers train for the Normandy invasion. He knew what he wanted to be. He was highly decorated at the battle of the Ia Drang Valley (We Were Soldiers Once). Mr. Rescorla went to work for Morgan Stanley in the late 80's in private security at the twin towers in New York city. With over 2,000 employees they consumed 44 floors of Tower Two. He warned the Port Authorities of the 93 bombing which occurred in the basement. No one would listen. He then warned that the terrorists would use civilian aircraft to attack the next time. Again, no one would listen. But Rick Rescorla was undaunted and he would not be denied. He was responsible for the employees at Morgan Stanley and he drilled them monthly on evacuation routes in the event of any emergency. He is credited with saving the lives of over 2,000 employees on 11 Sept 2001. He safely evacuated them in the stairwells by singing to them through his Bullhorn to keep them calm, an old Welsh fighting song "The Men of Harlech". Only one employee died that day.

Rick Rescorla had re-entered the building to ensure no one was left behind. He had just reached the tenth floor while on the phone with his wife. He had just told her that if he died that day he would die a happy man because of the love she had bestowed upon him throughout the course of their marriage. The phone went dead and the tower collapsed around him. His remains have never been recovered.

Keep in mind as well that it was the Vietnam Veterans and their families who brought about what is known today as the POW/MIA movement in this nation. That big black flag that you see hanging on the flagpole came about due to the dedication of many of those folks. Their work must not be understated. They are responsible for the honorable return of the remains of our Veterans from more than just Vietnam. I learned last Labor Day as I attended my reunion in Nashville Tennessee that one of the men I served with, Glenn Prentice, was actually one of the volunteers who excavated the grave of Marine Pfc Manley Winkley who we buried the week before at our state cemetery in Madison. I think we all remember that event.

Vietnam Veterans, collectively, have vowed to never ever let one of our heroes become lost or disrespected, no matter when or where they may have served. When our heroes were coming home from the wars in Asia and the Middle East they noticed a disturbing trend and rose to the occasion. Under the leadership of Vietnam Veteran Terry Houck of American Legion Post 136 in Mulvane Kansas, along with Veterans from other eras the Patriot Guard was formed.

We saw them in action last August here in Nashville when we buried the Winkley Marines. All two hundred of those magnificent men and women on their beautiful machines guarding the trail as a fellow Warrior came home to his final rest.

They are Semper Fidelis, Always Faithful.

For those of you who attended that event you may remember I pointed out to you a name on the plaque as you enter the offices at the cemetery in Madison. It is the name of Mr. William Jayne. He was the official with the VA in D.C. who over saw the grant money and construction of that cemetery in 2003. Bill is a good friend. We served together in the same rifle company in Vietnam. What you don't know is this. Bill was part of the initial group of young men, along with Jan Scruggs who had a vision for a great memorial to our fallen brethren. They worked tirelessly until it was done. The results of their efforts became the Vietnam Veterans Memorial in Washington D.C. better known as "The Wall".

Here in the state of Indiana one of our former Governors, Joe Kernan, was a graduate of Notre Dame and went on to serve as a Navy pilot. He was shot down over North Vietnam and spent eleven months in captivity. Joe came home to a successful career in politics. Joe presided over the dedication of our cemetery in Madison in 2003 as our Lt. Governor.

Ron Ridgeway was a POW released at the same time as Joe Kernan. He had been imprisoned for 5 years. He was captured in 1968 when his platoon was caught in an ambush by an overwhelming force. 26 died immediately while Ridgeway was severely wounded and knocked unconscious. The Company sent reinforcements but they too were repulsed. They were ordered to withdraw until morning.

When morning came orders from Washington had arrived. No recovery would be mounted. Marines loathed the thought of leaving their comrades in the field but Marines follow orders. Ridgeway was officially buried with the remains of 8 other Marines from that day in November 1968 at the Jefferson Barracks Cemetery in St Louis. His mother told the General her son was not dead and the Lord had assured her he would someday come home. Ron Ridgeway was from my Bravo Company. One of the Marines who was ordered to stand down stands before you this morning . It was 25/26 February 1968 at Khe Sanh RVN.

Another lesser known Hoosier was one of the bravest of the brave. After graduating from college Norman Jensen began a 24 year career in the USAF in 1956. By the time he began to affect my life it was in the winter of 1968. He piloted, on many occasions, his lumbering C 130 cargo plane back and forth from Da Nang to Khe Sanh bringing much needed men and material to the Marines during the Siege.

I watched many times as he brought his plane down through the low cloud cover, guided only by a WWII era radar signal.

Sometimes the ceiling was less than 100 ft. He did this time and time again and each time he landed his plane he would run the gauntlet facing murderous machinegun and anti-aircraft fire as he passed by the remains of the other C-130s that didn't make it, a reminder of friends who would never return.

The mortars and rockets would literally chase him up the runway as he slowed only long enough to offload supplies and personnel as he turned his aircraft around. As he squared up his aircraft for takeoff and applied the brakes, while revving up his engines, he gave us just precious moments to load our dead and wounded Marines who were homeward bound.

Each time he would make his run back down the runway, with his bullet ridden fuselage and those four big turboprops roaring, laden with its precious cargo, as the nose of that big Hercules began to lift and turn to the south away from the guns, 5,000 Marines would kneel in prayer. Colonel Jensen was awarded the DFC.

There exists to this day an iconic photo of Colonel Jensen's aircraft as he is lifting off the eastern end of the runway. In the foreground is a two story bunker with two Marines on top laying down suppressive fire with their .50 caliber machine gun. Flying overhead on a background of Navy Blue was the golden Torch of Freedom, the flag of the great state of Indiana. GO HOOSIERS!

After the war, Colonel Jensen started an 18 year career at Valparaiso University here in Indiana where he taught mechanical engineering. He started the first Co-Op program in Indiana which helped young Hoosiers advance their careers in engineering. Sadly he flew his final mission last May.

I'm sure all in attendance today remember too, our good friend Robert "Buck" Stogsdill, US Navy, former two term County Sheriff. Buck worked tirelessly for many years in our community of Veterans. In the early days of the BCVV Buck, along with others would gather every year on the afternoon of Christmas Eve (8-10 yrs) at a bakery near Gnawbone, Indiana. They would peel potatoes, snap green beans and make preparations for their Christmas gift to the community. After spending the evening at home with their families, Buck and his friends would rise early on Christmas morn and arrive back at the bakery around 5 a.m. to prepare multiple turkeys. By 9:00 A.M. they would be off in their vehicles to the four corners of the county delivering to those less fortunate.

Sometimes they would deliver to a Veteran who was a shut in but more often than not it was some young unfortunate couple who had nothing for their holiday meal. Sometimes they even managed to round up a present or two for the small ones who had nothing under their trees.

Our Vietnam Veterans continue to silently go about the business of taking care of each other and their fellow warriors from other wars. GySgt Dave Turner, former Marine and Vietnam Vet, now deceased, had a vision to create what became the Brown County Honor Guard.

Hardly a week goes by that they don't provide that last measure of respect for a fallen Veteran. These days they are mostly the heroes we looked up to so many years ago, our WWII Veterans. There are of course Veterans from other eras who participate as well and God Bless you each and every one and Thank You for your service as well. One Marine I especially respect is from the northern part of the county. He was wounded severely in Vietnam early on in his tour and spent months in the hospital only to be returned to his original unit to finish out his tour with the 2nd Bn, 4th Marine Regiment, otherwise known as, "The Magnificent Bastards" (ones) for their tenacity and their willingness to engage the enemy on the ground. Coupled with the residual effects from his war wounds his COPD is so bad sometimes others have to carry his weapon back to the van after their funeral details because he gets so winded. But he continues to show up. Bill Parsons is one of our heroes, representative of the many as opposed to the few.

But there are always those who fall through the cracks and when we know about them it is our solemn duty to tend to their honor. While we were all sleeping safe in our beds a long time ago on a lonely ridge top somewhere in the jungles of South America along the Columbian border a young career soldier gave up his life. He was on a still classified covert operation. His family was never given a Purple Heart or any other acknowledgement of his bravery or his sacrifice. They were only given a folded flag with the three complimentary shell casings tucked inside. Staff Sergeant John E. Waugh USA, one of our unsung American Heroes gave his life for his country. His honor is clean, his sacrifice great and we should never forget.

SSgt Waugh died in the arms of his commanding officer, now retired Army Colonel Rick White, Commander of our Honor Guard.

Two years ago we stood on this hallowed ground and gave tribute to three brave young Warriors with ties to our county who paid the ultimate price for their service during the war on terror.

Pfc Stephen Paul Downing, CWO Brian Hazelgrove and Marine Sgt Jeremy McQueary, were all great American Heroes, of the next generation.

Last year we paid tribute to Brown County's only known Missing in Action since the Korean War, Clyde Goe. It is a good thing that their families know that others care and appreciate their sacrifices. It too is a good thing we, not just as Veterans, but we as a community, have continued to come to this hallowed place to honor our heroes, for it is the Honorable thing to do. But let no one here today fail to understand, not man, woman, or child, this place is Hallowed ground.

When I began my remarks I jokingly stated how our families don't really understand us. For the families I leave you with a line from the famous poet W. B.Yeats: (Stolen Child). "For the World's More Full of Weeping than You Can Understand " God Bless you all here today and pray ye, each and every one, that He continues to Bless and watch over us as a nation.

Godspeed and Semper Fidelis.

LTCOL KEN PIPES INTERVIEW PRIOR TO SHOWING OF THE DOCUMEMTARY,

"BRAVO, COMMON MEN , UNCOMMON VALOR."

THIS ARTICLE IS FROM MARCH 2014

They were days of survival, just south of the Demilitarized Zone in Vietnam during the winter of 1968.

Ken Pipes was there; he was in charge of Bravo Company, a unit so badly battered in the war that most of its Marines had been injured and replaced with fresh riflemen in the weeks before the start of a prolonged siege on Khe Sanh Combat Base that January.

Pipes, who lives in Fallbrook, told me this week that his memories of the battle are still vivid and loud, recalling the constant bombardment from both sides, and the devastating ambush that no survivor can forget.

"One of the reasons we join the Marine Corps is to be prepared for those kinds of situations," Pipes said, and yet, "It was almost overpowering, the responsibility. What made it, I suppose, worthwhile was working with those Marines who were in the company. It still amazes me how well they did, how professionally they conducted themselves, and what tough warriors they were."

The occasion for Pipes' recollections is a feature-length documentary about the battle at Khe Sanh that will be screened twice in North County on March 22 — once in Vista and again in Fallbrook.

The film focuses on a six-week period during the siege that began when a platoon was ambushed outside the base. Twenty-six of Pipes' Marines were killed that day, while a number of others were severely injured and evacuated.

But it was the daily sight of the fallen that would haunt those who remained on the base: "We were told there would be no more operations outside the wire, so we couldn't go out and get them, but we could see them out there for six weeks," Pipes recalled.

On March 30, the Marines counter-attacked and recovered the 26 bodies, seven of which were returned to the U.S. unidentified and buried in a common grave at Jefferson Barracks in Missouri.

Pipes still remembers the day in 1973 when he watched one of the men who had been assumed killed among those seven step off a plane full of prisoners of war after their release.

"He was alive, and he'd been a prisoner for five years at the Hanoi Hilton," Pipes said. As the man's company commander, he had written the letter himself: "Presumed killed. Body not recovered."

"No one knew he had been captured," he said.

Pipes also remembers crawling through the trenches to check on his men, carrying a bottle of whiskey from his stepfather's liquor store in Central California.

"Mom would send me some green-labeled Jack Daniels and I'd save it so that when I went down checking lines and talking to Marines, I'd give them a sip of whiskey," he said. "So they knew we cared about them, and worried about them."

Meanwhile, the North Vietnamese troops surrounding the base sustained much higher casualties — perhaps totaling 10,000, Pipes estimated — as U.S. forces dropped more than 100,000 tons of bombs on the hills around Khe Sanh.

"We respected them very highly," he said of those unseen enemies. "They were as good of troops as the Marines have faced in the modern era."

The two and a half months spent on the front lines of the Tet Offensive defined many a survivor's life, Pipes explained.

"It was a real honor to be with them, to be one of them throughout that battle," he told me. "Even today, I'm in touch with a good many of them, and we've become friends over all these years."

During a reunion in 2008, a writer named Ken Rodgers started interviewing survivors. Rodgers was a survivor himself, and one of the Bravo Company Marines under Pipes' command.

"By that time, it was one friend interviewing another friend, and all of the people he interviewed had that common experience," Pipes said. "The hard part of that interviewing process was bringing back all of these feelings."

The interviews would form the basis for the documentary titled "Bravo! Common Men, Uncommon Valor," produced by Rodgers and his wife, Betty.

"I have nothing invested in this except a lot of emotion," Pipes said. "It doesn't praise war, it's just these guys' experiences. Some of them are very stark, there's a little humor on occasion, but it's an action-packed two hours."

POET EXPLORES WAR EXPERIENCE

FRED ROSENBLUM WRITES SEARINGLY ABOUT VIETNAM

By John Wilkens12:30 p.m.May 24, 2014

Fred Rosenblum went to fight the Vietnam War in 1968 when he was 19, full of Hollywood images about the glory of combat. He came back changed by what he saw and did. Eventually he started putting his impressions down on paper in the form of poetry.

"Hollow Tin Jingles," a collection of 50 war poems, opens with one called "The Final Episode of Leave It to Beaver" and ends with one called "Fort Rosecrans." In between is a journey of searing reflection on his military service, much of it laced with ironic pop culture references that ground the work in its time and place and make it achingly real. After the war, Rosenblum moved to Alaska and worked on a fishing boat, went to Hawaii and got married, moved back to Alaska and chopped firewood. He farmed for a while in Washington state. Now retired, he and his wife of 40 years live in San Diego.

Rosenblum dedicated his book "to those, living and dead, who shared the experience."

Q: How did you wind up in the Marines?

A: I lived out in El Cajon and I watched a lot of television back in those days and I was just pretty much brainwashed. I loved the Marine Corps, too, even after I went in.

Q: Did you have any family history in the military?
A: My dad was in the Coast Guard in World War II. My uncle was in Korea in the Army.

Q: How long were you in Vietnam?

A: 13 months.

Q: What did you do over there?

A: I started out in Phu Bai, right on the water, about eight miles from Hue City. I was a 60 (mm) mortar man. Then we moved about, moved up to Khe Sanh and the hills around there. Hill 881. I spent like three months up on 881.

Q: Were you writing poetry then?

A: (Laughter) No.

Q: How did you start writing poems?

A: Actually, I did write poems in high school but I had a long dry spell after I got out of the Marine Corps. I was cutting firewood and supporting a young family and I just, I don't know, I just had to vent that energy that was nagging at me. I went back to writing and I guess I sort of found my voice again.

Q: Over what period of time did you write this collection?

A: Some of these were written as far back as the early '80s. Some of the recent ones, about a year ago, before I even went into the final edition.

Q: Tell me what the title means.

A: It's pretty esoteric. I can give it a shot for you, although I usually like to leave it to people to figure out for themselves.

Q: Well, I have some ideas about it but I wanted to hear it from you.

A: On one hand, it's composed of 50 songs sung in homage to the dead and so-called survivors of the Vietnam War. On the flip side, it represents the contrasting symbols of identification some of us wore in subtle defiance to the dog tags. Is that what you thought it was about?

Q: I thought from the words "hollow" and "tin" it had something to do with dog tags.

A: Yes. There's a poem in the book ("So Ugly Too Early") that talks about love beads and dog tags. (After this interview, Rosenblum said in an email he went looking through items in storage and found both his love beads and his dog tags. And a belt he took off a dead North Vietnamese Army soldier during Operation Ford in 1968.)

Q: Tell me some more about why you wrote these poems. You talked earlier about venting energy.
A: Most of the poems are like snapshots of real incidents. I wanted to balance the actual incidents with some aesthetics, but at the same time I tried to keep the focus on accuracy. Some of the sketches reflect typical day-to-day experiences. Others are not as personal.

Q: What did you get out of writing them?

A: I'm not really a student of the healing-through-art school of thought. It really hasn't worked for me. There are workshops all around the country where people go to write and they find it therapeutic. It's just not that way for me.

Q: You must find something worthwhile in it, though, or why do it?

A: What I get out of it is I'm able to give a voice to people who can't spill their guts. It also gives me a chance to talk about something that I know and to play with words at the same time.

Q: What do you hope the poems say about your war experience?

A: I didn't keep a diary. A few photos maybe. I'm just trying to give the historians a unique perspective. It talks at length about what it was like for us as a culture. It's a period piece, really.

Q: Have you read it to other Vietnam vets?

A: I did go to St. Louis last year, to Springfield, and I read there. It was for an anthology I was in. I read extensively to a lot of vets and families of vets. All the reaction I got was positive.

Q: One of the reviews of your poems said it "sets the bar high for quality in Vietnam War literature." That kind of thing must feel good.

A: It does. I'm 65. I've sent a lot of these poems off to be published and I've had a lot of rejection and finally just all of a sudden I fell into a groove. I'm elated.

I GET MAIL
SOUND OFF

March 20, 2014

Dear Tom,

I enjoyed reading the Red Clay about Lloyd "Short round' Scudder. I managed to give him some Raven tee shirts I had. Ravens were FACs that flew over Laos kind of 'civilianized' AF guys from Vietnam.

This is about the time of Khe Sanh from back then when the 553rd Reconnaissance Wing maintained 'Blue Orbit' over KSAB.

I had been writing a book about it all this time when I had a artery problem in 2011. I have been okay since then but I don't stray out too far since I take voice muscle stimulation trying to get my swallowing to improve. Radiation in the throat is not a fun thing.

I read about Dennis Barnett's death though I never met him. Everyone from Young County Texas that served in the military is engraved on a memorial in Graham, Texas, his home town. I was born and raised in Olney, about 24 miles north of there and now live on my grandfather's old ranch at Post Oak, 20 miles north of Jacksboro, Texas where he married his wife, Florie. Small world isn't it?

I read some interest about how badly we Vietnam vets were treated back then and wanted to give a comment to those of our guys that never knew the real story. Russian KGB agents were planted around America to advise a number of organizations to oppose that war. Those of us in the Intelligence Community that had a chance to read those top secret code word reports could not tell how we got all that special information; it would have compromised our means of getting it. You may remember SDS, the 'Students for a Democratic Society', Jane Fonda's husbands organization like the American Communism Party as well as the NAACP, CORE and minority groups to oppose the war.
Demonstrating in college about what a country does was an old European activity; people wanting a change in money and prestige to suit their own needs by blaming attention to foreign war efforts. They claimed we 'murdered babies', 'killed innocent people' and 'fought in another countries right' when what they really wanted was a free education instead going to fight anywhere. The KGB efforts were extremely effective and so many Americans began to believe it and that joined those anti-war activities are now in elevated positions trying to hide their earlier positions.

Now we give our military a better status as if to hide how we Korean and Vietnam vets were treated back then. We all fought against communism's effort to encompass those Asian countries while our later wars are actually a fight against oil and the Muslim use to take over the world. Japan does not allow Muslims to settle there and I wish we didn't either.

Well, enough said for now and I appreciate getting the magazine. I have missed corning to the reunions and hope to try and come in the future. I need to send you a check for remembering me.
Regards

COMMUNUCATIONS AT KHE SANH
From Historical Branch G-3 Division Headquarters U.S. Marine Corps
The Battle For Khe Sanh

Although the berms were prime targets, the ASRT, MATCD, FDC, 26th Marines communications center, and other units which depended on sophisticated and delicate equipment suffered from the heavy shelling. Consequently, they all had one common problem--maintenance. The normal difficulties associated with keeping the various radars, radios, antennae, generators, and cooling components in an "up" status were complicated by the constant incoming, the. dust, and the limited supply of replacement items. The vans and bunkers were heavily sandbagged but antennae and some communication lines .were exposed and frequently knocked out by enemy rounds.

The speed with which the vital installations were returned to operation served as a tribute to the technicians who maintained the equipment under the most adverse conditions imaginable. In one instance, a l22mm rocket exploded a scant seven meters from the ASRT-B van and sheared off most of the radio antennae. Thanks to several trouble shooters who braved the intense barrage and repaired the damage, the station was back on the air within 20 minutes. Such performances were routine. The ASRT normally operated 23 hours a day and shut down one hour for maintenance. The ATCU; which was essential for ground-controlled approaches and paradrops, was kept operable 95 percent of the time.

Major John A. Shepherd, Communications Officer of the 26th Marines, was responsible for the vast network which enabled the ground commanders to keep abreast of the situation, and in touch with their units. The major praised the accomplishments of his men, stating that they "provided support in winning every' battle, firing every round of artillery, controlling every air strike, and providing the means to receive every-bean and bullet."

There were six radio relay teams which kept open 52 channels between Khe Sanh and the outside World. In addition, there were five external teletype nets in operation 24-hours a day. Radio relay provided voice and teletype, inks to agencies at Dong Ha and Da Nang.

For classified information, there were two secure voice circuits operating full time. One net linked the Combat Operations Center of the 26th Marines to that of the 3d Marine Division at Dong Ha, The other, the Regimental Tactical Net, enabled Colonel Lownds to disseminate hot information to his battalion commanders.

To protect it against the artillery, mortar, and rocket attacks, all communication equipment was either underground or heavily sandbagged. Major Shepherd moved his communications center into a shelter which was made from, 4 conex boxes, 16 feet underground. This nerve center housed the teletype equipment and switchboards which provided service for 65 on-base subscribers and 40 external radio relay voice circuits.

In spite of the protective measures, the antenna and internal wire system sustained damage on a daily basis. Following every barrage, wiremen tracked down cuts and spliced them and repaired damaged antennae so that the various nets were back in operation within minutes. The maintenance and repair of the electronic devices used for perimeter security placed an additional burden on the communicators

JOHN "JACK" CORBETT USMC KHE SANH VETERAN, H&S CO 1/26 81MM

John (Jack) Corbett, a former Nyack resident, died June 22, 2014, in Key Largo, Florida, where he resided for many years.

Born in 1947 to Dr. John and Dorothy Falt Corbett, he graduated from St. Ann's School, and St. John's Seminary in Horseshead, NY. Jack was a Marine who fought in Vietnam and throughout his life he was dedicated to the Marines and the memory of Khe Sanh. He was an avid fisherman and loved the time he spent near the ocean as well as traveling extensively throughout the country. In later years, he authored a book about his experiences called West Dickens Avenue which was selected as a Veterans Book of the Month. His friends in Nyack always knew when he returned in his KHE SANH decorated van. Jack is survived by his wife, Beth; son, Mark (Kane) and grandson, Kaiden in Florida, several brothers and sisters, Dorothy Corbett McClafferty of Nyack, Katherine (Larry) Rudden of Washingtonville, NY, Joseph Corbett of Nyack, Mary Corbett of Nyack, Gerard Corbett (Debbie) of Valley Cottage, NY, Noreen Fioriti (Jerry) of Rock Tavern, NY, as well as many nieces and nephews. He was predeceased by his brother, James.

Jack will be remembered for his kindness and love of life. A memorial service will be held at a later date.

Military historians frequently ask, when writing about the Marine Corps, "Where do they find such men?" In Mr. Corbett's case, as with the rest of us Marines, they are found, one at a time, by that most stalwart of men, the Marine Corps Recruiter. Interestingly, Corbett, prior to making contact with his recruiter in Nyack, New York, had given more than a fleeting thought to heading for Canada. He had enrolled in college, then, in a moment of defiance, tore up his draft notice. Later, at one of the neighborhood watering holes, he met and had a few beers with an old high school chum who had enlisted in the Marines a year earlier and had just returned home as badly wounded, recovering, disabled combat veteran. The next day, on a dare from his long time friend, Corbett enlisted for two years in the United States Marine Corps. This then is his story as You will be with him on this hard ride and live Corbett's tour with and along side him. It is a recent Military Book of the Month selection—for excellent reasons. This book has become one of the few outstanding personal stories that add immeasurably to the history of Marine involvement in the Vietnam War.

As seen through the eyes of and experienced by an infantry mortar man of some the most vicious and costly fighting of the Vietnam War; TET 1968!

He tracks the usual experience of a newly caught East Coast Marine; Paris Island for Boot Camp, Camp Pendleton for advanced infantry training and the trip to the exotic and dangerous country of Vietnam, via Okinawa, Japan! Finally, Danang and assignment to Khe Sanh as a member of the Mortar Platoon, First Battalion, Twenty Sixth Marines—arriving there just in time to become an active participant in the Second Battle of Khe Sanh; The 77 day Siege of the Combat Base!

For the next 13 months the First Battalion would be his home away from home. Remember, unlike the other branches of our in-country forces, barring being killed or seriously wounded, a Marine's tour was one month longer! A lot could and did happen to a Marine infantryman during that last month of field combat duty; all of it life threatening, to include being added to the growing list of Marines Killed in Action! Surviving one thirteen month tour as an enlist Marine in an infantry battalion easily equated to the multiple three, four and six month tours experience by other members of our military forces. When you finish Corbett's book you will understand why this is an absolute truth!

Corbett's book fills a void that exists in Marine Corps history of that time and place; Northern I Corps, 1968. His is a very personal prospective of a grunt, a mortar man and a Mud Marine who saw, experienced and was a participant in the month after month vicious, close in, life giving and life taking War of Professionals; the North Vietnamese Army and our Corp's Band of Brave and Heroic Marine Riflemen! He like his brethren, asked little, gave much and, to this day, has received little or no recognition of their superhuman efforts and sacrifices. As an aside, Corbett's now officially documented experiences does not easily correspond to our past history. If parallels can be made, his story more closely equates to that told of Morrell's Marauders and the Chindits of World War Two fame, or perhaps, our Caribbean excursions between the Big Wars! For Corbett and his mates, there were few breaks from continuous combat; there was only a small, beckoning Saviors light at the end of a 395 day tunnel! Corbett made it!

He survived the Siege at Khe Sanh, operations in Leatherneck Square, the A Shau Valley, Elephant Valley, the Go Noi Islands, the An Hoa Basin, Liberty Bridge and Dodge City to name just a few of the more interesting and dangerous locations that appeared on his 395 day travel itinerary of that exotic country! If you have read or researched the Battle of Khe Sanh and other major fights in Northern I Corps, during and after the 1968 TET Offensive, this is a book that you will want to add to your collection. It is not a view of strategy or of tactics; he does not address the greater questions of the reasons why we were there or why we should not have been involved. His is the rarest of all Marine stories and history.

A native Virginian, Roger was the son of the late John L. Sullivan and Janie Emma Curtis. He graduated from Spotsylvania High School in 1964, attended Richmond Professional Institute for one year, and then joined the U.S. Army in January 1966.

Roger served proudly with the 5th Special Forces Group MACV-SOG, Command & Control North, in Vietnam, the most decorated unit during the Vietnam War. While operating with Recon Team Krait out of Khe Sanh, Vietnam, he was critically wounded on February 19, 1968 and medevaced to Japan. For his courageous service, he was awarded the Silver Star, Bronze Star for Valor, Presidential Unit Citation, Purple Heart, Air Medal, Vietnam Cross of Gallantry with Palm, Vietnam Civil Actions Honor Medal, First Class, Combat Infantryman Badge, and Vietnam Service Medal with Two Bronze Stars. After recovery, Roger was returned to 6th Special Forces Group, Ft. Bragg, where he was discharged in December 1968.

Roger returned to college at VCU, earning his degree in Business Management (Real Estate). He was successful in the real estate and insurance business until redirecting his focus and interests and certifying as a National Service Officer for a Veterans Service Organization. He became a passionate champion for Veterans' rights and developed an all-consuming devotion to advocating on their behalf at every level. He retired as NSO six years ago, but he continued to help Veterans daily until his illness this year.

A service to honor Roger was held Monday, May 12, at 2:00 at Woody Funeral Home, 1771 N. Parham Road. There was visitation with the family before the service at 1:00. THE LAST OF THE ORIGINAL NAVAJO CODE TALKERS PASSES AWAY

Chester Nez, the last of the original Navajo code talkers credited with creating an unbreakable code used during World War II, died June 5 at his home in Albuquerque, New Mexico, the Navajo Nation President said. He was 93.

(CNN) -- For more than two decades, Chester Nez kept silent about his role as one of the original Navajo code talkers responsible for developing an unbreakable code during World War II.

His death Wednesday at his home in Albuquerque, New Mexico, at age 93 was lamented by the Marine Corps as the end of an era -- for both the country and its armed forces.

"We mourn his passing but honor and celebrate the indomitable spirit and dedication of those Marines who became known as the Navajo code talkers," the Marines said in a statement.

Nez was the last remaining of the original 29 Navajos recruited by the Marine Corps to develop the legendary code that was used for vital communications during battle.

He was a teenager when he was recruited in 1942 and assigned with the other code talkers to the Marine Corps' 382nd Platoon at Camp Pendleton. Together, they created a code, including developing a dictionary.

Military authorities chose Navajo as a code language because its syntax and tonal qualities were almost impossible for a non-Navajo to learn, and it had no written form. The ranks of the Navajo code talkers swelled to more than 300 by the end of the war in 1945.

The code talkers were forbidden from telling anyone about it -- not their fellow Marines, not their families -- until their work was declassified in 1968. The original 29 were presented with the Congressional Gold Medal in 2001 by President George W. Bush.

"In developing our code, we were careful to use everyday Navajo words, so that we could memorize and retain the words easily," Nez told CNN in 2011 while promoting his book "Code Talker."

"I think that made our job easier, and I think it helped us to be successful in the heat of battle." Still, Nez said he worried every day that an error might cost the life of an American military service member.

Nez was among the code talkers who were shipped out to Guadalcanal in 1942, where the code talkers worked in teams of two, with one relaying and receiving messages while the other cranked the portable radio and listened for errors in transmission. "That was my first combat experience, and there was a lot of suffering and a lot of the condition was real bad out there," he told CNN's Larry King in 2002.

Nez also fought in Guam and Peleliu.

"When bombs dropped, generally we code talkers couldn't just curl up in a shelter," Nez wrote in his book. "We were almost always needed to transmit information, to ask for supplies and ammunition, and to communicate strategies. And after each transmission, to avoid Japanese fire, we had to move."

The code talkers faced initial resistance from fellow Marines who did not understand who they were and what they were doing.

That changed once they understood the importance of the code, Nez said.

The Navajo code baffled the Japanese, who had successfully deciphered codes used by the U.S. Army. After the war, the Japanese chief of intelligence, Lt. General Seizo Arisue, admitted they were never able to crack the Navajo code used by the Marines and Navy, according to the Navy.

Nez was discharged in 1945, but later volunteered to fight in the Korean War.

After the code talkers' exploits were declassified by the military, the group gained legendary status with books and, ultimately, a movie that was inspired by their stories.

"The recognition of the code talkers came late, but it has been good for my Navajo people. I hope that this type of recognition continues across cultures," Nez said.

The 2002 film "Wind talkers," starring Adam Beach and Nicolas Cage, followed the fictional account of two Marines assigned to protect two code talkers during the battle of Saipan.

"I could understand when they sent the message and received on the other end," Nez said. "I could understand, and I could sit there and write it down myself. I still remember it."

It was a far cry from his childhood, when he was forced to attend a boarding school and punished by the teachers for speaking Navajo, according to his book.

It's a language, though, that appears lost even to many members of his own family.

"My own children do not speak Navajo, although my daughter-in-law ... speaks it well," he said.

Nez said he decided to tell his story because he wanted to share the contributions and sacrifices of the Navajo during World War II.

"Our Navajo code was one of the most important military secrets of World War II. The fact that the Marines did not tell us Navajo men how to develop that code indicated their trust in us and in our abilities," he said.

"The feeling that I could make it in both the white world and the Navajo world began there, and it has stayed with me all of my life. For that I am grateful." The Navajo Nation's flags have been ordered lowered in Nez's honor, President Ben Shelly said

A BLAST FROM THE PAST

KHE SANH VETERAN SERGEANT CHARLES LYNN BANEY HONORED POSTHUMOUSLY AT FORT LEE

In a moving dinner ceremony, the 245th Quartermaster General, Major General James M. Wright, presented Lucy Baney a commendation and a plaque honoring her son for his service in Vietnam as a parachute rigger in the U.S Army's 109th Quartermaster Air Delivery Company.

Baney was killed on October 15, 1967, in the crash of an Air Force C-130 on its final approach of an airdrop mission to the beleagured Marine Garrison at Khe Sanh.

The presentation was accompanied by a standing ovation of some 400 attendees including the top leadership of the Quartermaster Corps. Accompanying Mrs. Baney in accepting the award were Baney's sister, Sandra Johnson of Warsaw, and Baney's commanding officer, retired Colonel Albert B. Lanier of Raleigh, NC

The Distinguished Member of the Regiment award recognizes military and civilians (active and Retired) for their outstanding performance and distinguished contribution to the Quartermaster Corps. A plaque with names of all Distinguished Members of the Regiment is permanently displayed in Mifflin Hall at Fort Lee, the home of the Quartermaster Corps.

Baney, the son of Mr. and Mrs. Marion Baney and a graduate of Warsaw Community High School entered the U.S. Army in 1965. He was stationed at Fort Leonard Wood Missouri, Fort Benning Georgia, and Campbell Kentucky, prior to being assigned to Vietnam in July 1967.

He completed the Army Infantry Basic Course: Army Airborne School: and Parachute Packing Maintenance and Air Delivery School. He was awarded the Parachute Badge, Parachute Riggers Badge, National Defense Service Medal and the Vietnam Service Medal.

As an elite "Red Cap" parachute rigger assigned to the 109th Quartermaster Company, he was assigned in the preparation and parachute delivery of supplies and equipment to units that had been cut off from normal methods of re-supply. It was in that role, flying as an on-board parachute rigger, that Baney was killed in action at Khe Sanh, during the height of the Vietnam War.

"Baney was an outstanding young soldier that demonstrated the highest traditions of the Parachute Riggers, the Quartermaster corps and the United States Army," Lanier said! "He provided an outstanding role model that was worthy of emulation by his peers.

"I was extremely proud to have him as a member of the 109th which established the U.S. Army's still standing airdrop record during 1967-68. Sgt. Baney was an integral part of the U.S. Army's flexible response unit that had been centrally stationed at Cam Ranh Bay by General William C. Westmoreland in 1968 to provide emergency logistical supply throughout the country."

Baney is also survived by sister Amy Sills and brother Donald Lockridge, as well as many relatives from the Warsaw area. He is interred at Legion Circle in Oakwood Cemetery, Warsaw.

In the image section, Col. Al Lanier (ret.) is accepting the " Quartermaster Corps Distinguished Unit of the Regiment" award in 1997 from Quartermaster General Wright.

Also pictured is Col. William "Rigger" Mortis (Ret) who was a 1st Lt. in the 109th in January of 1968. Also at the awards, Lucy Baney, mother of Charles Lynn Baney who was killed in a C-30 crash at Khe Sanh. Charles' mother accepted the award of "Quartermaster Corps Distinguished Member of the Regiment", presented by Quartermaster General Wright. Charles was serving in the 109th when killed on the Khe Sanh low altitude Air Delivery flight.

A LITTLE HISTORY OF THE 109TH QUARTERMASTER COMPANY

The 109th Quartermaster Company (Air Delivery) arrived in Vietnam in August, 1966. The company was situated at the northernmost end of Cam Ranh Bay, overlooking the 6th Convalescent Center. The 109th remained active until 31 January, 1972, at which time it was inactivated.

The Air Delivery Unit of the 109th QM Co. designation never returned to the US from Vietnam. In 1983 the 109th designation was reactivated as a Quartermaster Petroleum Company.

The 109th was the only stand alone Air Delivery Company in Vietnam, and the only Air Delivery Company listed in the "Order Of The Battle Vietnam". Other air delivery units that made contributions are included in this history. Care has been taken to document the history included in these pages.

The 109th played an important role in many major events in of the Vietnam War, including resupply of the 173rd Airborne Brigade ("The Herd") combat jump in Operation Junction City in 1967; repair of the Khe Sanh Combat Base runway in September, 1967; critical emergency supply missions at Khe Sanh during the 77-day siege of 1968; emergency Tet 1968 air drops; A Shau Valley, April May, 1968; supplying 5th Special Forces, 1967 and 1968, as rebuilding Lang Vei after it was over run; rigging "Daisy Cutters" (large bombs to clear jungle areas for landing zones) which were dropped from C-130 transport aircraft; and the 1971 invasion of Laos by ARVN troops.

The 109th, 383rd, and 623rd all played a major role in the airdrops delivering over 8,000 tons of supplies by parachute and extraction systems that set a record of most tonnage ever drop into actual combat for a 30 day period during Khe Sanh and TET68. A record that still holds to this day.

On November 2, 1999 documents were received which clearly documents the 109th, not only rigged "necessary supplies, equipment, and mail" for inside Cambodia during the Cambodian Invasion, but also extracted captured enemy supplies out of Cambodia.

The documentation also refers to "members of our unit (109th) in Cambodia" in May and June 1970. In addition to the official documentation, Dale Larsen wrote a personal note: "We were spread out among the 1st Calvary. Our job was to sling out captured supplies and move heavier equipment around using slings, Chinooks and Sky Cranes." "We also had a couple of our guys with the Special Forces unit outside of Ban Me Thuot.

In June, 1997, the US Army Quartermaster Corps recognized the efforts of the 109th when it received the "Distinguished Unit of the Regiment" award. This is the highest award a unit can receive from the Quartermaster Corps.

KHE SANH VETERAN LIEUTENANT COLONEL THOMAS A. RICHARDS , THEN CORPORAL HOTEL CO 2/9 USMC

Lieutenant Colonel Thomas A. Richards (USMC, RET, Beloved husband, dedicated friend, avid veterans' advocate, American patriot and highly decorated Marine passed away on Wednesday, June 18, 2014. Thomas A. Richards was born to (and preceded in death by) Howard Thomas and Vera Nelson Richards in Madison, WI on April 4, 1947. His bear hugs, ear to ear smiles, bellowing laughter, incredibly warm disposition and zeal for life will be dearly missed.

Tom was raised on the west side of Madison, WI and attended Randall Elementary School and West Middle and High School. As a high school sophomore, he discovered his aptitude for long distance running and became a star runner on both the cross country and track teams. His love of running continued throughout his life, including competing in several marathons. Following his graduation from high school, he worked as a machinist.

In 1967, Tom joined the Marine Corps and found his life's passion. After completing recruit training he was selected to attend scout sniper school and Vietnamese Language School at the Defense Language Institute in Monterey. He was then assigned to Company H, 2nd Battalion, 9th Marines in the Republic of Vietnam where he earned a meritorious combat promotion to the rank of sergeant, the Navy Cross Medal for valor in combat, and the Purple Heart Medal for his wounds. Upon completing his assignment with the 9th Marines, Tom served as a drill instructor at Marine Corps Recruit Depot San Diego. While serving as a drill instructor he was selected for the Marine Associate Degree Completion Program, received his associate's degree, and was selected to attend Officer Candidate School through the Marine Corps' Enlisted Commissioning Program. He was commissioned as a second lieutenant.

Tom served four tours in infantry units and in various staff positions from battalion to division level. In addition to the Navy Cross and Purple Heart, Tom was awarded numerous other personal decorations and service medals, including the Meritorious Service Medal, Navy Commendation Medal (two awards), the Army Achievement Medal, the Combat Action Ribbon and the Marine Corps Good Conduct Medal, of which he was most proud. He retired in 1995 as a Lieutenant Colonel.

Both during and after the Corps, Tom's civic service and pursuit of academic excellence was legendary. He actively participated in the Legion of Valor and served as its National Commander, 2008. He was widely known for his nine years serving with Spirit of the Fourth, Inc. in the Rancho Bernardo community of San Diego, CA. He was active in the Rotary Club and established the Miramar Semper Fidelis Rotary Club on the Marine Corps Air Station, Miramar; only the second service club on an active military base anywhere in the world. He was an active member of the San Diego County United Veterans Council (UVC) and served as the UVC chairmanship for 2010.

He co-founded the Soldiers of the Sea, Band of Brothers Inc., an organization dedicated to bridging the gap between the Marine Corps and business communities. Tom served as a mentor to the San Diego State University Student Veterans Organization (SVO) and was presented with its "Mentor for Life" Award, its highest honor. He was appointed by Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger to the California Veterans Board. He spearheaded nationwide efforts to discover incidents of Stolen Valor and prepared a "Friend of the Court" brief for submission to the Supreme Court in support of a finding that the Stolen Valor Act of 2005 was constitutional. In recognition of his community service, Tom was selected in 2005 for membership in the Rancho Bernardo Hall of Fame, one of only ninety-selectees since 1974. In June, 2009, he was named the California 75th State Assembly District Veteran of the Year. He also received the "Lifetime Support of Veterans Award" from the San Diego Veteran of the Year committee in 2009. He relocated from Southern California to Virginia Beach in 2012 and was appointed by Governor McDonnell in 2013 to the Virginia Joint Leadership Council of Veterans.

An avid student, Tom earned both is baccalaureate and master's degrees in history, and his masters of business administration, all from San Diego State University. While in Virginia Beach, Tom followed his passion for teaching history as an adjunct professor at Tidewater Community College. Tom maintained a rigorous physical fitness regimen throughout his life, permitting him to engage in numerous outdoor activities including diving, kayaking, camping, and hiking. During the past eleven years he climbed California's 14,497 ft. Mt. Whitney ten times.

Tom never quit anything that he set his mind on. He was a consummate advocate for veterans' issues, was a devoted and dedicated husband, and was the best and sincerest friend a man could have. He was the epitome of a renaissance man who loved opera, fine art, classical and Celtic music, and world travel. He is survived by his loving wife, Diane Hall Richards of Charlottesville, VA; cousins Linda Halverson and Laurie Lerhdahl and their extended families; aunt Theda and the late William Curwen and their extended family, his brother Marines; his friends and an extended honorary family - too numerous to name - all of whom dearly loved, and were loved by, and will dearly miss their "uncle" Tom.

The family wishes to thank the compassionate caring staff at the VA Palliative Care and Hospice Center, Hampton, Virginia, who provided great comfort, superb care and love to Tom and his family. A memorial service to honor Tom was be held at H. D. Oliver Funeral Apartments, Inc., 2002 Laskin Road, Virginia Beach, VA 23454 on Saturday, July 12, 2014, at 1:00 PM. Arrangements are in process for a memorial service and internment following at Arlington National Cemetery, Arlington, VA, as well as a service in San Diego, CA. In lieu of flowers, the family requests donations in Tom's honor to be sent to Legion of Valor, 4704 Calle Reina, Santa Barbara, CA 93110. Semper Fidelis!

NAVY CROSS CITATION

LIEUTENANT COLONEL THOMAS A. RICHARDS, (then Corporal), United States Marine Corps. For extraordinary heroism on 5 and 6 June 1969 as a Fire Team Leader with Company H, Second Battalion, Ninth Marines. Third Marine Division during operations against an armed enemy in the Republic of Vietnam. When his platoon initiated contact with a company-sized hostile force occupying well-camouflaged positions on a cliff overlooking a trail, and were subjected to a heavy volume of fire, Corporal Richards, during the initial attack, skillfully regrouped his platoon and led his men in a counterattack, enabling them to establish a defensive perimeter. Throughout the night, he assisted in countering enemy attacks and in moving casualties to areas of relative safety. Although wounded by fragments of an enemy grenade, he steadfastly refused to be evacuated in order to remain with his men and continue the fight. Observing that a machine gun in his area was dangerously short of ammunition, he made several trips across the fire-swept zone to obtain and replenish ammunition for the weapon. When the machine gunner and assistant gunner sustained wounds, Corporal Richards unhesitatingly dashed to the gun position and, although exposed to the brunt of the enemy attack, concentrated a heavy volume of fire on the hostile troops, causing the attack to falter long enough for the Marines to repulse it. His gallant actions resulted in the death of eight enemy soldiers and prevented the Marine perimeter from being penetrated. Through his superb leadership, courage, initiative, and inspiring dedication, he contributed significantly to the defeat of the enemy and upheld the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and of the United States Naval Service.

Thomas Eichler,

First of all I would like to express my thanks for the consideration of the Red Clay magazine. I have read it from page to page with great interest; in fact that is primarily the main reason I am bothering you now.

In reading articles in the past publications I noticed a few about the Northern California group in Chico, CA. and a veteran by the name of Craig W. Tourte from Rocklin. Unfortunately it does not give his or the groups address so that I may contact them, and I do not have a KS directory. I am not at all sure what they might think of communicating with an inmate in state prison, but I would like to let them know what we are all about here, it I would not be out of line to do so? Also if there is anyone from their group, or others, that would be willing to come here to speak with our Incarcerated Vietnam Veterans Group.

Secondly, I would like to know where I might be able to receive a catalog for the Khe Sanh Survivors so I can purchase the "Home is where you dig it" pin, (we have a sign or reproduction of the sign in our office), and what the cost may be and an application if that is possible for membership?

Thank you for your consideration of my many questions; I am anxiously awaiting your communication .

RESPONSE FROM CRAIG TOURTE

"Doc" Piper

I received a copy of your correspondence from our Khe Sanh Veterans Association President Tom Eichler. Let me state you - being a veteran, a member of the Khe Sanh Association and having served our country is the common ground here.

Regarding the Khe Sanh luncheon held each year in Chico California, our little group consists of approximately twelve unorganized, disorganized and mostly undisciplined Khe Sanh Veterans - all suffering various effects of PTSD - who meet and socialize occasionally and who once a year invites the community to attend a luncheon to honor, not only Khe Sanh Veterans, but all Veterans who have served and those who are currently serving. Most who attend are friends of, or have associates who know Tom Horchler who lives near Chico. As the many who remember with great emotion and reverence those who fought at Pearl Harbor - December 7, 1941, Battle of Inchon - September 15, 1950, Battle of Hue City - January 31, 1968, Hamburger Hill (937) - May 10, 1969, both of the significant battles for Fallulah - April 23, 2003/February 12, 2004, and many other battles don't have an issue with your incarceration or communicating with where lives were lost and sacrifices made, we Khe Sanh Siege Veterans remember, acknowledge and honor those who served during any military conflict. The date January 21st - as you are aware - is significant to us as it was the start of the 77 day Siege which began on January 21, 1968.

As to speaking to your Veterans group I don't know what any of us would have to offer that you are not already aware of relating to that battle and the subsequent issues of PTSD. None in our little group has participated in social outreach but I'm sure speaking in a setting of incarceration would not be an issue. As you are aware our experience is difficult and in most cases painful to speak of to outsiders. I suppose though, it would be a small distraction from what I assume is a mundane routine. I'll be happy to ask some others, appreciating though that Soledad is a four and a half hour drive from Sacramento and add a couple of more hours from Chico, but I'll inquire. If I find myself down that way it would be a privilege to visit with you.

Please let me know if I can be of any further assistance.

Welcome to the third annual Incarcerated Vietnam Veterans of America, Chapter 1065 Correctional Training Facility "Memorial Day Celebration" as we,

"Honor the Dead by Helping the Living"

A Short History of the IVVA

The Incarcerated Vietnam Veterans of America CTF Chapter 1065, (IVVA) shall be affiliated with the congressionally chartered Vietnam Veterans of America, Inc. The purpose of the IVVA is to serve as a multi-purpose self-help leisure time activity group for veteran inmates at the Correctional Training Facility - Central (CTF-C). The IVVA's primary purpose is to aid veterans / ex-military personnel and active duty service personnel by providing support in dealing with service related problems including, but not limited to, Post Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD), alcohol and drug abuse, family relations, life skills and other concerns believed to be related to duty in the U.S. Military and its allies.

The goals and objectives of the IVVA are to bring together people and resources to assist veterans incarcerated at CTF. It shall provide a self-help support group based on common military experience which helps to address service related problems and concerns.

The IVVA seeks to establish and maintain contact with other veterans groups and outside organizations to further its goals and objectives. Outside contact will solicit guest speakers, promote the exchange of information, and seek to enhance IVVA's therapeutic value and resources.

The IVVA seeks to provide aid and support to group members preparing for parole and aid reentry to the community. Such assistance may include, but is not limited to, helping members find employment, housing, clothing, tools, transportation, and other transition resources and support.

The IVVA will invite approved outside guests to participate in the groups meetings, workshops, seminars, and other events designed to further its goals and objectives. Participation in group activities shall be voluntary, though the group may contract with professionals to provide services with the approval of its sponsor(s) and CTF Administrators.

The IVVA shall adopt only those policies and practices that are in accord with the laws of the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation, and he institutional policies of CTF.

The charter shall govern the organizational structure (as shown in Appendix A), and functioning of the IVVA at CTF Central Facility. AIIIVVA members shall adhere to this charter and maintain the integrity of the group and its activities.

The IVVA shall not advocate or support any ideas or political positions other than those directed towards its goals and objectives.

"Where's the New Guy?"

By Chaplain Ron Rayner

Stories of Faith and Courage from the Vietnam War by Khe Sanh Vet Larkin Spivey has provided me with much inspiration since it came out in 2011. I am giving a copy to the son of one of my fellow firefighters who will be going into the Marine Corps very shortly. I decided to read the whole of this daily devotional once again just prior to presenting it to the Marine recruit to remind myself of some of the details that have affected my life since its publication.

The July 5 devotional is entitled, "Where's the New Guy?" A soldier on his first night, not really knowing anyone, finds himself in a dark bunker as the base is being shelled. The soldier describes what happened next:

"Out of the silence and darkness, somebody said,
'Where's the new guy?'

'I'm here,' I said.

That was that, but there was something about that little exchange in the dark that I will never forget as long as I live...That somebody even bothered to think about me...I was amazed."

To those who have never attended a Khe Sanh Veteran's reunion, you will be amazed at the reception you will receive. Any new guys or people who have not attended lately will be well taken care of. Khe Sanh Veterans still take care of and welcome their new guys and the Khe Sanh Veterans' Wives take care of and welcome the ladies. For many it is a time of healing

The July 27 devotional in Stories of Faith and Courage from the Vietnam War talks about a soldier attending his first reunion with 11th Cavalry and he was contacted by a Chaplain that had help load him on a medevac chopper. He was able to say "Thank you." This made me think of the people I had helped on June 7, and August 18, 1968 that I never heard of again. One called Oakie, a truck driver from Oklahoma was severely injured and we only heard he had lived.

I have met others that I didn't know in Vietnam that have informed about what happened during those two battles on different parts of the battlefield.

The reunions have certainly educated me on many parts of the Siege that I was clueless about. I mostly only knew for sure what went on at the north side of the east end of the airstrip with a reaction force from Alpha 1/26. I have talked face to face with men that were on Hill 861 Alpha when it was overrun. Members of Bravo 1/26 have given me their personal accounts of their travails at different times during the siege. The reunion is a time to share a historic time in American history with one another.

Finally, it is a time to remember those who gave all. On November 15, 9am to 10am there will be a Memorial service. In the past family members of our fallen comrades have attended the reunions asking if anyone knew their father, grandfather or uncle. It has been my experience that our members have been very gracious in trying to help these people.

Lieutenant Colonel Fred McEwan, Commanding Officer of First Battalion 26th Marines at a memorial service for the KIA of 1/26 stated: "In this service, we have honored not only those who have died at Khe Sanh, but all those who were there... You will live with it the rest of your lives and in doing so, you will always remember those who gave their lives.

To each of you who were there, I have this to say. For three months, the eyes of the world looked at you and the enemy, who was unable to claim success..."

This quote comes from Chaplain Ray Stubbe's book, Battalion of Kings. As stated in this book 2097 Americans lost their lives in the Khe Sanh area from 1964 to 1972.

Please join us in San Diego, California in November to learn, remember and memorialize.
"May the Lord bless you and protect you. May the Lord smile on you and be gracious to you. May the Lord show you his favor and give you his peace. Amen."
Numbers 6:24-25 (New Living Translation)

OBIT

1/LT GEORGE ERIC ROSENTAL USMC
KHE SANH VETERAN VMO-6
November 21, 1941 - May 9, 2013

COLORADO SPRINGS, CO - George Rosental passed away May 9, 2013 following a fall at his home in Colorado Springs, Colorado. A celebration of his life was held 1:30pm Sunday, June 30 at the Black Forest Community Center in Colorado Springs where George had been very active.

Retired Major General Edward Bracken officiated the memorial service along with Chaplain James Woodruff. George was born November 21, 1941 in Latvia to the late Margarita and Arvid Rozentals. In 1944 while Russia invaded Latvia, his family escaped to Germany. Their last place of residence before immigrating to Greensboro, North Carolina in 1949 was the displaced persons camp Valka in Nürnberg.

George graduated from UNC at Chapel Hill with a Bachelor's degree in English. He served as Class President his sophomore year. He served in the United States Marine Corps from 1964 to 1988. He was designated Naval Aviator in 1966 after U. S. Naval flight training.

During a rescue flight in February 1968 in Lang Vei, Vietnam, he was severely injured by enemy gunfire. He was not expected to survive evacuation but friends say because of his North Carolina cussedness - he did. George was a true "Marine Hero", having received the Distinguished Flying Cross, Purple Heart, Air Medal, Navy Commendation Medal, National Defense Service Medal, Vietnam Service Medal with two bronze stars, and Vietnam Campaign Medal with 1960 device.

After a very long rehab, George fought to return to active duty transitioning from helicopters to fixed wing aircraft. He retired as Major in 1988. After retiring, he began a home handyman business, served as a financial advisor and later as a consultant on government bids as a technical writer. He also attended law school. Survivors include his wife Teresa of Colorado Springs CO; sister, Linda Gathings and her husband David of Fayetteville NC; brother, John Rosental and wife Lynn of Statesville NC; Teresa's sons, Ed Suever and Mark Suever ; nephews, David Dufresne, David S. Gathings, Chad Gathings and JR Rosental and nieces Karen Dufresne, Heather Gathings Navarro, Carrie and Claire Rosental. He was predeceased by a sister, Marita Dufresne. In lieu of flowers, memorials may be made to Wounded Warrior Project. https://support.woundedwarriorproject.org

AN EXCERPT FROM MIKE ARCHER"S NEWEST BOOK:

The Long Goodbye: In Search of a Friend Lost at Khe Sanh,

Hardly a day goes by when I do not shake my head in amazement at the number of lives Tommy Mahoney touched during his brief existence. He and I were friends in high school and together joined the Marine Corps in 1967. In July of the following year, Tommy was mortally wounded on the day American forces abandoned Khe Sanh Combat Base in the face of overwhelming pressure from North Vietnamese Army forces.

His fellow Marines refused to abandon the body of their much-admired friend, fighting for hours at close quarters against an enemy that stubbornly refused to relinquish it. Only after a menacing directive from a future Commandant of the Marine Corps, did the men reluctantly cease their efforts -- forever tasting the bitterness of that decision.

Thirty-seven years later, I included an account of this in my memoir, A Patch of Ground: Khe Sanh Remembered, generating an unanticipated outpouring of concern from readers moved by Mahoney's tragic end and the unresolved issue of his remains. A series of astonishing connections resulted, drawing me back to Vietnam and the hill where he had fallen. Scores of people, from around the world, became involved in this effort to see Tommy returned home. Among them, former adversaries from the Khe Sanh battlefield, including one who participated in the ambush that killed him.

My next book, The Long Goodbye: In Search of a Friend Lost at Khe Sanh, scheduled for release in early 2015, is not just the story of Tommy Mahoney, those who knew him and those who fought against him. It is also the story of why American forces chose to fight at Khe Sanh, a place with the ruggedest terrain; worst weather; and largest, best equipped, enemy force anywhere in South Vietnam. Without understanding that, it is impossible to fully comprehend the appalling scale of suffering and death borne by both sides, or fathom the enduring sorrow carried by those who knew a fine young man who never came back from there.

EXCERPT CHAPTER 21:

JULY 6, 1968

"There are few die well that die in a battle."

Shakespeare, Henry V

On July 1, 1968, Captain Black [CO, Bravo Company, 1/1 on Hill 881 South] finally received word that the base and hill outposts, with the exception of the radio relay site on Hill 950, were to be closed immediately. He called his platoon leaders to a meeting at the CP and told them that nothing of value to the was to be left enemy. [First Platoon leader] Lieutenant Frank Ahearn hiked back over to the western sector and told his squad leaders to have their men "cave in all of the trenches, collapse the bunkers, and destroy everything that you could not carry out on your back." Black began to ponder which LZ was the safest for final troop evacuation. Over the next three days, the men of Bravo destroyed the fortifications around them. By the night of July 3, 1st Platoon was, as Frank put it, was "sleeping out under the stars."

They were still there on the evening of July 4th. Bravo celebrated by joining the other hills in sending up red and white pop flares, rifle tracers and whatever other colorful ordnance they could spare. The following day was strangely quiet. There were no more explosions reverberating up the ravines and valleys from the base. The destruction was complete. Captain Black grew more concerned because the combat base could no longer provide the hills with artillery support -- and the NVA knew it. Bravo would now have to rely on helicopter gunships and close air support rockets or bombing if the enemy attacked.

Later that day Black told Ahearn that Bravo must remain on the hill for at least another day because Delta Company had gotten into a scrap with the NVA and all helicopters in the area were needed in support of that. The "scrap" he was referring to had begun on Hill 689 as the Marines prepared to abandon that position. Because the terrain there allowed the NVA to approach close to the defensive wire from defilade, the Marines were forced to patrol continuously just outside their perimeter to avoid surprise attacks.

On July 5, one of the patrols was caught in an ambush below the northwest perimeter. As was too often the case at Khe Sanh, the enemy had prepared a series of well-concealed bunkers and spider holes around a "killing zone," designed not only to inflict heavy initial casualties, but to lay in wait for those they knew would soon come to retrieve the dead and wounded. The officers of Delta Company spent the night devising a plan to recover the eight bodies that were now just outside their wire. On the morning of July 6, as soon as air support arrived over them, a platoon set out down the hillside.

The NVA were waiting, zeroing in on both the mountaintop position and the ambush site with 82mm mortars fired from a mile away. They had also emplaced a heavy machine gun into the hillside across a ravine, aimed directly at the killing zone, and tunneled in so deeply it could not be spotted. Any Marine or corpsman who tried to enter the zone to retrieve a fallen comrade came into its sights. By nightfall, several more Marine bodies, and possibly some wounded, were left in that zone.

By the time Lieutenant Ahearn learned of this dilemma, he was already simmering over the decision to abandon Khe Sanh: "When they started blowing up the ammo at Khe Sanh base I became upset and despondent. Why were we giving up the most important site in the whole war? Then we had several "hurry-up-and-wait" days after we caved in the bunkers got ready to depart the hill forever."

To make matters worse, Ahearn's radio operator, monitoring helicopter conversations for any indication of when they might get off the hill, believed he heard one of the pilots talking about making a special trip to deliver a refrigerated, chocolate cake to Marine Captain Chuck Robb from his wife, Linda, the daughter of President Johnson.

The sense of utter isolation on the hills around Khe Sanh was most keenly felt in the lack of information about what was going on elsewhere. Even mail from home took weeks to arrive. Anxious for a connection to the outside, the men often relied on rumor to supplant what they did not have. If a story was believable, it was believed. If believed, and with nothing to refute it, rumor became indistinguishable from fact and, in such fretful combat conditions, carried the same emotional impact.

Ahearn later recalled:

> I was mad when I heard that. Here we were sitting on top of a hill waiting to get evaced but could not get any helos, and the President's son-in-law was getting frozen fudge for his birthday. That, coupled with the fact that it was obvious to the NVA we were abandoning Khe Sanh after the valiant defense of the Marines there during the Tet Offensive, all combined made me totally demoralized and I was convinced that we [Bravo] had been betrayed somehow.[i]

Lieutenant Ahearn was not alone in his despondency over news of the abandonment and the base's destruction at the hands of fellow Marines. That sense of dejection was shared by the many thousands of American troops who had fought at, or around, the base, upon first hearing the news. It had been a well-kept secret and so landed hard and without warning for a majority of us.

We were disturbed by other events earlier in the year, such as the increasingly vocal antiwar sentiment back in the United States. President Johnson's decision not to run for reelection -- announced on the day before the Khe Sanh siege was lifted -- was, to us, tantamount to a coach quitting his team in mid-game.

All this, combined with the media's view that the Tet Offensive was a military victory for the communists, despite our successful efforts to the contrary; made us feel that our hard work and sacrifices were pointless, and worse, that the deaths of so many of our comrades, victims of political choreography and indecisiveness on the part of our leaders, was morally unforgivable.

Yet, nothing compared to the sick, personal sensation of betrayal we all felt at the news that we were handing Khe Sanh over to the NVA. I can still recall where I was standing near my hootch at Phu Bai when I read the short article about it, buried on the back page of the Stars & Stripes -- and the stinging sense of treachery like a slap to the face.

However, Ahearn and the others had more immediate problems than this anger at those who they believed had betrayed them and now had made their situation even more dangerous. Still sleeping in the open, they waited anxiously for the arrival of evacuation helicopters. Operating at half-strength and expecting to leave at any moment, Bravo had stopped patrolling around the hilltop for signs of the enemy. Each day they watched Marine helicopters making visits to other hills around Khe Sanh, but each evening they were still there, growing more apprehensive.

The History of the 304th Division records that the NVA knew the Marines desperate predicament and intended to capitalize on it:

"Seeing evidence that the enemy was fleeing out of Khe Sanh, the campaign headquarters immediately ordered units to keep aware of the situation and attack the enemy when they began to withdraw and throughout the period of their flight. The 246th Regiment tightly encircled Hills 832 [Hill 861], 845 [Hill 881 South] and 689, bringing pressure on the enemy who was withdrawing forces by helicopter."[ii]

As the sun rose on July 6, 1968, a light morning fog obscured the hilltops of the Hill 881 South complex from the surrounding countryside. Captain Black hoped the helicopters would arrive before the fog lifted. Although the NVA had all four LZ's targeted with mortars, the fog tended to confuse them as to the sound direction of arriving and departing helicopters and so provided a bit more safety from those both shells and their antiaircraft fire.

Still, Black worried that the sheer number of choppers arriving to remove his company might tip off the enemy that hill was being abandoned and with the defensive positions now demolished might trigger an attack. When the fog burned off later that morning and the choppers had still not arrived, Black "had a bad feeling about that day."

The captain's concern about NVA mortar fire caused him to order a switch from the eastern LZ, to one within the perimeter of the western sector, which had not been mortared during Bravo's time there. Black's experience told him that because of the way NVA mortars were so deeply dug into hillsides as a precaution against American counter battery fire, they could not readily shift them to another target. In addition, the slopes along that western sector were much steeper, making a last minute enemy assault there more difficult.

In making this decision, Captain Black weighed the fact that just a few days before, while one of the last patrols was reentering the western gate, they were surprised by what appeared to be an NVA officer and a subordinate studying the 1st Platoon position. Before patrol members could kill or capture them, the two men dropped off the northern lip of the ridgeline and could not be found. Yet, all things considered, the westernmost LZ seemed the safest.

As a result of this decision, Black ordered Lieutenant Gerry Rohlich's 2nd Platoon over to Ahearn's sector, where they took up temporary residence in the southern trenchline and a large bomb crater that Ahearn was using as his platoon command post to await the evacuation helicopters

Like the others, Lance Corporal Tommy Mahoney awoke that morning expecting this was his last day on the hill. To earn his $65.00 a month hazardous duty pay,[iii] he had survived some of the bitterest fighting o the war and in the worst places like, Con Thien, Hue and now Khe Sanh. Yet, barring a turn in his luck, he had only five months left to go in Vietnam.

However, Tommy seemed to have other things on his mind that morning and had been unusually quiet for the last few days. Many in his squad were becoming increasingly concerned after learning he had received a "Dear John" letter from his former girlfriend. Linda wanted to break all ties with him because of his involvement in the war and was not doing it nicely.

Lieutenant Ahearn later recalled how that morning seemed to drag on: "The 6th came and that was supposed to be the day. We woke up, surveyed the area (we weren't doing any patrolling), ate, and got ready. No helos. Noon came, still no helos. Then it happened."

At 2 P.M., Ahearn was sitting in his makeshift, bomb crater CP, along with Lieutenant Rohlich and most of his 2nd Platoon, when Corporal Ken "Snake" Fernandes, Tom Mahoney's squad leader, appeared at the edge of the crater. Snake told Ahearn that Mahoney had left the barbed wire perimeter to relieve himself. A guard near the gate had subsequently heard him exclaim, "Oh my god," followed by a burst of AK-47 rifle fire, then nothing.

Ahearn immediately jumped up and headed toward the western gate area. Seconds later, an enemy 82mm mortar shell exploded in the bomb crater, badly wounding at least a dozen men, including Rohlich and the corpsman. Ahearn, who was moving away quickly by then and uninjured, spun around and returned to assist the wounded. He simultaneously ordered Fernandes to conduct a search of the hilltop to be sure Mahoney had actually left the perimeter. Snake returned within minutes saying he could not locate Tom on the hill.

While helping with the wounded, Ahearn noticed that the enemy mortar shell had struck the exact sandbag on which he had been sitting. He had avoided certain death by seconds. "Mahoney saved my life," Frank would later say. The lieutenant then radioed Captain Black about Mahoney and the terrible toll the mortar round had just taken on 2nd Platoon. Black ordered him to swend all the wounded back to the main position. Those in 2nd Platoon who were still ambulatory, began carrying the wounded back the five hundred meters to the eastern sector[...]

After mulling the situation, Black told the lieutenant to make a serious attempt at recovering Tom, but not to overinvest troops in the effort. He suggested they use a CS "tear gas" projectile launcher to cover the effort.

Ahearn asked for volunteers. Privates First Class Bruce Bird, Richard Delucie and Wayne Sherwin stepped up and the team set out through the zigzag gate path to the outer opening in the barbed wire about twenty meters to the west.

There they set off the gas canister, which eventually covered a football-field area to the west blowing back toward the area where tom's body lay and dissipating. Simultaneously, machineguns from the Marine trench line blasted the area where they suspected the NVA were located, while others tossed M-26 grenades over the wire. The gas-masked rescue team ran down the path under this covering fire.

Just outside the west gate was a well-worn area of flattened grass and earth that extended in a semicircle out to about ten meters. This was created by patrols leaving the hill over the last few months as they hurried away in all directions from the gate due to predictable NVA mortar fire following their movements. In this area of flattened grass, they found a pool of bubbly blood and evidence that Tom had relieved himself. A few seconds later they saw his prone body about thirty feet down the hill, the head facing downward and hidden in the grass, his trousers bunched around his ankles as if he was hurriedly dragged there and dropped.

Delucie was the first man to crawl toward the body, followed by Bird, Ahearn, then the radio operator, Sherwin. As Delucie got within ten feet of Mahoney, automatic weapons fire opened up from concealed NVA positions just past the body. A bullet hit Delucie in the foot. The others pulled him back up the hill and then made another attempt, this time with Bruce Bird leading.

Bird, though wounded in the arm minutes before by the mortar shell explosion on the hilltop, nonetheless volunteered to help retrieve Mahoney. As he walked in a crouched position to within ten feet of Tom's body, a bullet struck him in the neck. Frank and his men moved forward and dragged him back up.

The CS gas weapon, acquired by Bravo while improvising tactics during house-to-house fighting in Hue four months earlier, was not as effective in the open air and the enemy gunfire continued unchecked. As Lieutenant Ahearn was bringing Bird and Delucie back into the defensive perimeter for medical attention, Captain Black asked the men if they could see the body. Ahearn replied that they did and also saw a pool of blood on the path. When Black asked them what color it was, Frank replied that it was a bright red and bubbly. The captain then deduced it was a wound to the lung or lower abdomen shot, in which case Mahoney was probably already dead[...]

Just as Lieutenant Ahearn was underway with his third attempt, Captain Black received a radio call from the 1st Battalion's operations officer, Capt Ed McHenry, telling him that because more helicopters were on the way, he should prepare the last of his troops to move off the hill. Black asked for "any possible delay" to allow Ahearn and his men more time to recover Tom's body.

McHenry replied that he would check with the battalion commander, but did not expect the request would be approved. However, before that response had come came back, Black recalled "a regimental commander flying around somewhere in a chopper, came up on my company net and laid into me for not being ready to lift out."

The voice on the radio belonged to Colonel Robert Barrow, commanding officer of the 1st Battalion, 9th Marines (later Commandant of the Marine Corps) who, as a result of the almost daily succession of such changes going on at the time around Khe Sanh, had just been given temporary command of all forces in the area.

The Colonel now angrily ordered the captain to immediately terminate all efforts to recover the body and evacuate the hill at once. Black recalled that Barrow "punctuated his transmission liberally with expletives and said to break contact, just get on the choppers and forget about everything else. Since he chose to do this on the company net, virtually every Marine knew what he had done and in a manner that made him look the fool." [vi]

Black was not so much offended at being chewed out in this manner by a regimental commander as he was fuming at the affront to his sense of justice by his superior officers who for the entire afternoon had refused his urgent requests for "the gunship we needed to get Mahoney out."

Despite Barrow's order, Captain Black went ahead and told Frank to try to reach Tom, "but get it done as quickly as he could." Joining Ahearn in this attempt were Sherwin and Williams from the previous try, and a new volunteer, Private First Class Patton. Even though they would not use gas this time, neither side could see exactly where the others were in the tall grass, and the effort quickly turned into a hand grenade duel at close range.

Allen Williams:

Once leaving the trail, the elephant grass was short and so rather than working our way down in a kind of switchback motion, we slid straight down the grass on our backs. I was calling Tommy's name out through the grass in hopes that the sound of my voice might help him regain consciousness. Soon I could see Tom laying about 10 meters down the hill.

The gooks were down the hill past him and even though the elephant grass was only two feet high, the angle at which they had to look up to see us gave us pretty good cover. They stopped shooting at us and started throwing grenades. We started doing the same thing since we couldn't see exactly where they were. I was hit by a grenade fragment on my right arm, and though it was not a big wound, my arm went numb. I then tried to fire my M-16 with my good arm but couldn't. The frustration nearly drove me crazy. I tried pulling the pins out of grenades and throwing them with one hand, but it didn't work and so I pulled pins for the other guys to throw. There were many grenades thrown.[vii]

The five NVA soldiers who opposed them in this grenade fight were not in that particular location by accident. They had carefully chosen the site because it put them at the gate the Marines would most likely choose to begin a march overland to help the rest of their battalion on Hill 689. Alternatively, if the Marines were to be helilifted out, it put the NVA team directly beneath the path helicopters traditionally used when approaching and departing the westernmost of the four landing zones on the hill.

Leading them was 23-year old Nguyen Van Luong. Luong, who was born in Phu Tho Province, had dropped out of high school at seventeen to join the army and, after six years, had risen to the rank of warrant officer. When his unit, the 9th Company, 1st Battalion, 246th Independent Regiment, arrived at Khe Sanh in March, he was a deputy platoon leader.[viii] However, unremitting attrition in the ranks soon relegated him to 3rd Platoon squad leader. When Luong took over the squad, it had consisted of sixteen men, but due to death, wounds, sickness and desertions (the latter increased as they began to experience B-52 bombings), there remained only five.

On the night of July 5, Luong and his men quietly worked their way up the slope through several barbed wire barriers to within thirty meters of the Marines, then spent the hours before dawn digging and camouflaging their fighting holes. While going about this business they could "clearly hear the voices of the Americans and smell cigarette smoke from the bunkers." At sunrise, they moved into these concealed positions and tried to get some sleep.

The History of the 246th Regiment describes what happened next:

At 1400 on the following day [July 6, 1968], we saw one American walking outside the entrance to the outpost. His face was red and his eyes were blue like a mean animal. He was looking toward Mr. Luong's team. The sounds of AK weapons roared immediately, and the American fell. Mr. Luong and Mr. [Tran Ngoc] Long jumped out of their positions and dragged the American's body down. They placed the body in front of them to create an ambush for the other Americans coming out of their bunkers. Ten aircraft of all types circled and bombed the area about five minutes later... however, the team was safe because they were very close to the enemy's location and could calmly observe their movements.[x]

Meanwhile, Captain Black, who had placed 1st Platoon at the end of the queue for the lift out, in hopes that Ahearn's team could finally retrieve tom's body, finally had to order him to "stand down" and move up to the LZ to leave the hill.

Ahearn:

I pleaded with Captain Black to let me stay with a couple of Marines from 1st Platoon and get the body. I thought we could get it. The captain said we were ordered from higher up to move out and so we gathered up all of the gear we could find so it wouldn't fall into enemy hands, even some bloody flak jackets. We crossed the saddle over to the main position as darkness fell.

By dusk, a few Marines were still left on the hill
To board the last CH-46 chopper out: Black; his helicopter support team radio operator; Ahearn and his three volunteers, including the wounded Allen Williams. Ahearn: "As the chopper lifted off I remember looking out of the window trying to see where Tom had been killed but I couldn't see him. It was getting dark. I was demolished exhausted"[...]

Many in Bravo Company, including Lieutenant Ahearn and Captain Black, later expressed the belief that Mahoney's inexplicable behavior in leaving the protection of the hilltop, which inadvertently tipped them off to the presence of NVA troops waiting nearby, saved the platoon from being shot down while lifting off during the scheduled evacuation. The History of the 304th Division records that the encirclement of Hill 881 South that afternoon was indeed to "bring pressure on the enemy who was withdrawing forces by helicopter."

Tommy Mahoney has the sad distinction of being the last U.S. Marine to die on that infamous mountain outpost. The place was wrested fourteen months earlier from an entrenched North Vietnamese Army regiment in a bloody four-day battle that resulted in hundreds of Marine casualties, and was held, at great additional cost of life, as the linchpin to Khe Sanh's survival. As the rhythmic popping of the helicopter blades receded into that July night, the agony of Hill 881 South, the Marine Corps' Gethsemane, finally came to an end.

CHAPTER NOTES:

i. Captain Charles Robb's birthday was ten days earlier, on June 26. On July 6, 1968, Robb was commander of a rifle company with the 7th Marine Regiment, south of Danang, a hundred miles south of Khe Sanh. Captain Robert Black would later remark: "Frank's comment about hearing net traffic regarding Robb's chocolate cake was undoubtedly correct, but Robb was never anywhere near Khe Sanh. Atmospherics at night, as well as being at a high elevation on the hill, permitted some really wild 'surfing' on PRC-25 frequencies and radio operators typically entertained themselves if it wasn't a tactical control net in use at the moment." The radio operator that day on Hill 881S either heard pilots who were now working the Khe Sanh lift recounting the story from ten days before, or he was receiving the atmospheric 'bounce" described by Black.

iii. That, added to his base pay of $137.70, totaled monthly earnings of $202.70

iv. Bird, Williams and Vaughn said they dis tinctly heard him shout "Oh My God!"

v. Robert Black would write in May 2007 "As some later observed, an entire platoon, or more, would have been lost. Tom's irration al action in reality saved Bravo Company from being severely hurt on our lift out from Hill 881S to Hill 689. Many of us knew that, even if we didn't realize it at the mo ment."

viii. The 246th Independent Regiment unit histo ry later recorded that in mid-June 1968 they was ordered to replace the 304th Division. The 246th was an independent regiment not attached to a division, but to the 'Northern Vietnam Military Region. After the 304th left, NVA forces at Khe Sanh then consisted of a single regiment west of the base and another regiment to the south.

1ST BATTALION 1ST MARINES DEDICATION OF THEIR MEMORIAL HONORING ALL THOSE WHO PERISHED IN VIETNAM

It is hoped that families and friends of our fallen will be comforted by the knowledge that we, their brothers, remember and honor their service. Semper Fidelis reveals its true meaning by all of us supporting this memorial. By creating this lasting Memorial, it is we, those that have survived, who honor them that have fallen - Semper Fi, Brother.

The cost of constructing this Memorial will be in the $65-$70,000 range. We want to have it completed and appropriately dedicated next Summer in conjunction with our 2015 reunion in Washington, DC, which is scheduled to for August 2015.August 2015 is the 50th year of the deployment of our Battalion to Vietnam, and the beginning of our story.

We are hoping that each of you will join us by contributing what ever you can. As a guideline only, a $300 donation will honor the place of one our fallen in this Memorial. Donations of $300 or more will receive a mini brick, a jacket or both.

Please go to our 1/1 Marines '65-'71 web site at http://www.1stBn1stMarines.com to join us in making this Memorial possible.

I have one other item that may be of interest to the Khe Sanh veterans organization. Bob Koury D1/1 is able to directly purchase 20 Kilos of Khe Sanh Coffee. The coffee is packaged in 6 or 8 oz bags and could be included as sale or auction items at the reunion. If you or the reunion committee is interested in pursuing this matter let me know and we can have it shipped to the appropriate person. Thanks again and we look forward to seeing you in San Diego.

The exhibit is a tribute to those Texans who died while serving in the U.S. Armed Forces during the Vietnam War. The Heroes exhibit is comprised of 3,417 replicated military ID tags (Hero Tags), each representing a Texas soldier who died in Vietnam during the war. In the foreground, you can see a scale model of the Texas Capitol Vietnam Veterans Monument (TCVVM), which was dedicated on March 29, 2014, on the grounds of the Texas State Capitol in Austin. OBIT

Gen. Carl E. Mundy, Jr., 78, 30th Commandant of the United States Marine Corps, and a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff from July 1, 1991 until his retirement on June 30, 1995, died April 2, 2014.

From 1996 to 2000 he served as President and CEO of the USO. Gen. Mundy is the Chairman of the Marine Corps University Foundation. He also served on a number of corporate boards.

Gene Overstreet served Gen. Mundy as the 12th Sergeant Major of the Marine Corps during his term as Commandant. Sergeant major Overstreet said "he was one of the finest men I ever knew."

Gen. Mundy was born on July 16, 1935 in Atlanta, Georgia. He graduated from Sidney Lanier High School in Montgomery, Alabama. At age 18, he enlisted in the US Marine Corps Reserve and enrolled in the PLC program in December 1953 while attending college serving in the 38th Special Infantry Company, Montgomery, Alabama and rising to the grade of Sergeant. He was commissioned a Second Lieutenant in June 1957, following graduation from Auburn University. His later military education included the Command and General Staff College and the Naval War College.

General Mundy's decorations include the Defense Distinguished Service Medal, Legion of Merit, Bronze Star with Valor device, Purple Heart, Navy Commendation Medal with a star & Valor device, Combat Action Ribbon, and many others.

General Mundy's two sons followed him into the Marine Corps. His oldest son, Brig. Gen. Carl E. Mundy lll currently serves as commanding general of the 1st Marine Expeditionary Brigade in California, while Col. Timothy S. Mundy serves as chief of staff for Combat Development and Integration at Marine Corps Combat Development Command in Quantico, VA. He is also survived by his daughter, Elizabeth Gunter. Private Memorial services will be held at the Iwo Jima Memorial. He will be buried with his wife Linda Sloan Mundy in the family plot in Waynesville, NC.

WELCOME ABOARD SKIPPER

KHE SANH VETERAN IN THE NEWS

TOM ESSLINGER USMC
INDIA & MIKE CO 3/26 HILL 881S

Marine veteran John T. "Tom" Esslinger, Marine Corps Association and Foundation (MCA&F) chief operating officer (COO) since 2008 will be departing the MCA&F at the end of June and was replaced by Colonel Daniel P. O'Brien, USMC (Ret). Tom oversaw significant advancements during his time as COO and in the two years he was a board member prior to becoming COO. His acumen and expertise were critical during the formation of the Marine Corps Association Foundation and in developing affinity partnership programs for the MCA&F.

OUTGOING COO MCA&F, TOM ESSLINGER

Following his graduation from Yale University, Tom was commissioned in December 1966 and upon graduation from The Basic School as an infantry officer he was ordered to the Republic of Vietnam. In Vietnam, Tom, with 3d Battalion, 26th Marine Regiment, was in combat in northern I Corps and on Hill 881S during the Battle of Khe Sanh in 1968. Tom left Vietnam in October 1968, having been awarded two Bronze Star medals with Combat "V" and a Purple Heart, for duty at Marine Barracks Washington, D.C.

In August 1970, he left active duty to enroll in Georgetown University Law Center, graduating with distinction in 1973 and beginning a law career that carried him from an associate to a managing partner in a District of Columbia law firm he helped establish. He joined the MCA board in 2006, moving to the COO position in 2008.

Tom Esslinger's long service to Corps and country has been marked by superb commitment, and he will be missed. But, MCA&F will continue to move forward with a continuity of effort as another current board member, retired Col Dan O'Brien, assumes the duties as the COO. Dan comes in from his position as the Vice President, Marine Corps and Defense Accounts, Battelle Memorial Institute, Washington, D.C.

NEW COO MCA& F COLONEL DANIEL P. O'BRIEN

Prior to retiring from active duty in November 2004, he held a wide variety of command and staff positions, including Commanding Officer, Marine Barracks, Washington, D.C.; Chief of Staff, Marine Corps Combat Development Command, MCB Quantico, Va.; Military Assistant to the Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs, Office of the Secretary of Defense, Pentagon. He also had command tours in infantry units in the 1st, 2d and 3d Marine divisions.

Dan holds a bachelor's degree in management from the University of Massachusetts and a master's degree in International Relations from the U. S. Naval War College program with Salve Regina College.
Tom, on behalf of our MCA&F membership, sponsors, affinity partners and certainly our staff, thank you, and we wish you "fair winds and following seas."

Dan, welcome aboard, we look forward to working more closely with you.

"I KNOW YOU "

By Craig W. Tourte

I usually wear a necklace and bracelet in the colors of the Vietnam Service Ribbon. You have seen the colors arraigned in many necklaces, bracelets, key chains and things that are similar. They are consistently yellow, red, white and green; many are handed out or can be purchased from the Khe Sanh PX during the reunions. At times I am surprised when I meet others who claim to be Vietnam Veterans when they fail to recognize or mention my adornment. I would have certainly noticed if another was wearing the same design and I'd mentioned it to them, inquiring if they served in Vietnam.

I played golf today and paired up with another man around my age. After a few minutes he asked me if I had served in Vietnam. I responded that he quite obliviously noticed my necklace and I confirmed that I had served in Vietnam in the Marine Corps. He said that he had also been a Marine and served two tours in Vietnam. He then asked me where I was in 1969 and 1970. I told him that I had served in Vietnam in 1967 and 1968 and that most of my time was at the Khe Sanh Combat Base. Our conversation went back and forth during the game and I learned he had a most storied and interesting experience during his two tours. He purchased an adult beverage from the cart girl and asked if I remembered the green beer from Vietnam and in particular that served in Da Nang. I smiled a bit and told him that I never got to Da Nang.

Sometimes I don't think others really understand our situation at Khe Sanh. To many it was just another place and another battle. Most understand the long period of incoming but few really understand the deprivation relating to the Siege. I told him that my experience in Vietnam was perhaps unique to that experienced by others who served in Vietnam. I'm afraid I went into my usual rambling informative spiel about never having taken a bath or shower from a forced water pipe, never walked on cement or asphalt, never slept on a bunk, never saw a television or heard a civilian radio program, never sat on a chair, never used a flush toilet, never walked on a rug - etcetera, all during my tour in Vietnam. The list was getting way too long for our short conversation but I think he was getting the idea. I told him that I was very impressed that he served two tours because I was quite sure I would not have survived another and in fact a Marine I had served with all through the Siege extended for another tour and was subsequently killed in action.

He was a very pleasant fellow who told me that he reached the rank of Gunnery Sergeant and had served for over 13 years (or something like that I don't exactly recall the exact years he served) in the Marine Corps but during the Corps downsizing he was forced to leave.

We exchanged (business) introductory cards after our game. I gave him the Khe Sanh Association card Leland Upshaw had sent to me and he in turn gave me a card which identified him as being a Commander of a local American Legion Post. I also presented him with a Khe Sanh Challenge Coin - they are very impressive and those who receive one are always very appreciative.

After our golf game was over and I was placing my clubs in my truck he drove up next to me in his golf cart and handed me a small rolled up paper with a red ribbon attached. He said he thought I would enjoy reading it when I had a few alone moments. When I arrived home I opened up his gift and read the following poem titled "I Know You."

"You may not know me, but I saw you

Your arms reached out.

Your mouth gasping for one last breath.

You carried wounds not seen with scars.

You carried memories that burn deep and burn like fire."

"The blood dripping from your hands does not wash off and the screams within never leave.

You choke up when a flag passes by."

"You fall to your knees not from faith, but from weakness when you hear "TAPS."

The faded army clothes, worn badges, but proud medals that you wear say so much."

"You many not know me, but I know you.

You are a veteran from a war no one liked.

You gave when no one cared.

You saluted a flag that you felt turned its back on you."

"You are a Vietnam Veteran.

I breathe Freedom, because you cared.

My children know Freedom, because you fought for it.

You may not know me, but I know you and I just want to say," "THANK YOU"

The author was not identified.

I thought it was a very important gift that I had received, obliviously the little poem by the unidentified author touched his heart and was an inspiration and even comfort to him. He told me that his post goes to the burials of homeless veterans and visits Veterans hospital. His concern was that returning Veterans are not forgotten nor treated like Vietnam Veterans were treated when they come home for war.

"I Know You" was a great title....because we do know, don't we.

HILL 861 AND KHE SANH COME TO THE BASIC SCHOOL AT QUANTICO, VA! PAST MEETS THE PRESENT

By Dennis Mannion

I picked up on the third ring, and the voice on the other end spoke just a few words, but they made my heart race and my breathing stop. "This is Captain Macon, United States Marine Corps, at TBS in Quantico, Virginia, and I am looking to speak with a Mr. Dennis Mannion." Before I could answer, my mind flashed through worst-case scenarios because our youngest son Devin was just about halfway through the 26 week Basic School course. I took a deep breath, wondered how I'd be able to break the news -- whatever it was that had happened at TBS -- to my wife, and said, "Yes...yes, sir. This is Dennis Mannion."

I was in for just under three years, and while I held down an officer's job in Nam as the arty FO for K 3/26, I was enlisted. From boot camp, to ITR, then to Naval Gunfire school in Coronado, CA, my sense and my understanding about USMC officers was that I needed to avoid them as much as possible! Sure, I knew that all officer candidates went to Quantico. I knew that there was no dividing line east or west of the Mississippi River for OCS, and that was about it. Hell, I don't think I even heard the acronym "TBS" until 5 or 6 years ago. I've met and hung around with some fine former Marine Corps officers at the reunions, but to be truthful, I never knew anything about the process that turned them into Officers of Marines. I wasn't "one of them" in the first place, and how they got to be who they were back then was always insignificant to me. It was at the San Antonio reunion when I first heard about TBS. Nick Romanetz told me that his July 67

TBS class was dedicating a monument in October on the grounds of the Marine Corps Museum. They were doing so to honor those in their class who had lost their lives in Vietnam.

As it turned out, I was very close to one of those officers -- to use the word "loved" would not be too much of a stretch -- and so I attended that dedication because of Lt. Fordham -- KIA 15April68 in the unforgiving terrain between Hills 881s & 881n. At the museum I was privileged to meet and spend some time with Lt. Fordham's TBS roommate Barry Kowalski who told me what those TBS weeks were like back in early 1967. With so many officers needed for Nam, it was only a 21 week course then. Last fall I became even more knowledgeable about TBS because Devin completed his ten weeks of OCS, graduated a 2nd Lt just before Thanksgiving, and started The Basic School a week later. We saw him at Christmas and New Years, but since then our contact was limited to weekend phone calls and video chats. Mostly what we heard was, "Lot's to learn; not a whole lot of sleep; made some great friends; the weapons at our disposal are awesome."

Now, standing in my kitchen in Cheshire, CT, I braced myself for whatever bad news Captain Macon had to say. His next words took me by total surprise. "Mr. Mannion, I just learned from some of the 2nd Lt's in your son's platoon that you were an artillery forward observer at Khe Sanh... on Hill 861 ... during the siege! Is that true?" My mind could not initially process what I had been asked, so I stammered, "Yes, I was an FO there, but what's wrong with Devin?" He laughed, said that Devin was doing well enough, and that he was calling not about our son but to inquire if I might be interested in helping him develop an artillery field-study case for Bravo Company's classroom work on Supporting Arms. He went on to explain that he was the head instructor for the artillery portion of their training, and that their final class on the topic consisted of a close examination of a real event in military history.

He stated that for almost two decades TBS had been using a field-study based on British Marines against Argentinean forces in a place called Goose Green in the Falkland Islands. He thought it was time for a change and was hoping that Hill 861 could become the new case-study about close artillery support at TBS! It did not take me long to say I'd be pleased to help.

For the next month, Captain Macon and I began weekly email and phone exchanges. He asked dozens of questions. I took my Khe Sanh map to Staples and sent him two copies by mail. I emailed him dozens of my photos from the siege, and I also used a photo-edit process to mark some of the photos with text about targets, terrain features, actual arty missions, known NVA locations, etc.

In mid-April he said that he was very pleased with the progress that he was making on this new case-study. However, completing it in time for Bravo Company's use was going to be a close call as their last day in the classroom before going into the field for a week of live arty fire was 10 days away -- Monday, April 28th to be exact. Not only did he have to get his immediate boss to approve the unit, it also had to be shown to the higher-ups at TBS before he got the green light. Then he casually said, "If I can get this approved and implemented for Bravo, do you think that you would be willing to come down to Quantico and participate in the study?! We'd love to have you here!" It did not take me long to say that I knew how to get there.

And so it was that I departed Connecticut on Sunday 27 April for the 6+ hour drive to Quantico with my original map and my C 1/13 issued Bausch & Lomb binoculars safely stored in my travel bag. I met Captain Macon on Monday at 0845, and we spent the rest of the morning going over his powerpoint presentation about the use of artillery at Khe Sanh. There was a particular emphasis on how arty was used against the NVA in their assault of 861 during the early morning hours of 21 Jan 68.

Stacked on the captain's desk were hundreds of copies of my map which he planned to distribute to the "students" when they came into the classroom in the afternoon. The classroom is a large lecture hall -- capacity over 300 -- with multiple, tiered rows of tables and chairs, two very large projection screens, and a superb audio system. Captain Macon and I went over the format for the field-study right before lunch, and he told me that the last 10 minutes of the class "would be mine."

As the 2nd Lt's arrived at the lecture hall, each fire team was instructed to send someone down to the front table to pick up a map. Once the maps were handed out, the lights were dimmed and Captain Macon began his power point presentation and his explanation of what the tactical situation was like at Khe Sanh in early January '68. There were overhead views of the base, the hills, friendly locations were highlighted as well as specific NVA units by known names and numbers. As his running commentary progressed towards the 20th of January 1968, Hill 861 became the focus of his talk along with specific photos on the big screens.

He explained what the days prior to 20 Jan were like on that hill: no more active patrolling off the hill; passageways in the barbed wire sealed up with even more wire; digging deeper fighting positions; ammo distribution; and the registration of potential artillery targets around the hill by the FO. The lights came up and the fire teams were given 15 minutes to examine their maps and plot two locations around 861 where artillery should be registered. They were also instructed to also plot one target in close as an FPF --Final Protective Fire call. They set to work with a large, overhead image of 861 on the big screens to help. After the allotted time, three fire teams were randomly called up to the front to indicate with a laser pointer where they chose particular target locations and why they selected them. Instructors and other new lieutenants in the audience asked questions, and the fire teams had to respond with their reasoning behind their choices.

At the end of a pretty lively discussion, Captain Macon showed a photo of 861 with my actual target registrations on it, and he asked them to look at their choices and compare to what they were seeing on the screen. He provided a balance and an explanation of some of their choices contrasted with mine. His next photo was of me on 861 during the siege, and he told Bravo that the "the Marine on the screen and the gentleman in civilian clothes standing in the back of the auditorium is Dennis Mannion -- the corporal who had registered those targets 46 years ago.

The place burst into applause, and I was allowed 15 minutes to cover three topics: The day and the night of the 20th including the NVA officer surrendering at the combat base; the early morning hours of the 21st when the NVA got through our wire and on to the hill; and what life as the FO was like for me over the next three months....the daily and nightly routines. There was time to take a few questions, and I had Captain Macon go back into his power point presentation so that I could pinpoint certain terrain features as well as places where the NVA gave us the most trouble from.

When it was over, my son's platoon was given permission to stay a few extra minutes to interact with me, but the other 5 platoons headed for their barracks. They had just under an hour to fall out in full gear and equipment for a late p.m. and early evening hike out to the artillery range. Live fire would commence the next morning. I got to speak briefly with my son and a few of his buddies, but they really had to hustle out too as they were under the same time constraints as the other platoons. I shook hands with Captain Macon and departed for my hotel room and an early morning drive home on Tuesday morning.

Captain Macon called later that week to thank me and to ask for an additional favor when we were there for Devin's graduation on 25 June. He asked if I'd be willing to sit in the AV room of the library and talk on camera for about 15 minutes covering the same topics as I had done in person. The way he put it was this: Goose Green is OUT at TBS and Hill 861is IN, and he knew that I would not be able to come down to Quantico every time a new company came through TBS. I was able to do that taping and it's now part of the unit.

I am pleased and proud to have been a part of this (and the fact that it will continue to get used), but mostly I am pleased and proud for the Marines in my arty unit C 1/13, the Marines at the combat base who provided security for all of them and the other artillery units, as well as the helicopter and plane crews who kept them supplied, and the Hill guys who took a lot of pressure off the base just by their collective presence out there in no-man's land.

Life can be circular at times and 861, being part of TBS is proof of that, and we all know the value of being in the right place at the right time Outgoing rounds fired all those years ago at Khe Sanh are now being observed and discussed at Quantico, and will be for the foreseeable future.

SORRY DENNIS HE WENT INFANTRY

A FEW COMMENTS FROM THE TROOPS

Dennis,
Congratulations! This is a perfect example of what has made our Corps successful since Tun Tavern, the willingness to continuously adapt and innovate by recognizing the genius from within. It invests us all in the mission, regardless of rank. How pleased you must be knowing the methods you employed 46 years ago to save lives at Khe Sanh, will now be helping bring even more boys safely home. Fantastic!
Mike Archer

Dennis, I think that most important thing about your post is that you were recognized by CURRENT Marine Officers who knew you did a remarkable job those many years ago at Khe Sanh. You accomplished your mission and with precision targeting saved many of our Brother Marines. I know that Devin was bursting with pride at his Dad's presentation. The old teacher in you never stops and I for one have learned much from you over the years at reunions. Congratulations and Semper Fi; Dennis. "T-Bone" PS: Get ready for some new photos of mine I just found stashed in my junk and "YES I am "T-Bone" Jones and won't you look at my photos!!!!"

Dennis, Great story! There probably isn't a guy more qualified than you to help put this together. It was a long time ago, but when I was at TBS, I don't recall spending in-depth time on supporting arms that the Lts go through now. We may have spent a day or two in the field, calling in a few live fire missions in small groups. Lots of class work though. I do recall personally calling in an 81 mission.

Once again, you have completed an immense undertaking that will keep Khe Sanh on the front burner at Quantico and in the Corps. You are among a few KSV that are the "go to" guys for factual information. An enlisted guy doing an officer's job? What would have happened with you and the Corps if you didn't leave Notre Dame early (you know what I mean)? Proud to have you as a brother and friend. I know you are immensly proud of Devin and his accomplishment.

Letter From Our Founder
Reverend Ray W. Stubbe

Hi Tom,

I'm still active In local veterans events. Gave the prayer for the Milwaukee Flag Day event and also an event for the dedication of a monument to war dogs that was built m a local town (Menomonee Falls, Wisconsin). There were dog handlers from all over the country and also several dozen different dogs. It was a very pleasant day. Rain had been predicted, but didn't come.

I Some incidents about dogs at Khe Sanh were in my mind. I recalled that on one of my visits to Hill 881S, my clerk and I were sleeping on a large pile of C-ration cases m the supply tent. In the middle of the night, my clerk left his blanketed nest and went out to piss. When he returned, the dog was sleeping on his blanket. He told me the next morning what had happened and added, "I wasn't about to move the dog!"

Then, I remember that the dogs were pulled from accompanying infantry patrols off 881S and 861 because it was too hard on them! (Not hard on the Marines, but on the dogs). Then, Kevin Macaulay once told me that when the siege began, a scout dog dashed up the rear ramp of a CH-46 helicopter and bounded to a position between the two pilots.

When his handler came on the chopper to coax him out, he just growled. Kevin said, "He wasn't about to leave the helicopter! That dog was smarter than any of us!" Lastly, I remembered a statement by a MP at Camp Pendleton about dogs sniffing out drugs in the barracks. He said that the breed of dog best suited was the poodle, but added, "How would it look for a Marine with a poodle?" So, the more "Marine" appearing dogs-English bulldogs, German shepherds, and so on were used!

I still go to the boxing gym Monday through Thursday evenings and to a regular gym for weights and machines. So physically I'm doing very well, although issues with the spine and bones in general is the same as It is for all of us who have become older-NO! not "older," but "more mature!" Emotionally, however, I'm finding that I'm increasingly becoming more isolated, "bunkered," and just don't venture out of my immediate area. I won't even go into downtown Milwaukee-too much shooting, like going back to a battlefield! When there are events in the city (like the Flag Day ceremony), a good local Vietnam vet friend takes me there. The odd thing is that even though I know what's going on, I don't have the power to combat it!

Several Khe Sanh vets occasionally call or write me usually people I never personally knew at the time, but who have read things I've written about some buddy of theirs that was killed. A few Khe Sanh vets also write or call, but I suppose most, these days, communicate through the internet, and I'm still not on that. It's always very good to hear from these people, however. Sometimes, I'm able to send them copies of official reports or other documents that clarify situations.

MENOMONEE FALLS MEMORIAL IS A BIG SALUTE TO THE DOGS OF WAR

By Meg Jones of the Journal Sentinel

Menomonee Falls - The 6-foot-tall gray granite monument was for Skip, Hobo, Fl0 and Prince. For Dobermans, German shepherds, bulldogs and huskies. For four-legged veterans who saved countless lives in combat zones as long ago as World War I and are still working in harm's way in Afghanistan.

They're veterans who have gotten little recognition aside from a chew toy and a loving embrace from their handlers. But a Menomonee Falls-based group called War Dogs thought they should be honored and raised $5,400 for a monument unveiled at an emotional ceremony Sunday afternoon in Village Park.

"I can't say enough for what military working dogs do," said Kim Michalowski, who served as an Air Force dog handler in Vietnam in 1971 and '72 with German shepherds Hobo and Prince. "I wouldn't be here without my dogs. This monument means so much - it just touches my heart."

A couple hundred people turned out for the dedication, including many veterans and War Dogs group members plus several dozen dogs and a few law enforcement K-9 units. Among the veterans were Vietnam military dog handlers who came from Colorado, Minnesota and Illinois when they heard about the effort. As the national anthem was sung, everyone stood silently and saluted or held their hands over their hearts while a few canines barked as their owners shushed them.

Jerry Witt, a member of War Dogs who was instrumental in raising funds for the monument, told the crowd about his dogs Skip and Satan, who served with him in Vietnam. Skip was killed when he triggered a trip wire on a patrol, but not before he signaled to Witt the danger. As Skip tried to back away from the booby trap, the pup's body harness exploded the trip wire. Skip survived the initial explosion but died a week later from an infection.

"We're here today to honor those four-legged veterans because they saved countless lives, including my own," Witt said.

In a touching moment, Vietnam veteran Joe Campbell recited a list of Wisconsin military dog handlers killed in Vietnam as veterans walked up to a table with one ceremonial place setting in memory of fallen and missing military members, touched a Bible and saluted as each man's name and the name of his dog were read out loud.

The mortality rate for dogs and their handlers was high in Vietnam since the enemy quickly realized they were so effective as trackers.
"I can assure you the dogs I knew in Vietnam were always out front. I don't think I'd be here today except for the dogs and the men who trained them," Campbell said. "May God bless you all and rest in peace our brothers."

The aim of War Dogs is to honor a little-known part of American military history by marching in parades - the group's next event is July 3 in Menomonee Falls - appearing at shows and giving presentations on the history of war dogs. Members own dogs of the 16 or so breeds used by the U.S. military, including collie, Labrador retriever, boxer, beagle, Newfoundland and Jack Russell terrier.

Wearing T-shirts with the logo "Hell on Paws - America's Unsung Heroes of All Wars," members paraded with their dogs by breed as David Pohle explained how they were used by the military. Among them was Dave Gohr, a military historian and collector, clad in the World War II combat uniform of the 10th Mountain Division and leading two huskies. Gohr explained huskies were used by the 10th Mountain Division to carry supplies over rugged terrain in Italy, and they were also used to rescue downed pilots.

Military dogs were also used to sniff for explosives, find improvised explosive devices, capture enemy soldiers, patrol bases and comfort wounded service members.

Dan Crangle of Germantown spoke while holding his son's black lab Flo, who sat on her haunches and surveyed the crowd, panting in the heat.

Crangle's son Cody spent a year training with Flo in the Marines before they deployed together to Afghanistan, where they were involved in numerous patrols and operations in Helmand province a few years ago. When Flo and Cody Crangle returned home to Camp Pendleton, the military decided 7-year-old Flo could no longer deploy because of PTSD symptoms and put her up for adoption. Cody Crangle jumped at the chance to adopt his partner, and now his parents are looking after Flo until Cody finishes his hitch in the Marines later this summer.

Crangle talked about how the pup quickly became a member of the family. "She's just an amazing dog. We're very proud of her and our son." Milwaukee County Sheriff David A. Clarke Jr. came to the monument unveiling with his 7-year-old Rottweiler Zookes. "This group (War Dogs) is usually in the same parades I'm in. I understand the role dogs play in law enforcement and the role that they play in the military," Clarke said.

Don Gutknecht, 82, who served in the 39th Scout Dog Platoon in Korea and Japan, worked with German shepherds that acted as scouts. Some dogs ferried messages because "we didn't have any cellphones," said a smiling Gutknecht. "We had a North Korean dog come up to us one time. He'd been an ammunition carrier, he still had the straps on. We made him one of our own, and he served with us for a while. Good dog."

Gutknecht grew close to his German shepherd Marta, who moved to Japan with him for two years after Korea until Gutknecht returned home, leaving his dog behind. None of the dogs that served in Vietnam returned to America when the war ended; their handlers sometimes signed up for additional tours of duty because they didn't want to leave their dogs behind. Because they were classified as "excess equipment," half of the American military dogs were euthanized at war's end and the others were left to fend for themselves or given to the South Vietnamese army.

Military dog handlers lobbied Congress to change the rules, and two decades ago legislation was signed that ensures war dogs are treated like other veterans.

KHE SANH VETERANS, INC. SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION
An update from the review Committee

What began as a simple idea suggested during the Board of Directors meeting at the 2008 Khe Sanh Reunion in Lake Tahoe has become an overwhelming success. This idea was to provide scholarship assistance to legal children and grandchildren of members of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. thereby supporting their goals of a full 4 year, post-secondary education. A five man Scholarship Committee volunteered to take on the task to setting the program up and establishing criteria for acceptance and review. Among those volunteers were Bruce "T-Bone" Jones, Bill Jayne, Larry McCartney, Dennis Mannion and Dan Fisher. Donations began to flow in from KSV members and from the proceeds of the reunion silent auctions.

By the beginning of school year 2009-10 the application forms were good to go and published in "RED CLAY", on the KSVinc.org website and announced at the KSV Denver, CO reunion.

2009-10 had 6 applicants, 2010-11 grew to 7 applicants, 2011-12 had 10 applicants, 2012-13 grew again to 12 applicants, 2013-14 stayed at 12 applicants and school year 2014-15 has a whopping 20 applicants! That is 67 applicants/awardees in the 6 years of the Scholarship program!

In fact, the quality of the applications has also risen considerably and now requires careful review and scoring separation by the review committee members. The competition is fierce and top scores are recognized by the Colonel David Lownds, Sergeant Major James Gaynor and the Colonel William Dabney levels of achievement. An outstanding $29,000 in a scholarship support has been awarded and that doesn't count the 20 awards to be given for 2014-15.

Many of these young scholars have completed their college degree programs are starting successful careers or continuing their educational goals knowing that they were supported not just by their families but by their family of Khe Sanh Veterans. The "Thank You" cards of appreciation they send in express their gratitude for the support.

So, a warm "thanks" is extended to all the members who contributed to make the KSV Scholarship Foundation the resounding success that it is.

WHY I GO TO REUNIONS

By Craig W. Tourte

I didn't know what to expect when I attended my first Khe Sanh reunion ten or twelve years ago. I felt a little out of place because it seemed most knew each other and I was an outsider. I was hesitant to meet others knowing they would not really understand my emotions of unexplainable guilt and certainly would not understand the pain I endured recalling those long ago experiences. I'll admit it was emotionally difficult the first few reunions I attended and it took me a period of time and several more reunions to realize that I was not actually an outsider looking in but that all who were attending were just like me, insiders who understood each other and who were in fact looking out at those who would never understand us.

I began to realize that we all had experienced the same fears, same tears, same emotional recalls - I was determined to stick with it and continue to attended each year. I don't know when it was, perhaps my third reunion when I realized that the others attending were - big surprise - just like me. With each new meeting of another Khe Sanh Veteran, with each new conversation I slowly realized how special we were to each other. That we were not strangers who were meeting for the first time but rather - even though it was our first time meeting - we had in fact known each other (it seemed) for many years.

I pulled out my old album the other day and went through the photographs I had taken at various Khe Sanh reunions. How young we looked - compared to now - even though we were rapidly reaching our golden years. I had placed a little name tag under each photograph so in the future I would not forget their names.

I paused at one photograph in particular and my heart sank, for I had known both men, one more than the other but each an important part of my reunion experience and both in one way or the other had influenced my life. This was the photograph of Charlie Fox, Lloyd Scudder and myself. A moment in time that will never be duplicated. What great and respected men they were, we all have stories and fond memories of each. I did not know either when I started on this Khe Sanh reunion venture and now I can't forget them.

The Khe Sanh reunions are like that, fleeting moments of too brief meetings, enjoying the short time we have together, remembering and honoring those who did not return from Khe Sanh with us and taking the time to remember and appreciate those who we will never have the opportunity to share our memories with again.

ROBERT CRABB SCHOLARSHIP

GOVERNING RULES FOR OPERATIONS OF THE KHE SANH VETERANS, INC. SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION:

1. The purpose of the Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. Scholarship Foundation (KSVSF) is to provide financial aid to high school graduates who plan to attend an accredited institution as a full time student OR who are currently enrolled full time in an accredited post-secondary curriculum.

2. Scholarships will be awarded to applicant students who have at least one parent, legal guardian, or grandparent who is a paid member in good standing of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., a 501(c)(19) charitable Organization

3. IT IS THE RESPONSIBILITY OF THE STUDENT TO SEE THAT THE SCHOLARSHIP APPLICATION REQUIREMENTS ARE FULLY COMPLETED AND SENT DIRECTLY TO THE SCHOLARSHIP CHAIR BEFORE 5/1/2014 AT THE ADDRESS BELOW;

Mr. Dan Fisher
KSVSF Committee Chairman
6050 52nd St. North
Oakdale, MN 55128-1317

CRITERIA FOR SELECTION

Applicants must be the legal child or grandchild of a paid up member of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. (See member definition in the KSV Association bylaws.) This includes deceased, life members of KSV and those Khe Sanh Veterans listed as KIA/MIA in Vietnam if family members are paid up, associate members of KSV, Inc. Children or grandchildren of KSV associate members are not eligible.

Information provided by each candidate on the attached application forms will focus on the following qualities considered for selection to KSVSF financial aid: good grades, character, citizenship, leadership experience and personal essay. A point selection system is included in the application forms.
Examples of these above mentioned qualities could be in the classroom, in extracurricular activities or in service to the community, church or nation.

A Scholarship Foundation Review Committee will serve the President of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., and will accept, review and grade each correctly completed application. This committee will provide a scholarship financial report and short summaries of the selected candidates at the annual KSV reunion for publication in the " RED CLAY" Newsletter.

SCHOLARSHIP AWARDS

The amount of financial award per applicant will be determined by the Review Committee's scoring results. The awards will be granted for a maximum of 4 years per student. A new application will be required for each continuous year applied.

Achievement Award Levels are:

The Col. David E. Lownds Award - for top achievement in Application Review (one award or tie)
The Sgt. Major James T. Gaynor Award - for high achievement in Application Review (5 awards)
The Col. William H. Dabney Award - for honorable achievement in Application Review (6 Awards)

The KSV Scholarship money will be awarded upon presentation of proof of registration for the appropriate term. Proof of registration should be sent to the chairman's address on page one of this application.

Scholarship Guidelines and Purpose

1. The financial award is to be used to help defray costs of tuition, fees and books at an accredited institution of the applicant's choice as a full time student.

2. If a recipient of the KSVSF scholarship does not enter a post high school institution during the next school year, the award for his/her benefit shall be cancelled and the money awarded to an alternate applicant. An alternate of each scholarship award is to be chosen at the time of selection of recipients.

3. The KSVSF Committee Chair and the Treasurer of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., will send a check for the full years' award amount to the selected students upon final approval by the KSV President.

4. The recipient of a scholarship shall be notified no later than the end of the month of August of the coming school year.

5. Scholarship Applications must be received by the Committee Chair on or before MAY 1 of the school year applied for.  (This is an important, NEW change to previous years)**

6. KSV, Inc. Scholarship recipients must agree to maintain a standard of personal performance both in and out of school that conforms to the moral standards set down by Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., members.

7. Criteria: Point Selection System !Maximum of 100 regular points or 115 with bonus points

a. Scholastic achievement / grade point average. Max = 40 points max. (please attach last school GPA transcript) example below:

TRIBUTE TO A FINE MARINE

By Andy Weddington

Last week I, with my Marine (and Sailor) brother, waded a river in New Mexico fly fishing for trout. And I painted. It was a long overdue trip to relax and the first trip back to river since the death of Dad (who loved fishing that river). Emotional enough, sad news came at the end of the first day.

A Marine friend, whom I've written about a few times, died. Battle injuries suffered long ago, and complications therefrom, had the final say. I spoke to him on the phone a few weeks ago - we were coordinating a visit when I returned from fishing. His voice I remember.

Now I know not what to say. So in honor of Colonel Marcel "Big Mac" J. Dube, U. S. Marine Corps - a warrior in every sense of the word - I decided to republish commentary from a little less than four years ago.

We've lost a great Marine. Our country has lost a great American. Your rest earned, Big Mac! Semper Fidelis.

HEROISM'S ALWAYS REWARDED--SOMETIMES DECORATED

By Andy Weddington

"Within the soul of each Vietnam veteran there is probably something that says " Bad war, good soldier."Only now are Americans beginning to separate the war from the warrior." Max Cleland

Today's Commentary...true story about a couple of captains--a courageous U. S. Marine Corps infantryman and an equally courageous U. S. Air Force pilot--and their battlefield hasty rendezvous and subsequent hair-raising dash--through heavy enemy gunfire--to friendly lines.

But first, a little history to set the stage... The year--1967. Lyndon Baines Johnson was president of these United States. The current resident at 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue was 3 1/2 years-old, and living in Jakarta. For the geography challenged, Jakarta is not in the United States. General Wallace M. Green, Jr. was Commandant of the Marine Corps. General John P. McConnell was Air Force Chief of Staff.

The NFL played its first "Super Bowl" (AFL-NFL Championship Game)--the Green Bay Packers beat the Kansas City Chiefs. Quarterbacks Bart Starr and Len Dawson "captain'ed" their respective teams. I remember the game but not the score. It doesn't matter. And, by the way, it'd be another two and a half years before Brett Favre, once of Packer fame, would be born. And decades before we'd know from season-to-season whether or not he was retired. In colors or not--cheesehead?

Astronauts Chaffee, Grissom, and White were killed in a fire during a pre-launch test for Apollo 1. Thurgood Marshall was sworn in as the first black justice to sit on the Supreme Court. 'Bonnie and Clyde,' 'Cool Hand Luke,' 'Guess Who's Coming to Dinner,' 'In the Heat of the Night,' and 'The Graduate' hit the silver screen. Old school Frank Sinatra won a Grammy for 'Strangers in the Night'--Record of the Year. He also earned a Grammy for Album of the Year. New school Beatles released 'Sergeant Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band.'

A team of South African surgeons, led by Dr. Christiaan Barnard, performed the first successful human heart transplant. The patient lived--for 18 days. John Coltrane, Woody Guthrie, and Spencer Tracey died.

America was amidst significant cultural change and turmoil--long hair, afros, bell bottoms, lava lamps, black lights, hippies, free love, drugs, tie-dyed T-shirts, love beads, racial tension, peace signs, draft dodgers, incense and draft card burners, riots, and war protests. In other words, it was pretty damn nutty. Sometimes it was downright scary.

THE DAY--MONDAY, MARCH 20th...

The 79th day of the calendar year and less than two weeks after my mother's annual "29th" birthday. Just another day. People were born. People died--some of natural causes, some in accidents, and some in combat. Yet the day was as unique as each day before it and each day after it. So goes life.

The Supremes--fronted by Diana Ross--released their hit song "The Happening." In Garland, Texas, a baby boy was welcomed to the world who grew up to be a phenomenal basketball player; a star in college Division I and the NBA. That boy? Mookie Blaylock.

The popular war-themed series, "The Rat Patrol"--a small, elite force running amok in heavily armed jeeps--in its first season aired episode 27,"Take Me to Your Leader Raid."

A U. S. Marine Corps captain reported to the Commanding Officer of VMD-6--a helicopter squadron deployed to Vietnam. From his reporting date through 22 September--little more than six months--he earned the Medal of Honor, Silver Star, Distinguished Flying Cross, Purple Heart, and 32 Air Medals. His name? Stephen Pless. Surviving hundreds and hundreds of combat missions, he was just 30 years-old when killed in a motorcycle accident in Pensacola, Florida, in 1969. A hero indeed but not the star of today's Commentary.

General A. J. F. Moody became the first U. S. Army flag officer to die in Vietnam.

And, the monthly issue of Playboy magazine was on the street--for the 20th day; officially. Playmate of the Month: Fran Gerard--a nineteen year-old 5' 2" 110 lb looker and the first to wear eyeglasses in her centerfold pose. Fran was popular with the Marines in Vietnam. And Soldiers, Sailors, and Airmen, too. So much for the old adage about guys not making passes at girls who wear glasses. Then again, maybe they didn't notice her glasses--or Frame.

For everyone knows young men--especially warriors, and some old ones, enjoy Playboy not so much for the half-ass (sometime full) photojournalism but for the exceptional articles. Well, maybe just a peek at the photos. Though it is peculiar how the color pages of the rabbit-eared magazine get dog-eared; another mystery of our universe.

I wore a uniform in those days, but knew nothing of such a magazine. A fourth-grader attending a K-8,one classroom each grade, non-air-conditioned parochial school--with convent on the second deck--in mill country North Carolina had little time for the fairer gender. School began with a semi-circle formation, by grade, near the flagpole. After classmates raised colors, we recited the Pledge of Allegiance or sang our National Anthem. I was aware of the Vietnam War but only as much as any 10 year-old in the day could understand. And, yes, we prayed in school--for everything and everyone; including soldiers.

Other than going to school, I've no memories from that day--probably homework, out to play until dinner, television, and to bed (to sleep peaceably because rough men were doing violence on my behalf--to paraphrase George Orwell). For sure I could not have imagined what a hectic, remarkable, and dangerous day--doing their duty and hoping to survive--a couple of rough Americans waging war on the other side of the planet had. And little did the Marine know that when the heat of battle was over it'd be well into the fifth decade after his heroism that official recognition--a decoration--would catch up to him.

And for one last tidbit of context...visiting with some retired Marines, far my senior, before the award ceremony I learned they were colonels and sergeants major when the general, who was going to pin the award on "Big Mac's" jacket lapel, was a second lieutenant. And that general was no more than six or seven, if that, on that fateful day in Vietnam. He, too, clueless as to what was happening on the other side of the world, slept peaceably. Time marches on. Marines are Marines are Marines.

" Courage is the art of being the only one who knows you're scared to death!"
Earl Wilson

The President of the United States takes pleasure in presenting the

SILVER STAR MEDAL TO CAPTAIN MARCEL J. DUBE
UNITED STATES MARINE CORPS

That is how the award recipient--Big Mac Dube, the rescued pilot--Phil Jones, hundreds of others including family, close friends, distinguished civic leaders, Marines and Sailors, reporters, and me heard the citation at the award presentation on Friday morning, 20 August 2010, aboard the Marine Corps Air Ground Combat Center, Twentynine Palms, California--ironically, Colonel Dube's last duty station before retiring 24 years ago. He was the Chief of Staff.

for service as set forth in the following

For conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity in action against the enemy as Senior Advisor to the Third Battalion, Vietnamese Marine Corps engaged against enemy forces in the Republic of Vietnam on 20 March 1967. During a heavy battle Captain Dube led a small team of Vietnamese Marines through enemy lines to rescue a U.S Air Force Forward Air Controller whose L-19 aircraft had been shot down by enemy fires 200 meters in front of friendly lines. In route to the aircraft he personally killed 11 enemy soldiers with his weapon as they fought through enemy lines. Reaching the aircraft Captain Dube extricated the pilot and then fought his way back to friendly lines, eventually evacuating the pilot by helicopter, all done under heavy enemy fire. Returning later in the day to the L-19 he righted the overturned aircraft, disarmed its onboard ordnance, and then coordinated the arrival, hook-up, and departure of a cargo helicopter to recover the L-19, again under enemy fire. Captain Dube's heroic action prevented the capture and saved the life of the Forward Air Controller, enabled the recovery of the L-19, and destroyed 11 enemy soldiers by his own hand. By his bold initiative, undaunted courage, and complete dedication to duty, Captain Dube reflected great credit upon himself and upheld the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and the United States Naval Service

For the President,
(signed) Ray Mabus

Secretary of the Navy

I have six riveting pages titled "The Story Behind the Story" Big Mac penned recalling his actions on March 20th, 1967 and gave to me a month or so ago. As I received his detailed account before acquiring a copy of the citation, I thought for sure I'd make use of it for this Commentary. But once reading the citation it was clear nothing more really need be said. As with all heroism the succinctness and power of the citation needs no edification.

Though Big Mac's Silver Star was a long-time coming his heroism was never forgotten by a handful of Marines (some now dead and some unable to attend the ceremony) who had first-hand awareness of his bravery, and especially not forgotten by Phil Jones. For readers unfamiliar, the Silver Star is our nation's third-highest award for gallantry in action against an enemy of the United States.

At a reception following the ceremony I had the pleasure and honor of meeting Phil Jones and his wife--they'd come from considerable distance to be with Big Mac. Phil's time was in demand but I managed a few minutes to hear his account of that day. Fascinating. It looked to me like there was a bead or two of sweat as he recollected. In short, he was flying low (100 to 300 feet typically) and slow (80 mph or so) looking for bad guys when--as he said, "...my propeller stopped..."--shot down behind enemy lines crash-landing his airplane upside down. It's important to note the L-19 was not outfitted with ejection seat nor was the pilot equipped with parachute. Infantryman respect, if not admire, this sort of aviator--likewise a rough man and not sure whether to think them brave or foolish, but thankful for them regardless. Though injured and disoriented, he managed to free himself from restraints and exit the aircraft about the time his guardian angel, Captain Dube, appeared. Then came their harrowing hundreds of yards dash through heavy enemy fire to friendly lines and his evacuation for medical care. Oddly enough, there were enemy POWs on the helo.

Phil Jones flew more than 300 combat missions (sometimes two a day). His interesting day on March 20th was not nearly his last flight. After recovering from injuries he returned to flying status for another six months. He mentioned a bird strike on one of his early flights that was a little unnerving but the frightening experience of being shot down did not otherwise interrupt his subsequent flying, low and slow, doing what he was trained and expected to do--support gunfighters on the ground. Though there was no mention and I did not ask, I know Mr. Jones was awarded at least one Distinguished Flying Cross, certainly some Air Medals, and sundry combat decorations. In his own right he's a larger-than-life hero of our country. As he spoke, he struck me as humble and not one to talk about his service unless directly asked and maybe even not then--it would depend upon who was asking; such is a common trait of warriors who have nothing to prove. Here was a man thankful to be alive, and enjoying the moment reunited with the man who saved his life.

Shortly after the reception, while another small gathering of old Marines was about to recognize Big Mac and Phil, I heard someone mention "...43 years ago..." and Phil casually remarked, "I was a kid." He was. An then it occurred to me--thankfully, our country still produces kids like Phil Jones and Mac Dube. Those "kids"--some witnessed the ceremony and some are now on duty; some in Afghanistan. And one or two unknowingly destined to not be recognized for their extraordinary heroism for decades. So goes the business of war. Every generation has true heroes.

Anyway, that "small gathering of old Marines"--representing the Desert Cities Chapter of the 1st Marine Division Association named in honor of Medal of Honor recipient Marine Colonel Mitchell Paige--presented Big Mac, one of their own, with an engraved K-Bar (combat knife) and welcomed Phil Jones as a lifetime Honorary Member. Presented an attesting letter and Chapter polo shirt Phil, clearly moved, struggled to find his words; find them he did.

Though corresponding through the years the reunion was the first personal visit between the two rough men in more than 43 years. No hostile gunfire and mad dash toward safety this time. Just memories and genuinely heart-warming camaraderie--in the Officers' Club pub of walls adorned with Marine units plaques. How fitting.

But the story is not quite over.

A few weeks ago I received an email from a stranger--a Marine so not really a stranger--who had found my Commentary site and read, "MARINES, BRASS RECYCLED, AND MYSTERY--SOLVED" posted for Friday, 28 May 2010. That Commentary another interesting tale involving Colonel Big Mac Dube. Strangely enough, the reader had, a few days earlier, himself received an email from a stranger--another Marine--asking if he could possibly assist with connecting him to a "Captain Dubee" a "Mustang" (term used to describe an officer who has served as an enlisted man) who he served alongside in 11th Engineers in Vietnam. The note to me wanted to know if it could be the same Dube? As Marines speak to each other, I sent a note to the Marine querying me, "Stand by." I then sent an email to Colonel Dube. Following is his reply--which he probably did not expect to see in this forum but would not object whatsoever:

"There is no doubt about this one, my brother, First Lieutenant Serge R. Dube (Former Master Sergeant) was with them at that time and we had several occasions where he had the time to visit with me when he found out that my Vietnamese Marine Battalion was around his area of operations. In fact, I had the opportunity to visit his compound once and met his CO and some of his friends during a lull in battle. I was in the Saigon area and had just been bandaged up after sustaining some wounds around the Cambodian Border.

Serge died last year from cancer which he no doubt inherited from his extended months trodding around that Vietnamese countryside getting sprayed with agent ORANGE!

Feel free to give them my phone number or e-mail, my friend! VERY GRATEFULLY!!!!!!!!
Yours Aye/Semper Fi
Big Mac"

TEXAS CAPITOL VIETNAM VETERANS MONUMENT

The Texas Capitol Vietnam Veterans Monument is designed in accordance with House 79TH Texas Legislation Concurrent Resolution 36 to honor Texans who served in the Armed Forces in the U.S War In Vietnam.

The monument was dedicated on Welcome Home Texas Vietnam Veterans Day Saturday, 2014 at 10 A.M. in a ceremony opened to the public. The monument will be located on the Northeast corner of the state Capitol grounds in Austin near the Peace Officers Memorial

The monument design includes an infantry patrol on top surrounded by bas-relief depicting important symbols of the war.

The five combat patrol figures symbolize the key roles of infantry patrol represent the ethnic diversity of Texans who served in the U.S. military-

Standing Grunt - Anglo
Radioman - Native American
Sniper - Hispanic
Medic - Black American
Wounded soldier - Asian-American

THE LAST PATROL HILL: 861-A TO LZ MARGO PART 1

By Larry McCartney
ECHO CO 2/26
HILL 861A

The sun broke early and bright on Wednesday, May 28, 2014 as Bill Griffith and I arrived at Philadelphia International Airport for the first leg of our trip to Hà Nội, Socialist Republic of Vietnam. Taking off from Philadelphia at 10:55 AM, just ten minutes after our scheduled departure time and flying east, we had an enjoyable, relaxing, though long flight which I quickly decided would be my last long distance flight in economy class—for any future air travel I will spend the extra money to stretch out in business class, maybe even first class if the cost isn't unreasonable. Hey, its only money and I don't have any children to leave it to anyway, so there's no reason to be as cramped as I was for such a long period of time.

Crossing the International Dateline we 'leapt ahead' during the flight to Doha, Qatar, where we had a long layover in its newly constructed international air terminal, then to Bangkok, Thailand for a brief stopover before flying into Hà Nội, where we landed on time at 3:30 PM on Friday, May 30, 2014—4:30 AM Eastern Daylight Time—after traveling for forty two hours. I can't praise Qatar Airways enough; it was professional and punctual. Unfortunately, upon deplaning we found it was hot and humid, just as we remembered and expected.

For the next three and a half days we did the normal tourist activities in and around Hà Nội, visiting museums, memorials, temples, pagodas, an inland waterway through caves which afforded protection from U. S. bombing during 'The American War,' shopping locales, and sites of ancient as well as historical significance—what's left of the Hà Nội Hilton, etc.—as we acclimated ourselves. Of all we saw, I was most impressed with the growth and modernization of the city—now a blossoming metropolis which, while still impoverished, when compared with my 1995 observations offers an improved quality of life for more residents. My greatest surprise was the many modern retail stores, which are replacing the street vendors and roadside stands.

On Tuesday, June 3rd we flew from Hà Nội to Hue, landing at the exact same Phu Bai airport where I landed in December of 1967 as an eighteen year old Private First Class. We were met by a driver and rode from Phu Bai to Dong Ha, a little over an hour, then checked into a decent hotel which was thankfully larger than the hotel in Hà Nội.

On the afternoon of June 3rd we spoke with a gentleman who is the director for Project Renew, a Quang Tri Province based non-governmental organization (NGO) which deals with unexploded ordnance (UXO) left over from the war—we learned that the Peace Tree Project, which is also responsible for the newly authorized memorial park at Khe Sanh, deals with the UXO issue in and around Khe Sanh, so we got contact information for those people and found out that there is great coordination, thus little duplication of effort, between those and related NGOs.

On June 4th we drove to Khe Sanh, stopping at what was Camp Carroll, as well as the bridge across Route 9 that the 2nd Battalion, 26th Marines guarded after leaving Khe Sanh. The current bridge, next to the bridge 2/26 guarded, holds many memories; it was here I last 'fished'—a sport I loved as a boy but haven't done since—using M-26 grenades for 'bait.' It was also from this bridge that Echo Company ran the patrols where Joe 'Cisco' Reyes encountered a large, 'unfriendly' snake and Bill Griffith saw a spider the size of an adult beagle.

After checking into our hotel we visited; 1) the site of the U. S. Army Special Forces Camp at Lang Vei, 2) the Old French Fort, where there's a People's Army of Vietnam (PAVN) memorial and cemetery and 3) the mall near Laos from which we could see Co Roc, which evidently is now inside Vietnam. We did not visit Co Roc since it's so close to Laos that we feared an unintentional border crossing and our visas only allowed a single entry, which we used when landing in Hà Nội. Besides, the hotel held our passports, so we had no official identification and could have been stranded at the border.

The schedule for June 5th was a main reason for our trip. We returned to Hill 861 Alpha since we were seeking answers to long nagging questions. We started early, meeting our guides for breakfast; Bill was pleased since they were the same men he used in 2008. He said they were good and he was right, they really knew their business. They took us by motorcycle up a rutted path from just outside the Khe Sanh Combat Base to the tower on the south side of Hill 861. As we passed Hill 700 ridgeline we saw Americans—Ed Zimmerman, Pete Post and the Joint Pacific Accounting Command (JPAC) site location team looking to find where Corporal Trimble and PFC Pepper were last seen. After exchanging pleasantries and a brief conversation, we continued our journey to Hill 861-Alpha as they found their objective on Hill 700.

Once leaving the rutted road at the tower we went uphill approximately two hundred meters, through tall, thick, elephant grass and 'wait-a-minute' vines, to the east side of Hill 861, where we easily found the trail through the saddle leading to Hill 861-Alpha. The walk over to Hill 861-Alpha was also difficult since the jungle has reclaimed the earth. We found the old Echo Company perimeter, but were very careful since we recalled leaving UXO in the area.

Our visit to Hill 861-Alpha was due the fact we wanted to learn if the PAVN had tried to tunnel up to us in 1968. Bill and I, as well as other Echo Company Marines, had heard and reported sounds of digging, but a senior Marine had told us we were overreacting, so we should just shut-up before we caused other Marines to panic. However, history shows the PAVN had dug their way up to the French lines at Dien Bien Phu in 1954 and had tried to do the same at the Khe Sanh Combat Base.

In addition, Reverend Stubbe has mentioned that there were reports of PAVN digging on Hill 861, of which Hill 861-Alpha is a part, so we wanted to learn if Echo Company had avoided something similar. One reason for our search for tunnels was since, when patrolling forward off the wire, Bill distinctly recalls seeing and reporting air vents—perfectly symmetrical holes, evenly spaced horizontally and vertically—coming up the northwest finger toward the Echo Company perimeter. Unfortunately, dense vegetation and suspected UXO prevented a thorough search of Hill 861-Alpha and the guides did not know of any tunnels or caves there, but did know of, and reported being in five such tunnels extending from the vicinity of Hill 558 near the Rho Quan River to the Khe Sanh Combat Base.

As we left the hill we held a brief memorial service for all the men of Echo Company who served there and are no longer with us.

On June 6th we visited the site of the Khe Sanh Combat Base, paying attention to visit where both airstrips were located—Bill explained that the first airstrip was destroyed after we left in 1968 and the second was built to support subsequent operations, such as Lam Son 719 in 1971. We also toured the new museum and coordinated with the director of the Peace Tree Project for possible participation in the memorial that is being constructed.

After leaving Khe Sanh we stopped at a Montagnard village to leave presents—pencils, paper, mirrors, combs, toothbrushes, toys, clothing, etc.—for the children as Bill had done at villages and orphanages in 2004 and 2008. The pencils and paper are necessary since the Montagnards are learning to read and write; something they couldn't previously do and didn't need because their language had no formal structure and they generally lived a nomadic life. We then drove through Camp Carroll to the Mai Loc area, observing the growth—there are no more ramshackle 'hootches' as we knew them, just permanent buildings with electricity, running water and satellite dishes.

We ended the day at Con Thien, the Hill of Angels, where 2/26 served from late May to late July of 1968. June 6th was the forty sixth anniversary of when Echo Company lost much of the 2nd Platoon—fourteen killed and at least fifteen wounded. In 1968 the area was a barren wasteland, but is now a thriving semi-rural community. Needless to say, all remnants of the positions at Con Thien, Yankee Station, C-2, the C-2 bridge/washout, etc. are gone. Much of what was the Con Thien Combat Base is now a plantation, growing coffee and tapioca. Upon leaving, it's now more than lightly populated and we didn't want to draw undue attention to our presence, we held a low-key memorial service for the Echo Company Marines lost in 1968.

On June 7th we prepared for the main focus of our trip, a visit to LZ Margo; referred to as Fire Support Base Margo in some official U. S. Marine Corps references—U. S. Marines in Vietnam: The Defining Year - 1968; page 400. Like our visits elsewhere, our tour guide cleared our visit with the Ministry of Defense (MOD), the PAVN—we found that while you don't have to have a guide, they can be extremely helpful and this was one such time. So going to LZ Margo was not an issue, despite what we were told by some association members. The only issues were positively identifying the location and finding the easiest, most direct route there.

We visited LZ Margo because of how the September, 1968 events affected us. Bill and I were wounded there, Bill on the 15th when 3rd Platoon, Echo Company engaged the PAVN on the hill northeast of the LZ and I on the LZ on the 16th, during the first barrage when our casualties were heaviest—official reports list twenty one Marines killed and one hundred thirty five wounded. I've long believed that in terms of casualties taken and the lack of known casualties inflicted, that phase of Operation Lancaster II – Trousdale North is one of the worst defeats of the U. S. Marine Corps in Vietnam. Why? Because a reinforced infantry battalion was crammed onto a barren, solid rock, hill; a site barely large enough for an infantry company—an area which prevented us from digging-in.

Reportedly we moved there so B-52 bombers could provide close air support. Yet, a review of official records questions that claim. So why did we move to where we were had to bunch up? We landed three days earlier with various levels of food and water—the 2nd platoon of Echo Company had little more than one day of rations, other platoons had more. Was it for resupply? After all, there is a stream at the base of LZ Margo that we could not use other than to cool off since we were told it had not been tested, but there was a water hole atop the hill. In my opinion 'leadership' at all levels underestimated the enemy, as the French underestimated their enemy during the Indo-China War, so we operated with flawed strategy, tactics and Rules of Engagement (ROE). We visited LZ Margo because, despite 'writer's block' and a lack of objectivity, I've long wanted to write about it. So I had hoped to film the site for a documentary; I can only hope to do half as good as Ken and Betty Rogers so brilliantly did in Bravo Company: Common Men—Uncommon Valor.

Finding LZ Margo was easy enough, we just had find LZ Winchester, then go approximately two thousand meters north. We had done a good map recon, so we took Route 9 to the service road from which that fire support base was resupplied, then remembering the climb up LZ Margo in 1968 we declined to climb that hill, we took the trail skirting it to the east.

Our trip to LZ Margo was an intense experience. So many Marines—our U. S. Navy Corpsmen are Marines—were killed or badly maimed there. The friends I lost, men with whom I shared hopes and dreams for the future, as well as the heroism I saw, too often not recognized, is forever etched in my brain. For whatever reason, their story is untold. It must be told. It will be told.

When concluding our visit to LZ Margo we held yet another memorial service, this to remember all the men from 2/26 killed or wounded there in 1968, as well as those like Eric Smith who have died since. Our particular concern was to pay tribute to Mrs. Anna M. 'Mickey Mom' Roble, formerly of Latrobe, Pennsylvania, a truly grand, very brave, lady who passed away in December of 2011, after she had traveled to Vietnam in August of 2004 to visit the site where her son, Lance Corporal Joseph E. Roble, an Echo Company Marine and a Khe Sanh veteran, died. Unlike the other mothers on that trip with Mrs. Roble, who was over eighty years old at the time, she was denied seeing the location of her son's death, as well as a proper, respectful, memorial service. This time we not only went there, but we also conducted a suitable service

Upon returning to our vehicle parked near Route 9 we were confronted by a rather unfriendly Montagnard village chief, surprisingly a young man in his early to middle thirties, as we were passing back through his village. The chief was extremely irate, so we sat silently as our guide spoke with him. We learned his anger was since we had passed through his village and territory without coordinating with him. That we coordinated with the MOD meant absolutely nothing to him; he was 'the law' in his village and he demanded the 'Rich Americans' compensate him for the insult; he wanted a pig and seven chickens. Our guide managed to negotiate and he settled for 'just' two million dong, approximately one hundred U. S. dollars.

The next day we drove to Hue, where we relaxed for four days after the intensity of the trip to LZ

Margo and to see the sights of the ancient Imperial City and surrounding area. Our tour of Hue included visiting what is left of the Citadel, a sampan ride on the Perfume River and a motorbike tour of the suburbs. While in Hue I first noticed a startling phenomenon; more than a few women were wearing small gold crucifixes around their necks. When I asked them about the crucifixes nearly all said, "I am a Catholic" and those who didn't said, "I am a Christian." I realized the religion was a result of the French influence, but I was surprised it survived so strongly and is now so openly expressed, even tolerated, in a communist country.

Upon leaving Hue we drove to Da Nang through the new vehicle tunnel under the Hai Van Pass—Bill recalled it opened in August or September of 2008. We spent two days there, visiting Marble Mountain and China Beach, still popular tourist attractions and resorts, Marble Mountain and the local markets. We also went to where LZ Baldy and the An Hoa Combat Base had been since I served there in 1970 and 1971. Our trip to the An Hoa Combat Base was an eye opener, it was still an active PAVN base in 1995, but is now demolished and due to become a modern 'supermarket.'

We left Da Nang on June 15th, flying to Ho Chi Minh City/Sài Gòn—it's only called Ho Chi Minh City in official matters, otherwise people still call the city by its prior name, Sài Gòn. We spent the night there and then drove to Mai Tho in the Mekong Delta, where we saw the sights, shopped in the local markets and toured the Mekong.

The half-day visit to the Mekong was interesting. Our guide, a pleasant young lady who spoke excellent English and I have no doubt was, like the other local guides who were either MOD officials or reported on our activities to the MOD—we were followed and our rooms/luggage were checked while we were out—showed us a fish 'farm' in the river. We also visited several villages with tourist-based industries, as well as the inland waterways. In one village locals entertained us with traditional music, than we had lunch in an outdoor restaurant where we were at a table next to a honeymooning Russian couple. Following lunch we visited another local mall, where Bill made friends with a large female boa constrictor. The snake had to be female since she immediately wrapped herself around Bill. I declined the 'invitation' to 'meet' her.

Upon returning to Sài Gòn on Tuesday afternoon we again took in the sights, visiting the new, upgraded, War Museum and seeing the old Presidential Palace, the Cathedral of Notre Dame, the Central Post Office, and many famous landmarks like the Rex Hotel. Interestingly, when we visited the War Museum we were delayed since it closes for an hour-and-a-half for lunch, so we eschewed McDonalds and Burger King and ate at Pizza Hut. The highlight of our Sài Gòn visit was seeing the old U. S. Embassy—now reopened as the U. S. Consulate General—where the Deputy Counsel General give us a personal tour. Of course we spoke with the Marine on duty, a Corporal from New Jersey who, since he is a neighbor, we told to look up 'Big John.'

While we shopped during much of our time in Sài Gòn, I also spent time with friends I had made during my 1995 trip as well as here in the United States. It was good to see them again and get their first-hand reports. Most are doing well and are pleased with the progress in the country since the end of the American War, though they also recognize that much still needs to improve. One observation I made is that despite changing demographics—in 1995 approximately seventy five percent of the population was born after the United States left twenty years earlier and now that number is roughly ninety five percent of the population—the plight of our former allies, the South Vietnamese in general and members of the Army of the Republic of Viet Nam (ARVN) in particular, is unchanged. Sadly, anyone still alive from those days are, if they fought for or served the South and/or its allies, at best second class citizens.

Something I first noted near China Beach, but saw elsewhere in what had been the southern half of Viet Nam during my tours there, was the presence of the U. S. flag. While not 'everywhere' south of what had been the Demilitarized Zone (DMZ), I often saw the U. S. flag flying alongside the national colors of Viet Nam. Tactfully speaking with locals, I learned there is little acrimony towards Americans in general or the U. S. military in particular, though some of the educated and articulate admitted an intense dislike for the U. S. anti-war protestors—they called them communists dupes—who subverted their freedom with the support they gave the North.

I also learned that due to ongoing political issues with the People's Republic of China (PRC), Viet Nam seeks stronger ties with the United States. Several told me they hoped the U. S. would send military aide should the PRC attack. On that point I surprisingly kept my big mouth shut.

A particular treat for me was to renew my friendship with 'Nguyen,' a former ARVN Special Forces soldier who I met during a two week liaison assignment in 1995 and have maintained contact with; though a Buddhist, 'Nguyen' gratefully and graciously accepts my small gift every Christmas. 'Nguyen' served a short—less than a year—stint in a reeducation camp in the immediate aftermath of the fall of the Republic of Viet Nam in 1975, but could not emigrate since he was a young enlisted soldier and not a commissioned officer. I will not further identify 'Nguyen' for fear of potential repercussions, but will note that he survived and raised his family despite not being able to obtain employment—he works as an unofficial tour guide and is a 'hustler' but refuses to engage in criminal activities. While with him, 'Nguyen' took me anywhere I asked to go, as well as a few places I never thought of, such as the bars he and his friends are welcome to visit. It was fascinating and gratifying to be fully accepted by these men, all of who fought for the Republic of Vietnam and still pay a steep price for their service—of the six children 'Nguyen' and his wife had, five have already died from Agent Orange related issues. The remaining child is crippled and only has a few years left. Sadly, none ever got any government assistance, or significant medical care, since their father fought on the wrong side.

With an international exchange rate of approximately twenty one thousand Viet Nam dollars (VND)—dong—to the U. S. dollar, the trip, once 'in-country,' was fairly inexpensive. In addition, many of the products, merchandise and services are likewise inexpensive. However, Viet Nam is a 'negotiating country' and the price a merchant will accept is below the listed price. There is what I can only call as a multi-tier price scale—prices depend on the nationality of the purchaser, so an American will nearly always expect to pay 'top dollar' for everything. Since we knew this from our previous experiences, as well as our contacts, we resolved to use our guide to make purchases; an idea that worked remarkably well.

Despite the significant modernization that I saw—infrastructure, homes, shops, commercial buildings, communications, etc.—I couldn't help but notice that computer modernization in Vietnam lags behind the rest of the world. Because of U. S. Transportation Security Agency (TSA) policies and procedures, I had intentionally left my laptop @ home knowing I could communicate as needed because of reports from others who have recently traveled to Vietnam. I found that all the hotels we stayed @ had computers with Internet connectivity and nearby Internet Cafes were not only plentiful but inexpensive. However, the equipment and software was seriously outdated. More than a few facilities had ten year old computers and in some cases were still running Windows XP or even Windows 98. So while Internet access was available, it was not as reliable as I am accustomed and it was slow. I mentioned this to a friend, a naturalized U. S. citizen born in Vietnam who left in late April of 1975 but has since returned and he remarked that my observations were not isolated; he reported that despite the significant modernization, Vietnam is still a very poor country so some 'hard choices' have to be made. However, he sees improvement in the coming Years.

During my many conversations with the 'man in the street,' one theme I often heard was how 'the youth of today' were unmotivated; they "did not appreciate what they had." While in shops negotiating with the vendors, I heard a parent call for help and several times the parent would get frustrated, then apologize to me saying; "The kids today don't want to work, they just want to play on the computer." J Again much to my surprise, I kept my big mouth shut.

While I saw many differences, most of which is improvement, in the quality of life from when I served in Vietnam in 1967 and 1968, then again in 1970 and 1971, as well as when I was last there in 1995, I was still stricken by the contrast between the different classes of people; Vietnam is a heterogeneous country with over fifty ethnic minorities, so we saw well-dressed people, expensive hotels, restaurants and luxurious cars such as Mercedes Benzes, Land Rovers, Fiats, Toyotas, etc. However, we also saw a much larger number of people who are lucky to have a small motorcycle, scooter, or bicycle as they struggle to survive, all too often on less than a $1.00 per day outside the urban areas. My experience at this point in my life made me appreciate the many blessings we have here in the United States all the more, as well as wonder how much we really did help the people. According to my friends change is coming, albeit all too slowly.

Just prior to 7:00 PM on Sunday, June 22nd we left Sài Gòn out of Tan Son Nhut International Airport and after a seven hour flight we arrived in Doha at approximately 10:00 PM. After a three hour layover, we boarded our flight to Philadelphia International Airport and arrived in the United States at 7:30 AM on Monday, June 23rd; accounting for zone changes, we were airborne for over twenty one hours during a twenty four hour period. Brutal!!!

All in all it was a GREAT trip, well worth the effort despite all that was involved. We met all our objectives, we; 1) visited Hill 861-Alpha, 2) located and visited LZ Margo, 3) met NGOs to learn what to do to participate in the Peace Park at Khe Sanh—that information has been passed to Colonels Nick Romanetz and John Kaheny, and 4) learned how to get involved with the UXO problem. Our only significant problem involved the failure of the video equipment we took to LZ Margo; a HUGE disappointment, though 'in retrospect'—no pun intended—not unexpected since we intentionally traveled light. Frankly I don't know how I'll handle that issue. Will I make another trip, this time with better equipment and a skilled operator? Will I forgo a video of the site as it now is and just try to make a documentary based on interviews and old photos? Will I even pursue the documentary idea? Only time will tell. Anyone with any ideas is encouraged to contact me.

STICKS OF GOLD

By Dave Anderson

I saw him coming down the trench with his can of ham and Mothers in hand and a slight grin started forming on my face. Stop grin'n ass* and give me those smokes now! Growing up, my Father was a two pack a day smoker. I pilfered one of his cigarettes one day and it made me sicker than hell so I never got into smoking. I was a country kid who grew up eating ham and Lima beans and actually liked the buggers. Melt some cheese into a can of ham and Mothers, break up some crackers and stir them in and if you were in possession at the time, a couple shots of Red Rooster and man I was in hog heaven.

I couldn't have been happier if I had gone to a fancy restaurant at the time. Most of my boys were smokers and they also hated that particular C-Rat meal so I was in a strong position when it came to trading my smokes for food. Those smokes were worth more than gold at the time I swear. Under the stressful conditions we were existing under, cigarettes were in demand and almost priceless to some of the guys. Word in the Mike 2 trench-line was, if you need smokes go see Anderson, he's always got some and he likes to trade for Ham and Mothers whenever possible. Like Sticks of Gold I tell ya. Like sticks of gold!

OBJECTIVE # 2 JANUARY 20, 1968

By Robert "Skip" W. Unangst Jr.
India Co 3/26 1st Platoon

After reading the accounts of Corporal Bryan's reconnaissance engagement on January 20, 1968 in "Red Clay", issue 83, memories of the day were stirred as they have been countless times since. At the time I was a twenty two year old corporal and squad leader of Second Squad, Third Platoon, India Company, 3/26. I was also the oldest member of the squad, and had been with India Company since arriving in country in July of 1967. No engagement is an isolated event. That day was no exception. For several weeks prior to January20th, India Company's base of operations was out of the network of trenches and bunkers atop Hill 881 South. After January 20th, these trenches and bunkers and those of Khe Sanh and other supporting hills would have a commonality with places like Verdun and the Somme.

Hill 881S was an isolated and distant outpost of the Khe Sanh combat base. From atop the hill one could see a vast panorama extending for scores of miles in every direction. To the South, one could see well beyond the combat base. To the West, one could see beyond the immense cliff that is Co Rok Mountain and well into Laos.

To the North, one could see beyond Hill 881 North's ridge line, across the sweeping DMZ valley, and to the distant massive edifice that is Tiger Mountain. To the East, and across another great valley, rose the stretching mountainous ridge line that contained Hills 950 and 1050. These great vistas contained nothing but raw wilderness, except for the tens of thousands of North Vietnamese soldiers occupying them.

This environment was enough to make a lone reinforced rifle company of a little over two hundred Marines on Hill 881 South uneasy. This rifle company was many miles from its closest support base. It is also important, by way of background information, to understand that four months earlier, India Company and the rest of Third Battalion Twenty Sixth Marines, greatly outnumbered, engaged a division of the North Vietnamese Army in a ninety six hour battle between the DMZ and the Con Thien fire base that saw over seventy per cent of the Marines killed or wounded.

On an afternoon, many days before the 20th, a squad on patrol from India Company engaged elements from the North Vietnamese Army approximately a click to the north of Hill 881S. Shortly after, the distant bursts of small arms fire could be heard and the command went out, "Third Platoon saddle up!" Within minutes we were that "spread out", three to five meters apart, serpentine column moving at double time towards the fire. In approximately twenty minutes we were at the site of the fire fight helping wounded Marines. The NVA had broken off the engagement and there was no sign of them. In particular, I remember carrying a Marine, with what appeared to be a severe eye wound, a short distance to an improvised LZ. I remember saying words of encouragement to him as I carried him. However, the moment was of such intensity that I did not realize until I lay him down that the back of his head was gone. We quickly secured the area and headed back to 881S.

On January 19th, in the afternoon while "milling around" on 881S, the spontaneity of small arms fire again erupted, but this time the sound was more distant. This time the sound came from the vicinity of Hill 881 North. Again, the clarion sounded, "Third platoon, saddle up!" Again, our serpentine column of three squads double timed down 881S, and up and down the intervening topography, along the narrow meandering trail, through shoulder high elephant grass, and always wondering, always anticipating, what was around the next bend. It was no secret that the NVA's strategy was to strike when they greatly outnumbered their prey. Political restraints from the "Demilitarized Zone" to "International Borders" created a macabre vastness that was known as our Area of Operation. These restraints created a Happy Hunting Ground for the NVA; we were the bait.

As we crested Hill 881 North, the just ambushed bodies of Marines from a reconnaissance squad laid in the hot sun. Some Marines from that squad were lucky to have been extracted by rescue helicopter. Not these. To this day, I have vivid memories of that scene. One Marine had deep blue eyes, as deep as the sky above. He had a bright gold wedding band that radiated in the sun light, and his body, split in half all the way to his upper chest, was framed in bright red; this, perhaps, the result of a Soviet RPG.

The next memory I have was of a tree line less than one hundred meters away. Only elephant grass separated us. A maelstrom from Hell could have erupted from that tree line at any second. We "secured" the area, and all of us, the dead and the living, were helicoptered back to 881S or the Khe Sanh combat base. The NVA, again, chose not to engage us.

On the evening of January 19th, 1968, I and the other squad leaders of third platoon were called to Third Platoon's command bunker by our Platoon Commander, Lieutenant Thomas Brindly. Lieutenant Brindly had returned from the Company Command bunker where our Company Commander, Captain William Dabney, had informed his platoon commanders of what Lieutenant Brindly was about to inform us.

India Company, shortly after day break, would depart Hill 881S on a company size patrol to Hill 881 North. There were several sequential objectives to be met along the way. The company would be split into two groups. First and Second Platoons would take one route, and third platoon would take a different route. This must have appeared as a two pronged advance toward Hill 881 North from Hill 881S. A reconnaissance squad would be attached to Third Platoon. This was Corporal Bryan's squad. Corporal Bryan's squad would peel off of our column and become "inserted" to commence its own reconnaissance mission. Lieutenant Brindley also informed us that a primary mission of the patrol would be the recovery of the radio the reconnaissance squad lost when they were ambushed the day before.

As it became light, Third Platoon "saddled up" and began to depart the perimeter of Hill 881S. My squad was second in the order of the march. First squad, led by Sergeant Knowles, was before us. Directly behind us were Lieutenant Brindley and the platoon command group, which included his radio man. Sergeant Johnson's third squad followed, and behind them was Corporal Bryan's reconnaissance squad so placed for insertion. I remember talking to Lance Corporal Collins of first squad just before we departed. He would be walking point for the platoon, and this would be his last patrol before completing his second tour in country. I believe he was from the Midwest.

I remember him talking about husking corn and corn country. He was a solid, alert, squared away Marine; the kind of guy you wanted walking point for you. He was also told he did not have to walk point or even be on this patrol because he was a day away from heading home. However, he felt strongly that he was more qualified than anyone else, and he therefore insisted on walking point. I remember telling him to be careful. As we left our perimeter and headed toward Objective #1, we moved down into the early morning mountain fog that blanketed the hills. The sky above the fog was so blue that we knew this would become a hot sunny day. Our forty something man column descended many hundreds of feet to the base of Hill 881S and up again to the crest of the adjacent hill, Objective #1. We continued to move north to Objective#2, Hill 800, which was a foot hill of Hill 881N.

As the point crested Objective #2 around midmorning, the silence was consumed by the explosion of small arms fire a few meters before me. I dropped to the ground, and a short time later, I remember looking up to see members of the first squad crawling back down. Several grenades were being thrown after them. In the middle of the group was their squad leader, Sergeant Knowles, with his lower jaw hanging below his throat, and in a strained voice with his tongue pressed against his pallet he was saying, "Help me, help me."

The first thought in my mind was, "Drop back and call in air support," but then another Marine, crawling back down the path said, "Collins is still up there." I then remember instinctively saying, "Second Squad Up." Up there" was probably no more than thirty five to sixty feet away. Just then, grenade floated through the air and landed five or six feet from me; I reflexively curled up and turned away from it. I thought, "This is it," and waited for a second for hot shrapnel to sear through me. Boom- unbelievable- nothing, nothing at all! I was untouched!

My first fire team, led by Lance Corporal Rudy "Dunker" Gomez, was before me, and I had them form a 'wedge." I called out, "Machine gun up." Two machine gunners, John Maceous, and Critchfield, instantly appeared. I said, "Give me a base of fire." Critchfield said, "where do you want it." I said, A few degrees to the left and right of where I throw this grenade." I pulled the pin, held it for a second, and lobbed it up to where one had been-lobbed down to us. I watched it, descend into the green elephant grass, and explode. In almost continuous rhythm, I saw what appeared to be an arm attached to quadrant of shoulder rise barely above the elephant grass.

The machine gunners put down a base of fire. I then had my second fire team, lead by Lance Corporal Roy Comstock, form a wedge to the left; and my third fire team, lead by Lance Corporal Tobin, form a wedge to my right. This movement created a squad wedge and took a very brief time to form. The squad then moved five to eight meters forward when I heard Gomez's point, PFC Barrett, aka All Cap, say "We got him."

The fire team brought Lance Corporal Collins fifty or so meters down to the base of Hill 800 where third platoon was regrouping. I spoke with Lieutenant Brindley and members of my squad. I remember concluding that probably Collins and others had inadvertently walked inside a NVA perimeter on Hill 800. I doubt either side saw the other one coming.

Seeing a NVA soldier, Collins fired and another NVA soldier behind him shot Collins in the back with the bullet exiting his abdomen. A brief but intense fire fight then ensued. As I walked past Collins at the base of Objective #2, I observed the Corpsman attending to him with serum albumin. I asked my first fire team what he said when they got to him. They told me he said, "Leave me alone, I am dying." A few minutes later he died.

We were told at about this time that First and Second Platoons, on their way to 881N, had engaged the NVA at almost the same time we did.

My understanding of things at this time is that Lieutenant Brindley Informed Captain Dabney of our engagement. The word that went around at this time is that Captain Dabney informed Lieutenant Brindley, "I want that hill." I have always assumed that the hill was Hill 800 as Hill 881N was still a good distance away.

In about an hour, we regrouped and redistributed ammunition at the base of Hill 800 while helicopters removed the dead and the wounded. There was also a brief meeting with Lieutenant Brindley in which he informed the remaining squad leaders that the platoon would get "on line," " fix bayonets," and "take, seize, and secure" Objective #2. As I recall, my squad (second squad), made up the left flank of the line because first squad had had been decimated. Its remaining members were integrated into second and third squads. Third squad, which was led by Sargent Johnson was to our right, and the reconnaissance squad, led by Corporal Bryan, was on the far right of the line. While we were regrouping a 106mm recoilless rifle on Hill 881S blasted away at the top of Hill 800. I believe this gun crew was led by Lieutenant Richard Dworsky, and its mission was obviously to "soften" the target before our assault.

On command, the platoon moved out on line through the open elephant grass. This may have been one of the last on line fixed bayonet assaults in United States military history. It is important to note that the distance from where we began the assault to the top of Hill 800 was no more than 200 feet, and the increase in elevation was probably less than fifty feet. It is also important to note that on the other side of Hill 800 the land descended again, but then rose up to the topographic fingers of Hill 881 North; fingers that were higher in elevation than Hill 800. At this time I believe we were about to have much in common with other assaults in history. These include: Marye's Heights in December of 1862 at Fredericksburg, Pickett at the High Water Mark in July of 1863, the Normandy Beach in June of 1944, and the Iwo Jima beaches in February of 1945. As we moved out on line, we slowly fired our M16s on semiautomatic. This was considered suppressive fire.

In 1965, a friend of mine, Tom Costello, a student from Villanova, off for the summer, and working his summer job, got press pass tickets from Bob Murphy to a New York Mets game. We got to sit right behind home plate. From that vantage point I was in awe of the speed and energy in Willie Mays' swing.

More than half way up that hill I felt as if Willie Mays' swing had connected with my neck. My strapped on helmet and eye glasses went flying. The thundering noise of a fire fight turned into silence. A white mist surrounded me, and I felt myself levitating and looking down on the verdant hills and mountains of Viet Nam. The world had gone Kafkaesque. I thought that what had to happen had happened. I was no longer of this earth. Many of us who had been in country for the past seven months came to believe that getting out alive was unrealistic. Although it took me some time to piece it together, I had been shot through the neck.

This dream gave way to a cruel epiphany. I began to register the crackling of gun fire. I came to realize that I was staggering around in the middle of a fire fight. I was not dead! Fool, get down.

As I hugged the ground, I realized I was lying next to my M79 man, Joe Ramierez. I remember telling Joe to have the others face outboard. What I did not know was that Lieutenant Brindley was dead, shot through the heart. His last words were (I was told), "Sergeant Johnson, it's your boat."

After learning Lieutenant Brindley was shot, Second Lieutenant Thomas came up the short distance from the base of Hill 800. Apparently, he and other members from Second Platoon were sent over to reinforce us. I was told that as he moved up to the crest of Hill 800 he said, "Lets show them what second platoon's got." At this time he was probably no more than thirty feet from me. Other marines later told me that as he got to the top of Hill 800 he rose to a kneeling position to make observations, and just as he did, a bullet entered one hip and exited the other hip, and then exited his canteen. As his head hit the ground, a bullet went through it.

Lieutenant Folly, who was India Companies Executive Officer, next appeared on top of Hill 800. As I lay alongside of Joe Ramierez, I asked him how I was. He said, "Not bad Skip." Folly, who was not far from him, also asked him how I was. He said, "Pretty bad sir." Then I remember my head being about twelve inches from Joe's utility pants pocket as we clung to that hill. A puff of cloth caught the pocket. Joe immediately grabbed and patted his leg. After a pause, He said "I'm OK." I still maintain that bullets have a unique sound when they pass within inches of your head; perhaps a sonic boom. Earlier in the march, Joe found a corpsman's scissors on the trail and put them in his utility pant's pocket. Five or so weeks, later when Joe and I were back at Khe Sanh, he showed me the scissors and the severe bend the bullet had made in them.

At this time, those of us on top of Hill 800 were hanging on. The North Vietnamese army was positioned on the fingers of Hill 881 North above us. From there they could rake our position from several angles. We were receiving protective fire from our company positions back on Hill 881 South. They were able to support us with that 106 mm recoilless rifle. It was not enough. This time the NVA would not break off the fight. This time they would not melt back into the vast wilderness. This time they sensed their prey was greatly weakened and greatly outnumbered. This time they began an assault to finish us off. Those of us remaining, and in the more forward part of our small perimeter atop Hill 800, heard them moving towards us. This situation could not have been greatly different from that experienced by George Armstrong Custer at the Battle of Little Big Horn and his troops ninety two years earlier.

But then two A-4 Skyhawks at near supersonic speed descended out of the blue and pounced on that which had taken the bait. As I looked up, two memories would remain with me. The first was that of releasing napalm canisters. Canisters falling so close that I felt I might have been able to touch them. Canisters that broiled all that which was advancing before us into holocaust. The second memory is of my head and chest exploding with one thought, life, life, life; I am not going to die today.

Corporal Bryan and his reconnaissance squad, who were on our right flank, took casualties that were as severe as ours. I was informed that after he was shot multiple times, and before he died, he held his squad together and contributed to the coordination of air strikes that saved the survivors lives.

The Skyhawks secured our position, and for the second time that day we evacuated the dead and the wounded. The wounded were flown to Charlie Med at Khe Sanh. From there, I was flown to NSA Da Nang where a doctor examined the entrance and the exit wounds on my neck. He then informed me in his Texas accent, "Another quarter of inch more boy and that would have snapped your neck just where we hanged a man." The next day, I was flown to the USS Sanctuary where I would convalesce for the next nineteen or twenty days. At that time I would make my way back to Dong Ha, the siege at Khe Sanh, and finally Hill 881S. This return took several days as landing zones along the way were relentlessly being hammered by Soviet artillery, rockets, and mortars.

After returning to 881S, I would daily look North from third platoon's trench line to Hill 881N and Hill 800. This was real estate we had paid a dear price for only to give it back. A couple of months later, Marines would take it again only to give it back again. This was not a World War II type of war fought to be won. This was a war with a "Demilitarized Zone," allowing massive numbers of ground troops to move south, but forbidding other ground troops to move north. This was a war with "Rules of Engagement" and international boundaries. This was a war designed, directed, and executed by the theory of "Containment." This war also devolved into one that many Americans and most of the media desperately did not want won.

By June my tour had ended and I was going back to "the world." What we as survivors did not know was that the "siege" would continue for decades. I was made aware of this many times. Not the least of which was in the early 1980's. While applying for a social studies teaching position at the Fifth Avenue School in Northport, New York, the interview committee asked me, "Are you going to use napalm and machine guns on children?" Needless to say I would not be hired there or in any surrounding districts where a system of winks and nodes and a code of "omerta" blacklisted Vietnam survivors. As has been said before and in the words of a Beatles song, "Boy, you're going to carry that weight a long time."

In a country now, filled with "sun shine patriots," wearing shiny red, white ,and blue lapel pins, I occasionally reflect back to Parris Island in 1966 and the prescient words of my and Platoon 201S's Senior Drill Instructor, Staff Sergeant J.J. Hegerty. At the end of one those hot July days that drill instructors love and recruits fear and in the middle of our misery he admonished, "Don't tell me how bad you think you have it now, because a day will come privates when you will be holding a hill with other marines and everybody else in the world will be coming at you trying to kill you."

Discipline
"Training to Ensure Proper Behavior"

Nine weeks of Boot Camp at the San Diego Marine Corps Recruit Depot was a difficult introduction into military life. I was thankful my cycle was not the usual twelve weeks, but the war was heating up and more Marines (Men) were needed, so the training was on a war time accelerated schedule. Upon graduation we were informed that we were now Marines. I certainly looked like a Marine in my new uniform and I was even told that I could even call myself a Marine. I had taken all of the instruction that was provided by the tough Drill Instructors and survived the rigorous physical and mental training.

I knew that additional training was forthcoming in the Infantry Training Regiment (ITR) at Camp Pendleton but I found solace knowing that the worst was over and now that we were recognized as legitimate Marines we would be treated as such with only physical training difficulties ahead, but I was wrong. Our Training Regiment consisted of the usual testy and slightly crazed and salty of which I was one. Our ITR Sergeant was now called a Troop Handler. A short little guy with a slight lisp, it was difficult to take him seriously when he yelled at us in his rather high pitched voice, we were all a bit taken back when he continued to treat us as recruits. At formation he made the announcement that he wanted the biggest looser to step forward (my words, not his) and he pointed out one individual - I observed that the Troop Handler had made the correct choice. His next instruction was "When he says something, I want you to act as if his orders to you came directly from me." Not suffering fools or idiots lightly, I of course had a slight problem with him which resulted in a minor physical altercation. Out of a hundred or so men in the company why did I have to stick my nose into this other than the fact I may have been an idiot myself or perhaps just a little hardheaded and not yet sufficiently disciplined.

After this minor issue of disobedience on my part, the Troop Handler called me into his office where he ordered me to stand at attention. He then stood directly in front of me and hit me in the chest which his fist knocking me to floor. He then took a position over the top of me and pointing his finger at me stated in his now commanding voice, "I told you that when he told you to do something you were to consider it coming directly from me, do you understand?" This incident and lesson in discipline is something I have never forgotten - It was truly "Training to Ensure Proper Behavior" a process I continued to understand explicitly.

MARK OWEN 60 MINUTES INTERVIEW
By Craig Tourte

If you happened to have watched the television show "60 Minutes" on Sunday (November 2, 2014) you'll recall the segment interview of former Navy Seal Mark Owen. The interview focused on the book he had written regarding "The Mission That Killed Osama Bin Laden" titled "No Easy Day" and it's authorization by the government. I met Mark in 2013 - see story below - and will be donating to the auction the book he personally signed to Khe Sanh Veterans.

"No Easy Day" - Signed by author to "Khe Sanh Veterans" September 12, 2013
By Craig W. Tourte

It was an honor and privilege, a few weeks ago, to have had the opportunity to have dinner with Mark Owen - author of "No Easy Day...the firsthand account of the mission that killed Osama Bin Laden." Mark was the team leader and second in line of the squad of Navy Seal Team 6 members who entered the house and climbed the stairs, confronted Bin Laden in the doorway of his bedroom and dispatched him to his reward of 77 virgins. Mark was the guest speaker at the dinner and provided a wonderful PowerPoint presentation of his extensive training - mentioning that he actually had to live in a tent and eat MRE's for a month (an inside joke for Khe Sanh Veterans) - the rescue of Captain Richard Phillips - an about to be released movie staring Tom Hanks in "Captain Phillips" - and a first hand account of his participating in the actual search, training for and dispatch of Bin Laden. His presentation was compelling, inspiring and even at times humorous. I was able to spend a few private minutes with Mark and presented him with a Khe Sanh Challenge Coin and the Fall Winter 2012, Issue 81 of Red Clay Magazine. On the inside cover I wrote - "On behalf of all Khe Sanh Veterans, thank you for your service and sacrifice - Craig W. Tourte."

Mark inscribed a couple of his books for me with a personal note and he was also kind enough to write in one of the books the following: "Khe Sanh Veterans - Thank you for YOUR sacrifice to this country! I'm honored to follow in your footsteps and serve as will!" "One Team, One Fight" "Mark Owen." I'll donate this book, addressed to Khe Sanh Veterans, at the silent auction next year at our reunion in San Diego. "No Easy Day" was a compelling read of which I thoroughly enjoyed and of course once again, it was an honor and privilege to have met Mr. Owen.

KHE SANH VETERANS IN THE NEWS
Steven Orr
HQ CO RLT 26 COMM

Steven Orr was a young Marine stationed on a plateau in Vietnam surrounded by enemy troops who marched shells, rockets and mortars across his company's position every day like clockwork.

In the years since the spring of 1968 when the 19-year-old left Khe Sanh Combat Base, which the U.S. abandoned after suffering more than 9,000 casualties. Orr has reflected on the men and women who for part of their lives wore a uniform to show devotion and service to their country.

"Veterans Day is a day for everyone to display their patriotism and their love of our flag and our country," Orr said. It's a day to express "appreciation to veterans and to those currently serving in the military for their service and for their sacrifices."

Orr, Lewiston's police chief, is the grand marshal of this year's Veterans Day parade, scheduled for 11:11 a.m. Saturday in downtown Lewiston. The parade's aim this year is to honor Vietnam-era veterans. The parade, which was revived in 2011 after a long absence, has routinely had between 85 and 100 entries.

"The parade is an opportunity for everyone to recognize and to celebrate our veteran-rich region," Orr said. An estimated 6,000 veterans reside in the area, Orr said.

"Our veterans serve stateside and abroad, they serve in times of war and in times of peace, in combat and support roles," said Ron Gray, commander of the Valley Veterans Council, an event organizer.

Saturday's parade took place Tuesday prior to a ceremony at the Idaho State Veterans Home, 821 21st Ave., Lewiston. John Brown of Clarkston, a retired U.S. Navy chief petty officer and Vietnam veteran, will give the address at that event.

The ceremony includes placing of the ceremonial wreath by veterans of the 148th

"We'll be honoring all veterans and all branches," said retired Command Sgt. Maj. Major Boyd L. Pedersen.

Retired U.S. Marine Corps Maj. Kay Kalbfleisch and former Army Staff Sgt. Howard Osterberg, a Korean War veteran, will receive the U.S. Sen. Mike Crapo Spirit of Freedom Award during the event, Gray said.

The ceremony will include representatives from local Veterans of Foreign Wars and American Legion posts, the Marine Corps League, the Disabled American Veterans and Fleet Reserve and Idaho Army National Guard color detail.

TRIBUTE TO OUR CORPSMAN
Larry McCartney E CO 2/26

Got this AGAIN today and it AGAIN brought tears to my eyes as I think of all the GREAT Corpsmen I had the honor and privilege to serve with through the years; in particular I though of those who were KIA--'Doc' Chuck 'Super Squid' Langenfeld, 'Doc' Jim Delaplane and 'Doc' Joe Lopez--but I also thought of some tremendous FRIENDS now gone, men like Commander John 'Doc' Lancaster and Bob 'Double Doc' Topmiller, as well as Medal of Honor recipient Colonel Don 'Doc' Ballard.
For those of us who heard and used the term 'Corpsman Up' it is a term that remains everlasting in both our hearts and our minds. The truth is that we ask and expect far too much from these young men and women who are called Corpsmen and who like most young Marines were first exposed to the horrors of war in ways most will never forget. Those assigned to the Fleet Marine Forces (FMF) lived the way we did and that of the units to which assigned; they endured and participated in every hardship and disappointment, as well as the praise and glory awarded their units.

The truth is many in Vietnam were eighteen (18) years old and upwards and were just as fearful of being hurt or killed as the rest were and like the rest failed to receive mail for extended periods of time. Like every other Marine in the ground combat units, Corpsmen dug their foxholes with other Marines, ate the same C-rations as the rest, felt the stings of ants, leeches, bees, and scorpions and they also dug their own toilets like the rest of us and they also buried their cans, papers, etc., after cooking and eating their meals. They were just as tired as the rest and at times just as afraid of the unknown as was anyone else. However, Corpsmen still had to check on the sanitation of our locations, as well as tending to the minor and major injuries and ailments suffered sooner or later by all—those aliments and injuries ran the gamut from diarrhea to coughs and colds, from Elephant grass cuts which usually festered into very large and ugly sores, to the usual heat related issues such as heatstroke and on to more serious mental and physical issues to include VD and other issues of that nature.

Our Navy Corpsmen did all that while still carrying the gear needed to care for a platoon or company sized unit as well as carrying their own gear and weapons. Often times they were told to help out the locals with their illnesses, injuries, or wounds and that in turn meant using up precious bandages and medications, which the Corpsman had carried in his pack and medical bags for his fellow Marines. That then caused the Corpsman to pray or ask help from somewhere that he would not run short of needed medications and supplies and just in case and when the next firefight, or mine explosion, or enemy mortars or artillery might happen upon his unit.

To ask the above of a young eighteen (18) to twenty two (22) year old FMF Corpsman is asking much more than many in the field ever realized until much later and after the fact. After all, that Corpsman is thought by many to be an 'expert' on wounds, or how to handle other major injuries, in addition to which medication might be needed and requested to be used for everything from fleas or hair lice to trench foot or crotch rot or pink eye. While every Corpsman that our units had in Vietnam might not have been quite as astute, courageous, gifted, and the logically-minded individuals as we make them all out to be, I would love to have just one (1) more time to shake their hands and hug them all and to thank them all for they did for so many over the years and especially for those units I was honored to be a part of.

THANKS 'DOC' FOR YOUR SERVICE, BRAVERY AND CARING—A TRIBUTE TO THE FMF CORPSMAN.

SERVICE CONNECTION FOR BRAIN CANCER
By Mack

All:
Just heard yesterday that a friend who I helped gather evidence for a disability claim with the Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) has been rated one hundred (100) percent service connected disabled for Glioblastoma Multiform—brain cancer—that is the result of Agent Orange exposure.

When gathering the evidence I was frequently told Glioblastoma Multiform, or any other brain cancer for that matter, can not be service connected for Agent Orange exposure since it is not on 'the list of diseases' connected to Agent Orange exposure. I disagreed, telling them that the illnesses on that list are only those that are currently presumed to be due to Agent Orange exposure, so if the claimant served in Viet Nam and has one (1) of those disease then he/she doesn't have to prove it occurred as a result of military service. However, a veteran can still be service connected for a disease if the claimant proves the nexus—connection—to military service.

The key here was in the diagnosis and testimony of the civilian doctors. In this case we found a Court of Veterans Appeal case—Citation Number 1201988, Decision Date January 19, 2012, Archive Date January 30, 2012, Docket Number 08-31 874, appeal from the VA Regional Office (RO) in Boise, Idaho—which set the precedent for service connection for Glioblastoma Multiform—brain cancer. In addition, we found a professional medical journal article written by doctors in Australia that substantiated the connection between Glioblastoma Multiform and Agent Orange exposure. The doctors examined the prior court decision, the medical evidence, including the medical evidence from Australia, as well as the current case, and wrote that the illness was "most likely" the result of exposure to Agent Orange.

After learning of the decision I learned that Glioblastoma Multiform, as well as several other forms of brain cancer, are on the VA 'watch list' that MAY be added to the presumptive list @ some point in the future

The important point here is that if you have a disease, any disease, make sure your doctors know you are a Viet Nam veteran and ask them if they think the disease is connected to Agent Orange exposure. If you need to provide them with medical evidence then do so. If they believe there is a connection then file a claim, which would include the strongest possible diagnosis the doctors can legitimately make, and force the VA to make a decision. Who knows, that decision just MAY go your way without any problems because of the accumulation of evidence from other claims, or your case just MAY be a part of that accumulation of evidence

Good luck, God Bless and Semper Fidelis!!!

VIETNAM STRIKES GOLD: THERE'S NO LOOKING BACK, AS THE VIETNAMESE CHARGE INTO THE 21ST CENTURY.

October 5, 2014

By Jeff Browne

I got in a little hometown jam, so they put a rifle in my hands, sent me off to Vietnam, to go and kill the yellow man.

American singer Bruce Springsteen

You think yellow, I say gold; it's the color of my real skin.

Vietnamese singer Pham Quyen Anh

When President Barack Obama took a moment in his first inaugural address to honor our war veterans, he cited four battles: Concord, Gettysburg, Normandy and Khe Sanh.

Khe Sanh? That's a village in central Vietnam where U.S. Marines repelled a furious assault early in 1968. The victory cost thousands of lives and obliterated the countryside. You might say we Americans won the battle there but lost the war. Or did we? If our purpose was to stop communism, you have to wonder.

In Khe Sanh, coffee plants have risen from the ashes. And today, amazingly, Vietnam is the world's second-largest exporter of coffee, thanks to hundreds of thousands of determined farmers.

Thirty years ago, Vietnam was starving. Today, it is feeding the world as a leading exporter of cashews, whitefish, tapioca, pepper, fruit and rice.

Vietnam makes shoes for Nike, chips for Intel, cameras for Canon, motorcycles for Honda and smartphones for Samsung. Vietnamese are customers of Briggs & Stratton motors, Harley-Davidson motorcycles, Manpower staffing services, General Electric medical devices and Kohler sinks.

Vietnamese consumers shop at the Gap, Banana Republic and Coach. They drink Pepsi, Coke, Miller beer and Starbucks coffee — and within a month after McDonald's opened there this spring, the Vietnamese had ordered 61,980 Big Macs.

McDonald's is an emblem of the triumph of capitalism over communism. The franchise owner is a Vietnamese-American named Henry Nguyen of Chicago. He is married to the CEO of an investment bank and the daughter of Prime Minister Nguyen Tan Dung, who oversees the Communist Party's determined, and sometimes crude, efforts to stay in control. Vietnam's pre-eminent corporate power couple and its communist government are family.

In some ways, Vietnam's youthful, ingenious entrepreneurs overshadow corporate royalty. Consider Flappy Bird. A few months ago, this maddening game was the most downloaded smartphone game worldwide, the creation of a software engineer named Dong Nguyen who lives with his parents in Hanoi, the capital of Vietnam.

Mr. Nguyen was bringing in $50,000 a day in ad revenue, but withdrew Flappy Bird from the market because he had grown weary of the notoriety. He wanted to get his life back.

Vietnam is full of Dong Nguyens — hundreds of thousands of modest, brainy entrepreneurs transforming their country.

That's what Google software engineer Neil Fraser discovered on a recent visit. He found that Vietnamese 11th-graders could pass Google's notoriously difficult interview test, and third-graders knew how to use Microsoft Word — in English. Over the next generation, these kids will showcase their potential. A recent report noted Vietnam's transition from col-lectivism to capitalism produced 170 people worth more than $30 million. What's interesting is who reported it: the official newspaper of the Communist Party, which apparently deems capitalism as important as ideology in a country with bold global aspirations.

Vietnam is an entrepreneurial frontier. It's the 13th most-populous nation — larger than every country in Europe except Russia. Theoretically, Vietnam has the potential to be the Japan of the 21st century, which eventually could make an investment in Vietnam grow 10,000 percent. So far this year, Vietnam's stock market is up about 20 percent.

Even so, while global investors see gold, many American still see yellow — the color of peril, caution and cowardice. In Vietnamese culture, yellow and gold are the same — the color of power, prosperity and success.

Vietnam is a golden opportunity. The promise arises from a confident, forward-looking and optimistic culture — a curious blend of Buddhist, Confucian, Christian and communist values. That cultural complexity is embodied in a young man named Huan.

I encountered Huan one afternoon in Hanoi. As I was sitting on a park bench, he approached me to practice his English. I invited him to sit down, and we talked.

His story was familiar. Huan grew up on a rice farm in the rural north of Vietnam, and he studied hard to earn admission to a university in Hanoi. Sometimes he walked to the old quarter to get an odd job at a shop or a restaurant to earn money for food and incidentals.

As we were talking, a frail, elderly woman limped up to us and held out her hand. I barely noticed her, but Huan gave her his complete attention. He asked her a question and then pulled out his wallet and gave the woman its contents, a single note of Vietnamese currency worth about a dollar.

As she moved on, I asked him why he gave her his only money, and he said, "Because she needs it more than I do."

He realized I was puzzled and added, "In Vietnam, we have great respect for old people, poor people, the less fortunate."

A few minutes later, as we parted ways, I handed Huan about $3 for dinner.

He seemed confused and said, "I cannot accept that."

I said, "Why not? You need it more than I do."
He replied, "My father taught me never to accept money that I did not earn."

Then Huan walked into the streets of Hanoi with attributes many Vietnamese possess in abundance: pride, confidence and an empty wallet.

Culturally, Vietnamese also seem to have a short memory. Not long ago, I joined an educator from Ho Chi Minh City on a tour of Wisconsin's Capitol building in Madison. After visiting the legislative chambers, we walked outside on the deck at the top of the rotunda.

There, we faced three flags blowing in the wind: American, Wisconsin and POW/MIA. He had never seen the black flag, so I explained it was a reminder that some Americans who fought in Vietnam are still missing.

"In Vietnam," he said, "we do not dwell on the past."

And he added, wryly, "I just learned the Wisconsin motto."

Forward.

Jeff Browne is president of Vietnomics LLC, an investment consultancy, and co-founder of templehillsonline.com, a social enterprise helping Vietnamese farmers develop specialty coffee. He's based in Elm Grove, Wisconsin.

ANOTHER SMALL WORLD STORY

By Craig Tourte

"As attractive and charismatic as he was, there was a side of my husband that surfaced night after night in his sleep. He was plagued with the terrible nightmares about his time in the Marines…Many nights I was up changing the sheets wet with sweat, which poured from memories he forced himself to turn off while awake. Like many damaged war heroes…he had received the Purple Heart…he clung to the pride of having been a Marine. Then he drank to forget what the war had done to him."

Who amongst us here hasn't experienced at least some of the above described symptoms. Difficult to explain to others and certainly not discussed with outsiders, after all it has been so along ago you'd think "we'd just get over it" as the too often repeated and insulting phrase is directed towards us during casual conversations by the ignorant. I was impressed that the young wife making this statement understood and recognized the demons her newly married husband was experiencing and that she attempted to understand and was able to offer support for a condition, which at that time was not recognized nor discussed but rather ignored and most often misunderstood. Perhaps understandable, since the quote was made by the caring wife who describes her World War II Veteran husband and his condition in 1951.

I was reminded a few POST down that Lee Marvin had been a Marine, this little quote above was written by Lee's first wife Betty Ebeling in her book "Tales of a Hollywood Housewife" and notes the many struggles Lee had with PTSD, although there was not a name for this condition until many years later. Lee Marvin served in the Marine Corps from 1942-1945 with the 24th Marine Corps Regiment and was wounded during the battle of Saipan. Her statement about Lee's condition, those many years ago, is synonymous with the condition presently experience by so many veterans, regardless of when or where the served.

ARRIVING AT KHE SANH

By Doc Jim Thomas

So 47 years ago, I arrived at Khe Sanh! I remember looking around at the GREEN mountains, waving elephant grass, and a few tents here and there. I remember seeing a helium filled Santa tied to the razor wire floating high without a care. I wondered why the enemy didn't snipe at it, just to irritate us! I remember seeing hundreds of fruit cakes from home being thrown over the wire to the enemy, but they probably didn't eat them either!

I remember the word of the day as more info came to us, attack probable, attack expected, start building bunkers! Fill sandbags. I've got a Doctorate in filling Sandbags! A Corpsman named Nick, & I drove all over the base on our mule, looking for bunker material! I remember walking around with jars of malaria pills, handing them out. Marines, thinking they could out fox the Doc would act like they took them, but I would force the issue, and an old Gunny watching me, said Good job Doc! That still makes me smile! I remember watching the fog roll in, like trying to see through a wad of cotton. A spotter plane missed the approach, circled around and approached again, setting down, and then the fog covering him just that fast!

I was so green, and scared that I wouldn't survive! I hung on every word of the Corpsman who had been in country for seven, eight months. Their war stories both intrigued, and frightened me. A warning from a Corpsman to stay away from Rockets, & Machine gunners would in fact create a friendship that last to this day! The hardships of Khe Sanh brought more than heartache! It brought friendships with Tommy, Big John, Russ, David, Kutz, Dennis, Mike, John, and many other men who are honorable warriors that I have such love and respect for! So on this date in December of 2014, I wish you a very Merry Christmas!

Doc Jim Thomas

KHE SANH VETERAN
REV. WILLIAM R. HAMPTON STS
CAPTAIN,UNITED STATES
NAVAL RESERVE
CHAPLAIN 3/26
8 OCTOBER 1935 - 12 NOVEMBER 2014

SERVICE OF MORNING PRAYER WAS HELD SATURDAY 6 DECEMBER 2014 AT GRACE LUTHERAN CHURCH 2108 N. EUCLIDAVE. UPLAND, CA 91784.

William Ray Hampton, known to many as 'Pastor Hampton', 'PrH', or 'Bill', was many things to many people-son, brother, Principal, Chaplain, Pastor, swim-instructor, YMCA Director, organist, mission fundraiser, mentor, and friend - all of it done in the service of the Lord.

Born October 8, 1935 to Hazel and Merle Hampton he grew up in Inglewood, CA. He was introduced to the Lutheran Church when h is mother enrolled him at Chapel of Peace Lutheran School because the local public schools did not teach phonics at the time. From there he attended Inglewood High School ('53) where he learned to play the organ. After high school he attended USC, graduating with a BS in Education ('57). While at USC he earned his keep by playing the organ at the Culver City Roller Rink, playing the catchy skate-tunes of the era while simultaneously studying for his classes.

This life long Trojan then went on to Pacific Lutheran Seminary at Berkeley ('61). While at seminary he attended Naval Officer-Candidate School and was commissioned an Ensign in the Chaplain Corps, USNR in 1959. He was ordained a Lutheran Pastor in 1961 (ALC), taking his first call as the assistant-pastor/principal at First Lutheran School, Pomona (1961-67).

He was then called to active duty to serve as a Chaplain, first assigned to the 3rd Bn 26Th Marines, with duty in Vietnam (siege of Khe Sanh, and in Quang Tri province), and then as the Chaplain for the Officer Candidate School, Newport, RI (1967-70). At the completion of his active duty he returned to Southern California as a graduate student at Cal Poly, Pomona (1970-72).In 1970 he became the Interim Pastor at Hope Lutheran Church, Mojave. In the 1980's he added two more preaching stations to his Sunday schedule with stops in Boron and Lake Los Angeles driving his ubiquitous Lincoln Continental or the "other" black car every Sunday morning, making the 225 mile round-trip for over forty years. Leading services in the liturgical tradition, PrH rarely missed a Sunday in those 44 years of serving his flock in the desert, conducting his last service on 19 October, 2014.

Pastor Hampton became the founding Principal of Lutheran High School in La Verne in 1972. He personally recruited the freshman and sophomore classes that began with the school in the fall of 1973. Pastor Hampton was instrumental in developing the curriculum that included the Naval Junior Officer Reserve Training Corp program in an addition to establishing the swimming and lifesaving class as a requirement for all students. Under his direction, in the fall of 1976, the new campus was constructed and the school moved to its permanent home in La Verne. In 1984 he oversaw the building of the new gymnasium.

Throughout his years at Lutheran High School he provided strong and caring direction to the many graduates and teachers.

In 1985 he became the General Director of the Pomona Valley YMCA. Through his steady leadership the YMCA grew and once again became an integral part of youth development in the valley through the programs of the Pomona YMCA. While serving as the General Director he also developed the Boy's and Girl's Gym Swim Club and the Young Men's Fitness Club. Through his community fund raising efforts he was able to provide sponsored membershi ps to many of the local youth that enabled them to participate in the aquatics and youth programs of the YMCA. Pastor Hampton retired from the YM CA in 1998 but was far from being retired.

In "retirement," Pastor continued to make his trips to the desert for church services each Sunday. He also began to travel extensively for mission trips and church conferences. He continued in his role as teacher, mentor, tutor, pastor and friend. He volu nteered his time to teach Greek and Latin (and the organ) to students at a local Lutheran School and to those who made the Sunday trip with him to the desert. His passion for music and playing the organ continued through his invitations to friends to join him at his home for organ concerts followed by dessert. He played and recorded the hymns for his weekly church services on his Johannus organ. He also volunteered as chaplain for the local Civil Air Patrol.

Affectionately known as the "desert father," Pr. Hampton was a tireless evangelist for the Society of the Holy Trinity. Hardly a California chapter retreat took place without his bringing one or more guests-sometimes a Lutheran pastor he sensed might be blessed by the Society, often an ecumenical visitor. His dry sense of humor and his wisdom were a blessing to the California chapter.

Pastor organized financial support for a number of Lutheran ministries in Indonesia that provided life-saving medical care, scholarships, and pastoral care to needy Indonesian children and their families, an effort that culminated in the establishment of an official presence of the St. Louis-based Lutheran Church- Missouri Synod in Indonesia.

In another part of the world, Pastor Hampton led the effort to provide the headquarters/cathedral of the Lutheran Church in Kenya with a first class organ, hymnals for the congregation, and vestments for the pastors, so that they might be a beacon of liturgical worship in Africa.

He served 30 years of commissioned service in the USNR, retiring in 1989 with the rank of Navy Captain. His reserve duty was usually completed on Wednesday afternoons, putting on his Khakis and driving to El Toro MCAS or Camp Pendleton to visit "his" Marines while also taking along one of his protege's - a few of who ended up joining the U.S. Marine Corps or Navy. Pastor Hampton's personal decorations include a Bronze Star (w/ Valor) and a Purple Heart.

TRIBUTES

Ten days before the reunion I received a phone call from Pat who was a patient at the VA hospital at Jefferson Barracks His speech was slow, deliberate, and emotional. He and I had never met in person, but we connected because of this Message Board and Red Clay. He was calling to ask if I was going to San Diego (I was), and he asked if I'd do him a favor. He had planned to attend this reunion -- a first for him -- but had been diagnosed with lung cancer some months back. Despite extensive medical treatments the cancer had spread to other parts of his body, and he was pretty sure that he might not ever be able to attend any future reunions. He wanted me to take his bank/credit card information with me in order to facilitate a contribution of $500.00 to the KS Vets Scholarship fund.

He said it was his way of giving a little of himself back to the organization which had given him so much pride and comradeship. I brought all his Master Card information and was able to make a transfer of funds right at the Registration Desk. One second the $500.00 was in Pat's bank in St. Louis and the next second it was in our account. I called Pat's mobile from SD to tell him the news but it went to voice mail. I did the same upon my return home with the same results.

Joan and I got back to CT Sunday night and Monday eve his sister called me to say that Pat had passed away over the weekend. Details about the funeral are pending -- I helped her with the wording about his USMC info for the obit -- but he will be buried in Jefferson Barracks Cemetery in the coming days. No wake, no service, just the Military Burial. Pat was never married and had no children.

He was part of the 81mm mortar section with the late Jack Corbett. A few years back Pat sent me a CD that had a 10 minute video on it. During the siege, someone sent him an 8mm movie camera and he had all that film transferred to a digital format. Amazing images of his section of the base: living conditions, the trash & debris, wreckage of aircraft, incredible air strikes (following the bombs down) as well as napalm drops, etc. In one short sequence he pans past Jack's Dickens Ave sign propped up on sandbags.

Pat, to his regret, never made to a reunion, but he has moved on to the greatest reunion of them all. I hope he rests in the peace and happiness he so justly earned. S/F. Dennis

VA chaplains part of 'remarkable work' being done for patients

By Joseph Kenny , St Louis Review

Forty-six years ago Patrick J. Hopkins served in Vietnam as a U.S. Marine hunkered down during the siege of the Khe Sanh base. His recall of the horror he experienced there led in recent years to post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD).

Hopkins was being treated for cancer and for the symptoms of PTSD at the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs Health Care System's Jefferson Barracks Division in south St. Louis County. A big help for him was visits from Father Stuart King. As the nation celebrates Veterans Day on Tuesday, Nov. 11, Father King and other Catholic chaplains at the VA hospitals in St. Louis make a difference in the lives of veterans such as Hopkins brutal battle

BRUTAL BATTLE

On Jan. 21, 1968, the North Vietnamese Army launched an attack, and the siege of Khe Sanh began. Fighting continued nonstop for the next 77 days in one of the most brutal battles of the war, marked by a massive artillery bombardment. Steady shellfire every day brought new casualties and tension as about 20,000 enemy soldiers surrounded the base.

Hopkins' regiment of U.S. Marines held its position, and the U.S. "won that battle," he said, noting that "very bad things happened there." He showed emotion discussing a patrol of 38 men that went out and only a handful returned. Five weeks went by before the bodies could be recovered.

He recalled the thousands of airstrikes, artillery mortars fired and more. A radio operator, he served in the Marines from 1966 to 1969, returning home from Vietnam in November of 1968. "I was lucky," he said. "I was never wounded, shot or anything. Shelled a lot."

He had tinnitus, the perception of sound in the ears or head where no external source is present, commonly referred to as "ringing in the ears" and caused by exposure to excessively loud sound. He traced his cancer to exposure to Agent Orange. The PTSD happened later in his life, perhaps triggered by documentaries he saw on the war, his cancer or the health concerns and deaths of those with whom he served in the war. "I didn't lose an arm or a leg. Sometimes I feel guilty for that." Later, he noted: "I'm just a guy who did his job."

DOCTOR OF THE GOLDEN GATE

Father King prayed for Hopkins. They said the "Our Father," and the priest asked that Hopkins find peace, healing and a sense of God's presence. Father King also expressed thanks for the feelings Hopkins shared.

The patient nicknamed Father King, "the Doctor of the Golden Gate." Father King and other chaplains have "buoyed my spirits quite a bit," he said. "How wonderful it's been to have priests come to see me here and at (the other VA hospital) John Cochran. And laypeople from parishes have come out and given me Communion."

Hopkins also mentioned Father James Gray, a hospital chaplain who visited him while he was at Barnes-Jewish Hospital, where he had surgery. Hopkins was a member of St. Monica Parish in Creve Coeur,. where, as a child, he was an altar server. He ran a restaurant in Creve Coeur from 1975-91. He then was a car salesman before retiring in 2009. He had been caring for his 97-year-old mother, a devout Catholic, since then.

He had surgery for a brain tumor about seven weeks ago, but the cancer returned. He was at John Cochran before coming to Jefferson Barracks and said that the staff of the VA have "done amazing things and give so much of themselves. You'd think they're related to me." His approach was to "put his faith in the Lord and try to come back from this," he said.

SUPPORT

As Father King entered the building to see Hopkins, a World War II veteran was getting a ride home after being discharged from the hospital. The man turned to the chaplain, thanked him for his visits and said, "I'll never forget you."

Earlier, a Vietnam veteran, Larry Rice, praised the priest and another Catholic chaplain. "Father has been there supporting me, praying for me," said Rice, a U.S. Army vet from Wichita, Kan. "When you need help, they're there for you."

Rice had surgery on his spine. He said he is recovering well and said the VA has done "remarkable work." After Father King prayed with him and gave him a blessing, Rice smiled and said, "That's my daily jump-start."

Father King, a lieutenant colonel and wing chaplain in the Air Force Reserve with the 932 Airlift Wing at Scott Air Force Base, is the only full-time Catholic chaplain at the Jefferson Barracks and Chochran hospitals. Four priests of the Archdiocese of St. Louis serve part-time: Father George Brennan at John Cochran, Father John Schneider at Jefferson Barracks and Msgr. Kevin Callahan and Father Richard Rath at both hospitals. They serve with the endorsement of Archbishop Timothy Broglio of the Archdiocese for the Military Services.

"Being a priest at our VA hospitals is demanding, but extremely rewarding, particularly as we offer the sacraments of penance, anointing and the Eucharist to veterans at the end of their lives," Father King said. "We also sit with them and provide comfort and reassurance, as they prepare to die, and as they recover from various illnesses and other medical conditions. We celebrate Masses for veterans, their families and staff members six days each week in one of the two hospitals."

Fourteen Catholic volunteers, including several from St. Francis Xavier (College Church) Parish, assist as extraordinary ministers of Holy Communion. Another volunteer transports patients who use wheelchairs to Mass at Jefferson Barracks. The volunteers have extensive training and get credentials with the VA every year.

Father King, who grew up in Michigan, was ordained in the Diocese of Houma-Thibodaux, La., in May 2012. He is married and a convert, having first served in the Army and Air Force as a Protestant chaplain, beginning in 1994. He was the first married man to be co-sponsored by the military archdiocese as part of their co-sponsorship program for seminarians. (There have been married Roman Catholic priests since 1980, when the Church said that Protestant clergymen who became Catholic priests could stay married to their wives.) He lives in Queen of All Saints Parish in Oakville with his wife, Bettina, and three children, ages 10, 4 and 9 months.

SPIRITUALITY IMPORTANT

Rev. Robert Collingwood, chief of chaplain services for the VA St. Louis Health Care System, said that in the past 10 years a shift has been made to a holistic approach to patient care.

"Particularly with veterans, it's important that you look at their whole life," said Rev. Collingwood, a United Methodist clergyman. "The VA has taken the approach that one's spirituality is a part of that whole person. So they look at the physical, mental, psychological and spiritual as well. We are not here to convert anyone but to help them to tap into and use the spiritual resources they have."

Some veterans have what's called a "moral injury" when they are required in combat to do something that goes against their moral upbringing, or witness such acts. Chaplains are particularly helpful in dealing with those situations and helping the veteran heal.

Some veterans have attended chapel services and it brings a memory of a safe place, close to God. "We have people who return to church after coming to the chapel for the first time in years," he said. "We're a bridge for them, getting them connected with spiritual or religious resources in the community."

Billy Ray Moffett, 70 year old, Checotah resident, passed away on Sunday, December 7, 2014 in Eufaula. He was born on Saturday, August 12, 1944 in Henryetta, Oklahoma to William Eugene and Venie J. (Parker) Moffett. Billy was raised in Henryetta where he graduated from High School. He entered the United States Marines on Friday, January 3, 1966. While in the Marines, Billy Ray earned the National Defense Service Medal, Vietnam Campaign Medal, Good Conduct Medal, Vietnam Service Medal Rifle Expert Badge and the presidential Unit Citation.

He was honorably discharged on Friday, January 3, 1969. After being discharged, Billy worked in Tulsa at Harding Glass, delivered Tulsa newspapers and was a certified security guard thru Pinkerton and worked as security guard at Wabash Metals in Checotah. There was a book written about him and his fellow warriors titled, "Last Stand At The Khe Sanh." He loved fishing, drinking coffee with his buddies at Our Place Café, scenic drives, time at home and loved the Florida beaches, but the biggest smile on Billy's face was when he entered the city of New Orleans on our vacations. Billy was preceded in death by his parents, brothers, Tommy and Jimmy Moffett, 2 infant children and his wife Connie who passed away on Wednesday, December 12, 2009. He is lovingly survived by his fiance' Brenda Rafael of the home; daughters, Carrie Jean Moffett and Kateryna Moffett Kunytska and her husband Alexander of Ukrain; grandchildren, Brittany Wright of Tulsa and Nash Wright of Claremore and Nicholas Kunytska of Ukrain . He is also survived by his sister, Carol Thompson of Henryetta; brother -in-law, Dennis Elledge and his wife Elizabeth of Warner and sister-in-law, Pat Lee of Tulsa.

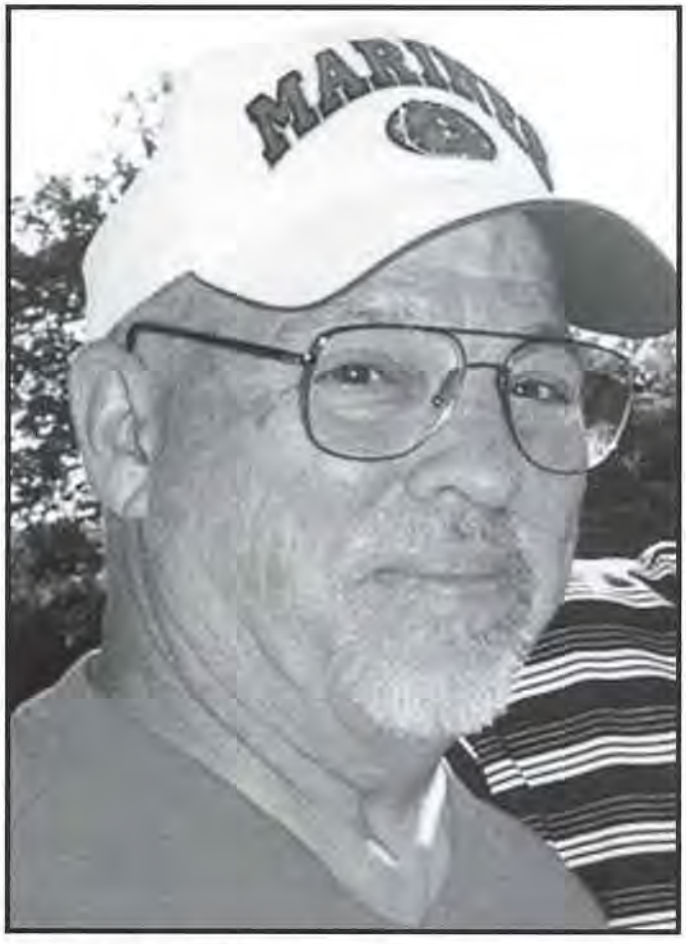
LAWRENCE E. BOSWORTH CWO-4 USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN C/O CAC-OSCAR –3

Larry (aka "Boz" & "Gunner") was assigned early in 1967 to Oscar Company at Khe Sanh as part of the "Plank Crew." He proceeded to help establish Oscar Co., and was the squad leader of two of its CAPs, serving as NCOIC of O-3 until Oct. 1967.



27 June, 1967, Oscar Company was ordered by the Marine command at Khe Sanh to send a patrol to investigate suspected rocket and mortar launch sites spotted earlier by an aerial observer that were believed to be the origin of an NVA rocket and mortar attack on the Khe Sanh base which had occurred just after midnight of the night before. This patrol resulted in the ambush of our patrol on Hill 689 and the deaths of most of the patrol. (See CAC Oscar History)

Larry was a good NCO who cared a great deal for his men's welfare. He told me in various Es and phone conversations that he greatly regretted sending that patrol out, as he knew it was a mistake at the time, as they all knew the area was "hot" and that the CAP unit was not big enough or well enough supported to make a combat patrol of that type, which was better suited to an infantry company. However, while LT Sermeus agreed, he was also under orders.

STEVE GREEN USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN, CAP -OSCAR 2

Steve A. Green joined the Marines in 1965, and was assigned to SU #5 in February 1967, thus becoming one of the "plank crew" of Combined Action Company Oscar. He was assigned to O-2 at Khe Sanh, and served under SGT Spellman, leaving in August 1967, prior to the Tet assault and Siege

Steve finished his tour in the Marines in 1970

Unfortunately, due to the years and his illness, Steve didn't remember a lot about his tour, though he recalled the Bru fondly, as most of us do.

He did remember some incidents, such as setting fire to the plantation by accident during a fire-fight in May 1967, when a fellow CAP Marine named Peter (he was unsure of the last name but it may have been "Pate") popped a flare that started a blaze. He also recalled a party thrown by a Bru chief to celebrate the curing of his malaria-stricken daughter by our medics.

Steve contracted cancer and took a full course of treatment for it, stemming the first assault, but was unfortunately struck again in 2014 by a much more aggressive and broader attack. Given the slender options, and with little to no chance for successful treatment, Steve decided to forego the debilitating treatment, and instead got his affairs in order. I spoke to Steve by phone on several occasions as his illness progressed (including a few days before his death) and he remained stoical, brave, and composed right up to the end. Despite his advancing illness and its severity, Steve survived for one more Marine Corps Birthday. He will be missed, but remembered, at the next Birthday, and I hope all of you will join me in raising a glass to his memory.

Steve enjoyed working on bikes and trikes, and could often be found in his garage tinkering with one of his "projects" like the one below
He is survived by his wife Carolyn.

A REUNION STORY
By Craig Tourte

I don't know how it started but some of us had heard those attending the graduation ceremony at MCRD would be offered VIP seating in the stands next to the Officer/VIP reviewing stand located in the very center of the grandstand area. Only the most important and those being recognized would be invited to sit in this area as it was the most advantageous location to view all the pageantry. Many loaded up in the busses at the hotel that would transport them to MCRD for this very auspicious occasion. Tom Horchler, who has some issues with mobility and was not sure if he wanted to sit and stay for an expected length of time thought it best that he just drive his own vehicle and asked if I would like to accompany him.

With our Khe Sanh shirts and reunion identification tag handing around our neck we found our way to the rear gate of the recruit depot and were waive through as we showed our identification and told the guard we were simply going to the museum. I told Tom that I thought it was a good place to park as it had several disabled parking places. The hundreds of vehicles heading to the parking area on the grinder for the graduation parade were waived to the long line of vehicles being inspected to a lane on the right while we simple followed behind a delivery truck in our own lane on the left.

We parked next to the museum and walked across the grinder to the middle of the grandstand area through a small opening monitored by what appeared to be drill instructors and sat in the grandstand to the left (north) of the VIP area where we assumed the K/S membership had been assigned seating, especially since not one person asked us who we were or directed us to sit at any other location. Looking around there were a few other Khe Sanh Veterans in their shirts sitting in the area but certainly not as many as those attending the reunion. After a few minutes several stood and apparently by invitation moved over to sit in the VIP area with the colonels, generals and other people of significant importance. Tom and I thought it was nice of whomever to invite us to join them so we walked in and sat down.

As I was walking up the stairs to the bench I was to sit on I spotted a rather attractive lady in a military uniform which displayed one gold star. I went up to her and thanked her for inviting us and told her it was an honor to be recognized for our service. She stood up, smiled and shook my hand. I was quite impressed with myself but sorry at that moment I didn't have a challenge coin to present to her.

The location of our seating was a perfect location to hear and observe the ceremony and the band stood right in front of us while they performed. We felt the Khe Sanh Veterans were really getting well deserved respect and recognition

After all the introductions, pontification, music, marching around and verbal recognition by the Lt. Colonel Master Of Ceremonies the graduation concluded and Tom and I walked towards the area where we observed the busses parked. As we reached the busses we learned that the Khe Sanh Veterans had in fact been seated at the very end of the grandstand and their view was less than ideal.

I want you to know that Tom Horchler and I duly represented all of you while we sat with the other VIP's, the general, colonels and the many others of importance and completely enjoyed

A CORPSMAN AT KHE SANH

By LCDR David C. Kleinberg
Former HM-3 K CO 3/9
Marine Corps Gazette Oct 2004

An intense firefight against the North Vietnamese at Khe Sanh as seen through the eyes of a corpsman.

On 24 June 1969, I was just doing my job as a grunt hospital corpsman 3d class (HM3) assigned to Company K, 3d Battalion, 9th Marines, 3d Marine Division in the hills near Khe Sanh. I provided medical care to the Marines in my company. This particular day was somewhat different. Another day of humping the bush had finally ended. The rumor going around the hill was that we had been here before, and from the looks of the hill, it was probably true. Fighting holes were located near the top of this hill, but if you looked a bit closer, there was higher ground to be had within 200 meters to the north.

This was one of very few company-sized movements that I can remember. 1st Platoon was on the west side, 3d Platoon stretched from the north to the east, and 2d platoon was on the east side of the hill. The foothills could be seen on the east side of our position.

We arrived on target around 2 hours before dark, which didn't leave much time for social life, such as it was in the bush. The Marines were working furiously re-digging fighting positions about 100 meters down the hill from the original holes because the company commander, 1stLt J.R. Wasson, wanted to take no chances being locked into an inescapable situation. 1stLt Wasson was an experienced combat leader. Lucky for us that he was because just after nightfall some of the Marines became aware of movement on the east and north sides of the hill.

We had gotten two new corpsmen that day-HM3 Fred Kurtze, who went to 1st Platoon, and another guy, who was sent to 3d Platoon. I had recently moved from 1st Platoon to 2d Platoon after the previous corpsman had been wounded and medevaced. Our platoon leader, 2dLt Arthur Johnson, was no stranger to the bush and neither were the men of 2d Platoon. 2dLt Johnson carefully checked all of the holes before returning to the top of the hill where the radioman and I were located-in one of the old fighting holes. The radioman told 2dLt Johnson and 2dLt Walter Smith (1st Platoon) that the company commander wanted to see them, so they went over to the command post. 2dLt Thomas Tighe (3d Platoon) was on the other side of the hill.

The moon was brilliant and full that night. With adequate night vision you could see almost as well as in the daylight, so a shadow was no surprise even in the dark of the mountains. Not long after the moon was at its zenith, "Buzz," one of our M60 gunners, came over to me and said, "You may want to keep your head down for a bit, doc. We're gonna make the gun talk a little." Buzz wasn't kidding. During the next 20 minutes or so you could hear a rhythmic clicking of sticks being tapped together by the North Vietnamese Army (NVA). It was their method of coordinating their assault movement in the dark. The Marines knew they were coming, and so we waited. Shortly thereafter, the guns started to talk. Only a few M16s could be heard, but within several minutes things got wild and crazy.

I was suddenly aware of someone lying on the hill, out in plain sight, and he seemed to be making noise. Not wanting to attract attention to myself amid the green tracers going over my head, I low-crawled to his location. He kept making this indistinct noise, and I kept trying to tell him to be quiet but to no avail. As I got closer, I realized that he was still completely wrapped up in his snoopy blanket. It made no sense for someone to be sleeping in the middle of the hill, particularly in the middle of a rather intense battle, but there he was with the snoopy blanket covering his face. By the time I got to him, I realized that he was not listening to my pleas for silence, so I proceeded to try to put my hand over his mouth. Finding nothing where his mouth used to be, I recoiled in some shock. This was the first dead Marine I had encountered.

I decided to venture back up the hill toward the area where Buzz had told me to stay low and in so doing encountered another Marine. This time, it was obvious. Cpl Rod Janetta was quite dead. He had a bullet wound in the thigh, and there wasn't much left of his head. My first thought was to start writing a tag. All of a sudden I heard "KACHUUUMP" to my left accompanied by lots of sparks and the appearance of three bodies being hurled out into the air just like you see on television. The cries for help followed from the same direction, so I left this patient and low-crawled again to the next location. When I reached the hole, I found "Little Joe" Loeffelman, Gator, and one other Marine in rough shape. Unfortunately for me, I also realized there was another NVA soldier approaching me, and I had no weapon with which to fight. A quick scan of the hole revealed one frag grenade at the bottom of the hole, so I threw that and ducked, hoping it wouldn't blow me up instead. The NVA guy was gone, but another showed up in his place. This guy had his helmet hanging over his AK-47. You could see him ready to shoot.

In no time, LCpl Dave Bartosek fired his weapon and neutralized the threat so I could work. Little Joe was in bad shape-shrapnel everywhere. Gator was OK, but he had the perfect Marine Corps wound-his butt was littered with shrapnel. The other guy (whose name escapes me after all these years) was hurt, but not too badly. None of them were in any shape to walk or even crawl so I pushed the first two up the hill and dragged the third with my leg. Once we got to the area of the old fighting holes, I did what I could to stabilize all three. The noise had diminished somewhat, so I got careless and stood up in front of Pancho, the radioman. In the flash of an instant there were a million firefly-like sparks coming out of the ground in what looked like an inverted funnel in front of me, but I don't recall any sound. Then I heard Pancho start to scream that he was hit. But he was behind me! That thing went off in front of me! I quickly got back on the ground and attended to Pancho, who had the classic sucking chest wound that I had heard so much about in my training at Camp Pendleton. I had the presence of mind to stuff the plastic wrapper of the battle dressing into the wound and tie the dressing around his chest and place him with the wound side down. He was as stable as I could get him in the dark.

A few minutes later it seemed that things had become quieter. It stayed quiet for about 15 minutes, and then we heard screaming. One of the Marines in 1st Platoon, PFC Jesus Perez, had been captured by the NVA while he was on an ambush. The corpsman (HM3 Mike Wild) had been separated from the group as well, but made it back to the lines safely. We heard another gunshot and heard Perez scream again, followed by more NVA voices telling us to surrender, I guess. This went on for what seemed an interminable amount of time-shot, scream-shot, scream. Finally, it stopped, and we surmised that Perez was dead. I guess we hoped he was so that he wouldn't feel any more pain. It was a long night for everyone after that.

The sun finally came up on yet another sweltering, humid day in the foothills of the mountains of Northern I Corps. We were now faced with the job of assessing the damages. There were three Marines killed in action, many wounded, and a lot of NVA bodies to count. I really don't remember how many NVA there were, but I had to go with the detail that was sent to detonate the explosive in the bomb crater where the bodies had been collected. There were a lot of young bodies in that crater.

I remember being numb from the entire firefight and wondering why no one came to take us out of there. A little later that morning, a general came to the hill by helicopter with a reporter on board. The general brought us several large boxes of ice cream. The flavor of the day was chocolate. While I was helping carry the body of Cpl Janetta to the landing zone, the reporter jumped out in front of me and yelled, "Smile, Doc!" I was in no mood to smile when he snapped the picture of me that was later published in the New York Daily News.

I never heard much about that whole event afterward, and it would be 34 years before I discussed it with anyone except the battalion executive officer (XO). One day after the 9th Marines was redeployed to Okinawa, I was summoned to the office of the battalion XO. During the short interview for which I was ordered to stand at attention, the XO opened the discussion by saying, "So you think you deserve the Bronze Star?" I replied by asking him, "What is a Bronze Star?" He said it was a medal. Since I had never been given a medal, I told him that I didn't know anything about it. His reply was, "What happened [as if I knew what he was talking about] was just 'doing your job,' and we don't give medals to corpsmen just for doing their job-now get out of here." So, my part in the long night was appreciated by at least one of my leaders, but I never found out which one. Needless to say, no one ever gave me a medal. I was, however, glad to know someone knew what happened that night, even if I was only just doing my job.

THROWBACK THURSDAY: CORPSMAN MONUMENT GETS A NEW LOOK AT BASE NAVAL HOSPITAL

It was just three days into Raul Avina's first combat experience, the Battle of Iwo Jima during World War II, when shrapnel blasted through his back, arms and legs.

As he lay there, several corpsmen ran up the hill to help him and another fallen Marine. Without their help, Avina later told his family, he wouldn't have survived. In the 36-day battle that ended with Marines raising the American flag at the top of Mt. Suribachi 4,000 Marines were killed and 15,000 were injured.

Nearly 40 years later on June 17, 1983, Avina, then 73, unveiled a sculpture he crafted from rebar, concrete and heavy mesh at what was then Naval Regional Medical Center Camp Pendleton. Top Marine and Navy officials attended the ceremony for the Hospital Corpsman Combat Memorial.

Avina, known for his artworks, designed and built the sculpture depicting three Navy hospital corpsmen running to a Marine on the side of a mountain in his Oceanside garage. It took him two years.

For 31 years, Avina's monument stood in front of the hospital. A year ago this week, a new four-story, 500,000-square-foot replacement hospital opened at Camp Pendleton and Navy officials planned to relocate Avina's 17-foot-monument. During the move, the sculpture broke apart.

Hospital Corpsman Memorial built by Raul Avina Sr. It was dedicated at Naval Hospital Camp Pendleton on June 17. 1983. The monument was built by retired Marine Raul Avina, who was rescued by corpsmen after being wounded in the Battle for Iwo Jima.

On June 17, 1983, veteran Raul Avina unveiled his Hospital Corpsman Combat Memorial in front of Camp Pendleton's hospital, which was then called Naval Regional Medical Center Camp Pendleton. Avina, then 73, created the piece as a way to acknowledge corpsmen past, present and future

Raul Avina with his wife, Quirina, embrace before he deployed to Iwo Jima. Avina was 31 when he became a Marine. He and Quirina were married 67 years. They are buried together at the Veteran's National Cemetery in Cave Creek, Arizona.

Part of Avina's original pieces were salvaged. Contractors used photographs, renderings and its old footprint to re-create a new one.

On Friday, Navy and Camp Pendleton officials including at least 20 of Avina's family will dedicate the new monument. Improvements include new texture of Mt. Suribachi on the island of Iwo Jima. Avina's original cement figures were re-cast in bronze with patina applied to protect against the weather and sun.

For Dan Avina, one of Avina's sons, the unveiling will continue a legacy his father had hoped to create when he began building the first monument in his garage in Oceanside.

"He built it in sections and suspended them from joists in the garage and almost pulled the whole garage down." Dan Avina said. "When he finished it, he transported it in pieces out to the lawn at Camp Pendleton. I don't know how he assembled it. It was truly garage art."

That garage art later would become the inspiration for the hospital's logo. Its image is incorporated into the hospital's logo and is seen at the hospital's entry and is printed in hospital linens and scrubs.

Raul Avina died in 2003, at the age of 93.

"At the ceremony, I will look up into the heavens and give him a good 'thumbs-up,' and say 'Pops, you did something that will last,'" Dan Avina said.

CORPSMAN MONUMENT REDEDICATED

Raul Avina's Hospital Corpsman Combat Monument was re-dedicated Friday during a ceremony at Naval Hospital Camp Pendleton.

The 17-foot-high sculpture was originally built by Raul Avina, a Marine injured in the Battle of Iwo Jima. Avina, forever grateful to the corpsmen who saved his life, created the monument at the age of 73. It took him two years to complete the cement, rebar and mesh sculpture in his Oceanside garage. It was first dedicated at Camp Pendleton at the old Naval Hospital in 1983.

Raul Avina created a corpsmen monument in 1983. The monument was in front of the Naval Regional Medical Center Camp Pendleton for 31 years. Last year a new Naval Hospital Camp Pendleton opened on the base. Attempts to move Avina's sculpture didn't go well and a new monument was created from Avina's original. An unveiling was held Friday at the base. Many of Avina's family members were on hand for the event. Corpsman are the Marines "docs" in combat and have saved countless lives over the decades.

Efforts to move the monument last year when the base's new Naval Hospital was opened were unsuccessful. The monument began breaking apart. So Clark Construction/McCarthy, builders of the new hospital, used photographs, renderings and pieces from the original structure to rebuild the monument and relocate it at the new Naval Hospital Camp Pendleton, completed in 2013.

Avina's original cement figures were re-cast in bronze with patina applied to protect against the weather and sun. The monument stands at the end of the hospital's Medal of Honor Mall.

Navy Capt. Mark Kobelja, commanding officer, Naval Hospital Camp Pendleton hosted the rededication. Speakers included Maj. Gen. Lawrence D. Nicholson, commanding general, 1st Marine Division; Rear Adm. C. Forrest Faison, deputy surgeon general of the Navy; and Richard Heim, president and CEO, Western Region, Clark Construction Group.

The very fact that a United States Marine, wounded in combat and under the care of hospital corpsmen during one of the Marine Corps most storied battles would personally design and construct with his own hands a representation of that image is profound, said Navy Command Master Chief Christopher Thorne.

The Marines had planned to cover Raul Avina's 31-year-old corpsmen monument with a parachute until the grand unveiling on Friday, but, instead, Mother Nature came into play and coated the sculpture with a blanket of rain. Guest speaker Lieutenant General David Berger, commanding general of the first Marine expeditionary force, delivered stirring accounts of corpsman bravery and, on queue, the rain let up as he concluded, which afforded the masses to emerge from their tented event shelter and see the finished work outside Navy Hospital Camp Pendleton on Friday.

Raul Avina's great nephew, Tom Ehmann, left, son, Dan Avina, grandson, Kyle Avina and his wife, Cheryl, admire the resurrection of the corpsman monument Avina created 31-years ago. Last year a new Naval Hospital Camp Pendleton opened on the base. Attempts to move Avina's sculpture didn't go well and a new monument was created from Avina's original. An unveiling was held Friday at the base. Many of Avina's family members were on hand for the event. Corpsman are the Marines "docs" in combat and have saved countless lives over the decades.

There is a bond between Marines and hospital corpsmen. A Marine will press forward in combat through mortal peril buttressed by the knowledge that if they should fall, a hospital corpsman will be only steps behind to aid them, while the fight continues around them. A corpsman will run onto the field of battle through fire with the sole purpose of reaching and aiding a fallen Marine, even if it means sacrificing his own life to do so. They will do this because each and every one of them know that their Marines will protect them with their very lives as well, he added.

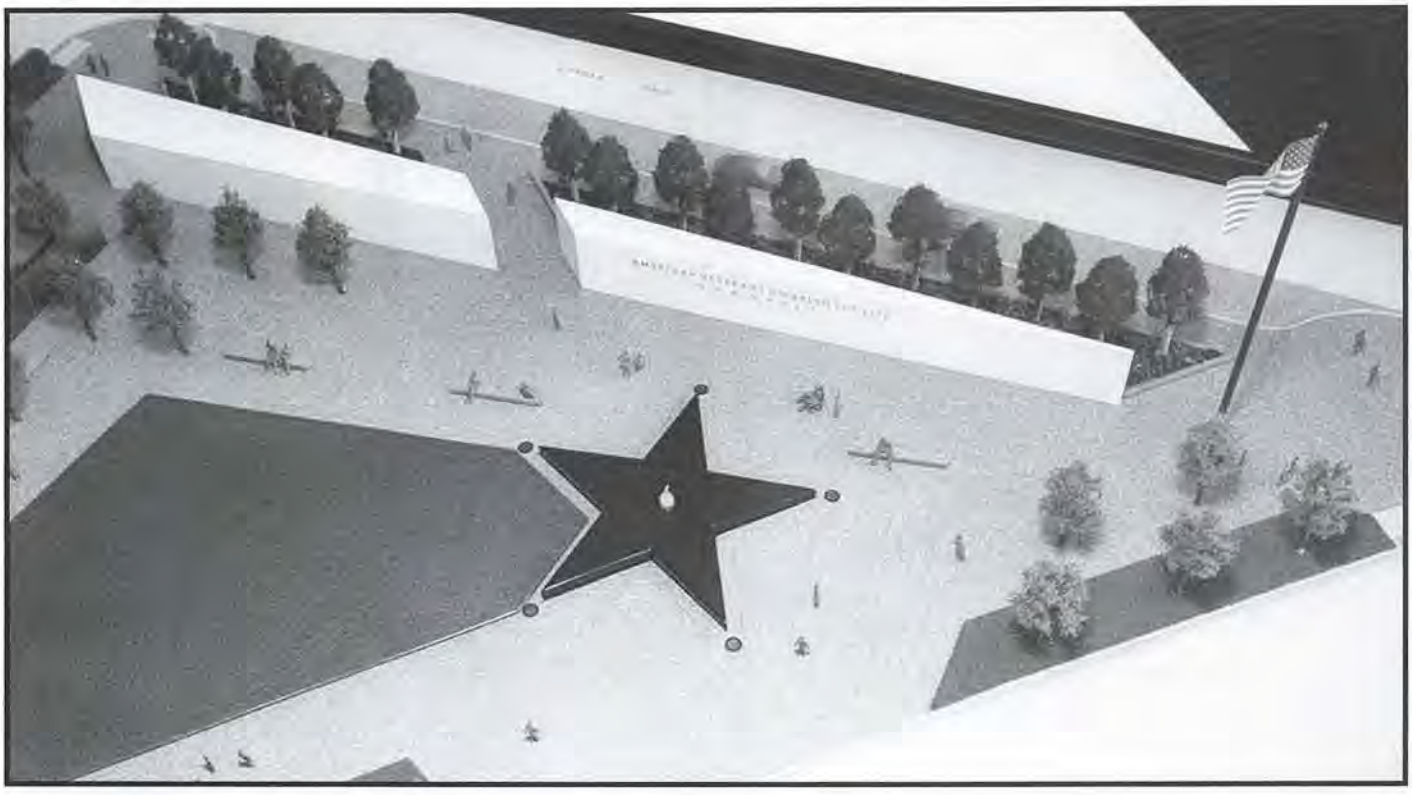
Guests admire the new installation of Raul Avina's corpsman monument outside Navy Hospital Camp Pendleton on Friday.

Van and Kathleen Avina, right, Raul Avina's son and daughter, thank artisan Richard Winget for his work on the new, permanent rock structure that their father built. It is now affixed outside the Naval Hospital Camp Pendleton.

"For Raul Avina to shape this memorial with his own hands and share that bond between Marine and hospital corpsman gives more meaning than any words of thanks or gratitude," he said. "It represents heartfelt love."

The Hospital Corps is the only enlisted corps and the largest corps in the U.S. Navy with 26,980 currently serving around the world on the sea, under the sea, on land and in the air. Twenty-two Hospital Corpsmen have received the Medal of Honor, 178 have received Navy Crosses including the recent award of Chief Petty Officer Justin Wilson on Nov. 25. Thirty have received the Distinguished Service Medal and 956 have received the Silver Star Medal. Seventeen U.S. Navy ships have been named in honor of Hospital Corpsmen.

NEW MEMORIAL HONORING DISABLED VETERANS UNVEILED IN DC



A new memorial honoring disabled veterans was unveiled in Washington on Sunday. "It was awesome. I cried the whole time," Bill McKinley, a Vietnam veteran told WUSA9 about the unveiling.

The new memorial is called 'The American Veterans Disabled for Life Memorial' and is the first of its kind to recognize all Veterans with both physical injuries and the "invisible" ones such as PTSD.

McKinley said that the memorial means "everything," to the Veterans who were their for its unveiling on Sunday: "It's finally an honor of our duty and service."

he project was a long-time coming. It started in 1998 when philanthropist Lois Pope, former U.S. Secretary of Veteran Affairs Jim Brown and the National Adjutant of Disabled American Veteran Art Wilson recognized a need for this type of memorial. Over the years they then followed suit with approval from Congress and 14 years of fundraising.

"This is something that's long overdue and I'm glad it's finally here," said Vietnam veteran Chester Wisnesky.

The structure itself symbolizes the people it represents. Architects used granite and glass to convey strength and vulnerability. A reflection pool shows a star with a single flame in the middle and a grove of trees stands to show the persistence in hope.

Some veterans say if there's no visible scar, many think there's no injury.

"They don't really see what's going on or what we've been though and so they just automatically assume that we should be fine," said Judy Brown, an Iraq War veteran. Brown says she's thankful every visitor will get a chance to see and understand what our service men and women really go though. "This helps us heal those wounds and stuff and know that we're not forgotten," said Martin Lathrop, another Veteran of Iraq.

The memorial officially opens to the public on Monday. For more on the memorial and the non-profit behind it, visit: http://www.avdlm.org/.

DISABLED AMERICAN VETERANS

WITH FAITH AND DEVOTION

By Herb Richardson
Originally Published April 1997

It was late in the afternoon on Monday, Sept. 4, 1967, when two platoons of Company M, 3d Battalion, Fifth Marine Regiment, First Marine Division got into a vicious firefight with a strong enemy force.

Lieutenant Vincent R. Capodanno, a Navy chaplain and Roman Catholic priest, died in the firefight on that day on a hillside south of Da Nang, at a place where he didn't have to be.

The story of how he got there and what he did on the day of his death is incredible to most of us, but understandable to many of the more than 700 chaplains who served with Marines in Vietnam over nine years, beginning April 12, 1962.

This was an old job in a new place.

Chaplains were first assigned to Marines full time in 1914, when a chaplain was stationed with the Marine Expeditionary Force of the Atlantic Fleet.

Chaplains were sent to the Fifth and Sixth Marine Regiments in 1917 and served with those units overseas during World War I.

Six chaplains went ashore with the troops at Guadalcanal. They were the first to see combat with the Marines on the offensive in World War II, but not the last.

Chaplains were with the Marines when they hit the Solomon Islands, the Gilberts, the Marshalls and the Marianas. When the leathernecks went ashore at Okinawa, the last island operation of the war, they had their chaplains with them.

Capodanno probably knew very little of these things. When he signed on for duty, he thought he was joining the Marines.

He was born in Richmond County, N.Y., in 1929, ordained in 1957 and served as a missionary in Taiwan and Hong Kong from 1958 until 1965.

It was in 1965, after the Vietnam conflict grew to a full-bore war, that the priest volunteered to serve in-country with the Marines.

Another Roman Catholic chaplain, Lt Conon J. Meehan, wrote that when Capodanno applied for military service as a chaplain he went to the Marine recruiting office in Hong Kong because he wanted to serve with the Marines.

It wasn't until he got back to the States for training that Capodanno learned that he had actually joined the Navy.

It didn't make any difference.

The chaplain joined the Marines anyway-the 5th Marines in Vietnam. He served a year, extended for six months and was killed in action four months into that extension.

On the day following his death, a letter was delivered to the 5th Marines commanding officer. It said in part, "I am due to go home in late November or early December. I humbly request that I stay over Christmas and New Year's with my men. I am willing to relinquish my 30 days leave."

Chaplain David J. Casazza said in his memorial remarks at the dedication of the Capodanno Memorial Chapel at the Naval Chaplains School in Newport, R.I., that Capodanno was pushed by a need to spend as much time as he could with his Marines.

"He was a hungry man. Hungry to be with his troops. Hungry for more time to seek out the lonely Marine, more time to sit with the scared boy, more time to explain things to the confused platoon leader."

Capodanno, like other Vietnam-era chaplains, adopted to the quick-mobility, small-services demands of this conflict. The chaplains assigned with the grunts in Vietnam had to find comfort in their Bibles and in their work.

They found little worldly comfort with their Marines who moved out fast, moved again and lived mostly in the dirt.

Services tended to be small, personal and frequent.

Ray Stubbe is a reverend in Wauwatosa, Wis., today. He was chaplain for members of the 1st Bn, 26th Marine Regiment during early 1968.

That's when the unit was being hammered day and night by NVA rockets and artillery at Khe Sanh Combat Base, near the Demilitarized Zone.

Stubbe understood the need for small, frequent services.

In a letter to former Leatherneck magazine managing editor, the late Tom Bartlett, Stubbe wrote, "The remarkable thing was not only the number of worship services but the fact of the 'one minute sermon!' In many ways I felt that just being with the men in their bunker or in their trench communicated far more than words ever would! I had been told not to gather more than three or four at a time since NVA forward observers on the ridge overlooking the base might very well regard that as a lucrative target and decide to provide background percussive music to our worship!"

Stubbe said sometimes there were too many Marines at one time, but the service would be over so fast that enemy observers would have problems calling in ordnance.

Stubbe's services lasted from five to seven minutes. There would be a prayer of invocation, often stressing that, "Wherever two or three are gathered" and "Lo, I am with you always."

A reading of scripture would follow. A one-minute sermon came after that, followed by words of institution, distribution with wafers and wine in a common cup and Aaronic Benediction.

From a reporting period of Jan. 28 through Feb. 10, 1968, Stubbe covered that besieged airstrip in Northern I Corps, where death, destruction and misery rained down in torrents. He ministered in the bunkers and foxholes, tuned in and ready to react to calls of "incoming" as he walked in the shadows of that valley of death.

He conducted 53 total worship services along the way. Attendance was 435. Stubbe also conducted eight counseling cases while he was resting.

Rest was a hard thing to find at times.

Stubbe wrote, "One night my bunker was so full of casualties that couldn't be evacuated, that I slept atop a 3 foot x 3 foot field desk, the doctor slept on the deck inside with his feet outside the 'door' and five Marines fell asleep sitting up on my rack."

Like the other chaplains assigned to the Marines, he was following his duty "to bring men to God and God to men."

Less than two weeks after that report 2d Bn, 26th Marines lost a chaplain-Lt Robert R. Brett (Roman Catholic), who was killed instantly Feb. 22, 1968, when a round landed in the trench in which the chaplain was waiting for a helicopter.

Brett was trying to return to battalion headquarters after one of his frequent trips to outposts.

Khe Sanh was deadly for chaplain's assistants, too.

Lance Corporal Alexander Chin, Brett's assistant, died in the same blast that killed the chaplain.

Lt William Hampton, assigned to 3/26, lost his clerk.

Stubbe had Private First Class Jonathan Nathaniel Spicer transferred to help him out because Spicer was a mild-mannered, caring, papers-filed conscientious objector.

Spicer also worked as a stretcher bearer with a habit of throwing his body over the wounded when there was incoming.

He was killed by incoming ordnance while evacuating casualties. Notch up a Navy Cross for the conscientious objector.

Rockets and artillery were as much a part of the war in Northern I Corps as were booby traps, mines and ambushes farther south. All-out attacks could come any time, any place.

Capodanno probably saw more of the Southern I Corps style of conflict in his part of Vietnam, especially on the day he earned the Medal of Honor.

It started out as a relatively small encounter when a platoon of M/3/5 drew some sniper fire. A second platoon set up a blocking position, then moved forward to help clear out the snipers.

As the two platoons advanced up a hill all hell broke loose.

Hell was a hail of mortar rounds, with machine guns, small arms and heavy weapons fire strong enough to halt the advance. The chaplain had been at the relatively safe command post until he heard a radio report that two platoons of Marines were in pitched battle and in danger of being overrun and wiped out.

While the order was being given for the Marines to fall back and form a defensive perimeter, Capodanno was on his way to the fighting, to take care of his Marines.

He took care of a Marine radio operator, who was forced into the dirt by a burst of automatic weapons fire. The chaplain grabbed a strap on the radio and helped the lance corporal up the hill. They had to eat dirt twice along the way as automatic weapons fire churned up the ground ahead of them.

The radio operator said he would never have made it up that hillside alive without Capodanno's help.

At one point the chaplain gave up his gas mask when the beleaguered troops popped tear gas to try to stifle the enemy fire. He continued through the gas ministering to the wounded and dying.

As he was moving ahead on the battleground, shrapnel from a mortar round that impacted about 20 yards from Capodanno, according to the Medal of Honor citation, "severed a portion of his right hand and inflicted painful, multiple wounds to his arms and legs." He carried his arm stiffly, but did not break stride until he reached a fallen sergeant. Capodanno prayed with the sergeant just before the Marine died.
He refused medical aid and continued to move about the area, encouraging and inspiring his Marines.

Capodanno reached a sergeant who had been hit five times and was lying near interlocking bands of fire from automatic weapons. The chaplain got him and delivered him to his comrades. The sergeant recovered fully from his wounds.

Outside of the defensive perimeter a lance corporal was trying to block the flow of blood from the thigh artery of a stricken corpsman in danger of bleeding to death.

The Marine saw the NVA charge their position, and he saw an enemy machine-gunner set up his weapon about 15 meters away. The Marine's rifle jammed as he tried to open fire, and he ran for cover.

Then he saw Capodanno, who heard the weapon, and could probably see its position, leave the perimeter to gather the corpsman into his arms and position his body between the corpsman and the enemy machine-gunner.

The chaplain died as he was trying to stem the flow of the wounded man's blood. One account says he was hit 27 times.

Then-Lieutenant Commander Eli Takesian knew Capodanno. Takesian said, "He [Capodanno] just wanted to be with the 'grunts.' He was more Marine than anything else."

Lt Bryant R. Nobles Jr., a Southern Baptist, had only been in the field a couple of weeks when he found himself in a foxhole near the Rockpile, a well-known landmark and battleground in Northern I Corps, with the 3d Bn, 3d Marines.

He recalled that his faith was challenged about midnight, Sept. 17, 1969, when he was suddenly awakened by the sound of rifle fire. That's when he jumped into the foxhole he had dug earlier.

A couple of other people-the commanding officer and the radio operator-jumped in shortly thereafter. The ensuing fight lasted for five hours, with Nobles moving among the men giving encouragement, first aid and, he wrote, "doing whatever I could while praying without ceasing."

The enemy were gone by sunrise, leaving 48 of their dead behind. American losses were 25 Marines killed, 47 wounded. Nobles was decorated for his actions. He wrote of a higher reward:

"Just before turning in for the night the Commanding Officer requested that I pray with him. 'Chaplain, I can't even remember your name, but I thank God you were with us last night.' This reward far exceeded the medal I later received. The rewards are many for the chaplain who will give of himself for the spiritual needs of the men."

Through the Vietnam era the chaplain business was often a grim one-last rites, memorial services, comforting the physically and spiritually injured Marines-many of whom had seen and felt rigors that no young man should endure.

But there were joys, too. The Marines accepted and appreciated the chaplains. The Marines gathered in the fields and in the bunkers for services, and they built chapels, elaborate and makeshift, as the situations dictated. The chapel at Camp J. J. Carroll was named in honor of the fallen Chaplain Brett.

The Marines often admired and praised these men of God.

A regimental executive officer wrote about his chaplain, "His conduct under fire was notably courageous and that of a very brave man. On numerous occasions this officer was observed running across exposed paddies and areas to be at the side of a Marine. With no apparent regard for his personal safety, thinking only of the wounded or dead Marine, he carried his inspiration and prayer to those who needed his help. He had the confidence and deep respect of the men and healed the scars which the loss of a friend frequently caused in those who survived."

The feelings were mutual. Chaplain John Lepote, 3d Bn, 5th Marines, once reported, "The 'grunt' as he stands in dirty, muddy majesty, is as fine a fighting man as the United States has ever produced. He is young, tough, intelligent. He understands why he is here and he believes in the purpose that put him here. And, that is something, because if you take a 'grunt' out of his water filled bunker; remove his helmet, his flak jacket, and his field uniform, and take away his rifle, clean him up and dress him in a sport shirt, slacks and loafers, you've got the kid who was playing on last year's high school football team. He is a national asset to be cherished."

So, in Vietnam, as in other wars, there was mutual respect and admiration. There was a sharing of hardships of a sort unique to Vietnam.

Because of lessons learned and advances in technology there may never be another conflict like that in Vietnam.

But you may be sure that no matter what the type of conflict, if Marines take the field, they will be blessed by U.S. Navy chaplains.

Author's Note: I cheerfully confess that I used quotes freely and with great joy from the book of my friend, Commander Herbert L. Bergsma, CHC, U.S. Navy. That labor of love is titled "Chaplains With Marines in Vietnam 1962-1971." It's 240 pages, with pictures, of detailed and cross-checked history, presented with love, heart and understanding, published in 1985 by the History and Museums Division, Headquarters, U.S. Marine Corps, Washington, D.C.

MEDAL OF HONOR

CAPODANNO, VINCENT R. Lt, USN, Chaplain Corps, 3d Btln, 5th Marines, 1st Marine Division (Rein), FMF. Action: Quang Tin Province, Republic of Vietnam, 4 Sep 1967. Inducted: Staten Island, N.Y. DOB 13 Feb 1929, Staten Island, N.Y

CITATION:

For conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity at the risk of his life above and beyond the call of duty as Chaplain of the 3d Battalion, in connection with operations against enemy forces. In response to reports that the 2d Platoon of M Company was in danger of being overrun by a massed enemy assaulting force, Lt. Capodanno left the relative safety of the company command post and ran through an open area raked with fire, directly to the beleaguered platoon. Disregarding the intense enemy small-arms, automatic-weapons, and mortar fire, he moved about the battlefield administering last rites to the dying and giving medical aid to the wounded. When an exploding mortar round inflicted painful multiple wounds to his arms and legs, and severed a portion of his right hand, he steadfastly refused all medical aid. Instead, he directed the corpsmen to help their wounded comrades and, with calm vigor, continued to move about the battlefield as he provided encouragement by voice and example to the valiant marines. Upon encountering a wounded corpsman in the direct line of fire of an enemy machine gunner positioned approximately 15 yards away, Lt. Capodanno rushed a daring attempt to aid and assist the mortally wounded corpsman. At that instant, only inches from his goal, he was struck down by a burst of machine gun fire. By his heroic conduct on the battlefield, and his inspiring example, Lt. Capodanno upheld the finest traditions of the U.S. Naval Service. He gallantly gave his life in the cause of freedom.

THE LAST STAND OF RECON TEAM KANSAS

Outnumbered worse than the Alamo defenders, here's the story of a SOG team's desperate last stand.

By Maj. John L. Plaster, USAR (Ret.)

The once bustling Khe Sanh Marine Base in South Vietnam's extreme northwest had been a ghost town more than three years by the summer of 1971. Though used briefly that February to support the South Vietnamese Army's invasion of Laos, after that bloody debacle the South Vietnamese abandoned not just Khe Sanh but the entire region, yielding immense areas to the NVA, who almost overnight began extending their Ho Chi Minh Trail highways into South Vietnam.

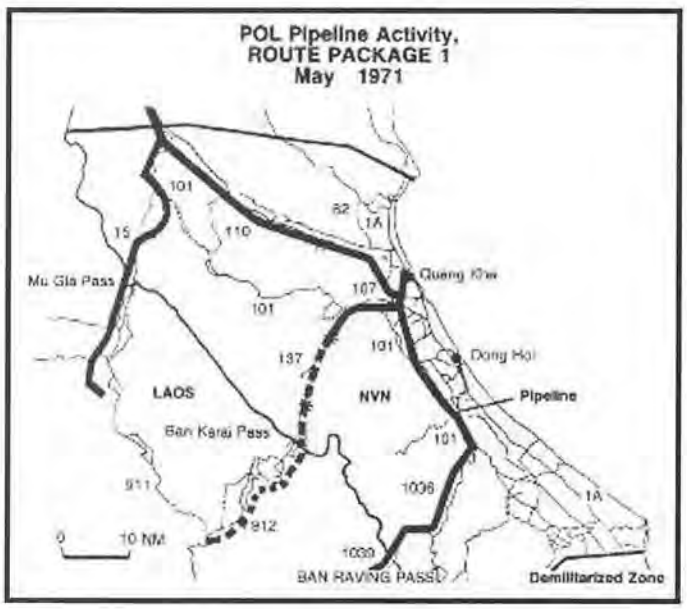
In late July 1971, U.S. intelligence began tracking a large enemy force shifting across the DMZ a dozen miles east of Khe Sanh, threatening the coastal cities of Hue, Danang and Phu Bai where the last sizeable American ground units were based.

It was essential to learn what was happening near Khe Sanh, a mission assigned to a shadowy organization called "SOG." Created to conduct covert missions deep behind enemy lines in Laos, Cambodia and North Vietnam, the top secret Studies and Observations Group had shifted most of its operations in-country by 1971 to cover the continuing U.S. withdrawal. From among its clandestine assembly of Army Green Berets, Navy SEALs and USAF Air Commandos, the Khe Sanh mission eventually became a prisoner snatch assigned to Recon Team Kansas, an 11-man, Special Forces-led element, which included eight Montagnard tribesmen.



But how do you grab a prisoner in the midst of 10,000 or more NVA? Headed by an easygoing, lanky Midwesterner, First Lieutenant Loren Hagen, along with Sergeants Tony Andersen and Bruce Berg, the RT Kansas men had brainstormed through several scenarios until settling upon the best option: They would land conspicuously on an abandoned firebase -- which obviously would draw some sort of NVA reaction -- put up a short fight, then extract by helicopter. Except half of Hagen's men would stay hidden on the hill. When the NVA sent a squad up to see if the Americans had left behind sensors or bombing beacons -- as SOG teams often did -- the hidden men would ambush the NVA, seize a prisoner and come out.

In case a serious fight developed, Lt. Hagen reinforced his team with three more Green Beret volunteers, Staff Sergeant Oran Bingham and Sergeants Bill Queen and William Rimondi, for eight Montagnard tribesmen and six U.S. Special Forces, a total of 14 men.

Landing at last light on 6 August 1971, Lt. Hagen surveyed the scrub brush and bomb craters below them and split his defense into three elements to cover the hilltop's three slopes. Immediately they went to work restoring the old firebase's two dilapidated bunkers and shallow trenches. The enemy must have seen them land, and Hagen reckoned to be ready.

A FOREBODING NIGHT

It was well after dark when the SOG men noticed campfires on two facing ridgelines, unusual because the NVA normally masked itself. By midnight enemy probers were at the base of the hill, firing provocatively from the north, south, east and west.

"Lt. Loren Hagen (right, rear) and Bruce Berg pose with five indigenous teammates. Both Hagen and Berg would die on the small hilltop, along with six of their Montagnard soldiers." (Photo by Tony Andersen)

At 1 a.m. a USAF AC-130 Spectre gunship arrived, walking 40mm and 20mm fire around the hill nearly all night. Never once did the team fire their weapons, staying blanketed in darkness. Then at 3 a.m. the SOG men heard trucks and tailgates dropping. This was odd, very odd.

Beneath the hill, dismounting NVA soldiers formed up into platoons and companies, which their leaders marched through the darkness to their assigned attack positions, to wait for dawn. Just before sunrise it became forebodingly quiet. Then Lt. Hagen heard more trucks arriving.

"The NVA were laying a Soviet-made tactical fuel pipeline, like this one, near RT Kansas' hilltop, the first ever extended into South Vietnam. It would be of strategic value a few months later during the Easter 1972 Offensive." (Def. Intell. Agency)

Fifty miles away at a coastal airbase, a USAF Forward Air Controller (FAC) and a flight of helicopters was lifting away for the false extraction; they would be above RT Kansas in 30 minutes.

As darkness gave way to light, Lt. Hagen detected glimpses of NVA on one slope; then on another slope pithe helmets appeared, bobbing in the fog. When his men reported NVA on the third slope, too, Hagen realized the hill was completely encircled by NVA -- but that would require a whole regiment, at least a thousand men!

The NVA regimental commander understood he had to dispatch the Americans quickly. They'd inadvertently landed almost within sight of the Hanoi High Command's most critical new venture, the first six-inch fuel pipeline laid across the DMZ, absolutely essential in a few months when entire tank battalions rolled through here for the war's largest offensive. Already the 304th NVA Division was massing here, plus a regiment of the 308th Division, preparing for the 1972 Easter Offensive.

A fourth battalion moved into place; then, concealed in the ground fog, a fifth battalion arrived. Later, SOG's commander, Colonel John Sadler, would learn an entire regiment had stormed the hill, supported by a second regiment, a mass assault by approximately 2000 enemy infantry.

A HUMAN WAVE

As the clearing ground fog disclosed that terrible truth, Lt. Hagen had no time for inspiring words, just serious soldier work; in those final moments he repositioned weapons while his men readied grenades and stacked magazines. The Catholic Montagnards made the Sign of the Cross. Then they came.

A well-aimed RPG rocket smashed into Bruce Berg's bunker, collapsing it and signaling the attack -- fire went from nothing to ten thousand rounds per second! Andersen could see dozens of NVA rushing in lines up his slope, meeting them with his M-60 machinegun. Hagen hollered that he was going to check Berg, and ran directly into a ferocious maelstrom, with bullets ricocheting and slamming the earth in front of, behind, and beneath his dashing feet. He made it a dozen yards when fire from the other slope cut him down, killing him.

Then Klaus Bingham left a bunker to reposition a claymore and a bullet struck him in the head, apparently killing him. One Montagnard in a trench below Tony Andersen fired several bursts then jumped up to pull back and fell into Andersen's lap, dead.

Four men had died in less than four minutes. It was up to Andersen now, the senior man

THE LAST STAND

Small arms fire rattled closer on all sides and grenades lobbed up from below the hillcrest where waves of NVA were scurrying behind small rises and rolling from bomb crater to bomb crater. Andersen dashed over the hill to look for Hagen but couldn't see him anywhere -- just 100 khaki-clad NVA almost at the top! He fired one M-60 belt at NVA advancing up his own slope, then sped to the other approach and ran belt after belt on the 100 assaulting enemy. By then grenades started coming from behind him as NVA closed in from his rear. Just a dozen yards away, beyond the curvature of the hill, enemy heads popped up, cracked a few shots, then dropped back down.

Still a dozen minutes away, the approaching Cobra gunships went to full throttle, leaving the slower Hueys behind.

Meanwhile RT Kansas had just run out of hand grenades when a North Vietnamese grenade exploded beside Andersen's M-60, rendering it useless; he spun his CAR-15 off his back and kept shooting, then he tossed back another grenade but it went off in front of him, nearly blinding him, yet he kept shooting. More shrapnel tore into him, then an AK round slammed through his webgear and lodged in his elbow, knocking him down. He stumbled back to his knees and kept firing.

The perimeter was pinched almost in half when Andersen grabbed his last two living Montagnards, circled below the nearest NVA and somehow managed to reach the survivors on the opposite side. He found Bingham, started to lift him, and saw he, too, was dead from a head wound. All around him he heard, "zzzsss, zzssss, zzssss," as bullets flashed past his ears.

He dragged Bingham back to where Bill Queen lay, wounded. Only Rimondi wasn't yet hit and still fired furiously. Andersen put them in a back-to-back circle just off the hilltop where they would make their last stand. AK bullets had destroyed their team radio, another slug had shot Andersen's little survival radio out of his hand so Rimondi tossed him another survival radio, their last.

Now the NVA were streaming, rolling over the crest like a tidal wave, their rattling AKs blending together into one never-ending burst. Andersen's men were firing not at NVA but at hands wielding AKs over parapets and around bunkers. There was no place left to fall back. Andersen was shooting NVA little further than the length of his CAR-15 muzzle, and the time it took to speed-change a magazine meant life or death.

From the air it looked like an ant mound, with moving figures everywhere. Cobra lead rolled in and sparkled 20mm cannon shells around the surviving SOG men, and at last fighters arrived, adding napalm and Vulcan cannons to the melee. Then at last the assault ebbed, turned, and the NVA fled for cover, just as the Hueys arrived.

Though wounded repeatedly, Andersen crawled out to fire his CAR-15 to cover the landing Hueys. With Rimondi's help, Andersen dragged as many teammates's bodies as he could to the first Huey, then helped the wounded Queen and others aboard the second.

"3 months before RT Kansas fought the most one-sided fight in American history, the USAF already had plotted three enemy pipelines running out of North Vietnam but these extended into Laos. The most critical pipeline was secretly being laid across the DMZ into South Vietnam." (USAF)

A TERRIBLE TOLL

In one hellacious half-hour, nine of Recon Team Kansas fourteen men had been lost.

Lt. Hagen had died, along with Bingham, Berg was presumed dead, six Montagnards had died, Rimondi and Queen both suffered multiple frag wounds, Andersen had been struck by both small arms fire and shrapnel, and their other two Montagnards, too, all had been wounded

"It's amazing that any of us came through it with the amount of incoming that we were getting," Tony Andersen says today, 25 years later. He attributes their survival to his deceased team leader, Lt. Loren Hagen. "He epitomized what a Special Forces officer should be -- attentive to detail, a lot of rehearsals, followed through on things," he explains. "We were ready. I think that was probably the only thing that kept us from being totally overrun. Everybody was alert and knew what was happening and was waiting."

As for Hagen's bravery, dashing into a wall of AK fire to try to save Bruce Berg, that didn't surprise Andersen, either. "Lt. Hagen was that kind of officer. He was a good man."

Against the lost of most of his teammates, Andersen learned, the USAF counted 185 NVA dead on that hill little RT Kansas had killed half a battalion and probably wounded twice that many NVA. But that gives Andersen sparse satisfaction compared to the loss of most of his team.

Perhaps Andersen's most difficult duty was carrying the bodies of his six Montagnard teammates -- his "family" he called them -- to their home village. "As soon as they saw us driving up in the truck, they knew. Wailing and moaning started, and all the grieving." The villagers gathered in a circle around the headman's stilted longhouse. "Through one of the interpreters I tried to explain how proud we were of them, what good fighters they were, that they had died for a good cause."

That would be borne out a few months later when the intelligence generated by RT Kansas' spirited defense helped U.S. analysts read enemy intentions, enabling American airpower to counter the NVA's Easter Offensive.

And though details of this incredible fight would remain classified for decades, enough was disclosed that First Lieutenant Loren Hagen's family was presented the U.S. Army's final Vietnam War Medal of Honor; Tony Andersen, who held together what remained of RT Kansas through those final mass assaults, received the Distinguished Service Cross, while Queen, Rimondi, Berg and Bingham were awarded Silver Stars.

And now, today, with full disclosure, we can appreciate the significance of their fight:

At the Alamo, 188 Americans had stood against 3000 Mexicans, a ratio of 16-to-1; at Custer's Last Stand, 211 cavalrymen succumbed to 3,500 Sioux warriors, or 16.5-to-1; at the 1877 Battle of Rorke's Drift, the most heralded action in British military history resulting in -- 11 Victoria Crosses -- 140 British troops withstood assaults by 4000 Zulus, or 28-to-1. Lt. Hagen's 14 men had held on despite being outnumbered 107-to-one, four times as disadvantagous as Rorke's Drift and seven times worse than the Alamo, one of the most remarkable feats of arms in American history.

1st Lt. Hagen distinguished himself in action while serving as the team leader of a small reconnaissance team operating deep within enemy-held territory. At approximately 0630 hours on the morning of 7 August 1971 the small team came under a fierce assault by a superior-sized enemy force using heavy small arms, automatic weapons, mortar, and rocket fire. 1st Lt. Hagen immediately began returning small-arms fire upon the attackers and successfully led this team in repelling the first enemy onslaught. He then quickly deployed his men into more strategic defense locations before the enemy struck again in an attempt to overrun and annihilate the beleaguered team's members. 1st Lt. Hagen repeatedly exposed himself to- the enemy fire directed at him as he constantly moved about the team's perimeter, directing fire, rallying the members, and resupplying the team with ammunition, while courageously returning small arms and hand grenade fire in a valorous attempt to repel the advancing enemy force. The courageous actions and expert leadership abilities of 1st Lt. Hagen were a great source of inspiration and instilled confidence in the team members. After observing an enemy rocket make a direct hit on and destroy one of the team's bunkers, 1st Lt. Hagen moved toward the wrecked bunker in search for team members despite the fact that the enemy force now controlled the bunker area. With total disregard for his own personal safety, he crawled through the enemy fire while returning small-arms fire upon the enemy force. Undaunted by the enemy rockets and grenades impacting all around him, 1st Lt. Hagen desperately advanced upon the destroyed bunker until he was fatally wounded by enemy small arms and automatic weapons fire. With complete disregard for his personal safety, 1st Lt. Hagen's courageous gallantry, extraordinary heroism, and intrepidity above and beyond the call of duty, at the cost of his own life, were in keeping with the highest traditions of the military service and reflect great credit upon him and the U.S. Army.

KHE SANH VETERANS REMEMBER FELLOW MARINES AT VIETNAM WAR'S BLOODIEST BATTLE

Posted: Nov 10, 2014 9:43 PM CST
Updated: Dec 10, 2014 9:43 PM CST

CHARLOTTE, NC (Joe DePriest/The Charlotte Observer) -

They met on a hill in a far corner of Vietnam.

Especially on Veterans Day, David "Randy" Norton of Charlotte and Larry McCartney of Black Mountain remember that time in early 1968 at Khe Sanh, the Vietnam War's longest and bloodiest battle.

Faces of other Marines who survived the horrors of Hill 861 Alpha stand out in their minds, along with faces of those who, like Norton's best friend, didn't make it off the hill alive.

At a 2007 reunion of Khe Sanh veterans, Norton and McCartney crossed paths again and became friends.

Both are mentioned in a new book that examines the battle from the viewpoint of those who did the actual fighting. The author, former foreign correspondent and Pulitzer Prize finalist Gregg Jones, interviewed nearly 90 Khe Sanh veterans, including Norton and McCartney.

A cloud of controversy still hangs over a battle where both sides claimed victory. But many Khe Sanh survivors, like veterans of other wars, look beyond military and political arguments. They look out for each other.

"Over the years, we've become a close group," said Norton, 66. "Veterans Day really is a personal day. I guess, for me, it's a time to remember those who made the ultimate sacrifice. It's almost like there's an obligation to respect their memory."

Jones' book, "Last Stand at Khe Sanh," revisits a story that once gripped the world's attention. For 77 days, a North Vietnamese Army force of 20,000 besieged an outnumbered U.S. combat base in the northernmost province of South Vietnam near near the Laotian border.

Shells rained down daily on the base and surrounding hills held by the Marines. It turned into a deadly zone not only for those stuck there, but for aircraft bringing in food, water and ammunition. Flying out with the wounded was just as dangerous.

For his book, Jones focused on the four months from January through April 1968, when the siege was broken. He devotes a full chapter to the Feb. 5 assault on Hill 861 Alpha, where Norton lost his best friend, Joe Molettiere of South Philadelphia.

"You would have been hard-pressed to find two guys with more different backgrounds and temperaments, but Dave loved Joe to his core, and his sense of loss over Joe's death moved me deeply," Jones said. "Dave helped bring Joe alive for me as I wrote the story of the Feb. 5, 1968, assault on 861 Alpha." In the Khe Sanh book, Jones said he wanted to "capture the experience for audiences today. It's a universal experience of bravery, fear and camaraderie. I wanted people to understand the human experience of war."

YOUNG SOLDIERS

Norton and McCartney went to war as teenagers.
The full story of what happened to him on the hill in Vietnam is one Norton hasn't told his two children. He's given them copies of Jones' book to read, if they want to.

In his senior year at South Mecklenburg High School, Norton joined the Marine Corps with two friends.

"It was something we felt we needed to do," he said. "And we did."

On June 3, 1966, he graduated in a ceremony held at Ovens Auditorium. A year later, he arrived in Vietnam, a rifleman with First Platoon, Echo Company, 26th Marines, based out of a place called Phu Bai.

His war experience had begun. Norton got to know his fellow Marines, including Martin Rimson from Detroit who liked to sing Motown soul music. But Norton became especially close to the 18-year-old Molettiere, who talked a lot about the baby his wife was expecting.

In January 1968, Norton returned to Phu Bai after a week of R&R in Bangkok to find that his company had been transferred. He caught up with Molettiere and his other friends in the field outside Khe Sanh Combat Base.

Echo Company had the usual duty at first – going on patrols and ambushes. But an order came down to fortify one of several hills surrounding the combat base.

HILL 861A

Jungle and razor-sharp elephant grass covered Hill 861 Alpha, elevation 2,800 feet. The Marines climbed at night.

"It was absolutely brutal," Norton said. "We were hacking our way up, and I've never been so tired in all my life."

The hilltop became their world – a swirl of hot days, cool nights and mornings wrapped in heavy fog and mist.

All day, the Marines dug trenches in the red clay and filled sandbags. At night, they pulled guard duty or tried to sleep.

Often, supplies of C-rations and water ran low.
For two weeks, the North Vietnamese left the Americans alone. Then, in the predawn of Feb. 5, they hit – and hit hard. The hill erupted in explosions and gunfire.

Norton could see rifle flashes split the darkness as North Vietnamese soldiers blasted away. At one point, he and Molettiere recognized the voice of Rimson calling for help. They ran to him and saw that a mortar had almost blown off one of his legs.

As they helped the young Marine, a mortar round exploded nearby. Molettiere was killed and Norton knocked unconscious. When he came to, he couldn't feel his right arm. His M-16 rifle was shattered, so he held onto a knife with his good hand for protection and crawled into the grass.

By sunup, the fight had ended. Norton was loaded aboard a helicopter along with the other wounded, including Rimson. But the Marine from Detroit died before the chopper touched down at Khe Sanh Combat Base.

A WATERSHED MOMENT

Even then, Norton knew Khe Sanh was a watershed moment in his life. He spent 1 1/2 years in hospitals and had many reconstructive surgeries, and his arm eventually was OK. He returned to Charlotte and attended Central Piedmont Community College for two years. People knew he was an ex-Marine, and he sensed resentment from some instructors. But that didn't matter. He had support from family and friends.

Norton married in 1970. He and his wife have a son, daughter and four grandchildren.

About two years ago, while exploring the Internet, he learned about a veterans group combing cemeteries for unmarked graves of people who'd served in the military. One grave they found using a list of war casualties belonged to Norton's Detroit friend, Rimson, who was killed at Khe Sanh. The cemetery rock identified him as No. 27.

Norton was angry and contacted the veterans group, offering to pay for a marker. But he learned the group was already in touch with the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs about getting a free marker for the grave.

Meanwhile, Norton met up with McCartney again at a reunion of the Khe Sanh Veterans Association in Washington, D.C.

McCartney, 65, spent 30 years in the Marine Corps, including two tours in Vietnam and tours in the Persian Gulf, Haiti and Bosnia. He saw some bad things but said "there was nothing like Khe Sanh. Absolutely nothing."

Yet he feels the experience helped him. On Hill 861 Alpha, fellow Marines "covered my back and taught me what I needed to do to grow up," McCartney said. "They taught me to survive – and in a very short period. I matured on the hill."

HELPING VETERANS

McCartney is concerned about veterans, helping them navigate bureaucracy at the VA when they're seeking mental health counseling, regular health services or other benefits.

He said the Khe Sanh association is providing scholarships and financial support for veterans' children and grandchildren.

Recently, McCartney replaced a damaged headstone of a Khe Sanh veteran buried in a Philadelphia cemetery. He'd survived Hill 861 Alpha only to die in another battle.

In June, McCartney made the trip of a lifetime. He returned to Khe Sanh, where war tourism now pumps cash into the local economy. Instead of a hole in the ground, he spent the night in an air-conditioned hotel.

Then he went to the hill and walked to the top.

"It was a step back in time," McCartney said. "A flood of memories came back, mostly about the people who helped me stay alive. And memories of the people we lost."

OBIT
NAVY CROSS RECIPIENT WHO BATTLED MILITARY FAKERS LAID TO REST

By Jeff Schogol, Staff writer
Military Times

A Navy Cross recipient who dedicated his life to protecting the integrity of valor awards has been interred at Arlington National Cemetery with his fellow heroes.

Retired Marine Lt. Col. Thomas Richards was given full military honors at a Tuesday ceremony that was attended by Medal of Honor recipient Barney Barnum and Assistant Commandant of the Marine Corps Gen. John M. Paxton Jr.

In June 1969, Richards fended off enemy attacks in Vietnam so that wounded Marines could be evacuated. He killed eight enemy troops and prevented the Marine perimeter from collapsing. After retiring, Richards helped Marine Corps Times uncover at least 40 instances in which Marine Corps Association members lied about receiving valor awards, including the Medal of Honor. He died of cancer in June.

On Tuesday, seven white horses pulled a flag-draped caisson in front of the funeral procession which marched to a drumbeat cadence to keep them in rhythm. Half of the Marine escort team marched in front of the colors and the other half behind. When the procession came to a stop, one Marine brought the urn with Richards' remains near the gravesite.

Diane Richards did not expect so many Marines to be there for her husband's interment.

"I was shocked by the entire tribute," she told Marine Corps Times after the ceremony. "I had no idea that they would be there. I was told there may be a few Marines from 8th and I, and had expected one or two representing the Marine Corps. When I walked out and saw this sea of Marines, I was overwhelmed."

After a bugler blew Taps and Richards was presented with a folded flag, Paxton knelt in front of her and embraced her.

"He and Tom were close," she said. "He continually offered his love and support, respect for Tom, what Tom stood for, the work that Tom did for the Marine Corps and for the country; and that the Marine Corps family will forever be mine."

It's fitting that her husband is now at rest in Arlington, she said.

"Tom was humble," she said. "I think to him, certainly he is among comrades. He is among comrades who shared his values and he's also among history, which was his love. His being at Arlington is also an opportunity for his legacy to be continued, something he would hold dear to his heart."

PATRIOTS POINT

Immerse Yourself into the Vietnam Experience Exhibit, a hero's welcome home.

Using state-of-the-art technology the Patriots Point Naval & Maritime Museum is bringing the history of the Vietnam War to life in a new two and one-half acre Vietnam Experience Exhibit. It features more than a dozen components that simulate life during wartime in a "Brown Water Navy" support base and a U.S. Marine Corps artillery fire base during the Tet Offensive and the Battle of Khe Sanh in 1968. The primary mission of the "Brown Water Navy" was to block the movement of insurgents and their supplies into South Vietnam.

This immersive exhibit incorporates various facilities such as a fire control bunker and mess hall with various Vietnam-era artifacts including a rare MK1 River Patrol Boat (PBR) dedicated to Medal of Honor recipient James Elliot Williams (see Medal of Honor Museum). It also includes a 105 Howitzer gun, Wilys M725 ambulance, and three different Vietnam-era helicopters: CH-46 Sea Knight, UH-1M Huey and UH-34 Sea Horse. In addition to the artifacts, guests can climb onto an observation tower and hear the sounds of jet aircraft and helicopters flying over their heads. Holograms bring Marine officers to life in an exciting 3-D production.

The Vietnam Experience Exhibit also serves as a place for the two million Vietnam veterans in the United States to reflect and reconnect with their experiences during their years of service..

The Vietnam Experience is a permanent two and one-half acre exhibit and is included in the normal museum admission price. Construction of the exhibit was made possible by contributions from Charleston County Council, Bennett Hospitality and the Charleston Harbor Benefactors Society.

Accommodations for handicapped and special needs guests.

To assist visitors with physical challenges, an elevator is available to reach the USS YORKTOWN hangar deck level. The ship itself has an elevator for handicapped and special needs guests. special needs at the Information Desk.

For conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity at the risk of his life above and beyond the call of duty. BM1 Williams was serving as Boat Captain and Patrol Officer aboard River Patrol Boat (PBR) 105 accompanied by another patrol boat when the patrol was suddenly taken under fire by 2 enemy sampans. BM1 Williams immediately ordered the fire returned, killing the crew of 1 enemy boat and causing the other sampan to take refuge in a nearby river inlet. Pursuing the fleeing sampan, the U.S. patrol encountered a heavy volume of small-arms fire from enemy forces, at close range, occupying well-concealed positions along the river bank. Maneuvering through this fire, the patrol confronted a numerically superior enemy force aboard 2 enemy junks and 8 sampans augmented by heavy automatic weapons fire from ashore. In the savage battle that ensued, BM1 Williams, with utter disregard for his safety exposed himself to the withering hail of enemy fire to direct counter-fire and inspire the actions of his patrol. Recognizing the overwhelming strength of the enemy force, BM1 Williams deployed his patrol to await the arrival of armed helicopters. In the course of his movement he discovered an even larger concentration of enemy boats. Not waiting for the arrival of the armed helicopters, he displayed great initiative and boldly led the patrol through the intense enemy fire and damaged or destroyed 50 enemy sampans and 7 junks. This phase of the action completed, and with the arrival of the armed helicopters, BM1 Williams directed the attack on the remaining enemy force. Now virtually dark, and although BM1 Williams was aware that his boats would become even better targets, he ordered the patrol boats' search lights turned on to better illuminate the area and moved the patrol perilously close to shore to press the attack. Despite a waning supply of ammunition the patrol successfully engaged the enemy ashore and completed the rout of the enemy force. Under the leadership of BM1 Williams, who demonstrated unusual professional skill and indomitable courage throughout the 3 hour battle, the patrol accounted for the destruction or loss of 65 enemy boats and inflicted numerous casualties on the enemy personnel. His extraordinary heroism and exemplary fighting spirit in the face of grave risks inspired the efforts of his men to defeat a larger enemy force, and are in keeping with the finest traditions of the U.S. Naval Service.

WHO IN THEWORLD IS 'GUNNY CLAUS?'

December 22, 2014, in Featured, Military Life by Raleigh Duttweiler

Macy's has the Real Santa. 1st Civ. Div. has a mall stand-in. But here in the Marine Corps, we have Gunny Claus.

That's right, Gunny Claus. 1st Reindeer Division, Marine Corps Base North Pole.
I'm not even kidding.

Who is Gunny Claus? Now, if you're a Marine Corps family, or a Navy family lucky enough to be stationed with some fabulous devil dogs, Gunny Claus is nothing new to you. You'd know him a mile away. His eyes – how they twinkle! His demeanor – so merry! His face is so jolly and his uniform's cherry! The beard on his chin is all salty and white and to ring in the season is his USMC right.

He's a part of all things holiday in the Corps, and rumor has it, it's been that way for awhile. According to legend, Gunny Claus first made his appearance in the forests of Argonne, France during World War I, but Marine kids today know you can find him at bases far and wide during the holiday season. A battalion holiday party is incomplete without him, and you really can't call it Christmas until you've had your picture taken with the big man himself. Since 2002, he's visited over 46,650 devil pups and adds to that list every year with a new generation of Marine Corps kids lucky enough to make his acquaintance.

But the thing about Gunny Claus is he's not just a big, jolly old elf Marine. Much like Saint Nick stands for all the lessons we try to teach about Christmas, Gunny Claus embodies all that's magical about Christmas in the Marine Corps.

And the Corps is really something at the holidays. Gunny Claus says it best:

Marines gather toys across the Nation each year only to give them back to less fortunate children. We help families of deployed Marines, Veterans, handicap children, and homeless Veterans at Christmas. We do this without the need of reward or recognition; this is Honor.

While others celebrate this festive time of the year, we serve on the battlefield far away from our loved ones surrounded by adversities unknown to most. We call this Courage since valor is simply one of our assets.

Marines at Christmas are deployed at hundreds of locations around the world, protecting the interest of this great Nation at Embassies, on board ships, in the air, and on distant battlefields. Standing our post at Christmas is not duty, we define it as Commitment.

This is the Marine Christmas.

In this house, Marine Christmas is marked by the usual holiday lights, tinsel, and in our case an added menorah. We gather toys from our family, friends, and big box stores for the children in our community who could use a little extra love.

We tell our own children about the miracles, about the baby in the manger, and about Santa, the most easily understandable version of all of those big concepts for small children. Santa is someone who cares about you, remembers you, looks out for you, acknowledges you, and rewards your goodness – and someone in whom you have to believe for the whole thing to work. Those are some great basic lessons of faith right there. We love Santa.

With Santa, there's that leap of faith. With Gunny, you just have to listen. He's not just a symbol of faith and goodness and love, he's the real deal embodiment of all of those things, proof that hard work, selflessness, kindness, and Semper Fidelis mean something. He's all the toys collected for children in need, the face of hope and determination that keeps us going through hard winters away from our loved ones, the promise that none of us will be left behind or forgotten. And like our spouses themselves, he's a warrior for what's good and honorable.
Again, Gunny:

There are many gifts you can give at Christmas. If you are not deployed, protect the families and kids of those serving abroad as they are your family. If you see a Vet, thank him and wish him a Merry Christmas; take particular care of Kids, they are our future. We have Marines in medical facilities across the Nation; let us never forget any of them. If you have a moment or a free day, stop by and say Merry Christmas to any one of them; this in itself is a reward.

The gift you need to give to your fellow Marines and their families is simply to wish them a Merry Christmas. This gift requires no wrapping and is the greatest gift of all. Never question if you or your family make a difference, as the answer is clear.

014 REUNION SUMMARY

From the feedback received, the reunion in San Diego was an unqualified success, and the committee as a whole is grateful to all who spoke or wrote to us about their time in San Diego. With this location and all it had to offer, we only scheduled one off-site activity and that was a visit to MCRD for the Marine Corps graduation ceremony. Most of us travelled by bus from the hotel, but a few used their own transportation. We were enthusiastically received by the Marines at MCRD and the civilian guests of the graduating platoons. In addition, we were recognized for our Khe Sanh service, which was met with an outstanding ovation from those in attendance on that Friday. Joining us for lunch on the base afterward, Commanding General, MCRD, BGen James W. Bierman Jr., delivered a heartfelt, emotional welcome to the membership.

Many of those in attendance at the reunion who ventured out from the hotel to see and experience all that San Diego had to offer utilized the passenger vans we rented for small groups. We particularly have to give a big thank you to Roland Kutzbach who spent the entire reunion chauffeuring the vans. Our Vice President John Pessoni as usual, did an outstanding job with the KSV PX. Carol & Dave Meyer assisted John as well as doing a superb job with the Silent Auction. Tom Ford also assisted in the PX, giving Big John some much deserved breaks, although there are some who maintain that Big John gets too many breaks as it is. LOL. The KSV PX, the Silent Auction, and the continuous generosity of the membership, contributed much needed funds for the Scholarship Fund. Rita & Merle Moritz and our main "get everything done," Michael Fishbaugh, tirelessly operated the hospitality room providing goodies for the multitudes.

While the membership gathered in the Hospitality Room on Saturday for the general membership meeting, the distaff side of the Khe Sanh Vets enjoyed their ladies luncheon. The membership voted to hold the 2016 Khe Sanh reunion in San Antonio Texas. The dates have not been set, but we can assure you it will not be in July or August! We know full well the meaning of "those repeating history..." The membership informed the reunion committee they wanted us to arrange a visit to Parris Island while in attendance in Savannah Georgia in August 2015. We will make those arrangements as soon as possible.

An election was held for positions on the KSV BOD. John Pessoni was re-elected Vice President. Bruce Geiger and Ken Martin retained their seats as Members at Large. Craig Tourte was elected Secretary, replacing Jack Haigwood and Wayne Deverney & Jose Reyes were elected to the BOD. Big thank you's to Jack & Leland who did an outstanding job during their tenure with the BOD.

Prior to the annual banquet we held a small 239th-Marine Birthday party. The youngest Marine was Lauren Reyes, the daughter of Jose Reyes E Co 2/26. The oldest Marine was Ret. GySgt Ernie Hamner, an honored guest from B/1/1, 1st Transplacement Battalion, Okinawa 1958.We also honored Retired Colonel Thomas Johnson USAF, who flew B-52 Missions at Khe Sanh.

Craig Tourte ran a couple of golf tournaments at nearby golf courses. We want to congratulate him for protecting Steven Wiese from any California snake cousins who might have sought additional retribution for the murder of one of their cousins in Vietnam.

Last but not least, a real vote of thanks must go to the lovely Kathy Turner who is the glue in putting these reunions together. Her tireless efforts and her extraordinary patience and trouble-solving skills are the reason these reunions work at all. Every individual attending our reunions owes a great deal to her. Kathy: there was a certain amount of luck in getting out of Khe Sanh alive. That same luck includes having you and your talents to make these reunions the success that they are.

COUNT YOUR BLESSINGS
By Khe Sanh Veterans Chaplain Ron Rayner

Count your blessings was the message delivered at the memorial service on Saturday at the 2014 San Diego Khe Sanh Veteran's reunion. We, who survived the Vietnam War and our lives for the last forty some years, should ponder the positive aspects of those years when negative thinking starts to dominate our life.

I have been diagnosed with Post-Traumatic-Stress-Disorder. If I allow it, negative thinking will fill my thoughts. I was introduced to a process called "thought stopping" during group sessions at the Vet Center in Detroit, MI. Simply put, I have to recognize that I am looking at life the wrong way and think about the positive things I have experienced and am experiencing. Some mistake I made years ago should not bother me today. I just have count my many blessings to get my mind headed in the right direction. Count your blessings if negative feelings control you. This is not very original but I know I need to be reminded quite often.

The Reverend Ray Stubbe provided a parable for the service. I had called him in Wisconsin to update him on the reunion and he told me the story about the minister who visited a parishioner that had not been to church in a long time. The minister simply went over to the fireplace and drew a hot coal away from the main portion of the fire. The coal cooled off and turned black. The minister then moved the coal close to the flames and it glowed again. The parishioner then stated he would be in church on Sunday. It is the same way with the reunions. The people at this year's reunion glowed with the fellowship of seeing old friends and making new ones.

I personally had the privilege of spending some time with two members of my Vietnam platoon, Vince Begay and George Miramontez. Vince, I have been seeing occasionally the last three years or so. It had been 46 years since I had seen George and we were able help each other clarify events that were foggy to both of us. Long buried feeling and events were relived. Second platoon Alpha First Battalion Twenty-sixth Marines meeting face to face once again was a fulfilling experience.

Connie Gibbons, wife of KSV Gregg Gibbon, spoke during the Memorial Service about her children's book, Mom Told Me You Were A Hero. This book will encourage discussion bridging generations about trauma induced anger, rage, lost memory, unexpected mood change (PTSD), and injury that can happen within families of veterans. It does not matter if the warrior recently returned or if their war is decades behind them. The book will be published in Spring 2015. Please contact Connie at cogconnexion@gmail.com if you are interested.

I personally believe that PTSD can be contagious and believe a book such as Connie's is long overdue.

Khe Sanh Veteran Larkin Spivey has published a new book, A Skeptic's Guide To God. Larkin, who did not become a Christian until age fifty-three after a prior life of religious skepticism, has done an excellent job of presenting an easily read, humorous, insightful, and skeptical look at God. One of the first quotes in the book explains the title.

"Large skepticism leads to large understanding. Small skepticism leads to small understanding. No skepticism leads to no understanding." Xi Zhi

I personally am a religious skeptic who has gained much understanding from this book. It was entertaining as well as educational. I highly recommend it for all, skeptical or not. It is available at amazon.com.

The Khe Sanh Veterans and their families are in my prayers.

"Live in such a way that God's love can bless you as you wait for the eternal life that our Lord Jesus Christ in his mercy is going to give you."

KHE SANH VETERAN IN THE NEWS

HON LEE KHE SANH VETERAN DELTA CO 1/26 & 1/13 FO 5TH 155

HON LEE: SCHOLAR, WARRIOR, SPY, TEACHER AND HEALER

An Interview by Bill Reddy, LAc, Dipl. Ac.

Bill: Please share with me a little about your childhood in New York.

Hon: It was fun. Growing up in New York's Chinatown was like living in a Chinese village that had been transplanted to a five square block area in southern Manhattan.

The thing I liked most about the city, and still do, is it's rich cultural diversity. The neighborhood was a culinary paradise, with Chinese noodle shops and Italian pizzerias within a five-minute walk, and great Kosher Delies a bit further north. I went to school on the lower East Side, a tough neighborhood and I took up martial arts to defend myself after getting beat up.

Bill: What's your martial arts background?

Hon: When I was a kid, my uncle claimed he knew kung fu. He showed me how to punch and kick and made me stand in a low crouch called a horse stance until my thighs burned and my whole body ached. But, I didn't take him or my lessons seriously because he didn't look like my cinema kung fu heroes. It wasn't until I got into high school that I took formal lessons, but in Japanese karate, not Chinese kung fu. The classes in karate seemed better organized than what I found in Chinatown. I continued training in the Marine Corps, but it wasn't until I moved to Washington D.C. that I returned to my Chinese roots to study kung fu. This was before anyone had heard of Bruce Lee and people thought kung fu was something you ate at a Chinese restaurant.

Bill: What were some of the highlights of your Vietnam service as a Marine?

Hon: Combat was a transformative experience. The man I replaced and the man who replaced me were both killed in action. So many of the men I had served with came home broken, physically or emotionally. I'm glad that today's veterans are returning to a warmer welcome than the hostile reception Vietnam vets received. But I feel we have to go beyond just saying, "thank you for your service." A 2008 RAND Corporation study concluded that 31% of veterans returning from Iraq and Afghanistan suffered from PTSD, depression or traumatic brain injury. That's why I appreciate the work so many in our acupuncture community are doing to help veterans, and I applaud the Acupuncture Without Borders "Military Stress Recovery Project," and similar initiatives.

Bill: What drew you into working with the CIA?

Hon: Military service whetted my appetite for travel and adventure. After the exhilaration of combat, I wasn't ready to settle down to a routine 9-to-5 job. And who could resist playing James Bond? Having witnessed the futility of war and the strategic myopia that got our country entangled in the so-called Vietnam quagmire, I had hoped that by joining the CIA I could help provide U.S. policy makers with the intelligence they'd need to avoid the future squandering of our national blood and treasure. Unfortunately, good intelligence doesn't always translate into good policy.

Bill: Can you tell me of any "close calls" you've had during your tenure with the company?

Hon: What you see on screen is a distorted picture of the CIA. I was a case officer. Unlike Tom Cruise, unless it's a war zone or hostile environment, CIA officers don't go around shooting bad guys. The agents I handled, who put their lives or careers on the line, were the ones at risk. I was never in mortal danger while on the job. The only close call was during a burglary, when I had a knife pressed against my throat. But that could have happened anywhere.

Bill: What were the circumstances surrounding your pursuit of Chinese Medicine?

Hon: When I was a kid, I got so sick my mother took me to the Chinese herbalist down the street and made me gulp down bowls of foul tasting decoctions that restored my health. It was like magic, something I knew i had to learn. Also, the founders of my martial arts systems were Chinese medicine physicians. I'd inherited a manual of "secret" formulas, so I felt obligated to learn enough so I could use them responsibly. Moreover, according to Chinese martial arts ethics, if you know how hurt someone, you should also know how to heal them.

Bill: Have you had any qigong exposure? If so, what style(s)?

Hon: I'd practiced qigong as part of kung fu training to develop internal power and as a form of self-cultivation. It wasn't until I took a required qigong class in acupuncture school that I discovered that it's a pillar of classical Chinese medicine and can be used to heal people. Since then, I've learned several styles and completed a three-year program in Medical Qigong Therapy. I personally practice and teach Spring Forest Qigong, created by Chunyi Lin, whose vision is: "A healer in every family and a world without pain." I recommend it to all my patients as a way to heal physically, emotionally and spiritually. What I like most about this particular style is that it's profoundly powerful yet very simple to learn. If it's not simple, my patients won't do it consistently (if they do it at all).

Bill: What skills in your previous careers have come in handy as a Licensed Acupuncturist?

Hon: I think good people skills, i.e., our ability to communicate and build rapport with others, are essential in being successful in any profession. It's a set of skills I tried to develop to be a more effective military commander, CIA manager and martial arts instructor and that I continue to hone as an acupuncturist. In treating patients, especially those with chronic illnesses, I'm more effective if I can change mental, emotional or spiritual patterns that may be at the heart of their problems. And to effect change requires gaining their trust and confidence.

Bill: What do you like most about being an acupuncturist?

Hon: I just published my memoir describing the seemingly divergent paths I travelled that finally lead to fulfilling my boyhood dream of practicing Chinese medicine. Along the way, I discovered that my true purpose in life is to serve others. Being an acupuncturist provides me the tools to do just that, to help people lead stronger, happier and healthier lives.

Bill: Any parting thoughts for our readers?

Hon: Albert Schweitzer said, "I don't know what your destiny will be, but one thing I know: the only ones among you who will be really happy are those who will have sought and found how to serve." I know my fellow acupuncturists feel the same way. That's why it's such privilege to work with and learn from a community of like-minded people who are passionate about helping others.

LAST OF NAVAJO "CODE TALKERS" DIES IN NEW MEXICO

CHESTER NEZ, USMC

Reuters) - The last of 29 Navajo Americans who developed an unbreakable code that helped Allied forces win the second World War died in New Mexico on Wednesday of kidney failure at the age of 93. Chester Nez was the last remaining survivor of an original group of 29 Navajos recruited by the U.S. Marine Corps to create a code based on their language that the Japanese could not crack.

His son, Michael Nez, said his father died peacefully in his sleep at their home in Albuquerque.

"He had been battling kidney disease and it seems like the disease won," Michael Nez told Reuters. "He's the last of a great era, a great part of history."

About 400 code talkers would go on to use their unique battlefield cipher to encrypt messages sent from field telephones and radios throughout the Pacific theater during the war.

It was regarded as secure from Japanese military code breakers because the language was spoken only in the U.S. Southwest, was known by fewer than 30 non-Navajo people, and had no written form.

The Navajos' skill, speed and accuracy under fire in ferocious battles from the Marshall Islands to Iwo Jima is credited with saving thousands of U.S. servicemen's lives and helping shorten the war. Their work was celebrated in the 2002 movie Windtalkers."

The president of the Navajo Nation, Ben Shelly, said he had ordered flags to be flown at half staff in memory of Nez. "It saddens me to hear the last of the original code talkers has died," Shelly said. "We are proud of these young men in defending the country they loved using their Navajo language." Last November, the American Veterans Center honored Nez for bravery and valor above and beyond the call of duty, awarding him the Audie Murphy Award for distinguished service.

"I was very proud to say that the Japanese did everything in their power to break that code but they never did," Nez said in an interview with the Stars and Stripes newspaper the day before receiving the award.

Nez and his young fellow recruits were called communications specialists by the Marines and were taught Morse code, semaphore and "blinker," a system using lights to send the code they developed substituted Navajo words for military terms. CHAY-DA-GAHI, which translates to "turtle," came to mean a tank while a GINI, "chicken hawk" in English, became a dive bomber. America was NE-HE-MAH, "our mother."

The code talkers served in all six Marine divisions and 13 were killed in World War Two.

Nez also volunteered to serve two more years during the Korean War. He retired in 1974 after a 25-year career as a painter at the Veterans Administration hospital in Albuquerque.

Shelly said the Navajo Nation was drafting a proclamation in honor of Nez that it plans to present, along with the Navajo Nation flag, to the code talker's relatives. Nez is expected to be buried at the Santa Fe National Cemetery next week.

WASHINGTON -- The 29 U.S. Marines dodged bullets at the front -- first in the Pacific and then in Germany -- passing top-secret messages to each other in a code that the enemy couldn't crack.

The warriors, Navajo Code Talkers, relied on their their native language to develop the code, which helped to turn the course of World War II in the favor of the Allies. Of the original group, only one was still alive: Chester Nez.

On Nov. 9, the American Veterans Center honored Nez and six other veterans for bravery and valor above and beyond the call of duty during combat. Nez received the Audie Murphy Award for distinguished service in the military during World War II. "I was very proud to say that the Japanese did everything in their power to break that code but they never did," Nez said in an interview with Stars and Stripes the day before the award ceremony.

If the Code Talkers had been caught, he said, they would be tortured and their tongues cut out. They risked everything for the United States, even though they were raised in military boarding schools that prohibited them from speaking their native language.

Nez was raised at a time when the government required every Native American to have a census number and be accounted for. His grandson, Latham, described it as a "bad time" for Native Americans. Part of the effort involved taking children off reservations and putting them into boarding schools. Once there, children were forbidden to speak Navajo and were beaten or had their mouths washed out with soap if they were caught.

That didn't stop them from whispering Navajo to each other in secret, said Latham Nez, who travels with his grandfather helping him tell his story. Their language, however, would serve the United States well later, in 1942, when Americans were dying in rising numbers overseas, especially in the Pacific. The Japanese seemed to know what the U.S. military was planning well before it took place.

That's where the Code Talkers came in, recruited from boarding schools to join the Marines and use their unique skills to develop an unbreakable code to pass messages.

"Even some of our town tribe wouldn't understand what we were talking about," Nez said in the interview.

World War I veteran Philip Johnston, who came up with the idea to develop the Navajo Code in 1941, came to Nez' boarding school to recruit. The volunteers went directly into basic training without any goodbyes. Nez left behind his sister Dora, his father and his beloved grandmother, who wouldn't know he was fighting until two years after he left.

When the Code Talkers got out of the service, "they told us not to talk about what we did," Nez said.

The Navajo men received no fanfare, and many struggled, said Judith Avila, who co-wrote Nez's memoir "Code Talker: The First and Only Memoir By One of the Original Talkers of WWII" and helped Nez during the Nov. 8 interview.

Instead of people thanking them for their service, they faced discrimination and insults, she said. When Nez wore his Marine Corps uniform to register for his Certificate of Degree of Indian Blood -- required for all Native Americans -- the clerk told Nez he wasn't a real citizen.

"I wish I had my .45 with me," Nez recalled saying at the time, according to Avila, "because if I did, I would shoot you in the face."

Without support, suffering from what most now know to be post-traumatic stress, many Code Talkers turned to alcohol and lived on the streets. There were about 420 Code Talkers that followed the original 29 into service. Of that group, about 30 are still alive.

Nez said he was one of the lucky ones. When he returned, he was embraced by his family. He got a job at the VA, which he kept until the 1970s.

Nez still has good memories of his time with the Marines, whom he said treated the Code Talkers very well. Latham Nez, who accompanied his grandfather to the awards, said the Marines saw the Navajo men as "damn good Marines" who were already warriors when they left for basic training.

A modest man, Nez doesn't talk a lot. His grandson said that he was raised not to discuss his life, which made the book very special. It's also what makes the Audie Murphy award so fantastic.

"His normal response was a big smile, and saying, 'Good, good.' I know deep down it's the story that's important (to him)," Latham Nez said.

AT SANTA FE NM. CEMETERY, A MONUMENT TO NAVAJO CODE TALKERS

Published: March 22, 2013

Albuquerque Journal, N.M

SANTA FE, N.M. — Wind is thought of as a spiritual force in Navajo folklore and tradition. It also represents a means of communication. So it was appropriate that the spring wind was blowing hard Thursday during the dedication ceremony for a monument honoring Navajo Code Talkers at Santa Fe National Cemetery.

Cliff Shields, the cemetery's director, also said the Santa Fe cemetery is a fitting site for the new memorial.

When he was approached by the New Mexico State Organization Daughters of the American Revolution, "I thought how appropriate it would be to have the monument in New Mexico," he said, which encompasses a significant portion of the Navajo Nation.

The Navajo Code Talkers served as secret weapons for American forces in the Pacific Theatre during World War II. Using variations of the Diné language, they communicated messages through use of a code in the Pacific war theatre. The code was never broken and the code talkers' contributions are said to have helped bring an end to the war and saved thousands of lives.

A plaque mounted on a stone foundation simply reads: "In honor of the Navajo Code Talkers for their sacrifice and courage to help ensure the United States' victory during World War II."

"It will pass on the legacy for what we were honored to do to our children, grandchildren and everyone down the line," said Roy Hawthorne, of Lupton, Ariz.

Hawthorne was one of three code talkers present for the ceremony. Another was 91-year-old Chester Nez, who grew up near Gallup and now makes his home in Albuquerque, the last of the 29 original code talkers recruited by the U.S. Marines to carry out the task.

Brigadier General Andrew Salas of the New Mexico National Guard gave the keynote address, saying "their contributions will not be forgotten and are treasured in our hearts now and always."

Zadeea Jean Graham Harris, the state regent for the Daughters of the American Revolution, said she always loved and respected the code talkers. Through her research, she found that there were no monuments for the Navajo Code Talkers in New Mexico and decided to do something about it. "When people heard who it was for, I had no problem raising money," she said.

There are other code talker memorials elsewhere, including in the Navajo national capital of Window Rock, Ariz.

Shields said the Santa Fe monument will serve as the centerpiece for a new memorial wall and walkway to be located at the cemetery. He said there's space for 20 other monuments at the site, some of which will recognize military service branches.

A STATEWIDE PROGRAM TO HONOR DISTINGUISHED VETERANS WAS SPARKED BY A SCHUYLER COUNTY MAN.

Vietnam veteran Philip J. Swaney of Cayuta braved explosions and gunshots to save seven critically injured soldiers during a heated battle on Oct. 14, 1967, in Vietnam. His bravery, Philip earned a Silver Star.

Fast-forward a few decades to his latest battle with the New York State Legislature where Philip and his late wife Marilyn advocated for a bill to allow Silver and Gold Star recipients to receive a distinguished emblem on state license plates.

The bill remained stagnant in the Legislature for years over a moratorium on distinctive plates. Only recipients of the military's highest award, the Medal of Honor, and the Purple Heart, awarded to the wounded, are allowed the distinctive plates, according to a news release from the state Assembly.

"We were surprised and disappointed that these brave men and women who fought for our nation were being deprived of this simple recognition for their exceptional deeds because of some legal dispute in Albany," Assemblyman Marc Butler, R-Newport, stated.

During a press conference held in November at American Legion Robert Lee Walsh Post 337 in Broadalbin, Marc announced a new state-wide program to honor distinguished veterans — window stickers.

The "Honor Our Heroes" program administered through the Broadalbin American Legion Post, will provide free of any charge to veterans distinctive, full-color window stickers designating the medal awards for Silver Star, Bronze Star, Navy Cross, Coast Guard Cross, Distinguished Service Cross and Distinguished Flying Cross. The stickers are available to any New York state veteran who is a verified recipient of the medal.

"Mr. Swaney played a key role in developing this award program," Butler stated. "He really pressed our office to make it a reality and his perseverance in moving this forward is remarkable."

Philip was the first to be honored in the new program. During a small ceremony at the news conference, Philip thanked three people. His father, who fought during World War II's Battle of the Bulge, his mother who instilled in him a sense of patriotism, and his wife who stood by his side until her death.

Details of the program will made available to all New York Legislators. To learn more, contact Marc's district offices at (518) 762-6486, (315) 866-1632 or (518) 455-5393.

2d BATTALION, 9th MARINES IN 1967 "HELL IN A HELMET"

By Beth Crumley
August 2011

Early last week, I received an email from an acquaintance of mine, an active duty Marine officer, who commented on my HMM-262 blog. He said he was pleased to see me writing on Vietnam, since the Vietnam veterans had been ignored, or held in disdain, for so long. He added that his father had been with Echo Company, 2d Battalion, 9th Marines in 1967. I was surprised to hear that, and a bit taken aback. I knew that was a hell of a year for 2/9… Operation Hickory, Operation Kingfisher, heavy fighting in the hills around Khe Sanh Combat Base, and at Con Thien. My curiosity got the best of me, and I started to look more closely at battalion operations for the 1967 period…and it is an understatement to say it was a hell of a year for the unit that called themselves "Hell in a Helmet."

In the early spring of 1967, 2/9 was operating south of Hue. The commanding officer of Echo Company, Captain William B. Terrill, received word that his company was flying back to Phu Bai. Once there, he was briefed on the growing enemy presence around Khe Sanh Combat Base. Elements of the 1st Battalion, 9th Marines were reporting frequent contacts in the area, and it was believed that two NVA regiments were operating in the area. Echo Company was heading to Khe Sanh to reinforce the Marines already there.

Marines Of Echo Company, 2nd Battalion Ninth Marines on a sweep south of Hue, February. 1967.

Neither Captain Terrill, nor his seasoned commander of 1st platoon, Staff Sergeant Spencer Olsen believed the reports of heavy NVA activity in the area. Said Olsen, "It seemed every time we were briefed about a new operation, there were two NVA regiments waiting for us. All of these briefings seemed canned."

On March 7, much to the relief of the Marines of 1/9, Echo Company, 2/9 arrived at Khe Sanh. It was not long before they realized the reports of enemy activity in the area were not exaggerated.

Eight days later, on 15 March, SSgt Olsen received orders to conduct his second patrol. The first has taken Olsen and his Marines south of Hill 881S. This time, he was to scout the north side of the hill. The plan was to follow a trail west of the base, and in the course of a week, to cross Hill 861, and patrol the area north of 881S and west of 861.

Olsen's patrol, comprised of about 40 Marines, departed the relative safety of Khe Sanh Combat Base near dusk. Moving in a staggered column, Olsen halted the patrol about a quarter of the way up Hill 861, and took the radio handset to report in. He later said, "Vietnamese voices filled every frequency....There was just so much NVA radio traffic in the area that it was bleeding over onto all my frequencies." It was a portent of things to come, and it was, for the Marines, an uneasy, sleepless night.

On the morning of 16 March, the patrol continued its advance up 861. Cautiously moving through thick vegetation, the Marines could hear Vietnamese voices. SSgt Olsen halted the patrol and called for artillery support. Within minutes 105mm rounds impacted the far side of the hill. As the patrol continued, the trail leveled off below the crescent of hill before it descended down the west side of 861. The lead squad, led by Sergeant Donald Lord, disappeared from Olsen's sight. As they approached a fork in the trail, the point man, Private First Class George D. Johnson, asked "Which way?" Corporal Julian McKee pointed to the left. Thirty meters down the trail, they came to a second fork. As Johnson turned to ask which trail to take, he saw several hundred NVA. A blast of small arms fire killed Cpl McKee instantly. PFC Johnson was mortally wounded. As Private First Class Ivory Puckett watched his best friend dying, he opened fire. A momentary silence followed, then the hill erupted, spewing enemy fire on the Marines. Concussion grenades fell among them.

SSgt Olsen called for artillery support. Lance Corporal James Chase "started the rounds on the eastern slope of Hill 861 and walked them over the top." As the rounds exploded, Olsen made contact with Marine air assets operating in the area, and handed the handset to LCpl Chase. Chase, who had never directed an airstrike before, brought the jets in but twice called for them to abort. The jets came in for a third time and released canisters of napalm. To Chase, it seemed the canister were far too close. In a second, the landscaped changed from lush, green jungle to one of flames.

SSgt Olsen now began to concentrate on assisting his wounded Marines. One of his corpsmen was seriously wounded. The other, despite shrapnel wounded to his arms and legs, continued to treat the patrol's casualties. As medevacs were called in, Captain Michael Sayers, commanding Bravo Company, 1st Battalion, 9th Marines, diverted a patrol and ordered them to Echo Company's position.

Olsen had succeeded in gathering most of his casualties around a suitable landing zone. As a CH-46, escorted by Huey gunships, landed, a mortar round exploded. SSgt Olsen was catapulted through the air. He said, "Wide streams of blood were running down both my arms. There was so much blood..." Wounded by shrapnel in both arms and the backs of his legs, he was told that seven wounded Marines had gotten out aboard the helicopter. Incoming enemy mortar fire had, however, wounded several more. He called for another medevac.

As the second helicopter landed, mortar rounds once again pounded the Marines. Said LCpl Chase, "I looked around. The chopper was gone...Several newly wounded guys staggered around the LZ, blood pouring from their wounds. It was horrible." SSgt Olsen was faced with a decision. Both times he had called in medevacs, the enemy had hit them hard, causing more casualties. However, there were simply not enough able-bodied men left to carry the wounded. He radioed Captain Terrill and told him they needed help.

By 1500, a column of Marines, a platoon from Bravo, 1/9 came into view. As they did, the unmistakable sound of incoming mortars was heard. The enemy fire had a devastating effect on the approaching Marines. As the smoke lifted, dead and wounded were strewn about the hill.

As the Marines worked to gather the dead and wounded into a perimeter, a third helicopter approached carrying additional troops from Bravo Company. One of them, Private First Class David Hendry, felt the helicopter shudder and saw holes appear in the fuselage. The CH-46 tumbled from the sky. It hit the ground nose-first, flipped and finally came to rest some 700 meters down the side of Hill 861.

Captain Terrill and his command group flew into the battlefield from Khe Sanh. Corporal Robert Slattery stated, "Dead and wounded Marines were everywhere. SSgt Olsen had that thousand yard stare of a man who's seen too much death and destruction."

It took the rest of the evening and into the night to evacuate the wounded. In the morning, helicopters arrived to take the dead. Subsequent patrols combed the area between Hills 881S and 881N. There was no sign of the enemy. They had simply vanished. Marine casualties totaled 19 dead, and 59 wounded, all of whom had belonged to Echo Company. Depleted by fighting, the company returned to Dong Ha on 26 March to rebuild.

In early May, Con Thien, south of the Demilitarized Zone, came under heavy attack. Enemy activity in the "Leatherneck Square" area intensified and while clearing Route 561 between Cam Lo and Con Thien, 1st Battalion, 9th Marines Made contact with a large NVA force. Military Assistance Command, Vietnam (MACV) authorized the III Marine Amphibious Force to conduct ground operations in the south half of the Demilitarized Zone. The planned attacks called for combined USMC-ARVN attacks along parallel routes. Code names for the operation were Hickory for Marine forces, and Lam Son 54 for ARVN forces.

By mid-May of 1967, a large force of US and South Vietnamese troops were poised south of the Demilitarized Zone. In total, some eight Marine infantry battalions, including two afloat, and five South Vietnamese battalions (three airborne and two infantry) were ready to go on the offensive. Among those was the 2d Battalion, 9th Marines, which had arrived from Phu Bai on 16 May.

Operation Hickory launched on the morning of 18 May, 1967. 2d Battalion, 26th Marines, and 2d Battalion, 9th Marines, under the command of LtCol John Peeler, were supported by tanks from Alpha and Bravo Companies, 3d Tank Battalion. As they moved northward from Con Thien, 2/26 made contact with a large NVA force, estimated to be two battalions, positioned in well-defended bunkers and trenches. The right flank came under blistering automatic weapons and mortar fire. Casualties were heavy and the Marines of 2/9 moved up to reinforce the flank, immediately engaging the enemy. As night fell, the Marines broke contact and pulled back to evacuate the dead and wounded.

That night airstrikes hit enemy positions and as the day dawned on 19 May, artillery fire fell on enemy defenses. Both battalions jumped of in the attack at 0700. Within minutes, the advance of 2/26 was halted from withering fire to the front and right. 2/9 moved forward against light resistance and was able to relieve the pressure on 2/26's right flank. By 1030, the Marines had overrun the enemy bunker complex and continued the advance.

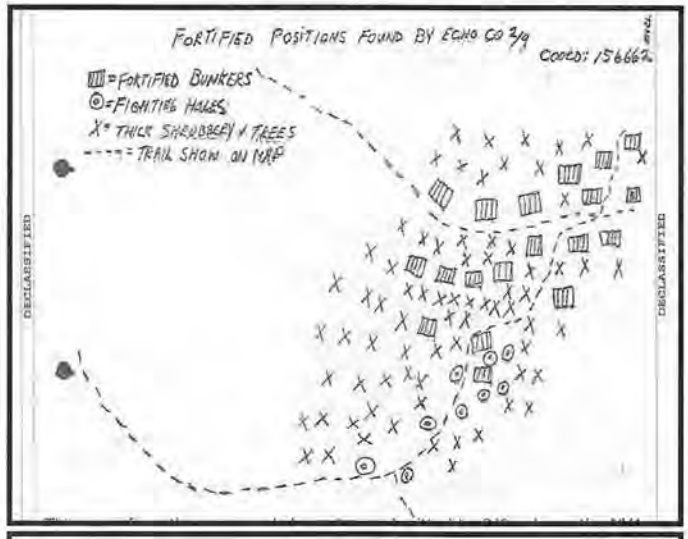
Three hours later, Company H, 2d Battalion, 9th Marines, on the easternmost flank of the advance came under heavy attack near the intersection of Route 606 and 561. Heavy automatic weapons and mortar fire emanated from the east. Shortly thereafter, they began taking heavy fire from a tree line 60 meters to the front. Several Marines in the point squad had been shot and were lying in the open. Corporal Robert Gillingham ran through savage enemy fire to rescue one of the wounded Marines. Hit three times in the effort, he dragged the man to safety, but later succumbed to his wounds. He was posthumously awarded a Navy Cross for his actions.

Tanks from Alpha Company, 3d Tank Battalion, were brought in to support the attack. Almost immediately the first tank, "Earth Moving Mama," was hit. The gunner was killed instantly, and the tank commander was mortally wounded. A second tank moved into the fray and was immediately hit by RPG fire, knocking it out of the battle. Captain Robert J. Thompson, commanding Company H, moved the entire company forward to retrieve the dead and the wounded. As the company pulled back, he called in supporting arms. The action left 7 Marines dead, and another 10 wounded.

The next day, 2/9 faced Gia Binh, an abandoned village some 2500 meters northeast of Con Thien, where the NVA has established an extensive bunker complex off Route 561. Accompanied by tanks, 2/9 started the attack at 0930. One flame tank torched the bunker while another fired canister rounds and machine guns. Surprising, enemy resistance was very light. The NVA had pulled back from their fortified positions around Con Thien.

The command chronology for the month of May states, "During Operation Hickory, well-equipped and well-trained NVA troops fighting from fortified bunkers and positions were encountered. These positions had interlocking fields of machine gun fire and defensive concentrations of mortar fire. Camouflaged and placed at strategic locations, they formed formidable obstacles to friendly offensive movement. "Casualties for the operation totaled 22 killed in action, and another 116 wounded.

By 28 July 1967, 2/9 found itself involved in Operation Kingfisher, yet another operation along the DMZ, designed to block NVA entry into Quang Tri



This map, from the command chronology submitted by 2/9, shows the NVA fighting positions during operation Hickory Province. Reinforced by a platoon of tanks, three Ontos, LVTEs and engineers, the Marines moved north along Route 606. Companies E and G provided security on the flanks.

Moving through a narrow stretch of land bordered by the Ben Hai River on the west and north and a stream to the east, terrain dictated that the tanks remain on the road. Thick vegetation made movement on the flanks very difficult. Unbeknownst to the Marines, who would be forced to return by the same route, the NVA were already moving units into positions covering Route 606.

Marine of 2/9 during operation Kingfisher, north of Con Thien

On the morning of 29 July, 2/9 reached its objective. By late morning the battalion began moving south out of the Demilitarized Zone, led by Echo Company. At 1115, the enemy detonated a 250-pound bomb buried in the road, wounding 5 Marines. The engineers soon found a second bomb and destroyed it.

As the second bomb detonated, the NVA opened fire with small arms, machine guns and mortars, beginning a running battle that lasted until darkness fell. The NVA had established several strongpoints along the road. Some Marines dove off the road, only to land on NVA booby traps that had been placed there overnight.

Given the situation, and the terrain, the tracked vehicles became a liability rather than an asset. Company F was ordered to establish a helicopter landing zone to evacuate the dead and wounded. When the tanks entered the area, the enemy rained down a torrent of fire. Machine guns, RPGs and mortar fire swept the entire landing zone. Corporal Miguel Rivera Sotomayor, wounded by shrapnel knocked out an enemy machine gun position. He braved the enemy fire to man an M-60 when the gunner was badly wounded. When he ran out of ammunition, he picked up a rifle and continud to fire before being badly wounded. (Corporal Sotomayor survived and was later awarded a Navy Cross for his actions.) In addition to the casualties they had already taken, another 7 Marines were killed, and another 31 were wounded.

By late afternoon, Echo Company and Command Group A managed to break through the enemy gauntlet. Two squads of Echo Company could not move due to intense enemy fire that had killed 2 Marines and wounded 9 others. Other companies of 2/9 were unable to move, pinned down by enemy fire and with too many casualties.

The enemy pummeled Con Thien with rockets, artillery & mortar fire

Hotel Company, commanded by Captain Frank Southard, pulled back to join with Company F. The two squads from Echo joined them, as did two squads from Golf Company. The remainder of Golf Company, bringing up the rear had successfully fought off the NVA during the day, but found themselves separated from the main body by 1000 meters.

Mike Company, 3d Battalion, 4th Marines moved back up the road to defensive perimeter. In the morning, meeting no resistance, they were able to link up with the remainder of 2/9. Once again, the NVA had disappeared into the jungle.

Helicopters began evacuating the wounded and the dead. The After Action Report submitted by 2/9 clearly states, "It is believed the mission of the enemy force was to isolate the battalion, separate the column and then destroy-as an initial phase in the long sought after victory over the forward Marine outpost at Con Thien. His concept of operation was to conduct ambushes at several strong points, utilizing terrain features to his advantage, At these the enemy had pre-registered mortar concentrations. In all cases the strongpoints were covered by intense automatic weapons fire."

Ina three day period, 2d Battalion, 9th Marines had suffered the loss of 23 killed in action and 191 wounded. Those Marines who survived returned to the "Leatherneck Square" area harboring feelings of bitterness and betrayal.

Throughout August, the battalion operated in "Leatherneck Square," a free-fire zone bordered by Con Thien and Gio Linh to the north and Dong Ha and Cam Lo to the south. It was a relatively quiet time for the battalion. However, by September, enemy activity began to intensify around Con Thien. Said UPI photojournalist David Powell, "When I think of Con Thien, I get a knot in my stomach and I feel echoes of the fear I felt. God, it could be terrifying."

On the morning of 12 September, 2/9 was awakened by a barrage of 82mm mortar fire. Several Marines were wounded. As the helicopters arrived to medevac the wounded, the battalion was subjected to second barrage. Both the commanding officer, LtCol William D. Kent and his executive officer were wounded.

By 15 September, the battalion moved to some 2000 meters south of Con Thien, closer to the main supply route. Pounded by enemy fire, the Marines also endured heavy rains. Said Lance Corporal Jack Hartzel, "I don't remember a day in which we didn't get hit with incoming rounds of some sort. We also suffered something that was almost unheard of elsewhere inSouth Vietnam. It was called "shell shock" and it was not unusual. The constant pounding every day could make you do nuts. You would sit there on edge, wondering if the next round that came in would have your name on it. We were in holes in the mud. Our holes would fill with water; we'd have to bail them out four or five times a day. We also had immersion foot and your feet would bleed and hurt like hell. Then there was the damned mud! You walked in it, you sat in it, you slept in it and you even ate it. There was just no escaping it." Enemy fire was so heavy, so constant, that the Marines of 2/9 was not regularly resupplied. Over the course of nine days, Con Thien was hit with more than thousand rounds of artillery fire, rockets and mortars. At one point they were forced to scrounge in their own trash pits for something to eat.

Throughout September, the enemy kept up the pressure and Marine casualties mounted. Con Thien averaged 50 wounded and 2 Marines killed by incoming every day. 2/9, now operating outside the wire, was taking almost as many casualties.

On the morning of 25 September, at 0715, Con

Thien was pummeled by hundreds of rockets, mortars, artillery rounds and recoilless rifle fire. 122mm rockets landed in the midst of 2/9. Said LCpl Hartzel, "The thing I remember about September 25 that really sticks in my mind is a picture of a Marine sitting in a puddle of blood and battle dressings on a poncho with his legs blown off from the waist down. He was numb from morphine and in shock from loss of blood. He was smoking a cigarette very calmly as if nothing has even happened. He was waiting for a medevac. He probably died on the shopper ride back...Our platoon arrived at Con Thien with 45 men. When we left we only had twelve. Now you wonder why we called it "The Meatgrinder!"

The following day, 2/9 was pulled out of Con Thien after two months in the field as part of Operation Kingfisher.

Late fall would find the battalion embroiled in Operation Kentucky, and once again, caught in a fierce daylong battle near Gia Binh, were they had faced the enemy in May.

It had, indeed, been a hell of a year for the 2d Battalion, 9th Marines. The coming year would prove just as difficult, if not more. The battalion would see action in Operation Scotland, the defense of Khe Sanh Combat Base. They would also see action near The Rockpile and Vandegrift Combat Base.

There is no doubt that those Marines who served in 2d Battalion, 9th Marines were extraordinary. Those who survived lived together, fought together, and all-too-often bled together. I find myself reminded of the Saint Crispin's Day speech in Henry V:"From this day to the ending of the world, But we in it shall be remembered; We few, we happy few, we band of brothers; For he to-day that sheds his blood with me Shall be my brother;"

Let us remember those who served with 2/9. Let us remember their hardships and their sacrifices. And rest assured, they will not be forgotten.

NEW YEAR'S EVE 1967

By Dennis Mannion

So, Kilo has been on 861 for almost a week since our arrival on 26Dec67, and there has been a long-range patrol (over 3000 meters, reinforced platoon) and a short-range patrol (smaller sized and less than 800 meters) every day starting on the 27th. As the FO team, my RTO Dave Kron and I go on all the long-range ones, and New Years Eve day was no exception. Instead of west or north, we go south this time over to the 689 ridge line and back.

31Dec67 starts out sunny, partially cloudy, and surprisingly cool, and as we slog south through the elephant grass, Dave and I occasionally smile to each other. Man, do we have a New Years Eve feast planned for that night. Back in our above-ground bunker, we've set aside the last of our home-packaged Christmas goodies as well as "select" C-ration items. As soon as this F'in patrol is over, we can bring 1967 to a festive conclusion and ring in 1968.

By mid-morn we are across Hill 700 heading downhill towards 689 (photo), but by noon the sunlight & heat is intense and the humidity rising up from the wet leaves and grass is taking its toll on everyone. We're almost to our objective -- a small hill just in front of 689 -- when the column, now in almost triple-canopy jungle, just seems to stop. "FO up" is passed down the line, and Dave and I push past exhausted, sweat-stained, filthy Marines as we struggle to keep our footing in the soft ooze of the the of the jungle floor. We reach the CP group and the Lt. in charge ask me if I know exactly where we were. (Kilo had some flat out, terrific LT's but this individual seemed to be the weakest and the least unsure).

I told him that I had a good idea, but that without getting onto some high ground and better visibility, I could not be sure. The only other solution was to conduct a fire mission using illumination rounds and adjust the parachute flare to pop overhead. Then have C/1/13 tell us where the target grid coordinates were plotted. I was told to give that a try as the patrol was NOT going any further. It took a bit of adjusting, but Charlie Battery gave us a good reading on our location. As we progressed back to the north and northwest -- you do not want to retrace your steps at all -- it became clear to me that we were not making significant progress and that we were using up a lot of precious sunlight. Two or three times we stopped for many minutes at a time, and at one point in late afternoon I was again ordered to the front of the column. A Staff Sergeant now seemed to be in charge, and he asked me to speak on the radio with Kilo's CO back on 861. I was told in no uncertain terms to help the E-6 get us back "home." It was a long, drawn out afternoon as we pushed our way back towards 861. The shadows got longer and we were still 1200 meters out. Going faster -- uphill all the way -- was simply not going to work. Back on 861, Captain Jasper had to make a decision: Leave us out all night in a defensive 360 or fire illumination to light our way back. He opted for illum.

By 8:30 p.m. -- I know that's 2030hrs -- we were on the approach in near darkness to the ridge line 500 meters to the west of 861....still an hour away from relative safety. Despite the real danger of highlighting us for the NVA, the 60mm & 81mm mortar guys began to fire round after round of illumination. We scrambled, clawed, and staggered across the western ridge, but it was never a full-out sprint as there was the constant danger of leaving Marines behind in the dark. Illum is tricky in that it lights your way, but the flares swinging beneath their parachutes make the ground seem to sway and pitch like being on a ship. Very disorienting to say the least.

It was less than 2 hours before 1968 when Dave and I got thru the gate in our protective wire, and it was closer to midnight before we concluded our debrief at the CP bunker. We only had 15 minutes to celebrate the end of 1967, and there was no time, energy, or desire for food or festivities. We shed our 782 gear, and exhausted beyond all measure, wrapped ourselves in poncho liners, clicked our canteens together and wished each other Happy New Year. It was still 1967 when I was fast asleep.

At the point in the jungle near 689 when we turned back for 861.HAPPY NEW YEAR to all.

REPLIES:

NEW YEARS EVE 1967

I always thought you guys up front were lost when we left the gate. 3rd platoon weapons was always bringing up the a rear. We called those leading a lot of names that day and they wasn't nice.

HAPPY NEW YEAR. Posted on December 31, 2014 at 11:41:24 PM by Edgar J. Mickelson

Posted on December 31, 2014 at 08:17:35 PM by Doc Jim Thomas

Still the early days for me! Bunker building, listening to every story from OLD SALT Corpsman! Thoughts of what the year held for me! No way of knowing the treasures of experiences I would go through, nor knowing what GREAT Friendships would happen because of Khe Sanh! But here we are, just a few hours away from a New Year, and I'm able to look back and honestly be thankful that I met you guys! So HAPPY NEW YEAR to the most wonderful Guys on Earth!

GOVERNING RULES FOR OPERATIONS OF THE KHE SANH VETERANS, INC. SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION:

1. The purpose of the Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. Scholarship Foundation (KSVSF) is to provide financial aid to high school graduates who plan to attend an accredited institution as a full time student OR who are currently enrolled full time in an accredited post-secondary curriculum.

2. Scholarships will be awarded to applicant students who have at least one parent, legal guardian, or grandparent who is a paid member in good standing of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., a 501(c)(19) charitable organization.

3. IT IS THE RESPONSIBILITY OF THE STUDENT TO SEE THAT THE SCHOLARSHIP APPLICATION REQUIREMENTS ARE FULLY COMPLETED AND SENT DIRECTLY TO THE SCHOLARSHIP CHAIR BEFORE 5/1/2015 AT THE ADDRESS BELOW;

Mr. Dan Fisher
KSVSF Committee Chairman
6050 52nd St. North
Oakdale, -1MN 55128317

CRITERIA FOR SELECTION

Applicants must be the legal child or grandchild of a paid up member of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. (See member definition in the KSV Association bylaws.) This includes deceased, life members of KSV and those Khe Sanh Veterans listed as KIA/MIA in Vietnam if family members are paid up, associate members of KSV, Inc. Children or grandchildren of KSV associate members are not eligible.

Information provided by each candidate on the attached application forms will focus on the following qualities considered for selection to KSVSF financial aid: good grades, character, citizenship, leadership experience and personal essay. A point selection system is included in the application forms.
Examples of these above mentioned qualities could be in the classroom, in extracurricular activities or in service to the community, church or nation.

A Scholarship Foundation Review Committee will serve the President of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., and will accept, review and grade each correctly completed application. This committee will provide a scholarship financial report and short summaries of the selected candidates at the annual KSV reunion for publication in the "Red Clay" Newsletter.

SCHOLARSHIP AWARDS

The amount of financial award per applicant will be determined by the Review Committee's scoring results. The awards will be granted for a maximum of 4 years per student. A new application will be required for each continuous year applied.

Achievement Award Levels are:

The Col. David E. Lownds Award – for top achievement in Application Review (one award or tie)
The Sgt. Major James T. Gaynor Award – for high achievement in Application Review (5 awards)
The Col. William H. Dabney Award – for honorable achievement in Application Review (6 awards)

2. The KSV Scholarship money will be awarded upon presentation of proof of registration for the appropriate term. Proof of registration should be sent to the chairman's address on page one of this application.

Scholarship Guidelines and Purpose

1. The financial award is to be used to help defray costs of tuition, fees and books at an accredited institution of the applicant's choice as a full time student.

2. If a recipient of the KSVSF scholarship does not enter a post high school institution during the next school year, the award for his/her benefit shall be cancelled and the money awarded to an alternate applicant. An alternate of each scholarship award is to be chosen at the time of selection of recipients.

3. The KSVSF Committee Chair and the Treasurer of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., will send a check for the full years' award amount to the selected students upon final approval by the KSV President.

4. The recipient of a scholarship shall be notified no later than the end of the month of August of the coming school year.

5. Scholarship Applications must be received by the Committee Chair on or before MAY 1 of the school year applied for.  (This is an important, NEW change to previous years)**

6. KSV, Inc. Scholarship recipients must agree to maintain a standard of personal performance both in and out of school that conforms to the moral standards set down by Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., members.

7. Criteria: Point Selection System /Maximum of 100 regular points or 115 with bonus points

a. Scholastic achievement / grade point average. Max = 40 points max. (Please attach last school GPA transcript) example below:

A GPA of 4.0 x 10 = 40 points or a GPA of 3.0 x 10 = 30 points

b. Extracurricular activities. Max = 30 points total

Description of personal experience in the following type of activities (Be specific!);

Student government = 10 points max.
Community related services = 10 points max.
Other (i.e. work experience, sports) = 10 points max.

c. KSV SCHOLARHIP ESSAY (250 words min. to 400 words max) on educational goals, career goals = 30 points max.

Over decades countless adjectives have tried to describe Khe Sanh Veterans and their historic accomplishments. Please review the six suggested adjectives below, select one or more that might relate to you in some manner to explain how this is evident in your life's experiences and will help you in meeting your educational and career goals.

TENACIOUS FAITHFUL UNDAUNTED STEADFAST RESOLUTE INNOVATIVE

d. Bonus Points = 10 bonus points for being a military veteran
= 5 bonus points for an accredited college GPA (Grade Point Average) transcript

WHY MEN WHO HAVE BEEN TO WAR YEARN TO REUNITE

I NOW KNOW WHY MEN WHO HAVE BEEN TO WAR YEARN TO REUNITE. NOT TO TELL STORIES OR LOOK AT OLD PICTURES. NOT TO WEEP OR LAUGH.

COMRADES GATHER BECAUSE THEY LONG TO BE WITH THE PEOPLE WHO ONCE ACTED THEIR BEST; WHO ONCE SUFFERED AND SACRIFICED, WHO WERE STRIPPED OF THEIR HUMANITY.

I DID NOT PICK THESE MEN, THEY WERE DELIVERED BY FATE AND THE MILITARY. BUT I KNOW THEM IN A WAY I KNOW NO OTHER MEN. I HAVE NEVER GIVEN ANYONE SUCH TRUST.

THEY WERE WILLING TO GUARD SOMETHING MORE PRECIOUS THAN MY LIFE. THEY WOULD HAVE CARRIED MY REPUTATION... THE MEMORY OF ME.

IT WAS PART OF THE BARGAIN WE ALL MADE, THE REASON WE WERE ALL WILLING TO DIE FOR ONE ANOTHER. AS LONG AS I HAVE MEMORY, I WILL THINK OF THEM ALL, EVERY DAY.

I AM SURE THAT WHEN I LEAVE THIS WORLD, MY LAST THOUGHTS WILL BE OF MY FAMILY, AND MY COMRADES.

SUCH GOOD MEN!

GROUP OF VIETNAM VETERANS RECEIVE LONG OVERDUE RECOGNITION

WASHINGTON, D.C. - Thanks in-part to a loyal colleague and US Senator Bill Nelson (D-FL), a group of veterans will receive long-overdue recognition Thursday night for their actions during the Vietnam War.

Fifteen veterans will be honored with a total of 33 awards, including Silver Stars, Distinguished Flying Crosses, Bronze Stars, Army Commendation Medals and more. Three of the veterans are from Florida.

Many in the group were on-hand at the Special Operations Association's Reunion Banquet in Las Vegas to receive the awards in-person.

The veterans served in the U.S. Military Assistance Command Vietnam Studies and Observations Group (MACV-SOG), which was a highly classified, multi-service special forces unit which conducted covert operations in South Vietnam, North Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia. Members of the group conducted reconnaissance missions, captured enemy prisoners, rescued downed pilots and conducted rescue operations to retrieve allied prisoners during the war.

MACV-SOG was not a publicly recognized unit until 2000, when the entire unit received the Presidential Unit Citation - the highest award a military unit can receive.

The group took part in some of the most noteworthy campaigns of Vietnam, including the Tet Offensive, the Cambodian Campaign and Operation Tiger Head. An eyewitness account from SPC Roger Lockshier describes one harrowing incident during the war when some of the veterans were sent to save a reconnaissance team that had come under heavy fire from North Vietnamese Army troops.

He recalls, "I turned to see if Scott was OK and he pointed to the side of my flight helmet. I reached up to find a large gash in the helmet where a bullet had torn across. I then also noticed how our helicopter had been hit with so many bullets ... both Scott and I had small spattering of blood on our arms and legs where small pieces of shrapnel had apparently hit."

"That day these soldiers risked their lives to save their fellow troops," Nelson said. "They fought, sacrificed and put their lives on the line to protect all the rest of us."

Securing the medals has been a long process for these soldiers and for their colleague, SGT Richard Crawford of Lakeland, a former member of MACV -SOG. The original awards packets were lost multiple times, and Crawford decided to contact Nelson's office almost four years ago about starting the awards process again. Crawford reassembled information for each veteran and worked with staff members in Nelson's Orlando office to help secure the medals.

Each veteran's name, along with the awards and a short description of their service, is listed below.

SPCS John Smith of Hawthorne, Florida is receiving the Silver Star for gallantry for his actions from November 16-21, 1968. And, he is also receiving a Soldier's Medal for heroism for his actions on June 3, 1968. According to the Army citation for that Soldier's Medal, SPCS Smith "was at Forward Operating Base when a supply convoy arrived. One of the drivers accidentally drove into a friendly unmarked minefield, hitting an M-1S anti-tank mine. The vehicle was almost completely destroyed and the drive was gravely wounded, requiring immediate medical attention. Specialist Five Smith quickly responded to the accident, and with no regard for his own personal safety began clearing undetonated mines in order to make a path to the wounded driver." He is also receiving another Soldier's medal for heroism for his actions on October 30, 1968, a Bronze Star and an Army Commendation Medal.

SFC Preston Mills of Colorado is receiving a Silver Star for gallantry for his actions on March 5, 1969. According to the Army citation, SFC Mills pushed back "multiple enemy attacks on (his element's) defensive position, which was protecting an extraction landing zone for friendly helicopters. Sergeant First Class Mills repeatedly exposed himself to intense enemy fire in order to assist with the evacuation of his fellow Soldiers. Despite being injured multiple times, he refused medical treatment and continued to help direct incoming aircraft to the landing zone and load other Soldiers onto the helicopters." He is also receiving a Bronze Star.

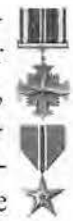
SPC4 Robert Donoghue of Massachusetts is receiving a Silver Star for gallantry for is actions on October 3-4, 1968. According to the Army citation, SPC4 Donoghue, as part of a medical evacuation of wounded soldiers, "rappelled down from (his) helicopter to the wounded Soldiers. He tied a wounded Soldier to himself, and ignoring the heavy enemy fire, climbed the same rope he rappelled with, back to the aircraft. He then rappelled back into the firefight in order to lead the unit to a landing zone from which the wounded could be evacuated." He is also receiving a Bronze Star.

CW02 James Wittman (deceased) is receiving the Silver Star for gallantry for his actions on September 28, 1968. His son Matthew Wittman of Minnesota will be receiving the award on his father's behalf. According to the Army citation, CW02 Wittman "was assisting in the extraction of a reconnaissance team that was in danger of being overwhelmed by a large enemy force. He repeatedly placed his aircraft in a position to protect the extraction helicopter from the heavy automatic weapons fire, allowing other Soldiers to be successfully extracted." He is also receiving a Bronze Star.

SPC J.S. "Scott" De Arman of Arizona is receiving a Distinguished Flying Cross for heroism for his actions on September 28, 1968. According to the Army citation, SPC De Arman "placed the gunship as a physical barrier between the landing zone and devastating enemy fire. Without regard for his own personal safety, Specialist De Arman exposed himself to provide the covering fire. He continued to provide accurate covering fire, slowing the enemy advance. His suppressing fire allowed for the successful extraction of the special operations recon team." He is also receiving a Bronze Star.



SPC Roger Lockshier of Connecticut is receiving a Distinguished Flying Cross for heroism for his actions on September 28, 1968. According to the Army citation, Specialist Lockshier was supporting the extraction of a reconnaissance team when he "exposed himself to provide covering fire. He continued to provide accurate covering fire, even after taking a hit to his flight helmet. His suppressing fire allowed for the successful extraction oft he special operations recon team. He kept firing upon the enemy, even after the helicopter was hit with an anti-aircraft round and began to crash. After the crash, Specialist Lockshier ignored his wounds and began destroying all sensitive material before establishing a perimeter and defending against the advancing enemy. His fire slowed the enemy, allowing crew members time to utilize extraction rings and escape." He is also receiving a Bronze Star.

(SGT Louis DeSeta KSV) of Delaware is receiving a Bronze Star for valor for his actions on June 6-7, 1968. Sergeant DeSeta was serving as the Assistant Leader of a Long Range Reconnaissance Team and displayed exemplary leadership by effectively directing his team during an intense firefight. He exposed himself to the enemy fire and successfully counter-attacked the enemy force. Sergeant DeSeta continued to engage the enemy, keeping them from reaching the team's extraction zone. His actions prevented a dire situation from deteriorating further." He is also receiving a Bronze Star with Oak Leaf cluster and an Army Commendation Medal.

The following soldiers are receiving Bronze Stars for their service as part of MACV-SOG. According to the Army citations, each soldier is receiving the Bronze Star for ensuring "that a multitude of critical special operations missions over the time period were executed effectively and efficiently."

On 22 May 2014, retired Special Forces Master Sergeant, and former Marine, Patrick N. Watkins, was awarded the Distinguished Service Cross, 46 years after his valorous actions. Put in for this prestigious award, second only to the Medal of Honor, for his extremely valorous actions while serving with MACVSOG, and during a massive NVA assault overrunning FOB-4, Da Nang in 1968, the paperwork for this award was lost. So viscous was the attack the night and early morning of 22-23 August, 1968, that 18 Special Forces warriors were killed in the attack and over 30 wounded, including Watkins.

The paperwork and time limit waiver legislation for his DSC was assembled by a group of fellow Veterans and with the assistance of Senator Nelson's office of Florida, the DSC was finally put through and presented to MSG Watkins.

In a spectacular ceremony carried out by the 7th SFG(A) at their compound at Eglin AFB Florida, near where MSG Watkins family resides, his actions were formally recognized and the DSC presented. The 7th SFG(A) graciously hosted MSG Watkins, Veterans of the action and MACVSOG, and friends and family, at the 7th Group Chapel. The 7th Group also conducted a tour for the Veterans and a pre-ceremony reception was hosted by their Family Readiness Group. After the ceremony, a post reception gathering was held with family, friends, and veterans at the Magnolia Grill in Fort Walton Beach.

MSG Watkins has spent a lifetime in service to his Nation. Born in Michigan in 1938, his mother and his aunt at an early age instilled a dedicated sense of duty in him which would carry through for the rest of his life and show in his deeds and actions. In High School, Pat played football, basketball, and ran. MSG Watkins found his excellence in running, but rather than accept a track scholarship in 1957, he chose to do his duty to his country and enlisted in the United States Marine Corp.

In the Marines, Pat Watkins was deployed to Lebanon with operation "Blue Bat", and then at Guantanamo Bay during the Cuban Missile Crisis, It was also in the Marines that MSG Watkins would meet his wife Carol, also a Marine. After Seven years in the Marine Corp, trying to figure out how to proceed with the rest of his life and working for his newlywed wife Carol's father, with a newborn daughter, Pat chose to do something he had always longed to do. He enlisted with the United States Army Special Forces, to don the Green Beret.

Initially though in the Army, Pat served with the 82nd Airborne with Operation "Power Pack" in the Dominican Republic, then later was accepted into Special Forces. By 1967, Pat Watkins had volunteered for the clandestine unit, MACV SOG, Military Assistance Command, Vietnam, Studies and Observations Group. MACVSOG conducted ultra-classified cross-border operations into Laos, Cambodia, Thailand, and North Vietnam, in addition to operations in South Vietnam. Casualties in this unit were extremely high, often exceeding 100% where every member was wounded at least once and still fighting. Never has a unit taken such massive casualties as MACVSOG on a regular basis, and kept fighting, since the American Civil War. Of the 16 men Pat went to Vietnam with, only seven survived. Publicly MACVSOG operations were completely denied, and would remain secret until the mid-1990s. Unfortunately this led to many missing cases of proper recognition for the courage and bravery of the men of MACVSOG.

MSG Watkins courageously served three tours, 27 months, in Southeast Asia. He was awarded three Bronze Stars for Valor, two Bronze Stars for Merit, Two Purple Hearts, two Army Commendation Medals, and four Air Medals. Each of the Air Medals requiring 50 combat flights. Pat Watkins is very well noted for his exceptional skills as a "covey rider" and coordinating air to ground assets to keep his fellow warriors alive on the ground, as well as running and leading many cross-border ground operations himself.

Then Staff Sergeant Pat Watkins, on the night and early morning hours of 22-23 August, 1968, while at FOB-4, Da Nang, Republic of Vietnam, attending a NCO board, valiantly and courageously held off a surprise attack of highly trained North Vietnamese Sappers that had overrun the compound. He fought them courageously and sought out the wounded and those unable to defend themselves. At one point SSG Watkins, shielded a fellow wounded soldier from a grenade blast and with no regard to his own safety courageously engaged the attacking enemy with nothing more than his pistol. SFC Watkins rallied the men in the defense of FOB-4 to beat back and defeat their attackers. 18 Special Forces warriors were killed that night, but if not for the actions of SSG Watkins, the toll would have been severely greater.

MSG Watkins retired from the military in 1981. He spent his final years in the military teaching survival and land navigation skills to ROTC cadets at the University of Utah. From retirement he worked as equipment manager for the university Athletics, a technical writer for Hercules Company, and as a safety Manager for the Department of Veterans Affairs. MSG Watkins after many years of war and service to his Nation now peacefully resides in Utah.

CITATION

The President of the United States of America, authorized by Act of Congress July 9, 1918, takes pleasure in presenting the Distinguished Service Cross to Staff Sergeant Patrick N. Watkins, Jr., United States Army, for extraordinary heroism in connection with military operations involving conflict with an armed enemy in the Republic of Vietnam, while serving with Headquarters and Headquarters Company, Command and Control North, 5th Special Forces Group (Airborne), 1st Special Forces. Staff Sergeant Watkins distinguished himself by exceptionally valorous actions in the early morning hours of 23August 1968, while at Headquarters, Command and Control North when the compound was attacked by a North Vietnamese Army sapper force in a well-coordinated assault. Despite being wounded in the initial assault, Staff Sergeant Watkins quickly organized a small reaction force to repel the attack and rescue wounded Americans while leading them to a defensive position through a gauntlet of machine gun fire and grenades. Staff Sergeant Watkins disregarded his own safety to direct the recovery of the many wounded men and repeatedly engaged and killed enemy sappers. Despite receiving several more wounds from grenade shrapnel, Staff Sergeant Watkins repeatedly repelled numerous sappers as he continued the search for the wounded. He refused medical aid and on one occasion fiercely charged an onrushing North Vietnamese Army sniper, killing him and preventing the sniper's continuing infliction of numerous friendly casualties. His actions inspired his men to greater heights to defeat the enemy and successfully defend the compound. Staff Sergeant Watkins' extraordinary heroism and devotion to duty were in keeping with the highest traditions of the military service and reflect great credit upon himself, his unit and the United States Army.

JOSEPH P. AMODEO SR. USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN, HOTEL CO 2/26

Joseph P. Amodeo Sr., age 66, passed away on Jan 25th at home in Newport, Oregon. Joe was predeceased by his parents, Adala and Ralph Sr. He was born Jan 13th, 1949, in Des Moines, graduating from St Anthony and Dowling High Schools. After high school, he enlisted in the US Marines and served two tours in Vietnam, most notably at the heroic and famous 1968 defense of our base at Khe Sanh. After military service, he resided in the Chicago, Il metro area, where he had a successful career in packaging industry marketing. Joe's legacy includes three fine sons, Joe Jr., Lou and Cody, all of Chicago. Also, he is survived by three brothers, Jim of Gainesville, VA, John, Ralph, Jr., and sister, Elaine Ragan, and spouses, all of Des Moines, plus many nieces, nephews and cousins. Joe leaves behind a nationwide contingent of friends and associates, notably many fellow Vietnam Marines.

WEB BRIEFS
March 30, 1968
By Ron Shouse
B Btry 1/13

It was close to sunup and there was still a little foggy. My crew was at the gun pit right near what was left of the ammo dump. I looked up and observed a group of grunts route stepping by us. They headed straight through the position toward what was left of the four holer and zig zagged out of the wire. They could not have been out of the wire more than 10 minutes and all HELL broke loose.

By this time the sun was up and we could observe what was going on. I could see our guys shooting like they were shooting at a rabbit. We inside the wire could tell they were in trouble. We had our rifles ready but were told not to fire because our guys were so close. Either the Gunny or an officer yelled at me and asked how low I could get my tube to help these guys out.

I ran back to my pit and could get an elevation of 60. They gave us a mission of HE, charge 1 or 2 at an elevation of 60, just enough to get it over the squad's head to try to get the gooks on the run. Then they increased the elevation so that we could keep them on the run. Do not remember how long we fired but in the middle of all of this, either the Gunny or the Lt came and told me to get my ####, my time was up and I was out of there. Everything is fuzzy until I got on the Chopper but I will never forget seeing these guys on the ground in one Hell of a fight just so I could get out of that place.

Every year on the 30th of March I always drink several shots of Jack Daniels and thank these guys for what they did for me. I still hold the Silver Star that was awarded to Wayne Morrison that day, he told me that he did not remember performing the actions they said he did. For that reason he did not want to keep it. I have attempted to leave it at the WALL several times. But the men who know him best, asked me to hang on to it. In case his family should want it at a later date. Semper Fi Bravo 1/26 and may God Bless .Ron Shouse

Semper Fi

I have read Ron's very moving recall account of March 30th. Now 47 years passed, one would think memories and emotions for all who experienced this horrific battle would fade, however as Ron's post clearly shows, as time passes those events have become vivid and painful recollections. In understandable circumstances faces and names have faded, but their gallantry and sacrifice will forever be remembered

ANNUAL CHICO CA MINI REUNION REMEMBERING START OF KHE SANH SIEGE 21 JAN 1968
By Craig Tourte

Another wonderful January 21, 2015 turnout to honor not only those who served at the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh but also a special time to honor all who have and are currently serving and especially to remember those we lost. There were few speeches, no pseudo dignitaries of any significance, no special guests or self-congratulatory politicos. All were honored and we appreciated those in the local communities who took the time to come in and just say hello. Once again a special thanks to Tom Horchler, David Tonick, Steve Wiese, Marco Soto, Ken "Buzz" Sawyer, Daniel Ferguson, Bob Singleton and the many other on base Khe Sanh Veterans who paid their respects, sorry but I just can't list you all.

I know many others would have liked to have been able to join us but sometimes unforeseen circumstances and events do not allow attendance. We are grateful for the telephone call we received from Chuck Chamberlin and our condolences go out to him for the recent loss of his mother. I mentioned Tom Horchler already but he is the inspiration and driving force behind this event each year. I wanted to give a special thanks to Dianne Jackson who joined us after a difficult two hour drive by herself in the dense fog only to have to drive back home to start her 12 hour shift as a hospital nurse. Dianne delivered some home baked goods which we all enjoyed and so much appreciated. Dianne continues to be a devoted member of our Khe Sanh family and there are just insufficient words to descript our appreciation of her support.

LONG OVERDUE RECOGNITION FOR GREEN BERET

Mission Hill Gazette
December 14,2012
By Maurice "Mossy" Martin

On Aug. 23, 1968, Mission Hill's Joe Conlon, a Green Beret assigned to the 5th Special Forces Group, was stationed at headquarters at Marble Mountain in the Republic of Vietnam. Shortly after midnight, Conlon heard several explosions and realized the enemy was inside the compound. A first lieutenant lay on the floor, injured by a grenade. Conlon jumped on the lieutenant to protect him and moved him to safety. Conlon and SFG member Patrick Watkins secured the entrance, but they were wounded by another grenade.

Conlon, although bleeding and with debris from a collapsed ceiling on him, fearlessly carried a badly wounded soldier through enemy snipers. Conlon eventually found a Navy corpsman who was driving a jeep and transporting the wounded to the dispensary. Conlon returned to headquarters several times, moving more injured soldiers to medical treatment. He did this while exchanging gunfire with the enemy.

Seventeen American soldiers lost their lives on that dark day, and many more were wounded. Because of Conlon's gallant actions, countless more American casualties were prevented.

For his devotion and bravery, Staff Sgt. Joe Conlon was awarded the Silver Star Medal at a ceremony on Oct. 25, 2012 at the Orleans Hotel in Las Vegas. The 5th Special Forces Group was highly secretive, and after the Vietnam War, paperwork was lost, hence the long delay in the award. The 5th Special Forces Group did receive a Presidential Unit Citation in 2003.

Conlon graduated from Mission High School in May of 1960. Four days later, he was in Parris Island, having joined the Marines. Joe served for 24 years in military service. After retiring from the military, Joe worked for General Electric in Lynn. He has a lovely daughter, Christine Shoemaker, who I enjoyed conversing with a Joe's celebration party Nov. 10 at McGarvey's Tavern in Manchester, N.H., where Joe resides.

Joe, incidentally, was a fierce defensive end on Mission High's football team who played in the epic 22-18 upset win against Matignon High at Matignon in 1959. Matignon had two future NFL players, including quarterback Jack Concannon. The game ended with a Matignon ball carrier attempting to cross the goal line, only to be tackled by Richie O'Neill and Dougie Blades at the 1-yard line.

Mission's quarterback in that memorable game was Mike Mangiacotti, a brilliant signal-caller. The coach of that team was Tom "Bubba" Clarke, a 1953 Mission High graduate who later was an All-American running back at Northeastern University.

AWARDEE HONORS OTHERS WITH PARTY

By Shawne K. Wickham
New Hampshire Sunday News 11 Nov 2012

A pint of beer and a shot of whiskey sat untouched at McGarvey's Saloon. Nearby stood a photo of a tall, handsome American surrounded by South Vietnamese soldiers, and a Silver Star rested in a velvet case.

Joseph Conlon, a Vietnam War veteran of the Army's 5th Special Forces Group, threw himself a party Saturday. And for a few hours, there was no better place to be on this Veterans Day weekend.

An Irish balladeer was singing, and American flags and red, white and blue balloons adorned the tables. A stream of friends poured in to congratulate Conlon on receiving the Silver Star, long overdue. As Conlon's daughter, Chris Shoemaker of Shirley, Mass., hugged her father, he told her, "I wish your mom was here, and your grandma." "They are, in spirit," she replied.

The citation accompanying Conlon's Silver Star describes his "gallantry in action" at a forward operating base in Danang on Aug. 23 and 24, 1968.

The base came under attack that first night, and one of his comrades was injured in the initial assault. "Staff Sgt. Conlon immediately administered first aid and shielded him with his own body as an explosion and fireball blasted out from a nearby building," it reads.

After stabilizing his badly injured comrade, Conlon prevented the attacking forces from getting inside, then "exposed himself to direct enemy fire as he fought his way outside to rescue soldiers while delivering highly accurate fire on the enemy." The fight continued into the next morning. The citation notes that Conlon's actions "saved countless lives."

The injured soldier that night was a medic named Jim Scurry, Conlon said in an interview, "He was defenseless. I wasn't," he said, tears coming to his eyes. "I wasn't going to let them hurt him anymore, so I jumped on his body."

For a very long time, Conlon said, Special Forces veterans didn't receive medals or other recognition; it was the nature of the work they did. "We had to sign security documents," he explained. "I didn't exist." Back then, he reminded, "there were no Americans in Laos or Cambodia."

His unit was called a "studies and observation group," he said with a wry grin. "We were 'studying and observing' in Laos, Cambodia and North Vietnam. That's what we did." In 2000, 25 years after the war ended, Conlon's unit received a Presidential Unit Citation from the Army. The individual medals have followed, slowly.

Conlon took the microphone from singer Marty Quirk to thank his friends for coming to celebrate with him. His hair is white now, and he's gained a few pounds compared with that young soldier in the photo, but the 70-year-old's spine was straight as he donned his dark-blue dress uniform jacket, glittering with medals.

Conlon told his friends the medals soldiers receive are not their own. "We just keep track of them. I have mine framed, I hang them up on my walls, and I remember who was with me that night." "We lost 17 United States Army Special Forces soldiers that night," he said, struggling to maintain his composure.
He motioned to the untouched glasses of spirits on the counter. "That's why that's there," he said. "That's their drink."

Some of Conlon's closest friends were on hand for the occasion, including Bill Blankenburg of Townsend, Mass., another Special Operations veteran, and Donna and Paul Silver of Raymond, both Vietnam vets. John O'Keefe, who owns the bar with Bob Scribner, said when Conlon asked him about having the party there, he told him, "I'll throw a bash for you like you've never seen."

Every year, Conlon attends a reunion of the Special Operations Association. That's where he catches up with former members of his unit, including Jim Scurry, the medic who survived that long-ago night assault. At this year's event, held last month in Las Vegas, he was presented his Silver Star.

But it's a long-standing tradition to celebrate afterward at a bar, Conlon noted. And he wanted his celebration to be here in Manchester.

"These are all my friends," he said, looking around fondly. "These are the people that care about me."

DAYS ON MARBLE MOUNTAIN AN ACCOUNT OF SPECIAL FORCES HEROISM 21-26 AUGUST, 1968, REPUBLIC OF VIETNAM

By Neil R. Thorne, MACVSOG
Historical Researcher

On August 21st, 1968, Military Assistance Command Vietnam-Studies and Observations Group (MACVSOG), Spike Team Rattler, was assigned to occupy a listening and observation post on the side of the steep and rocky Marble Mountain overlooking the Special Forces and Marine compounds around Forward Operating Base 4 (FOB-4), Republic of Vietnam. Spike Team (ST) Rattler consisted of two American Special Forces Sergeants, a "One-zero" team leader and "One-one" squad leader Staff Sergeant (SSG) Larry Trimble, with seven Chinese ethnic Nung mercenaries.

ST Rattler stealth fully made its' way up the surreal environment that was Marble mountain, amongst the Buddhist shrines, vast cave networks, and areas known to be infested with enemy snipers. Ascending the steep and rocky mountain the first day, no enemy forces were detected. Ropes were required to make the ascent to the observation post located among the rocks and cliffs overlooking FOB-4 and the South China Sea.

Reaching their assigned post, ST Rattler set up a perimeter and began the mission of enemy detection. From the mountain, ST Rattler overlooked the entire area covering two US Marine outposts below, their own Special Forces compound, and a Marine Amphibious Unit stationed near the South China Sea. The first night and following day were eerily quiet of enemy activity, with none detecting or suspecting the gathering forces of elite North Vietnamese Army Sappers and Vietcong deep inside the Marble Mountain caves below.

The NVA had not overlooked ST Rattler. Enemy forces were soon attempting to ascend the ropes to their observation post. Hearing gunfire from the Nungs guarding the perimeter, SSG Trimble relinquished the radio to his fellow American "one-zero" and rushed to organize the repulse of the assaulting enemy force. While dropping grenades and delivering accurate fire to repel the enemy, a Nung mercenary alerted SSG Trimble to a nearby enemy mortar position firing on the Special Forces FOB-4 Compound. SSG Trimble with precise accuracy used a grenade launcher to silence the enemy mortar that was killing his friends in the Special Forces compound below. Flares were requested and launched over the mountain the remainder of the night to observe for additional enemy positions and personnel.

In the morning light, ST Rattler could see the devastation wrought on the FOB-4 compound below. 18 American Special Forces warriors and over 80 allied indigenous mercenaries were killed that night, with scores more wounded. Though the battle at the compound had ended along with the single deadliest attack on US Special Forces in history, it was far from over for ST Rattler on Marble Mountain, surrounded by an enemy licking its' wounds and regrouping for a second attack. Special Forces Staff Sergeant Patrick N. Watkins, Distinguished Service Cross recipient of the combat at FOB-4, said of SSG Trimble's actions, "Larry was an outstanding Special Forces Soldier and Recon Warrior.

The catastrophic loss of Special Forces personnel that night would have been far worse if not for Staff Sergeant Trimble eliminating the enemy mortar on Marble Mountain." Special Forces Staff Sergeant Joe Conlon, Silver Star recipient of that night's actions at the FOB-4 Compound stated, "Larry kept those mortars from putting effective fire on our camps position. Knocking out those mortars impeded the enemy's intent of destroying our camp and the neighboring US Marine positions."

ST Rattler continued to engage the enemy from inside their own staging area of Marble Mountain. Descending from their post, SSG Trimble and several of the Nung spotted an enemy patrol and gave chase. SSG Trimble led an aggressive assault to take out a second enemy 82mm mortar and capture enemy equipment and documents, as his fellow American "one-zero" gave cover fire from the observation post above.

Ascending back to the post and immediately notifying FOB-4 of their actions and captures, a helicopter was sent to retrieve the enemy equipment and documents. The American "one-zero" team leader boarded the chopper with the enemy property as it hovered and took heavy fire. This left SSG Trimble the only American on the ground and now the acting team leader of ST Rattler in the field. It was determined at FOB-4 that the documents SSG Trimble had captured contained detailed plans of a second attack on the Marine Amphibious Unit, which were thereby thwarted.

Still surrounded on the mountain, the Nung mercenaries decided to leave. Their interpreter informed SSG Trimble of their intent to sneak through the enemy and back to the compound. SSG Trimble refused to abandon his post and the Nung left him alone on the mountain. Soon after the Nung descent, a firefight erupted and they came running back, SSG Trimble gladly accepted their return and new-found agreement to defend the observation post.

ST Rattler was surrounded with no hope of ground escape and the enemy fire was too intense for helicopter extraction. SSG Trimble led the successful repulse of two more NVA attempts to overrun ST Rattler's position that night. One of the Nungs was severely wounded in the enemy assaults and SSG Trimble saved his life by stopping his severe bleeding. Gunships were called to assist in the enemy repulse and fire was brought down danger-close to ST Rattler's position. So close was the fire, the team was peppered by shrapnel, flying rocks, and debris.

By the morning of 24 August, as the team was reorganizing, a relief helicopter was sent to drop supplies to the small beleaguered force. A fellow American Special Forces warrior accompanied the helicopter and attempting to leap onto the ground to assist, was injured beyond ability to walk by the rocky terrain. A Special Forces Hatchet Platoon was dispatched to attempt a breakout of the surrounded ST Rattler but had to retreat after taking casualties from the determined enemy force still holding the mountain. That night a quiet returned.

The next morning, a helicopter was sent for the wounded American and Nungs, it received no fire, and no enemy were spotted. The NVA and Vietcong had dissipated back into the mountains and vegetation as fast as they had come. SSG Trimble and the remnants of RT Rattler held on for another day to ensure the enemy force was gone. On 26 August 1968 SSG Trimble and ST Rattler were uneventfully extracted by helicopter, leaving as quietly as they had arrived.

For six days SSG Trimble and ST Rattler held in the repulse of a vastly superior and completely surrounding enemy force. He was personally responsible for silencing deadly enemy mortars, thereby saving countless lives in the battle below his observation post. When all gave up, SSG Trimble continued to hold his post and engage the enemy.

SSG Trimble in his expert medical training, saved the life of one of his severely wounded men. He expertly guided close air support onto the surrounding foe, further leading to the enemy defeat. SSG Trimble's aggressive and fearless assault of the enemy was responsible for the capture of documents that saved lives by preventing the overrun of the US Marine Amphibious Unit stationed by the South China Sea. For these actions Army SSG Trimble would be awarded the Army Commendation Medal with Valor and treated to a celebration for him and ST Rattler by the United States Marine Corp, an uncommon cross-branch honor. SSG Trimble in his courage, actions, and dedication to duty is a true credit to his Nation, the United States Army, and Special Forces. SSG Trimble would continue to serve his Nation and Military, retiring after 21 years of service.

KSV MEMBER SEEKS HELP IN BUILDING A MEMORIAL TO A KSV MARINE & MEMBERS OF 1/9 WHO WERE KIA ON HILL 64 AT KHE SANH 1968

Tom, My name is Bob Williams My uncle Jerry C. Burkhead was a Marine attached to Alpha Company,1st Battalion Ninth Marines. Junius Jones and Velma Clyde Burkhead's youngest of 12 children was Jerry Clark Burkhead. Jerry was born and raised in Lee Mont, Virginia and graduated from Parksley High School in 1966 on the Eastern Shore.

Rhett Burkhead is only one year younger than his Uncle Jerry Burkhead because Rhett's dad is Jerry's oldest brother, Junius Edwin Burkhead. Rhett and Jerry grew up together, graduated at Parksley High School together, and Rhett remembers his Uncle Jerry well; "He was awesome. Everybody loved him." Soon after graduation Jerry volunteered to join the United States Marine Corps to fight for his country in the Vietnam War.

Cpl Jerry Burkhead was an M-60 machine-gun team leader in Alpha Company 1st Battalion, 9th Marine Regiment in I Corps, the Republic of Vietnam .The men of 1/9, the Walking Dead", were rapidly moved from Camp Evans and flown in by helicopter to the Khe Sanh Combat Base, on 22 January, 68. Their mission was to protect the southern perimeter of the 26th Marines at the KSCB.

The 1st Platoon of A CO 1/9 (reinforced) was assigned a forward defensive position called the Alpha-l outpost. Alpha-l outpost was a small hill nicknamed Hill 64, not due to its elevation rather because of the sixty-two Marines, including Jerry, and two (2) Navy Corpsmen, dug-in at Hill 64 in a defensive position.

Alpha-l outpost elevation. Hill 64 dimensions were 60 meters long by 40 meters wide by 20 meters in height. In other words, Hill 64 was shaped like a football with a perimeter of concertina wire and mines connected by integrated and concentric trenches with bunkers throughout all dug deep and lined with sand bags.

Hill 64 was manned by 64 brave warriors from the youth of America, quite a distance from any friendly forces, and located 600 meters west of the perimeter of 1/9 and a mile from the KSCB.

The North Vietnamese Army was moving past Hill 64 for the attack at the KSCB. They had several Divisions in the immediate area, or staged nearby. The NVA had been ferociously attacking other nearby bases, camps, and hills almost every day for a week prior to the attack on Hill 64, to completely isolate the KSCB.

At 4:15 a.m. on the foggy morning of 08 Feb 68, the battle for Hill 64 began with a barrage of mortars, recoilless rifles, satchel charges, RPG's, automatic weapons, and a determined multi-pronged assault by a reinforced battalion from the lOlD Regiment, 325C NVA Division against the "Walking Dead" platoon on Hill 64. The enemy simultaneously fired hundreds of mortar shells against the perimeter of Alpha Company 1/9 in an attempt to further isolate Hill 64.

The overwhelming attack on the waiting 1st Platoon of A Company 1/9 reinforced Marines on Hill 64 was an example of some of the most brutal combat of the Vietnam War. These tenacious foes were locked in savage trench warfare, often hand-to-hand combat.

The 1st Platoon of Marines from A CO 1/9 (reinforced) held against a numerically superior force on Hill 64. Captain "MAC" Radcliffe bravely led twenty volunteers from the 2nd Platoon A CO 1/9 to relieve his brave Marines on Hill 64, and systematically cleared the Hill.

Cpl Jerry Clark Burkhead was 21 years old as he and his Brother Marines fought for each other, Hill 64, A CO 1/9, the "Walking Dead", the KSCB, I Corps, the RVN, and America with nearly 100% casualties. Sadly, 28 brave Americans were killed in action that foggy morning on 08 Feb 68, during the Battle for Hill 64.

The Battle for Hill 64 was the last all-out attack by the NVA on the KSCB American and Allied Forces during the 77 day siege of the KSCB. All KSCB veterans from 20 January to April 1 1968 received the Presidential Unit Citation for extraordinary heroism in action against the numerically superior NVA forces. Devotion to duty by A CO 1/9 Marines was exemplified during the Battle of Hill 64 08 Feb 68.

MSgt F. King and MGen J.O. Butcher greeted Julius Foster at Camp Lejeune after he walked 404 miles to re-enlist.

MARINE "WHO WALKED FOR WAR" DIES IN BATTLE
February 28, 1968

Raleigh, NC (AP) A young Marine who walked 404 miles in 30 days to attract support for the United States Marines effort in Vietnam, has been killed in the fighting there.

The Marine, Lance Corporal Julius C. (Corky) Foster, 28, walked from his home at Welch, West Virginia, to Camp Lejeune last summer with a 40 pound pack on his back.

A Marine reservist, Foster was going to Lejeune to re-enlist for active duty in hope of being re-assigned to Vietnam.

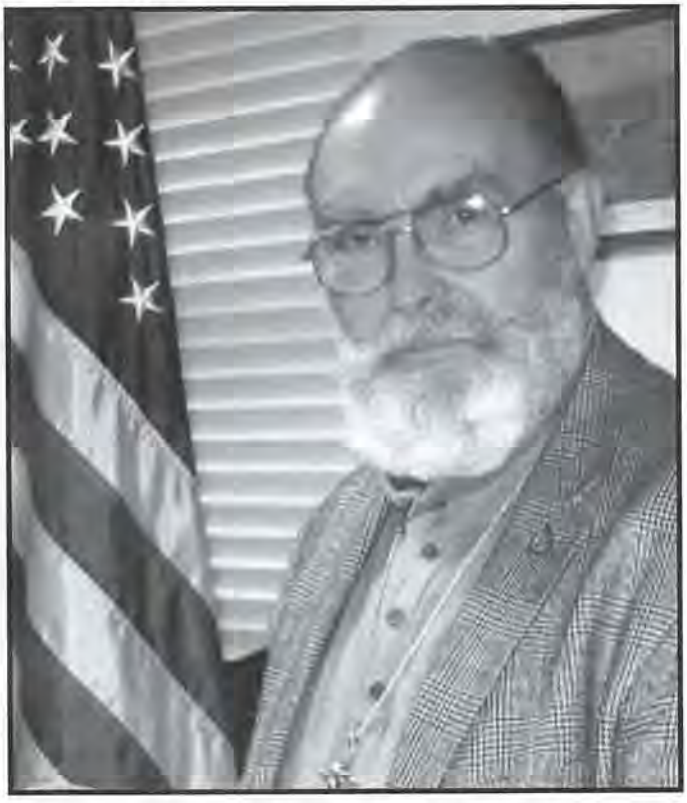
He said he decided to take the hike to "emphasize the effort being made by other Americans. I hope to register the intent of the American people to win the war-not to talk about it or buy it-but to win it."

Word of Foster's death came from Captain Richard Titus, the Marine officer who swore in Foster at Raleigh after he completed his walk to Lejeune.

VIETNAM: MY EXPERIENCE STARS & STRIPES FEB 15, 2015

MGYSGT EDWARD EVANS USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN, HQ BN 2/26, G-3

I arrived at the Khe Sanh combat base on Feb. 3, 1968, on a CH-46, the guest of Maj. Gen. Rathvon McClure Tompkins of the 3rd Marine Division, headquartered at Dong Ha in I Corps. I was the Team Chief of a III MAF G-3 group doing classified historical documentary work under orders. Tompkins' trip to Khe Sanh was my first opportunity to get in there, as every aircraft that landed there brought a rain of mortar and artillery fire to the already embattled base and its inhabitants of the 26th Marine Regiment.



MGYSGT EDWARD M. EVANS "FAST EDDIE"

When the '46 landed, the general was the first off and there to greet him on the Marston matting was David Douglas Duncan. Even in the crashing "krump" of incoming mortars, they stood there talking and shaking hands. I nearly ran them down as I exited the aircraft looking for a hole. I was not alone!

Duncan was accompanied by base commander Col. David E. Lownds. When we came out of our holes, Tompkins, Lownds and Duncan had moved on to the Command Operations Center and I never saw Duncan again.

Years later, I learned Duncan remembered that moment. I had contacted him about a copy of his book, "I Protest," which I couldn't find anywhere. I'd given my copy away and I was on my way to a Khe Sanh Veterans Association Reunion in Chicago, and I had promised to find a copy for a buddy there. Duncan wrote me that he remembered that encounter at Khe Sanh, and sent me five boxes of "I Protest," gratis, to be shared at the reunion.

The book was precious to me because it contained photos of the fiery destruction of the only C-130 the Marine Corps lost in Vietnam. And aboard that aircraft on Feb. 2, 1968, was a Marine who meant a great deal to my wife and me, Staff Sgt. George Wilcox Walbridge. George had been in country only a few days or he would have known better than to get on an aircraft carrying six bladders of aviation gas into besieged Khe Sanh Combat Base. The C-130 was also carrying two pallets of emergency resupply.

When the ill-fated C-130 came in for a landing it was hit by enemy ground fire, bullets going through the bladders of aviation gas and splashing onto electrical equipment that set the C-130 ablaze. Pilot CWO-4 Henry Wildfang, a legend in Marine Corps aviation, managed to bring the flaming plane into a landing, which allowed five of the 10 aboard to survive. George wasn't among them.

Anyone who has seen Duncan's book of photos, "I Protest" has to be impressed with the documented efforts of the Marines in the crash crew, still under fire, attempting to knock down the fire and get Marines out of those flames.

Later, friends told me George was intent on reaching Khe Sanh because he had heard that I and another buddy, Gunnery Sgt. Chuck McCormick, were attempting to get in there. Chuck was there and saw the crash. I got there a day later, and he told me of George's death in the charred skeleton of the aircraft. Killed with him that day were Lance Cpl. Daniel Ralf Devik, Staff Sgt. William Leo Brown, Staff Sgt. Glen Henry Calvin, Master Sgt. John D'Adama Jr. and Col. Carl Elving Peterson.

While George was only three months senior to me in age, he had a "16" serial number and one year more in the Corps than my nine years. But George was also one of those guys the Company Gunny loves, a slick talker, knows everyone and can find a way to "get" anything.

He was far more than any of that to me and my wife, however. While attending the Navy's Journalism School at Great Lakes Naval Training Center in 1964, George had introduced me to the most gorgeous brunette WAVE in the class. The younger sailors in the class had "locked up" all the other WAVES with dates far beyond the class graduation date. I was having enough trouble keeping up with the rules of journalism and operation of the old black box — the Speed Graphic camera — and figured she wouldn't be interested in this hardcore Marine, anyway. I didn't count on George inviting me to a drive-in movie with him and his WAVE girl friend.

I declined his invitation, not wanting to be a "third wheel" on their date, but he reminded me I owed him for a favor, so I accepted. When his car pulled up in front of the Marine Barracks, with him and his girlfriend in front, there was my future wife sitting in the back. The rest is history. Forty-eight years, five grown children, 11 grandchildren and two great -grandchildren later, she's still gorgeous.

To this day I've never been able to find out where George is buried. In 1967 I had dinner with his Marine wife and him at Camp Pendleton before I shipped out to Vietnam duty. It was a pleasant dinner in their home with a great reprise of memories George and I shared. But when George left the room for a moment, she fixed me with a stare like a bayonet, came closer and quietly informed me that several of George's friends had come through the Combat Correspondent School there at Camp Pendleton run by Master Sgt. Walt Stewart, but even though George kept requesting to go to Vietnam, the Marine Corps wouldn't let him. "Don't you make him feel bad about that," she ordered.

At a landing pad at Freedom Hill, Danang, South Vietnam, June 1970: Stony Merriman, Ed Evans, and John Wold. Stony and John were attached to the First Marine Division Public Affairs Office, Freedom Hill, and I am there on assignment for Leatherneck Magazine. We are about to fly up to the Khe Sanh Combat Base where the Army is involved in clean-up operations. I am just out of Charlie Med with a boot full of blood after having been wounded in the left leg."

Feeling as I did about George, and under that wifely glare, the only sensible answer, as I heard George coming back, was "Yes, Ma'am!"

Much later after George's death, I could find no one who knew what happened to her, or where she had gone. I have to admit it was a while before I could begin looking for his grave site, or her. Upon returning I was a bit messed up, especially after the second tour in Vietnam and a minor wound.

Since Duncan could not have known how much his book, and his kindness, meant to me, I felt compelled to write him a personal thank-you note, and tell him the story of Staff Sgt. George Wilcox Walbridge.

NEWS FROM THE WEB

By Larry McCartney

After the article posted to the Khe Sanh Veterans Message Board that appeared in the Winter 2015 edition of Red Clay, I received telephone calls and E-Mails asking for clarification on the criteria for a valid claim with the Department of Veterans Affairs (VA). Since several were interested I thought more of you would want to know. So here is some information that you may find helpful.

There are three (3) criteria that must be met to substantiate a claim with the VA for service connection for; 1) injuries, 2) illnesses/diseases and 3) conditions, which were incurred while serving in the United States Armed Forces:

1.Evidence an 1) injury, 2) illness/disease, and/or 3) condition occurred while serving in the United States Armed Forces, or, if a preexisting condition, that the condition was fully disclosed upon entry into the United States Armed Forces and the injury/illness/disease/condition was exacerbated (VA terminology, means made worse) by military service;

2. Evidence the veteran has a current condition, supported by a medical diagnosis. Due to the Veterans Claims Assistance Act of 2000 (VCAA) most veterans who file an original claim for disability compensation do not need to obtain a medical diagnosis on their own. The VA is generally obligated to provide veterans with a medical examination to diagnose the current medical condition and there are only a few legitimate reasons for which the VA may refuse to schedule a VA medical examination;

3. A medical nexus connecting the military service incurred; 1) injury, 2) illness/disease, and/or 3) condition with the current diagnosed condition;

Examples:

1) Injury:

a) Loss of limb;
b) Gunshot/Shrapnel wound;
c) Traumatic Brain Injury (TBI)—Previously called: i) Closed head injury; ii) Concussion;

2) Illness/Disease:

a) Cancer;
i) Agent Orange presumptive;
ii) Any others;
b) Malaria;
c) Hepatitis C;
d) Hypertension;

3) Condition:

a) Post Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD);
b) Tinnitus—Ringing in the Ears;

The questions arise because some are confused about having an illness service-connected for Agent Orange exposure when that illness is not on the list of illnesses that are presumed to be due to Agent Orange exposure.

Please understand, the list of presumptive diseases the VA connects to Agent Orange exposure are those diseases where the nexus to military service has already been sufficiently proven by medical professionals, so the VA automatically accepts the condition is the result of military service. You do not have to prove the nexus. This is different from diseases where the VA does not automatically accept the nexus, in which case you are responsible for proving the disease is the result of military service. If you can prove it, using acceptable medical evidence, then the disease can be service connected.

As for the diseases that the VA recognizes are due to Agent Orange exposure, the following information was taken directly from the VA Web Site at: http://www.publichealth.va.gov/exposures/agentorange/conditions/index.asp;

The VA assumes certain diseases can be related to a Veteran's qualifying military service. We call these 'presumptive diseases.' The VA has recognized certain cancers and other health problems as presumptive diseases associated with exposure to Agent Orange or other herbicides during military service. Veterans and their survivors may be eligible for benefits for these diseases.

1. AL Amyloidosis: A rare disease caused when an abnormal protein, amyloid, enters tissues or organs;

2. Chronic B-Cell Leukemias: A type of cancer which affects white blood cells;

3. Chloracne (or similar Acneform Disease): A skin condition that occurs soon after exposure to chemicals and looks like common forms of acne seen in teenagers. Under VA's rating regulations, it must be at least ten (10) percent disabling within one (1) year of exposure to herbicides;

4. Diabetes Mellitus Type 2: A disease characterized by high blood sugar levels resulting from the body's inability to respond properly to the hormone insulin;

5. Hodgkin's Disease: A malignant lymphoma (cancer) characterized by progressive enlargement of the lymph nodes, liver and spleen and by progressive anemia;

6. Ischemic Heart Disease: A disease characterized by a reduced supply of blood to the heart that leads to chest pain;

7. Multiple Myeloma: A cancer of plasma cells, a type of white blood cell in bone marrow;

8. Non-Hodgkin's Lymphoma: A group of cancers that affect the lymph glands and other lymphatic tissue;

9. Parkinson's Disease: A progressive disorder of the nervous system that affects muscle movement;

10. Peripheral Neuropathy—Early-Onset: A nervous system condition that causes numbness, tingling, and motor weakness. Under the VA's rating regulations, it must be at least ten (10) percent disabling within one (1) year of herbicide exposure;

11. Porphyria Cutanea Tarda: A disorder characterized by liver dysfunction and by thinning and blistering of the skin in sun-exposed areas. Under the VA's rating regulations, it must be at least ten (10) percent disabling within one (1) year of exposure to herbicides;

12. Prostate Cancer: One (1) of the most common cancers among men;

13. Respiratory Cancers: Cancers of the lung, larynx, trachea, and bronchus;

14. Soft Tissue Sarcomas (other than Osteosarcoma, Chondrosarcoma, Kaposi's Sarcoma, or Mesothelioma): A group of different types of cancers in body tissues such as muscle, fat, blood and lymph vessels, and connective tissues—See more At: http://www.publichealth.va.gov/exposures/agentorange/conditions/index.asp#sthash.RQYMbFql.dpuf;

Children with Birth Defects:

The VA presumes certain birth defects in children of Vietnam and Korea Veterans are associated with Veterans' qualifying military service:

• Spina bifida (except Spina Bifida Occulta): A defect in the developing fetus that results in incomplete closing of the spine, is associated with Veterans' exposure to Agent Orange or other herbicides during qualifying service in Vietnam or Korea.

Birth defects in children of women Veterans is associated with their military service in Vietnam, but are not related to herbicide exposure. The affected child must have been conceived after the Veteran entered Vietnam or the Korean demilitarized zone during the qualifying service period.

IN TRIBUTE

by Craig W. Tourte

This is a very difficult time of year for most Khe Sanh Veterans. The start of the Siege, the loss suffered by Bravo Company, the Revenge Patrol, the attacks and defenses on the hills, the gallant fight by the 9th Marines at the rock quarry, the historic struggle for Lang Vei and the countless battles, skirmishes and horrific losses and wounded that now defines the meaning of Khe Sanh. We all take a moment at this time of year to remember those we fought alongside and those we lost in battle. It doesn't take much to set me off on a melancholy tearful journey back in time and a painful remembrance of loss. Sometimes it is just a song, or theme from a movie that causes tears to flow. "Adagio for Strings" from the movie "Platoon" for some reason has always caused me pensive sadness and reflection

I attended a dinner accompanied by entertainment a couple of weeks ago which was set up on a long table with chairs on each side. I didn't know the two ladies sitting across from me but since it was a military sponsored event I was quite certain they had some connection to the Armed Forces. The Master of Ceremonies was dressed in white shoes, pants and jacket, he told the crowd he was not a Veteran however his father had served. He had perfect hair and sung all the songs in a high sweet voice. He reminded me of a ship cruise director.

As expected he had those who had served in various wars and military services stand to be recognized as he sang each service song. He then asked those who wanted to remember someone in the service to stand. One of the ladies across from me stood at what I would call attention. I noted she appeared to be in her early 70's, she had short grey hair and a dark sweater but what I notice most is that she stood ramrod straight for about 10 minutes, never wavering . There was just something about her that stood out to me and I could not take my eyes off of her. Her female companion then told me that her husband had been a Navy pilot who had flown from an aircraft carrier and had been lost during the Vietnam War in October 1968. It was clear the woman was remembering the continued love she still carried for her husband and her standing demonstrated her respect for his sacrifice and loss.

I did so want to say a few words to her, to say something to let her know how much I appreciated her sacrifice and how her husband's efforts were so important to Khe Sanh Veterans and that Vietnam Veterans continue to morn the loss of those who did not come home. I had planned to say these things but I was not able to say them. You see the last song of the evening was "I'm proud to be an American" by Lee Greenwood. I approached her after the crowd sang this last song but with tears now streaming down my face I was only able to smile and shake her hand and mumble something I don't now remember. Even so, it was a moving moment for me and I'll forever remember this elderly lady standing so tall, proud and respectful in tribute to a loved one she lost so long ago.

I was looking for a restoration project and ran across this Kaiser Jeep M715 that was built in November 0f 1967 and sent to the USMC in Viet Nam. I have paperwork on the vehicle appraisal that says it was in Viet Nam, but I want to do some research and verify that The truck is a 5/4 ton ammo/cargo hauler. It originally came with a 6 cylinder overhead cam engine that was not too reliable. The previous owner has his own auto repair business and he purchased and built up a 355 cubic inch 4 bolt Chevy engine. He installed headers, performance ignition, Edlebrock carb and air intake, an aluminum full flow radiator with electric fan and installed a custom dual exhaust system.

The truck has Dana 60 front axles and Dana 70 rear axle with 5.87 gear ratio. It has a 4 speed transmission with a two speed transfer case. The truck has an 8" suspension lift. The body, cab and canvas top are all original. The original 24 volt electrical system has been converted to 12 volts.

The truck operates and drives like new. There is some rust on the rocker panels and the bottom of one door. The camo paint job isn't too great so I want to repair the body and repaint the whole truck

I have 8 foot doors in my workshop and this beast clears the door opening with less than an inch of clearance. I took it out and plowed my way through some 2-3 foot snow drifts and it barely slipped the wheels. Once I get the restoration done I want to drive it in the local parades and maybe take it down to the Kokomo Vietnam Veterans reunion in September. Just thought I'd share this at the start of the project. I'll keep a complete photo record of the whole process and I might post them if anyone is interested.

Dave...that looks like a good project. It seems in much better shape than most of the surplus we would get our hands on for fire department use. Have fun with it.

I was contacted by Anthony Buccino; an author who lives in Belleville N.J. Mr. Buccino is one of the driving forces of the Belleville "Sons of Honor Roll" which lists those Killed In Action from Belleville and includes the name of Donald Baron Saunders. Mr. Buccino told me.... "Recently the township committed to adding Donald's name to the street where he lived. I'm not sure of the logistics but was told that it would be done in warmer weather and they are going to try to honor all of Belleville's sons who perished in the service." Mr. Buccino provided the following from the local Belleville council bulletin:

February 19, 2015
From the North Jersey. Com breaking news..."The council additionally approved a resolution to dedicate High Street in honor of former Belleville resident Donald Baron Saunders, who died on March 4, 1968 while serving the United States in the Vietnam War.

According to www.bellevillesons.com, Saunders enlisted with the United States Marine Corps and volunteered to go to Vietnam. A graduate of Belleville High School, and member of its Big Ten champion cross-country team, he died while defending the Marine Corps combat base of Khe Sanh during a siege that lasted over two months. He was 20 years old."

Here are some reflections and memories of that world that became a part of our day to day lives in that network of trenches and bunkers with surrounding hills and known collectively as Khe Sanh. For months this was our home; and as we all knew, it was where we could "dig it."

After returning to Khe Sanh from a twenty day convalescence gunshot wounds, I made my way from India Company's rear area to the eastern part of the trench around the air strip. I waited all day for a helicopter to take me back to India Company's forward area on 881S. No helicopter was able to make it the first day. I waited as these were very "hot" landing zones. At the end of that day, I went back to the Company rear. The next day, I returned to the trench to again wait for a helicopter to attempt to make it in and take us out to Hill 881S. During these periods of waiting, the base was frequently receiving incoming Soviet rockets, mortars, and artillery. We learned to live with this background noise and what it could suddenly mean.

I have two special memories of "incoming" during my two day wait in the Khe Sanh trench. The first was rockets heading for the base and Marines in the trench converging on this small bunker just off the trench. I don't know how many of us squeezed into that small volume of space, but for those who know what phone booths are, it was analogous to getting ten people in a phone booth.

The rocket exploded and after several seconds of silence loud thuds could be heard. One Marine said, "Don't worry, that's just others jumping into the trench." No it wasn't. It was masses of earth returning to earth. We all scurried from the bunker to see a steaming crater less than three meters from our bunker. My old M-79 man, Joe Ramierez, took out his camera and said, "Skip , take a picture of this." He gave me his camera and then he entered this four foot deep, six foot diameter steaming crater, and laid down with his feet crossed and his arms behind his head as if he were on a beach. He put on a big smile and I took the picture. Joe, I hope you still have that picture.

The second memory from the trench around the air strip is of that fateful C-130 that took an incoming hit just as it was landing. I remember watching the plane approach and touch down. I thought it was coming in a little tilted with respect to the axis of the runway. I think it was receiving fire as it made its approach. I believe it was an incoming mortar that made a direct hit on the top of the fuselage. It simply turned it into an inferno.

This reminded me of an earlier time back at Khe Sanh. It August of 1967 and we were back at the base after completing a company size patrol that took most of a week. India company's perimeter made up part of the northern section of the base perimeter. We were at the northern end of the air strip. Perhaps a hundred meters beyond the air strip was a stand of large trees. It was dusk and a small reconnaissance/spotter plane was taking off.

You could hear it more than see it. As several of us, which included Lance Corporals Gary Travatello, Richard Harvel, and others were standing around talking, I said, "He better get up." Just then the plane hit the tops of the trees, and you could hear the strange sounds of the motor going quiet and the plane tumbling down through the branches. At about the time it hit the ground it burst into flames and illuminated the trees in the area. A good number of us rushed to the area. The ones who got there first said they could hear screaming, but like those trying to rescue the crew of the C-130, there was nothing you could do.

On the second day of waiting at the Khe Sanh airstrip, a UH 34 helicopter was able to approach and hover long enough for a few of us to jump on and be on our way before the mortars hit. We were on our way to Hill 881S. I was returning after twenty something days. On revisiting The Hill, I was amazed at how much deeper and wider the trenches had been dug. The width was increased to allow a stretcher to pass, and every sixty or so feet were sandbag baffles so placed that a direct hit in the trench would not take all those in that section of the trench.

The crest of Hill 881S was more like a small ridge line with two high points. The slightly higher point was the apex of India Company's perimeter. The slightly lower point was the apex for a reinforced platoon from Mike Company. India Company, which was also reinforced, had the larger perimeter. The two perimeters were separated by a distance of perhaps sixty feet. This area was a geographic saddle between the two high points. The population of Marines on this hill would fluctuate around 200. This was a function of the dead and the wounded that would be evacuated from time to time and those who would subsequently arrive. All of this was a function of incoming.

As I remember it, we could count on two H&I incoming mortars every hour when it was light. Of course an approaching helicopter was a whole other story. At least one Helicopter carcass on our perimeter was a testament to this. The routine mortars almost always came in a pair. From the time they made that soft distant soda can pop top pop as they left the tube, we had twenty seven seconds until boom. Twenty seven seconds to do little more than prey that they would not find time. Twenty seven seconds to pass the word, Incoming."

60mm mortars have 15 meter killing radiuses and much greater casualty radiuses. 81mm and 82mm mortars have 25 meter killing radiuses and, I believe, 50 meter casualty radiuses. India Company's perimeter had an average radius of no more than 50 meters, and Mike Company's reinforced platoon's radius was smaller than ours. This is why we lived in bunkers and trenches. These twenty seven seconds would produce what some religions might consider to be a "come to Jesus moment." For several months this setting would daily produce many such moments.

The land in front of the perimeter sloped downward and was barren dirt for about 25 meters. There, concertina wire and claymore mines took over. This distant outpost of the Khe Sanh combat base was surrounded by similar hills. A few, like Hill 861 and others, were also manned by Marine infantry. However, all of us were surrounded by tens of thousands of North Vietnamese soldiers. Perhaps two weeks after returning to the hill, in the middle of the day, we heard two NVA mortars leave the tube. Peeking above the trench with my elbows on the trench, I looked through a pair of binoculars hoping to catch a trace of where they might have been fired from. This was something we all did if we happened to have the binoculars. After all, we had twenty six seconds to look.

The round hit directly behind me on third platoons command bunker. I think the force of the explosion, although not enough to breech the bunker roof, was enough to set off a smoke or a CS grenade, or something similar, because white smoke came billowing out of the bunker and into the short trench that connected the bunker to the perimeter trench. Shortly after the smoke began billowing out, a big husky Marine from Hawaii named Montoya (I hope I am spelling it right) came staggering out of the bunker and into the now quiet mist surrounding him. With a distant stare at other hilltops he said," I am in heaven, I am in heaven." I remember grabbing him and saying, " No, you are still on Hill 881." I think a tear then came to his eye.

The other memory from that incoming was of finding a piece of shrapnel in the back bottom part of my helmet liner. The steel pot had a bb sized whole in the same area. I was treated by Doc Steinberg for minor cuts but two years later the VA would show me an X-Ray with two pieces of shrapnel in my left elbow.

There is one memory of "incoming" that stands out among the rest. It was of a sunny day in late February or in early March. I was standing in third platoon's trench in a place where one could look down and over to Mike Company's trench. A steep ravine separated the lines at this point. Looking at the other perimeter, I saw three Marines talking and laughing. They were in the access trench that connected their bunker with their perimeter trench. I thought how wonderful was this scene of joy. In the middle of this apocalyptic landscape, these three were able to stare death in the face and find it in themselves laugh. Seeing and hearing it just made you feel good in a land where feeling good was hard to find.

The flash was in the center of the dust cloud that instantaneously consumed them. In the center of all of that there was a short moan. A trench, a meter and a half wide, met an incoming mortar with a 15 or a 25 meter killing radius, I'm not sure what was left to send home. Years later, at an art show in the Central Park Bird House, I saw a painting by Austin Deuel. He was a Marine Corps artist and attached to the Marines that first took Hill 881S in May of 1967. The painting shows the combat ravaged crest of the hill and evidence of dismembered Marines. He presciently entitled the painting, "Even God Is Against Us."

In a fashion this experience would continue upon "corning home" where many Viet Nam veterans were treated as pariahs on college campuses unless they claimed involvement in atrocities that never happened. This was another commonality we had with our POWs and the conditions their communist captors placed on them. Although it could have been heard on countless other campuses and although ROTC may have returned by now, I clearly remember the student ranting at Hofstra University in 1982, "At least we got rid of that ROT- C."

IMPORTANCE OF RED CLAY

Craig W. Tourte

The Importance of 'Red Clay"

While flying to the Khe Sanh Reunion in Nashville (2013) I engaged in conversation with the lady sitting next to me. I was wearing a Khe Sanh shirt so there was an opening for conversation. I learned that Ms. Kolodi was a school teacher and Councilwomen in Delran, N.J. who taught a class on the Vietnam War, which of course we discussed in length. Before we departed the airplane I presented Ms. Kolodi with a Khe Sanh Challenge Coin and a recent edition of Red Clay magazine.

When I returned home from the reunion I had the Documentary, "Bravo, Common Men, Uncommon Valor" sent to Ms. Klodi for use in her Vietnam War class and purchased a Red Clay subscription so that she would have additional historical and relevant class material. A few days ago (2/3/15) I received a letter from Ms. Kolodi again thanking me for the documentary and the Red Clay magazines.

Her letter reads in part, "....thank you for the Fall Issue 83 edition of Red Clay....I appreciate you sending me these books (magazines). This one is especially interesting because of the story of Robert Lee Sevell (pg 16). He grew up in Clark, N.J, and today my sister and her family live in Clark. The world is truly small, we went to the same grammar school. Since we met on the airplane over two years ago a few things have changed. I retired teaching after 36 year....but because I still love teaching I have started an adult night school class at Delron High School and am teaching the Vietnam course to adults. Believe it or not out of all the classes offered - from computer to cooking - Vietnam was the most popular. So we still remember all of your efforts so many years ago and my adult class, like my high school students, have a homework assignment for life - when they meet a Vietnam Veteran say thank you and welcome home...." Attached is the article regarding our meeting on the airplane flight to Nashville

August 25, 2013 While flying from California to Nashville, David Tonick and I were joined in our row of seats by retired school teacher and current town Councilwoman Patty Kolodi of Delran, New Jersey. Observing our Khe Sanh shirts naturally the subject of Vietnam came up in the conversation. We learned that Ms. Kolodi created a course in the 1980's covering the Vietnam War and that the course is sill being taught throughout South Jersey, where teachers from neighborhood districts ask for copies of the curriculum and veterans are invited to the classes to address the students. We also learned that Ms. Kolodi still teaches the class to adult students. It was interesting to hear that Ms. Kolodi had been a volunteer with Operation Smile which took her on 5 missions to Vietnam as an International Health Care Volunteer. Ms. Kolodi seemed interested to learn about Khe Sanh and our Association. I provided Ms. Kolodi with the copy of the Fall Winter "Red Clay" magazine, issue 81, for her edification and enjoyment.

I obtained Ms. Kolodi address just before we departed the airplane. When I returned home after the reunion I sent Ms. Kolodi a Khe Sanh Challenge Coin, a printed history of the "Battle of Khe Sanh" and a copy of the documentary film "Bravo! Common Men, Uncommon Valor" of which I had purchased 3 from the reunion PX.

A few days later I received a nice letter from Ms. Kolodi thanking me. The letter stated the following: "Thank you for sending me the information on Khe Sanh. I received it yesterday and a few days later I received a nice letter from Ms. Kolodi thanking me. The letter stated the following: "Thank you for sending me the information on Khe Sanh. I received it yesterday and am looking forward to watching the video "Bravo." Thank you also for the Khe Sanh coin - I am honored. I promise you this information will be used by the high school students to give them a better understanding of the Vietnam War. I hope you had a wonderful time at your reunion. Please give Dave my best. It was a pleasure and a real learning experience meeting both of you on the plane. Thank you again for all the information on Khe Sanh. But thank you most of all for serving our country in difficult times. Welcome Home, Sincerely Patty Kolodi."

When I travel I always try to take a few extra copies of our "Red Clay" magazines and coins along with me, for just such an encounter. It is through the education of others that the heroics, lives and remembrances of so many others will live on and hopefully their sacrifice will not be forgotten.

WELCOME HOME
A 47-YEAR WAIT IS OVER FOR A SOUTH WEST ARKANSAS FAMILY

The remains of a local soldier who disappeared during the Vietnam War have now been identified. Sergeant James William Holt was listed as "missing in action" (MIA) for nearly five decades but that will soon change after the discovery of his remains in Vietnam. "I have worn this bracelet ever since he came up missing" says Sgt. Holt's brother George Holt.

It has long been a tradition to proudly wear the bracelet of soldiers listed as MIA but for George Holt of Guernsey, Arkansas, he is glad to remove his bracelet. "His daughter will receive this bracelet in Washington, D.C." says George Holt.

Sgt. James Holt was listed as MIA on February 7, 1968 in Vietnam. Sgt. Holt was a medic assigned to Company C, 5th Special Forces Group. Last month, his family was notified the remains were recovered and positively identified as Sgt. Holt. "It is a relief yes sir when we finally put the remains in the casket and in the ground" says George Holt. Family members of the soldier say only 12 people survived that attack when the enemy used tanks in battle for the first time.

Sgt. Holt is one of eight soldiers listed as MIA on the Korea Vietnam memorial in Texarkana. The Texarkana chapter of the Vietnam Veterans of America Plan to further honor Sgt. Holt at a special memorial service on February 7, exactly 47 years from the date of his death. "So his family can get some closure and us too because he is kind of a brother to us although I have never met him. We care about him and his family" says Gregory Beck, President of the Texarkana Chapter of Vietnam Veterans.

Shortly after midnight on February 7, 1968, a combined NVA infantry-tank assault drove into Lang Vei. Two PT-76 tanks threatened the outer perimeter of the camp as infantry rushed behind them. SFC James W. Holt destroyed both tanks with shots from his 106mm recoilless rifle. More tanks came around the burning hulks of the first two tanks and began to roll over the 104th CIDG Company's defensive positions. SSgt. Peter Tiroch, the assistant intelligence sergeant, ran over to Holt's position and helped load the weapon. Holt quickly lined up a third tank in his sights and destroyed it with a direct hit. After a second shot at the tank, Holt and Tiroch left the weapons pit just before it was demolished by return cannon fire. Tiroch watched Holt run over to the ammunition bunker to look for some hand-held Light Anti-tank Weapons (LAWs). It was the last time Holt was ever seen.

FEBRUARY 5th, 2015
WELCOME HOME SERGEANT HOLT

The volleys of a rifle salute and the forlorn strains of Taps concluded a memorial service conducted here Saturday to welcome home Master Sergeant James Holt, of Hope, after 47 years Missing in Action in Vietnam.

By Ken McLemore, Hope Star Editor

The volleys of a rifle salute and the forlorn strains of Taps concluded a memorial service conducted here Saturday to welcome home Master Sergeant James Holt, of Hope, after 47 years Missing in Action in Vietnam.

More than 200 people gathered in the WPA Gymnasium at the state park for the service conducted by the Vietnam Veterans of America, No. 278, of Texarkana, to honor the memory of one of the heroes of the Battle of Lang Vei and to give the Holt family the recognition of a grateful nation.

"Only two individuals have ever died for you," Chaplain Charles Jones told the assembly, "Jesus Christ, who died for your soul; and the American Soldier, who died for your freedom."

Jones' remarks invoking the tenor of the service were vividly illustrated in the reading of the names of the military personnel from Arkansas who remain MIA from the Vietnam War and the remembrance of all other Arkansans who gave the last full measure for their country.

M/Sgt. Holt's story was the Battle of Lang Vei on Feb. 6-8, 1968, as recounted by Vietnam veteran Don Ruggles, of Hope.

As officially documented, Holt served in the medical unit of Company C, Fifth Special Forces Group, at Lang Vei, which was housed on the west end of the U.S. compound adjacent to the dispensary. On the evening of Feb. 6, 1968, three armored columns supporting a North Vietnamese infantry assault attacked the Special Forces Camp.

Holt dodged enemy fire to cross the compound and treat fallen American soldiers, then took up a position with a recoilless rifle and returned fire upon the advancing NVA and Russian tanks, drawing both tank cannon and machine gun fire concentration on his position and away from other American soldiers.

According to the accounts of the investigation into his action against the assault, Holt delivered return fire against the attackers, disabling two tanks before he ran out of ammunition. He was last seen charging a third tank with a light anti-tank weapon, destroying the tank before others lost sight of him.

George Holt, of Hope, older brother of M/Sgt. Holt, representing the Holt family, was presented with an American flag which draped a table in the front of the assembly, representing the missing casket typically covered in such fashion. Holt also received the collection of MIA bracelets worn by individuals from across the country for the past 47 years in recognition of his brother's sacrifice and MIA status.

M/Sgt. Holt's sister, Mary Spigner, of Nashville, and her husband, Bill, were also recognized. She and George Holt are the last surviving of seven siblings, of which M/Sgt. Holt was the youngest.

"I'm so happy," Mrs. Spigner said after the service. "I couldn't believe how much trouble our veterans went to for this. My brother would be beside him George Holt, of Hope, older brother of Master Sgt. James W. Holt, is presented an American flag in memory of his brother's service and sacrifice at the Battle of Lang Vei, Vietnam, 47 years to the day after MSgt. Holt became "missing in action." The Vietnam Veterans of America, No. 278, of Texarkana, also presented the Holt family with metal MIA bracelets which Americans from across the country have worn for the past 47 years in honor of MSgt. self. And, my mother, every morning she would get up and she would say, 'If I only knew what happened to Jim. ' She would be so thrilled."

The POW/MIA Table ceremony was read by Billy Walker, a World War II veteran and former POW, commemorating the empty place of honor for those who have yet to be returned home.

Brig. Gen. (Ret.) Herbert Jack Lloyd, recounted how he was entirely coincidentally involved in the Battle of Lang Vei.

"Today is the same day, the same day, that Sergeant Holt gave his life; and, here we are," Gen. Lloyd noted. "By chance, by chance, I was a young sergeant with the 68th Paratroopers who was part of the rescue element that went to Lang Vei. We landed in a zone that was about eight miles east of the base at Lang Vei; at a dirt strip and walked to the Marine base at Khe Sanh. We got there late in the afternoon; spent the night there, and the next morning, we moved out in a half-moon to Lang Vei to come down from the north."

Lloyd recalled that the battle was over and it was evident the American position had been overrun.

"There were bodies all over, even though the North Vietnamese went to great lengths to try to remove all of the dead, because they didn't want the Americans to determine how many had been killed," he said.

Lloyd said that Holt, whom he had never known, was representative of the fighting spirit of the American soldier, who understands that his post is at the gates of freedom.

"When it comes down to living and dying, you're American; and, you want somebody American behind you," Lloyd said. "The call sign in Vietnam was 'Americans on the ground; everybody come.' It didn't matter who you were: Army, Marines, Air Force, Navy, everybody came."

Lloyd took a moment to assure the Holt family that, although M/Sgt. Holt was posthumously advanced in rank to master sergeant and awarded the Silver Star and Purple Heart, efforts are being made to upgrade M/Sgt. Holt's award to the Distinguished Service Cross, the second-highest military honor awarded U. S. soldiers.

"We're going to make it happen," Lloyd said.

M/Sgt. (Ret.) William Amelung, of Truman, among the numerous Vietnam War veterans in attendance, said after the service that Msgt. Holt's remains were discovered at the spot where the command center of the American Special Forces camp was located during the excavations of the Lang Vei area by the government of Vietnam for highway construction. Amelung said once remains were discovered in the area, the construction was stopped for further investigation.

M/Sgt. Holt will be buried at Arlington National Cemetery in Washington with military honors later this spring.

OBIT

CAREY W. MCGIFFIN, USMC KHE SANH VETERAN, H&S CO 1/9, ATT TO DELTA CO 1/9 AS A SCOUT

On July 20, 2014, a generous soul left us after a long and courageous battle with cancer. Carey Wayne McGiffin, died peacefully in his home in St. Petersburg. Originally from Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, he made St Petersburg his home in 1987. Carey's warm heart and generous nature touched many people during his time here with us.,

Carey's life was marked by service to his country. He was a United States Marine Corps veteran of Vietnam, where he earned a Bronze Star, Navy Achievement Medal, Combat Action Award, Purple Heart, and a Vietnamese Cross of Gallantry. He later served in the United States Army Military Intelligence and Criminal Investigation before becoming a Federal agent with the U.S. Bureau of Land Management. This service continued with his memberships and volunteer work in the Marine Corps League, American Legion Post 124 in Gulfport, FL, VFW Post 39, and the Vietnam Veterans and Khe Sanh Veteran's Associations.

After retiring from government service, he became a teacher and coach in the Pinellas County School System and later an adjunct instructor at St. Petersburg College.

Music was a vital part of Carey's life. An excellent singer, he participated in musical theater productions and choir at Slippery Rock State College, and continued to share his talent in community theatre and church choir throughout his life.

As a sports enthusiast, he valued his membership in the Gulfport Boomerangs Softball Team since 1987. He was very proud of his volunteer work at the Armed Forces History Museum in Largo, FL and can be found on the TV screen there being interviewed in the Vietnam War section. Always strong in his faith, he served as a leader in his church, First United Methodist Church in Gulfport, and was a valued member of the choir there.

Carey is survived by his beloved wife Barbara, daughter Shannon, Barbara's children, Jennifer, Jonathan, and Joseph, and six grandchildren.

A memorial service was held Friday, August 8th at 10:30 AM at the First United Methodist Church, 2728 53rd St. S., Gulfport.

OBIT

CORPORAL BILLY DREXEL, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN, HILLS 861& 861A, ECHO COMPANY 2/26, MORTAR SECTION LEADER

Billy E. Drexel Jr., 67, beloved son, brother, uncle and friend, was welcomed into his heavenly home Thursday, Feb. 19, 2015. Billy was born May 9, 1947, in Fort Worth to Bill and Alice Drexel. After graduating from Lake Worth High School, he joined the Marine Corps and was deployed to Vietnam where he was injured at Khe Sanh in 1968. Billy was a highly decorated Marine and an award-winning landscape designer. Billy will always be remembered for his kindness, generous nature, love of family and heart of gold. He was preceded in death by his father. Survivors: Mother, Alice M. Drexel; sisters, Cynthia Myers, Sherree' DeGroat.

Billy Drexel passed away on Feb 20, 2015. Billy was a Corporal assigned to E Co 2/26, as the 60mm Mortar Section Leader on Hill861A, Khe Sanh Vietnam. On 05 Feb 1968 two companies of the North Vietnamese Army launched an early morning attack on Echo Company Positions. One of Billy Drexel's Mortar position received a direct hit by an enemy mortar round.

Billy immediately brought up another Mortar , and began firing his mortar directly at the advancing enemy, without the use of a base plate. He fired hundreds of rounds directly at the enemy, killing several NVA. He also killed several more who attacked his mortar position. For his Heroic Actions Billy was awarded the Bronze Star with V for Valor.

A short time later, Echo Company moved up to Hill 861. During an enemy mortar barrage Billy again left a safe position to set up a mortar to return fire on the enemy position. He was than seriously injured by an incoming enemy mortar, losing both his legs.

This Photo appeared in David D. Duncan's book "I protest" Billy is standing with the soft cover to the right of myself as we examine the dead NVA, in front of our position. Mike Worth, another unsung hero, is standing just behind me.

A SMALL WORLD STORY

Craig W. Tourte

"Life's reality is that we cannot bounce back. We cannot bounce back because we cannot go back in time to the people we used to be...The nineteen - year-old Marine who sails for war is gone forever, even if he returns...what's done cannot be undone...and some of what life does to us is harsh." From the book "Resilience" by Eric Greitens.

I was having a conversation with my sister-in-law the other day. We don't normally discuss the Vietnam War, even to this day it brings up painful memories of her boyfriend "William (Buddy) Denman KIA 11/5/66." But we know many of the same people and she had gone to grade school with my cousin "Richard," - a pseudonym - me and Buddy. Buddy and I both volunteered for military service and Vietnam. I spoke to Buddy just before I went off to Marine Corps Boot Camp and he deployed to Vietnam serving in the Army. My cousin faked asthma and didn't enter the military. I realize not everyone is cut out to serve, during the draft years which ended in 1973, many were to frightened to serve, had legitimate health issues, were conscientious objectors or just did not want to carry a rifle with the possibility of have to fire that weapon at another....I appreciate and understand those issues...then there were others like my cousin. Richard didn't go into the military because his priority was driving his new Corvette around town and partying with the girls. Now there is nothing wrong with that except someone took Richards place in the draft line. This is not an original opinion on my part, but rather was offered to me by a friend who was drafted and as a result of wounds has suffered terrible. Having volunteered I have no excuse for any issues I might have as the result of my service, but I can see how one who was drafted would have a particular dislike for those who avoided their responsibility to the point where someone else had to take their place in line, particularly if that other person was physically capable. To this day, my friend believes he took a draft dodgers place

The irony of it all is that my cousin the draft dodger, was killed in a single vehicle automobile accident just a few weeks before my tour was up in Vietnam while drunk and returning home from a party he crashed his new pickup truck into the side of a tree. Who knows, if he had gone into the military and had even served in Vietnam, he in all likelihood might have survived. But that is all water under the bridge a long time ago now...does it matter...I think to some it does....it certainly still matters to my friend who was drafted, can't sleep, is in great pain and has had nightmares for these forty odd years...he would have liked to have been able to stay behind, had a girlfriend, drove a new car, visited his parents...but he is not the same now...and he never will be. He knows like most of us....although we returned....we can never go back to the person we used to be.

VINDICATION AFTER A BATTLEFIELD ERROR AND PURPLE HEARTS LONG DENIED

MARCH 14, 2015 By C. J. CHIVERS

CHANDLER, Ariz. — Long after Dan Jones's last flight over Vietnam ended in wreckage and blood, his combat tour was never quite complete.

In 1968, Mr. Jones, a Marine first lieutenant, was co-piloting a helicopter carrying supplies to troops in battle when an American howitzer accidentally shot the aircraft down.

Three Marines were killed. Lieutenant Jones, the only survivor, was notified while convalescing that the deceased crew members, victims of an embarrassing mishap, would not be awarded Purple Heart medals, which recognize troops wounded or killed in action. He was instructed, he said, not to inquire further.

Forty-seven years on, Mr. Jones's determined journey — from silenced victim of a fratricidal mistake to a veteran vindicated by his insistence that his dead crew be honored — is reaching its end.

Last year, the Marine Corps reversed previous decisions and approved Purple Hearts for all the Marines who had been aboard the aircraft. A spokesman said the family of the one Marine who had not yet been formally recognized, a door gunner who was ejected from the crippled helicopter and fell to his death, would receive the medal as soon as his surviving family members set a date.

"The Purple Heart is absolutely an appropriate recognition of their courageous service and sacrifice to our nation," the spokesman, Maj. Rob Dolan, said of the crew members. "This is closing a tragic story from the Vietnam era."

The corps's about-face points to the continuing evolution in how the Pentagon determines who qualifies for one of the military's most emotionally resonant awards. Eligibility questions are often contentious, and rules have repeatedly changed.

During the recent wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, for example, eligibility was expanded to include victims of a trauma that often does not leave visible wounds: brain injuries caused by explosive blasts.

And in an interview last month, Brad Carson, the under secretary for the Army, said the services were considering Purple Hearts for troops wounded while clearing improvised bombs made from old chemical weapons. This could result in honors for veterans of the Iraq war who were previously denied them.

That change, however, will cover a small number of veterans compared with the thousands presumably struck by American gunfire or ordnance in Southeast Asia, said Fred L. Borch, a retired Army colonel who is a historian of American medals and decorations and the author of "For Military Merit: Recipients of the Purple Heart."

For troops wounded by their colleagues in Vietnam, recognition has been difficult to obtain.

Mr. Jones, now 70 and living in Arizona, twice asked the Marine Corps to issue the medals, including in 1981 with the help of Senator Barry Goldwater. He was told that victims of so-called friendly fire were excluded from the honor.

The policy effectively prevented ceremonies that would have acknowledged grave battlefield errors. It also compelled Mr. Jones to abandon his efforts. "I dropped it," he said, "thinking there was pretty much no hope." For years he was plagued by sadness and guilt.

A change to the law in 1993 granted eligibility to those who had been wounded by American ordnance intended to cause an enemy harm. The law was amended, Mr. Borch said, after Congress became concerned that some victims of friendly fire in the 1991 Persian Gulf war had been awarded Purple Hearts but others had not. There had also been disagreement over the denial of the medal to an Army officer wounded in Panama in 1989.

"The genesis of the law was, 'We want uniformity,' " Mr. Borch said.

Few Vietnam-era cases have been opened, veterans said, in part because the change was not widely publicized but also because the Pentagon has not actively searched for all of the victims. The complicated work of marshaling evidence has largely been left to veterans and their families or friends — many of whom, including Mr. Jones, were not aware the rules had changed.

He learned of his crew's eligibility only after he and other veterans began pooling records and recollections in 2013. The chronicle they assembled was one that many combat veterans would recognize; it told of a routine leg of a mission that instantly turned bad.

Early on June 11, 1968, the squadron of CH-46 helicopters in which Lieutenant Jones served had flown a ground force to a landing zone northwest of Danang. That afternoon, those Marines were in heavy fighting. Lieutenant Jones's aircraft was returning to provide supplies and take out the wounded and dead.

1ST LT DAN JONES

The aircraft had just picked up a cargo net loaded with what looked like water cans, he said, and was gaining altitude.

First Lt. Glenn J. Zamorski, Lieutenant Jones's friend since flight school, was in command. Sgt. Raymond W. Templeton was the crew chief. Cpl. Conrad Lerman tended a .50-caliber machine gun at the left-side door. He had just re-enlisted, and was due home in July to see his wife and infant son, his widow, Faye Kelley, said by telephone.

CPL CONRAD LERMAN

With Lieutenant Zamorski on the controls, Lieutenant Jones sat quietly in the left seat, enjoying a lull before reaching a dangerous landing zone.

"I relaxed and was sitting much as you would in an easy chair at home, with my arms resting on the edges of my armored seat and my feet flat on the cockpit floor," he wrote in a statement submitted to the Marine Corps.

As the helicopter climbed through 1,200 feet, he said, he heard an explosion. The aircraft nosed over, out of control. "The tail lifted up and to the right, continuing way past the 90-degree point," he wrote. "I would describe it as having the motion of a football tumbling end over end."

The helicopter was falling. Lieutenant Jones jumped on the controls, but the rapid descent could not be checked. He heard no human sound as they plummeted, he said, save a scream behind him roughly halfway down. This, Mr. Jones said, was probably Corporal Lerman, who he later learned left the aircraft at about 500 feet, most likely after being ejected.

In the 10- or 12-second descent, Mr. Jones said, he first assumed the aircraft had suffered a mechanical failure, then accepted that he was about to die.

1ST LT GLENN J. ZAMORSKI

As the ground seemed to rush to meet him, he said, he had a vision of two Marine officers in dress uniforms walking up his sidewalk to notify his wife that he was gone. "The only emotion I felt," he wrote, "was anger."

The last sight he recalled was an emerald tuft of grass on white sand as the aircraft slammed to earth. His seat, with him attached, was thrown clear at impact. He ended up face down and unconscious near the wreckage. A Navy corpsman at a nearby firebase sprinted to the site, flipped him over, cleared his airway and saved his life. (The corpsman, Lloyd E. Colvin, had crossed a minefield; the Navy later awarded him the Bronze Star.)

The wreckage of the helicopter after an American howitzer accidentally shot down the aircraft on June 11, 1968.

Mr. Jones recalls briefly waking up. "The investigating officer told me that I tried to pull my pistol and shoot the Marines that were trying to rescue me," he said. Tallies of his wounds read like a dispatch from a morgue. He had fractures of the right collarbone, nine ribs and two vertebrae. His sternum was "split down the middle." His jaw, right wrist, right hip and right ankle were dislocated. His right knee was hyperextended. His left foot faced backward. Both of his thumbs were broken, as were two toes on his left foot. His face and body, he said, were a patchwork of cuts. "They used a whole lot of Band-Aids," he said, softly.

Grimmer news soon followed.

Capt. James T. Butler, another pilot from the squadron, investigated the crash and determined that a los-millimeter round had struck the helicopter's rear rotors. It had come from the firebase they crashed beside, where a howitzer battery had been "firing continuous rounds in support of heavily engaged Marines," according to an affidavit Mr. Butler wrote last year.

In a telephone interview, he said the projectile's impact with the rotors had instantly made the aircraft impossible to fly. Before submitting his official report in 1968, Mr. Butler said, he visited Lieutenant Jones on a hospital ship and shared the unvarnished news: His helicopter had been shot down by other Marines, and the rest of the crew was dead.

The information, Mr. Jones said, "just staggered me." Mr. Butler said he had then written his report honestly, attributing the crash to American fire, which became a basis for denying medals he believed his friends deserved.

"I could have written it a little different," he said. "But I had to write it as I found it." He added: "I always felt a little guilty that they did not receive their awards."

The turn of fortune came last year after George Ross, another fellow pilot from the squadron, submitted a bundle of documents to the Marine Corps.

John Zamorski, left, accepted the Purple Heart for his brother, a victim of so-called friendly fire who had long been excluded.

Mr. Jones had not been optimistic as the records were assembled. "I'm afraid they'll never get the award," he wrote in an email from the time. "I've been hauling around these letters and such for forty-some years. Perhaps I'll leave them to my grandson."

Several months later, Mr. Ross called him to say the Purple Hearts were approved for the entire crew. As Mr. Jones described the conversation, his eyes welled with tears.

"My reaction to that call was pretty much the same as it is now," he said. "I cried. I was at a loss for words." "They were my buddies," he added. "I felt their deaths needed to be honored, and as the surviving crew member it was my responsibility to make sure that occurred."

Since that call, three of the four medals, including one for Mr. Jones, have been awarded. Only Corporal Lerman's medal remains.

Major Dolan said the Marine Corps hoped to honor the Lerman family's wishes and present the award at a family reunion this summer. The medal will be given, he said, to Gary Lerman, who as an infant in 1968 lost a father due home within weeks.

SGT MAJOR FRANKLIN D. JONES
USMC KHE SANH VETERAN
SNIPER 26TH MARINES

Sgt. Maj. Franklin D. Jones (ret), age 70, lost his courageous battle with cancer and the effects of Agent Orange at 2:15 AM on February 15, 2015. Although he lost his battle with cancer, he was victorious in life.

Frank was a dedicated family man and is survived by his beautiful wife Peggy, his daughters Pam, Tracy and Becki, sons Dave and Jacob, and nine grandchildren.

SGT MAJOR FRANKLIN D. JONES USMC

He served with honor and valor in The United States Marine Corps for 28 years. His distinguished military career includes fighting in one of the longest and bloodiest battles of the Vietnam war, the Battle of Khe Sanh where he was a Sniper with the 26th Marines. His military service and courage were commemorated with two Purple Hearts, The Cross of Gallantry with a Silver Star, and two Presidential Citations just to name a few. When he retired from The Marine Corps he was proud to protect and serve as a member of the Inglewood Police Department for a number of years.

Frank got sober January 7, 1981 and remained sober for the rest of his life. He was a sponsor, mentor and friend to countless men and women who's lives will be forever changed by his steadfast influence and example.

He will be remembered for his quick wit, his love and commitment to friends and family, his love for our Country and his unique ability to inspire others to greatness. His leadership, loyalty and dedication to duty will live on in the lives of his family and friends forever. The life of Franklin Dennis Jones, husband, father, grandfather and friend was celebrated with a Memorial service March 1, 2015

WELCOME HOME VIETNAM VETERANS DAY DESIGNATED BY SENATE FOR MARCH 30

In 1969, after a year of service to the U.S. Navy in Vietnam, Doug Vollmer returned home to a country that failed to differentiate between the war and the troops who served. "We just weren't welcomed home," said Vollmer, Paralyzed Veterans of America's Retired Associate Executive Director for Government Relations.

But in 2011 the U.S. Senate unanimously passed a resolution to provide these veterans with the chance at a proper welcome. Recognizing the final withdrawal date of all combat and combat-support troops from Vietnam, March 30 honors these veterans by its designation as "Welcome Home Vietnam Veterans Day."

Senator Richard Burr, ranking member of the Senate Committee on Veterans' Affairs, introduced the resolution, calling it "a day to give our Vietnam veterans a warm, long-overdue welcome home." Indeed, many homecoming veterans were scorned, insulted and even spat on by vociferous anti-war activists.

"You don't see that kind of rhetoric about veterans returning from today's wars," Paralyzed Veterans' Retired Associate Director of Health Policy Fred Cowell said.

After two tours stationed in Vietnam and the Philippines as a naval petty-officer, Cowell had trouble adjusting to civilian life after nearly three years abroad. Attending college on the GI Bill, Cowell experienced the anti-war movement first-hand.

"There was a time when we were trying to sort out the value of the war and the position of many college students at the time," Cowell said, speaking of a group of veterans who congregated on campus. For many veterans, the construction and unveiling of the Vietnam Veterans Memorial on the National Mall was the most significant milestone in recognizing their service.

Cowell spoke of the anger and frustration that veterans experienced during the tumultuous period as they returned home faced with a lack of appreciation for their service. "I am so thankful that today's military veterans aren't returning with that anguish," Cowell said. He called the resolution to welcome home Vietnam veterans an "extended hand."

"As a Vietnam veteran, it's nice to finally feel appreciated," he said.

Today, while opposition to the conflicts and continued American troop presence in Afghanistan and Iraq is fierce, support and respect for returning soldiers is widespread. While today soldiers often travel in uniform—a uniform that, today, elicits high esteem from the public—Vietnam veterans often trekked in plain clothes to avoid name calling and the like.

Vollmer credits Vietnam vets as a driving force behind the respect afforded to today's veterans. "Our generation wasn't going to allow what happened to us happen to them," Vollmer said.

Paralyzed Veterans of America urges all citizens and communities to honor Vietnam veterans on this date, and to remember and honor the service of all veterans throughout the year.

COURT DISMISSES VETS' CLAIM AGENT ORANGE POISONED THEM IN VIETNAM

A federal judge dismissed Navy veterans' claims to compensation for illness incurred by exposure to poisonous chemicals the U.S. Military sprayed during the Vietnam War, Courthouse News Service reports.

U.S. planes showered almost 20 million gallons of the herbicide Agent Orange over about 10,000 square miles of Vietnam in the late' 60s and early '70s. The chemical is extremely toxic, and hundreds of thousands of American veterans who served on land in Vietnam have been compensated for their poor health by the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs. But sailors who served at sea are ineligible for benefits, and their move for medical funding was denied in a district court.

RELATED: Vietnam vet walks to raise awareness of Agent Orange

According to Courthouse News, U.S. District Judge Tanya Chutkan wrote "Congress chose to shield VA benefits decisions from review or channel them into specific courts, and the court therefore has no jurisdiction to hear these claims."

Organizations of Navy veterans first sued the VA in 2013. The sailors argue that, even though they were not on land, they were exposed to Agent Orange that washed into the ocean and was sucked into their ships' drinking water purification systems.

Agent Orange is linked to at least 14 cancers and diseases, as well as birth defects. Hundreds of thousands of Vietnamese suffer from Agent Orange poisoning, and children are still born with severe deformations.

RELATED: Agent Orange still a threat at old U.S. base in Vietnam

Neil Carman, a chemist with the Texas Sierra Club, called Agent Orange "one of the most toxic chlorine containing chemicals ever known to science," and noted that it can poison a man's sperm. It's main use if deforestation; it was used to wipe out rainforests where North Vietnamese armies hid and to kill the crop fields that fed the communists. "It was an environmental disaster in Vietnam," Carman said.

According to the New York Times, the Pentagon and developers of Agent Orange initially claimed the chemical was not harmful to humans. However, according to the VA, it is a recognized cause of illnesses including leukemia, diabetes, Hodgkin's Disease, lymphoma, Parkinson's Disease, prostate cancer and respiratory cancers. In Vietnam, where many communities were sprayed with the chemical, Agent Orange has caused severe mental disabilities and physical disfiguration, including people born without eyes.

RELATED: Communist, U.S. will fight effects of Agent Orange in Vietnam

In 2010, U.S. Secretary of Veterans Affairs Eric Shinseki expanded the list of Agent Orange claims eligible for benefits, adding new diseases to the list. Shinseki said he expected 150,000 new claims from the Vietnam era and would re-review 90,000 claims previously dismissed.

The VA commissioned a 2011 study to determine to what extent ocean Navy veterans were exposed to Agent Orange. But Judge Chutkan noted that the results are "vigorously disputed." She said she dismissed the case because her court did not have jurisdiction to evaluate the parameters set by the VA for what qualifies a veteran for benefits.

VIETNAM: POST-WAR PROBLEMS THAT STILL NEED FIXING; AN INTERVIEW WITH GEORGE BLACK

Cecil Caulkins

On March 8, 1965, the first combat troops landed in Vietnam. The war ended 35 years ago, but not before about one million people died. Parts of the country still bear traces of Agent Orange, the chemical used to burn away parts of the jungle. Agent Orange still poisons the environment in Vietnam. In addition to that problem, the people of Vietnam have had to cope with unexploded ordinance, which has killed about 40,000 people and maimed 65,000 since the end of the war. Reporter George Black discusses the problems in this commentary and his 9,000 word report in The Nation magazine, "The Lethal Legacy of the Vietnam War."

Black explains that Chuck Searcy, a Vietnam War veteran, guided him through the country as he was researching his report. Searcy was one of a few veterans, initially, who went back to Vietnam after the war. He wants, as Black puts it, to make us worthy of the extraordinary forgiveness offered by the Vietnamese.

GEORGE BLACK

Black says that the Agent Orange has lingered in Vietnam, and several generations of children have been born with birth defects. No one, however, has spent the money to do an epidemiological study to discover conclusively whether the birth defects were in fact the result of Agent Orange. Searcy approaches both sides of the war with sympathy, both for the Americans—close to three million of them—who served in Vietnam and for the millions of Vietnamese people who suffered through the war, including many who died.

Black found that the people of Vietnam have largely forgiven Americans for their part in the war, which happened a long time ago, especially for young people. Chuck Searcy believes that the U.S. government should make an effort to bring Vietnam veterans back to that country, as such visits could have "an extraordinary healing effect." Meeting the people can be a good way to deal with PTSD. Black wonders whether, in the long run, the people of Iraq will be as gracious and forgiving towards Americans as are the people of Vietnam.

During the war, the U.S. sprayed nearly 20 million gallons of Agent Orange on parts of Vietnam. The U.S. has spent money on clean-up, but probably not enough. The Da Nang airport was the central point of spraying operations, and $84 million has already been spent cleaning up dioxin contamination at that one base. Black says there are dozens of these "hot spots" where Agent Orange was loaded onto planes and where some of it spilled, and other hot spots where the civilian population lives. There were 4.8 million civilians who were in the path of the spraying, and there has been no restitution to them.

Unexploded ordinance is still a very big problem in a small area, particularly the Quang Tri province. The estimate is that 10% of the ordinance that dropped is unexploded and that 84% of the area is still contaminated by the munitions. It is a daily problem. Searcy's Project Renew operation has a hotline that citizens can call when they encounter munitions that need to be removed.

ganization. "THE COLOR ORANGE"

We only had their moments and the were hard to bear the husbands, sons and brothers whose dreams were lost somewhere.
They took what they were given, and gave all that they could in a bid to further Freedom in a place where warriors stood.
They taught them to be soldiers and dressed them up in green but color are not always,
the color that they seem.
The color orange was so supreme they sprayed their days, of grace hoping it would end their strife that danced before their face years beyond, the toll began as the color faded past and the husbands, sons and brothers, would find the die was cast.
They found no pleasure, in the pain, and no patience, for the plan,
as they sailed through days of sorrow, with no thanks from Uncle Sam.
With no known retribution they advanced through livings' fears and the pleas that fell between the tracks, would fall on deafened ears.
Intent now on delivering to a hostile industry, they stand, now undivided,
in their search for sanity,
They will not go unnoticed, if all stand, with voice strong and take the reins back from the men, to make a right, from wrong.

ONE VETERAN SHARES WHAT IT WAS LIKE TO BE SURROUNDED BY THE NORTH VIETNAMESE FOR 77 DREADFUL DAYS
BY DAN DOYLE

Recon teams from Bravo Company, 3rd Recon Battalion at Khe Sanh had been reporting large enemy movements long before the siege started. Many had experienced contact with elements of the NVA for some time, but the higher-ups seemed to be in denial about the size and intent of the enemy. By the end of December, Khe Sanh was observing blackout orders at night.

On January 21, 1968 at 5:00 a.m. the base was hit with its first heavy bombardment from NVA artillery and mortar batteries. 50,000 well-trained, well-equipped NVA had surrounded the base and had begun a siege that would go on for the next 77 days.

HITTING THE GROUND RUNNING

I arrived at Khe Sanh as a 20-year-old, fresh-in-country Corpsman assigned to Bravo, 3rd Recon. When myself and another new Corpsman were flown into Khe Sanh on a Caribou cargo plane, we were told that the plane was not going to stop to unload, that it would taxi in to the loading area and we were to run off the back ramp as it kept rolling and into bunkers beside the airstrip. That's what we did and then watched while it continued back out to the runway to take off as fast as it could to avoid being hit by incoming mortars.

That was my introduction to the war. Little did I know what lay ahead. The NVA would begin firing their mortars as planes landed. They would hit a big C-130 during the siege, and one large 53 Seaking medivac helicopter, killing several Marines and wounding many more.

From the 21st of January to the 9th of April, the Marines at Khe Sanh would endure daily artillery and mortar barrages. The NVA would also probe for weaknesses along our perimeters and would even try to tunnel under the base. Corpsmen from Bravo Company would often be called upon to take their stethoscopes and listen to metal stakes pounded into the ground to see if we could hear any sounds that would imply tunneling beneath the base. There were about 5,000 Marines and Army of the Republic of Vietnam (ARVN) troops on the base when the siege began.

"One of the men, thinking that others may not yet have assembled, suggested that we wait for the others. We were told that we were it."

Bravo, 3rd Recon had 110 men on January 21st. On April 9th when the siege had been lifted, our Company Commander gathered us together for a photo for historical purposes. We were issued new, clean fatigues to put on. We had not showered or bathed fully in 77 days. We had lived underground in bunkers of our own making in the red earth of that part of Vietnam. Everything we wore was covered with that red dust. The letters I wrote home during the siege still have that red dirt smudged into them.

We put those newly issued fatigues on over our dirty bodies and began to gather together for that photo. Our CO began to read off all of the names of those who were present. There were 42 gathered together there. One of the men, thinking that others may not yet have assembled, suggested that we wait for the others. We were told that we were it.

At the end of the siege only 42 of the original 110 were able to walk onto the one helicopter that would take us away from that place where we had struggled, fought, and survived together for so long. Nineteen of our men had been KIA as a result of the constant and accurate artillery and mortar fire. 49 had been wounded and evacuated either to the rear or to hospitals in Japan, the Philippines, or the U.S.

NO REST FOR THE WEARY

We were supposed to be taken back to Quang Tri to be reunited with the full battalion, but for some reason, we were flown to Phu Bai. We would not be able to get further transportation to Quang Tri until the next day. It was late in the day, we were exhausted, dirty, and benumbed. But we were not alone. Our 1st Recon brothers at Phu Bai gave us soap and towels and opened their facilities to us so that we could take our first showers in months. They fired up the ovens in the mess tent and cooked us our first real meal since January 21st. We had been living on C-rations and Kool-Aid alone during the siege.

That part of the war was over for us. We were told when we got to Quang Tri that we would be given a month to get back into condition, and re-equip ourselves before we would be going back out on the recon patrol missions that we had been trained to do, to become once again the "eyes and ears" of the 3rd Marine Division. That would not be the case, of course. We were back at it within a week.

At 20 years of age these kinds of experiences have a way of tattooing themselves into the memory. You are no longer 20 years old, you are 40. You face your own mortality in ways that are not normal, that are intense, immediate, and certain. Your dependence on your brothers for mere survival is complete. When you endure something like that you form a brotherhood like no other. Being with the men that I went through these things with again this past week has been one of the most moving experiences I have had in a long time.

GOOD MARINES

We are old men now in our 60s and 70s. Some of us are struggling with the health issues that come with age. Many have died and our numbers are growing smaller every year. We are all slower, grayer, heavier than we were back then, but when we get together we are young men again, enjoying our shared memories, laughing about the crazy things we did, and mourning those who died, and who we remember as they were back then.

I am, of course, thankful that I came home, that I was able to marry a woman who has loved me for over 40 years now, to have been given the gift of two beautiful daughters and three wonderful grandchildren. I was able to enjoy a meaningful and purposeful career and to build a good life. I am thankful for those men who gathered in Sparks, Nevada this past week to spend time together again, to enjoy the camaraderie of that singular brotherhood again. I am glad, too, that we were able to remember those who died. The experiences of war never leave us. We endured our struggles with PTSD to recover from our wounds and our memories. We overcame to varying degrees, and we got on with our lives. But we never forget.

Thank you to all my brothers in Bravo Company and to all our brothers from who fought with 3rd Recon Battalion, 3rd Marine Division in that war long ago. Thanks to all who have served in all of our wars. We did our duty, and we did it with honor. Our honor and respect goes out to all those who died and to their families. Semper Fi!
You were all good Marines.

45 YEARS LATER, VIETNAM VET RECALLS LAST TIME HE SAW

'JUNIOR' PRICE

By Diane Turbyfill

Retired Army Lt. Col. Dan Maslowski piloted a helicopter shot down in Cambodia on May 2, 1970 during the Vietnam War. He never met young Staff Sgt. Bunyan Durant Price Jr., of Belmont, who went by the name "Junior," but he may have shared Price's last minutes. Price was listed as missing in action for decades. His remains were recently discovered in a shallow grave near where Maslowski landed the burning helicopter almost 45 years ago. The Belmont man's remains will return to the U.S. next month.

BUNYAN "JUNIOR" PRICE

Maslowski, who now lives in Charleston, S.C., was captured after landing the burning helicopter, but not everyone survived the attack by enemy fire, he said. "That was the last time I saw most of the guys," he said.

FIERY LANDING:

Maslowski, another pilot and six men loaded into the helicopter that day. Their mission was to fly supplies into Cambodia. They were derailed when the enemy shot at the helicopter and it caught fire. "That thing looked like it was firing red basketballs at us. I had been fired on many times, but nothing like this," he said. The men in the back gasped for air as the chopper burned. Maslowski and the other pilot landed the helicopter in a rice paddy, and everyone scattered, several of them jumping out before the helicopter was on the ground. All of the men made it out alive, but they split up from there. Maslowski said he never saw Price again.

TRUSTY .38:

Maslowski saw one man dive into a ditch to hide. He and another soldier landed face down in the rice paddy as the enemy approached. Their heads about a foot from each other, the men braced themselves. "I cocked my trusty old .38. I looked at this guy, and I said, 'Hey buddy, we're going to die,'" Maslowski said. Armed men approached with an interpreter. Twelve to 15 seconds felt like a day as they drew nearer, he said. Then the interpreter spoke."He said, 'Surrender or die.' So, I dropped my trusty .38," Maslowski said. Maslowski spent more than two years in captivity. In that time, he crossed paths with two men from the helicopter, one of whom eventually died from an injury.

SCHEDULED RELEASE:

Maslowski and two others from the helicopter were bound with their own bootlaces and taken to POW camps. Life wasn't good by any stretch of the imagination, but they weren't what Maslowski would call abused or tortured. When their captors said it was time to move, they walked miles at night. Captured service members were kept in wooden cages, and malaria became a vicious enemy. Some men came down with the disease every couple of months. Many died as a result. Maslowski and 26 other soldiers were part of a scheduled release on Feb. 12, 1973, just shy of three years after he was taken prisoner. The American Red Cross was on hand to provide medical care, and The Associated Press was on scene to capture it on film. Maslowski still has the photos.

PROVIDING COMFORT:

Maslowski went on during his career in the Army to speak to families of service members missing in action. He didn't know Price or the other passengers who jumped from the helicopter the day he became a POW. Because Price's remains were found less than a mile from the crash site, Maslowski imagines he was shot and killed that day. He could have been buried by his killers or by local farmers, Maslowski said.

Maslowski can't speak with certainty about how Price met his end, but he can talk about the day he last saw him. He has offered to talk with Price's family if it would bring them comfort.

FINAL BURIAL:

Price would have turned 65 last month. Instead, his family got confirmation from the military that his remains had been identified. The family has since worked with the Army to make funeral arrangements. Price, called Junior by friends and family, will be buried near his parents in Belmont on April 11. A portion of his remains will also be interred in Arlington National Cemetery.

SEARCH FOR SOLDIER SPANS NEARLY 50 YEARS

Joseph Paul, jpaul@jconline.com

For nearly 50 years, all Jack DuVall knew was that his brother Dean left an Air Force base in South Vietnam in 1966 and never returned.

"We did not hear anything from that point on to speak of. Each year, we would get an annual update. It would be almost word for word from what it was the previous year," he said. "It never changed. It was almost the same. I called it a rubber stamp."
DuVall was a college student when he learned his younger brother was missing in action at the age of 20. Dean was onboard an AC-47 gun ship on a mission to Laos, which borders Vietnam to the west.

It took nearly four decades for U.S. government officials to locate the plane's crash site and nearly 15 more years to excavate it. It's still unclear what caused the plane to crash into the side of a mountain near a small village in Laos' southernmost Xekong province.

The White County resident recently received a 150-page report, documenting the 2,400-square-meter excavation completed in 2014 and its findings — dog tags, watch bands, belt buckles, buttons and even a human tooth. None of it, however, definitively linked to Dean.

"I think we're going to have to accept that this is his final resting place," DuVall said Sunday during an update on the search at Sitka Baptist Church in Monticello, where he's been a member since 1972.
The half-century struggle to locate his brother's remains led DuVall and his family across the country, as they regularly attended status updates held about 10 times a year in various cities. They've learned to grapple with the U.S. and Laos governments, the latter setting strict regulations on when and how long crews could excavate the site.

In Pittsburg in 2010, the family learned that human remains had been located. But in Minneapolis in 2014, their hopes came crashing down: Of the testable remains found, none was Dean's. The family has yet to hold a memorial service.
"He's never given up the search," said James Elliott, the pastor at Sitka, where DuVall has hosted several similar updates over the years. "He knows his brother is deceased, but having closure with the remains, it's been consuming."

Even more consuming could be DuVall's battle with leukemia and prostate cancer, which requires daily trips to Logansport for chemotherapy. Yet the farmer is out every morning to take care of his animals and the first to volunteer at the church, which recently needed roof repairs.

"He's worked hard all the days of his life, seven days a week. Always has a smile, very generous and kind," Elliott said. "He's the head deacon at our church. He'll do anything. He's the first guy on the roof at 71 years of age."

In person, DuVall is proof that time can't heal all wounds. Wearing a POW/MIA tie and button attached to the lapel of his blazer, he expertly explained the intricate details of the case as a packed church sanctuary intently listened.

The maxillary molar found during the excavation typically comes in from ages 8 to 10, he said, and the grating that eventually uncovered it was a quarter-inch wide. Anything wider, he noted, and the tooth would have fallen through; anything less and the dirt and sand wouldn't properly sift.

The attention to detail is just one way DuVall keeps his brother's memory alive. Dean's absence left him with an empty feeling — a void that over the years he's attempted to fill, starting when he joined the Air Force a month after his brother went missing.
"He wants to do everything he can to find out," said DuVall's wife, Ruth.

But he isn't the only who's struggled to come to terms with the loss. Kay DuVall-Martinez, the youngest of DuVall's five siblings, was 11 when a school official came into her class to tell her Dean was missing. Since then, she's clung to hope.

"I don't know if I've come to the grips of losing him," she said with tears in her eyes.

TWO MEN WHO KEEP HISTORY ALIVE

By Terry Garlock

Cliff Stern (L) and Wayne King (R) in front of Huey 624, a helicopter Wayne flew in combat in Vietnam. .

How do you know when you are rubbing shoulders with someone who has left footprints in history? Well, sometimes you don't. I'll tell you about two men here in Peachtree City who left footprints serving their country when it was not easy, and how you can help keep their history alive.

Cliff Stern and his wife Paula live in the Interlochen development. A retired U.S. Army lieutenant colonel, Cliff is now president of the Army Aviation Heritage Foundation (AAHF), a unique non-profit volunteer outfit of veterans and civilians with a hangar at Tara Field near the racetrack in Hampton. AAHF keeps a number of Vietnam War aircraft maintained in tip-top flying condition. You might instinctively worry about helicopters over 40 years old, but the intensity of AAHF maintenance puts these birds in far better condition today than they ever were when we flew them into combat in Vietnam.

The AAHF flies in airshows and provides static displays and rides all over the country. Last week they flew to Nashville to display at the Army Aviation Association of America convention. They have done numerous flybys at the Vietnam Memorial in Washington, D.C., and at other venues on Memorial Day and other events.

Two weeks ago Cliff's group flew a Huey and a Cobra into the soccer field at Newnan High School, where a number of us who flew in the Vietnam War gathered around the aircraft to talk to hundreds of students interested in the helicopters and our experience.

Why is Cliff so passionate about connecting veterans and civilians by capturing attention with helicopters that flew in the war? Well, he was a Huey helicopter pilot in that war, flying combat assault lift missions as a platoon leader with the 174th Assault Helicopter Company, flying loads of ground troops into and out of landing zones.

Cliff's son, John, owner of John's Golf Carts here in Peachtree City, so admires what his father did decades ago that he built a beautiful golf cart for him with silk-screened images from the war.

On his first day with his unit in Vietnam, Cliff had his customary check ride in the morning, and that very afternoon, because they were one pilot short, this new guy flew an emergency extraction mission for a Special Forces team under attack by enemy forces. He hoped things wouldn't get worse than that initial excitement, but they did.

Near the end of the war in February of 1971, the massive Lam Son 719 operation had been planned for five to seven divisions to cross the border into Laos to cut the enemy's Ho Chi Minh Trail where they had operated unchallenged for years. In execution, only three divisions were committed against an enemy dug in very deep.

The staging area was Khe Sanh where they launched on Feb. 8. The huge lift flight of about 100 Hueys were loaded with South Vietnamese grunts because most American ground troops had been withdrawn from Vietnam and by order of the 1970 Cooper-Church Amendment in Congress, no American troops were permitted to put boots on the ground in Laos. Americans provided support in logistics, artillery, air transport and air cover.

When Cliff flew into LZ Hotel that first day, he was in front only because the two aircraft that had been in front of him had already been shot down. He had Bob Gentry as his wingman since they had worked together every day and knew each other's moves and signals.

When Cliff took off after dropping his ground troops, he spotted an enemy anti-aircraft team setting up and just seconds later they shot Bob dead, though his chicken plate (chest protector). He had celebrated his 22nd birthday two days prior. Bob's co-pilot, Steve Burch, quickly took the controls to recover the aircraft. Steve died in a fiery crash a few weeks later. On that same day, Cliff flew fresh loads of troops back into that same LZ five more times, and at the end of the day he picked up eight wounded South Vietnamese soldiers and delivered them to a hospital. Cliff received the Distinguished Flying Cross for heroism that first day of Lam Son 719.

Joe Galloway, the most respected correspondent of the war, covered the operation and says a pro-Hanoi spy in Saigon leaked the plan to our enemy a month in advance, and 60,000 battle-hardened NVA troops were waiting to fight. The bad guys had 19 anti-aircraft battalions in the area including the feared .51 caliber plus larger 23mm, 37mm and 57mm guns guided by radar. Cliff saw more than a half-dozen helicopters shot out of the air by big guns, including Cobras hit broadside and broken apart mid-air.

The operation proceeded for more than two weeks, but with our Vietnamese allies losing the ground fight against a much tougher enemy and weather hampering air support, a withdrawal was initiated which Cliff summarizes as just awful. When he flew in to pick up South Vietnamese grunts, they panicked and rushed to overload the helicopter with too many so the crew chief and gunner had to throw troops off. Even then some held onto the skids in desperation to get out until they fell to their injury or death from altitude. Cliff said they had to do something to get the grunts out without overloading and causing a fatal crash, so they greased the skids. When the operation was over, out of the 33 Hueys Cliff's unit flew into Laos, only five remained. These are memories that do not fade.

U.S. Army Major (Ret.) Wayne King also left footprints in history flying Hueys in the Vietnam War. Wayne lives just down the road from Cliff in the Highlands development with his wife, Cookie.

Like Cliff, he flew lift missions in the Vietnam War but with the 61st Assault Helicopter Company based at LZ English. Since 6+1 is a key roll of the dice in the game of craps, the 61st takeoff pad was known as the Crap Table and the Huey lift platoons were called Lucky stars.

As a helicopter gunship pilot myself, I often watched lift pilots taking troops into a hot LZ, clustered in a tight formation to fit into a small clearing with gunfire zipping through the thin-skinned aircraft, and I asked Wayne to explain for students the pucker factor of taking fire in that setting. He told me they should think about it this way.

With a load of armed grunts in the back, the ride was usually at the treetops to evade enemy fire, dipping and rolling with the terrain and the grunts with their feet hanging over the side sometimes yelled their delight at the ride.

When the LZ was not far away, the pilots climbed to tighten up in formation with just one rotor blade of separation since they needed to touch down and take off as one to minimize exposure to enemy fire, and room in the LZ was often tight.

They stepped up toward the back, keeping the next rotor to the front lower and level with the horizon, jockeying to stay in position, trying to prevent the dangerous stretch and compression of a slinky, and keeping the right rear skid strut visually lined up with the left front strut on the aircraft to the front left to stay in position, even in a slow turn, listening intently to radio traffic announcing the marker rounds from artillery indicating their prep fire was complete, then gunships like mine were alongside firing rockets, trying to nail the enemy or at least keep their heads down while our grunts got on the ground, sometimes scaring the hell out of the lift pilot if it was close, listening for other pilots announcing, "Taking fire from three o'clock!" and being ready for the sudden change of "Go around! Go around!" if enemy fire was still too heavy, scanning the gauges every few seconds as always while the crew chief and gunner on either side just behind you tried to bust your eardrums as they opened up with their M-60s to shoot back at the tree line, staying lined up tight with the other birds as the ground approached and watching intently for an enemy to pop up from the deep grass to punch your lights out, and ready before the skids touch the ground for the grunts in the back to jump out and scramble away from the helicopter because it is such an inviting target, and without touching down, rock it forward to take off, still keeping formation separation while gaining altitude until you had enough room to drift apart since scattering might lead to a midair collision.

Who had time to worry about rounds whacking through the aircraft, Wayne asked? He said they just looked for bullet holes when they got back to base and fixed what needed fixing so they could go do it again.

On his off time, Wayne and his buddy, gunship pilot Richard Benicewicz, used their construction skills to build things, like a barracks, or to fancy up their own room. They scrounged and horse-traded for material, and covertly "borrowed" from the Air Force what they needed in quick excursions they thought of as the virtuous practice of "reallocating Uncle Sam's resources to a higher and better use."

Horse-trading and making things with hammers, saws and his hands with Richard at his side was one of two things that kept Wayne's sanity amidst all the killing and dying. The other was his wife, Cookie, writing him a letter every day, telling him about life with their young boys back home. On one of the worst days of his life, Wayne was flying a combat assault lift mission, escorted by Richard's and another gunship on the way to another LZ when Richard's aircraft had a freak catastrophic rotor failure. His Huey gunship dove into the ground like an anvil and the entire crew was killed. Wayne was never the same. He switched to flying guns, said it was time to shoot back.

After Vietnam, Wayne flew helicopters and fixed wing aircraft in a number of U.S. Army capacities, including covert missions in Central America that he still cannot talk about to you or me. Both of these men have deep in their bones a permanent love of the aircraft they flew in battle, and the crews who will always be their brothers. The hangar at Tara Field is where they come together and labor with meticulous and intense care to maintain these Hueys and Cobras to exacting standards, even better than they did in Vietnam long ago. Wayne has a special connection to one of the AAHF aircraft, a Huey with tail number 624. Wayne flew this very aircraft in combat with the 61st AHC during the Tet Offensive of 1968. He says he could have been flying 624 the day Richard was killed, but he doesn't know.

Huey 624 is a prime example of why the crews who flew them still love them so much. They were tough, resilient, reliable and absorbed much abuse. Huey 624 flew over 2,200 combat hours in Vietnam. Several of her crew received Purple Hearts for wounds and several others died. She was shot down multiple times, including from enemy mortar fire while preparing to take off from the Crap Table.

At the end of the Vietnam War, Huey 624 was returned to service in Germany, Korea and finally with the Alabama National Guard in Birmingham until acquired by AAHF. After passing the rigorous maintenance standards and tests at AAHF, 624 was put into service in air shows, displays and rides. Wayne is not only proud to be a life member of AAHF, he has his own combat chariot in 624 that is also now a life member. He and his entire family, including five grandkids, have taken a recent ride in 624, a Huey that has served America long and well.

Two weeks ago 624 was the Huey the AAHF flew in to Newnan High School, and Wayne was on hand to talk to the kids about flying that same bird in the war over 40 years ago. How cool is that? As time moves on, AAHF will be looking for opportunities to acquire more recent aircraft that our soldiers flew in Iraq and Afghanistan, a more recent history equally vital to keep alive, especially as we Vietnam vets are not getting any younger.

The Army Aviation Heritage Foundation also wants to involve more civilians in its mission, and they have an invitation for you, whether you are a veteran or not.

KHE SANH VETERAN BILL MAVES FATHER'S WWII SERVICE HONORED WITH SOLOMON ISLANDS VISIT

By Rachel Wittrock
Reporter staff

While the Edgerton Lions were busy serving up heaping stacks of pancakes, sausages and scrambled eggs on Sunday, Edgerton resident William Maves was packing his bags for a three-week journey to the Solomon Islands. The journey is not just a vacation to warmer temperatures, but a chance to reconnect with his father, Elroy Maves, who passed away 10 years ago.

William's father was the first Edgerton resident to serve overseas during World War II. The war came to the United States with the bombing of Pearl Harbor on Dec. 7,1941. Exactly eight months later, on Aug.7,1942,Elroy was with the Marine Corps unit that landed at Guadalcanal.

From the battle at Guadalcanal, where he was wounded the first time, to the battle at Midway and Okinawa, William's father was a part of the war's major offensives. During his deployment to Okinawa, Elroy was wounded and sent back to the states to a hospital in North Carolina, where he met a young Army nurse and his e wife.

William's life very closely mirrored his father's. He also joined the U.S. Marine Corps and was the first member of his high school class to be sent to Vietnam. William was also called up to serve in Operation Iraqi Freedom in 2005, making him the last member of his high school class to serve.

It was during William's 2005 deployment to Iraq that his father passed away.

During the next three weeks, William and his wife Peggy, will be visiting Australia and the Solomon Islands, which are located off the northeast part of Australia. William is planning to visit Wellington, which is where his dad was sent when he was wounded in Guadalcanal. He also wants to find Red Beach and explore the jungles. William is planning to bring some of his father's ashes with him to spread either on the beach or the jungle.

BILL MAVES VISITS GUADALCANAL TO HONOR HIS FATHER

By Rachel Wittrock
Reporter staff

Last month, Edgerton resident Bill Maves left on a three-week trip that took him to Australia and Guadalcanal, the island where American troops beat the Japanese in a bloody jungle battle that turned the tide in the Pacific Theater during World War II. Maves' mission: re-connect with his father, World War II veteran Elroy Maves, who died in 2005.

Maves' first stop was Sydney, Australia, where he spent six days. "We went in the Outback and into the Blue Mountains. We got to see the kangaroos and the koala bears and the things that are native to Australia that tourists like to see," Maves said. trip also included several stops not listed in tourist handbooks. Unlike Sydney and New Zealand, Guadalcanal is not a tourist destination. Planes land at the small airport only twice a week.

Soon after stepping off the plane, Maves met a local man who gave a him a tour of the island. Maves said history has been well preserved on Guadalcanal.

"There are war relics there, they are just where you left them," Maves said. During a walk in the jungle, Maves came upon an intact World War II plane and an artillery piece still in place. "On the shore there are still a couple troop transports that were destroyed," Maves said.

Guadalcanal doesn't see many tourists. The Toulagi Dive Club is an exception. The club attracts divers who want to explore Iron Battle Sound, where the sea bottom is littered with Japanese and Allied shipwrecks.

While on the island, Maves visited the memorial gardens near Henderson Field. Maves made his way down the "M" aisle until he found a secluded tree standing next to the airfield. Using a fork, Maves dug a hole next to the tree and buried his father's ashes. Maves said his father had no interest in traveling back to Guadalcanal in 1992 to mark the 50th anniversary of the Battle of Guadalcanal, a fierce fight that dragged on for six months and killed 24,000 Japanese soldiers and 1,400 GIs.

Alistair Morris Pae Honiara holds a dog tag he found on Guadalcanal when he was a boy. The dog tag belonged to David William Chalkley, a GI who fought in the battle of Guadalcanal in 1942.

The turning point in the battle came when U.S. Marines landed and took possession of the airfield. Although they were only able to un-load half their supplies before warships of the Imperial Navy steamed over the horizon and forced them to retreat, the Marines were able to grab a large cache of Japanese supplies, including most of the rice.

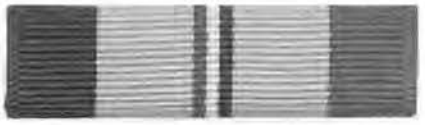
In addition to burying his father's ashes, Maves undertook a second mission during his trip: discover the fate of another World War II veteran, David William Chalkley. During his time on Guadalcanal, Maves met a local man who found a GI's dog tag while he was a child. The dog tag belonged to Chalkley.

The discovery prompted Maves to investigate Chalkley's history. Did he lose the dog tag? Was he killed on Guadalcanal? If so, was his body ever found or was he listed MIA? Since returning to Edgerton on Tuesday, Feb. 24, Maves has uncovered some answers, which The Reporter will report on in a future issue.

NO CAR, NO RESPECT: THE PUSH TO END THE RIBBON RACK DIVIDE

By Hope Hodge Seck, Staff writer



ED NOTE: I Believe that some Khe Sanh Members had the same experience with the issuing of the CAR Maybe this article and new standards may answer some age old questions.

Master Sgt. Orlando Reyes was taken aback when he was ridiculed on social media for not having a Combat Action Ribbon after being named the 2014 Military Times' Marine of the Year.

While Reyes, a logistician, had three deployments to Iraq under his belt, his duties had never put him in a position to participate in a combat engagement. "I didn't expect it to go so far," Reyes said of the criticism he experienced. "In today's era of social media and anonymity of computer posts, people are going to say what they want and there's no repercussions. They think, because of the rack of someone's chest, they have insight into that individual."

The growing discord surrounding Combat Action Ribbons — the award issued by the sea services for active participation in ground or surface combat — is troubling some leaders.

The online criticism illustrates an increasingly vocal perspective among Marines, especially those in the ground combat community. This perspective holds that a Marines' worth and authenticity is closely connected to combat experience, and that those who lack this experience are less deserving of respect.

In some ways, this viewpoint is a natural outgrowth of 14 years of war in Iraq and Afghanistan. But Commandant Gen. Joseph Dunford is making it clear that he has no patience for it.

"The coin of the realm is the eagle, globe and anchor," Dunford told Marine Corps Times in a February interview. "It doesn't matter what [military occupational specialty] you have, it doesn't matter what deployments you've been on, it doesn't matter what ribbons are on your chest — it's about being a Marine."

"STACKING EACH OTHER UP'

When Dunford named Sgt. Maj. Ronald Green as his senior enlisted adviser in January, most Marines expressed interest in his background and the reputation he'd built as a thoughtful and involved leader. But a loud minority couldn't get past the stack of ribbons on his chest.

Green, a career artilleryman, did not have a Combat Action Ribbon.

"No CAR ... not the right guy for the job," one reader groused on Marine Corps Times' Facebook page following Green's selection. Others complained that the newly chosen sergeant major of the Marine Corps didn't measure up to other senior leaders who had earned combat valor awards.

Green took the comments in stride.

"We don't go around counting one another's ribbons, and, you know, kind of stacking each other up," he told Marine Corps Times. "We're actually too busy to do that."

When a Marine is tested in combat, Dunford said, how he or she performs is important. But, he added, the same can be said for every task and field to which Marines are assigned.

"Most Marines don't pick their MOS," he said. "Most of us do things that the Marine Corps tells us to do. And it really is about the quality of your performance in the task that you've been assigned that's most important, once you wear the eagle, globe and anchor. And that's how I'm going to approach this issue."

These comments from Dunford, a decorated infantry officer, represents a rebuke to the grunt-centric culture that glorifies combat experience above all else. What remains to be seen, though, is whether the commandant's message is enough to change the culture — or if only time can do that.

Green isn't the only Marine leader to face criticism for lack of a Combat Action Ribbon. Now-retired Gen. James Amos, the 35th commandant and the first from the aviation community, received so much heat online for his lack of a CAR that an aide once jumped into the fray to defend him.

"[Amos] has been in many a fight ... probably killed more enemy with his F-18 than any single company of grunts," the staffer wrote in a Facebook posting before thinking better of it and deleting the comment.

The division is a relatively new challenge for the Corps. The Combat Action Ribbon did not even exist until February 1969, when the Navy and Marine Corps adopted it in the midst of the Vietnam War. It was retroactively applied to combat engagements stretching back to 1961, and later extended to cover combat dating from the December 7, 1941, Pearl Harbor attack that marked the U.S. entrance into World War II. The Coast Guard would adopt the Combat Action Ribbon much later, in 2008.

And prior to the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, Combat Action Ribbons were a rare sight rather than an expected one.

Andrew Northam, a Marine infantry veteran who served from 1990 to 1994, recalled the reverence that surrounded the CAR during that largely peacetime period.

"[CAR recipients] were more revered when I was in," Northam said. "A guy had three Combat Action Ribbons in my unit and he was like a god to us." Because there were so few opportunities to earn a CAR, he said, they weren't treated like a badge of authenticity. And combat experience wasn't seen as a rite of passage among Marines, as it sometimes is today.

Northam, who deployed to Somalia in late 1993 to support Operation Support Hope, earned a Combat Action Ribbon there, but did not receive it until years later when it was retroactively authorized after he had left the service.

Receiving the award, even late, made Northam realize its significance as a recognition of what he experienced. "When we looked back on our experience in Somalia, we always thought we should have gotten it; we felt a little robbed by that," he said. "We were taking mortar fire, in an offensive posture. It was a little bit of vindication having that."

Still, Northam believes the hype surrounding the ribbon has gone too far. When news of Green's selection as the Corps' top enlisted leader broke, Northam fired back at Green's critics on the blog USMC Life, calling the belief that senior leaders needed to sport a CAR "fanatical."

"Marines do not get to choose their duty stations; you go where you are assigned," Northam wrote. "As we wind down our nation's longest period at war, the Corps is facing many challenges; two of the biggest are dealing with the overall military drawdown and more importantly, dealing with returning vets and [post-traumatic stress]. Can [Green] conceivably do this without that precious ribbon? I believe so."

AN IMPERFECT AWARD

Even today, following a decade and a half of war in two theaters, Combat Action Ribbons are less common than some perceive them to be. According to Marine Corps Manpower and Reserve Affairs, only 20,855 of the 184,567 Marines currently on active duty boast at least one CAR.

With combat arms fields — including infantry, artillery and mechanized units — making up roughly 22 percent of the active-duty force, that means less than half of active Marines in combat arms rate the award. That figure is likely to keep dwindling as wartime deployments are replaced with training, humanitarian and crisis response missions.

Logan Stark's Marine Corps experience was in many ways different from Northam's. He enlisted in 2007, as the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan were in full swing. An infantry assault man, Stark was surrounded by Marines who had already deployed and earned their Combat Action Ribbon. There was definite pressure, he said, to join their ranks.

"When I was a boot, there was the whole concept of, 'you aint sh-- until you got your Combat Action Ribbon," Stark said. "When you're coming up in the fleet, especially the time that I was in, you felt like that was a requirement of being an infantryman in the Marine Corps. It became something that you strived for, that you needed to be that complete Marine."

But there was a dark side to the CAR obsession, Stark soon realized. While deployed to Afghanistan's Sangin valley in 2010 and 2011, Stark said he encountered Marines who would insert themselves into patrols they didn't belong on, just so they could earn their Combat Action Ribbon. The experience altered the way he viewed the award.

"Is it a badge of honor and do I wear it with pride? Yes," said Stark, now a filmmaker and writer for the website Funker350. "But it only holds so much weight. I don't think we should judge people based on whether or not they have it. For some reason, we want to use these really easily identified symbols ... When did we get away from getting to know a person and getting to know their background before judging them?"

"I want to hear about a person's experiences; I want to learn from their combat," he said. "It shouldn't be a pedestal thing; it should be a way to learn from each other."

Reyes, the master sergeant, said he also observed Marines going out of their way to get a CAR during his deployments to Iraq. The trend wasn't limited to junior Marines, he said; he saw troops that were senior to him finagle their way onto convoys and other missions outside the wire to earn the coveted award. When they did, Reyes said it wasn't only unnecessary, but dangerous.

Now assigned to School of Infantry-East out of Camp Lejeune, North Carolina, Reyes said he encourages junior Marines to value their comrades' character and leadership qualities more than their ribbon stacks.

"We get so bent out of shape with these ribbons and awards that we sacrifice the most important thing to us as Marines: our integrity," he said.

SHORT VERSION OF THE NEW GUIDELINES FOR ISSUANCE OF THE CAR.
FOR COMPLETE DETAILS SEE PAGES

What's out: "Personnel in riverine and coastal operations, assaults, patrols, sweeps, ambushes, convoys, amphibious landings and similar activities who have participated in firefights are eligible."

It's the swatch of silk most Marines point to when you ask them what's the most important award on their chest. Sporting the gold, red and blue of the Combat Action Ribbon is a subtle way of telling fellow leathernecks you've done your job when the bullets were flying. But after two years of work and growing controversy over whether too many - or too few - CARs were being awarded, the Navy and Marine Corps have revised the criteria that govern who can earn one, modernizing the Vietnam-era rules in "recognition of situations encountered in today's combat environment."

Those "situations" can be summed up in one term that anybody who's been to Iraq knows all too well: improvised explosive devices. The revised rules, which are detailed in the June 26 Corps-wide message ALMar 025/06, change the language of the official instructions for awarding the CAR to include those who've actively participated in a "ground or surface engagement" instead of a "bona fide ground or surface combat firefight or action during which he or she was under enemy fire." The change broadens the criteria for awarding the CAR to include situations where Marines and sailors may not be under small-arms fire, such as in an IED ambush.

"This is all tied to the IED piece," said Lt. Col. Jim Taylor, acting awards branch chief with Manpower and Reserve Affairs at Quantico, Va. "If I am the recipient of an IED explosion, I have not returned fire, in some cases.

"We didn't want the phraseology to eliminate that warrior from being entitled to the Combat Action Ribbon."

Gone, too, are stipulations that include the defense of a ship under enemy attack, riverine and coastal operations and Marines and sailors participating in peacekeeping operations. If they've actively participated in the ground or surface engagement, they're eligible.

Marine officials say that no previously issued CAR will be revoked under the revised rules. However, the new rules do mean that more Marines are eligible for the prestigious award than before. And Marines can get them retroactively if the new rules fit their situation on the battlefield.

So far, 85 Marines who had been denied the CAR based on earlier rules have been retroactively approved for the award, Taylor said.

The modernized CAR rules come after years of debate over the equity of the award and the situations under which Marines and sailors should earn it.

In 2002, there was grumbling in the Corps over the awarding of CARs for nearly the entire 26th Marine Expeditionary Unit's battalion landing team after operations in Afghanistan. The CAR is supposed to be bestowed upon a Marine for his individual action - it is not a unit award, officials explained.

The increasing toll of improvised explosive device ambushes in Iraq and the belief among most commanders that the rules did not allow them to award CARs for Marines hit by roadside bombs prompted further discussion in late 2005, including a letter from I Marine Expeditionary Force commander Lt. Gen. John Sattler to Marine Commandant Gen. Mike Hagee asking for a review of the rules.

After intensive discussions between Navy and Marine awards officials, the language was clarified earlier this year to include IED attacks.

The clarification also said the new IED rule would apply to Marines and sailors as far back as Oct. 7, 2001. And in March, the Corps drew up guidelines to help determine who might have been denied a CAR and now deserved one, and how to submit the names of those Marines and sailors who might not have been considered under the old guidelines.

The latest revision takes the eligibility to receive the CAR a step further, deleting or changing language from the original Navy Department rules written in 1969 and giving commanders greater authority to award the CAR in combat situations that can go from humanitarian operations to pitched combat in seconds.

"The Marine Corps has the most diligent application of awards in comparison to the other services," Taylor said. "From this point forward, I think we've got it right."

The rule changes also attempt to end the controversy over whether a Marine or sailor has to be fired on and fire back to rate a ribbon. By saying the individual has to "render satisfactory performance under enemy fire," the rules say a Marine or sailor doesn't have to fire his weapon when he's fired on to earn the CAR - but he's got to be doing his job to the utmost.

"It's meant to eliminate that potential situation where a Marine demonstrates cowardice under fire or disobeys a direct order," Taylor said.

The rules further emphasize the CAR may be awarded to Marines and sailors engaged in clandestine operations that preclude them from engaging the enemy. Navy awards officials wanted to ensure the new CAR rules did not leave out SEALs, whose duties often keep them from firing on the enemy.

The modified commando language applies to Marine special operations troops and reconnaissance men as well. "What we intended to do was to define the box a little better to say that the intent is to describe those people who by the nature of their mission are restricted in their ability to return fire - not by virtue of the specific assignment that they're on," Taylor said.

The rule revisions are also expected to dampen controversies sparked by some recent CAR awards. In late 2001 and 2002, hundreds of Marines from the Camp Lejeune, N.C.-based 26th MEU were awarded CARs for a firefight near their compound and for a mortar attack at Kandahar airfield. Few 15th MEU Marines - who were among the first to take ground in Afghanistan - were awarded the CAR.

Marines from the 26th MEU held their noses in August 2005 when the entire Navy crews of the amphibious assault ship Kearsarge and dock landing ship Ashland were awarded CARs after a single rocket fired by terrorists flew over their ships docked at the port of Aqaba, Jordan.

The MEU's leaders refused to submit their Marines for the award, believing the brief incident did not constitute an "engagement," officials said. "There was some degree of consternation about that situation," Taylor said The rule revisions are also expected to dampen controversies sparked by some recent CAR awards.

In late 2001 and 2002, hundreds of Marines from the Camp Lejeune, N.C.-based 26th MEU were awarded CARs for a firefight near their compound and for a mortar attack at Kandahar airfield. Few The CAR revisions coincide with an ongoing Navy Department overhaul of all its awards for Marines and sailors, Navy and Marine officials said. A draft of the newly edited awards manual has been forwarded to the Navy's top manpower official; the final version is expected to be released by the end of the summer.

Award eligibility: A June 26 Marine Corps message laid out major changes in eligibility for the Combat Action Ribbon. The highlights:

DEFINING COMBAT:

What's in: "...the individual must have rendered satisfactory performance under enemy fire while actively participating in a ground or surface engagement."

What's out: "...the individual must have participated in a bona fide ground or surface combat firefight or action during which he or she was under enemy fire ... ."

What's in: "Direct exposure to the detonation of an improvised explosive device used by an enemy, with or without the immediate presence of enemy forces, constitutes active participation in a ground or surface engagement."

What's out: "Personnel in riverine and coastal operations, assaults, patrols, sweeps, ambushes, convoys, amphibious landings and similar activities who have participated in firefights are eligible."

"Personnel assigned to areas subjected to sustained mortar, missile and artillery attacks who actively participate in retaliatory or offensive actions are eligible."

"Personnel aboard a ship are eligible when the safety of the ship and the crew were endangered by enemy attack, such as a ship hit by a mine or a ship engaged by shore, surface, air or sub-surface elements."

All three circumstances are now covered under the "ground or surface engagement" clause, and were deleted and rendered "unnecessary." Personnel aboard a ship are eligible when the safety of the ship and the crew were endangered by enemy attack, such as a ship hit by a mine or a ship engaged by shore, surface, air or sub-surface elements."

VIETNAM HEROES: 'I'VE BEEN WAITING 40 YEARS FOR THIS!' BOX-OFFICE HIT HAS WARRIORS IN TEARS, FINALLY GIVES THEM CELEBRATION THEY DESERVE

By Richard Botkin

In his book, "Ride the Thunder," author Richard Botkin tells the amazing true story of the remarkable collaboration between U.S. Marine Capt. John Ripley and South Vietnamese Marine Maj. Le Ba Binh. In the process, he vigorously dispels the notion that the military situation in Vietnam was lost, even as American war correspondents and policy makers were surrendering to the winds of political and economic pressure.

"For men like Ripley and Binh, who fought long and hard only to have victory pulled from their grasps, 'Ride the Thunder' celebrates their heroism, their humanity, their story," says Botkin. Using his keen Marine insight and years of in-depth research, Botkin takes the reader back in time, deep into the heart of the jungle and into the midst of the American-Vietnamese struggle for liberty.

In the prime of their youth, the two noted warriors were inspired by their fathers to fight for their country's freedom – one American, Capt. John Ripley, and the other South Vietnamese, Maj. Le Ba Binh. Their destinies would collide in Vietnam.

REVIEWS

"Richard Botkin has written a brilliant account of the bravery and skill of a small group of American Marine advisers and the courageous, Vietnamese Marines who fought to the end. For those of us who served as advisers to these Marines, it is a moving, personal story magnificently told. It is a must-read for all who want to understand the true nature of the Vietnam War." – Gen. Anthony C. Zinni, USMC (retired

Ride The Thunder

This is a fantastic book for any American patriot, regardless of branch of service. It is especially a must read for former Marines or Viet Nam era veterans. Botkin ties in some crucial tangents between key historical figures both of South Vietnamese and American forces. The heroics of many; particularly Captain Ripley are inspiring and unforgettable. I've made it a gift to others as well as for myself. Semper Fidelis!

"I 'VE BEEN WAITING 40 YEARS FOR THIS"

That was a common refrain among the Vietnam War veterans and the South Vietnamese Americans – most with tears streaming down their faces – who gathered there on March 27 and 28 to witness their powerful story finally making it onto the big screen at the wildly popular premiere of "Ride the Thunder: A Vietnam War Story of Victory and Betrayal," a film that exploded at the box office and ranked as the top movie in the nation in per screen revenue this weekend.

VICTORY NEAR THE DONG HA BRIDGE

Some South Vietnamese attendees recalled their own heart-wrenching memories of more than a decade of starvation and torture in prison camps after they fought to keep their country free of communism. Separated from their wives and children, they saw friends and loved ones brutally murdered by North Vietnamese guards during their communist "re-education."

And 40 years after the fall of Saigon and the end of the Vietnam War, U.S. Marine and Army veterans remembered harrowing fire fights alongside their South Vietnamese brothers in arms – and their return to a nation that turned its back on its own freedom fighters. But this momentous event wasn't about re-opening old wounds.

Instead, it was a heartfelt celebration of brotherhood, a long overdue welcome home and a chance to finally tell the incredible story of unparalleled sacrifice that most Americans have never heard.

"The film record of the Vietnam War is what will determine history 10, 20, 50 years from now when all the Vietnam veterans are gone," Richard Botkin, executive producer of "Ride the Thunder," told WND at the red-carpet event.

"Ride the Thunder" Executive Director Richard Botkin at the premiere of the film:

Many popular films dealing with Vietnam – such as "Apocalypse Now," "The Deer Hunter," "Platoon," "Good Morning, Vietnam," "Rambo" and "Full Metal Jacket" – serve as great entertainment, Botkin said, but they often grossly distort the reality of the warriors who fought courageously to stop the spread of communism.

"Those films portray our troops as victims, as dupes," he said. "It marginalizes them, shows them very unfavorably and the leadership unfavorably. It shows our Vietnamese allies as even worse. Our film is an effort to begin to turn the tide against that so that, in the future, people will realize that America was right to fight in Vietnam, to stop communism, and that our South Vietnamese allies were worthy of our sacrifice and that they fought well also."

The main character of the film is South Vietnamese Marine commander Le Ba Binh, who was a prime example of enduring courage in a battle of David and Goliath proportions as his battalion of only 700 men held 20,000 communist invaders in Dong Ha.

Binh, a man with few equals in the war-fighting profession, served 13 years in heavy combat (1962-1975) and another 11 years in communist prison camps. Despite numerous battle wounds and lost comrades, he showed unwavering courage in the face of extreme hardship.

"Americans, when they went to Vietnam, if they were a Marine, they went 13 months for one tour. If they were in the Army, 12 months. Some men went two or three times, but very few," Botkin explained.

"The Vietnamese generally had one tour that ended with death or dismemberment, so they fought forever. My main character, Binh, fought forever – 13 years, wounded nine times. At the end of the war, the communists put him in prison – they called it euphemistically 're-education camp' – for 11 years. He comes to the U.S. because he'll never get ahead in Vietnam. He comes to the U.S. with nothing and prospers. That's the Vietnamese story in America – suffering, hardship, come to America, work hard and succeed. It's a great story."

Botkin traveled to Vietnam seven times to do research for the film and the WND book that inspired it, "Ride the Thunder": A Vietnam War Story of Honor and Triumph." He and Binh visited Saigon and toured battlefields where the South Vietnamese Marines and their American advisers had fought so valiantly.

The film cast includes many Vietnamese "boat people," refugees who came to America's shores on overcrowded boats. They endured violent storms and even vicious attacks by pirates. An estimated 250,000 refugees would die at sea in their unwavering pursuit of freedom.

"No one dies breaking in to communist countries," Botkin said. "They all die breaking out. These people broke out. They were the risk takers. Those are the people who came to the United States. We got the best of the best. The risk takers came here, and that's why they've done so well."

Botkin's name was on the lips of most veterans and Vietnamese-Americans attending the premiere, all of whom said they were profoundly grateful that he and Producer Fred Koster endeavored for so many years to finally bring the untold story to the big screen.

One Vietnamese couple, Kim Ly and Thomas Ly, was filled with emotion after seeing the film.

With tears welling in her eyes, Kim told WND, "There were a lot of memories. We cried so much when we were watching that movie."

Thomas said his brother, an Army of the Republic of Vietnam general who was famous for his leadership at the Battle of An Loc in 1972, is his "first hero."

"But Richard Botkin, he's my second hero," Thomas said. "When I watch this film, I am so proud."

WND also interviewed Col. Gerry Turley, member of an all-star American team of advisers who found the moral courage to persevere when he was forced into one of the highest positions of leadership in the midst of a brutal and bloody confrontation.

Turley, whose real-life story is told in the book, admired Binh's determination and sacrifice.

"I think that Col. Binh was illustrative of all of those other Vietnamese officers who served their country," he said. "He really laid his life on the line so many times. Then he became a prisoner. All he had to do was say, 'I accept communism.'"

Another leading character in the book and film is the late U.S. Marine Capt. John Ripley, who showed exceptional physical strength and courage when he took on the superhuman task of detonating a steel bridge at Dong Ha on Easter Sunday, 1972 – before the enemy could cross with its tanks and 20,000 invaders.

Ripley had not slept or eaten a solid meal in four days when he shimmied up and down the I-beams of the bridge for nearly four hours, rigging them for detonation. His legs dangled like moving targets, inviting enemy fire from snipers and North Vietnamese tanks. While most people might never have dared attempt the monstrous feat, Ripley never backed down, purchasing critical time for allied forces.

"It was a tremendous honor to play this great man. There's a responsibility when you play such a great person, a historical figure," he told WND. "There's an abundance of great material about him, his life, his family, what he did in the war. It makes the job easier as an actor when you have a book with such rich details about this person's life. Usually you're using your imagination and also your life experiences, but … it was great to have that book to go to and get all those details. I hope I did him justice."

Capt. Ed McCourt, who served in Vietnam in the 3rd Battalion, 3rd Marines, knew Ripley personally. McCourt, who grew emotional when recalling his time in Vietnam, told WND the film accurately depicted Ripley, the war heroes and the reality of the battles they fought.

Vietnam Veteran Capt Ed McCourt and his wife Dr. Susan McCourt at the premiere of "Ride the Thunder"

"John Ripley was a real Christian type of individual," he said. "Fidelity was number 1 on his list. He was a super individual, inside and out. … His troops would follow him to hell and back just because he asked them to go. That's the kind of leader he was. When his company would go out, he was like a [North Vietnamese Army] magnet. Every time they'd go out, they'd get in a fire fight."

McCourt said his Marines liked to go with Ripley on patrol because "we knew we'd get into something and not just walk around for six or seven days."

McCourt lamented that the U.S. military is still enforcing the same rules of engagement he says handicapped the warriors in Vietnam.

"We've got the same thing happening right now," he said. "We send Marines, soldiers, airmen, Navy SEALs and whatever to combat, but we've got rules of engagement that will not let them win. This is ridiculous. We didn't learn anything in Vietnam when it comes to that."

Asked how he felt about the film as a whole, McCourt said, "I'll tell you, it brought me closure. … I thought it was fantastic. … I think the president should see this movie."

Nationally syndicated talk-radio host Hugh Hewitt said he "loved" the documentary film. He attended the premiere and saw the movie twice – once with a primarily Vietnamese-American crowd and a second time with a crowd of American veterans.

"The Vietnamese audience reaction was significantly different from the American veterans," Hewitt told WND. "The American veterans were moved and touched by the story of their compatriots. The Vietnamese were, in part, angry and very chatty about what they were seeing because many of them had survived the re-education camps before they got to the United States."

Hewitt predicted that the film will "play very well across the United States" and the word will get out "Dinesh D'Souza style."

"It accomplished its ends. It was very sober. It's not propagandistic. It's just a telling of a story that needs to be told," Hewitt said. "They allow the film to tell the story about the people who were against the war and the propaganda they created for the enemy and the fact that they need to apologize. It really creates a moral obligation on the part of people like Jane Fonda and John Kerry and Donald Sutherland to step up and say, 'I'm sorry. I was wrong.'"

WND asked Hewitt: What was the most significant lesson you learned from this film?

"Don't give up the fight for history," he said. "It's never over."

Some U.S. history teachers are ready to bring the lessons of "Ride the Thunder" into their classrooms. Todd Anton, an eighth-grade history teacher at Heritage School near Victorville, California, told WND, "It was an outstanding movie. … This is what we need to get in our classrooms throughout the country – the honest portrayal of the heroic men and women, both sides, who fought in Vietnam – because it's not taught in our schools anymore."

Anton said most school kids don't know much about the war, but, in his experience, Vietnam veterans are more than willing to have honest and thoughtful conversations with younger generations about their experiences.

"It's really opening up a lot of dialogue and a lot of healing for our veterans, which is so important," he said.

Anton said the "Ride the Thunder" film presents such a significant lesson of history that he's working on a related curriculum to teach in America's classrooms.

"This isn't some propaganda," he said. "There are two sides to every story. It's about time for people to hear both sides and let the individual make up their mind. That's what history is all about. It's not a predetermined outcome. It's using the facts, and this movie really brings that together."

Two jovial and brawny Marine officers who served two tours in Vietnam together, Maj. Wayne Legenfelder and Maj. Dell Williams, told WND they delighted in seeing the film.

"Ride the Thunder Executive producer Richard Botkin (Left) Vietnamese-American actress and producer Kieu Chinh and retired Marine Capt. Ed McCourt

Williams, a retired U.S. history teacher for Mira-Costa College in North San Diego County, said, "It was an excellent, excellent film. It tells a story of Vietnam that I think very few people in this country have heard about – and that's something that happened after the Tet [Offensive]. Things were going so well in Vietnam, and we just don't hear that story. It ends with Tet, and 'Oh, we lost the war.' I don't think that's the case at all. It shows it well."

Williams said, in his experience, American students "have no idea" about the Vietnam War: "They don't understand the politics, the foreign policy, the agreements this country made."

And for those critics who say America had no business getting involved in the war, Chow Huang, whose father was a South Vietnamese Marine, had a special message:

"If you have never been to our country, you don't know," he said. "We were fighting for our freedom, and we appreciate all the help from the U.S."

Following the premiere, on March 28, a special ceremony was held in the parking lot of the Westminster theater that drew several hundred veterans and members of the community. The event, called "Bridging the Gap," promoted the brotherhood of the South Vietnamese and American veterans.

The emotional 40-year reunion of the brothers in arms featured veterans from both countries who individually saluted and embraced one another. And for Richard Botkin, seeing the warm ceremony and the culmination of his 12-year labor of love was pure delight.

"Bridging the GAP" Ceremony, March 28, 2015

"I've met so many wonderful American Marines and their families," he said. "And the Vietnamese community has embraced us magnificently. It was a long time, but it was a complete joy for me."

Botkin shared the most significant lesson he learned in his dozen years of research:

"America is made and kept free by a small percentage of men and women who are willing to risk it all," he said. "We should celebrate those people. Unfortunately, we don't. We celebrate the wrong people all the time. But these are people who need to be celebrated. 'Joy' is the word that describes being around warriors. These are committed people. I love these people."

ANOTHER EXCERPT FROM MIKE ARCHERS NEWEST BOOK:

The Long Goodbye: In Search of a Friend Lost at Khe Sanh*,

This Chapter immediately follows the chapter "July 6, 1968" in Red Clay Issue 85 Page 61

Hardly a day goes by when I do not shake my head in amazement at the number of lives Tommy Mahoney touched during his brief existence. He and I were friends in high school and together joined the Marine Corps in 1967. In July of the following year, Tommy was mortally wounded on the day American forces abandoned Khe Sanh Combat Base in the face of overwhelming pressure from North Vietnamese Army forces.

His fellow Marines refused to abandon the body of their much-admired friend, fighting for hours at close quarters against an enemy that stubbornly refused to relinquish it. Only after a menacing directive from a future Commandant of the Marine Corps, did the men reluctantly cease their efforts -- forever tasting the bitterness of that decision.

Thirty-seven years later, I included an account of this in my memoir, A Patch of Ground: Khe Sanh Remembered, generating an unanticipated outpouring of concern from readers moved by Mahoney's tragic end and the unresolved issue of his remains. A series of astonishing connections resulted, drawing me back to Vietnam and the hill where he had fallen. Scores of people, from around the world, became involved in this effort to see Tommy returned home. Among them, former adversaries from the Khe Sanh battlefield, including one who participated in the ambush that killed him.

My next book, The Long Goodbye: In Search of a Friend Lost at Khe Sanh, scheduled for release in early 2015, is not just the story of Tommy Mahoney, those who knew him and those who fought against him. It is also the story of why American forces chose to fight at Khe Sanh, a place with the ruggedness terrain; worst weather; and largest, best equipped, enemy force anywhere in South Vietnam. Without understanding that, it is impossible to fully comprehend the appalling scale of suffering and death borne by both sides, or fathom the enduring sorrow carried by those who knew a fine young man who never came back from there.

LAST STAND AT HILL 689

Later that night before brief, merciful, sleep engulfed the men who had tried so hard to reach Tom's body, each struggled with the same questions: Why had he left the safety of the hill top that afternoon? If it was merely for some privacy to relieve himself, why did he not use one of the many trenches or partially collapsed bunkers within the defensive perimeter?

Everyone on Hill 881 South had been aware of what was happening over on Hill 689 that day, how the NVA had ambushed Marines just outside the perimeter, placing the bodies in prepared kill zones awaiting other Marines to retrieve them. In addition, Tom had likely been part of the 1st Platoon patrol just days before that had chased off two NVA reconnaissance soldiers standing near where he was later killed. Just as puzzling, why would a seasoned combat veteran like Tom venture out into enemy territory without a weapon?

Years later, Ken Campbell vividly recalled that "the day Mahoney took that walk, his friend told me that he had been depressed because of a recent 'Dear John' letter and he suspected that Tommy was 'inviting suicide.'" Ken felt there may have been some truth in that "because to go outside the wire without your rifle just did not make sense." Allen Williams concurred, later saying, "Tommy never let me see the 'Dear John' letter, but we all knew about it and he was very distraught for days. After he got that letter, he was in bad shape. Very bad shape. He was just not thinking clearly. He didn't give a f#ck any more. He was hurt, really hurt." It was entirely out of character for him, Williams added:

"Tommy was a decent human be-

[1]Northrop was wounded on Hill 689 the day after Tom was killed, suffering a hand injury and concussion from an enemy mortar round. He returned to duty with Bravo Company and left Vietnam in September, later saying "When I try to think back and remember certain things that happened during my tour, very little comes back. But, July 6th will always be on my mind" > ing who always wanted to do the right thing and always seemed to succeed. He always stayed awake on watch. He always knew the right thing to say and do. I never heard him say a bad word about anyone, and he got along with everyone. Tommy had that way with everything he did."

His fellow Marines, including Lieutenant Ahearn, agreed. By all accounts, Tommy Mahoney was probably the least careless member of the platoon, and although Ahearn knew him to be fearless and often "rambunctious and experimental" in combat situations, Tommy was not negligent and the last person one would expect to take such an unnecessary risk.

Frank would later say, "I don't think Mahoney was trying to commit suicide. We had not patrolled for days while waiting to evacuate the hill. We were just sitting ducks." Lieutenant Ahearn was of the opinion that while Mahoney could stoically endure "the pain of war," he was also a sentimental-type, and perhaps that was his Achilles heel. Savvy and battle-hardened, he may have been undone by "a broken heart."

While Frank's take on this might sound overly romanticized, it sprang from terrible anguish he'd endured as a boy, watching his mother die a slow, painful death as his father struggled mightily to pay her medical bills and encourage her not to give up. A responsible, intelligent man, who adored his children, the elder Ahearn could no longer find the will to go on without her and would die in his sleep ten months later, orphaning Frank and his six siblings. "He loved her very much," Frank later said of his father. "The cause of death was attributed to a heart attack, but I knew it was actually a broken heart." [iii]

Three weeks later, I received a letter from Tommy dated July 4—two days before he was killed. I was in Phu Bai when it finally arrived and had not yet learned of his fate. No longer the upbeat and optimistic guy he had been in his last few letters to me, Tommy's tone was now gloomy, almost despondent. He had been watching the destruction of Khe Sanh Combat Base for the last few weeks and glumly commiserated with me about the waste it had been by so many who sacrificed so much to defend the place.

He was also frustrated by his battalion- and regimental-level superior officers for allowing his company to exist so dangerously exposed on the hill for days after destroying their own shelters. The men of Bravo were growing angry at the lack of proper planning that had left them in such a precarious situation and with still no reliable word on when they would be lifted out. There was no more talk from Tom about a career in the military. More ominously, there was no mention of our planned New Year's Eve bash back home in Oakland. Though he did not tell me of it, I later learned he had just received a hurtful letter from Linda, for whom he still carried a torch. Given his despondency about the abandonment of Khe Sanh to the North Vietnamese, her timing could not have been worse.

Lieutenant Ahearn was inconsolable as he examined the events of the day on the five-minute flight from Hill 881 South to Hill 689:

> "I didn't bring back Mahoney's body and was allowed 'no excuses' like my father had taught me. The Marine Corps has high standards for this and I didn't meet them. I believed I had let everyone down who ever trusted me. Words cannot describe my feeling of hopelessness and loss that day and for many years thereafter."

Others had a higher opinion of Ahearn than he did of himself. Ken Campbell later wrote to Frank saying, "Tom Mahoney was a good guy. I know you tried hard that bad day to get him back. You should take comfort that you did your best ... and the rest of us knew and appreciated it." Tom Northrop, who had been Mahoney's squad leader for a time, empathically seconded Campbell's sentiment, recalling Tom Mahoney "as probably the most well-liked brother in our platoon" and Ahearn as "the best damn line officer a Marine could have." [1] Many decades later, Marine General James "Mad Dog" Mattes observed that, "some platoons are worth as much as a company because of the social energy of their leaders." He must have been thinking of men like Lieutenant Frank Ahearn.

Some in Bravo could not endure another minute of the strain and danger. One confided to me years later that while helping medevac wounded men, he had stayed onboard a chopper bound directly for a hospital in a safe area to the east. Though not injured himself, he was covered with so much blood from those he'd carried that no one would question him until he was too far away from Khe Sanh for it to matter. He made this decision to avoid going to Hill 689, where it was obvious the battalion was preparing to make a last stand and he would likely not survive.

His platoon had been badly mauled a few weeks before on Memorial Day near the Old French Fort and the subsequent anxiety of trying to defend Hill 881 South with so few people added to his emotional damage. The peculiar circumstances of Mahoney's death, coupled with the simultaneous mortar attack wounding over a dozen Marines and a corpsman, was the final straw. His story reminded Me that each of us had a breaking point. He reached that point on the afternoon of July 6, 1968—we will never know if Tommy Mahoney did so that day as well.

Ahearn was so exhausted when he arrived on Hill 689 that he slid into the nearest hole he could find, an old bomb crater, to get some sleep. As his eyes adjusted to the dark interior he noticed an unexploded NVA satchel charge [2] but was too tired to go any further and so curled up beside it and went to sleep.

Members of Bravo who had arrived earlier were busily digging defensive positions on the southeast side of the hill. Captain Black landed after dark and immediately ordered a radar-guided bombing strike on his old command post to keep the enemy from using what was left of it. He vividly recalled the bombs were right on target and how "that mountaintop lit up."

Earlier that day, the new commander of the 1st Battalion, 1st Marines, Lieutenant Colonel Archie Van Winkle, finished moving all his men, including his headquarters unit, to Hill 689 in order to deal with the dire situation. Van Winkle, who had received the Medal of Honor as a staff sergeant platoon leader in Korea, set up his new command post in a deep, cave-like hole hastily dug below the northeast rim of the hill. Due to unrelenting attrition over the last month, his command was now a "battalion" in name only, closer to just two companies, or about 500 men, rather than the approximately 1,200 of customary battalion troop strength.

The NVA knew that the senior Marine officer had moved his command post there from Hill 558 and were anxious to achieve maximum propaganda value by annihilating this last American battalion at Khe Sanh. Major General Raymond Davis, commanding the 3rd Marine Division, added some media bluster by announcing, "We are going to move off the hill, but not until we have defeated the North Vietnamese," failing to mention there was now no other option left for the isolated and outnumbered Marines but to hold.

Charlie Company set up within the existing perimeter wire, reinforcing badly depleted Delta. Alpha Company covertly moved into positions just outside the northwest defensive perimeter to protect the flank and rear of the hill. This put them just above the killing zone where the Marine bodies lay from earlier NVA ambushes, the stench of death nauseating them throughout the night. Alpha was led by 4 The presence of this flag suggests the NVA planned to raise it in victory on the hill.

Lieutenant Ray L. Smith. He and Ahearn had been classmates at Officers Candidate School and Frank had been immediately impressed by the natural leadership abilities of this young Oklahoma native. Originally an enlisted Marine, Smith had so impressed his superiors in boot camp that he was immediately tabbed as officer material and sent to Quantico.[3]

The following night, July 7, hundreds of NVA soldiers moved from across the ravine to the southwest. Lead members called out to the Marines in English phrases, like "friendly corpsman" and "friendlies coming in," to deceive the defenders into thinking wounded comrades were finally returning. The ruse allowed them to approach within a few meters before bursting through the perimeter barbed wire and flowing to the right and left down the Marine trench lines. The attackers quickly overwhelmed Marine fighting positions and bunkers, but their effort to take the crest of the mountaintop and the battalion command post was stalled by Charlie Company defending the interior of the narrow fortification. [iv]

Some of the attackers, attempting to get onto the northwest ridgeline, were surprised and driven back by the waiting Alpha Company. Lieutenant Smith then led a platoon counterattacking back into the main position, killing dozens of surprised invaders and retaking captured bunkers and trenches.

Lieutenant Colonel Van Winkle then ordered Bravo Company to provide a platoon at once to assist in the counterattack, granting Lieutenant Frank Ahearn his wish from the day before when, in the throes of despair after losing Mahoney, he bitterly hoped to "maybe kill some NVA." Those who witnessed Ahearn's audacious charge down the trench line ahead of his troops, firing point blank into the stunned enemy, never forgot.

Ernie Vaughn, then a 20-year-old Lance Corporal from Keokuk, Iowa, was right behind Frank and later recalled: "The NVA were everywhere and Lieutenant Ahearn traded his .45 pistol with me for my M-16 to increase his fire power." They soon came upon a Marine bunker now occupied by the enemy. "Lieutenant Ahearn fired a LAW [Light Anti-Tank Weapon] into it and when we went over to check, there were several dead NVA [the later official count was six] laying there. I wanted their flag, but the Lieutenant told me to leave it because it could be booby trapped."[v4] Throughout the night, the Americans waited for the NVA's heavy artillery to pulverize their positions on the hill, as they done a few weeks earlier at places like LZ Bang Hill. Later, many Americans would be incredulous that they passed up on the opportunity to easily destroy the Marine battalion with unrelenting artillery fire, rather than a costly and unsuccessful ground assault.[vi]

At sunrise, it took Bravo's commander, Captain Black twenty minutes to get to the battalion command post, a walk of usually less than five, because of the damage and carnage all around him. "All along the way," Black recalled, "I saw Marines in tears for the hell they'd undergone and the buddies they lost." [vii]

The NVA took most of their dead when they finally retreated before daybreak, leaving only fifteen bodies behind, nearly half of whom were personally dispatched by Frank Ahearn. He and Ray Smith, classmates at OCS the year before, had just led synchronized charges into the teeth of a resolute enemy assault force, driving them from captured American trench lines and bunkers. Their courage and determination saved this last, isolated battalion at Khe Sanh from being overwhelmed, denying Hanoi a considerable propaganda coup which undoubtedly would have a significant impact on negotiations then underway in Paris to end the war.

The final major battle by Marines at Khe Sanh was not decided by sophisticated weaponry in America's vaunted arsenal, as envisioned by General Westmoreland when the siege had begun six months before, but by the audacity and heroism of the officers and men of rifle platoons meeting the enemy in the dark, face-to-face.

Before the battalion could leave Hill 689, they had to devise a scheme to recover the dead Marines outside the wire. After two days of preparation, the final plan unfolded on the night of July 9. A "box of steel" would be created around the bodies with coordinated machine gun, mortar, and close air support, while two-person "body snatcher" teams, well-camouflaged and faces smeared with black paint, would under cover of darkness move into the box to recover a designated body. The mission was over in thirty minutes, when all but two of the dead were located and recovered. This time, no one was killed in the effort. The Americans finally left Hill 689 on the afternoon of July 12, 1968.

I learned of Tommy's fate 17 days later, while reading U.S. casualty reports in the Stars & Stripes. His name was listed under the heading "Missing in Action." Earlier that month I suspected something might be wrong because of a puzzling interruption in mail from friends and family, especially my mom who wrote almost daily. My unit was then located near the Hué-Phu Bai airfield, about 70 miles southeast of Khe Sanh, and, after reading that Tom was missing, I hitchhiked over to the hospital to see if any men from Bravo Company, 1st Marines might be there.

I found Bruce Bird still recovering from the neck wound he received in his attempt to reach Tom a few weeks before. Bruce said he had heard that Tommy was acting "differently" because of a "Dear John" letter he'd received a few days before walking off the hill and getting killed. Until that moment I thought Tommy was missing-in-action and so was shocked to learn he was dead. Bird told me the rest of the story in a detached, matter-of-fact monotone of one who had seen many men die. Still stunned, I turned to leave. Bruce, sensing my pain, called out to me: "Hey, for what it's worth, if Mahoney hadn't done what he did, the whole platoon would have been lost, shot down with the chopper on the way out."

I suddenly recalled the unusually vivid dream I had back in May 1967, as described earlier, of Tommy being killed on Hill 881 South. At the time I dreamt this, Marines had just fought a well-publicized battle there, which I followed with great interest in the newspapers and on television. I did not mention it to Tom and now wondered if I should have. If I had, and he remembered, would it have made any difference? Like most dreams, I didn't think it would come true, but had since learned firsthand that at pitiless Khe Sanh, the unimaginable was a common occurrence—a lesson once again being painfully reinforced at that moment.

After leaving the hospital, I went back to my hut and intentionally picked a fight with the burliest enlisted man in my platoon, with whom I rarely spoke, and who was more than happy to accommodate, drilling me on the chin with a big right fist, knocking me back through the air onto the plywood floor dazed.

This incident was immediately understood by everyone present. In an environment where to weep was considered a sign of weakness by peers, a cause for doubt about one's toughness and trustworthiness under pressure, I had to do something quickly to extirpate the devastating sorrow I was experiencing. Physically punishing myself for having outlived my friend seemed like an acceptable course of action. Getting one's ass kicked was more dignified than crying.

That evening I wrote a letter to my parents:

Dear Mom & Dad,
I haven't been getting much mail lately. I guess I know why. I read about Tom, we get weekly casualty reports. I'm really going to miss him. He was about the best friend I ever had. I hope his mom will be able to take it.

As for me, I just don't know. I'm sick of it all, this lousy country and this war. A few more months and I'll be leaving and somebody else will take my place. One big waste. That's all it is. Well I'd better go. Take care. I'm O.K. And I'll write again soon. Love, Mike.

MIKE'S LETTER ON THE CONTINUING SEARCH FOR TOM MAHONEY

Tom, JPAC was up on Hill 881 South digging for Mahoney this last summer, but were relying on information from two guys, one Marine and one former NVA, who weren't actually there the day Tommy was killed—and so the excavation unsurprisingly to me) came up empty. Several members of Bravo 1/1 and myself have been trying to tell JPAC every chance we got for the last four years that they were looking on the wrong hill, but for some reason they are adverse to entertaining first-hand information.

To give you an idea how far off they were, visualize walking off the back of that CH-46 in the Hill 881 South exhibit at the National Museum of the Marine Corps. The distant hilltop you see on the mural straight ahead (then called 881 Alpha by the Marines) was guarded by Tommy Mahoney's First Platoon and his body was left behind on the far side of that knoll (out of view) as you look. Yet, the JPAC dug last summer at two sites close together on the 881 South main position almost equivalent to where the exhibit helicopter is located! Anyway, the good people at DPMO (now a new agency) are picking up the ball and have asked me (again) for all the information. They will pass it along to JPAC with a strong recommendation that they at least consider it (since that's where he is!) during their two trips back there this coming summer… so keep your fingers crossed.

TOMMY, YOU ARE NOT FORGOTTEN

BRAVO! Skipper Ken Pipes remembers the actions of 30 March 1968 in the following piece that was published, among other places, in October 2014 for the Military Order of the World Wars.

ED NOTE: THE STORY HAS BEEN TOLD BEFORE, BUT I AM PROUD TO BE WRITING & READING IT OVER AND OVER.

One of the most sobering experiences in life is the responsibility of leading young Marines into the teeth of the enemy knowing that some of them will not come out of it alive. It takes courage, faith, an indomitable spirit, and an unfailing trust in the capabilities of the men entrusted to your care.

Fighting at Khe Sanh, Republic of Vietnam in 1967 –1968, was an ongoing, brutal fight to the death between Marines and soldiers of the North Vietnamese Army. Subsequently, this battle has become the title of a two-hour documentary film, "Bravo! Common Men, Uncommon Valor," produced and directed by Ken and Betty Rodgers. Ken was a member of Bravo Company, First Battalion, 26th Marines, before and during the Siege of Khe Sanh.

On 30 March 1968, Company B, 1st Battalion, 26th Marines (B/1/26) proceeded from the perimeter of the Khe Sanh Combat Base to their predesignated line of departure located near forward units of the North Vietnamese Army's (NVA's) 8th Battalion, 66th Regiment, 304th (Hanoi) Iron Division. Poised against each other in the coming attack were lineal descendants of one of the most famous divisions involved in the siege against the French at Dien Bien Phu in 1954 and elements of the 26th Marines—one of three Marine regiments of the 5th Marine Division that led the assault against Japan's island fortress of Iwo Jima in February/March 1945.

The attack was scheduled for first light, but it was delayed by heavy ground fog that obscured the entire objective area. As the blinding fog began to lift, our Marines, with bayonets fixed, crossed the line of departure outside the wire of the Khe Sanh Combat Base.

Immediately upon commencing the assault, the two lead platoons came under extremely heavy mortar, rocket-propelled grenade, automatic weapons, and small arms fire from the 8th NVA Battalion who occupied extensive, well-constructed, mutually supporting bunkers and trench systems.

Under the umbrella of withering fire from nine batteries of Marine and Army artillery that pummeled the flanks of the objective area and created a rolling barrage 50 to 70 meters in front of the two attack platoons, the Marines began breaching the NVA positions. The fight for fire superiority hung in the balance until the attached flame section and combat engineer detachment entered the fray. As their predecessors did on Iwo Jima, these units, covered and assisted by Marine riflemen, began to blind, blast, and burn their way into the NVA fortifications.

For the next four hours, the Marines of Company B, some of whom had undergone 70-plus days and nights of continuing, killing bombardment by NVA heavy artillery, rocket, mortar, and concentrated sniper fire, gained some measure of retribution as they routed the NVA soldiers from their fiercely defended positions. Within the breached positions, our Marine riflemen were literally walking over the dead and dying NVA defenders.

From the moment of close contact until some four hours later when we received the order to withdraw back into the combat base, the fight was hand to hand, bayonet to bayonet, knife to knife, grenade against grenade, and rifleman against rifleman, with the trump card being, as always, Marines using flamethrowers and combat engineers employing demolitions!

It may seem to some readers that this was just another example of a typical seasoned Marine combat unit doing its job. It was not. The Marine rifle company that attacked the NVA that Saturday morning was not the same company that had moved from Hill 881 South three months earlier to participate in a battalion sweep toward the Laotian border, and then moved into the perimeter of the Khe Sanh Combat Base. The continuous enemy bombardment while we were in the combat base had hurt B/1/26 more than any other similarly-sized defending unit, exacerbated by the tragic loss of most of an entire platoon on 25 February resulting from an ambush by a reinforced company from the 8th NVA Battalion.

Most of the Marines in Company B on 30 March had joined during the siege as replacements after the siege had begun. These young men had traveled a hard road including boot camp, skills training at the Infantry Training Regiment, Staging Battalion at Camp Pendleton, a flight to Vietnam, reporting in to the 26th Marines, exiting the aircraft at the Khe Sanh Combat Base under fire, reporting for assignment to 1st Battalion, and finally, still under fire, joining Company B. To a rifleman, they had no combat experience at the fire team, squad, platoon, or company level.

As it has always been in combat, if it had not been for the leveling skills of a handful of short-timer leaders, privates first class and corporals, led by an experienced company executive officer, company gunnery sergeant, and outstanding platoon commanders, the execution of this company-sized raid on 30 March 1968 would never have moved beyond our frontline trenches.

As noted by the commanding officer of 1/26 and the S–3 (operations officer) who planned the company raid, "The members of Company B performed individually and collectively in a manner normally expected only of seasoned and combat-experienced Marines."

I believe that their brilliant feat can only be attributed to their deep and overriding desire to avenge the prior loss of Marines of their company, most of whom they never knew or met! To them and them alone goes the credit for executing, arguably, the first successful company-sized offensive assault outside the wire since the ambush of their mates on 25 February, and for making it such a success!

These Marines totally decimated the 8th NVA Battalion, including the enemy battalion commander and his staff. In so doing, intercepted enemy radio traffic revealed the Marines of Company B killed at least 115 NVA officers and soldiers and wounded an untold number of their survivors.

Still later, Marines from B/1/26 (none above the rank of corporal) who had participated in the raid, were awarded two Navy Crosses, nine Silver Stars, eight Bronze Stars, and two Navy Commendation Medals with Combat "V" for valor for individual acts of courage, gallantry, and heroism! Additionally, Marines received over 100 Purple Hearts, with several of these Marines earning their awards for receiving a second and third wound.

Subsequent to the fighting on 30 March 1968, the company was the recipient of the following from the commanding general of the Military Assistance Command, Vietnam:

Officers and men of B/1/26 USMC deserve highest praise for aggressive patrol action north of Khe Sanh on 30 March. Heavy casualties inflicted on bunkers and entrenched enemy forces indicate typical Marine esprit de corps and professionalism. Well done!

Gen William Westmoreland

Just as is the case with their predecessors from Iwo Jima, to a man, the Khe Sanh Marines of Company B remain intensely proud of their 26th Marines heritage! We will always feel we were privileged to serve with Bravo's young, inexperienced, Marine infantrymen that fateful Saturday morning. We were truly in the company of men who were, are, and will always be, "The Immortals!"

Lieutenant Colonel Pipes was the Officer Commanding Bravo Company, First Battalion, 26th Marines, during the Siege of the Khe Sanh Combat Base, TET, 1968, RVN. Ken and his wife, Sharon, have lived in Fallbrook, California since their retirement from the Marine Corps in 1982. They have been married for 52 years. Ken, Sharon and their sons, Dan and Tim, are all members of MOWW's MajGen Pendleton Chapter, CA.

GOVERNING RULES FOR OPERATIONS OF THE KHE SANH VETERANS, INC. SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION:

1. The purpose of the Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. Scholarship Foundation (KSVSF) is to provide financial aid to high school graduates who plan to attend an accredited institution as a full time student OR who are currently enrolled full time in an accredited post-secondary curriculum.
2. Scholarships will be awarded to applicant students who have at least one parent, legal guardian, or grandparent who is a paid member in good standing of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., a 501(c)(19) charitable organization.
3. IT IS THE RESPONSIBILITY OF THE STUDENT TO SEE THAT THE SCHOLARSHIP APPLICATION REQUIREMENTS ARE FULLY COMPLETED AND SENT DIRECTLY TO THE SCHOLARSHIP CHAIR BEFORE 5/1/2015 AT THE ADDRESS BELOW;

Mr. Dan Fisher
KSVSF Committee Chairman
6050 52nd St. North
Oakdale, -1MN 55128317

CRITERIA FOR SELECTION

Applicants must be the legal child or grandchild of a paid up member of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. (See member definition in the KSV Association bylaws.) This includes deceased, life members of KSV and those Khe Sanh Veterans listed as KIA/MIA in Vietnam if family members are paid up, associate members of KSV, Inc. Children or grandchildren of KSV associate members are not eligible.
Information provided by each candidate on the attached application forms will focus on the following qualities considered for selection to KSVSF financial aid: good grades, character, citizenship, leadership experience and personal essay. A point selection system is included in the application forms.
Examples of these above mentioned qualities could be in the classroom, in extracurricular activities or in service to the community, church or nation.
A Scholarship Foundation Review Committee will serve the President of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., and will accept, review and grade each correctly completed application. This committee will provide a scholarship financial report and short summaries of the selected candidates at the annual KSV reunion for publication in the "Red Clay" Newsletter.

SCHOLARSHIP AWARDS

The amount of financial award per applicant will be determined by the Review Committee's scoring results. The awards will be granted for a maximum of 4 years per student. A new application will be required for each continuous year applied.

Achievement Award Levels are:

The Col. David E. Lownds Award – for top achievement in Application Review (one award or tie)
The Sgt. Major James T. Gaynor Award – for high achievement in Application Review (5 awards)
The Col. William H. Dabney Award – for honorable achievement in Application Review (6 awards)

2. The KSV Scholarship money will be awarded upon presentation of proof of registration for the appropriate term. Proof of registration should be sent to the chairman's address on page one of this application.

Scholarship Guidelines and Purpose

1. The financial award is to be used to help defray costs of tuition, fees and books at an accredited institution of the applicant's choice as a full time student.

2. If a recipient of the KSVSF scholarship does not enter a post high school institution during the next school year, the award for his/her benefit shall be cancelled and the money awarded to an alternate applicant. An alternate of each scholarship award is to be chosen at the time of selection of recipients.

3. The KSVSF Committee Chair and the Treasurer of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., will send a check for the full years' award amount to the selected students upon final approval by the KSV President.

4. The recipient of a scholarship shall be notified no later than the end of the month of August of the coming school year.

5. Scholarship Applications must be received by the Committee Chair on or before MAY 1 of the school year applied for.  (This is an important, NEW change to previous years)**

6. KSV, Inc. Scholarship recipients must agree to maintain a standard of personal performance both in and out of school that conforms to the moral standards set down by Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., members.

7. Criteria: Point Selection System /Maximum of 100 regular points or 115 with bonus points

a. Scholastic achievement / grade point average. Max = 40 points max. (Please attach last school GPA transcript) example below:

A GPA of 4.0 x 10 = 40 points or a GPA of 3.0 x 10 = 30 points

b. Extracurricular activities. Max = 30 points total

Description of personal experience in the following type of activities (Be specific!);

Student government = 10 points max.

Community related services = 10 points max.

Other (i.e. work experience, sports) = 10 points max.

c. KSV SCHOLARHIP ESSAY (250 words min. to 400 words max) on educational goals, career goals = 30 points max.

Over decades countless adjectives have tried to describe Khe Sanh Veterans and their historic accomplishments. Please review the six suggested adjectives below, select one or more that might relate to you in some manner to explain how this is evident in your life's experiences and will help you in meeting your educational and career goals.

TENACIOUS FAITHFUL UNDAUNTED STEADFAST RESOLUTE INNOVATIVE

d. Bonus Points = 10 bonus points for being a military veteran

= 5 bonus points for an accredited college GPA (Grade Point Average) transcript

The Anthem Veterans Memorial, located in Anthem, Arizona, is a monument dedicated to honoring the service and sacrifice of the United States armed forces. The pillar provides a place of honor and reflection for veterans, their family and friends, and those who want to show their respects to those service men and women who have and continue to courageously serve the United States.

Once a Year at 11:11 am the Sun Shines Perfectly on this Memorial At precisely 11:11 a.m. each Veterans Day (Nov. 11), the sun's rays pass through the ellipses of the five Armed Services pillars to form a perfect solar spotlight over a mosaic of The Great Seal of the United States.

The memorial was designed by Anthem resident Renee Palmer-Jones. The five marble pillars represent the five branches of the United States military. They are staggered in size (from 17 ft to 6 ft) and ordered in accordance with the Department of Defense prescribed precedence, ranging from the United States Army, the United States Marine Corps, the United States Navy, the United States Air Force and the United States Coast Guard Vietnam veterans with Agent Orange diseases continue to march into the Vietnam Wall to join their fallen brothers. These men and women will not be remembered as fatalities of the Vietnam War. Their names will not be engraved onto the wall…yet they are still victims of the Vietnam War! These veterans have died slow deaths BECAUSE of their country and won't be remembered as dying FOR their country. This is truly a gripping photograph of the Vietnam Memorial in Rochester, New York. HOW MANY PEOPLE HAVE REALLY DIED FROM THE VIETNAM WAR?

"ALL IS CALM, ALL IS BRIGHT" FOR THE LAST TIME AT KHE SANH

By LTCOL JAMES B. WILKINSON, USMC (RET)

REPRINTED FROM LEATHER NECK MAGAZINE DECEMBER 2004 WITH PERMISSION

In the spring of 1965, units of the 9th Marine Expeditionary Brigade arrived in South Vietnam. As they stormed ashore, ready for battle, lovely young ladies welcomed them with floral bouquets. The Marines were given the mission of protecting the airfield at Da Nang and were soon patrolling the surrounding villages and paddies. Their enemy, clad primarily in black pajama-like garments, supported the National Liberation Front of South Vietnam and were called Viet Congo Armed with single-shot rifles, punji stakes and other rudimentary weapons, they were a formidable foe, blending in with farmers and villagers when not setting up ambushes or planning other actions against the Marines.

Identifying Viet Cong was a major challenge. It was reminiscent of a vintage Western with John Wayne as the grizzled, old Indian fighter. When a cavalry officer reports, "We just saw a patrol of Apaches!" Wayne replies, "Sir, if you saw them, they weren't Apache."

By 1967 American forces in South Vietnam numbered approximately 500,000 troops. Marines included the First and Third Marine divisions plus supporting forces, including a variety of Marine aviation units. The Marines were assigned to I Corps, in the northern portion of South Vietnam. The enemy also had grown from a poorly equipped but effective group of Viet Cong into a far more capable force. Large numbers of well-trained and equipped units of the North Vietnamese Army had moved into South Vietnam. Their arsenal included the old reliable AK47 rifle, rocket-propelled grenades, rockets, field artillery and an up-to-date communications and command structure.

Like the Viet Cong, the North Vietnamese units proved hard to locate. But in the spring of 1967, friendly patrols detected enemy forces in the extreme northwestern corner of I Corps. The enemy was present in well-placed fighting positions and bunkers in the vicinity of Hills 881 South, 881 North and 861. Several Marine infantry battalions were tasked with destroying the enemy units. The ensuing conflicts became known as "hill battles" with both sides suffering heavy casualties.

When the fighting ended, the Marines occupied Hills 881 South, 861, 950 and Khe Sanh Combat Base. Hill 881 North was not occupied. The enemy withdrew, probably across the border into Laos where they could regroup and take on replacements that moved south along the Ho Chi Minh Trail.

American leaders at very high levels decided to maintain a force at Khe Sanh Combat Base. Their strategy was to lure the North Vietnamese into a set -piece battle, where air and artillery coupled with the courage of the individual American fighting man would prevail. The enemy viewed a future battle for Khe Sanh as another Dien Bien Phu the French outpost the North Vietnamese had battered day and night with artillery and ground attacks. The French surrendered Dien Bien Phu in 1954 after suffering extremely heavy casualties. This decisive battle led to the defeat of French forces in Vietnam. Like Khe Sanh, Dien Bien Phu was located close to Laos.

In August 1967, Colonel David E. Lownds assumed command of the 26th Marine Regiment. During most of 1967 he had only one battalion under his command. The 26th Marines were part of the 5th-MarDiv. However, when additional forces were needed in Vietnam, the regiment was moved from Camp Pendleton,Calif., and became part of the 3dMarDiv.

For the last half of 1967, up until Christmas, life at Khe Sanh Combat Base was uneventful. The defense of the base, Hills 861, 881 South and 950 remained with 1st Bn, 26th Marines. That battalion also was responsible for security of the bridge over the Rao Quan River. A rifle company was given the mission. Every six or seven weeks, companies would be reshuffled to and from the hills, to the base or to the bridge.

Life on the hills was far more Spartan than life at the base, with C-rations delivered by two ancient UH-34 Seahorse helicopters. The helicopters were so old their Marine passengers joked that the old "birds" suffered from mental fatigue.

When the squad-size patrols left the hills, the triple-canopied jungle, which began a few hundred yards from each hill position, enveloped them. Patrols oftentimes stayed out for several days, even during heavy monsoons or "cratchins," (The French used le crachin to describe light rain, coupled with fog.)

By comparison, life at the base in the days leading up to Christmas was a picnic. Even a few jury rigged showers were available. When operational, a laundry unit would attempt to scrub out the red hue from each article of clothing it received. M16 rounds, occasionally left in pockets of utility clothing, sometimes exploded, creating more than a little stress in the laundry unit. A cold beer would be available every now and then to troops at the base. A bunker-type structure, probably dating back to when the French occupied the base, served as a "club" for officers and staff noncommissioned officers. Mess halls included one operated for regimental headquarters personnel and another operated by 1st Bn.

Monsoon rains turned the Rao Quan River into a dangerous torrent, dictating the removal of the bridge by Marine engineers. After the bridge was removed from Route 9, food was in short supply at Khe Sanh, as Route 9 had been the sole overland supply route from Da Nang across the northern part of South Vietnam. From then on, everything arrived by air.

Thanksgiving provided a rare treat at the base: turkey with some but not all of the trimmings. Shortly after Thanksgiving, a food shortage meant that only two meals were served daily. Breakfast almost always included blueberry hotcakes. The second meal was a thin soup and a sandwich, usually bologna. Anyone desiring more substance could always find a can of ham and limas or other choice morsels from a box of C-rations.

In other parts of Vietnam, occasional USA shows would provide entertainment and a break from the monotony of day-to-day life. Unfortunately, these entertainment units could not visit Khe Sanh. Individual celebrities would sometimes fly in, spend an hour or so and then head out to other such outposts. These were dubbed "handshake" visits.

One such celebrity who appeared just before Christmas was Robert Stack, the star of "The Untouchables." He posed for photographs with the troops. The last entertainment before Christmas was provided by a small detachment from the 3dMarDiv Band. They sloshed through the mud, playing a mixture of martial music and Christmas tunes as they visited troops manning the trench lines and bunkers protecting Khe Sanh.

As Christmas approached, the cratchins continued to overwhelm the area. When the sun broke through, the two UH-34 helicopters usually stationed at Khe Sanh proceeded with the daily logistical flights from the combat base to Hills 861 and 881 South.

Getting onto the outpost on Hill 950 was especially challenging. While Hills 881 South and 861 could be visible from the airstrip at Khe Sanh, fog frequently surrounded Hill 950. Reaching 950 on foot was a difficult, if not impossible, task as the approaches to the hill were extremely steep. Crossing the flooded Rao Quan, which ran between Khe Sanh Combat Base and Hill 950, was dangerous for Marine infantrymen. Earlier in the year, prior to the monsoon rains, the NVA had attacked Hill 950 and came close to over-running the outpost. Defending Marines called in artillery on their own small position and avoided defeat.

Improving positions was a never-completed task at Khe Sanh. Units from a Naval Mobile Construction Battalion (Seabee) were assigned to Khe Sanh to improve the airstrip, a monumental task during the monsoon just before Christmas. Begging, bribing or even using the chain of command resulted in a remarkable event involving the Seabees. A few of the Seabees briefly left their round-the- clock mission of upgrading the airstrip. Using a backhoe and other implements, an additional trench line was dug outside a portion of the regular trench line. With the battalion stretched thin, lst Bn lacked the resources to man the new trench line. They did, however, put in a formidable addition to the defenses by installing double apron and concertina barbed wire outside the new trench line. These efforts paid big dividends later when an Army of the Republic of South Vietnam Ranger battalion reported to Khe Sanh. They were moved into the new trenches that had been installed along a major avenue of approach leading toward the base.

Obtaining wood to help improve and provide support for sandbags as overhead protection proved difficult. Most sturdy trees were well away from Khe Sanh and were so filled with shrapnel from the previous hill battles that saws and axes were useless in felling them. Trenches were continually damaged by the heavy monsoon rains.

As Christmas neared, intelligence sources revealed that North Vietnamese forces were beginning to amass around Khe Sanh. "Many hoof prints coming in, no hoof prints going out." "Bravo" Co from the division reconnaissance battalion was based at Khe Sanh and reported increased signs of the enemy. Khe Sanh was also home for a U.S. Army Special Forces forward operations base, FOB-3, which housed a Special Observations Group (SOG). Dozens of black Huey helicopters appeared periodically at FOB-3, loaded troops, then headed westward. One of their missions was to obtain information along the Ho Chi Minh Trail. They also made frequent attempts to interdict the trail and capture prisoners. Scuttlebutt had it that SOG received orders directly from Saigon.

A small U.S. Air Force Tiger Hound unit operating from Khe Sanh provided additional intelligence. Pilots and aerial observers, flying Piper Cub-size aircraft dubbed 0-1 Bird Dogs, confirmed heavy enemy movement toward Khe Sanh. This galvanized everyone at Khe Sanh. The North Vietnamese Army was up to something, and it would happen soon.

The movement of the rifle company from the bridge site across the Rao Quan River back to Khe Sanh provided additional manpower just before Christmas. A few more surprises were added to Khe Sanh's defenses. One of these involved installing lethal fougasse-a mixture of gasoline, oil and various explosives in 55-gallon drums, just outside the barbed wire and along other avenues of approach.

The drums proved doubly useful when filled with gasoline and diesel fuel. They were placed around the perimeter to mark friendly lines. During a major attack, they would have been lighted to outline the perimeter. Specially outfitted Air Force aircraft, dubbed "Puff, the Magic Dragon" and armed with modern-day high-powered Gatling guns, could use the burning oil drums as markers to avoid casualties from friendly fire.

In mid-December, 3d Bn, 26th Marines, commanded by Lieutenant Colonel Harry L. Alderman, returned to Khe Sanh. Use of the airstrip had become a challenge during the preceding two months. A Navy construction battalion detachment worked around-the-clock to repair rain damage. The regimental commander, Col Lownds, spent hours alongside the Seabees, providing encouragement and advice. Because of the need for illumination for the work force on the airstrip, "light discipline" at the base basically was nonexistent.

Signs of increased enemy activity were reported almost daily by the patrols from Bravo Co, 3d Reconnaissance Bn. The patrols by the companies on the hills revealed recently abandoned field kitchens and directional markers along trails that resulted in an edgy, tense feeling that the enemy was preparing for battle. Villages of Bru Montagnards were nearby along Route 9. The tribes had endured poor treatment from other Vietnamese for generations. Maps were dotted with the names of Bru villages, now marked "Village destroyed."

Weather permitting, the hills into Laos were visible each day, where the Ho Chi Minh Trail operated like Interstate 95 carrying the enemy south. Battlefield intelligence revealed that large numbers of the enemy in division strength were stopping around Khe Sanh. Higher-level intelligence, such as delicate sensors, radio interceptions and prisoner interrogation, revealed that the enemy was close by and in considerable numbers.

As Christmas neared, several well armed, hard-core NVA divisions were nearby. Where could such a large number of enemy fighters find shelter? Michael Herr, author of "Dispatches," a highly acclaimed book about the war in Vietnam, spent time in and around Khe Sanh and in his book describes the area as follows: "The Highlands of Vietnam are spooky, unbearably spooky, spooky beyond belief. They are a run of erratic mountain ranges, gnarled valleys, jungled ravines." The media latched onto the story and began comparing the past tragic battle for Dien Bien Phu to a future battle for Khe Sanh Combat Base. The feelings of the Marines ranged from uneasy to "let them come; we're ready."

In spite of the increasing tension, life went on as usual at the base. Troops continued to go on rest and relaxation trips as scheduled. Married Marines usually chose Hawaii, where they met their wives. Single Marines chose more exotic locations, such as Bangkok. Mail from home increased as family and friends remembered the troops with Christmas packages of candy, cookies and photos from home.

Dick Camp Jr., commander of Lima Co, 3d Bn, 26th Marines, has vivid memories of Christmas Eve 1967. His battalion had just returned to Khe Sanh Combat Base after spending several days sweeping the adjacent jungles. His company gunnery sergeant approached him and asked where he should put the packages. Busy getting his company settled in, Capt Camp impatiently told the "gunny" to put them anywhere. Several minutes later Camp saw Marines stacking box after box of Christmas packages that became a gigantic pile near his CP foxhole. Girl Scouts from his hometown had collected hundreds of boxes of cookies. Some members of the company also had received a few small baby bottles containing various alcoholic beverages. The battalion provided half-frozen eggnog, nonalcoholic of course, and each Marine and corpsman received a box of cookies plus other goodies, as available.

The sounds of battle from Hill 950 came from Second Lieutenant Marshall "Skip" Wells' 3d Platoon, Charlie Co, 1st Bn, 26th Marines, as they repelled an enemy attempt to overrun the hill position. The days around Christmas had been designated a ceasefire period by both sides. Following their usual procedure, the NVA, trying to catch the enemy off guard, launched an attack on 950.

On Christmas Day Col Lownds hopped on board a UH-34. He had the crew tie a green smoke grenade on one side and a red smoke grenade on the other. The pilot circled each hill outpost, then circled the Special Forces camp at Lang Vei. While green and red smoke streamed from the helicopter, Col-Lownds stood at the door waving a Christmas greeting to all the valiant troops who, in less than 30 days, would fight in one of the most epic battles of the war.

Despite Three Wounds, He Remained With His Marines

Although wounded in action during the Christmas Eve action, Marshall "Skip" Wells remained with his platoon for several months. He was awarded the Bronze Star Medal for his heroic leadership during the battle for Hill 950. Later in his tour, he received two additional Purple Hearts. His comrades claim that Skip received several other wounds that were not reported during the remainder of his tour. After his third Purple Heart, he received orders out of country.

Skip Wells returned to Vietnam in 1971-72, serving as an advisor to the Vietnamese Marine Corps. He earned the Silver Star during that assignment. In 1989 he retired from the Marine Corps and now lives in Colorado, working as a counselor to county prisoners. When recently questioned about his gallantry in repelling the enemy assault on Hill 950 Christmas Eve, Skip, a soft-spoken Marine, modestly explained, "I had a lot of help."

LtCol James B. Wilkinson, USMC (Ret)

LTCMDR Ray W. Stubbe, a 1/26 chaplain, arrived at Khe Sanh in the summer of 1967 and remained with the Marines, making daily diary entries, until the battle for Khe Sanh was over.

Sunlight streamed down on Khe Sanh Combat Base in the distance as clouds shaded the Marine outpost atop Hill 950 in the foreground. The NVA marked the Christmas 1967 cease fire with a ground attack on Hill 950.

OBIT

KENNETH MARTIN, USMC
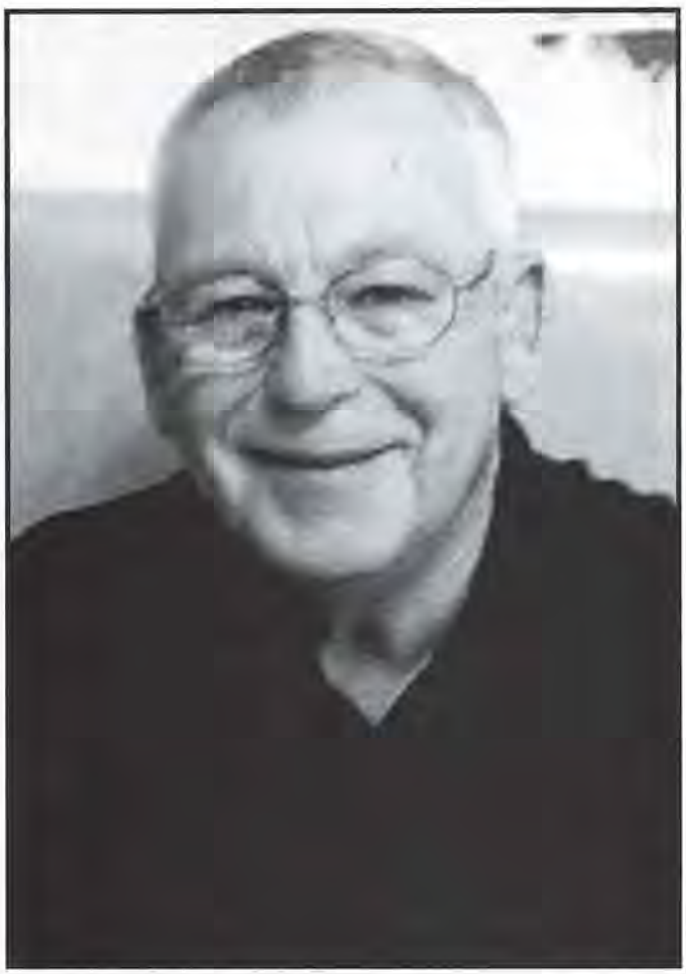
BRAVO CO 3RD RECON

Ken was born on January 31, 1948, to Tanner and Evelyn Martin in Cottage Grove, Oregon. Ken was the first of three sons. On Tuesday, May 26, 2015, Ken lost his brief battle with lung cancer, a strand caused by exposure to Agent Orange during the Vietnam War. Ken was 67 years of age.



Ken attended Days Creek High School for his freshman and sophomore years and was sophomore Class President; Myrtle Creek High School as a junior and South Umpqua High School for his senior year. Ken was in the first graduating class from SUHS in 1966. Voted "best all around" by his classmates, Ken surely was. He was a man you knew you could count on. An avid athlete, Ken participated in football, basketball, wresting and track throughout high school.

After graduation, Ken enlisted with the United States Marine Corps. He received his Basic Training in San Diego, additional training at Camp Pendleton, and was soon among the many young men sent to Vietnam. Ken served with Bravo Company, 3rd Recon.

Ken would come home from Vietnam bearing three Purple Heart Medals; the National Defense Service Medal; the Vietnamese Service Medal; the Vietnamese Campaign Medal; the Presidential Unit Citation; the Combat Action Ribbon and Rifle Sharpshooters Badge. Ken saved countless lives while fighting during the siege at Khe Sanh.

Ken met his wife Linda in Roseburg and they would have two daughters. Linda was one of the best things to happen to Ken. The family enjoyed many camping trips over the years with friends and family. Ken never made a secret of how much he loved his family. Ken was employed with James A Graf Trucking for 36 years as a log truck driver.

After retiring from trucking, Ken was a volunteer at the Roseburg VA as a patient escort. To date, Ken had volunteered over 2,500 hours. He was well loved by his co-workers and fellow veterans. Ken was a member of the Khe Sanh Veteran Association and enjoyed attending annual reunions. The bond between his Khe Sanh brothers is eternal.

Ken is survived by his wife of 33 years, Linda Martin; their daughters Melissa (Andrew) Georgesen and Kendra (Jason) Schroeder; his granddaughter Ella Rose Georgesen; and brothers Gary (Carole) Martin and Mike (Juanita) Martin. Ken was blessed to be an uncle to special niece Nancy Martin. Ken is survived by many family members, including nieces and nephews Kristy, Michael, and Brian Martin. Ken will be missed by numerous close friends who were like family to him.

Ken was laid to rest on Friday, June 5, 2015, at 11 a.m. at the VA National Cemetery in Roseburg. There was a Celebration of Life to honor Ken also on Friday, June 5, 2015

The one he was most proud was the D-Company, 3D medical Battalion 3rdMarine Division (Rein) FMF in the Republic of Vietnam Dec 14, 1966 to April 1, 1967.

James was very proud of his 3 children Sheila, Kate and Mark and Grandson William David Craig Canter. James loved to spend time with his family, and reconnect with past family, friends and comrades from his service time. James is a lifetime member of the VFW, DAV, American Legion post 0501 and is an eternally bonded member of the KHE SANH VETERANS. James received the following medals: Presidential Unit Citation, Vietnamese campaign medical with device, Vietnam service medal with Bronze Star, National Defense service, Good Conduct medal and The Purple Heart. James Canter's life was celebrated on March 22, 2015 in Monona, WI with Full Military Honors.

James will be remembered for his quick wit, his love and commitment to friends and family, his love for his country and his Cherokee Heritage. He had a unique ability to inspire others to achieve their goals and always to do better in their lives. James always found the good in others and made sure everyone knew they were special. His famous words that he lived by were "Be Kind to Each Other".

DAVID SPRY, USMC
ECHO CO 2/26 HILL 861A

David was born March 16,1948 in Forest Lake, MN. His father ran a funeral home and sold used cars on the side. His mother was a homemaker. David had a brother, Tom, who was eleven years older. Tom was a cadet at the Naval Academy. One snowy, evening, while home on leave, Tom went to a nearby town to pick up a car part for his Dad. He was hit by a drunk driver and lived for a few hours in the hospital but ultimately died. Tom's death destroyed the family. His mother grieved deeply and never really recovered. I say this next piece not to disparage anyone but to share the pathos that permeated David's life, and all our lives for that matter...On many occasions David's mother would cry and tell David, "I wish it would have been you who died."

David described himself as a prankster growing up. He was either in roller skates or ice skates and was told he should have been born with wheels on. He also played baseball and football and loved the sciences. He played in "a crappy band and was a mediocre singer and a mediocre bass player." He stole cars, went joy riding and was generally in search of a good time. David was popular with the ladies in high school as he was a jock AND had a car and in the sixties you only needed one of those two things for social standing.

One of David's favorite stories from childhood involved fishing. He and a friend had gone out to the lake for a day of fishing. After many hours and no fish they were about to give up. At that moment, their black lab jumped into the water and came back with a 5 pound grouper. The fish did not have a mark on it. The boys were going to pass the fish off as their catch but they thought they better make it look real. So David picked up the spear and aimed at the fish. He missed the fish but did manage to put a hole in his father's boat. They had no choice but to tell the truth at that point!

David joined the Marines straight out of high school as he had become aware of the plight of the Vietnamese people , wanted to help, and thought the Marines offered the best chance of survival and he didn't want to be drafted to the Army. He went to Vietnam in late 1967 with E/2/26. David joined the Marines on the buddy plan with a friend, Gary, from his hometown of Lincoln, NE. His buddy did not make it home. When David did return home himself, right before Christmas in 1968, his mother insisted he spend Christmas with the family of his deceased buddy, which David did. He continued to visit the family on holidays for the next ten years. David, of course, felt guilty about talking Gary in to joining and tried to offer some comfort as sort of a surrogate son.

As mentioned, David was an athlete, strong and healthy. Boot camp was not difficult for him. Others were not so lucky. David became friends with a guy who was a little on the scrawny side and had difficulty with the maneuvers and exercises. David would help him out however he could by doing things such as carry some of his gear when no one was looking. The DI rode this guy hard and he began to show signs of mental distress. David did his best to encourage the guy. One evening some one yelled for David from the back of their barracks. The guy had shot himself in the head.

David's MOS was the ubiquitous 0311. David had a girlfriend named Janet, when he shipped out to Vietnam. David wrote her name on his helmet and they corresponded intermittently throughout his enlistment. When David returned from Vietnam in 1968, he found that Janet was engaged to someone else. David was grateful that he never got that "Dear John" letter in Vietnam, as, false as it was, Janet gave him something to look forward to…

David had not been in country all that long before he got shot in the arm in a friendly fire incident. He was sent to Da Nang, initially, and after some stabilization, was moved to a smaller hospital. While there, the hospital took some incoming and the building collapsed on David. He sustained serious head and facial injuries resulting in numerous reconstructive surgeries and a lengthy recovery. Even years later, David regularly had to have some sort of facial surgery for problems that would crop up from this initially injury. In another incident, David dove into a pipe at the Khe Sanh Combat Base during an incoming round. The round basically landed on top of the pipe and caused David to loose his hearing.

When finally ready to be discharged from the hospital the CO there said "You need to rejoin your company because they're getting the hell beat out of them up there at Khe Sanh. They're completely surrounded and things don't look good". The problem was finding someone to fly him in. Originally troops were being flown in on C-130's but those got shot down, then C-123s, and those got shot down. Then choppers on a limited basis. The enemy had the runway dialed in and were attacking from the nearby hills of Laos so even supplies had to eventually be dropped in by parachute as the landing strip was so dangerous.

After a couple of days, David finally found a chopper going in and there was a total of six guys headed to Khe Sanh. One thing David had figured out by then was that the last one loaded on was the first one loaded off so he made sure he was that guy. On approach to Khe Sanh David noticed there were bursts of light coming in a straight line from the fuselage. He realized these were bullet holes. About 20 feet off the runway, the pilot got hit by incoming and the helicopter jerked to the right and David literally fell out the back, got tossed in an arch upward and fell landing on his helmet and his pack. He got the wind knocked out of him. By the time he stood up he saw that the helicopter had crashed and the pilot had been badly injured and several other guys were injured to a lesser degree and were scrambling out.

By this time, David's company was already out on Hill 861 Alpha. David's CO, Captain Earle Breeding said, "Listen...you already have two purple hearts and you are just getting over dysentery. I'm assigning you to mail call duty. So, along with mail call came an additional duty. While delivering the mail, David would meet guys face to face and get to know where they were from as he checked addresses before delivering. So David was familiar with many more people than the average guy. The worst thing about all this was that David was asked to identify dead bodies. They were housed in a storage bin all double bagged, piled one on top of the other. Each one was wrapped in a translucent sheet that you could see through and then in a zippered black bag, double tagged inside, top and bottom. At one point, David was asked to identify a friend, Joe Roble. In the process, he identified a kid who had only been there one day. The kid only knew David and one other guy. When David finally found Joe he found Joe had a blast injury to the right side of his neck and his head was hanging on by a few neck veins on the left and some cervical vertebrae. David knew it was Joe as he recognized a little scar he had above his right eyebrow. At one time Joe was wounded while burning trash. A live grenade was in the trash pit and cooked off, wounding Joe in the forehead.

When Joe was sent home, David heard that his mother insisted on seeing his body, even though the military did not advise that. She had been told he was decapitated. The heavy closure stitches that were used to sew his neck together from left posterior to right posterior gave the appearance that his head had been in fact decapitated and then sewn back on. Several years later at a reunion, David was able to speak with Joe's mother telling her that he, David, was the last person who saw him and his neck had been blasted but he was not decapitated. When Mrs. Roble heard David's description she heaved a sigh of relief. David said no mother wants to picture her son decapitated and that their meeting was a healing of sorts.

Some time after Khe Sanh the military insisted David take some time off. He hadn't wanted to go on R and R as he was saving money for a new corvette, which he did end up buying. The military compromised be allowing David and a couple of other guys to act in a courier capacity in lieu of R and R but they had to leave Vietnam. So, they assigned David to a project escorting six dead Royal Thai Military in their silver, aluminum coffins, back to Thailand. The coffins were stored in a shipping container. The temperature outside was 120 degrees. The aluminum held in the heat and inside the containers it was probably 180 degrees. They loaded the coffins on the back of a C-130. When they reached altitude the cabin was pressurized. Shortly thereafter, creaking and popping sounds could be heard coming from the coffins. The handles securing them started breaking off due to the heat and the changes in pressure. They began popping open. The stench of the hot, bloated, dead bodies was unbearable. David and the others started heaving their guts out. Everyone in the cargo area of the plane was sick. The crew ended up dropping the back lift gate and depressurizing the cabin to allow some air flow. The lift gate was tilted up instead of down and they were all hanging over the back end, heaving continuously. When they finally reached their destination, David tidied up the coffins and delivered them to their destination. Once delivered David was asked if there were any problems in transit, to which he replied, "No, none what-so-ever."

After Vietnam, David met his wife of twenty years, Penny. They lived in the same apartment building when they met. They had two children, Jason and Robin. David went to college on the GI bill and majored in Biology. David also liked geology and philosophy and was probably the only person who ever actually enjoyed organic chemistry. Originally, David wanted to go to medical school and became a doctor. It became impossible once David realized you can't use a stethoscope with hearing aids. Instead, he tried a few different things and ended up in sales.

David did, in addition to his sales career, become a paramedic and in 1995, took a trip back to Vietnam and participated in medical screening and treatment in the villages. He always carried an emergency treatment kit in his car.

Throughout David's adult life he devoted hundreds of hours helping other veterans. David was well known to the Nebraska legislature as he was regularly challenging erratic VA policies and lobbying for better care and benefits for veterans. In order to assist people in filing VA claims, he would sometimes write briefs . One of those a couple of years ago, was 160 pages long. There are many people who benefited form David's efforts. He did all of this without compensation of any kind.

David was also a mentor and a benefactor to Vietnamese immigrants and spoke fluent Vietnamese. He would help them negotiate the Small Business Administration policies and help them get started in business. To this day, some of David's most loyal friends have been South Vietnamese immigrants.

David liked to dance, enjoyed good food, could talk to anyone about anything, and honestly earned the nickname Mr. Fix It. David would help any body with any thing any time. He was highly intelligent and just a little quirky. David was devoted to the Khe Sanh Veteran's organization. Of all the things for which he was proud, being a Khe Sanh Veteran was number one on his list.

One very fond memory I have of David was his ability to tell a good joke. No one, but David, knew as many jokes where the main character was a frog, often in a bar, each time with a fresh twist that you couldn't help laughing at.

I once asked David if there were any period in time he could live in what would it be. Without missing a beat David answered, Vietnam. "It was exciting, it was dangerous, it was invigorating...it was the most alive I have ever felt. Sure, I have the nightmares, the flashbacks, the PTSD, the hearing loss-but I wouldn't trade it for anything."

HAPPY BIRTHDAY "DOC'S, WE LOVE YOU GUYS

We extend my sincerest thanks and appreciation to the Navy Hospital Corps commemorating 117 years of faithful and committed service.

President William McKinley signed an act of Congress in 1898 establishing the Hospital Corps. Since the first 25 apothecaries were appointed by the secretary of the Navy, the Hospital Corps has grown immeasurably in size and scope.

Today, we honor their bravery, brilliance and sacrifice while serving in harm's way to protect the lives of our Sailors and Marines. From the Revolutionary War to current overseas operations, corpsmen have served heroically and gallantly.

They stand ready to heed the call, "corpsman up," tending to the sick and injured on the sea, under the sea, in the air and on the battlefield.

No Marine has ever taken a hill without a corpsman, and when they do, they take comfort knowing that "doc" is by their side.

In 1902, corpsmen learned their profession at the Navy's first corps school at Naval Hospital Portsmouth.

Today, they receive extensive training at Navy Medicine Education and Training Command in Fort Sam Houston, Texas, and the quality of their training has not changed. It's evident that corpsmen are selflessly dedicated to caring for patients worldwide. Because of their exceptional and comprehensive training, we are experiencing the lowest battle mortality and non-battle injury rates in the history of war.

The Navy Hospital Corps is the largest and most decorated rate in the Navy. Twenty-two corpsmen have received Medals of Honor, among many other awards. Additionally, 20 naval ships have been named in honor of corpsmen worldwide. Since the end of World War I, 178 corpsmen have been awarded the Navy Cross. During the Vietnam War alone, corpsmen were awarded four medals of honor, 31 navy crosses, 179 silver stars, and 292 bronze stars for heroism while under fire. This recognition is a humbling testament to the quality of character and integrity of the men and women proudly wearing the caduceus and answer to "doc."

Today we pay our admiration to their courage in battle; the empathy they provide to those in need during humanitarian assistance and disaster response efforts; their desire to do the right thing; and their outstanding commitment to mission readiness at our military treatment facilities across the globe. These heroic individuals ensure our nation has a medically-ready, fighting force, while providing compassionate patient and family-centered health care.

To the more than 30,000 active duty and reserve corpsmen globally, thank you for your steadfast and fearless service at home and overseas. Happy birthday Hospital Corps!

KHE SANH VETERAN AIDES RECOVERY OF MARINE REMAINS LOST ON TARAWA FOR 70 YEARS GLENN PRENTICE– INDIA CO 3/26 & CHARLIE BTRY 1/13

Glenn has been volunteering with History Flight a non-profit NGO that works in Europe and the South Pacific recovering WWII MIA--For the last four year he has been the South Pacific Team Leader in Tarawa (Betio) Two year ago, he was appointed Vice Chairman of the Board--two month ago they uncovered lost cemetery # 27--They found 36 intact Marine remains this was the biggest recovery of MIAs to date. Glenn says he is very thankful he was able to be apart of this find.

The grandson of one of the Corps' most ferocious officers killed in the World War II Battle of Tarawa will finally bring his grandfather's remains home, along with those of dozens of other fallen Marines. More than 70 years ago, Marine 1st Lt. Alexander "Sandy" Bonnyman, Jr. was determined to blast a hole through the deeply entrenched enemy on the tiny island of Betio in the Republic of Kiribati.

With fellow Marines pinned down on the beach during the November 1943 amphibious invasion of the Tarawa Atoll, the 33-year-old led a small engineering team into unfriendly territory to repeatedly assault enemy fortifications. He succeeded, but was mortally wounded while fending off an enemy counterattack.

Bonnyman's "dauntless fighting spirit, unrelenting aggressiveness and forceful leadership" led to his posthumous award of the Medal of Honor, according to his citation.

Yet the remains of Bonnyman and approximately 40 other Marines killed in action during the battle disappeared as their impromptu burial trench, known as Cemetery 27, was lost.

An American Graves Registration Service team exhumed and repatriated about 500 Marines from the small island in the Central Pacific in 1946, but simply could not find Cemetery 27. Its occupants were officially declared "unrecoverable" by the Quartermaster General's Office in 1949.

1ST LT ALEXANDER "SANDY" BONNYMAN MOH

"They must have been buried in all the confusion," Clay Bonnyman Evans, Bonnyman's grandson, told Marine Corps Times. "In all probability the grave markers were run over when the Seabees came ashore."

For 70 years the lost graves of Tarawa remained a mystery, but now the fallen Marines — including Bonnyman — are coming home.

"History Flight is extremely pleased to announce the discovery and recovery of historic Cemetery 27 on Betio Island as part of its 10-year, multi-million-dollar effort to recover hundreds of Marines lost to history, their nation and their families in 1943," said founder and director Mark Noah in a press release Sunday.

The non-profit, dedicated to finding and recovering the remains of 84,000 missing American service members, located the burial trench in 2011 and began excavation in March. They have since recovered the remains of at least three dozen fallen Marines.

Working with the Defense POW/MIA Accounting Agency, History Flight recovered the remains of at least 120 troops from Betio previously believed to be unrecoverable. They will conduct a forensic review of the remains from Cemetery 27 this month.

Although we have dental matches to known missing Tarawa Marines for more than half of the recovered individuals, we are seeking DNA reference samples from families of the Tarawa missing," History Flight board secretary Ed Huffine said in a news release.

"We plan to have all of these recovered heroes identified by the end of the summer," Huffine said.

Clay Bonnyman Evans never got to meet his grandfather, but grew up in admiration of his legacy.

When History Flight began calling families to obtain DNA samples of the Marines unaccounted for at Tarawa, Evans jumped at the opportunity to volunteer with the group and flew to Betio to assist in excavations.

"They're a small non-profit, but these guys have done what no one else could do," Evans said. "This is a group that knows how to get things done."Evans assisted the History Flight archaeological team in excavating Cemetery 27, which was located under a parking lot on Betio.Evans knew that his grandfather had distinctive dental work, including gold teeth. He said he was breathless when Kristin Baker, the History Flight Recovery Team leader, called him over to examine the teeth on an exposed cranium."It's gold," Baker told him.

Evans said it's very likely that the remains are those of the Medal of Honor recipient, but legal verification is still required.

The remains of the three dozen Marines are being transported to the Defense POW/MIA Accounting Agency's laboratory at Hickman Air Force Base in Hawaii, where a team of specially trained dentists and other experts will work to authenticate their identities.

"We are very grateful for the efforts of Mark Noah and History Flight for the recovery of these Marines lost during the Battle of Tarawa," DPAA director

Lt. Gen. Michael Linnington said in a press release. "This is a tremendous example of how private-public partnerships can contribute to our accounting efforts both now and in the future."

After more than seven decades, Bonnyman's remains will finally travel the almost 7,000 miles to his birthplace in Knoxville, Tennessee, where he will be buried next to his parents and three siblings. Bonnyman's family intends to conduct a public burial ceremony in late September to celebrate his return home.

"This has been simply incredible," Evans said. "Our family is so, so grateful."

MARINES ARE FINALLY COMING HOME
36 MARINES MISSING SINCE THE BATTLE FOR TARAWA WWII

Thirty-six caskets holding the remains of U.S. Marines killed in the 1943 Battle of Tarawa were returned from battlefield interment last weekend.

The men, killed in the epic 76-hour Battle of Tarawa on the heavily defended island of Betio were recovered recently through the efforts of non-profits and the Defense POW/MIA Accounting Agency.

The Marines, each in a flag shrouded casket, were transferred to a contingent from the 3rd Marine Regiment during a repatriation ceremony in Tarawa, Kiribati on Saturday. Reverently loaded onto a Marine KC-130J Hercules, they were flown to their home country for the first time in more than 70 years.

Upon arrival at aboard Joint Base Pearl Harbor-Hickam, Hawaii, they were further honored as they were unloaded for identification and final burial. Among the remains is believed to be 1st Lt. Alexander Bonnyman, a posthumous Medal of Honor recipient from the battle.

"Today provides for us the opportunity to bring home some Marines who were lost here during the Battle of Tarawa over 70 years ago," said Maj. Gen. Richard P. Simcock, 3rd Marine Division commanding general. "Those Marines that gave their lives and ensured our way of life continued here in the Pacific were fully expected to come home, but it didn't work out that way. Today we've filled that obligation for those Marines."

"THANKYOU FOR YOUR SERVICE"
CRAIG TOURTE

I was fortunate last week to have been able to spend time in Monterey California, a very pleasant 65 degrees while it was 103 in Sacramento. I stayed with a friend who has a second home there and who had invited me to stay for a few day. During the war in Vietnam he had been a Lieutenant in the Army Reserves but did not serve in Vietnam, also being more scholastic than I he attended the Department of Defense Language Institute (DLI) at the Presidio of Monterey which is run by the Army but serves as a joint service institute. While students from the other military services and foreign counties are just starting out the Marines attending have already gone through Marine Combat Training and are considered careerists and have privileges from the day they arrive. My friend has fond memories of attendance and enjoyed his time studying and living in Monterey, unfortunately he suffers from extreme guilt for not having served in Vietnam.

Because I have a Military Identification Card I was able to drive onto the base and took him to the Mess Hall – sign says cafeteria – where we enjoyed a variety of military cuisine as we sat at a table surrounded by curious young men and women wondering who these old farts were. While my friend was reminiscing, a young Marine walked up to us, held out his hand and thanked me for my service – could have been he noticed my Khe Sanh shirt. I am now accustomed to such gestures and thanked him. The Marine then extended his hand to my friend and thanked him for his service which he likewise acknowledged. After the Marine walked away my friend told me that no one had ever done that before. He could not stop talking about it the rest of the afternoon. That evening he told my wife about it and I noticed tears were running down his cheeks and observed that it had been quite an emotion experience for him. It was just a little thing really, having someone acknowledge our service, common occurrence now for many, but a reminder that countless did their part quietly, served in different ways in a variety of MOS's and in different locations around the globe, but all who serve deserve recognition for that service no matter their situation or contribution. I am reminded of that now too often used phrase "All gave some, some gave all." I am certain my friend will never forget his experience at DLI that afternoon and in the future realize his military service and contribution was important and is appreciated.

Another reunion next month. But is it just another reunion or it is like all of the others I have attended, once again, something special. I know this reunion will be something I'll think about the rest of the year and I'll wonder why the years has gone by so fast. I wonder how many I have left. Like so many others there is something about each one that stands out. I thought I'd let you read the little story about our reunion in Reno...a very special reunion and one I think you'll enjoy reading.

A REUNION STORY

BY: CRAIG W. TOURTE

I had a great time at the reunion this year. It's doesn't matter where the reunion is held, the extravagance of the accommodations or lack there of, it's the comradeship that is important to me. On Thursday Steve Wiese (B/1/26), Mike Fishbaugh (FLSU-1 & FLSG-B), David "Tony" Tonick (A/1/26) and myself, drove over to Genoa Nevada, a little town about forty miles south of Reno, tucked up against the high Sierra Nevada Mountains. David served eight months in Vietnam before he was shot in the back, the projectile exiting through the front right side of his neck. A jagged scar remains and is a reminder to all of his service, bravery and sacrifice. Genoa was named after the birth place of Christopher Columbus in Genoa Italy. We stopped off for a cold one at the Genoa Bar, said to be the oldest and first established bar located West of the Mississippi (or something like that). I bought Mike a T-Shirt, him being from Kentucky and all; I wanted Mike to have a little souvenir from his Nevada Travels. I can almost guarantee that no one in Kentucky has ever heard nor been in the small little dusty and hard to find town of Genoa. Like the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh, if you're in Genoa, you're no where. For many years Steve Wiese owned and operated a successful construction company and did a great deal of traveling, I was surprised to hear that he had never heard of, nor been to Genoa before that day because he certainly has been everywhere else. We continued our travels, driving up the steep 11.2 mile Kingsbury grade, climbing to over 7000 feet above the desert floor to South Lake Tahoe where we stopped in at the Beacon Restaurant and gazed out over the world famous deep blue lake while we had lunch. We continued our trip with a slow drive around the east rim of one of the most beautiful lakes in the world, onto highway 50, descending down to the desert floor then on to Carson City, the state capitol of Nevada and back to Reno. It was a great afternoon.

On Friday evening Steve Wiese, Tom Horchler (H.Q. 1/13) and myself, were the invited guests of Khe Sanh Veteran and Association member Michael Archer (Author of "A Patch Of Ground") who lives in Reno. Mike's guests included the two sons and the grandson of the late Lieutenant Colonel John A. Hennelly, Commanding Officer of the First Battalion Thirteenth Marine Corps Regiment at Khe Sanh. Both men are former Marines and the grandson is entering Marine Corps boot camp in late August. There was an array of various dignitaries, scholars, writers and academics amongst the professionals present. As the twenty five or so of us gathered in the back yard, Mike stood and introduced each guest, announcing their name and giving a brief personal history of each and their individual achievements. It was one of the most amazingly articulate and even humorous oral presentations of introduction and recalled personal information I have ever heard, and I was privileged to have been present and to have been invited to his home. Mike introduced me as a Khe Sanh Veteran and writer, perhaps a bit gratuitous, but I appreciated the introduction.

It was the first reunion for many, often a difficult and lonely time for some. Marco Soto, Chuck Teasley, Andres "Pete" Torres and Phil Nuchereno were just a few who attended the reunion for the first time. Marco and Pete are from Sacramento and I know they attended the reunion because I asked them to come. I appreciated them taking the time to drive over from California. Both attended the reading of the names at the California Vietnam Veterans Memorial along with myself, Steve Wiese, Ernie Spencer, Carrie Peppers and others.

Steve Wiese asked my wife and I to join his table for dinner. I was honored to have sat with Ken Pipes, Ben Long, Ken Korkow (all with B/1/26)), Chuck Teasley (C/1/26) and their wives. I tried to keep an eye on Pete Torres and Marco Soto because I knew they had arrived late to the reunion and I didn't want them to feel left out because they didn't know anyone. I observed that Pete had connected with the others at his table and was pretty engaged. Marco and his wife sat a couple of tables away from ours. I introduced myself to Marco's wife and thanked them both for coming. Marco told me that when he signed his name on the reunion sign up board he noted the name of David Tonick, and asked if I knew who he was, as both David and he had served in the same company in Vietnam and he had not seen David for over forty years. Marco took out his wallet and showed me an old color photograph of David taken during the war. At that point my heart skipped a few beats and I had to take a couple of breaths. I'm just assuming here, but I had to believe that Marco and David had been rather close in Vietnam. My understanding is that the last time Marco saw David was when he and David were severely wounded and Marco was told to grab any other wounded and get on the chopper. David was removed from the field of battle with a rather large wound in his back and neck. In June of 1968 Alpha and Charlie Companies were attached to Delta Company, all with the Twenty Sixth Marine Regiment, when they assaulted up a small hill containing spider holes, towards an enemy held trench line. Marco sustained a wound to the back of his neck and had his M-16 jam during the assault. Many who survived the Siege at Khe Sanh were killed and wounded.

I took four steps to my left, less than ten feet. As I stood in front of the next table. I told David that there was someone at the next table who he should meet. David stood up and followed me the few feet to where Marco was sitting. I noticed that David had a photograph of himself taken in Vietnam attached to his reunion name tag. The exact same photograph that Marco had showed me just seconds before. It was a private moment and I left them alone to get reacquainted.

I sat down at my friend Tom "Louie" Horchlers table. Tom had talked me into attending our first Khe Sanh reunion some five years ago. I asked Tom what he thought of this reunion and Tom said it was the best one so far. I considered that for a minute, recalling how difficult those first reunions were for me and how each proceeding reunion was a little easier and more enjoyable. I told Tom he was right, it was a great reunion, perhaps because we were just emotionally prepared for it, Tom just smiled knowing it has been a long road traveled. I glanced over at David and Marco knowing it was their first reunion, and was sure they would feel the same way.

CHAPLAIN'S CORNER FALL 2015
YOUR LITTLE LIGHT SHINE

By Khe Sanh Veterans Chaplain Ron Rayner

"Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven."

Matthew 5:16 (KJV)

It is time to brag to your local newspaper's veteran's editor about attending the Khe Sanh Veteran's reunions. Once again we had in excess of ten Khe Sanh Vets attend this year's reunion that had never heard of The Khe Sanh Veterans before. Getting an article in your local newspaper will spread the word about our organization and we will hopefully have many more new attendees next year at San Antonio. I take advantage of any opportunity to tell people how great our reunion is run and the many new and interesting people I meet. I am also amazed at the new information I get about a battle I was in over 47 years ago.

Something else to brag about, Connie Gibbons (Khe Sanh veteran Gregg Gibbons wife) book Mom Told Me You Are A Hero. This excellent children's book is a wonderful, easy to understand vehicle to provide understanding and healing between veterans and their families as well as the general public. I believe the general public sees veterans on Veteran's Day and Memorial Day but really have little concept on how to relate to a war veteran. I pray this book will help my wife, children, nieces, nephews, and grandchildren to understand why I am a little strange sometimes. This book provides many definitions and thoughts on relating to veterans. I have ordered one hundred copies of the coloring book to spread around to relatives, newspapers, veteran organizations, churches, and schools. The simple message it delivers is what I can relate to.

Ken Korkow spoke at this year's memorial service on helping US veterans and active duty personnel deal with symptoms of Post-Traumatic-Stress-Disorder. Ken mentioned one of the ways he gives his life purpose is by distributing a New Testament with Psalms and Proverbs that is entitled; The Greatest Warrior. Included in this Testament are stories by US military combat personnel that have been afflicted with Post-Traumatic-Stress-Disorder. These personal testimonies tell about how Jesus changed their lives and guides them through the tough times. The Greatest Warrior is available at BiblicaDirectService@Biblica.com.

Giving purpose to your life is one of the most effective tools you can use to fight Post-Traumatic-Stress-Disorder. Donating blood, being a chaplain and prison visitation are a few of the activities have provided me with a sense of worth to fight my PTSD.

I also want to brag about collecting yarn for the Vietnam Veterans at Jackson Prison in Jackson, Michigan. I get yarn, take it to the prison, they crochet it into hats, mittens and scarfs and these items are distributed to the needy. The people who donate the yarn feel good about themselves; the prisoners keep busy doing something worthwhile and feel good, the groups that distribute the items enjoy their part in all this, the needy get good quality items to keep them warm and finally PTSD Ron can justify his existence when he is attacked by bad thoughts.

A quote from Ray Stubbe's book Battalion of Kings, which is the motto of the War Memorial in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, suggests appropriate remembering;

"To honor the dead by serving the living."

"The generous prosper and are satisfied; those who refresh others are themselves refreshed."
Proverbs 11:25

"A final word: Be strong with the Lord's mighty power. Put on all of God's armor so that you will be able to stand firm against all strategies and tricks of the devil… Pray at all times and on every occasion in the power of the Holy Spirit. Stay alert and be persistent in your prayers for all Christians everywhere."
Ephesians 6:10-18 Selected verses

OBIT

MAJOR EARLE BREEDING JR. USMC (RET)
KHE SANH VETERAN. C/O ECHO
COMPANY 2/26, HILL 861A
KHE SANH VIETNAM

Major Earle Breeding, Jr., United States Marine Corps, retired, died Friday morning, Aug. 7 in Albuquerque at the age of 82 in the Veteran's Administration Hospital. Major Breeding, and wife of 62 years, Patricia, have been Ruidoso residents for more than 17 years.

Born Dec. 17, 1932 in Washington, D.C. to Dr. and Mrs. Earle Breeding, Sr, Earle attended Fishburne

Military School in Waynesboro, Virginia and joined the Marine Corps at 19 years of age.

His military years in the '50's and 60's sent him across the world and far away from those he loved.

After serving two tours in Japan and Okinawa, Major (then Captain) Breeding was given the Vietnam command of 200 troops in Company E, Second Battalion, 26th Marines, Third Marine Division. He remembered his first moments in-country before heading to Khe Sanh. After getting squared away, he was taken to Colonel David Lownds who Major Earle Breeding, Jr., United States Marine Corps, retired, died Friday morning, Aug. 7 in Albuquerque at the age of 82 in the Veteran's Administration Hospital. Major Breeding, and wife of 62 years, Patricia, have been Ruidoso residents for more than 17 years.

Born Dec. 17, 1932 in Washington, D.C. to Dr. and Mrs. Earle Breeding, Sr, Earle attended Fishburne Military School in Waynesboro, Virginia and joined the Marine Corps at 19 years of age.

His military years in the '50's and 60's sent him across the world and far away from those he loved. After serving two tours in Japan and Okinawa, Major (then Captain) Breeding was given the Vietnam command of 200 troops in Company E, Second Battalion, 26th Marines, Third Marine Division. He remembered his first moments in-country before heading to Khe Sanh. After getting squared away, he was taken to Colonel David Lownds who was finishing a briefing of what was expected in the days to come. Lownds stated to Breeding, "We will hold Khe Sanh at all costs, won't we, Captain Breeding?" Breeding replied, "As long as Echo Company is here, Khe Sanh will hold." And for seventy days in the early months of 1968 hold they did, against horrific conditions and all odds.

David Douglas Duncan, WWII Marine veteran and a photojournalist at the time, has preserved these moments in several published books. "War Without Heroes" contains a section devoted to Hill 861 A and Breeding's fighting men.

Breeding's service earned him two Purple Hearts, a Navy Commendation medal with V for Valor, the Vietnam Cross of Gallantry and a Silver Star which states, in part, "By his courage, extraordinary initiative, and unflagging devotion to duty at great personal risk, Major Breeding contributed significantly to the accomplishment of his unit's mission and upheld the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and the United States Naval Service."

After Breeding arrived home, he spent time in a military hospital to treat the effects his service in Vietnam had left. Eventually he retired from the military and was recruited personally by J. Edgar Hoover to give the Federal Bureau of Investigation a try, serving for 20 years as a Special Agent. During and subsequent to his time with the Bureau, he also worked with the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children.

Breeding and wife, Pat, 15 year Ruidoso residents, recently hosted a reunion of several of the men who served under his command. Breeding was honored by the Lincoln County Commission with Resolution 2011-36 recognizing his valiant leadership and the ultimate sacrifice given by many in the battalion. Personal friend Commissioner Tom Battin was on hand to deliver the resolution and to offer the county's thanks to the men who were there. The Ruidoso Free Press was privileged to attend and speak with the visiting men of the second battalion and their families.

A REUNION EXPERIENCE PARRIS ISLAND MUSEUM

BY CRAIG W. TOURTE

Visiting the Parris Island USMC Recruit Depot Museum was certainly an interesting experience, it offered an excellent representation of Marine Corps History. I did a slow walk around trying to view each segment. I felt great pride at having served as a Marine and having been a part of its exceptional history. Of particular interest to those attending was the section devoted to Khe Sanh. As I made the circle carefully viewing each segment, I noticed a large gathering in one particular area, I knew it was the area devoted to Khe Sanh so I stood back a bit and waited for the crowd to clear before I walked over. As I made my way towards that section Dennis Mannion passed by me and in kind of a hushed voice said, "They said only 205 Marines were killed" I sensed the presumable incorrect numerical accounting of loss was a very personal and emotional issue for Dennis

The inscribed panel on the wall read the following: "Khe Sanh – Early in 1968, the North-Vietnamese Army targeted the Marine defensive base at Khe Sanh, just south of the Demilitarized Zone. The NVA looked at Khe Sanh, guarded by a chain of mountain outposts, as the key to controlling the Quang Tri Province."

The Base's defense consisted of the reinforced 26th Marines and South Vietnamese Rangers. On January 20, 20,000 NVA regulars and Viet Cong began a 77-day campaign against Khe Sanh's 6,000 -man garrison. Effectively using air supply and coordinated artillery and air strikes, the besieged Marines crushed all attempts to capture the base. Despite withstanding intense artillery shelling day and night for over two months, at one time receiving 1,109 incoming shells in a single day, U.S. casualties were comparatively light. Only 205 Marines were killed compared to more than 10,000 of the enemy. The NVA withdrew without victory and were sorely depleted of troops, equipment and ammunition."

Besides the stated number as 205 Marines killed during the Siege, I thought the use of the word "Only" was an inadvertent attempt to marginalize the number of those killed, I suspect many felt the same way. I think this causality issue is best addressed in the book "Valley of Decision" (1991) by John Prados and Ray W. Stubbe, (pages 515-516). I'll try and hit the most pertinent parts here as the explanation is rather lengthy. It reads in part...."Official (Marine Corps) casualty figures are 205 killed in action, 816 wounded and evacuated, 852 wounded but not evacuated and one missing... they include only Marine causalities and only for the combat base and hilltops...the Marines own casualty figures in the heat of confusion of battle may be incomplete and inadequate." "...Charlie Med logs record 903 casualties treated just between January 21 and February 24, a figure that does not include Marines treated by regimental or battalion aid stations..." "...memorial service bulletins and 3rd

Marine Division casualty records identifies by name 353 Marines killed between January 20 and March 31, (sixty nine) 69 (killed)between then and the end of PEGASUS, April 15, plus 64 killed on April 16 and 17..." "Valley of Decision" also notes additional losses which occurred in Khe Sanh Village, PEGASUS losses, losses at Lang Vei and plane crashes. In "Battalion of Kings"(2005) another book researched and authored by Ray Stubbe he notes, from January 20 to April 16, 1968, those Marines Killed totaled 495

In a separate article also written by John Prados published in "The American Legion Maine" (September 1, 2013), he states, "Careful compilation of Marine Corps and other causalities for the campaign (Khe Sanh Siege) indicate overall allied losses of 730 dead and 2,642 wounded." In addition Prados states that it (causalities) are also "... among the most difficult to assess."

I want to close this little article by once again referring to Ray Stubbe's very fine book "Battalion of Kings" in which he notes the following, "This book tells the story of the major battle of the Vietnam War in human terms (rather than strategy, tactics, political implications, etc.) Not only individual deaths, but how that death affected others, and continues to do so, makes the implications of President Kennedy's statement about bearing any burden and paying any price to ensure freedom profound beyond mere words. In our fallen brothers we know the meaning of "Greater love has no man than this, to lay down his life for his friends." That is why words and numbers are so important to Khe Sanh Veterans, each loss was personal to us, there is no "ONLY" there are just friends, comrades and fellow Marines.

CHARLIE WITTWER, USMC KHE SANH VETERAN, INDIA CO 3/26 HILL 881N

Charlie Wittwer, a decorated veteran and wheelchair athlete who once appeared on a Cheerios Box, died Friday after an illness.

The 66-year old Island Lake resident was remembered for his positive outlook, his tenacity and his leadership.

"He wanted to be a hero, and he was. He thought you could raise the bar and everybody could do better",said his wife, Jan Wittwer.

Wittwer served as a US Marine machine gunner during the Vietnam War, earning a Purple Heart, among other military honors.

He fought during the Battle of Khe Sanh in 1968, suffering shrapnel wounds from a mortar round. In 1979, 10 years after he returned from the war, Wittwer lost the use of his legs after an accident with a semitrailer, leaving him a paraplegic. Seventeen years after that, one of his legs was amputated after an infection.

"You can't not be inspired by that guy," said Duluthian Shawn Corbin, who played wheelchair basketball and softball with him for 27 years. "He went through so many bad things in his life. ... If there was anyone who had the right to be jaded or pessimistic, it was him. But he was the opposite."

Wittwer started the Minnesota Flame Throwers wheelchair softball team after playing for the Minnesota Rolling Twins. A pitcher and the coach, he took the Flame Throwers to national competitions, coming in fourth last year.

He volunteered for the Minnesota Paralyzed Veterans group both as a sports director and as president, traveling to Washington, D.C., to lobby for better laws for people with disabilities. He was honored with dozens of medals from the wheelchair games held with the state paralyzed veterans group, in a variety of fields. That's how he landed on a Cheerios box in 2008, Jan Wittwer said. A gold-medal finalist in the 2007 National Veterans Wheelchair games, he was pictured with other athletes on a special box after being chosen by the Veterans Canteen Service.

"It was pretty amazing," Jan Wittwer said. "He saw himself, really, as an athlete first. The chair was secondary."

Wittwer played for 17 years with the Twin Ports Flyers basketball team, and he learned to parachute, golf, scuba dive, water-ski and downhill ski from a wheelchair.

"He's done so many things from a wheelchair to inspire other people and himself," Jan Wittwer said. "He wouldn't say 'no.' He would try anything."

He was most proud of his family, she said, where a "symbiotic" relationship existed.

"You need to rely on other people, but we relied on him just as well," she said.

Wittwer was a champion in northern Minnesota for wheelchair sports, teaching others about the benefits of competition for people with physical disabilities, said Eric Larson, program manager for Courage Kenny Rehabilitation Institute-Northland, previously known as Courage Duluth.

"He always had a glass-half-full approach," Larson said, noting Wittwer looked at life with humor, never taking himself too seriously. "He tried to make others recognize it isn't all bad. You can have fun and contribute to something larger than yourself."

Wittwer told the News Tribune in 2010 that he was "hurt at the right time," because those paralyzed years ago were "cast aside."

"Now we're in an age where the wheelchairs are better and people are more accepting of wheelchair athletics," Wittwer said. "We're every bit as competitive because most of us were athletes before."

Educated as a teacher, Wittwer spent 15 years as a social worker at St. Mary's Medical Center and five with Courage Duluth as a sports director. He also coached several youth sports.

Corbin, who plays with the Flame Throwers, said Wittwer was "the heart and soul" of the team. While he wasn't recently able to play, he still traveled to the Twin Cities for practices.

Despite his difficulties, "he never had a bad day," Jan Wittwer said. "He had these cute little quips: 'Walking is overrated.' "

Wittwer is also survived by five children and 11 grandchildren.

RIP Brother! Charlie and I were together on Jan 20, 1968 during the battle on 881N. I was the M 60 Gunner when James Collins, our point man was hit! I was four or five behind Collins and immediately setup the 60 and started firing into the NVA lines! Charlie was the gunner who took over after we recovered Collins!!! My team leader had me pushing out rounds non stop during the initial contact which heated up the barrel resulting in a cook off round! Thus, putting my gun out of commission!!! Reece Critchfield was my assistant gunner and we did not have any spare barrels, we both effectively became 0311's!!! There were plenty of M16's laying around so we were able to rejoin the fight! Some how I found myself with the recon team we were planning on inserting! Late in the day we returned to Hill 881S to man the lines! We lost Critchfield the following day on Hill 881S! He and I were loading WIA's on the medivac when we heard the incoming! We both jumped into a nearby trench. I suffered slight wounds, however Critchfield took the brunt of the schrapnel and died immediately! RIP My Brothers! S/F!

I was married to Ernest A. Frank, Jr. who was a Marine in Vietnam and a member of the Khe Sanh Veterans. He died September 2, 1997, just a couple months after attending a reunion in St. Louis. I have been getting the Red Clay issues since then. I wanted you to know that I have finally received a positive ruling from the VA.

I continued a claim he started for PTSD with the VA, and finally after 15 years, was granted my claim that his sudden heart attack was attributed to his service. We had 4 young children when he died. By the time I was awarded the claim, they had all graduated from college. It has taken over 2 more years to finally have each of them receive benefits for college, but that has finally been completed. Unfortunately, our oldest son died in a car accident the week before his checks came, but he had the benefit of looking forward to paying some of his debts with those funds. In fact, today would be his 32nd birthday. I've worked through probate court, and finally have that settled so his little girl will get those benefits when she turns 18.

Our younger son has Crohn's disease and I have filed a claim for him so that if that is ever connected to his dad's exposure to Agent Orange, the claim is in place.

I remarried four years after Ernie died, so I am not receiving benefits as a widow, but I know that if something happens to my husband, they should be available.

I did not meet Ernie until right after he got home from Vietnam, but I did read the graphic, descriptive letters he wrote home to his mom. Our children also treasure having that piece of their dad's history. Your publication Red Clay, is also a source of information for them, and I will save them for our grandchildren to read some day.

I just wanted to contact you and thank you for your service and let you know that like Ernie said of Marines, we never gave up. Even if it took all these years, and countless pages of forms and letters, we finally were successful. I could not find an email address for you, but if you do use email, please let me know, and I can send any updates on our situation if you would like.
Love and prayers,

I GET MAIL FROM OUR FOUNDER REVEREND RAY

Mr. Tom Eichler

Hi Tom:
Both the regular mailing (to all Khe Sanh vets) and the special envelope with the extra copies of the latest Red Clay just arrived and, as usually, you have produced a truly great issue that far exceeds those of ANY of the other veterans groups that I receive! I am especially pleased with all the various colored photos inside the magazine as well as the cover.

Of interest was the reprint of Gunny Richardson's article that first appeared in Leatherneck concerning chaplains that appears on pp. 35-38. The part dealing with me starts rather abruptly on p. 36, and reading it, brought back any memories. You might be interested in a note from my diary entry of November, 1989-8 book review Tom Bartlett of Leatherneck wrote of the book I co-authored: Inside Force Recon:

REVEREND RAY STUBBE

Book review by Tom Bartlett in Leatherneck 72: 11 (Nov89) p. 98: "Ray Stubbe is neither stranger nor friend. We've met, and I remain in awe of his accomplishments. He has been places I've only read about and accomplished deeds beyond my comprehension. We first met in DaNang in early 1968. He was dirty, needing a shave, shower and sedative. He was very nervous. He smelled. He wore no rank, but appeared too old to be a private. He wore no weapons. He had a story he wanted told. He offered a rough draft on a cruddy sheet of paper. The story was, indeed, rough. But it contained all the facts, so we edited and printed it in the Sea Tiger, newspaper of the III MAF. By the time I realized who the smelly grunt was, he was gone. Back to Khe Sanh where he served as chaplain to the Marines. He was a naval officer. That's Ray Stubbe, a Lutheran minister. Though he has long since hung up his cammies, he still writes of 'his' Marines. .. .. "

All is well, despite a few aches and pains that come Sanh vet so well put it, "Every day since Khe Sanh is a plus, a day I couldn't have counted on." I'm sure you agree--as do all of us. We know how precious each day truly is because we got to the point over there, almost 50 years ago, when we didn't know if we could count on another day. I've told many hundreds of people in my many presentations and conversations that the Marines I knew at Khe Sanh during the siege were those who gave their last drops of water of bits of C-ration to a buddy, who dashed out during incoming to pull in a wounded Marine who couldn't move, and move him to safety, that in the dozens of bunkers I visited, the Marines remained without fear, frequently cracking jokes-like how poor a marksman they were shooting their rockets and unable to hit their bunker (not considering the rockets were fired from over 7 miles away!), or who hugged each other while present because of the affirmation of life in the presence of death, the sharing of food and water "with the least of these," caring and sharing and daring!

Many years ago, I started telling people: "Life is short, precious, and fragile." All of us Khe Sanh vets know that at the core of our being! And maybe that's the reason I've always felt that Khe Sanh vets, as a whole, are the best group of people I have ever known-and I've been with some mighty good groups of people! Like most boxers who generally have a rather mild manner in normal life because they have confronted very brutal situations, those who have emerged from combat are like the gold that has been refined. I knew a fellow chaplain who also served in Vietnam who once told me: "Everything of value that I have has come out of the crucible." All that really doesn't matter, all the stuff that's just for show, all that has been stripped, leaving the truth of what a person is.

The Greek word for "truth" literally means "unconcealed" or "revealed," "disclosed." My worship services had no choirs, robes, stained glass, pews, organ music, or people dressed up in their finest, but all was so genuine, so "true," so real. I remember Gunny Bailey, NCOIC of the Radio Company (those Marines from III MAF who intercepted NVA radio transmissions and determined by late November, 1967, that Khe Sanh was going to be the target of a major NVA battle) once told me that he saw one of our worship services or about three men kneeling and praying. In a typical Marine Corps fashion appropriate to a Gunny, he stormed over to give us some of his "Gunny talk" (you know the Marine vocabulary he was going to use!), because he said it was crazy. He said, "The audacity!" He said he came, and listened, and then joined in himself and knelt, and felt a peace in the midst of all the bombardment that amazed him. It was like being in the eye of the destructive hurricane, all peaceful, but not as the absence of turmoil, but as strength in the center of the turmoil.

When something difficult makes life miserable, other Khe Sanh vets might tell me: "Hey, we've been through much worse!" And we have! We know! We appreciate each other! We live!

GOD BLESS THEM ALL

THE MARINE WHO VANISHED IN VIETNAM WITHOUT A TRACE

By Ron Martz
September 13, 2015

Late on the afternoon of Sept. 21, 1969, Marine Lance Cpl. James W. Jackson Jr. of Atlanta walked into a U.S. Navy medical facility in what was then South Vietnam and vanished without a trace.

At least that is what the Marine Corps told his family after a rather cursory investigation, a story to which the Corps has steadfastly held for the past 46 years despite the fact that, short of an alien abduction, people just do not simply disappear; there are always explanations.

Jackson is among the more than 83,000 American service members and civilian contract workers unaccounted for since World War II. These soldiers of the unreturning army fell on foreign soil and remain there, their last resting places unmarked, their sacrifices for their country often remembered only by those who loved them or served with them.

This Friday, Sept. 18, is National POW/MIA Recognition Day. It is a day that will go largely unnoticed by many. But it is a day which is uniquely painful to those family members who have never had the closure that comes with giving their loved ones a final accounting and a final resting place.

For many of the 83,000, there will never be a final accounting. Their planes or ships went down at sea, their remains unrecoverable. Others died in battle in which their demise was of such a violent nature that little was left of their physical self.

According to the Defense POW/MIA Accounting Agency, more than 73,500 are unaccounted for from World War II, 7,800 from Korea, 1,600 from Southeast Asia, 126 from the Cold War and six from Iraq and other conflicts.

Yet much of the focus of DPAA remains on the war in Southeast Asia, often incorrectly referred to as the Vietnam War. The reasons are complex and difficult to explain to those who were not touched by the war or the political and social upheaval that rent the United States in the 1960s and early 1970s.

The Jackson case is somewhat of an allegory for the war; there was no reason he should have been lost, just as there was no reason the war should have ended as it did. And the official explanation for Jackson's disappearance defies all logic, just as the explanation for the war's strategy defies logic.

"This case is an institutional embarrassment for us," one Marine officer told me shortly after I began investigating the case in 1983. Other Marines have told me that efforts to reopen the case in the years since Jackson's disappearance have met with strong pushback because of the negative publicity it would engender.

Over the years, I have interviewed hundreds of people, traveled thousands of miles and amassed more than 20,000 pages of documents and notes in an effort to find the true story of why Jackson has never been accounted for.

The answer, I finally discovered, was actually rather simple once I began questioning conclusions the Marine Corps accepted as fact thanks to the help of Al Duda of Kenner, La., a former Marine who knew some of the circumstances of events that led to Jackson's disappearance and helped me see through the flaws in the government's case

On the day Jackson disappeared, he was serving as a rifleman on a remote hilltop fire support base named Russell just south of the Demilitarized Zone in northern South Vietnam. His unit was preparing to abandon the base in preparation for redeployment to Okinawa as the Marines' role in the war wound down.

A fire and accidental explosion in a pit where discarded ammunition had been placed sent Marines scurrying off the hill — many without their weapons — because all the bunkers and trenches had been rigged with explosives and there was fear that the whole hill would blow.

Two Marines were killed and about a dozen wounded that day. Helicopters were brought in and the entire unit was flown off the hill, with the dead and wounded first out. Or so they thought.

Two days later, another unit returned to Russell to investigate the damage. A Marine major saw the smoldering remains of two small men in a shallow depression and concluded the bodies were those of two Vietnamese scouts who had been with the unit but were unaccounted for. Those remains were not recovered.

At this point no one knew Jackson was missing. His buddies assumed he had been among the wounded taken to a medical facility. It was not until six weeks later, when Jackson's worried mother began inquiring why she had not heard from her son, that anyone went looking for him.

Frantic inquiries were made throughout Vietnam and all military facilities in the Far East. There was no record of Jackson anywhere. When members of his unit were told of his absence, several began trying to piece together what had happened the day of the explosion. One thought Jackson had suffered a minor back wound. Several others thought they remembered placing him on a helicopter bound for the medical facility.

Once the official investigation began in November 1969, that became the story that has endured to this day; Jackson, slightly wounded, was flow to a hospital, walked in and disappeared.

It was not that the Marines who served with Jackson and testified at the hearing were being deceitful or in any way criminally negligent in his disappearance. What had occurred among them was what is known as "false memory syndrome," a psychological phenomenon in which the human brain, when under severe stress, can be made to believe that something happened when it did not actually happen.

In her book "Witness for the Defense: The Accused, the Eyewitness, and the Expert Who Puts Memory on Trial," Dr. Elizabeth Loftus writes that "When people are afraid, their memories slip and slide, neglecting details, rearranging facts ... The finished product, the memory that seems so clear and focused in our minds, is actually part fact, part fiction, a warped and twisted reconstruction of reality."

So what happened to Jackson? In all likelihood, he was left behind in the rush to get off the hill, his body one of those seen two days after the explosion.

Despite urgent requests from some Marines investigating the case early on, no one went back to the hill to recover the unidentified remains to see if they just might belong to Jackson, despite Marine Corps assurances to the family that it was doing everything in its power to find Jackson.

The official investigation simply concluded that Jackson had disappeared, vanished into thin air, a mere puff of smoke in a strong breeze. To this day, the government remains convinced there was no chance the eyewitnesses were mistaken in what they believe had happened. Any suggestion that he had been left behind was dismissed out of hand.

The possibility that he might have been in shock and simply deserted was discounted because of his strong family ties and somewhat hypochondriacal nature that would have prompted him to seek immediate medical care if injured.

Jackson was listed as missing in action for nearly 11 years, promoted and paid as if he were still serving. Finally, on Aug. 7, 1980, Jackson was declared dead with the stroke of a pen, an administrative procedure undertaken by the government after his parents could not prove he was alive.

A headstone bearing the name "GYSGT James W.

Jackson, Jr." was placed in a special section of the Marietta National Cemetery and a ceremony held to commemorate his passing, even though he had likely died 11 years earlier and there was no body underneath that marker.

When I first talked to Jackson's mother, Rudeen, about the case many years ago, she told me that she was glad her son had joined the Marine Corps because Marines had a reputation for taking care of their own and never leaving a man behind.

"When Jimmy went to Vietnam, I thought one of four things would happen," she said. "He would come home safe, he would be taken prisoner, or he would be killed or wounded and come home that way. I never thought they would just lose him."

Rudeen Jackson died in 2008, never knowing what happened to her son. Jackson's father died in 1986. An older brother and a younger sister also have died. The only surviving immediate family member is an older sister, Dawn Bodiford of Jackson.

So why spend so much time, money and effort to find the remains of one Marine?

As Michael Sledge writes in his book "Soldier Dead: How We Recover, Identify, Bury and Honor Our Military Fallen," there is a social contract between military personnel, their families and the government that when a service member dies overseas, extraordinary efforts will be made to recover their returns.

"For the families of those killed," Sledge writes, "the war is not over until all the missing have been accounted for and buried, either overseas or at home."

And as all Marines know, we never leave one of our own behind.

THE DEAD WENT LAST
LZ MARGO

By Major General Jarvis D. Lynch, U.S. Marine Corps(Retired)

"They were typical grunts and Corpsmen- normally unwashed, usually underfed, always overloaded and more often than not, tired " A battalion operations officer reflects on. One day in a very long war.

The 2d Battalion, 26th Marines rarely appears in the Marine Corps illustrious combat history. The battalion saw only brief service during World War II ... long enough to land in the assault wave at Iwo Jima. Later, during the Vietnam War, it reappeared for a few years before its colors once again were returned to the museum curators.

It's daily Vietnam experience was usually far less stressful than the Iwo Jima operation but Vietnam had it's days and when it did, the late 1960s Marine of 2/26 experienced the horrors of war at the same levels of intensity faced by the generation that fought its way up the black ash terraces beneath Mount Suribachi. This is the story of one of those days: 16 September 1968.

Late 1968 found the 3d Marine Division serving in the extreme north of I Corps, the northern most corps area in what was then the Republic of Vietnam, controlling ten infantry battalions: those of its organic 3d, 4th, and 9th Marine Regiments, plus 2/26. The division's operational concept — an effective one — was as easy to understand as it was difficult to execute. Relying on few fixed defensive positions and even fewer infantry units to defend them, the defense was offense. Battalions stayed in the bush for weeks on end covering North Vietnamese Army (NVA) infiltration routes and, in general, looking for trouble. They moved constantly, on foot or by helicopter, and when they encountered an NVA unit, all hell broke lose until it was destroyed.

Our battalion – I was the operations officer – celebrated the Fourth of July in an area near the coast called Leatherneck Square, where it was responsible for defending the square's northern and western sides. In late July, the battalion was reinforced to conduct amphibious assault operations and designated Battalion Landing Team (BLT) 2/26.

After training with the reinforcements, BLT 2/26 embarked in the ships of Amphibious Ready Group Alfa, including the famous World War II Essex – class carrier Princeton (LPH-5), now an amphibious assault ship. Initially, there was talk of landings just south of the Ben Hai river inside the Demilitarized Zone (DMZ), but the pattern of NVA operations had shifted westward and the amphibious talk died out. An early September landing, well inland, marked a temporary end to our amphibious experience, and the beginning of service as one of the division's maneuver battalions.

Despite the change in mission, the battalion kept its reinforcements – among them, a tank platoon, a 105mm artillery battery, and a 4.2 inch mortar battery. Operational control shifted to the 3d Marines, head quartered at Camp Carroll, but several days of aggressive patrolling yielded no enemy contacts. About 7 September, the BLT's field elements were trucked to Camp Carroll and staged for two contingencies: a helicopter assault into Landing Zone (LZ) Margo, a barren hilltop just south of the DMZ, roughly 17 kilometers west-northwest of Camp Carroll — or a shift of operational control to the 4th Marines and a return to Khe Sanh, where the battalion had served throughout the early 1968 siege. To the relief of those who had served at Khe Sanh, the Margo operation prevailed – an assault into the LZ followed by movement north to the high ground on the southern border of the DMZ, where the battalion was to turn east, and sweep the high ground. The orders emphasized the need to take prisoners.

A typhoon brushed the coast and although the tree covered mountains inland showed no outward sign of the rains, movement became impossible. The war ground to a halt. Finally the weather began clearing and, on 12 September the commanding officer of the supporting helicopter squadron flew in for the Zippo brief — a planning and co-ordination meeting attended by the battalion and squadron commanders plus their staffs. Zippos were business like affairs. Lives were at a stake and the assaulting battalion and supporting squadron had to reach complete agreement and understanding. On the plus side, Margo was easy to find because of its location on the north side of the Cam Lo River inside a distinctive kilometer-wide, and more than a kilometer deep – U-shaped bend.

Unfortunately this plus was offset by several minuses — most of which stemmed from the tiresome but necessary subject of terrain.

Margo, which resembled a broken bowl, was smaller than the maps indicated. Using north as 12 o'clock, the rim from about 5 to 10 o'clock was the dominant piece of ground within the LZ. The southern side of the rim dropped sharply to the Cam Lo River, actually more stream than river at this point. While the interior slope provided good observation over the landing zone and north toward the DMZ. A spring near the center of the zone fed a stream that had cut a deep draw, which meandered eastward and exited Margo between 2 and 4 o'clock. Margo's northern rim, from 10 to 2 o'clock, varied in height but was lower than the southern rim. Its exterior sloped sharply downward for a kilometer or so before reaching the steep approaches to the terrain fingers that led to the high ground in the DMZ. At its highest point, Margo was about 150 meters above sea level. The hills to the north were three to four times that height while the intervening terrain dropped to low points of about 50 meters.

It was rugged, forbidding country, made all the more so because — although Margo was clear — the heights and intervening valleys were covered with double — or triple canopy forest. The terrain inside the LZ made Margo a "one-bird zone," — helicopters had to land and unload one at a time. This was hardly unusual, but it slowed the rate of assault dramatically. Margo also was too small to accommodate the entire BLT. Since the intent was to retain only G Company, the BLT command group, and the 81mm mortar, Engineer, and Reconnaissance platoons in the zone for any length of time (a few days), the size of the LZ did not seem to be a major factor. Its rock hard soil, however, was another problem. Digging-in, took time.

Finally, there was Margo's history. For a brief period some months before, it had been used as an artillery fire support base and the North Vietnamese were known to keep such positions under observation. The terrain and history summed to the point that BLT 2/26 was landing, one aircraft at a time, into a zone that was:

1 Too small to hold the entire BLT
2 Dominated by high ground to the north
3 Probably the subject of continuing NVA attention, at least to the point of registering mortar fires
Not good … but not unusual.

Friday the 13th of September 1968, a date not lost on many of the Marines, marked the beginning of several days of cloudless skies and comfortable temperatures. By 0700, a thousand or so Marines and Corpsman were waiting quietly in the Camp Carroll pick-up zone smoking, talking, thinking, and maybe, especially in Golf Company – which was landing first – praying. They were grunts, a term coined in Vietnam. While it may have been a derisive term originally, the sting was long gone. With certain pride, it is what they called themselves.

Believing that the chances of infection dramatically increased with the amount of clothing worn when wounded, they were deliberately underdressed. Boots. socks, and trousers were the standard; no underwear and, quite often. no shirt during the day. Their faded helmet covers sported an elastic band around the outside intended to hold camouflage material when the wearer sought invisibility in the bush. More often, it held either a main battle dressing for use if the wearer's luck turned bad or. in the case of optimists, a bottle of mosquito. repellent. The graffiti on most of the covers addressed a variety of subjects but many tended toward the religious. David Douglas Duncan's striking photographs of 26th Regiment Marines at Khe Sanh captured the phenomenon.

They all wore flak jackets, never zipped because she -or grenade fragments taken in the wrong place could jam the zipper, making it difficult for the Corpsmen to remove the jacket and treat a wounded man in the field. The flak jackets, if anything, were dirtier than the helmet covers. Sweat-stained from long wear by a series c owners, they had the same faded color as the camouflage covers but their graffiti, for whatever reason, tended to more basic thoughts than those found on the helmets.

They carried a haversack holding a box of the venerable C-rations, a poncho, poncho liner, and most important of all, an extra two or three pairs of socks. They carried extra radio batteries; mortar ammunition, even though them were not mortar men; rocket launchers, -grenades; at least four filled canteens; and as much extra rifle or Machine gun ammunition as possible.

They were typical grunts and Corpsmen, -normally unwashed, -usually underfed, always overloaded and, more often than not, tired. The lucky ones, those who avoided disease, wounds. or death, did not enjoy a hot meal or a cold shower for weeks on end.

Shortly before 0800, the CH-46s began landing in the pick-up zone with their distinctive whomping blade sound-unforgettable for those who rode them into combat. As the first wave launched, the sounds of the artillery preparatory fires in the distance and the roar of the fast movers orbiting overhead helped ease the tension.

The actual landing was anti-climactic. There was no opposition. but it still took a long, time. Echo, Foxtrot, and Hotel companies quickly assembled and began moving north. Echo struck out for a finger on the right that led to the high ground while Foxtrot and Hotel headed up another finger on the left. Golf Company, the command post, the 81-mm. mortar platoon. and others established defensive positions in the LZ and began digging in. Friday the 13th passed quietly.

On Saturday, 14 September, the companies continued moving north at first light. While there were well-worn trails in the area and occasional sounds of movement ahead. there were no contacts. Even so, the companies called artillery and mortar fires on possible target to keep the fire-support system active. About mid-day, Hotel Company's point, leading the movement up the left finger, saw movement ahead and signaled the company to move off the trail and wait. Their patience was rewarded as they watched a North Vietnamese soldier, weapon at sling arms, striding down the trail toward them.

The entire point was in an excellent ambush position and easily could have killed him. That they didn't was a testimony to discipline and the emphasis on taking prisoners. Waiting until the NVA soldier had passed. the point man re-entered the trail and, in Vietnamese. ordered him to halt — which he did promptly. The capture was reported to the company commander, relayed to battalion. and within a matter of minutes the 3d Marines had learned of the potential guest speaker. Within the hour. the prisoner had been flown to Camp Carroll for interrogation.

Throughout the war, most higher headquarters consistently failed to pass timely intelligence information down to the battalion level where it could be acted upon. The 3rd Marines did not make that mistake. Just before sundown. 2/26 learned that the prisoner had intended to surrender because he had been at Khe Sanh when the Marines first arrived. Stating that he "had a love of life." he added that he wanted no more of anything remotely resembling that battle, a confrontation that clearly had a psychological hold on both sides. Of greater interest was his disclosure that the lead company on the northwest finger – Hotel Company – would be attacked at about 2000 that evening. All three companies were alerted.

Echo, Foxtrot, and Hotel halted for the night and began registering artillery defensive fires. Hotel Company's artillery forward observer (FO), controlling a supporting 155-mm. howitzer battery, had just started registering fires to cover a listening post located on the western side of the finger when the Marines manning the post reported hearing movement through the draw to their direct front. Since the registration rounds were on the way, they could only wait. Seconds later, as the roar of the explosions died away. the listening post reported screams and other sounds of panic. The FO immediately called "Fire for effect" and swept the draw with 155 -mm. rounds. Other than moans and the sound of some movement in the draw the remainder of the nigh; was quiet.

15 September dawned clear and cloudless. Visibility was so good that Marines could watch outgoing 81mm mortar rounds until they reached their apogee. Again keeping the mortar and artillery fire-support systems active. E F, and H companies resumed their slow and careful climb toward the high ground. Signs of enemy presence were plentiful but there was no contact. The trouble started at noon, when a radio message from the 3d Marines ordered the BLT to pull its companies back to the LZ and prepare to shift to the operational control of the 9th Marines. The message was cryptic — it had to be because none of the radio transmissions with any of the battalions in the 3d Marine Division's area were secure. The encryption equipment of the day was too heavy to be carried in the field and, in any case, seldom worked in the heat and humidity of the bush. Problems with getting shackle sheets (code) down to company level precluded the use of even that decades old means of encryption. Everyone assumed that the North Vietnamese heard most of the radio traffic.

Communications security problems notwithstanding. the order was received with incredulity. There was little doubt that the NVA would follow the companies back to the landing zone and less doubt that mortar and perhaps infantry attacks would follow. The three rifle companies were told to halt and then to begin moving south to Margo; meanwhile the order was strenuously argued.

The regimental commander made it clear that the order stood but it was clear that he Agreed with the battalion's tactical assessment of what lay in store. Obedience would have a price. that much was obvious. What was not obvious was how much. After a few hours. the three companies were told to halt, reorient. and return to the original northward advance. We had to know if the trailing-enemy theory was correct. The order did not specify how long to follow the reverse course. but did tell the company commanders something they already knew — to expect contact. It came quickly on both ridges as small NVA units were surprised to find the Marines heading north again.

Breaking contact, the companies once more turned south toward Margo. So far as 2/26 was concerned, the point had been proven. We reported this to the 3d Marines and forcefully recommended cancellation of the withdrawal order. The reply was more enlightening than helpful. The battalion was told that its arguing and temporary resumption of the offensive had caused some difficulties (it wasn't phrased quite that way) and that there would be a 24 hour postponement. Further, however, the entire battalion was to concentrate in LZ Margo south of the 61 grid line — an east-west map line that split the LZ — by a specified time early the next afternoon. 16 September. In the interim, the BLT was authorized to do whatever it thought best to prepare for the return to the LZ. The maneuver companies were turned north again: within minutes. they bumped into NVA troops following them down the ridge lines.

The enlightening section of the order was the part about moving south of the 61 grid line. It made no sense because the area remaining in the LZ south of the grid line was too small to accommodate the BLT in anything resembling tactical positions. Even worse, it did not permit a tactical defense of the LZ, especially against infantry attacks coming from the most logical direction — north. It was apparent that the order had emanated from a headquarters other than regiment or division, neither of which would have displayed that level of tactical ignorance. This. and the urgency associated with the 61 grid line provision, led to the conclusion that an Arc Light-a high altitude B-52 area bombing mission — was imminent. To those steeped in the traditions of obedience to orders it might seem strange, but the BLT now confronted a dilemma. If its tactical assessment was correct, the order returning the maneuver units to the LZ would result in some form of NVA attack; if,. on the other hand, the Arc Light guess was right, there were other problems. The timing and target area were unknowns and, for security, would remain unknowns at the battalion, level. Further, the tactically inane directive to move south of the 61 grid line indicated that the Arc Light was going in north of Margo but close.

The dilemma was. simple and stark: Comply with the: order and risk NVA action — or move the companies toward Margo, retaining some semblance of tactical deployment north of the LZ, and risk the Arc Light.

To those who have seen a proper Arc Light, the choice was easy. The companies were directed to hold in place and begin moving south to the LZ early the next morning. But as a concession to common sense, that portion of the order regarding the 61 grid line was interpreted rather loosely. WE WOULD DEFEND MARGO.

The weather on 16 September matched the brilliance of the days gone by. Today, the Vietnamese Bureau of Tourism would be touting the weather, on that day in 1968, however, it turned into a scene from hell

Occasionally stopping to engage the NVA units following them, the three rifle companies, slowly made their way back to Margo. Echo Company came in last. Commanded by Captain John Cregan, now a Roman Catholic priest, the company began the climb up Margo's northern slope about and by 1430 or so was beginning to take up its assigned defensive positions on the northern perimeter. Even after ignoring the order to stay, south of the 61 grid line, there were too many troops in too small an area — and they had to contend with Margo's hard ground. Digging in took more time.

Early in the afternoon, there were ominous sightings of North Vietnamese Soldiers with mortars fording the Cam Lo River west of Margo. Artillery fire was called, probably without effect. At the same time, there was a minor flurry of activity as the BLT shifted to the operational control of the 9th Marines and radio frequencies were changed and tested. That done, the chatter of the troops and clanging of their entrenching tools were the only sounds disturbing the quiet.

At 1500, Captain Ken Dewey, an F-4 pilot serving as the battalion's air liaison officer, was looking north toward the left of the two hills that had been the original objectives when suddenly a mirror started flashing — followed immediately by the soft "thunking" sound of mortars firing in the distance. Within seconds, Margo was blanketed with exploding 82-mm rounds from several points on the compass, especially the northern arc. The battalion began – its "time on the cross" as the French put it in an earlier Indochina War.

The noise was deafening. Each explosion filled the surrounding air with black, stinking, greasy tasting smoke. The mortar men poured it on until 200 to 300 rounds had pummeled the Marines and Corpsmen, a good percentage of whom had no protection beyond that of shallow fighting holes.

As, the fire eased, the LZ sprang to life and First Lieutenant Al Green's 81mm. mortar platoon began counter battery fires, an action that won them concentrated NVA attention. Battalion machine gunners on Margo's southern rim saw some enemy mortar men and began to engage at long range attracting in turn their share of incoming. The exchange continued for a few more minutes until the mirror on the high ground flashed again. The incoming barrage slowed, then stopped— but the noise in the, zone grew to deafening proportions as hundreds of rifles went into action.

At first, it seemed as if the frustrated Marine riflemen were wasting ammunition on the out-of-range NVA mortar men, but a radio query to First Lieutenant Bob Riordan, the Golf Company commander, revealed that from his position, on the -southern rim, North Vietnamese soldiers could be seen moving uphill to assault the LZ's northern side.

Then the rifle fire stopped abruptly and, within seconds, the southern rim and center of the LZ were alive with Marines running to the northern side. Their fires had been masked by those manning the northern slope defenses and they were leaving their own positions to get into the fight. The enemy never had a chance, The NVA commander who ordered the assault, probably had fewer' troops than he thought as a result of the previous contacts. In any case, the reaction of the defenders was too violent. No more than 20 minutes had elapsed. The cost to BLT 2/26 was more than 150 dead and wounded. The cost to the enemy was unknown. At 1700, the mirror flashed again and the mortars went, to work. Once more, rounds rained down on Margo fewer this time and without – an infantry attack – but the BLT's casualty list grow longer.

For the first time since the attacks began, medical evacuation of the wounded now seemed possible. It was likely that the NVA had expended most or all of their mortar ammunition and would not interfere with the helicopter evacuation.

The casualties had been separated by category . . . emergency, priority, routine ... and the "permanent routine," a euphemism for the dead that had crept into the radio operator's lexicon. We hoped to Medivac at least the emergency and priority wounded before nightfall. Several CH-46As and gun ships arrived about 1830 and the laborious process of loading the casualties, one at a time, began as soon as the lead bird touched down.

As always, the strength and example can be found in the casualties. I saw Staff Sergeant Doner from the reconnaissance platoon, covered with ' with blood, as he was being escorted to the Medivac staging area. He was refusing to leave, insisting that he was okay. I told him that he would leave.

Late the afternoon of 16 September, I watched as an uninjured Marine rapidly searched the rows of wounded, clearly looking for a friend. Suddenly, a large arm reached out and waved. "There you are," said the first as he took the wounded man's hand and squatted down to talk. They held hands quietly until the Medivac helicopters arrived.

The wounded Marine had been hit badly, I do not know if he survived. Nor do I know if his friend survived our subsequent encounters with the NVA. What I do know is that the wounded Marine was black and his buddy white. I remember thinking at the time how much better a people we would be if we were all like those two. Recently, we have been told that the best and brightest did not go to Vietnam. When I heard that, I thought of those two Marines so long ago, the hardships they endured, and their obvious respect for each other. Maybe they were not the brightest. They were the best.

Realizing that there would be no other Medivacs from Margo that night, the last pilot insisted on overloading his aircraft with wounded. Over his objections, the loading stopped and the pilot was told to launch. He must have been good. If not good, he was lucky. The overloaded 46 resembled a giant praying mantis as it struggled into the air, tail down, nose swinging back and forth in a wide arc, as though searching for escape from a trap. Finally, he nursed it a few feet higher, leveled, and began slipping sideways, just above the trees, down the slope that formed Margo's northern rim. Again, the LZ filled with Marines running north: convinced that the -46 was about to crash, they were moving to assist survivors. The helicopter disappeared from view behind the trees and, an eternity later, came back into view, this time in full flight, nose high on a southerly course, jettisoning fuel to lighten the load and clear the ridge to Margo's east. All movement stopped as everyone in the LZ watched the miracle claw its way over the ridge line, taking the wounded to safety.

Quiet settled over Margo. As the troops returned to their positions, the silence was broken by a single "thunk" off to the north. This time there was only one round, but it landed precisely where the Medivac birds had loaded. It was "Charlie," saying that he knew what had been done and could have stopped it anytime. He also was saying that he was a "pro" We knew that already.

The XXIV Corps Commanding General visited Margo the following morning. His worries about morale evaporated as he watched Marines improving their defensive positions. He then looked toward large group of wounded waiting to be evacuated. In response to a question, he was told that they were the routine Medivacs. Behind them were rows of poncho – covered objects. He looked at them, saying nothing, knowing what they were. Finally, a Marine broke the spell. "The dead go last. Sir."

Epilogue

The Arc Light went in five or six kilometers north of Margo on the afternoon of 16 September. Maybe too much had happened or maybe there was an unusually high number of duds. Regardless, it was unimpressive. Paradoxically, it hurt 2/26 more than it hurt the enemy.

'Early on 17 September, Golf, Foxtrot, and, Hotel Companies returned to the familiar trails, attacking north. Echo Company, having lost nearly 70 Marines in the mortar and infantry attacks, remained behind. The LZ was mortared twice that day but there were few casualties. Margo's final toll probably will never be known exactly. We evacuated more than 200 dead and wounded, some of whom doubtless died later. Before we left, we filled 18 helicopter external nets with packs, weapons, and other equipment, no longer needed.

Eventually, after another long period of torrential rains, the attacking companies reached the high ground, where Golf found a graveyard — 18 graves with markers aligned in rows — near where the mirror had flashed before the mortar attack. They excavated a few to confirm that it was a graveyard. They also traced the extensive writings on the markers and sent them to the rear for translation. The writings turned out to be a history of each of the casualties. We learned that we had gotten the NVA battalion commanding officer and much of his staff. The CO had been a soldier since joining the Viet Minh in the late 1940s, he was a professional. I think that whoever ordered all of the writing put on the markers did so, at least in part, so that we would not dig up their dead.

We stood by to attack to the west. It never happened. Near the end of September, the BLT moved by helicopter into another one-bird zone, his one in the DMZ just south of the Ben Hai River, nearly 15 kilometers north and east of Margo. In a series of assaults, BLT 2/26 routed an enemy force defending a headquarters complex and artillery positions. During the last assault, Marines of Echo and Hotel Companies were treated to the rare sight of North Vietnamese troops fleeing in panic.

The Marines and Corpsmen of 2/26 formed a typical grunt battalion. They fought a dirty, unpopular war and they did it well. They never said that they were the best. All they said was that, if they met somebody better, they hoped he was on their side.

Major General Lynch, an infantry officer, was the operations officer (S-3) for BLT 2/26 during the action at Landing Zone Margo. He commanded the Marine Corps Recruit Depot and Eastern Recruiting Region, Parris Island, South Carolina, prior to his retirement in 1991. He is the Southwest Florida Area Co-ordinator for the State Comptroller.

2015 ANNUAL KHE SANH REUNION AUGUST 17 - 22

The reunion was held in beautiful Savannah, Georgia at the Marriott Savannah Riverfront Hotel. Another reunion full of interesting events and excursions was offered for all to enjoy. Golf was offered on Wednesday at the beautiful Savannah Harbor Golf Course. Thursday we boarded comfortable busses for a trip to Parris Island where many were able to relive their induction of many years ago. Friday was the board of directors meeting and later the attendees enjoyed an outstanding two (2) hour river boat dinner cruise which included entertainment and dancing. Saturday morning was the ladies luncheon, Memorial Service and General Membership Meeting. The evening concluded with the Annual Cocktail Party, formal flag ceremony, introduction of elected officers, acknowledgment of appreciation for the outgoing officers and concluded with the annual Dinner Banquet.

Besides these wonderful social events, actual work does get accomplished for the good of the membership and the Association. Meeting are held, opinions are offered and discussed, budgets presented, financial reports are made available for all to review, elections are conducted for various board positions and the membership selects the year after next reunion location.

The Officers and Board of Directors (Members at Large) are elected for a two year cycle. The terms are staggered so there is always a carry-over of current members. The board members for 2015-2016 are as follows. (Officers) Tom Eichler – President/ Treasurer, John Pessoni – Vice President, Craig W. Tourte – Secretary. (Board of Directors) Russ Turner, Thomas Ford, Bruce Geiger, Wayne (Butch) Deverney, Jose (Cisco) Reyes, Dennis Mannion, Sid Patricio, Mike Fishbaugh and John Wolf. David Meyers – Sergeant at Arms and Ronald Rayner – Chaplin.

Previously selected San Antonino will be the site of the 2016 Annual reunion. (Details pages 35 & 36) The membership decided this year that the 2017 Annual Reunion will be held in (downtown) Cleveland Ohio. (No Date Has Been Set)

Special appreciation was noted to those who donated so generously to the Khe Sanh Association which supports the needs of the Association and the Khe Sanh Scholarship Fund. A Certificate of Appreciation was awarded to Robert C. Koury Jr. Delta Company, 1st Battalion, 1st Marines for his tireless efforts and overwhelming support and generosity to the Khe Sanh Veterans.

Starting November 1, 2015 the annual dues has been raised to $ 40.00. The dues notifications will go out the same date. John Pessoni related that members are still sending orders for the PX to his old address. His new address is listed in the change sheet in the current issue of Red Clay. For those who do not have a current directory in their possession it is:

JOHN PESSONI
1700 RT 37W
BLDG 124 APT 8
TOMS RIVER, NJ 08757

Big John wanted to thank the membership for their generosity in purchasing items from the KSV PX. Dave Meyer KSV Sgt At Arms, and his lovely wife Carol, who work so hard putting together the silent auction, also wanted to give a shout out to the membership for their generosity. Khe Sanh Veterans also kicked in almost $1,400 for the 50-50 drawing. Thanks to all who worked hard selling tickets. All these funds support our magazine and the scholarship fund.

We would be so remiss if we did not give a huge thank you to our lovely hard working committee chairwoman, Kathy Turner. She is really the glue that holds the reunions together We love you Kathy.

Please get your registrations in ASAP, after you receive them in the mail. It makes our job a little easier You can always cancel with the KSV and the Hotel. We refunded eight members and the Hotel was kind enough to give refunds even after the 24 hour limit.

WELCOMING REMARKS BY ROBERT C. KOURY JR. DELTA CO 1/1, USMC

It is wonderful to see so many adolescent faces- and I am not just talking about the grandchildren. It is indeed a grand and glorious day to be alive and in the Corps where every meal is a banquet, every formation is a parade, and every day is a holiday. Am I missing anything?? May the Heavens bless the United States Marine Corps and all who serve in her ranks.

My goodness, what a spectacular ceremony! Thanks to Rick Bazaco and Sgt Major Lon Martin for making this possible Can I get an Oroughah. Ever since Rick asked me to speak at this event, I have been agonizing about what I could possibly say to a group of Marine combat veterans. Something they didn't already know about Vietnam. Something about the profound subjects of life, death and sacrifice in combat.

I ask you to forgive me if I repeat facts that you may already know. And please forgive me for carrying around the notes on this talk in front of me. I have not been able to memorize anything since the hundreds of rock 'n roll songs that I know by heart from the 60s took up all the available space in my brain. You know- Buddy Holly, Gene Vincent and the Big Bopper

Two score and ten years ago, Marines from the 1st Battalion of the 1st Marine Regiment were deployed to the Republic of Vietnam. We were just one part of America's commitment to bolster the democratic government in the south of that country. And to halt the expansionist aggression of the communist government in the north.

We were inserted into a very long, in fact ancient, history of conflict and war in Vietnam. It is fair to say most Americans, and certainly most of our political leaders, were woefully negligent on the depth and breadth of what had unfolded in Vietnam for well over a thousand years before our arrival. These guys had been at war forever, and learned to be real good at it. It is also fair to say that most of us, definitely not me, had very little appreciation of our place Vietnam's history, at least not at that point in our lives.

But, let me see if I have this right...
- Communists are invading a democratic free nation...
- More domino nations in the area will fall to Communism if we do not intervene...

- Hmmmm..... for us, Nuff Said.

Let's kick a little Commie butt and be back home in time for Christmas!!

We are Marines. We march toward the sound of gunfire, and faithfully obey the orders from our chain of command. No matter what our county asked, we Marines were eager to do. And tuning up the Communist north's attitude was right up our alley.

So march off to war boys. With bangles and spangles and bright golden buttons. Our role in the conflict started with guarding an airfield, and expanded to seeking and destroying the enemy across most of I Corps and its borders with North Vietnam and Laos. We fought guerilla and conventional battles, and we engaged in urban combat. The conflict for us expanded from an intervention to become a real war.

America fought this war with one hand tied behind its back militarily, using only a fraction of its might and resources. This, primarily due to the concern that we could awaken the giant Communist nations of China or Russia into full scale land war in Asia. Absolutely, not a good idea. However, this larger strategic picture was of little consequence for those of us at the pointy end of the spear. For us, the Vietnam war was serious, intense and damn deadly.

During the six year period of its deployment in Vietnam, 1st Battalion 1st Marines lost 567 Marines and corpsmen killed in action. Staggering. That is almost 3 whole companies killed out of a battalion. 567!! To this day, it is difficult to fully comprehend and reckon with the tragedy of these losses. For every death there were at least four times, or five times or maybe six times that many of us wounded. There is no way to know exactly how many.

And these wounds included horrible losses of limbs and bodily functions- not the kind you see in the old time western movies. These were wounds that forever changed your life, and inflicted long term suffering and misery.

So, that adds up to 567 of us killed and likely well over 2,500 wounded during 1/1's deployment. That is roughly 3,000 lives which were either terminated or forever changed. Your odds of being killed or wounded were 1 in 3, or maybe even 50/50 if you were serving with 1/1 in Vietnam. Based on your experiences, does that sound about right?? How many of you wear the Purple Heart ? Thank you.

Those brutal odds were a consequence of 1/1 being at the absolute pointy tip of the military spear in Vietnam. We were bloodied, but no way broken. And then on top of these frightful KIA and WIA odds are the additional lingering consequences of being in our war. Horrible Agent Orange illnesses, TBI (traumatic brain injury), PTSD, alcohol and drug addictions, and the ever enduring deep emotional scars. We all came back from our journey to war as very, very different individuals from who we were when we left.

On a slightly brighter note, our on-going sacrifices are just beginning to be recognized by our country. Rather late in our lives, but I guess, better late than never. We at the pointy end, have paid a heavy price for serving. And we have paid that price many times over.

Let's reflect for a moment on what happened to us on our journeys both to war and coming back from war.

We signed up for the Green Machine, or the Blue Machine, from our home towns throughout this great nation. Our motives for doing so varied. No matter. With the skilled guidance of our recruiters, we overcame the apprehensions and opposition of our parents and loved ones. And then, off we go on our journey to become Marines or Corpsmen. Soon, the realization sets in... we are alone on this voyage. Friends and family are small specs in the rear view mirror, and they are continuing with their lives without us. We are introduced into a new world of discipline, martial skills and hardening. Our instructors absolutely know what is ahead for us. And we absolutely, absolutely do not have a clue. There is very little time to make friends we are on this journey alone.

Whether a recruit at Parris Island or San Diego, or squid at Great Lakes, or a potential (make that possible) officer candidate at Quantico PLC or OCS, the basic military conversion is to you, and to you alone. You are beginning your journey to war. You get to know a few guys, but they are 30 day friends. Not like your long time high school friendships from home.

Then there is the next dislocation on your journey to war: Advanced Infantry, Advanced MOS or Corpsman training, or to officers' Basic School. Again, you enter this leg of the journey to war without family or friends to be your support group. You are injected into a whole new group of strangers- alone again. Then, you deploy to Vietnam. This leg of your journey to war is taken with new strangers who are on the same well worn path with you. Remember the surreal voyages or flights into country? And on arrival, the heat, the noises, and the smells (yes, I do mean the burning the crappers) are staggering to your senses.

You are lost and alone in this new world- warrior not yet at war. At last, your assignment and arrival to somewhere within 1st Battalion, 1st Marines. Again, you are with new strangers and in a very strange place. Your mind is reeling as you try to fit in. Then comes.....the ultimate separation and loneliness which is:??? Anyone please?? You are the New Guy- locally known as an FNG!!

We were all a FNG at one point, and we all, if we were fortunate enough to not get hit, later knew guys who we called FNG's. As a FNG, you were an outcast. You were embedded in a unit, but no one wanted to get friendly or emotionally close. They all knew your chances of outlasting the FNG label were pretty darned small.

Talk about lonely... your first FNG nights on watch, in a hole or bunker in the pitch black night, with every shrub an enemy coming to cut your throat. No one but other strangers to talk to- and not much of that. Alone and pondering the fact that that your sweetheart, Nancy Rottencrotch was doing it with Jody Sweetgums back home, while you were on the opposite side of the planet.

Strangely, you were somehow able to look down, with mental x-ray vision, through the bottom of your hole, all the way through the planet, to see their feet on the other side where you left them. That is, unless Nancy and Jody were horizontal, whereupon the view was very different, but easy to visualize. So, here you are, an FNG surviving among strangers, and worse, now within the reach of those who really do want to kill you.

If you stayed healthy for a while, you made a few new 30 day friendships with some of your fellow Marines. These were somehow much deeper and different friendships than you had ever experienced. Probably because your lives depended on each other. A lot different from your football buddies back home. But with your new Marine buddies, you always held something back. You had to be willing to let them go in a heartbeat- always one bullet or incoming round away from their leaving your life.

Or if they rotated home before you, they were pretty much flat gone from your life. Strangely, the longer you survive in country, the fewer friends you are willing to make. It is just not worth the emotional loss when they go. And your mind begins to be packed with new, vivid memories of your time at war. Memories that will be with you for the rest of your days. Some good. Most horrific. These are the very best times and the very worst times of your life.

Do I have that right???

Your journey to war has now reached its destination. You are a Marine warrior at war. And you are serving with the legendary 1st of the 1st- 1st Battalion1st Marines. It just doesn't seem so at the time, but you are now a living part of that storied 1/1 legacy: Guadalcanal, New Britain, Peleliu, Okinawa, Inchon and the Chosin Reservoir. You are now the last link in the unbroken chain of Marines at war stretching back over 200 years. A chain of Marines joined in mind, body and soul that has remained unbroken to this day.

Your moments of combat, with the lives of brother Marines in your hands, will likely be both the very best and the very worst times of your life. The peak and the valley. The top and the absolute bottom. All in one. Most of the rest of your life will be relatively, and thankfully, dull by comparison.

You are filthy, covered with oozing sores. You have been cut by elephant grass, sucked on by killer mosquitos, bitten by the ginormous centipedes, threatened by rats big enough to carry sidearms, and that doesn't account for the damned leaches- ugh. You have been shot at by little guys who are very serious about killing you, mortared, rocketed and booby trapped You have become weary to the bone exhausted from little sleep, pissed off and pissed on, haunted, edgy, moody, and hostile, damned hostile.

You have become exactly what is needed to survive and succeed at this war thing- the perfect killing machine: An Infantry Marine at War. Welcome to the new you. So this is what those Marine heroes from earlier wars endured?- wow. Whodda thought?

And then your thirteen months are up. Or you are wounded and evacuated. You have survived your journey to war, and are ready to begin your journey from war.

Here you are, too short for a long conversation. Too short to see over your jungle boot laces. Too short for a wait-a-minute vine to slow you. Infused with guilt at leaving your buddies, and those poor, poor bastard FNG's behind, you head back to the World. You are a survivor. However, it is a very different you who is leaving. You are absolutely not the same person who started your journey to war months earlier. You left the World with bright eyes, bangles, spangles and bright golden buttons.

You have returned from war with aching scars from your sores and wounds, haunted, edgy, angry, moody, pissed off, and still hostile- damned hostile. You are haunted with the horrible war memories, to be re-lived- many, many times over. This is the new you.

This new you is a stranger to even you. What the heck happened? And even worse, all those folks you left back in the World are now strangers to you. And you to them. You are back in the World, but you are alone on your journey from war. It is a very strange place.

None of us signed up to get a thank you from a grateful nation on returning from our journey to war. We signed up to be warriors. And we warriors are in it for reasons the rest of the World simply does not comprehend. Definitely not in it for getting parades and a rousing welcome home. That is something we can live without and blow off. Screw it- march on. Simply add one more item to our enormous list of things to be pissed off and hostile about But, to top it all off, back in the World, we were welcomed and rewarded with the utter disdain of friends and strangers alike for our heroic part in our nation's war in Vietnam. This distain and sneers for our service was, and still is, a bit tough to stomach. How many of you get a rousing welcome home and thank you from a grateful nation??

The way the Corps worked in our war: you joined alone, became a Marine or Corpsman alone, trained with strangers, traveled to war with strangers, fought with strangers and came home with strangers, only to reunite with strangers who used to be family and friends. Alone again. "Surrounded by strangers you thought were your friends, you find yourself further and further from home." (Bob Seger). You are now back in the World, but without a real home, even in your home town. You are there, but your soul isn't. And oh, the survivor's guilt.

Strangely, you miss and want to be back with your Marine unit, even if it means going back to the hell hole that is the Nam. Self healing is the next, and the very longest part of your war journey.

And, self healing turns out to be very a long term proposition.

So, that is our story- the story of those of us who survived our war journey. Now, let's take a moment to ponder the journey of those less fortunate than we. Those who served with 1/1 in Vietnam who did not survive their journey to war. Those who walked among us, and who walked with us, who were killed there. Those who we today honor. Depending on when or how they got hit, they likely died with Marine comrades and Corpsmen around them. But they essentially died alone. Without the comfort of the mother they sometimes cried out for. And without any support system to ease this part of their journey. They were alone- and then they were gone. Absolutely gone from us.

Still at war ourselves, we had to turn our backs on their death and get immediately on with the very urgent business of surviving. No time or emotion available to think deeply about their onward journey. They were irrevocably and immediately gone. And they were achingly alone on their journey from war.

If there was a quiet moment later, and if their death was even discussed, it was said that:??? "They were scattered". Not sure we understood or fully appreciated the greater implications of this description. But in fact, they were scattered from us- alone on their personal journey from war. First, on a hurried chopper out of the field which was, understandably, primarily interested in getting the heck out of a hot LZ. Then, through the morgue at Division. Then in a dark baggage hold on a flight to a receiving center somewhere in Guam or Hawaii.

Next, to a couple of more unknown transit locations, before finally arriving at one of the thousands of local mortuaries across the land. They were a stranger to all they passed at each stop of their final journey.

When they arrived at their final destination, those who came to mourn them were only able to know and remember who they once were- who they had been before they left to war. Their mourners simply did not have a clue who they had become during their journey to war- the new him. They were mourning a stranger. Only we, their almost-brothers, knew who and what they had become. And sadly, we, the only ones who now truly knew them, could not be at their final destination to be with them, comfort them, and mourn their passing.

There simply has been no way for us to come together with our fallen Marine brothers for these many years. They have been scattered and alone, without a home. As have we. But today, damn it, we are going to begin a new chapter in the war journey for both us and our fallen. And this new chapter is named "Welcome Home, Brother".

The Marine Corps Heritage Museum is located at Quantico, the crossroads of the Marine Corps. Sooner or later almost everyone who serves in the green machine passes through Quantico. The designers of the Heritage Museum grounds wisely provided for a beautiful and fitting, naturally wooded memorial area to honor Marines from many generations. This is really a wonderful thing, and our enduring thanks should be rendered to them.

Quantico is also at the crossroads of our American Civil War. After over 45 years of living in this area, I finally came to understand why there were so many battles fought here: this area is basically midway between the Confederate capital in Richmond and the Union capital in Washington. Civil War soldiers on both sides crossed this ground many times in that horrible war, and too many perished right here. This is indeed hallowed ground.

From now on when I use the word "here" in this discussion, I will be referring to where our new 1/1 Vietnam Memorial is situated. At the Museum, maybe a couple of miles from this Chapel. How many of you have already seen our Memorial?? The rest of you have a day coming that will be remembered for the rest of your lives. It is just that cool.

Here (there), in this hallowed ground, we have built a fitting Memorial to the fallen 567 who walked with us, with 1/1 in Vietnam, and perished at their posts. Our Memorial contains 193 beautifully engraved bricks displaying each of their 567 names. Our fallen have now, at long last, come together at this Memorial place. Reunited. No longer alone. No longer scattered. They are at home.

In designing our memorial, we decided that it was fitting to display the names of our fallen in a way that those who came to visit with them could:- Easily locate and read their name- Speak it out loud in this wooded area - And sit for quiet moments to contemplate this reunion

Most important, when we speak their names out loud, we are keeping that person alive within us. By saying their names, we remember and rekindle their lives within us. It is like a flash bulb going off in the brains of we the living. You can see them, visit with them and remember. When I say:

- Smiley Vasquez
- Nick Buffin
- Mike Casey

David Langley

Or any of our 567, their personal flash will go off in the brains of we who knew them. Did that just happen for some of you with these names I just said?- it did for me

Next in this ceremony, we will share that rekindling of their lives, by reading out loud the names of each and every one of our fallen brothers. And by so doing, they will become a mental flash, remembered, and alive again within us.

I had the occasion to tour the Museum with a group of my basic school class- 47 years later (I know, we don't look it). Sgt. Major Lon Martin was our host. During his orientation, he shared a story that has had a profound impact on me, and I hope it will on you as well. He told us that quite frequently, families will bring older Marines to the Museum. And that many times, these Marines are in wheelchairs and don't have the ability to say much. The Sgt. Major has often responded to their family's questions which ask why this old Marine has such a huge grin on his face while wheeling through the Museum. The Sgt. Major advises the family that this is because this old Marine now feels that he is home.

Home with a part of his life that was of huge importance to him. Comfortable in these Marine surroundings and happy with the people about him. And you know, when I walk through the Museum, I feel at home. And I have that same grin on my face. And I'll bet you will too.

So, our new Memorial has created a home for our fallen in this hallowed ground. Home from the 567 locations where they were scattered, their spirits have come here to this hallowed ground, to these crossroads, where we remember them and honor them. The creation of this memorial is a homecoming for our 567.They are no longer scattered. They are home.

And we, the surviving, are today also welcomed home. This is a new home for us as well. At home with our fallen brothers. At the crossroads of the Civil War. At the crossroads of our Marine Corps. And at the crossroads of our personal journeys to and from war. This is a place to remember our war journey, and a place to give thanks and homage to those who walked with us. It gives me great pleasure to say to you assembled here today: Welcome Home Marines. This is the welcome home you never got and have long deserved. Thank you for your many, many sacrifices. I am so damned proud to be standing here among genuine American heroes. Can I get an oooraugh.

To paraphrase President Lincoln: We are met here, on a great battlefield of our American Civil War. We have come here today to dedicate a portion of that field, as a final resting place for those who walked with us and perished in what was, ironically, a civil war in Vietnam. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this. The world will little note, nor long remember what we say here, but it should never forget what our honored did. It is rather for us to be now dedicated to the great task remaining before us—that from these honored dead, we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of their devotion: the success of our Marine Corps and the preservation of our great nation.

We hereby highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain. That their memory and their sacrifice shall not perish from the earth. Can I get an oooraugh.
Semper Fi, Brothers.

Lon Martin, a retired sergeant major, helps dedicate the memorial to the fallen Marines and Corpsmen who served in 1st Battalion, 1st Marines in Vietnam from 1965-1971. The new memorial is located at the National Museum of the Marine Corps and was dedicated Aug. 29 in a ceremony held aboard Marine Corps Base Quantico.

MARINE CORPS BASE QUANTICO, Va. — Dolia Gonzalez, mother of Medal of Honor recipient Sgt. Alfredo Gonzalez, reads names of fallen Marines in her son's unit 1st Battalion, 1st Marines. The roll call was part of a ceremony aboard Marine Corps Base Quantico Aug. 29, to dedicate a new memorial to the 567 Marine who died in that unit from 1967-1971. The new memorial is located at the National Museum of the Marine Corps.

MARINE CORPS BASE QUANTICO, Va. — Brad Mamalis, a former Marine who was a soprano bugler for The Commandant's Own Drum and Bugle Corps rings a bell after the name of each of the 567 Marines and Corpsman who were killed in action with 1st Battalion, 1st Marines in Vietnam from 1965-1971. As the roll call was part of ceremony dedicating a new memorial was held aboard Marine Corps Base Quantico Aug. 29. The new memorial displays each of the 567 names and is located at the National Museum of the Marine Corps.

We've traveled halfway 'round the world
To find ourselves again
And look how far we've come
So far from where we used to be
But not so far that we've forgotten
How it was before ( Lyrics by Neil Diamond: September Mourn)

By Richard D. Camp, Jr.
Colonel USMC (Ret)

Packed with troops, the long column of trucks maneuvered over the rutted, hard-packed dirt road. Many of the vehicles mounted .50-caliber machine guns, their threatening snouts jutting menacingly from cab-mounted support rings. Their gunners peered intently into the ground-clinging fog that limited visibility to the edges of the cleared brush. Rain pelted the poncho-draped Marines sitting in the open, overcrowded truck beds, adding to the misery of sore butts and cramped muscles. The wretched passengers faced outboard, rifles at hand, but half asleep, numbed by boredom and fatigue. The distorted silhouette of an LVT (landing vehicle, tracked) materialized out of the fog, just off the road. There was a sudden stir among the passengers…heads snapped up, hands tightened on weapons, something was terribly wrong. The steel hulk was blasted and burned, barely recognizable. Multiple rocket-propelled grenade strikes had turned the vehicle into a shattered wreck. The sight of the destroyed armored vehicle—seemingly invincible to a grunt—inspired a new awareness. Lieutenant Chan Crangle, platoon commander, Mike Company, 3rd Battalion, 26th Marines (M 3/26), summed it up. "I told my platoon sergeant that we were about to get into a very different war from the farmer-and-pitchfork stuff down south. I knew Con Thien was a dangerous place…"

Deadly Encounter

In early September 1967, 3rd Battalion, 26th Marines (3/26) fought two major engagements against elements of the North Vietnamese 324B Division, suffering almost 350 Marine casualties, four out of ten killed or wounded. The actions took place just south of the Demilitarized Zone in Northern I Corps. The area became known as the "Leatherneck Square," a quadrangle just below the Ben Hai River, which marked the boundary between North and South Vietnam. The "Square," bounded in the south by Cam Lo and Dong Ha and in the north by Gio Linh and Con Thien, was one of the most hotly contested areas in South Vietnam.

The first deadly encounter began on the afternoon of 7 September, when volleys of rockets, mortars and artillery slammed into the hastily dug Marine positions. Waves of NVA infantry closely followed, threatening to overrun the embattled Leathernecks. Three under strength companies, India, Kilo, and Mike, battled elements of the North Vietnamese 812th Regiment throughout the long night. Finally, toward morning, the fighting tapered off and the NVA withdrew to lick their wounds. The haggard Marine survivors emerged from their foxholes to find the battlefield littered with over a 100 NVA bodies. The struggle had not been without cost; twenty Marines had been killed in action, while another 70 had suffered wounds.

Sounds in the Night

The Battalion, minus Lima Company, ended up at a location just north of Charlie-2 (C-2), an artillery firebase, where the men dismounted and waited for guides to take them to their position. It was one of those pre-monsoon days when the sometimes heavy rain turned the reddish loam into mud; sticking to their jungle boots and making them feel like they weighed a ton. Visibility was less than 100 meters. "The guides from 1st Battalion, 9th Marines (1/9) (later nicknamed "The Walking Dead") were wearing ponchos," recalled Crangle, "and as they moved out ahead of us, is seemed surreal, with those green ghosts walking toward the treelines. Noiseless. No chatter. No clatter of equipment. The silence was striking."

They moved into position and 1/9 shoved off, anxious to get back to the rear for hot showers and food that didn't come in little green cans. "The unofficial word, grunt to grunt during the relief," India Company's Staff Sergeant Russ Armstrong remembered, "was that there was nothing around there—no VC or NVA, no action." There was a problem with the relief however, 3/26 had three companies, while the departing battalion had just two. The foxhole lined perimeter was too small…and it was almost dark, a bad time to dig new holes. Captain Tom Early, the communications officer recalled, "Unfortunately, it's sometimes easy to take the lazy way out and put yourself into a hole that's already been dug." The three companies shifted about, trying to find the best ground. Andy DeBona, the profane snuff-dipping skipper of Mike Company didn't like the ground one bit. "I was spread out over hell's half-acre and back," he groused. A thoroughly annoyed 81mm mortar platoon under Chief Warrant Officer Dick Holycross, a reservist from Columbus, Ohio, had to pick up and move to a new position before digging in—again!

The battalion settled in for the night, on the ground that was the highest around but was, in effect, a slight grade, more of a mound than commanding terrain. Sergeant Armstrong recalled, "It was bordered on two or three sides by dense growth we did not control and in which I was afraid enemy soldiers could conceal themselves." A half-destroyed church stood in the middle of the perimeter, its ruined tower jutting into the air, "like it was right off a movie set," according to Lieutenant Ron Zappardino, the forward air controller. "It was right out of a John Wayne movie." The only thing the ground lacked was a graveyard—but that would soon change.

DeBona's forward observer called in night defensive fires—planned artillery concentrations in case of attack. "Either he was off or the guns were," Crangle remembered. "The first round impacted close enough to get everyone in their holes. I convinced our 'cannon cocker' to add a few meters to his plot." When the excitement passed, the defenders settled down to the usual 50 percent alert—one man awake in every two man foxhole—but there was uneasiness. India Company rifleman Lance Corporal Chuck Bennett summed it up. "We heard some movement during the night, but not much. They were testing us, I think. They were out there; in front of our perimeter…I could hear movement."

Hell in a Small Place

September 7 downed bright and clear, the previous days rain just a memory. The men completed their morning ritual—pee, C-ration breakfast, weapons' maintenance—and saddled up. Battalion wanted to check out the area—India, minus one platoon to the northwest, while Mike Company scouted generally south—each company on its own patrol route. Debona wasn't too happy with the assignment. "I wanted to get out and back into position as quick as I could," he said. He had been told this was "bad-guy country and...we should go out only as a battalion with a lot of supporting arms planned." His company reconned by fire—artillery and mortars onto suspicious terrain—and returned to the perimeter by late morning. They didn't spot anything but old NVA fighting pits.

Two platoons of India—about 80 men and three officers—trudged through the badly overgrown cultivated area. "That terrain was tough to move in," India Company's Lieutenant Bob Stimson recalled. "It was very confining, very scary. I had a bad feeling about being in such dense growth." It took the slow moving formation about three to four hours to move a little over one klick—1,000 meters. Armstrong discovered "four very distinct beaten-down trails in the grass where a military unit had marched through four abreast." Bennett saw some smoke and came across a "big black kettle with rice cooking in it." The company crossed a large, open rice-paddy and dropped down into a dry drainage ditch—8 feet deep and 10 feet across. Even though part of the company was able to use it, progress remained slow because fire teams and squads had to advance through the brush on either side to provide security for the rest of the men. Suddenly, small arms fire broke out on the left. "Lance Corporal Gary Lindsay was the next guy to my left, about 20 feet away," Bennett said. "I saw him go down. I knew he was hit. I crawled over, firing a few bursts as I went. Lindsey was hit in the head and was already dead. He never knew what hit him."

The company set up a hasty defense, pushing troops out of the ditch to form a perimeter. Sporadic small -arms fire wounded three men, who were dragged back to the ditch, along with Lindsey's body. Another Marine was killed, tumbling into an old bomb crater. The NVA seemed to be moving around, probing to determine what they were up against, searching for any weakness in the Marine defense. The company contacted an Aerial Observer (AO) who brought in several flights of fighter-bombers to hit the NVA positions. The enemy fire died away and an H-34 medevac helicopter was able to get in and take out the wounded—but had to leave the two dead Marines.

Battalion assembled a rescue force consisting of Kilo Company and a platoon of tanks. The tank commander, Lieutenant Paul Drnec said, "The entire tank platoon—all three gun tanks and the one flame tank— reinforced Kilo Company." The force reached the open rice paddy but couldn't cross it because there was too much water under the crust. It wouldn't support the weight of the tanks. India withdrew from its position in the ditch and linked up with the rescue force. "We retraced our route," Stimson recalled. "I knew there were NVA out there. I could just sense that we were in the wrong place." Armstrong saw a man in a Marine helmet and flak jacket motioning for him to come to him. Something just didn't seem right; there were no Marines over there. India's commander, Captain Wayne Colter, climbed a tank and ordered it to fire into their old position. Drnec warned him, "Hey look sir, let's get the hell outta here and then we can start playing games." Overruled, he started firing—and was immediately blanketed by intense fire from the entire NVA arsenal—artillery, 60mm and 81mm mortar fire, RPGs, 140mm rockets, .51-caliber machine gun and small arms fire. Colter toppled off the tank with a severe head wound.

Stimson heard the rockets lift off, and then impact around the tanks and the rear elements of the company. Armstrong took a hit. "An explosion went off just to my right rear and shrapnel penetrated underneath my right arm and struck me in the right side of the face. Another piece went all the way through my left leg. The hole in my leg was huge." The incoming killed and wounded many (author's note, number undetermined) and disrupted the formation. "The company was in as vulnerable a position as anyone could have feared," Stimson said, "strung out, burdened with casualties, in incredibly bad terrain, part in the open, and with no one in charge!" At this critical moment, the NVA launched a ground assault. "I saw a dozen to about 20 people in green uniforms trotting—double timing—across the paddies," Armstrong recalled. "I thought 'Jesus Christ,' this is the end of the line."

About a dozen Marines made it to the thin cover of trees off to the side of the paddies. "There were human waves of NVA coming at us," Bennett said. "It looked like they had us completely surrounded." Two Marines with him were blinded by white phosphorous, but there wasn't much he could do for them. The tanks had just pulled back into the tree line when the flame tank commander shouted to Drnec, "For Christ's sake, they're all around me!" Drnec barked back, "Are you sure they're not Marines?" "No sir," the tanker responded, "they are definitely goners, can I zap them with the flame?"

Drnec knew there were Marines still out there—what a dilemma—"No, spray them with your .50"—it was a tough call. He glanced through the vision slits in the cupola and his heart stopped. An enemy RPG team stood up, less than 25 meters away and took aim. Drnec hit the trigger of the 90mm main gun and blew the NVA away.

India gradually formed a perimeter—more or less—as many Marines were still in the brush fighting for their lives. "We didn't really form a perimeter per se," Stimson said. "Our position had an amorphous shape...my main concern at the time was not its shape, but its strength." Wounded men who could hold a rifle were put in the line—and others who kept drifting in filled still more gaps. Somehow a badly wounded Russ Armstrong made his way back to the perimeter and took over a radio to call in artillery support. The company forward observer had been killed earlier when an ammunition can exploded.

Stimson saw a Navy Corpsman get shot in the throat—then wrap a battle dressing around the wound and carry on. "It was one of the most incredible things I have ever seen," he said. Drnec tank was hit and disabled by an RPG round that took out the transmission. The situation was desperate; the Marines were running out of ammunition, weapons were jamming and the NVA were in the next rice paddy—some as close as 10 to 15 meters away. Stimson could see the enemy's faces. He ordered his men to fix bayonets!

Heavy .51-caliber machine gun fire now raked the Marine lines, pinning them down. The thumb-sized slugs tore up the ground and anything else they hit. Bennett saw the results at first hand. He recalled, "Lance Corporal Robert Pugh hollered, 'Ben, Ben, I'm hit.' I crawled over and saw that he was hit in the back, down low, near the spine, a big hole just below his flak jacket." Stimson radioed the AO and begged him to hit the machine gun position. "The first F-4 made its run along an east-west axis and dropped all its bombs on an NVA company." The second F-4 worked on the .51s, knocking out at least one and causing the remainder to stop firing.

Drnec and his crew abandoned the gun tank, after disabling its main gun and machine gun. They stuffed themselves into one of the other gun tanks and made their way into India's position, adding valuable firepower to the defenders. According to Stimson, "We were no longer vulnerable; we had good tactical integrity, we had the tanks, the air, and the indirect artillery fire. And we had taken a heavy toll on the NVA. The time for them to turn it on full bore had been at the beginning. That was when they could have gotten us...but they missed the opportunity."

While India Company fought for its life, 500 meters away the battalion's two other companies faced a similar fate.

Fight for Life

A slight breeze carried the faint crackle of small arms fire and the heavy booms of exploding artillery to the Marines manning the battalion perimeter. Word soon filtered down through the ranks that India Company was in deep trouble. The "word" was soon reinforced when a tired and spooked Kilo Company returned from its failed mission to bring back India's survivors. Even the most skeptical defender was soon scooping an extra shovel full of dirt from his foxhole. The atmosphere was tense, this was truly bad-guy country—a free-fire zone where anyone not wearing Marine green was shot—no questions, no warning.

Staff Sergeant Charles Owens, Kilo Company gunnery sergeant, stood near his foxhole winding down from the harrowing rescue mission. "I had one arm in my flak jacket and I had my helmet in my left hand...when I saw the flash of a rocket as it went off. The last thought going through my mind was, 'Oh no, not in the stomach!" He woke up minutes later with his flak jacket on and his helmet buckled. He couldn't figure out how it happened. India Company platoon commander, Lieutenant Bill

Cowan thought it was out-going from Con Thien until, "All of a sudden I heard shwew—the sound of incoming—and a tremendous explosion behind me, about 50 meters." Men dove or simply fell into any depression that offered protection. Most just curled up, hands clutching the sides of their helmet trying to pull it down to their ankles! Within 30 minutes an estimated 60 140mm rockets and 70 82mm mortar round hit the perimeter, killing three Marines and wounding 25. While this heavy enemy bombardment pounded the perimeter, NVA infantry crept to within 10 meters of the font line foxholes.

Staff Sergeant Dave Nugent was in the 81mm mortar position when, "The NVA started opening up on us," he said. "Gunner Holycross yelled, 'I think they're up in the trees." A sergeant charged the NVA with his .45 caliber pistol. A slug from an AK -47 cut him down. An ammunition carrier was hit in the leg and. Nugent was attempting to stop the bleeding. "Before I was done, I saw this Chicom grenade coming. It blew up just before I could get my hand on it. The grenade destroyed my left hand and tore up the upper left side of my head. The NVA got inside the perimeter and shot several mortarmen in their holes. Enraged, Holycross charged the assailants—shooting them in the head at point blank range. Debona rushed over. "There were quite a few wounded Marines there," he recalled, "inside a little bomb crater. I also saw a lot of bullets coming from a tree line approximately 60 meters away." Debona scraped together a reaction force and sent them after the NVA. Ten minutes late the posse proudly reported, "We got them all, sir."

The battalion command post was under direct attack. Tom Early recounted, "Everybody in the CP who didn't have to have a [radio] handset in his hand and a radio stuck in his ear was given a weapon and put on the line around the CP area. Once the enemy attacked and penetrated into the trees, we had a tremendous problem of identification and trying to get any type of clear field of fire." It was worth a man's life to leave his foxhole. The enemy fire didn't stop the indomitable DeBona. "Mike Six," roamed the perimeter, "kicking ass and taking names," in Marine jargon for aggressive leadership. He led a charmed life until, "On the way to the battalion CP," DeBona recalled, "my invincibility was shattered. The bad guys threw one round...and I felt some warm stuff on my leg!" More bad news followed. "I received a report that Mike-3 Actual—Lieutenant John Manzi—was KIA." It was a personal loss for DeBona. "He [Manzi] was about to make first lieutenant, and it was my intention to transfer him over to the battalion S-3 section."

Lieutenant Zappardino tried to get air support but, "We couldn't get air because of the weather. The sky was overcast and it was getting dark." Early worked the artillery nets, "...but there was a lot going on throughout the area that night. Con Thien and Gio Linh were being shelled." Zappardino pitched in, relaying firing data over the radio nets. "We had support from every gun at every fire base that could reach us." Marine artillery from Dong Ha, C-2 and Camp Carroll opened up, putting a ring of steel around the two perimeters. Even the U.S. Army pitched in with its 175mm guns, adding to the weight of metal from 105mm howitzers and 8-inch self-propelled guns.

Lieutenant Cowan's best squad leader was killed while cleaning a jammed M-16—a common occurrence that cost more than one Marine his life. It was the young officer's first time under heavy fire. "Until Sergeant Krage was shot, I had been too busy or maybe too inexperienced to be scared. After that, I was more aware of the danger." Lieutenant Crangle had a similar experience. "...A young Marine came up to me to ask for a cleaning rod. He sounded a little groggy, and I asked him if he was all right. 'Yes,' he answered, but then I looked at his helmet and saw a bullet entry hole just about where the top of his head should have been. I held my breath while I took off his helmet, fully expecting his brains to fall out! The kid had a permanent part where the bullet had just creased his skull, one more inch and good night." Crangle ordered the man to the landing zone, which had turned into an aid station.

Casualties were jammed into an area between the battalion CP and the 81mm mortar position. The site was a frenzy of activity as Navy corpsmen desperately struggled to treat the wounded in the darkness. Many of the wounded were classified as "emergency medevacs—one of three categories and the most serious, "in danger of losing life or limb." The Corpsmen rigged ponchos so they could use flashlights—an exposed light could mean instant death. Battalion put the call out for an emergency medevac—men would die without hospital care. A gutsy Marine helicopter crew responded. Zappardino talked them down through the heavy fire. The most seriously wounded were quickly loaded aboard. The pilot got a "thumbs up" and the bird leaped into the darkness, escaping without a scratch.

The wounded were flown to Dong Ha, a 15-minute flight, for initial treatment and stabilization at "Delta-Med," a Navy Medical Collection and Clearing Company. Stretcher bearers rushed the wounded into triage, where they were quickly evaluated for priority of treatment and scheduled for emergency surgery. Within minutes many of them were under the knife. As soon as they were stabilized—hours or days—they continued along the evacuation chain. Sergeant Nugent was flown to the USS Repose (Ah-16), a Navy hospital ship off the coast. "My facial wounds were minor," Nugent recalled, "and quickly healed, but I lost the use of my left hand." Others were flown directly to the United States for hospitalization close to their homes.

The irrepressible aviator, Zappardino, established contact with "Puff the Magic Dragon," a C-130 aircraft armed with a gatling gun that fired 6,000 .50 caliber rounds a minute. When it fired, the red stream of tracers looked like a water hose, and the battlefield quickly settled down. Lance Corporal Ron Burke remembered, "Every once in a while someone would think he saw something out there. We'd lay down a little fire and wouldn't have any problems for a while. I never slept a wink that night. I just wasn't about to go asleep. I could sleep some other time." Tom Early heard noises. "The NVA dragged away their dead with meat hooks that had ropes attached. We could hear the noise of the hook going into the body and the body hitting other objects as it was being dragged."

At first light, the men witnessed the grim results of the fighting. Zappardino saw, "dead people all over the ground. Everyone was stunned." Lance Corporal Bennett was given the grisly task of retrieving the dead. "I didn't want to do it," he said. "We were tired and it was very hot. Some of the guys were already decomposing. They smelled terrible and some were blown all to hell." Andy DeBona had his men sweep through the tree line that had caused so much trouble. "...Mike 2 found a total of seven bad guys and a live one who was shot through the ankle. The POW was a young kid who just scared to death. He was crying and sniveling and, I guess, begging for mercy." The prisoner was treated and evacuated—the only one taken during the battle.

India Company also survived the night and in the morning Kilo Company helped bring them back to the battalion perimeter. Sergeant Owens described the scene. "The India dead and wounded were all spread out—a little patch of people here and a little patch of people there, killed and wounded."

The Battalion Commander called a meeting of his surviving commanders and staff. He started to give them new orders when a tank engine interrupted him. The group turned and watch pensively as the battle-scared armored vehicle ground slowly past. Its rear deck was piled high with dead Marines. As the noise faded, the commander finished the brief—"continue the mission." Two days later the battalion, now reinforced with Lima Company, fought another pitched battle.

Dick Camp is a retired Marine Corps colonel and the author of Lima-6, his memoir as a Marine infantry company commander at Khe Sanh. He has written several combat histories of the US Marines, including The Devil Dogs at Belleau Wood, Battleship Arizona's Marines at War, Iwo Jima Recon, and Last Man Standing: The 1st Marine Regiment on Peleliu. He is also the author of Leatherneck Legends: Conversations with the Marine Corps' Old Breed and has published over sixty articles in various military-oriented magazines, including Vietnam, World War II, Marine Corps Gazette, and Leatherneck.

In February 2015, Belleville Township Council approved a resolution to dedicate High Street in honor of former Belleville resident Donald Baron Saunders, who was killed in action on March 4, 1968, while serving with the U.S. Marines in the Vietnam War. Council members Kevin Kennedy and Vincent Cozzarelli are here today. Thank you for undertaking this effort to honor all 159 Belleville sons

We need to remember the sacrifice Donald Saunders' family made. It surfaces in the Belleville Times article on March 14, 1968, at the report of his death.

Pfc. Saunders leaves besides his parents William and Maisie, a brother Kenneth, 16 at the time, and a sister, Kathleen, both at home, 27-29 High Street. [In summary]

"Since he had to leave this world, I'm glad he left it the way he did, with courage and fighting for his country." There was little else for William D. Saunders of 20 High Street, Belleville, to say.

The young Saunders, only 20, died of wounds on his head and body from an enemy mortar fire in Quang Tri. Saunders was killed while defending the Marine Corps combat base of Khe Sanh.

Saunders enlisted in the Marines two years earlier on his father's birthday.

A member of the First Battalion of the 13th Marines, Pfc. Saunders attended Belleville High School.

He was also a member of Little Zion U AME Church in Belleville. Donald completed his basic training at Parris Island, S.C., and advanced infantry training at Camp Lejeune, N.C. He volunteered for duty in Vietnam.

His mother, Mrs. Maisie Saunders, said, "Donald was never too talkative. He made his own decisions. I think he felt the boys were doing a good job and he should back them up."

"It was just a job that had to be done, for him," added Saunders, and he never complained. In all his letters there was never a word of complaint. He tried to reassure us, in fact."

Mrs. Saunders said Donald did mention in one letter that he did not know whether it was the last letter or not and that they were surrounded by the enemy.

She told the Times that the difficulties of the people of Vietnam particularly affected him. He wrote home about the villagers who had to scramble for food and were so starved that they were eating garbage.

About two weeks before he was killed, Donald managed to telephone home -- at 3 a.m. -- to talk to his parents. Mrs. Saunders said: "We were surprised and so happy to hear his voice. The first thing he said was 'don't talk about anything military, Mom.' There was so much confusion because of the relay through Hawaii that we could not say very much. I said something and then had to wait for it to be relayed. He did say though, 'What's happening, Mom' which was his favorite expression. It was so good to hear that. I only wish we could have talked much longer, it was over so quickly, so very quickly."

Mrs. Saunders told the Times her son never said much about military conditions in South Vietnam. Mrs. Saunders said, "He sometimes wrote that he gave candy and food to the Vietnamese children. The only thing he really asked for was undershirts. It seems that you could not purchase them over there because of the climate."

His dad told the Times, "When he enlisted, we hoped for the best, we did not want anything to happen. But we knew he was on a machine gun and the first thought of any enemy is to knock out machine gun out. At least he wasn't like those doves or slobs, who try to find any excuse to get out of going. That's the one thing I remember, he never, even after he was in combat, said he was sorry or complained."

Thanks to Mike Lamberti in The Belleville Times, who wrote on the 45th anniversary of Saunders's death. The mini biography under Donald Saunders' photo in his Belleville High School yearbook read:

Donald plans to become president. Watching television occupies much of his time. He admires Peter Snell, Olympic gold medal winner.

Lamberti wrote: A short but concise description of a Belleville original who was a fantastic athlete. A 1967 graduate of Belleville High, Donald would go on to join the Marine Corps after graduation. Less than a year later, he lost his life in Vietnam, on March 4, 1968. He had turned 20 years old a little over two weeks earlier....

Saunders was remembered by friends on the 45th anniversary as a humble young man who had a smile as wide as his athletic talents. He also held one of the most prestigious athletic records at Belleville High.

Donald broke the school record in the half mile in '67 with a time of 2:00.08. His record stood for 11 years. In addition to being a tremendous track runner, Saunders was also on the 1965 Belleville cross country team, which won the Big 10 championship

Donald Saunders is not forgotten by the men he served with.

Craig W. Tourte, a veteran of Khe Sanh Veterans writes:

Anthony - I hope all is well...I just wanted you to know that March 4th is the date Donald B. Saunders was Killed In Action while defending the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh in what was then the country of South Vietnam.

I thought it important that you know I continue to mourn his loss and remember what a fine brave Marine his was.

We who survived that horrific siege are all some of them have left who remember their sacrifice.

Tourte continues in another letter:

The mention of Quang Tri as the site of his death is like naming a county or state, as Quang Tri is both a city and providence.

More important is that Donald was killed during the horrific and deadly 77 day Siege of the United State Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh -- while he was assisting other Marines in fortifying their bunkers from an incoming attack of artillery, rockets and mortar fire.

I just wanted to make that fact clear as it personalizes his death a little more. I knew Donald at Khe Sanh and talked to him just before he was killed.
One little additional point I wanted to make, and that was that Donald did this while unselfishly exposing himself to the intense incoming fire of the enemy - a fact one does not always hear from the government.

Craig Tourte wanted to be here today but he lives in California. He would also like to correspond with Saunders' family members.

KHE SANH VETERANS, INC. SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION

GOVERNING RULES FOR OPERATIONS OF THE KHE SANH VETERANS, INC. SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION:

1. The purpose of the Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. Scholarship Foundation (KSVSF) is to provide financial aid to high school graduates who plan to attend an accredited institution as a full time student OR who are currently enrolled full time in an accredited post-secondary curriculum.
2. Scholarships will be awarded to applicant students who have at least one parent, legal guardian, or grandparent who is a paid member in good standing of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., a 501(c)(19) charitable organization.
3. IT IS THE RESPONSIBILITY OF THE STUDENT TO SEE THAT THE SCHOLARSHIP APPLICATION REQUIREMENTS ARE FULLY COMPLETED AND SENT DIRECTLY TO THE SCHOLARSHIP CHAIR BEFORE 5/1/2016 AT THE ADDRESS BELOW;

Mr. Dan Fisher
KSVSF Committee Chairman
6050 52nd St. North
Oakdale, -1MN 55128317

CRITERIA FOR SELECTION

Applicants must be the legal child or grandchild of a paid up member of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. (See member definition in the KSV Association bylaws.) This includes deceased, life members of KSV and those Khe Sanh Veterans listed as KIA/MIA in Vietnam if family members are paid up, associate members of KSV, Inc. Children or grandchildren of KSV associate members are not eligible.
Information provided by each candidate on the attached application forms will focus on the following qualities considered for selection to KSVSF financial aid: good grades, character, citizenship, leadership experience and personal essay. A point selection system is included in the application forms.
Examples of these above mentioned qualities could be in the classroom, in extracurricular activities or in service to the community, church or nation.
A Scholarship Foundation Review Committee will serve the President of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., and will accept, review and grade each correctly completed application. This committee will provide a scholarship financial report and short summaries of the selected candidates at the annual KSV reunion for publication in the "Red Clay" Newsletter.

SCHOLARSHIP AWARDS

The amount of financial award per applicant will be determined by the Review Committee's scoring results. The awards will be granted for a maximum of 4 years per student. A new application will be required for each continuous year applied.

Achievement Award Levels are:

The Col. David E. Lownds Award – for top achievement in Application Review (one award or tie)
The Sgt. Major James T. Gaynor Award – for high achievement in Application Review (5 awards)
The Col. William H. Dabney Award – for honorable achievement in Application Review (6 awards)

2.. The KSV Scholarship money will be awarded upon presentation of proof of registration for the appropriate term. Proof of registration should be sent to the chairman's address on page one of this application.

Scholarship Guidelines and Purpose

1. The financial award is to be used to help defray costs of tuition, fees and books at an accredited institution of the applicant's choice as a full time student.
2. If a recipient of the KSVSF scholarship does not enter a post high school institution during the next school year, the award for his/her benefit shall be cancelled and the money awarded to an alternate applicant. An alternate of each scholarship award is to be chosen at the time of selection of recipients.
3. The KSVSF Committee Chair and the Treasurer of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., will send a check for the full years' award amount to the selected students upon final approval by the KSV President.
4. The recipient of a scholarship shall be notified no later than the end of the month of August of the coming school year.
5. Scholarship Applications must be received by the Committee Chair on or before MAY 1 of the school year applied for.  (This is an important, NEW change to previous years)**
6. KSV, Inc. Scholarship recipients must agree to maintain a standard of personal performance both in and out of school that conforms to the moral standards set down by Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., members.

7. Criteria: Point Selection System /Maximum of 100 regular points or 115 with bonus points

a. Scholastic achievement / grade point average. Max = 40 points max. (Please attach last school GPA transcript) example below:

TWO WEEKS OF 'CALM' AT KHE SANH

LTCOL C.G. GERARD USMC, RET

There is an old axiom in Marine aviation: Never go on leave or miss a meeting because in your absence you can be sure you will become heir to a task solely because you were not there to protect yourself. I judge that is what occurred during my two weeks TAD away to_Texas in December 1967.VMO-6 C/O Lieutenant Colonel White listened to my after-action report until it was his turn to speak. He let me know that VMO-6 was taking over a commitment for a detachment of two UH-1Es and flight crews for two week stints at the Khe Sanh combat base. VMO-3 previously carried that commitment, but now that we established at Quang Tri nearer the DMZ, it became our inherent responsibility. I was to take the first two-week detachment, to begin January 1, 1968.

The Khe Sanh combat base was the scene of a major battle in 1966, which fought on rather conventional terms until the NVA withdrew. Since then the base was relatively quiet, although it certainly stuck out to the northwest constantly inviting action from the North Vietnamese. I had the one previous visit in September 1967 when Ed Kufeldt led me on a flight of two planes up there from Ky Ha to support local re-supply transport helicopters for a day. I had only a vague idea of the layout of the base, the outlying facilities or the threat. I certainly recall the vast beauty of the area. The first two weeks of 1968 gave ample time to learn the workings of Khe Sanh.

On the afternoon of New Years Eve, 1967, our cadre flew to the northwest comer of I Corps to take over the helicopter support for Khe Sanh. Old friend Joe Sales had the previous VMO-3 detachment, and took us on a quick orientation of the ground facilities before making a hasty retreat back to Hue Phu Bai.

Colonel David E. Lownds was the commander of the 26th Marine Regiment and its supporting activities. As the senior Marine, he was also the base commander. His headquarters was in the "Old French Fort," a structure built by the French in a pentagon configuration of thick brick walls buried two-thirds below the surrounding ground level. The single entrance gave an initial impression of crossing a moat before lowering your head to transit the low overhang. Inside all was dim except for an occasional light bulb dangling on a single wire from the cantilevered brick ceiling. The Colonel operated from an aluminum frame lawn chair in front of a hardwood kitchen table. A yellow note pad, communication radios and a wall of combat maps were the only obvious adornments. I was introduced briefly to the Colonel before working through his intelligence officer, Major Jerry Hudson, or an air liaison officer, one of several Lieutenant Aviators who rotated through the daily watch routine. VMO-6's own Lieutenant Rich Donaghy became the 26th Marine ALO in mid-January.

The base was bare bones functional. A 3000-foot east-west Marston-mat runway had a distinct uphill grade toward hills to the west, and a precipitous drop off the eastern end. With few exceptions, fixed-wing aircraft landed to the west and took off to the east. A turnaround taxiway at the southwest end provided room for on- and off-loading transports. Charlie Med hospital was within fifty feet of the turnaround, located to provide quick medical loading to aircraft. To the northwest, opposite the runway and turnaround were six corrugated steel revetments designed to protect parked helicopters from fragmentation and debris during any attack. We contentiously parked our two UH-1Es in the revetments at night, during our two quiet weeks at Khe Sanh, and the provision worked fine. Two CH-46 helicopters normally also used two revetments.

Every conceivable military function was available at Khe Sanh, from infantry, to airfield support, to logistics, to artillery, to housekeeping was in place. In addition, the base was encircled with triple-roll concertina wire with trench lines and strategic gun emplacements within that. Khe Sanh was red clay underfoot and everything soon carried its crimson imprint. Initially we were there in the dry season, but soon it was the wet season and all turned to gumbo.

A wood frame building housed the mess hall, post office and basic PX. All was calm enough that movies were shown there immediately after the evening meal hour. Our conventional wood frame and plywood Southeast Asia hooch was more than adequate with metal frame racks and mattresses. Our eight-man detachment of four pilots and four crewmembers fit comfortably. Nights were cool, so we slept under poncho liners. A sandbagged bunker for protection behind the building was a constant reminder that hostile fire was ever possible, even probable.

The base was reliant, unquestionably, on air support. The main Highway-9, from the east through a mountain grade, was cut long ago, and the support roads to outlying defensive positions in the hills around were suitable for foot traffic only -- no vehicles. Highway-9, as it passed the base and headed for Laos, twenty-miles west, was kept open only with dedicated effort. Two to four CH-46s made daily supply runs to the outlying defender positions. Much of our UH-IE flying was escorting the 46s as gun support. For the most part those flights went unmolested during the quiet days of early January.

The immediate countryside was beautiful in its native state. All was green and a substantial river ran from northwest to southeast cutting the northeast comer of the defensive perimeter. That ravine housed a pump station as the only potable water-point supplying the base. It remained intact during the full duration of the three-month siege of the base. In that deep canyon, it seemed to beg someone to fly fish. The beauty was deceptive for the apparent low green was mostly six-to-eight foot high saw grass that would cut-to-ribbons anyone who attempted to pass through. Several months earlier, a VMO-6 UH-IE was down at night about one mile north of the base. The immediate search for the helicopter and crew was not productive. At first light, they were located and successfully lifted out only after standing on top of the aircraft. The UH-IE was almost out of sight, buried in the tall grass.

For two weeks, we flew the deceptively "friendly skies" around Khe Sanh. In addition to the gunship escort for the CH-46, helicopters providing daily supply to the surrounding hill outposts we delved into reconnaissance. Daily we flew intelligence gathering flights into varying quadrants, with vague guidance as to what we should be seeking, although questioned in detail during after-flight debriefings as to what we actually noted. We were in fact, but a small input to the greater intelligence gathering effort, for what was developing around Khe Sanh. The enemy was out there and only the number and intent were undetermined. Our wanderings did in fact uncover extraordinary sightings, but we were never allowed to act upon them -- just report.

Initially to the west, along the single-track dirt road, misleadingly labeled a "Highway" was the lush green coffee plantation of Madame Poilane. Next was the village of Lang Vei, just prior to the Army Special Forces compound of the same name. Just beyond the boarder with Laos stood imposing vertical face of Cu Rock Mountain. Pocketed within its face we saw numerous caves -- some camouflaged, but enough exposed that we could see barrels of artillery pieces unquestionably pointed at Khe Sanh proper, twenty miles to the east. We could see the weapons, but no personnel -- they apparently stayed alert and remained out of sight.

On another day, south of Lang Vei beyond a long low-running ridge we stumbled on a large grass meadow, which revealed tire tracks from vehicles activity. More surprising, browsing under broad limbed trees were four dusty elephants painted with identifying colored numerals on their sides. We knew this was a significant find and immediately reported to the Khe Sanh command post. I requested clearance to take some offensive action on the elephants, but that was denied. Again, we sighted no personnel.

VMO-6 was the custodian to an equipment item, dubbed "people sniffer," which mounted a wand under a UH-IE for gathering air samples and a sensing unit in the cabin for processing. When flown at low altitude and slow airspeed over the landscape it had the capability of "sniffing" and chemically testing the air for human urine. Supposedly, it classified monkey urine the same as human urine, but no other species could confound the equipment. The sniffer was highly classified and only a couple of the squadron pilots were trained on the operation to obtain maximum reliable readings. One afternoon Lieutenant Colonel White came to Khe Sanh to spend a full afternoon to sniff the valleys and hills around the base that our searching had identified as possibly "hot." I flew about a thousand feet above his low-level flight path with a map on which we placed an X over every point he called off as giving a significant reading. We gave our data to Major Hudson to incorporate into the intelligence picture his agents were developing. The sniffer report revealed that there was a huge human urine trace throughout the area --either people or there were an equally significant number of monkeys. The bottom line supported the fact that a probable hostile build-up was growing around Khe Sanh.

My flight crews became intimately familiar with all the outposts surrounding the base: the "hills," to the west were 881S, 881N, 558 and 861, while east was 950 -- each referenced the elevation in meters on a contour map of the area. Each soon became historically significant when the true battle of Khe Sanh developed.

By January 14, our group completed the two-week obligation and we left the base as relatively quiet as we had inherited it the first of the year. Major Dave Workman and company relieved us and it was back to Quang Tri to pick up the more conventional missions the squadron flew.

One week later, on the night of January 22, Workman's group awakened, along with everyone else, to the initial attack on the base -- the siege of Khe Sanh began. Over the next three months, I was to return to Khe Sanh repeatedly -- as an out-and-in, overnight or escorting other evolutions.

THREE MONTHS OF 'NO CALM' AT KHE SANH

Reflecting back on the siege of Khe Sanh and participation in it, just like most of the Vietnam experience, it is better to judge from afar. Daily activity moved so quickly that there was, during the moment, little opportunity to keep things in perspective. From almost fifty years for consideration, the action and the impact is much easier to evaluate. Read elsewhere for the story of, and history of, the "Battle of Khe Sanh." Here is solely my participation.

The dawn of January 22, 1968, at Khe Sanh, found what the North intended to be the destruction of the combat base and a drive to remove the Marines from the outpost. The ordnance storage facility was hit the first night and exploded with a force that leveled many of the above ground structures and rained debris throughout the base. That day was bedlam for the defenders. For the defenders on the hill positions, artillery fire and frontal attack was almost successful. The 1st MAW put much of its assets in the air, and artillery that could reach the area was also put into action.

By late morning, I went from Quang Tri along with a brand new copilot, First Lieutenant J. B. Turner, who was literally receiving his "baptism of fire" on the trip. We landed near the revetments where I had the crew stay with the aircraft while I would hustle down to the command post in the old fort to talk to Rich Donaghy for a briefing on what we could do to support. When I was within about 50 yards of Charlie Med, an artillery round impacted probably 10-yards from me. The concussion knocked me off my feet and I went tumbling into a ditch. I was dully shaken and dirty, but trudged the remaining quarter-mile to the CP. Rich had more than he could keep up with in the bedlam of the moment, but gave me a frequency and an area to support to the southwest of the base, near the Lang Vei Special Forces camp and he would feed fixed wing flights to me to control. That is what we did for six hours that afternoon, control jets on targets of opportunity, landing only to refuel and rearm. We stayed in contact with the voice on a radio in Lang Vei Special Forces compound, who contributed with recommended targets.

Within a few days, the battle settled into sparing and responding. That is much the pattern for us that followed for weeks, and into the three months of the siege. Some days we flew out of Quang Tri, some nights we slept at Khe Sanh in the concrete underground bunker the Air Force was in the process of building when action began. The Air Force never got around to using it, but we found it gratifyingly secure. Nights there were fairly serene, listening only for the course of battle and the Khe Sanh rats that shared the space with us -- they nibble, but never bit.

Eventually we ceased leaving helicopters in the revetments overnight, because it appeared they were a magnet for NVA artillery. The message seemed to be, "Destroy the helicopters." The revetments were soon damaged to the point of being useless and several aircraft hulks littered the area, so few adequate parking spots remained. However, during the night helicopter support was much on-call and the response had to come from Quang Tri, meaning a demanding night flight. The air traffic control unit's never ceased operation -- the tower controllers went from above to below ground. The GCA radars went underground too with an open scan pointed east, so helos could be guided in during minimal weather, day and night. In addition, weather was a huge factor during the winter season -- fog sometimes persisted throughout the day. Some daring CH-46 pilots on occasion approached the high ground and gradually crept up the slopes to some of the outlying hill outposts for the worst of the emergency evacuations.

Otherwise, it was a ground battle -- the NVA used bad weather and night to attempt to infiltrate the vulnerable defensive lines. One night an NVA sapper team did penetrate until eventually chased down individually before doing any real damage. From that group an officer was killed and initially suspected, because of his circumcision -- a rarity among Vietnamese males -- not to be Vietnamese. Eventually, it was confirmed he was a Chinese captain. The indication of Chinese participation was significant.

Daily, weather permitting, Marine fixed-wing dropped heavy ordnance around the base, sometimes within several hundred feet of the fence line. There were several incidents when an aircraft was damaged enough to merit pilot ejection. One F-4 pilot landed literally in the defensive wire, and another, farther away, was quickly snatched up by helicopter. The air force began B-52 bomb saturations, referred to as "arc-light" drops, throughout the area. Those came day or night and their rumble left an extremely satisfying impression on the friendlies, wherever they were. The B-52 drops took the better part of a minute for their 750-pound drops to reach the ground. I suspect that too, they were terrifying and destructively effective to the NVA army. Soon the green, green hills around Khe Sanh were a "moonscape." The Marine A-6s, carrying a lesser load also dropped what we learned to recognize as the "minnie arc-lights." They produced the same satisfaction to those on the ground that their "big-brothers" generated.

Supply of Khe Sanh was primarily Air Force C-130s, but their needed offload time began to also draw heavy artillery and mortar fire. One Marine C-130, carrying bladders of aviation fuel, piloted by Chief Warrant Officer Henry Wildfang, was hit by enemy fire while on rollout and was destroyed by fire -- several were killed in the incident although the two pilots survived. (Wildfang is one of the last Naval Aviation Pilot -- not a commissioned aviation officer -- and his actions during the loss merited his fifth DFC.) Air Force delivery began to use parachute-borne cargo containers released over the rear ramp from about 500 feet altitude. A single pass could deliver several thousand pounds of supplies. A few loads inadvertently ended up far to the west where they may have actually supplied the NV A. Another low-altitude parachute extraction system delivered loads from a very low altitude where once out of the aircraft they slid to a halt -- those tended to carom arbitrarily, or worse, do major damage to the runway surface.

That was, after three months, the territory the North finally chose to withdraw from.

My flying was there almost daily. After the battle MAG-39 identified, from the four helicopter squadrons supporting the siege the individual pilots with the most hours at Khe Sanh. I was the VMO-6 "top dog."

SEVERAL INDIVIDUAL KHE SANH INCIDENTS MERIT MENTIONING:

An indigenous troupe living in the hills of the Vietnam-Laos boarder were disrupted and displaced as a direct result of the fighting. Referred to as a Montagnard tribe of "Bru) and significantly slight of build -- generally less than five feet. The developing conflict drove them in mass to the east to avoid the fighting. They came down Highway-9 to the gate of the combat base. There they came to the realization the Marines were not going to take them within the combat base where feeding, protection and providing shelter were beyond possible.

A small number of the thousand we escorted to Air Force C-130s for transportation out. The majority were to fend for themselves, although some foodstuff was made available from the Marines' limited supply. They took up camping as close to the Marine wire as practicable. Many dug underground holes to subsist in, popping up like chipmunks when the heat from battle allowed. In some cases, they were so close to the perimeter that they could converse with defenders across the defensive line.

There they existed until the battle termination and they either exited further to the east or returned to their home location.

One foggy morning when we could not fly, I found three young Marines positioned as snipers on top of the bunker where we slept. One manned the sniper rifle with scope, one worked binoculars to give recommendations and results to the shooter and one kept a small notebook recording their every action. Their vision was south across a level plane, which eventually rose to higher ground concealed by the low clouds. Highway-9 crossed a quarter-mile away and the Brew "chipmunk holes" that abutted the base. The snipers had an NVA patrol pinned down beyond, and were picking them off one-by-one. During the forty-five minutes I observed they took credit for three kills. Quite an insightful experience for me. Next, noted photographer David Douglas Duncan came on the scene and quietly began some candid snaps. He was at Khe Sanh for several days and I had seen him in other shoots as he toured. Years later, I found his book War Without Heroes, which documents in photos far more than I can convey here in words. It covers Khe Sanh and other Marine outposts throughout our area of operation in early 1968.

February 8 proved to be a dramatic day-long ordeal. The night before the base was alerted to something big in the making. We were advised to check our gas masks and to carry them. The base took hundreds of artillery and mortar rounds throughout the night. My crew was sleeping at Khe Sanh that night. The command center wanted our UH-1Es in the air at first light for reconnaissance, but it was one of the "locked-in-tight" fog hardened mornings. We finally were in the air by about ten hundred hours and directed to the Lang Vei Special Forces camp, which was under heavy pressure. When I checked-in with their radio the report was, "We hear tanks coming down Highway-9 from the Laotian boarder."

Flying west in lousy visibility I confirmed the tank movement. We fired some rockets, but did nothing to slow the steady advance. Before our time-on-station was down to where we had to return to Khe Sanh for refuel-rearm, at least one tank was "in the wire" at Lang Vei and their situation was critical. Meanwhile other participants were into the air war and we became simply contributors with our on-board weapons and trying to get some fixed-wing on target. The weather continued to be terrible. Eventually all seven tanks were stopped, but Lang Vei was overrun. Survivors were evacuated by various means and in the afternoon the battle pretty much wound-down. Late in the afternoon Captain Ed Kufeldt's flight of two picked up a call that there was still one American in the Lang Vei perimeter, and no other aircraft were in position to attempt assistance. Therefore, Ed and his crew, including co-pilot First Lieutenant George Rosenthal made a run-for-it, to help. They encountered immediate NVA close-in fire and were badly damaged. George was wounded three times and Ed barely nursed the DH-1E back to Khe Sanh. It had been a well or castrated trap set in motion by some well-spoken English speaking instigator. Seven tanks, and one probable, of nine confirmed were eventually destroyed. Fourteen of twenty-four Special Forces troops survived, with only one not wounded. Three were captured, but later repatriated. The indigenous Special Forces support troops losses were also substantial. Lang Vei fell, while Khe Sanh continued to fight on for another six weeks. The tanks were Soviet-built PT-76s.

I mention one heroic deeded simply because it almost went unnoticed. Corporal Ernesto Gomez was the crew chief on a HMM-262 CH-46 during an emergency medical evacuation on Hill 881, January 25. From the after action citation (recommended for Medal of Honor, gut awarded the Navy Cross) reads, "Two Marines on the ground began to lead a casualty to the helo. The wounded service member's head and eyes were both covered with bandages. At the moment the zone came under intense enemy fire the two Marines dropped to the ground. Meanwhile the blindfolded casualty continued, unassisted, toward the helicopter. Gomez unhesitatingly left the helicopter and rushed across 25 meters of fire-swept terrain to the side of the injured man. Quickly pulling the Marine to the ground, he selflessly used his own body to shield his comrade from the hostile fire impacting around them." Another Marine joined them and together carried the injured Marine to the helicopter. That event almost went unnoted, except a photojournalist recorded it and soon it was published by national press. Copies were sent via personal mail to several members of the HMM-262 squadron and eventually action was taken within the squadron to get the award recommendation forwarded.

Ernesto Gomez went on to serve three tours in CH-46s in Vietnam. Twenty-six years later he was diagnosed with post-traumatic stress disorder PTSD, and entered eight months of therapy. He died unexpectedly October 10,2007. In comparison, only one aircrew member, PFC Raymond Clausen of HMM-263 , received the Medal of Honor in Vietnam. His action on January 31, 1970, involved entering a known minefield to make repeated trips carrying injured Marines to his CH-46 rescue helicopter.

USO shows circulate freely throughout I Corps, although th~ her from Da Nang, the less apt one is to attend one. Several good venues did make it to Quang Tri, but always an afternoon performance, gone by sunset. With one exception -- a country and western group was stuck with us for the night when their transportation cancelled due to weather. Members dispersed across the camp to where a free bunk was available. The one female singer got the Colonel's Quonset, the only quarters with indoor plumbing. My group housed the male singer - guitar player and the comedian, Elmer Fud Pucker -- "Have to be careful how you say that son," he'd quip We did have an entertaining evening. The crowning event was generated by the Lutheran chaplain who shared our hooch -- for he was a darned good hypnotist. The Chaplain put his spell on Elmer, who was counseled while "under" that when awaken he would not immediately be able to bend his elbows, and he would have to urinate. Sure enough, when snapped alert he announced he needed the urinal and trotted of to the outside vertically buried rocket tube, which served that purpose. We could hear .his swearing when confronted with stiff arms and the need to relieve himself. He returned wet, as predictable.

That chaplain was a very non-conventional practitioner. During his Sunday services, he gave his eulogy while walking the . isles of the small hooch converted to a chapel very disconcerting to many who did 't cater to the idea of someone they could not see preaching from somewhere behind them. He also was very effective with disgruntled enlisted people sent by various commanders for counseling, "go see the chaplain" about perceived issues. He would place the Marine in a comfortable overstuffed leather chair he had acquired and so ,through fatherly talk, have the individual hypnotized and revealing facts from his psyche he would not have considered revealing during conventional questioning. Often more than one session was necessary to get to any real revelations, and usually, the issue was relatively minor -- a change of work supervisor, or a short three-day R& to Da Nang's in country China Beach recreation center. One particularly hard-n case led to unprecedented revelations when the individual began to speak about a murder he had perpetrated at some point in his past.

When the siege of Khe Sanh was well underway and conditions reasonably stable, I got an unusual assignment to join up at Dong Ha Combat Base with an Army CH-54 Flying Crane. I spoke briefly with the Army Warrant Officer about his assignment and what I might do to facilitate it. The mission turned out to be uneventful except for the unusual inventory he had to deliver -- an aviation fire truck, a backhoe and an ambulance, all of which was to be individually carried with external lifts. I led him to Khe Sanh, handled all the voice transmissions and kept him out of trouble. More than anything else, the latter was what he wanted -- no trouble. His parting words before leaving Dong Ha were"You let anyone shoot at me and I'm dropping what I have on the hook and leaving the area." Three round trips, and all went well before he was thankfully able to depart to his more familiar area of operation. That was the only crane operation I experienced during the year in Vietnam. The fire fighting equipment and the ambulance were self-explanatory, but the backhoe was unique. It was for use just outside the perimeter defensive wire to dig a lengthy trench in an effort to uncover any of the tunnels the NVA were suspected digging at night to infiltrate the base. Several tunnels were uncovered and the effort thwarted.

When I checked in to VMO-6 I was the junior major and inherited the junior major job -- S4 logistics, supply), and that never changed. The only decision I ran into, which I was not able to handle on my own occurred while Hue-Phu Bai. Co-located there was a highly classified organization, the 8th Radio Research Field Station. Their compound had eight air-transportable vans, many antennas, and a small cadre of six OV -1 D Mohawk aircraft, heavy security and access on a "need-to-know" basis only. It remained a curiosity to us because none had the "need-to-know." That was true until their executive officer came to see me one day as the VMO- supply officer. We exchanged pleasantries pending his speaking frankly about the visit. The Army did not have the state-of-the-art fire-retardant Nomex flight suits, which the Marines seem to have in unlimited supply. He would like to outfit his flight crews with Nomex and was offering to trade an army jeep for 40 Nomex flight suits, varying sizes. My mind raced through the options facing me, until I had to admit, I would have t propose that to my CO and let him make the decision. In turn, we were given an invitation to dinner at their club that evening where we could discuss the proposal further.

Lieutenant Colonel White, two others and I went to dinner. We not only got access to the compound, but also encountered a small well-appointed club with all amenities -- bar, pool table, dim lights, linen table cloths, solid stainless utensils and a steak and seafood menu -- unheard of in northern I Corps. We not only discussed the Nomex proposal, but also learned about their mission. They were a "listening" organization picking up on any NVA radio and signal communications available. At least one OV-lD aircraft was always on station near the Laotian, Cambodian or North Vietnam borders, listening and relaying to the vans, where interpreters and intelligence personnel called the input. As for the jeep trade, Colonel White asked to defer a decision until the following morning.

After sleeping overnight on the deliberation, he made the right decision, he could not accept. I delivered the message at noon, with one 44-Long Nomex flight suit as a gift for the XO. The bright side of that exchange was a standing invitation for our field grade officers to use their club anytime, with a twelve-hour prior clearance request. (In 1972 when I was the Air Operations Officer on the USS Tripoli, the NVA incursion across the DMZ was well underway and the end in sight, we had the mission to use Marine CH-53 helicopters to external the 8th Radio's high priority vans from Hue- Phu Bai to the ship. We later offloaded them at Subic Bay in the Philippines.)

Early in the evening, on a return to Hue-Phu Bai I was by happenstance caught up in a small bit of intrigue, which lasted for weeks. I sent the rest of the crews off to get a meal before the dinning facility closed, while I would complete the maintenance reports and do a quick intelligence debrief. Then I was off to the club and a bite to make up for the missed meal. I was completely alone in the late light, while crossing our flight line, when I took note of a single A-4 Skyhawk profile transiting ac rossss the sky at about 2,000 feet. I gave it little thought until -- Kaboomb -- a blast in our parking area. I was thrown forward, prostrate on my front side, while small debris mixed with bigger chunks of cement and steel reined around me. I stood, surve yed the fact I was uninjured, then the five or six damaged aircraft, and a 20 x 20 foot hole in the matting filling with water. Soon it was remarkably apparent no one else d seen or taken note of the incident. I went to the nearest hooch of the MAG XO to tell him what had happened, to which he was nothing short of uninterested. I went there alerting others to take charge of assessing the damage and taking steps toward cleanup. I then completed my intended trip to the club.

Next day the local investigation established, among other things, I was remarkably the only witness! I provided a formal statement, referencing the fact the 250-pound bomb probably came from the A-4 I had seen. That investigation was bumped up to the Wing, from which the issue was delved into further -- Whose aircraft was it? I was interrogated aggressively, trying to get a revision to my statement that it was an A-4, because it was established their were no Marine A-4s in the air at the time and place. I stuck with my statement," with 800 hours in the A-4, I know one when I see one." Only after three weeks was it fin ally determined the A-4 was from a Navy carrier, and the pilot knew he had a "hung bomb" as he was heading out to sea from a mission in Laos. I was vindicated. Interestingly, Hue-Phu Bai was always short of water, as no amount of drilling had established a reliable water source. That bomb crater in turn had an unending amount of water bubbling from it -- the engineers took weeks pouring concrete into the crater before it was finally reduced to an acceptable dribble.

My closest incident for total wipeout came not from combat, but from a pure hazard of aviation. Sometime during the siege from Khe Sanh, while returning to Quang Tri at last light after a full day of flying, I chose a comfortable 4,000 cruising altitude above a solid low-level cloud cover. That was a good safe, relaxing way to shake the tensions of the day. That is what we were doing when a Marine RF -4 from the photoreconnaissance squadron shot straight up from the cloud, vertically in front of us. I was looking right into the radar-intercept officer's (RIO) back seat, and could note every detail and color of the aircraft inside and out -- close enough to see that neither pilot nor back-seater was looking our way, knew we were there or what had just missed killing them -- and us. Immediately we passed through their afterburner turbulence, which further threatened to tear the UR-1E apart. After that, all was calm again as we tried to put in perspective what had happened. Apparently, the RF-4 had been on a low-level flight of some type before deciding to abandon it and pull straight up through the clouds in after-burner for higher altitude. There was nothing we could do except be thankful we had not been a few seconds further along on our homeward flight.

The 26th Marine's chaplain Ray Stubbe became a "behind the scene" dynamo of inspiration throughout the combat area. In addition to the traditional religious functions, he became the unofficial (later official) historian of the siege. He not only wrote the definitive history of the battle, Valley of Decision, the Siege of Khe Sanh, (copy write1991) with co-author John Prados, but established the Khe Sanh Veterans Association (of which I'm a life member), and its quarterly publication Red Clay. He, thus, is the force behind preserving Khe Sanh heritage for all of us who participated. Annual reunions continue to be held each year.

The LBJ Library & Museum archives in Austin, Texas, retain a Khe Sanh battlefield model-- sand table -- that the Commander-in-Chief kept in the White House Situation Room in 1968. The President and aides apparently agonized over it daily, week after week, before and during the siege to better understand what was doing on the battlefield.

SUPER GAGGLE

Supply of the defensive hill locations west of the base by the CH-46 helicopters became untenable due to the weapons the NVA were able to direct on the landing area whenever they approached. The enemy knew those hills relied for survival on the helicopters and directed everything possible when they were most vulnerable, while on the ground evacuating wounded and delivering food and ammunition. The escorting UH-IE helicopter gunships could suppress some gun locations, but were unable to cover all.

Typical of the hill outposts plight was 881 South, 8-kilometers west of Khe Sanh, where Captain Bill Dabney commanded two companies of Marines in a 77-day standoff with almost overwhelming numbers of surrounding NVA.

Back at Quang Tri Air Base, home to the supporting helicopter squadrons, the three squadron commanders most involved in the resupply came up with a "better idea" -- a maximum effort. Lieutenant Colonel's Bill White of VMO-6, Melvin J. Steinway of HMM-262 Flying Tigers and Louis A. Gulling of-HMM-364 Purple Foxes formalized the plan. Lieutenant Colonel White then carried it to the 1st MA W to brief Major General Norman J. Anderson, who in turn approved it.

The first outing in mid-February had many more players that necessary for everyone beyond just the helicopters wanted to participate. Understandably, of course there was much coordination required and the unavoidable apprehension, which goes with any new endeavor. The concept had flights of as many a twelve CH -46s at a time load with externally carried supplies at Quang Tri and Dong Ha, to proceed directly to the Khe Sanh hill sites, where, in a "daisy-chain" they approached the landing zones and one-by-one place and release their loads and rapidly depart.

Those deliveries flooded the zones with as much as 24 tons of supplies in about three minutes, which later could be sorted and dispersed as conditions allowed. Just prior to the CH-46 arrival jets bombed the surrounding enemy concentrations. Two A-4s made low-level smoke dispensing runs on both sides of the helicopter approach lane to reduce the enemy's observation of the operation. Four UH-IEs parallel the transports providing close -in gun support. Each CH-46s also has two door cabin mounted 50caliber machine guns very effective for close-in suppressing fire. One two-seat TA-4 aircraft functioned as the overall Tactical Air Controller, Airborne (TACA), which represented the fixed-wing community wanting to get a piece of the helicopter operation. VMO-6 pilot, Major Bob Neff, who was familiar with the terrain, rode along in the back seat to advice on the helicopter participation.

The effort was soon dubbed Super Gaggle, for its possible resemblance to a gaggle of geese. It was not without shortcomings. The NVA adjusted, brought long-range fire into action when the helicopters were anticipated. Weather -- often dominated with low cloud cover, or even all-encompassing fog was always a factor. Retrieving the external carrying nets and slings, evacuating dead and wounded still required prolonged periods of a helicopter holding in the landing zone.

However, in the end it was a huge success, for the transport helicopter squadrons could concentrate on supper gaggle a couple of days a week and be free to apply their flying to other needs. They were still committed to having CH-46s on-call for immediate and emergency needs from the hills, but the one or two helicopters for daily resupply were eliminated. Supper gaggle continued for weeks during the siege of Khe Sanh, while adjustments made it more sophisticated and effective with each effort. The fixed wing jet support was soon abandoned as providing more forewarning and coordination effort than actual effectiveness. It became a helicopter effort exclusively, and much better than before.

I was a UH-IE participant repeatedly during the CH -46 resupply of the hills, both prior to and during supper gaggle. My second DFC recommendation was a result of providing cover for a downed CH-46. A CH-46 was damaged either in the hill landing zone or just after departing, and he was forced to put down in a valley half-a-mile east of Hill 881S. The steep incline on either side of the "controlled crash" site allowed NVA to fire down on the aircraft. My crew and I made repeated firing passes on obvious gun locations until our ammunition was expended. The crew was in the process of destroying everything that might be useful to the enemy when the aircraft was abandoned. I got another CH-46, Major John A. (AI) Chancy from HMM-364 directed to the scene for rescue pickup. We continued to make unarmed passes directed to diverting the enemy gunners away from the downed CH-46, while Al and the rest of the crew got their aircraft positioned to pickup. All were rescued and the downed 46 was smoldering as we all departed east to Khe Sanh.

I note in the obituary of Major General Norman J. Anderson, who passed September 6, 2010, that he is given substantial credit as, "Innovator Super Gaggle concept for Khe Sanh." He was the Commanding General of the 1st MAW during most of my tour in Vietnam and deserves much credit for his strong leadership, particularly standing his ground against General Westmoreland on how Marine aviation was to be used in direct support of the Marine on the ground. However, he may have approved the concept and possibly provided some of the "bells whistles" added to the original super gaggle plan, but I stand behind the position that it was not his idea! That has to remain a credit to the three squadron commanders at Quang Tri. (Close to home it is added that in retirement Major General Anderson was involved with the MacArthur Memorial Foundation in Norfolk ,Virginia, for 28 years -- for the first 10 years as Executive Director, and then as member of the board, helping to turn a forgotten museum into a civic center, as well a world-class memorial for one of America's great warriors. He remained director Emeritus until his death.)

PROVISIONAL MAG-39

Somewhere during that early 1968 period of the Khe Sanh siege, the TET offensive and all the other activity in northern I Corps, organization rework was going on behind the scene. Parent command, Marine Aircraft Group 36 (MAG-36) was now located at Hue Phu Bai airport. Co-located there were Huey squadron VMO-3 and several other CH-46 and UH-34 squadrons. VMO-6, two CH-46 and one UH-34 squadron were at Quang Tri, twenty-five miles north. That distance prevented MAG 36 providing the needed attention to oversee the Quang Tri Squadrons permission from the MAG-36 Commander, Colonel Wilson to go to the Wing and brief the supper gaggle proposal, he also highlighted the command structure shortcomings that existed in our detached relationship with MAG-36. Appropriately, MAG-36 should have presented the proposal, but it allowed Colonel White to do the job for them. That reflection alone highlighted a lack of initiative and responsibility on the part of MAG-36, and the obvious fact they did not know much about the Khe Sanh support issues.

First indications that movement was afoot by the MAW came with low-key visits to Quang Tri by one of the two assistant wing commanders, a ground officer Brigadier General H.W Hise. As a ground officer, not necessarily "aviation savvy," he proved to be very perceptive in observing that there was a weak link in providing Quang Tri. The result was; create a new administration and operational command-Provisional MAG-39, to be headquartered at Quang Tri.

The term Provisional represents the fact the organization wa s made up of "wing assets" alone, with no formal endorsement or support from the Marine Corps. A table of equipment and personnel for Prov MAG-39 was drafted and then all other Wing organizations were tasked to contribute assets to it's creation. About 139 individuals from various occupational specialties, ranks and rates were drawn from other air groups and squadrons throughout the 1st Wing. Every unit gave something or someone, and was not very happy about the losses.

Since the Quang Tri facility opened in December 1967, the senior Marine, Colonel O. V. Gallentine, had oversight and assets to run the Quang Tri base. The tenant aircraft squadrons received their maintenance support, and operational guidance from MAG -36 at Phu Bai, far to the south. The arrangement of two Colonels overlapping responsibilities was not good.

Organization change, all solidified April 15, 1968, when Provisional Marine Air Group-39 was commissioned. Colonel John E. Hansen was the new commander of both MAG-39 and the Quang Tri base. Lieutenant Colonel Bill White relinquished command ofVMO-6 and moved to Hue Phu Bai the week prior (March 24) to become the MAG-36 Operations Officer, while Major Bertram A. Mass assumed command of the squadron. On his first night at Hue Phu Bai Bill White was injured during a mortar attack that hit the hooch where he was sleeping. Several other occupants were killed or wounded that night, and he took shrapnel in one eye. He was medically evacuated back to the states, where he recovered from his injuries except for the loss of the eye. He remained on active duty and eventually rose to Lieutenant General, where he served three years as the Deputy Chief of Staff for Aviation -- as high as any aviator general had reached in the Marine Corps at the time. He, thereafter was affectionately referred to as "the one eyed General."

Almost lost in the multitude of other events occurring that date, I took command of newly formed Headquarters & Maintenance Squadron - 39, created to provide the administrative functions of the new MAG. I have absolutely no factual insight to how I was selected for the job -- I suspect I was nominated to fulfill VMO-6's piece of the overall personnel contribution for creating Provisional MAG-39. I had an administrative occupational specialty having been a personnel officer previously. I was well past midway in my tour and very well could have been forfeited to almost any other job in the Wing when it became available. Therefore, I got the best of all options -- a command and remain at Quang Tri where I could still fly and contribute with VMO-6.

On July 5, Colonel Walter Sienko replaced Colonel Hansen as Provisional MAG-commander, and I continued to work with him until my departure August 10, 1968. Fortunately I had excellent rapport with both men, thus could not have been happier with my position. Apparently, I did an excellent Job for both.

The creation of Provisional MAG-39 did not go well in all respects. The individuals forfeited by other units obviously gave opportunity to provide less than their stellar individuals. We did get some losers. However, most Marines came with an attitude of "second chance" and opportunity to prove themselves in a new command. Unquestionably, I inherited a superb Sergeant Major in the form of Duncan F. Davis. He managed the Staff NCOs and enlisted personnel to the point that I do not recall having a single disciplinary case come to my desk. or some never-to-be determined cause, we did have a suicide by hanging. The Navy criminal Investigative Service report was never made available to me other than to establish it was not a murder.

Some real hanky-panky was exposed via some of the equipment we inherited. Example: Evidence of trying to short-change us came with the ten boxes of supposedly "new" typewriters, which obviously had passed through some point in the supply chain where free-interchange took place. We received ten derelict machines. Brigadier General Hise interceded in that case by going to the 1st Wing headquarters and visiting office-by- office to recover our new equipment while returning the usurped -- or "stolen" -- typewriters. At the same time, he took the initiative to send the Wing Commissary officer personally to Quang tri and get us on the list for better food distribution and even a once a week supply of ice cream. The H&MS-39 office spaces never did advance from under teenage during my time on the job.

Good friend Major Guy Larkin, from HMM-262 also joined provisional MAG-39 to be the S-4 Logistics officer. For whatever reason his association with the two COs was not good, to the point he probably damaged his career in the process.

Somewhere in that spring Colonel Sienko and I, along with three or four other commanding officers from Quang Tri were invited dinner at the Commanding General Anderson's mess in Da Nang. Quite a formal a formal affair with amenities to the ridiculous for a combat environment we thought.

However, I guess general officers have to be prepared to provide a civilized front for visitors of all stripes. Tuesday nights he set aside to rotate through his many commands officers to come and kibitz, his way to "keep in touch" with his commanders. Many of his direct staff were also there, as they apparently were every night, as members of the mess.

When Colonel Sienko was afforded an opportunity to speak during after-dinner coffee he gave a spectacularly clever pitch, which subtly spoke to the neglect of which the northern reaches of the 1st MAW had been subjected. "It is nice", he said, "to finally be drawn in to the Ice Cream Belt." Colonel Sienko obviously knew his way around and through the wing headquarters, which allowed him to place his jabs where he new they were merited. He referenced the "stolen" typewriters, and called out Brigadier General Hise for all he had done to benefit Quang Tri. Good trip and a long CH-46 ride home in the late hours.

It is coincidental that the siege of Khe Sanh also ended simultaneously on that 15 April date. The Army formally moved in to the area and relieved the 26th Marines of control of that area, Highway-9 was opened again to vehicle traffic, and the whole complexion of the contested area changed. The NVA had withdrawn. The 26th Marines reformed in the Quang Tri - Dong Ha area and thereafter directed their efforts directly north into the disputed territory along the DMZ. Good friend, Major Bud Guenther showed up on my door step during that time. He was the 26th Marine's Air Officer, and was struggling in the shuffle to find his home in the organization. He stayed with us several nights until he found the spot where he fit in with the reorganizing regiment.

Not to be overlooked is the battle for Hue City, which began with the TET offensive of January and February 1968. Support of that prolonged conflict relied primarily on the aviation assets of MAG -36 out of Hue Phu Bai.

Not to be ignored is the fact that VMO-6 and sister transport squadrons supported daily the contested war north of Dong Ha at hot spots like Gio Linh, Cam Lo and Con Thien in Leatherneck Square, and the Chua Viet river passage. I missed most of that support flying since my time was at Khe Sanh. Nevertheless, it as an expensive time from January through April when VMO-6 lost more aircraft, pilots and personnel than any other time. Captain Bobby F. (Gabby) Galbreath copilot First Lieutenant Paul Jensen and crew were all lost February 16, 1968, while trying to xtract a ground unit under attack. Gallbreath received the Navy Cross and Jensen the Silver Star posthumously for their heroics. We lost several personnel during mortar and rocket attacks on the Quang Tri base.

Captain Bruce McMillan and his crew were lost in a mid-air collision with a UH-34. Still another, Captain Jim Cawley, First Lieutenant Bob Kimmel and crew disappeared unaccountably at last light east of Quang Tri. Investigations best bet is they were hit by a friendly artillery round -- almost unbelievable. There were 35 VMO-6 combat losses in Vietnam.

Sister squadrons at Quang Tri of course had their stellar performers. One of which was Major Dave Althoff, the XO of HMM-26 ,who gained a reputation for flying the most demanding emergency missions. He took his quiet and unassuming nature on the ground to the air and performed repeated acts of heroism. His three Silver Stars spoke unquestionably of his mettle. HMM-2 lost 22 crewmembers over the first three months of 1968.

CH -46 helicopters went through another spell of structural fixes during that period, pulling planes out of operation ,leaving many of the junior pilots without much opportunity to fly. Lieutenant Colonel White offered up an arrangement where blocks of six or eight Lieutenants a time could join VMO-6 as co-pilots for the duration. We picked up some great young aviators that way. Most, after experiencing the UH-IE were reluctant to return to transports.

In an after war interview General Vo Nguyen Giap, the brilliant, highly respected leader of the North Vietnam military, gave the following quote in his memoirs currently found in the Vietnam War memorial in Hanoi.

"What we still don't understand is why you Americans stopped the bombing of Hanoi. You had us on the ropes. If you had pressed us a little harder, just for another day or two, we were ready to surrender! It was the same at the battle of TET. You defeated us! We knew it, and we thought you knew it. But we were elated to notice your media was helping us. They were causing more disruption in America than we could in the battlefields. We were ready to surrender. You had won!"

However, the U. S. public voted Richard Nixon into office, based heavily on his promise to begin withdrawing U. S. troops and turn the war over to the South Vietnamese. The move was initiated and underway soon after his taking office. Thus, we forfeited all that fifteen years of conflict had gained.

More in question was, where was I going next? Typically, that question was to remain until the final days. A couple months earlier, I received a preliminary alert from my assignment officer indicating Marine Aviation Detachment, Naval Missile Center Point Mugu, California, to fly the F-4. I recognize that was a little bizarre, noting my background void of any weapons expertise and certainly no F-4 flying, but it did sound "neat." In preparation I obtained an -4 Flight Manual from hooch-mate Major Dave Vest and began some late night reading.

Eventually reality came as a modification of orders for MAG-26, MCAS New River, North Carolina. I did not care for that -- having been there and done it before. I tried to protest with a quick message, from which the terse reply was, "Needs of the service. Your rank and occupational specialty are desperately needed at that location." Truth is; when I arrived at New River there were six UH-1E majors vying for two jobs. Fortunately, I got the best position, but it does highlight the, all too often, assignment shortfalls.

(Incidentally, a few words on David G. Vest. He went to high school with my wife Jane, who judged him a bit "kooky" at Normandy High in St. Louis. The Vests also lived two doors from us in b se housing at EI Toro in 1961. He did not fly much combat in Vietnam, and ran the passenger transportation center at Quang Tri while we lived together for about four months . However, overall he performed quite well in the Marine Corps, evidenced by being selected Marine Corps Aviator of the Year for 1971, for his work developing the Aviation Air Combat Facility at Yuma, Arizona. He was a good organization man .)

The commandant of the Marine Corps, General Leonard F. Chapman, visited Quang Tri, for which the troops of H&MS-39 provided a portion of the backdrop of inspection. The Commandant's comments included favorable reflections on the base, the unit performances and the overall contributions in northern I Corps supporting the bases there.

A formal change of command ceremony was on the Quang Tri flight line as I "passed the H&MS-39 flag" to a CH-46 pilot, Major Herman Bolen, I provided a short recognition which gave to recipients of awards for individual actions over the four months I had the unit -- including three Silver Star medals. Those decorations were earned by members of Air Traffic Control Unit-64 detachment, which operated the Khe Sanh airstrip throughout the siege. The unit became part of Provisional MAG-39 upon its creation.

CH-46 squadrons, earning Air Medals. Several Bronze. Stars were also awarded. It was quite a creditable presentation for a headquarters organization forcefully emphasized. There were a couple of departure gathering with the enlisted personnel, the Staff NCOs -- which I most enjoyed -- and the several officers of the H&MS and VMO-6 organizations. The Air Force C-130 I hopped to Da Nang was rigged with rope lines strung low across the fuselage every so many feet for the occupants to hold during the flight. We were directed to face the rear and sit on the floor and grasp the nearest line. That was the last vestige of the combat zone for me.

Once in Da Nang I visited the 1st MAW "O' Club for two nights and parked in Jake Moore's recently vacated room in the BOQ, he left a week ahead of me. Then on departing Vietnam it was a contract flight to Travis AFB, California for processing and a commercial TW A flight to St. Louis.

From arrival in San Francisco until St. Louis, I had sobering exposure to unbridled Anti- Vietnam mentality. Long hair, loud weird casual clothing leaning to bellbottoms and peacenik T-shirts, along with bra-less women was prominent. I was traveling in uniform, which prompted stares, finger pointing and a few hisses. The one and only barbershop shave I have ever paid for, in preparation for arrival home in a few hours, left me in the hands of an outspoken straight razor wielding anti-war advocate -- not comforting. Once safely out of the chair I gave him justifiable right to protest something -- no tip. On the TWA flight I found the stewardess (flight attendant today) failed to waken me for the in-flight meal. When I inquired if there was yet a chance to get a bite, she let me know directly, "You missed your chance soldier boy." No attempt made to accommodate the Marine who had been fighting a war important to someone other than her.

Back with family was reward enough. Seven -year-old Steven had been in an arm cast when I left a year before, and he was still in cast upon my return -- different arm. Several days prior to my return my Uncle Ned Gerard, from Alton, Illinois gifted the boys a Brittany spaniel puppy, soon dubbed Freckles. He lived with us for thirteen years. All was well as we immediately began to plan ahead with the priority of getting the sons to Jacksonville, North Carolina, and established for the fall school year.

CHAPTER FROM NEW NOVEL "DUELING WITH GIFFORD" BY GARY FOSTER

The jungles of western Quang Tri Province turned tranquil just before dawn – very tranquil – but not completely quiet.

The only sounds heard were those of small birds overhead, the occasional rustle of the palm fronds and the constant ripple of the Quang Tri River as its waters sluiced through the cataracts and the meandering channels below the canyon walls.

The NVA ground attack against the Khe Sanh Combat Base surely was going to occur. No one knew when. Some refugees, arriving at the base seeking protection, reported movements of NVA. Enemy activity in I Corps was increasing. The area around the base remained combat active every day.

Patrols outside the wire were risky yet they were essential to the survival of the combat base. Special Marine patrols began to seek out the enemy to ascertain where they were and to substantiate theories as to what General Vo Nguyen Giap's next move would be.

Captain Jason Allen led his two heavily-armed platoons – a total of thirty-four Marines – on a daring patrol far from the base to reconnoiter Highway Nine. The Marines had moved all night through the dense vegetation. They now found themselves several kilometers somewhere east of the Khe Sanh Combat Base in a slight but eerie fog-shrouded landscape.

The patrol halted. The men stood perfectly still. Some Marines crouched low, their guns at the ready. Allen looked at his map. He and his men were on the north bank of the Quang Tri River just north and downstream of the confluence of the Da Krong and the Rao Quan Rivers. Allen mused to himself. This must be the headwaters of the Quang Tri River. This is where the Da Krong River turns into the Quang Tri River. Interesting. The geographic layout was very complicated. He confirmed his location by spotting two islands in the river that barely showed up on his map.

Captain Allen's men were superb fighters. They had been tested on earlier patrols and in many firefights. Allen relied heavily on Lieutenant Gerry Gifford who he had placed at the lead of the platoons. The Lieutenant was about one hundred meters in front of the mass of men, about fifty meters more than he should have been.

Captain Allen could not see Lieutenant Gifford and waited for the Lieutenant to return. Neither he nor any of his men spoke. The Marines made no sound. Instead, they listened.

Lieutenant Gerry Gifford gasped for air from the crouched run back from the river, from the two islands. He had slung his M79 grenade launcher and his M16 assault rifle over his shoulder – Gifford carried both weapons when he was on point, in fact, always. He reached Captain Allen's position just below the cliff. Gifford was out of breath.

"Captain," he urgently whispered. "There's something going on over there, beyond those two islands."

Captain Allen had heard an unfamiliar noise on the other side of the Quang Tri River, south of the patrolling Marines. The sound was not a naturally occurring one. It was menacing, even unnerving. The commotion of military personnel handling equipment – rifles, mortar tubes, base plates, machine guns and tripods – was muffled but unmistakable. The sounds grew until they became completely distinguishable. Vietnamese voices and words could be distinctly heard.

Allen wanted to see. He returned with Gifford to investigate. Both Marines, bending forward, walked at a steady pace through the fleeting fog to the south edge of the two islands. Once there, they lay down on the sand and gravel deposits behind thick brush and some large rocks. They observed a bustle of activity in the thick trees on the other side of the river. Had to be the NVA. Who else would be out here?

A minute passed as Allen and Gifford scanned the tropical landscape through the early morning greyness. The two Marines weren't looking for figures, only for movement, for patterns. Soon, as their eyes focused and discerned shapes, they saw clearly what they feared. Like so many ants rustling in the brush, green figures, somewhat camouflaged, were toiling in the jungle's thickness. The NVA must have been on the move maybe for two or three days.

"Shit," Allen said in a whisper. "What the hell are they doing?" "Not sure, Sir." Gifford looked across the river again. "It must be a probe, Sir."

Captain Allen strained his eyes. "Can't be, Giff. Too many men. Why are they setting up mortars and machine guns, and why so near the river bank? There's nothing here and we're too far from the base. God, I hope they haven't seen us. What are they up to, Lieutenant?"

Captain Allen looked about him, up the river, up to the steep hills and toward the flat plateau where the combat base loomed. He turned and looked through the wafting fog down river to where the cataracts ended and the water flow smoothed out. The Captain, looking back over his shoulder, surveyed his men's position from the vantage of the river.

"Gifford, we need to move to a safer place. We're too vulnerable. No cover. No protection. We gotta get the men outta here. The gooks have too much firepower. We can't match it with what we have with us. We need mortars to match theirs and some fifty cals but we ain't got 'em."

Both men continued to look at the developments of the enemy on the other side of the fast- flowing stream. The Captain continued in a whisper.

"The NVA's in force. What do you think their strength is, Giff?" "Can't be a regiment," Gifford responded in a low voice. "Surely not. Maybe a couple of companies, maybe a battalion. Can't be positive about that, though, Skipper. Sure as hell seems to be a lot of 'em over there, Sir."

Captain Allen looked intently. The NVA were busy establishing some sort of a position. But why?

"Gifford, sixty-one millimeter mortars? See any?"

Gifford looked hard across the river. "Maybe they have some of the smaller calibers – I don't see any – but there!"

Gifford quickly pointed. "Over there, Skipper, see 'em, Captain?" Gifford's eyesight was as keen as it was when he had played baseball in high school and college. "I can see they're setting up eighty-twos."

"Eighty-twos! Shit me alive, Gifford. Goddamn, we'd be crazy to start a firefight here on our own with that kind of enemy firepower. There is no intelligence as to which NVA units are operating here, if any at all, and how many NVA there are in the area. We don't know what they got hidden in the jungle."

"Sir, Highway Nine is behind us. I'll bet they're setting up for some kind of ambush on the road from the other side of the river."

"Shit, Gifford, what do they know that we don't know? We can't start a firefight on our own and we are too far from the combat base for such heavy action without hope of reinforcements. We need artillery and air support, Lieutenant, and . . ."

The Captain paused and then stole another quick glance at the enemy through the grass. He pushed backward, prone on his stomach, from the opening in the bush. He slid his helmet back on his head. Sweat rolled down the Captain's dirty face. How he would love to have a cigarette.

"Gifford, I'm sure they have patrols everywhere up and down this damned river but I don't think they know we're here. We could exploit this opportunity and surprise the hell out of them. But we need to call in artillery, give the arty guys some coordinates and let them take the gooks out. Let's get back to the platoons. You run ahead of me – stay low, Giff – and get me Lieutenant Schuster, the Forward Observer, and the radio man. Get Agostino and his radio quick. I want to call in a pre-assigned fire mission. I need the FO and the radio. Go now, Gifford!"

"Got it, Skipper."

The Captain reached out and grabbed Gifford by his arm. "Also, find out what airpower is in the area. We could use some napalm and CBU's. Tell the men to hold their fire and stay low. I don't think the gooks have seen us. If there is no air power in the area, we'll surprise the bastards and take them out with our 105s and 155s."

Captain Allen and Lieutenant Gifford moved stealthily back from the river. Gifford started to run ahead for the Forward Observer and the radioman. But it was too late. The Captain's presumption of their not being seen was dashed. The distinctive metallic sound of mortar rounds being dropped down the hollow, lengthy NVA mortar tubes, and the excited voices of the NVA crews signaled what was about to happen next.

The propellant of each round exploded in the tube with a truncated sound, sending the projectile into the air. Within seconds the NVA mortar rounds landed but way short of the two Marine platoons. The valley resonated with loud explosions. The shells tore up the ground and shredded the landscape. They splintered trees and showered the area with limbs, dirt, flying wood, fragments of rock and sharp, jagged shrapnel. The pungent smell of explosives pervaded the area. At the same time, the NVA sprayed the nearby brush with heavy machine gun fire. The small bullets, their sound unmistakable as they hit their random targets, peppered the trees and ground. The recognizable short, staccato sounds of NVA AK47 assault rifles broke out. Allen could hear the bullets as they zinged overhead and clipped limbs and leaves, ripped into tree trunks and ripped the ground apart in instantaneous spurts of dirt and mud. It all happened fast.

"Gifford, run like hell ahead of me! Get Agostino! Get on the radio and call in artillery!" The Captain took another look back across the river. He spoke to himself. "Shit, the bastards know we're here. How in the hell did they spot us so quickly? Damn sonzabitches! They're gonna march their mortar rounds right up our ass and cut us to ribbons. We've got to get out of here and pull the men back."

The Captain began to run toward the valley cliff. He caught up with Gifford. Both men continued to run toward the platoons, toward the waiting Marines who were taking cover in the jungle foliage, concealing themselves where they could. The enemy mortar rounds arced through the sky. They fell to earth and exploded violently.

Gifford was blown off his feet by a nearby explosion as he ran. He was bleeding from cuts on his face and neck but not seriously harmed. Now behind the Captain, Gifford picked up his M16 and helmet and ran again. His M79 bounced on his back.

The mortar shells were coming closer to the platoons but the Marines held their fire lest they kill the Captain and the Lieutenant.

Finally, the Captain made it back to his platoons with Gifford right behind.

"Return fire! Return fire!"

The Marines opened up with their M16s and two M60 machine guns. The sound of the Marines' gunfire filled the entire valley and seemed to smother the sound of the enemy's guns. The firefight, just what the Captain was trying to avoid, had started in earnest. The now-isolated Marines were in a serious fight for their lives.

Both sides exchanged long torrents of machine gun and rifle fire.

The Marines launched volleys of grenades at the NVA from their M79s. The hand-held weapon shot grenades a little bigger than golf balls. But the effective range was not much more than four hundred meters and at that distance accuracy suffered. The Marines fired grenade after grenade across the river. They exploded in puffs of white, then black smoke. The resulting explosions from the grenades just on the other side of the river made a distinctive sound. The Marines continued to rake the area across the river with their M60 machine guns and smaller caliber M16 assault rifles. In all, they laid down a formidable wall of fire.

The NVA answered the Marines with much larger and much more potent rocket propelled grenades from shoulder-held B40 and B41 launchers. The Russian and Chinese-made projectiles made horrendous shrieks and left behind long telltale smoke trails. The flight of the warheads terminated in deafening explosions. Mortar rounds kept falling indiscriminately, too.

The enemy continued their vicious fire. Their bullets severed tree branches and spit everywhere through the dirt. They brought more men and arms to the fray.

The Marines' weapons were no match for the strength of the NVA. The NVA had overwhelming firepower. The battle on the banks of the Quang Tri River, unbalanced as it was, turned into a bloody slugfest.

Captain Allen made it back to his radioman, cursing that he had ever left him in the first place. He yelled out.

"Agostino, Jesus Christ, we're facing more than a company of NVA. There're probably four or five hundred gooks out there. Gotta call Stanford for a fire mission now. We got to get in touch with those guys."

Little could be heard above the noise of the explosions. Allen cupped his hands and yelled at Lieutenant Schuster, his forward observer.

"Schuster, do we have pre-assigned fire missions for this area?"

The Captain, impatient with the danger around him, quickly assumed the duty of the forward artillery observer who was part of the artillery unit on the base but who was accompanying the patrol. He looked at his watch quickly: ten minutes past seven.

"Give me that phone, Lieutenant."

"Captain, we don't have pre-planned fire missions here. Nothing here, Sir. We need to be farther downstream in the area where the coordinates are lined up and ready to go. We have Toto one-one, Toto one-five, Juliet six, and Hotel ten —"

"Lieutenant, I don't have time for an explanation. We'll call in a new fire mission. Give me the grid and azimuth.

Schuster looked at his map and determined the grid coordinates and he ascertained the azimuth from his position to the target.

The Captain talked into the radio's hand-held receiver while the FO determined the fire mission.

"Stanford Thirty-four, this is Oscar Six. Stanford Thirty-four, this is Oscar Six."

"This is Oscar Six. Do you read me?" No reply.
"Shit, what's wrong with those arty guys? Are they on vacation, playing cards, havin' a damned picnic? What the hell is going on up there?"

The Captain looked up.

"Must be too steep in this damned valley. We're in a hole. They can't read me." The Captain tried again. "Stanford Thirty-four, Stanford Thirty-four. This is Oscar Six. We need fire support. Do you copy?"

The Captain waited for a reply. "Come on you cannon cockers, pick up the phone, for Christ's sake." He pressed the button. "Stanford Thirty-four, Stanford Thirty-four. Do you read?" Still no reply.
"Damn." Gifford shouted above the noise of the firefight. "Captain, we gotta do something now. We gotta take out the mortars."

The NVA had marched their eighty-two millimeter mortar rounds across the river toward the platoons. The rounds were now landing less than seventy yards away and coming closer. Machine gun bullets were zinging through the air and thudding into the dirt and trees. The bullets ricocheted off the boulders. The air was full of flying lead.

Several mortar rounds landed behind the Captain and Gifford. A cry came from their left rear.

"Corpsman! Corpsman! I'm hit! Oh, shit, I'm hit bad." Captain Allen turned to Gifford. "Damnit! The gooks'll have us bracketed within seconds. My God, Gifford. We gotta get our men outta here. Damnit to hell."

Gifford looked around. He and his Marines were in a serious predicament. The steep cliff rising from the river valley floor up to Highway Nine above him cut off any easy retreat. The North Vietnamese were walking their mortar rounds in on them closer and closer and forcing them to the cliff face. Once there, a barrage would destroy the platoons. Climbing the wall would be no escape. Every Marine would be easily picked off. The only escape was moving up or down river or attacking the enemy directly. Either way would be suicide. No cover and no area in which to maneuver.

"Shit!" Goddamnit! We need arty support." Captain Allen spoke into the radio receiver. "Stanford Thirty-four, this is Oscar Six. We need arty now! Repeat, immediate! Do you read me?" No reply.
"Schuster, what's wrong with those Goddamn jokers?"

Gifford, not far away from the Captain and Lieutenant Schuster, had moved nearer to his platoon mates. They were digging in and covering their bodies with anything they could find.

"Who are those guys? How did the gooks know we're here?"

Whoomp! Whoomp! The mortar rounds were shaking Gifford to his core. They exploded now only yards away. The explosions were ear shattering. They sent deep, shuddering concussion waves through the terrain and through each Marine's body.

The NVA fired more rocket propelled grenades toward the Marines. The rocket-grenades, making their screaming, whooshing sound and, with thick smoke in trail – straight-as-an-arrow – zipped across the river directly at the Marines. The rockets exploded immediately on the cliff face, sending shrapnel and earth debris everywhere.

A shout rang out above the others. "Corpsman hit. He's down."

In one quick movement, Gifford emptied his pack. He rounded up eight hand grenades, three that he had and five from his comrades, some of whom had sustained severe wounds to the point they could no longer fight. He put the grenades inside the empty green satchel. With his M16 across his back, several magazines of 5.56mm rounds and six, fat shotgun-like cartridges for his grenade launcher in his vest pockets, Gifford grabbed the satchel of hand grenades in one hand and the M79 in the other. He crawled, then ran back across the islands to the river's edge.

"Grenades first, Goddamnit, then rifles." He recalled the words of a fellow Marine during the Hill Fights who admonished another Marine when he returned fire at night with his rifle."Shithead! Now they know where you are and we're gonna get plastered, you idiot."

Gifford had never forgotten that night or those words. Now, as he ran toward the river bank to within throwing range of the enemy positions, he repeated them to himself: "Grenades first!"

Gifford ran fast, sometimes tripping on rocks and debris and falling to his face only to jump up and run again. He crossed the two islands. He heard bullets flying crazily overhead. The Marines' fire in back of him was matched by the NVA staccato fire in front of him. The air was alive with the whipping sound of bullets as they snapped and zipped overhead in opposite directions. The Marines fought valiantly. Their survival depended on it.

The North Vietnamese continued to rain down their mortar shells and fire their rockets at the Marines. Gifford could hear the deadly ordnance whistle and shriek overhead. Twice an NVA RPG rocket sizzled just above his head on its way to some target. It left behind a horrible stench of burned propellant. He imagined the flight to the end point of the rocket's trajectory. He heard the explosions now behind him. He dropped and crawled the remaining distance to the river's edge on the south island. Gifford hid behind a large thick bush and some shoulder-high boulders. He peered through the leaves and stalks and saw what he expected to see.

Three enemy mortar crews were working the tubes. Two machine guns were spitting red flames out of their muzzles. NVA crews continued to load and fire their shoulder-aimed B40 RPGs. NVA infantry, interspersed among them, were crouching and furiously firing their AK assault weapons.

Gifford had learned from a briefing that NVA infantry had been taught to conserve ammunition through the use of the Diem Xa – firing only two cartridges at a time in rapid succession. But it seemed the infantry disregarded this technique and embraced the Lia – full automatic fire.

Gifford could see the NVA were bringing up more soldiers. Gifford heard the screams of wounded Marines behind him. He knew their position had been hit hard; his comrades were dying. But he had not been spotted. At least, he didn't believe he had been spotted.

"They have us cornered but they haven't attacked us yet," he murmured to himself.

Gifford thought he might use his grenade launcher but decided not to; not at first. "Shit, if I fire this grenade blooper, they'll see me like that idiot dumbass months before. Gotta use hand grenades."

Gifford laid the M79 down. He eyed the two mortar crews to his left and another mortar crew far to the right, all on the other side of the river. For no particular reason, Gifford decided to strike the two outside mortars first. He pulled out two hand grenades from his pack. He mentally measured the distance to the right target. Throwing a grenade is not like throwing a baseball. There's a big difference between lobbing and throwing. Gifford knew the distance was at the limits of his throwing capability. Still . . . damnit, Gifford was going to do it anyway. He was going to go for the strike zone

Gifford clamped the safety spoon to the round grenade casing with his left hand and pulled the arming pin with his other hand. He waited till the NVA dropped a round down the mortar tube.

"Ground ball to short center with a runner on third. A straight throw to home plate from behind second base." Whoosh, the NVA mortar round fired.

At that precise moment, Gifford rose up to his full height and with the speed of lightning and the strength of a Roman catapult, launched his grenade in a slight arc, straight at the right mortar crew. The hand-thrown projectile flew on a true trajectory across the river and within a second, exploded among the NVA mortar crewmen, killing them all.

"Strike one for the southpaw. You gook dumb-shits don't know who you're messin' with."

A more difficult throw would be to Gifford's left since he was left handed but in the blink of an eye, Gifford repeated the movement. He clamped the spoon down and pulled the pin on his second grenade, stood upright, spread his feet apart and steadied himself on his left foot. Gifford took aim and let fly. The grenade sailed, this time in a higher arc, across the river. Again, it met its target and exploded, disabling the second mortar and killing its crew. "Strike two, you filthy sonzabitches."

Gifford had caught the Vietnamese completely off guard. He didn't think they had seen him but, surely knowing the distance a grenade can be thrown – but not knowing the distance Gifford could throw a grenade – Gifford knew they would rake the brush with their machine guns.

Gifford clutched his pack, his M16 and the M79 and pulled back and down into a small, narrow ravine. Bullets ripped through the thicket and gouged the trees. They clipped the grass and churned up the earth and zinged off the rocks. A line of earth fountains suddenly jumped up to his left as the succession of machine gun bullets ripped up the ground, marching right past him. He protected himself as best he could. He rolled to the right and slid into a deeper gulley.

The two outside mortars were silent but the NVA were screaming and shouting. Machine gun fire swept over and past him to his right and up into the trees cutting down limbs and decapitating palm trees. It was time to take out the NVA machine gun.

The Marines continued to return fire.

Gifford pulled the pin on his third grenade, rose up and let it fly across the river. It landed right in front of the machine gun and exploded. But the machine gun was not knocked out and continued to fire.

"Damnit to hell," Gifford said to himself. "Ball one. A one-two count."

He pulled the pin on the fourth grenade, stood a little to his left for a better vantage and threw the grenade with all his strength. The grenade made a beeline, straight as a taut rope, into the machine gun nest, hitting the gun. It exploded, killing everyone and blowing the machine gun several feet away.

Gifford smiled. "Now we're talking."

The North Vietnamese soldiers began to scream and point. They turned their guns toward where they thought Gifford was hiding. The NVA would soon cross the river.

Gifford stood and, partially hidden, stretched his long, lanky, sinewy left arm all the way back. Like a tightly coiled spring, his arm snapped forward in a shortened arc over and to the left of his head. The fifth grenade left his hand and headed for the third mortar. It struck quickly with lethal accuracy and exploded. The grenade killed everyone in the crew.

A surprise explosion occurred behind him. It came from a Chicom grenade. Although the shockwave startled him, Gifford was not struck by any shrapnel. But where did the grenade come from? He saw directly in front of him a grenade flying through the air toward him.

"Oh, shit."

Gifford dove for a small ravine. The grenade exploded harmlessly.

"I got to get those bastards, they've outflanked me."

At the same time Gifford rose up, he saw two NVA soldiers standing not far away. They were in easy range. Quickly, Gifford dispatched a grenade in their direction before either one of them could throw theirs or unshoulder their rifles. Gifford's grenade landed at their feet. The explosion killed them both.

"Man, that was close."

Gifford decided it was time to leave but not before he launched his last grenades. He threw two more in rapid succession across the river right at the attackers with deadly results.

The whole episode lasted less than seven minutes.

Not wasting any time, Gifford sprang to his feet. He ran into the brush with bullets zinging after him, tearing at the leaves and waist-high grass. Gifford turned, aimed his M79, and pulled the trigger. The shell shot over the river and exploded on an embankment killing two NVA soldiers. He opened the breach of the single-shot weapon, loaded and fired again. More NVA fell to the ground. The Marines behind him provided suppression fire just above his head.

Gifford moved to a new position and repeated. He fired the M79 again. Finally, Gifford ran back to the two platoons.

But shelling continued from other hidden enemy mortars. NVA machine gun fire seemed to be on the increase. The North Vietnamese were now charging across the river.

The Marines continued to lay down an intense wall of fire.

"Captain, I can't suppress them anymore," Gifford yelled out. He was out of breath and panting for air. Captain Allen, Agostino and Lieutenant Schuster tried to raise the artillery battery on the Combat Base.

"Stanford Thirty-four, this is Oscar Six. Fire mission! Can you copy?" "Go ahead, Oscar Six. This is Stanford Thirty-four. Ready to copy." "Shit, Almighty! They woke up. They finally Goddamn heard me. For Christ's sake."

Allen depressed the button on the phone.

"Stanford Thirty-four. Oscar Six. Urgent. Active movement, NVA attacking my position. Over." "Roger, Oscar Six."

Schuster had already determined the grid coordinates on his map. The grid could be pinpointed to within ten meters if he had had time to precisely make the measurements. But no such time was available. The grid to the nearest one hundred meters would have to do. The fire could be adjusted. No time for shackle codes. The grid coordinates would be sent in the clear. Schuster took the phone from the Captain and spoke.

"Stanford Thirty-four. Grid, X-ray Delta, niner two niner, four one niner. Compass azimuth, one four seven degrees. Enemy attacking. Request two rounds Hotel Echo. Adjust fire. Over." "Stand by one, Oscar Six, working the data for fire mission. Battery engaged in support of firefight near Kilo Sierra. Stand by three zero seconds. Repeat, stand by three zero seconds."

Out of patience, Captain Allen yelled out.

"Schuster, give me that damned radio,"
Allen grabbed the receiver out of Schuster's hand and stuck it to his ear.

"Stanford thirty-four, this is Oscar Six Actual. Negative, negative. Cannot wait. NVA in the open attacking our position. I repeat, NVA in the open. Copy?"

"Oscar Six, understand. Repeat. Working the data. We've got you covered. Stand by your fire mission. Kilo Sierra will advise Romeo Papa – The Rockpile – and Charlie Charlie – Camp Carroll – to provide reinforcing fire."

The NVA kept attacking but the Marines maintained a withering fire which slowed their advance. Still the NVA mortar rounds fell among the Marines. Fire from the NVA machine guns ripped through the area like a scythe. RPGs punctuated the cacophony with their rocket sounds and terminal explosions that shook everything.

Captain Allen covered his ears. He became desperate. "Stanford thirty-four, I say again, this is Oscar Six Actual. Repeat. Actual. Fire Mission! Repeat coordinates, X-ray Delta, niner two niner, four one niner. Compass azimuth, one four seven. Danger close, repeat, danger close. Will adjust. Affirmative on reinforcing fire from Romeo Papa and Charlie Charlie. Repeat, affirmative. Have Romeo Papa and Charlie Charlie fire spotting rounds for reinforcing fire. Will adjust. All rounds need fuse quick and Victor Tango in effect. Do you copy?"

While Captain Allen was talking, Schuster unfolded the adjacent map west and found that when adjoined with the one he was using, the NVA position was directly east of the Khe Sanh Combat Base. The Marine patrol was about three hundred meters north of the NVA salient. He added up the grids. The target was just about eight kilometers east of the base, well within range of the 105s. He could have used grid coordinates and a gun-target line but, under the circumstances, plotting an accurate gun-target line on two separate, unattached sheets would be more difficult than plotting the azimuth on the same sheet from his position to the enemy's. For him to say east of the base would not be accurate enough for the Fire Direction Center and the artillery battery. Over a distance of eight kilometers, a one degree error would result in an alignment variance of one hundred forty meters.

The Fire Direction Center at Khe Sanh plotted the grids and azimuth, determined range and deflection, size of charge and quadrant elevation. The gun crews attached fuses to shells, loaded their howitzers and waited for directions from the FDC.

The FDC quickly gave the order. "Fire!" Two howitzers fired one round each. The FDC spoke immediately to Captain Allen.

"Oscar Six. Shot."

There was a slight pause. Then the FDC gave Schuster and Captain Allen a heads-up so they could look for the impact. The FDC called into the microphone to Allen and Schuster.

"Splash."

Two forty-pound shells from the Combat Base screamed overhead and within seconds smashed into the river bed far to the east of the tip of the south island and short of the advancing NVA. A huge geyser of mud and water flew into the sky.

Captain Allen stated corrections. "Stanford Thirty-four, Oscar Six. Adjust fire. Right two hundred, add one hundred."

The FDC on the Khe Sanh Combat Base repeated the corrections and gave the new firing data to the guns. After not too many seconds, the guns reported ready.

The command was immediately given.
Fire!"

Like before, the FDC spoke to Allen and Schuster.

"Shot." Then, "Splash."

The two 105mm rounds fell in the middle of the enemy near the edge of the river and exploded.

"Stanford Thirty-four, good shooting. Request Battery One, three volleys. Fire for effect. Good rounds. Danger close. Oscar Six."

Captain Allen turned to his men. "Marines! Heads down! Incoming!" Within seconds, six shells, then another six, then another six - eighteen shells in all – crashed in on the NVA. The valley filled with a continuous roar of explosions from the landing artillery shells. The ground beneath the charging North Vietnamese soldiers suddenly churned into brown and black and geysers of dark water. Smoke and dust and flying debris from the effects of the Marine's artillery enveloped the area. "Stanford Thirty-four, continue fire for effect. Repeat, danger close. "The rounds kept coming.

With the coordinates now known with precision, the Fire Support Coordination Center on the Combat Base called in reinforcing fire from The Rockpile and Camp Carroll. The giant US Army 175mm long range guns, two from each firebase, fired. The projectiles landed with such a sudden impact that they made the explosions of the 105mm shells look insignificant. But they both landed short of the target.

Captain Allen, remembering a lecture about crater analysis and the size of crater a 175mm shell makes, screamed out. "Marines, get down low. Incoming 175s!"Schuster spoke into the receiver to the Fire Support Coordination Center. "Tell Romeo Papa and Charlie Charlie, add two hundred meters, fire for effect."

All of the 175s at The Rockpile and Camp Carroll opened up with their large, one hundred fifty pound rounds. The shells, their shriek faint at first, screamed loudly through the air and smashed into the area amidst the advancing NVA. The noise of the explosions was sudden, overwhelming and all consuming. The US Army's King of Battle had arrived.

Dirt, small boulders and tree trunks flew in all directions. The rounds exploded with devastating effect. Huge plumes of smoke and dirt and large geysers of water shot skyward. Hot shrapnel, spraying over a wide area, slammed against the edge of the cliff. The shock waves spread up and down the valley. The 175mm rounds arrived with an intensity that quickly overwhelmed the advancing NVA. There was no let-up. Twenty-four 175mm rounds total, in two volleys, all from the US Army firebases at The Rockpile and Camp Carroll, smashed into the area within a short time on both sides of the river where the NVA had been spotted.

The charging NVA horde was suddenly stopped. They did not press the attack. They retreated south across the Quang Tri River and disappeared into the tall elephant grass and the hills, leaving their dead and wounded behind.

Rounds from the Khe Sanh Combat Base continued to slam into the area. "Stanford Thirty-four, check fire. End of mission. I repeat. End of mission. Good shooting you guys, good shooting! Drinks on me. Thanks to Romeo Papa and Charlie Charlie. I have at least eight maybe ten dozen enemy KIA and many WIA. Oscar Six out."

Literally out of the blue, a new voice came on the radio. "Oscar Six, this is White Star Fifteen on scene overhead north of your position. See NVA retreating in open. Can coordinate direct fire from Romeo Papa and Charlie Charlie. Attack aircraft in area in one five minutes." Schuster looked to the skies but he saw nothing. Captain Allen took the receiver. He pressed the button on the microphone. "White Star Fifteen, Oscar Six. Be my guest. Hammer the bastards if you can see them. We can't see sierra."

The FAC – Forward Air Controller – banked his two-seater, single engine aircraft so he could get a good glimpse of the retreating NVA while staying clear of the gun-target line. He leveled out as he spoke into his mic to the Fire Direction Centers at The Rockpile and Camp Carroll.

"Romeo Papa Twenty-one and Charlie Charlie Niner, White Star Fifteen. NVA in retreat from Oscar Six position, in the open. One hundred left from last grid. Fire one shot, can adjust from altitude."

Two 175 mm shells, one each from The Rockpile and Camp Carroll, slammed into the south bank of the Quang Tri River. The FAC saw the impacts perfectly. White Star Fifteen added some power and banked his high-winged plane again to get a clear view. He reacted with adjusting fire instructions.

"Got it! Romeo Papa Twenty-one, left two hundred; Battery One, fire for effect. Charlie Charlie, adjust same. We got 'em on the run, boys. Oh, man, we really got the bastards. Crush 'em, guys. Aw, man, beautiful shooting. Shit hot." large 175mm shells fired from the long gun tubes many kilometers away flew through the air and, like meteorites, smashed into earth farther south of Captain Allen. The waves of explosions and resulting devastation tore up the countryside and shredded the NVA forces. Captain Allen smiled and then, out of nervous relief, laughed loudly.

The Forward Air Controller circled his Cessna observation plane around the besieged Marines. The pilot looked at the terrain around the two Marine Platoons. Craters were everywhere. "Oscar Six, This is White Star circling above. No sign of enemy. State status." "White Star, I have four KIAs and twenty WIAs, some very serious." "Roger that, Oscar Six, Can arrange chopper extraction. Two Sandy's and two A4s in area in one zero minutes for support. Repeat, can arrange extraction. Will remain on station. Stand by one. Changing channels."

Captain Allen's response was easy: acknowledgement and call sign. "Understand, Oscar Six." Two minutes passed. "Oscar Six, White Star Fifteen. Five 46s enroute your position for extraction to Kilo Sierra and Danang. On ground your position in zero two zero minutes. Will take KIAs and WIAs to Danang direct. Attack aircraft circling. Have called for more Alpha Charlie. Copy?" "White Star Fifteen, thanks for gettin' us outta here. We owe you a case of beer, my friend, courtesy the Marines." The pilot chuckled back. His voice was somewhat garbled by the sound of the plane's engine. One thing came out clear. "Make that vodka."

The two Marine platoons who had faced imminent destruction were now safe and soon to be extracted. The area, destroyed of all vegetation, cleared of smoke and dust. The enemy was vanquished. NVA bodies littered the area.

Captain Allen, a slight smile crossing his muddy face, laid his M16 across his left shoulder. He turned to look at his Forward Observer whose face and squinted eyes showed the anxiousness of the moment. Allen spoke rapidly. "Lieutenant Schuster, this was some bad shit today but we got through it. If you were scared, don't worry about it. I was scared shitless. We all were. But I'll tell you what.

The NVA learned a big lesson today." Schuster's face brightened up. Allen continued. "Lieutenant, I know you ain't been here long but you can be my FO anytime. I really appreciate that you were with us . . . and what you did today . . . for all of us. I'm gonna write a good report about today and your actions."

Captain Allen, Agostino, Lieutenant Schuster and Lieutenant Gerry Gifford and the others of the two platoons who had survived the attack by the North Vietnamese soldiers left the area by chopper. After hours of desperate fighting, almost hand-to-hand, the living but exhausted and bloodied Marines arrived at the Khe Sanh Combat Base and stepped from the helicopters onto the red soil.

Not long afterward, Gifford, with a few stitches on his face and a bandage covering the wound, held a can of hot Black Label beer that had been stolen from somewhere. A message on the back of the can read 'Do not consume after May 1967.'

Gifford stretched back against the sandbag wall of a crumpled lean-to. The sandbags that had been slashed open by shrapnel, their contents spilling onto the red clay. He laid his M16 and his M79 to the side and unlaced his boots and removed them. He pulled his wet, stinking socks from his swollen feet. He allowed his bruised and bleeding toes to feel the air and to dry in the hot sun. Gifford was exhausted, dirty and sweaty. He was not able to form cognitive thoughts.

He opened the can of Black Label with his fighting knife. Foam immediately erupted from the top of the can and sprayed him in the face. He laid his head back and poured the beer into his mouth. The hot, frothy taste, never appealed to him. At this moment, however, it was a welcome and pleasurable relief. Gifford savored it. Beer dribbled down his chin and neck and onto his shirt but he didn't care. He wiped his lips with his dirt and sweat-covered, salt-stained forearm before gulping the beer again. This time the beer frothed less. He could actually swallow some liquid. The inside of his mouth tingled from the hot but refreshing effervescence of the carbonated liquid.

"The Captain needs you, Giff, pronto." Gifford looked up. He shielded his eyes from the low sun with his forearm. It had been one hell of a long day. He saw Agostino looking at him. "Come on, Giff. Shit, man. Get your ass in gear. The Captain wants you now."
Gifford took in a deep breath and put on his socks and boots. He grabbed his M16 and M79 and stood. He followed Agostino, who said very little, as they walked to the Captain's hootch. Gifford didn't knock. He just went inside.

Captain Allen didn't bother to look up from a report he was reading. "You knocked out three mortars, right, Gifford? Eighty two millimeters, right? How many mortars total do you think, Lieutenant?" "Correct, Sir. I saw three – yes, all eighty-twos. I took them out. But there may have been five or six or more because it looked like they were still setting up. And after I took out the three I saw, mortar rounds were still coming in. So, there had to be several more mortars hidden somewhere, Sir." "What else did you see, Gifford?" "Two heavy machine guns, fourteen point fives, I think – I knocked one out – and some infantry in the bush." "How many NVA soldiers total do you think were out there?" "Not sure, Skipper, but when they opened up, it sounded like more than fifty, maybe sixty, or maybe even a hundred men." "Gifford, I think perhaps even more. Did you see any of them?" "Only some, Sir, but not close up. Not really, Sir. Sorry." "Lieutenant, I am thinking there may have been as many as five or six hundred NVA out there. The question is, why on the river and why so exposed?" "Not sure, Sir. Maybe they followed us and wanted to engage us openly and measure our strength."

"Shit, Gifford. If they had followed us, they would have known our strength. They weren't following us. They had another mission." Captain Allen lit a cigarette and inhaled. He drummed his fingers on the sheet of plywood that served as a makeshift table. "What's wrong, Sir?" Gifford asked. "Gifford, Giap hasn't attacked Khe Sanh like we think he will. Something is going on but we don't know what. Papers found on two of the bodies after today's engagement suggested they were from the PAVN 320th division." "Yes, Sir." "Gifford, we know the 320th is controlling the eastern sector of Highway Nine. We don't know where their headquarters are." Gifford looked at Allen quizzically. "Sir?" "Gifford, if Giap chose not to attack Khe Sanh and if he placed the 320th in the eastern sector far from Khe Sanh; first question. Why? Second question. Why did they send heavily armed soldiers back in the opposite direction in which they were originally sent? And third, why are they near Khe Sanh now?" "I wouldn't know, Sir."

Captain Allen inhaled on his cigarette and chuckled. "Gifford, we had one hell of a duel today. Man, we poured some bad-ass artillery fire into the middle of those shithead gooks, didn't we?" "Yes, Sir, once we finally made contact with Stanford. Chewed them up pretty good." "Lieutenant, if there were five hundred soldiers out there, or more, doesn't it strike you as odd that the NVA did not call in their own artillery on us first rather than risk their men?" "I never thought of it, Sir. I was too damned busy. I'm just happy to still be in one piece."

"That's all, Gifford. File a detailed report with intelligence. They want it ASAP. They need your account as soon as possible to corroborate with other reports." "Got it, Sir. Will do." "Get some rest, Giff. I'm sure as hell we will go out on patrol again within one or two days. My supposition is within one day. Take care of that wound. I'll need you on the next patrol."

Captain Allen paused as he looked at Gerry Gifford, then spoke again. "You done good today, Marine. I may as well tell you. You'll probably be gettin' some kind of medal. " "Thank you, Sir." "Oh, and Lieutenant, damn good arm. Where did you learn to throw like that?" Gifford grinned. "Phoenix, Arizona, Sir."

Gifford saluted, although he knew he didn't need to. He turned for the exit. "Gifford, something tells me we're going to be in the thick of things here in I Corps. This shit is just gonna to get worse. I think we're at Khe Sanh for the long haul."

REUNION REFLECTIONS

BY RON SHOUSE
BRAVO BTRY 1/13

This year's reunion sadly had to come to an end. I can only hope that the men, their wives, kids and guests had as much of a good time as my group did. I always try to speak to as many of the guys as possible as most of you know.

The night before our main group was going to Parris Island, Tom Keaton, Jerry Williams and Cliff Treese B 1/13 and Leroy Matlock E 2/26 decided they would leave early enough to attend Morning Colors. I do not know if it was anticipation or the excitement of what was about to happen, but none of them slept that night. We left the Marriot at 0600 and arrived at Base HQ Parris Island at 0745. It should have taken us only an hour but you have to forgive us we were in artillery and sometimes our sense of direction is off a little and we got lost.

Colors ceremony begin at 0800. Once the ceremony was completed (Fig # 1 back Page) we took pictures with personnel responsible for the color detail. (Fig # 2 Back Page) Afterwards we went to the Khe Sanh Memorial at the Rifle Range to take a few pictures. We had a picture of our group from the reunion held at Charleston several years ago before we lost Phil Mineer and Glenn Rappold and wanted to do an update. (Pictures On Back Covers)

We had a little ceremony and drank a toast to them and to men we lost so long ago. While standing there I saw a Drill Instructor close by and asked him if it would be all right for me to take my guys down to the Khe Sanh combat range for a few pictures. The range Gunnery Sergeant and after seeing who we were, told me to go, hang out but that the range would be going "HOT" in about an hour or so. We drove down to range office and all the instructors came out. We laughed and joked with Marines that are probably younger than our kids but what was really neat about it was these guys acted just like us. I mean, they were just like us. As we stood there a golf cart drove up. (Fig 4 Back Page)

A colonel got out and a Sergeant Major came up and joined in on the B/S formation. Several other officers came over when they found out we were

Khe Sanh Veterans. The Colonel turned out to be the Commanding Officer of the Weapons Battalion and the Sergeant Major was the Weapons Battalion Sergeant Major. He said "would you guys like to stay on the firing line and watch the recruits go through a simulated casualty extraction drill?" Unreal… The recruits would come across a clearing of about 200 or so yards, then fall down behind cover, simulate firing, jump up move forward to another position and repeat this probably 8 to 10 times, before running to the firing line to actually live fire at "pop up" targets. After firing, the Squad leader would then run them to the "casualty" where they would get him out of field of fire for medical attention. This is part of the "Crucible". (See Pictures On Back Covers)

I know this sounds easy but these kids had packs and other gear on, running full bore and all of my guys were dripping wet with sweat so these kids must have really been hot and it was probably taking a lot out of them. The instructor stopped one group and told them who we were and that the training they were receiving was because of us. That made us all kind of choke up. The Commanding Officer and Sergeant Major gave us a Challenge coin from Weapons Battalion and we returned the favor by giving 1 or 2 of ours. I will return to the Island and make sure that all personnel who gave us this experience, receive one from the organization. Before we left the range, the instructors had us "Police up some Brass" for souvenirs. I could not believe our good fortune that day.

On a different note, Cliff Treese met a gentleman in Melbourne, Florida that made plaques of various subjects and had him make one of our Battery Sign for the guys in Bravo Battery. When we were walking around Savannah, we stopped at a little bar to have lunch and met Captain Jason Henesie, an Army Chaplain stationed at Fort Bragg, and his fiancé. They joined our little group for lunch and we invited them to come over to the Marriott to meet some of the Men from the Khe Sanh Reunion. The Captain and his Lady forgive me, I have forgotten her name just hung out for a while and remarked how great it was that there was still so much fellowship between the men after all these years. We told them that we shared a bond that is hard to explain to non-members. Cliff had an extra plaque of our Unit and he presented it to the Captain who now displays it in his office at Fort Bragg. Oh to be a fly on the wall to hear some of the good natured ribbing he must be taking from the Army personnel.

Ron Continues:

Every year at this time, Tom Keaton, Jerry Williams and I get together at our property in Mt Airy NC for a little fellowship. We usually end up taking a trip to Camp Lejeune to shop at the PX or commissary or visit some friends at the 10th Marines. Our primary purpose this year was to present a Statue of St Barbara to the Regiment. Liberty call had been sounded for the long 4th of July weekend around 1300 that afternoon and there was only the OD, his driver and clerk on duty. (See Pictures Back Covers)

We informed the Warrant Officer who we were and wanted to leave the statue on the Master Gunnery Sergeant's desk for a little surprise for him, when he came back on Monday. He was gracious and allowed us to do it. (Fig 6) Just outside of HQ of the 10th Marines is the Gun Park. There is some of the weaponry we used in the Nam. There is a 4 deuce Mortar, 155 SP, 155 towed, an 8 inch gun, several pieces from Korea, a howitzer, and a 75 pack howitzer and of course several 105's. Brought back some memories for all of us. We spent the night at the BOQ Hospital Point now called the on base motel before heading back to Winston Salem the next morning.

The primary purpose of our little yearly get together is to remember the guys that we lost in the Nam and the ones that have reported to the Supreme Commandant since our return. Promptly at 1400 on July 4th we assemble at Mineer Park on the "Last Firebase". The program is short, usually about 20 to 25 minutes, and consists of a drink of Rum poured in a Marine Corps Shot Glass and the names of our departed spoken, starting with the ones we lost in Nam, not necessarily just at Khe Sanh, and then poured for them on the Memorial. After all names of men to be remembered, those of us in attendance will toast them either by the rum or the drink of their choice. Most will use the rum as that was the drink of choice of Philip Mineer for which this park is named. Before we dismiss the ceremony, we ask if someone in attendance has anything to say and then close with a prayer. Afterwards there is usually a few tears, but they are good tears of remem-

By about 1530, everyone has migrated to my place to sit in the cool, eat, drink and talk of the time when we were all a bunch of invincible heroes. The crowd starts to disperse around 1800, I think we get tired of each other, but it is getting close to "lights out" and all us old guys need to hit the rack because 0530 comes early.

Every year our numbers are getting smaller and it seems the younger generation is starting to become more interested in what we did and the places we were. My grandchildren asked if I would take them to Washington DC and the Marine Corps Museum. They wanted to visit the WALL, go to the Evening Parade at Marine Barracks and see the IWO JIMA statue. If you look in a history book that our kids study in the schools, there will be little, if anything, of what our generation did. There will be very little mention of the Korean War and WW11. I feel if we do not tell them of the horrors of war that they will never understand just how bad it can be, so whenever a young person asks me about the Nam I talk to them. Of course there are questions I do not wish to answer and will tell them so but anything I think they might learn something from, I talk about. Gentlemen, when a young person asks you a question, take time to talk to them and when they say to you "Thank you for serving" it will all seem worth the trouble.

CONTINUING MEMORIES

Gentlemen, when we all visited that fabulous vacation land back in our younger days, I always thought that there must have been a Guardian Angel looking over me. It turns out that there was. Her name is Saint Barbara. She is the Patron Saint of all the Artillery.

On a recent trip to Camp LeJeune, aka Camp Swampy, or Swamp Lagoon as you may remember, I had the privilege of meeting Master Gunnery Sergeant John Locke, Master Gunnery Sergeant of the 10th Marine Regiment. He invited my wife Lynn and me to attend the annual "St Barbara Celebration" of the 10th Marines. At the time I had no idea what an honor it would turn out to be.

It was a formal affair, with all the Staff NCO's and Officers in Dress Blues and the wives in gowns. These men asked questions about Nam and we talked about details of the Khe Sanh experience. I had never really thought about it but these guys informed me that we were actually in a firefight with the NVA artillery. Wow, did not see that coming and I guess that is the first time since I got back that I truly felt we were appreciated.

We arrived at the Hilton Double Tree on Atlantic Beach, North Carolina around 1700 and were promptly escorted to the VIP Bar. This was bad. Free Beer for me and wine for the wife. We chatted with the upper crust of Division and I must say these men really made me feel welcome. When Tom Keaton and Jerry Williams came to the annual Bravo Battery get together at our property, located just outside of Mt. Airy, N. C. called "The Last Firebase" last summer, I took them down to meet these men. They were invited to attend the celebration, but were unable to do so because of prior obligations. After a few Beers we went in for dinner and had some entertaining skits about the history of Artillery, a speech by the former 10th Marines Commanding Officer, Colonel Gobar with the evening culminated with "mixing of Marine Corps Grog" and appropriate toasts being made. Several of the Staff NCO's were awarded the "Order of Saint Barbara" Medallion. There is also an award given to the ladies of our Artillery Family called the "Order of Molly Pitcher".

Of course there was music for dancing after the program but I spent the rest of the evening talking with the various dignitaries. I was asked if terminology that is used today in the Artillery Vocabulary was anything like what we used back then. Absolutely. Their missions may not have as many rounds fired as we did and their "GUNS" are a little different from what we used but it is still the same. It was really refreshing to speak with someone who actually knew what I was talking about when I spoke of Powder Charges, Deflections, Quadrants, Direct Fire and Shifting Zone Missions and the like. So gentlemen, I guess what I am trying to tell you is if you have access to a Military Installation, regardless of the branch, take a trip/tour and talk to the younger generation that are serving now. They are probably better educated than we were but they will still ask your thoughts and opinions of current events and ask for a little history of the places we were and things we did. Was a really gratifying experience. Cannot wait to do it again. One final side note, I did make a donation for a beer blast for the men of the 10th Marines. Semper Fi

On Sunday morning Lynn and I headed south to Myrtle Beach to spend the night at our beach house before heading to Parris Island on Tuesday. After checking in at the Osprey Inn, I walked up to the Parade Deck to watch the new Marines practice for graduation and I must say they really looked sharp. It is hard to believe that we looked that squared away almost 50 years ago. Where has the time gone? After some shopping at the PX and a lot of reminiscing, it was back on the road again heading to Melbourne, Florida and the annual Viet Nam Vets Reunion at Wickham Park.

Lynn and I arrived at the home of Cliff and Linda Treese, another "Bravo Brother" on Wednesday afternoon. After chatting a while and going out to dinner, Cliff and I decided to ride up to the Reunion. There are plenty of exhibits of the things we carried and used when we were in the Nam. The "TRAVELLING WALL" was there, along with the "WALL" for the Men lost in Iraq and Afghanistan from the state of Florida and also the "DOG WALL" remembering the War Dogs that were lost in the big sandbox. There was live music by a local DJ, "Doc Holiday" that was actually a crewman on a B 52, a lot of camaraderie, a few tears, souvenirs and of course a Beer Garden. There was also a landing of a Chopper. When the guys heard that "Whop Whop Whop" of those blades, cheers went up and there was a mass migration to where it would land. It came in and you could see those circles of dust on both sides of the bird. The guys could not wait to touch it and have a picture made beside it. Was a sight to see and still brings a tear to the eye.

On Saturday afternoon all the Marines gather in front of the stage, for the annual "Charge up the Hill" and sing the "Marine Corps Hymn". The hill is a grueling trek of almost 25 yards at about a 10 degree grade and most of us were exhausted but still managed to sing the Hymn. Probably should have been recorded for sales later as it was really a good rendition. After about the 3rd time, it really started to sound That was probably the highlight of the event because all the guys were cheering and laughing and it really brought back some memories of our younger years. Some good and alas some bad.

If anyone should be interested in attending the event you can go online under Florida Viet Nam Vets and get some info about next years' program. This program is free to the public. It is kid friendly and is encouraged. I saw some dogs but because of amount of people attending that may be frowned upon. There is no cost for anything, other than souvenirs, food and drink. I am sure that donations can be made to defray costs of the Moving Wall but are made directly to the Brevard County Viet Nam Veterans Association. LEGEND OF SAINT BARBARA
B/1/13

According to legend, our patron saint was the beautiful daughter of Dioscorus, a nobleman of the Roman Empire, believed to have lived in Nicomedia in Asia Minor in the third or fourth century, A.D. Because of her beauty and fearful that she would be demanded in marriage and taken from him, to limit Barbara's exposure to Christianity and encourage her development as a zealous pagan, her father kept her shut up in a tower. But even such incarceration could not keep the young woman from becoming a Christian. From her window, she looked out upon the surrounding countryside and marveled at the living things. She concluded they all must be part of a master plan and the idols of wood and stone her parents worshipped had to be condemned as false. She received instruction in Christianity and was baptized.

Shortly before embarking on a journey, Dioscorus commissioned a sumptuous bathhouse to be built for her, approving the design before he left. The bathhouse was to be lighted by only two windows. However in token of her faith while her father was away, she had another window pierced in the tower making three, symbolizing the Holy Trinity. Upon his return, Dioscorus asked why she had made this change, and Barbara acknowledged her conversion. Despite his threats, she refused to renounce Christianity. Dioscorus flew into a rage and dragged her before the local prefect who ordered her death. The evil Dioscourus tortured his daughter, then took her to a high mountain where she was beheaded. Afterward, as he descended the mountain, he was caught in a sudden violent storm, struck down and consumed by the lightening. Only his scorched sword remained as a reminder of God's vengeance.

As a logical consequence, Barbara came to be regarded as the sainted Patroness of those in danger from thunderstorms, fire, explosions, that is to say, sudden death. Given the questionable reliability of early cannon misfires, muzzle bursts and exploding weapons were not uncommon, it is easy to see why our predecessors sought the protection of Saint Barbara. She has protected us well ever since.

Saint Barbara is usually represented standing by a tower with three windows, carrying a palm of a martyr in her hand. She is often viewed standing by a cannon or holding a chalice and sacramental wafer.

ARTILLERY ORDER OF MOLLY PITCHER

The Artillery Order of Molly Pitcher is a military society that occupies a central position in the traditions of the United Sates Field Artillery. Its membership is limited to those women whose service to the Field Artillery Community exemplifies the spirit of sacrifice and devotion of Molly Pitcher. The award recognizes these women for voluntary contributions that perpetuate the essence and significance of Molly Pitcher.

The story of Milly Pitcher is about an artillery wife, Mary Ludwig Hays (better known as Molly Pitcher) who shared the rigors of Valley Forge with her husband, John Hays. It was at the Battle of Monmouth (28 June 1778) that she gained fame. That day was as hot as the valley had been cold that legendary winter. With water to cool the hot guns and quench the thirst of the men essential, Mary Ludwig Hays earned her nickname by bringing pitcher after pitcher of refreshing water to the parched troops. While carrying out these duties, she saw a wounded Continental soldier and carried him on her back to the rear, out of reach of hard charging British. Back at the cannon, she saw her husband fall wounded. Without hesitation, she stepped forward and took the rammer staff from his hands, resolutely staying at her post while facing heavy enemy fire and ably acting as a gunner. For her heroic role, General Washington himself issued her a warrant as a non-commissioned officer. Thereafter she was widely hailed as "Sergeant Molly". A flagstaff and cannon stand at her gravesite at Carlisle, Pennsylvania. A sculpture on the battle monument commemorates her courageous deed.

VIETNAM MARINE FROM BENSALEM HONORED DURING BRIDGE RE-DEDICATION

by Cpl. Matt Myers

BENSALEM, Pa. — On June 22, 1968, American service members in Vietnam were engaged in the Tet Offensive. Marines from 2nd Battalion, 4th Marine Regiment, were providing covering fire from the top of Hill 512 near Khe Sanh as Marines below them were fighting their way into the enemy perimeter. During that time, the Marines on Hill 512 attracted a large enemy artillery assault. That artillery barrage left some Marines wounded and others killed in action. One of those Marines killed was 18 -year-old Private First Class Neil William Weintraub. To honor the Bensalem, Pennsylvania, native,

Neil Weintraub rests on the side of The PFC Neil William Weintraub Memorial Bridge where it is mounted. The bridge was re-dedicated to Weintraub on Nov. 14, in Bensalem,The bronze plaque honoring Private First Class Pa. The ceremony was held to remember PFC Neil William Weintraub, a Marine who was killed in action during the Vietnam War on top of Hill 512 near Khe Sanh. (U.S. Marine Corps Courtesy Photo/Released) in 1969 a bridge in his hometown was named, 'The PFC Neil William Weintraub Memorial Bridge.' Recently, when the bridge was closed down to be worked on, some concerned citizens took action to ensure it was re-dedicated upon its opening

"When we heard the bridge was closed, Neil's friend George Delia, who is a Vietnam combat veteran, contacted Lee Cannon, who is also a Vietnam combat veteran, and me," said Brenda Hecklin, one of the event organizers. "He wanted to have a re-dedication ceremony for him so he could honor his service and sacrifice. It was important to us because it was the only bridge that crossed over the Pennsylvania Turnpike named for a veteran, so by extension it also honors all veterans."

On Nov. 14, more than 250 family, friends and community members gathered for the ceremony. Fire engines from the Union and Nottingham Fire Departments flanked the bridge with their ladders raised while Newport Fire Department members rendered their salutes. Bagpipes played, followed by an official Marine Corps Color Guard presentation of the Colors and the playing of the National Anthem.

Speeches were given by family members and state officials, after which there was a fly over of an U.S. Coast Guard HH-65 Dolphin helicopter and a 21 gun salute

He will never be forgotten," said Hecklin, a Montgomery County, Pennsylvania native. "This bridge keeps his memory alive, and stands as a symbol of remembrance to all who see it."

BURNS YOU UP YOU SAY T-BONE"

Dennis and Dan'l: I thought I flew in to Khe Sanh on May 11th - my Brother's BD. But I obviously was wrong all these years (shut up Dennis!) because I went in two days before 1/26 got there so maybe May 9th. I was pulled off Bravo Co. outside of Phu Bai on security for some road construction after leaving Hill 55. Some Sgt. from Naranga Florida an 81's FO came over and said you are leaving with me. He said there were no 81's FO's left alive at Khe Sanh after the Hill Fights and we were going TAD to Khe Sanh. Flew in and sat in a bunker for two days along the airstrip waiting for orders to do what???? Nobody ever told that Sgt. what to do so we just sat there picking our noses. Cannot remember the Sgt's name and it is still a mystery to me what we were doing there. The one thing I do remember was seeing some of the Marines come in off of 881 and that scared the snot out of me! Now Dennis I was not as smart as you (that's a compliment you smart ass...) so when I hit Hill 55 they issued me a 45 because I was a radioman and I didn't need a rifle. After I got out of the hospital after getting blown away on Route 9 (7-21-67) I went to the armorer at KSCB and said I WANT a rifle... NO 45! After showing him the scar from the gunshot in my neck and the shrapnel holes in my pelt; he did give me a M-16. Oh what a piece of crap that was. Until the grunts in Bravo showed me how to figure it out. That rifle was as first issued a piece of junk and many men lost their lives from jamming even after the hill fights!! Semper Fi Boys and it still burns me up to this day.

ROGER ERICKSON: HELL AND BACK

By Matt Warshaw

KSV IN THE NEWS

New Year's Resolution, 2016: Stop making lists. Like this one. Or this. And especially this! Silly little look-at-me clickbait trifles. But to give up listing will take grit and discipline and resolve. I know this because, for the past week, since making the the Roger Erickson clip you see above, I've felt compelled — nay, obligated — to draw up a "10 Coolest Surfers" list so I can put Roger in the top spot and feel the righteousness of having this laudable but obscure man out in front of Lopez, Curren, Edwards and every other platinum-level-cool petitioner (Including, yes, Barry Kanaiaupuni, a man I once cited with total conviction as the "coolest surfer ever." Do I contradict myself? Very well, then. I contradict myself).

For the moment, I will resist the urge to list by reprinting, in abridged form, "Roger's Got Wild Eyes," Derek Hynd's masterful 1988 SURFER profile on a man known to big-wave heavies at the time as the King of Waimea. Read and be amazed.

Tom Carroll returned home two seasons ago from Hawaii with a ginger-colored beard. "Just like Roger Erickson's," as Tom put it. It smacked of hero worship. The beard came off after a week of sloppy surf, but the intrigue remained.

Last winter, walking into the Sunset Store on Oahu, I saw that Roger Erickson had signed a one-man protest next to his name on the list of Eddie Aikau Invitational invitees, pledging $15,000 to charity if he won. I'd already heard stories, opinions and predictions about him—some good, some strange. No one really knows how he operated so powerfully on his own. Then, a big moment.

Roger was running on the soft sand between Rocky Point and Pipeline, when he angled up to the Pupukea deck that held Flippy Hoffman, Fred Van Dyke and myself. Thundery things filled me, in the face of a man who looked so nice, yet so deadly. He was 41, with a gladiator's build, but his eyes had it all: life, death, and wisdom. Here was power, in mind and body. A defined human being. We met. Suddenly, I wanted a beard.

Playa del Rey, Los Angeles. Summer of '65. "It was the best year of my life. Everything was coming together: a year out of high school, double-dating at the drive-in, racing at Lyon's Drag Strip, surfing and hanging out on the beach—all that stuff. In '66, it all fell apart." Roger pauses. "I joined the Marines to avoid being conscripted. I didn't want bad training if I was going to Vietnam."

Fresh out of boot camp, Roger married his high school love, and honeymooned in Hawaii. "Just me and my girl, living at Rocky Point. I surfed big Sunset and Waimea, and she was there when I got out." Two weeks after that, Roger sailed out of San Diego in early morning darkness. "I remember looking over the railing of the boat, smoking my bowl of pot, thinking, 'Man, what am I doing?' I'd just left my whole life behind. I actually thought about jumping off."

On February 6, 1967, he entered another world. Da Nang fist, then southwest to Hill 55. On the way, a sniper nearly picked Roger off. It got him excited. He volunteered to go on point. Nobody did that. On quiet nights, Roger thought about the beauty in everything he saw, and thought about his recent past. "I knew better, but at times it was all so serene out there. And with emotions running through you, you're trying to relate to your life back home, and for me it was . . . 'What's she doing now? What is she doing now?' That was my overriding emotion all through Vietnam."

Roger's squad was under fire and in retreat, up by Hill 55. "A bullet came so close to my head that I felt it pass, and at that point I got so focused returning fire that I lost track of time. When I finally turned around, everyone was gone. It was just me. I saw movement, and retreated through the field, started running, and a mortar landed between my legs. It didn't go off."

Another time, Roger saved the life of a friend who'd tripped a mine. Roger was injured as well, but not as badly. He dove on his burning friend, smothered the fire, then collapsed. Earned himself a Bronze Star.

The war just kept coming. Out of the infirmary, Roger was airlifted straight to Khe Sanh. It was quiet when he arrived, but was soon to become one of the heaviest battlefields in military history, with Roger in the middle. Everything was chance, from taking a shit, to sleeping, to going on point. It rained two days out of five. Jungle rot was everywhere, and plagues of mosquitoes descended and devoured. He was truly in hell now, and interest began to fade. His own description: "I was a walking zombie."

Late in '67, Roger got his R&R pass, along with malaria. By the time he arrived back at Da Nang for the trip to Hawaii, he was nothing but shakes, sweats, and chills. "Somehow I hid my condition, because I didn't want to get put in the hospital again. As soon as we got to Honolulu, I jumped the first plane home."

Back in Playa del Rey, everything had changed. Incredibly, just 10 months had passed since he'd left. Roger was 21. He spent five days in town, three of them in bed. People avoided him. The word went something like, "Roger's back from Vietnam, and he's twisted." He smelled like the bush, and looked out of his mind. His wife had split, hippied out in paisley and granny glasses. "It didn't matter by that point. The way I figured it, I was going back in at Khe Sanh, and wouldn't be coming out. You can't imagine how sick I was at that point—in every way."

After returning to Da Nang, Roger spent a month in the hospital, and then sure enough was ordered to Khe Sanh—where the hell he'd experienced before soon expanded tenfold. After walking in the jungle for two days on patrol, Roger was on his way back to camp when the North Vietnamese launched the Tet Offensive. The world had never seen a battle like it. Hill 881 was no more, and Khe Sanh became the most crater-ridden location in history. Survival itself was a ridiculous longshot. Survival followed by a return to normalcy was a complete impossibility.

Playa del Rey. Summer of '68. "I was the decorated Vietnam Marine, back in town, and I was meant to set a good example. I surfed, but basically I was racing bikes. My forte was going as fast as I could. I remember flying down Imperial, near LAX. The police were on me, and that got me all jazzed. I had a couple of outstanding tickets, and no license, so I went for it. Here come the sirens, and all I could think of was, 'Wow, unreal! If I get through the tunnel up there, I can escape.' But they ran me down on the curve past the tunnel. I took the corner so fast—had my back wheel on the edge of the gutter, riding out the curve. They threw me in jail for two weeks."

By 1969, Roger had a dark reputation around town. The full impact of Vietnam had still not been felt in America, and any veteran who opened his mouth against what was happening was a Commie-lover. Few civilians saw the vets' point of view, or knew of their problems.

Roger went deeper into his Easy Rider mode. At a Venice Beach concert that year, he saw an old biker getting billy-clubbed by several policeman. "I saw a friend in trouble, and starting running over. Hands down, totally passive, just wanted to try and settle things down. One of the cops saw me coming, and next thing the club was coming down on my head, then I'm fighting five or six of them." Roger went to court, refused to plea-bargain, argued self-defense, and got a 10-month prison term for his troubles. Out in late 1970, he got into it with five bikers at a party in the middle of L.A.. One of them had a baseball bat. A busted arm and a fractured skull for Roger, and thereafter his involvement with bikers was terminated.

I learned all of this during a chess game with Roger, not long after we met. He wasn't proud of his past. As Roger saw it, he'd had a destiny until Vietnam ripped it away. Not until the mid-'70s was he able to think about the future, and a challenge relative to Vietnam—a fresh test of mind and body, but this time by his own choice, on his own terms.

Roger knows the limits of human endurance in more ways than any other surfer. As he laid my king over on the chessboard, he slowly said that the flashpoint of his memory was no longer Khe Sanh. Now it was that afternoon in 1976, when he was a link in the human chain that saved big-wave surfer Kimo Hollinger from drowning during a huge swell at Waimea. As outstretched hands met, the point of contact burned into Roger's soul: the difference between life and death.

Roger Erickson had a new destiny. He bought Kimo's board.

FROM JIM CROW TO KHE SANH: AN AIRMAN'S HISTORIC JOURNEY

By J.B. SMITH

For nearly half a century, retired Lt. Col. Allen Smith kept his place in history locked inside a briefcase, alongside medals and photos.

His story as a pioneer in the integration of the U.S. Air Force and his life as an officer in the Korean and Vietnam wars has emerged only this year, after a look inside that briefcase led his son to piece it together.

At 86, Smith finally is sharing his stories of fighting for his comrades and for their respect.

As a young black man, Smith enlisted in the Air Force shortly after the outbreak of the Korean War in 1950, one year after the Air Force announced that it would be the first branch of the military to end racial segregation.

The all-black Tuskegee Airmen had recently won fame for their prowess in World War II, dispelling doubts military leaders had long expressed about the valor and fitness of blacks.

"I joke with my dad about the Tuskegee Airmen," said Michael Smith, Allen Smith's son, who now cares for him in their home in Elm Mott. "I said, Dad, which is harder, to graduate from an all-black flight school or be the only black in an all-white flight school?" "Being in an all-white school," his father answered with a chuckle

DISTINGUISHED CAREER

In his career training among white cadets and later leading mostly white airmen, Smith did more than survive. He served as an intelligence officer with high-security clearances in Korea, then led the transport of bombs and planes across the U.S. Ultimately, he would play a prominent role in extricating Marines from the siege at Khe Sanh during the Vietnam War.

Through it all, he kept the words of his father in his mind.

"My dad told me, 'You can do anything you put your mind to,' " Allen Smith said.

He believed that sentiment, as unrealistic as it might have appeared for a black child growing up in cotton fields of Mississippi in the 1940s.

Smith's father was an unschooled sharecropper with 13 children, and he lived in a time and place where racial inequality was rigorously enforced.

But he saw promise in the boy and put him in charge of driving cotton to market and checking the price to make sure it was favorable. Smith graduated as valedictorian from an all-black high school in Edwards, Mississippi, and came to Texas when he was recruited by a coach at Prairie View A&M University.

"My mom put my clothes in an old trunk, and she said, 'You know we don't have any money, so when you get to Prairie View, you put your trunk in the employment line,' " Smith recalls. "Before I even enrolled, I got a job busing dishes."

When Smith graduated in 1950, he married a classmate, Lorraine, in her hometown of Waco, and she got a job as a nurse. But by then, the Korean War had begun, and Smith went to enlist so he wouldn't be drafted. He went to basic training at Lackland Air Force Base in San Antonio.

President Harry S. Truman had signed an executive order on July 29, 1948, calling for racial equality in the Armed Forces, but it was greeted with resistance and foot-dragging. The following day, Army Chief of Staff Gen. Omar N. Bradley stated desegregation would come to the Army only when it became a fact in the rest of American society.

Air Force historian Rudy Purificato, curator of Lackland's Airman Heritage Museum, said the Tuskegee example had helped the way for the Air Force's integration. Still, he said, "it wasn't a quick process," and racial biases still persisted.

Purificato said Smith would have been among a "handful" of blacks who trained at Lackland in the early 1950s.

After basic training, Smith taught white cadets in Wyoming to read, then was accepted for officer's candidate school back at Lackland.

Smith said his treatment by cadets and officers at

Allen Smith began his 30-year Air Force career in 1950 at the beginning of the integration of the Armed Forces. He retired as a lieutenant colonel with experience in the Korean and Vietnam Wars.

Lackland was "excellent," and he served as class leader. But he often had to stay at the barracks when others took their leisure time in the segregated city.
"There were times I couldn't go with my classmates," he said. "I knew it, and they knew it. But I never had any confrontation with the authorities."

But he had a close call with those authorities. Once

Rod Aydelotte Allen Smith's son and daughter-in-law made this display this spring after discovering photos, medals and documents from his distinguished career in the Air Force.

he drove back from Waco with a white classmate and was 10 minutes late getting to his class. A guard noted it and wouldn't let it slide.
"It was an offense that could have washed me out completely," Smith recalls. He said his punishment was to walk the track with a weapon for 24 hours.

After Smith's service as an intelligence officer in Korea, he shipped to flight school at a small airport in Bartow, Florida. At one point, when he was in danger of flunking, a white officer named Maj. Ralph Bradley took an interest in him. The two went up in a small plane, and Bradley had Smith cut the engine, then restart. After some maneuvers, the officer told Smith to head back to the airport.

"He said, 'Smith, there's nothing wrong with your flying, and you're going to graduate with your class,' " Smith recalls.

Smith learned to fly big cargo planes at a Texas Air Force base and was promoted to captain. Then he was transferred to Travis Air Force Base in California, where he found a racial tolerance he had never known.
"Even though I was the only black captain, it was different altogether," he said. "I was considered just another person doing a job, which made me feel real good."

MISSILE MISSION

In 1959, Smith was commander of a mission to ship a Titan missile from California to Florida. He recalls that the white crew on the tarmac in Florida was stunned when he walked out in his captain's stripes.

An officer at the rural Florida base offered to drive him to a segregated motel, separate from the rest of his crew. Smith said he made his position clear.

"I said, 'Sir, we fly together, we eat together, we sleep together and sir, we die together,' " Smith said. " 'If I don't stay with my crew tonight, this missile will go back to Southern California.' "
And so the men stayed together that night.

Smith got his master's degree in business in 1965, and in 1967 he was deployed to the rapidly escalating Vietnam War. He said bullets were flying when he stepped off the plane.

As chief of tactical operations for the 315th Air Commando at Phan Rang Air Force Base, he was in charge of 25 C-123 planes. In early 1968, he was ordered to send his planes to help extricate some of the 5,000 Marines stranded at Khe Sanh, which was under siege by thousands of Viet Cong who were encamped in the surrounding hills.

He said two of his planes loaded with Marines were shot down as they attempted to take off from Khe Sanh. He told his other pilots to circle in a holding pattern until he gave further commands.

Smith said a general got on the radio and confronted him about why he was not following the orders to evacuate.

"I said, 'I've already lost two. I'm not going to lose any more,' " Smith recalls. He said planes landed after the Viet Cong forces were beaten back.

Smith left Vietnam in November 1968, his brain still burning with images he saw there. He remembers seeing bodies of supposedly dead American soldiers piled like cordwood against a wall but hearing moaning from one of the men saying, "Help me! Help me!"

He said those experiences were too difficult to talk about, so he snapped his briefcase shut and put it all behind him.

"I had never seen anything like that before," Smith said.

He resumed his military career in data development in the U.S. and later worked as a Veterans Affairs adjudicator in Waco, retiring in 1985.

OLD MEMORIES (Good or Bad)ARE NOT EASILY FORGOTTEN

The Poilane family was and still is an integral part of the history of Khe Sanh. The Poilanes and Khe Sanh vets share a common connection -- the land. They were digging into the red soil at Khe Sanh long before the first American forces ever set foot in that place, and their dependence on that soil was their livelihood as they farmed acres and acres of coffee tress. Unlike the Poilane family, our dependence on the soil wasn't our livelihood; it was our life! For us, it was simply a matter of survival as we dug down into it. Through the use of the internet and a friend of a friend, Dennis Mannion in October of 2014 was able to locate the two Poilane children -- now adults in their 50's -- living outside of Paris with children of their own. Through emails he has remained in contact with Francoise and Jean-Marie, and in January of this year he posted a long message on the board (including photos) that generated a lot of commentary and remembrances. Recently, at the urging of the Dennis and the president of the Khe Sanh Veterans, Jean Marie went on line and posted a message of his own to all of us. In a magical and heartwarming way, he and his sister are family and one of us. So, many of you now have an additional brother & sister in your lives.

For those members who are unaware of the Poilane's history at Khe Sanh, I am posting the recent emails and history of the Poilane family which originally appeared in the Red Clay Magazine, which were Written by Madeleine Poilane.

FROM OUR WEBSITE:

Many of you -- and some of you more than me -- have a memory or had a personal contact with the Poilane family during your KS days -- pre-siege. Felix and his wife Madeleine were owners of the largest coffee plantation at Khe Sanh. They had two children: Francoise and her younger brother Jean-Marie. The entire family was forced to leave everything when the siege began, and the Marines flew them to Saigon. Felix died in the crash of a C-130 on the KS runway on his return to KS 13April68. Madeleine took her two children to France and raised them there. To my knowledge she never returned to Vietnam. She is now deceased...some years back...cancer I was told.

Nick Romanetz (C/1/26) took the left photo above while on patrol just before or after Xmas 67. I too had seen Françoise on similar patrol by her house just before that Xmas. I waved to her as I walked past, and she smiled and waved back. I've never forgotten that -- a kid's smile just before all the madness ensued.

At the Nashville reunion a few years ago, I was telling that story (about Nick and my patrols) and I had Nick's photo on my laptop. A gentleman near my table overheard, and he came over and said that he was not a member of the KS vets but he lived in the Nashville area and had heard about the reunion. Turns out, he was a Green Beret in the early 60's, and he was at KS in 1964 when there were only 8 Americans there -- his team. He said that they were in and out of the Polaine home all the time. He supplied me with the photo (upper right) taken in either '64 or '65.

In the last few years, I was able to track down the Polaine "kids" both now living near Paris. Jean-Marie and I are in email contact from time to time and for the first time ever, Françoise herself wrote back to me even though she had been copied on all my emails to her brother.

We all have our memories (and our pain) from those years....so do the Poilane kids, but life continues to move forward and we all forward-on, like it or not. I hope this makes you smile.

The little boy grew up. S/F Dennis

Latest emails: Jean-Marie on 5 Jan:
Hi Dennis, Thanks for this kind message and the photos, you have a beautiful family.

Yes in France we are still under the shock of the terrorist attack in November. It was horrible and now situation is tense in the country. Thanks also for speaking of your time in Vietnam and of us to students. My family and I are healthy and happy - I send you a photo taken on Christmas day. Warmest regards.
Jean-Marie

Françoise on 10 January:
Hello thank you for the mail and happy new year also for you and all of your family, i hope all is ok for you. All is ok for us, we are living near Paris but were not in Paris in November, it was terrible. kind regards
Francoise

Jean-Marie
Françoise is 55, married and also have 2 children. My sister and I would like to post a message on this site. First to thank you all, and especially Dennis Mannion who could contact me in the end of 2014 after long searches to find Françoise and me. I think most of you know his story and how he saw Françoise in December 1967. To summarize it briefly, Dennis was in a patrol and returned back when he saw our house - an European building - and my sister (she was 8) sitting in front of the house. He was surprised to see this in the heart of VN. He waved my sister with his hand and she waved back. He took a picture but after he thought he had dreamt all this. But it was not a dream and Dennis has this moment since living deeply in his memory. He could retrieve who we were and learned a part of our story. Dennis sent us the 2 photos (our house and the one with Françoise) taken by Nick Romanetz and also another one taken in 1964/65 by a US Army Green Beret with all the 4 of us (my parents, my sister and me). So thanks a lot to Nick Romanetz and to the Green Beret - unfortunately I do not know his name, maybe someone knows ?These 3 photos are a treasure for Françoise and me. Moreover they are in colors - in the 60s in France we had only black and white and color photos were very rare. I asked to a photograph to work on it in order to enhance if possible and develop these photos. Now in my living room I have the one with the 4 or us and sent the one with Françoise to er. Recently my wife made me a surprise. She asked a friend, who has some talent in painting, to paint a drawing from the photo of our house. When it was done my wife gave it to me as a present. When I left VN after the tragic death of my father in April 68, I was only 5 and did not have any remembering of our house. My sister was 8 and she remembered the house. So it is very precious for us.

I would like to thank also Reverend Ray W Stubbe who was chaplain of the Marines in Khe Sanh and who met and knew my parents. Ray stayed in contact by postal mail with my mother and she sent him her writing on her memories about her life in VN. Ray could make it translate in English and share through veterans' associations. Ray could find me also, after the death of my mother in 2007 and kindly sent me his last writing « Pebbles in my boots volume 3.

Our story in VN began with my grandfather Eugène Poilane. Eugène was born in 1888 in a small village (near Angers a city in the center of France). He came in VN around 1908 as a soldier, he signed to serve in French army and Vietnam was belonging to France as a colony. Eugène was a self made man and showed some capacity in botanic. He was remarked by a botanist who learned him the basis. Eugène was passioned by this and was a great searcher in plants - in his life he discovered the flora of the whole Indo-China and picked up and sent more than 40 000 plant's specimen to the French Museum of botanic (the average for a « normal » searcher is 7000/8000). At the end of his life he had a « laboratory garden » very famous, the president of South VN visited it.

He came back to France to find a wife a got married in 1921. They returned to Vietnam just after and had 3 children (my father Felix was the youngest, born in 1931). Eugène divorced after and had a second wife - Vietnamese. He had 7 children, so Felix had half brothers and sisters who were Metis. Felix met my mother in 1956 in Vouvray near Tours (a town in the center of France) as he came to get cured of a grave accident (he signed to serve in the French army in VN and got his spine broken). Felix was accountant (army was finished for him after his accident) in France but he missed his life in VN so he proposed to go back to VN to manage the coffee plantation (the half part belonging to his mother after the divorce with Eugène). My mother accepted and they returned in VN in 1957. Eugène was killed in 1964 in an ambush on the road done by VC (they were expecting a Vietnamese general, so he was killed by mistake).

Francoise on 15 Jan :

Hi Dennis
Thank you for your message in-French, remember many time about Viet Nam when I was young also, I love Viet Nam, and in 2001 2003 and 2011 we were in Hue (where I was born) with my husband and my second daughter. The last time I was at Khe Sanh to try to remember to find the house of my parents or something else but all is change the only thing I found it was a museum of the war nothing else I was sad bye and at the next mail from you

The following is the memoirs of Madame Poilane, wife of coffee planter Felix Poilane who ran the coffee plantation at Khe Sanh.

Memories of Vietnam, 1951-1968

The Sanh village came about as a result of the arrival of the planters. Before, there were only the Montagnards of the "Bru" tribe who were dispersed in the villages that were accessible only by the back roads. There was a French woman living, I believe, with a Vietnamese man. Since the development of the plantations, the Vietnamese population came about slowly and one could be able to figure between 1,500 and 2,000 inhabitants in 1968.

The planters were five in number Monsieur Eugene Poilane, remarried to a Vietnamese woman who managed the plantation from 1964 until the death of her husband. She also possessed a plantation bought for Monsieur Poilane's sister (former Lecas plantation). Madame Lecas died of cholera, and she is buried on the plantation at Khe Sanh Monsieur Felix Poilane, my husband and manager of his mother's (Madame Bourdeauducq) plantation since December 21, 1957, the date on which I arrived with him to Vietnam. We stayed there until January 22, 1968 -- the evacuation before the Viet Cong offensive.

Jean-Marie-Poilane

Monsieur Simard (former Laval plantation) owned a plantation starting from Khe Sanh and continuing on the road to Lao Bao. Another part was found at another section. Monsieur Simard was married to a Eurasian. Monsieur Rome (deceased) rented the plantation to Monsieur Llinares, married to a Vietnamese woman.

And finally, the plantation of the Benedictine Fathers whose monastery was at Hue. When my mother-in-law, Madame Bourdeauducq, had to leave Khe Sanh and Vietnam, she gave them our plantation. But the Fathers, in addition, had asked for more land. She gave them 9 Hectares (equivalent to 22,239 acres.) of land planted with productive coffee trees and the possibility of expanding, which they did.

FRANCOISE POILANE

Upon our return in 1957, the Fathers, having been notified, constructed a building for themselves and gave us back the plantation as agreed. One French Father (Father Corentin who since died in France) and some Vietnamese brothers stayed to help with the plantation work. When I arrived on December 21, 1957 in the middle of the monsoon season, I was a little afraid to see the state in which the plantation was -- especially the big 16-room mansion which was uninhabitable. The Fathers had to cultivate and harvest the plantation, and that's all -- no reparations, since we did not know what would become of Vietnam. Father Roman, another French Benedictine who accompanied us, did me the honor of showing me the plantation. He told me, "You will be a queen here." I held back my tears, for all I was seeing there were holes in the ceilings and in the floors.

There were no more doors or windows. The wind could easily come in. In the first floor room, which was our bedroom, the ceiling was held up with branches from the coffee trees. As there was no bed, my father-in-law gave us two iron beds, and we set up mats on them. The main part of our luggage had not arrived yet from Saigon, and we only had a few things with us.

Our first meal consisted of bread with salted "bridel" butter and bananas. There were only two bowls and very few plates and dishes, some canned food that was barely edible, especially the peas. In view of this lack of supplies, we went to have our first meal at my father-in-law's at Khe Sanh. The chauffeur came to pick us up with an old winded T23 Citroen automobile. Encountering the little comfort that existed at my father-in-law's home, we had our meals at our own home with the arrival of our thi ba named Ninh. Father Corentin had hired her for us. She was clean and honest which was good for us.

Our first Christmas was very simple and rather sad for us who just made the trip from France to Vietnam on the boat Le Laos and then stayed at the Hotel Majestic in Saigon. This was too much of a change for us. Thus, we found again the poverty of those who were around us.

It was necessary to go down to the Province of Quang-Tri, 77 kilometers (almost 48 miles) from Khe Sanh to shop and to buy the minimum to live in a more decent manner. My husband did not dare to venture out too much; he managed the plantation alone for the first time. It was necessary to work for a year to see how it would turn out. We were to show Vietnamese identification papers in order to go about. From Dong Ha to Khe Sanh there were no less than 14 barriers to cross, showing these papers. Most of the time, soldiers would look very seriously at the reverse side of these papers. They did not want to show that they did not know how to read. We said nothing and tried only to stay calm. Later on, the name Poilane served as our passport.

Before going any farther I would like to say that Khe Sanh is connected to town -- that is to say Dong Ha -- by Route 9 which was constructed by the French Military Corps of Engineers. The road went as far as Lao Bao, but before the events of the Viet Cong and the Japanese, it went as far as Laos. When it was impossible to come down toward Dong

Ha, the coffee was sold at Savannacket in Laos. When my father-in-law arrived for the first time, he was able to come as far as 41 kilometers (about 25 miles) by the river, then on foot along the path that existed then, having been cut out by the Montagnards who went to visit each other from village to village.

I am going to continue to enumerate the important people who were with us: the Vietnamese Protestant minister who was there before 1955 without having any followers. He came back in 1958 and wound up having a beautiful house for prayers and meetings with the Montagnards. No Vietnamese joined him again. Then the American Protestant linguists arrived around 1960 or 1961. They did a tremendous job and began to transcribe the "Bru" language that was never written down. With the Bru, they began to make little elementary books for teaching the Montagnards to read and write their language. Then they started translating the books. Our relationship excelled with this young American couple (the Millers) who lived in a straw hut constructed in a village. They had much courage since this was just about complete destitution for them. The Fathers of Foreign Missions of Paris arrived March 3, 1964. First was Father Poncet who was named parish priest (he was later killed February 13, 1968 at Hue during the Tet Offensive in the middle of a road by the Viet Cong.) Next was Father Mauvais who came to replace him, and in May of 1967 the nuns of Saint Paul of Chartres moved in near the priests. They, too, came to take care of the Montagnards.

FELIX POILANE DRIVING HIS TRACTOR

For us, rather for me, I was beginning a completely new life. My husband, Felix, who was born in Khe Sanh and had always lived there, was happy to meet his father again and also to see his plantation and country once more. The Montagnards had been informed of the return of the "boss" and for those who knew him, it was a great joy because with his return, there Was also the promise of steady jobs. Visits were numerous. One often came to see the wife of the cau, a Vietnamese word meaning "young man of good family." Numerous gifts, in the form of new rice, were offered to us. I remember a nice gesture: upon my arrival at the plantation house (named Petite Fleur), I found a pretty bouquet of flowers. The young boy in charge of watching the house knew that the wife of the master was arriving. In my distress, this gesture moved me very much.

I had a lot of trouble getting used to this new life in the middle of the underbrush. Above all, it was the lack of even the slightest comforts that left me unable to adapt. In this large house full of holes, one could not consider anything to do in such conditions. And furthermore, there was the food to which I had trouble adapting. We had a very clean cook who did her best, but I simply could not stand eating rice at every meal. She tried to prepare rice for me in the form of bread, but nonetheless, it was still always rice! Each night I would cry and ask my husband to leave again; I said that I would not become accustomed to this life. Felix used to say to me then that it was necessary to make a harvest, and then we'd see about it. The trip would be expensive; it would be necessary to make the harvest and then sell it. We would see then if we would return. He knew very well what he was doing. He knew well what the country did to each person. In such a paradise, because that is what this land was, he knew that I would let myself be taken by the enchantment and would stay. It was true.

The first harvest of coffee was a little Arabica and weighed 800 kilos (about 363 lbs) then came several tons of the Robusta. And around April 15, good weather had arrived and the harvest of the Chari was going to begin. Before explaining how the harvest of the coffee went, I would like to describe it. The Arabica is a real little shrub, not more than two meters in height. It is very fragile and was destroyed by a disease called leaf blight. This disease showed itself by the appearance of tiny mushrooms under the leaves. When this was discovered, the damage was done since we did not have the products to take care of this disease. The plantation produced, before the onset of the disease, 25 tons a year. This coffee was harvested during the monsoon and thus did not have the sun to dry it. It was prepared by the "wet" method. It was placed in large cement basins full of water and left to swell with water and to ferment. Then, it was shelled and the beans could dry in a room known as the "hot room." The heat did the rest in thoroughly drying it. The coffee could then be put in bags before preparing it to be sold, removing the outer skin and sorting it so that there were only perfect beans being sold.

The Robusta was just as the name indicates, a more robust coffee. It was bigger, as it was already a small tree and the harvest took place at the beginning of the month of January. It was not prepared, however, by the wet method. Instead, we dry it by leaving it first to ferment, then putting it in the hot room to dry it. Once dry, it is placed sideways until the time comes to prepare it to be sold. We produced 2-3 tons of this a year. The hot room is a large room with trays on which the coffee is placed for drying with long dug-out galleries which are covered with sheet-irons to conduct the heat. A large furnace in which wood is burned produces this heat. The furnace runs day and night. The coffee is turned at least twice a day so when the upper layer dries, we can continue to dry the rest.

ext is the Chari. It was my father-in-law who brought back nine beans of this coffee from Tonkin, and with those nine beans, started this plantation. As its name indicates, this coffee originates in Africa in Oubangui Chari. It is a tree with a rather fat trunk and long branches with large leaves of a beautiful dark green. It can reach three to four meters in height. It is a very robust coffee and it adapts well to the red earth of Khe Sanh. Generally, the coffee tree grows in red earth.

The harvest of Chari is done from the 15th of April to the end of September. It is our largest output as we produce about 20 tons a year. The harvest is done on the spot by the Montagnards -- those here leave in the morning and return in the afternoon. Starting at about 3:30 in the afternoon, I begin to measure the harvest of each coffee. A starting price is set: $10 a touque (a Vietnamese measurement). A touque of petroleum is 20 liters. The coffee bean has the form of a red cherry, which is picked bean by bean as to try not to scratch any little pieces of wood from the coffee tree, because the tree would then suffer. It is an art to pick the ripe coffee. It takes a lot of time to gather each bean but the Bru are very gifted for this type of Work. I watch only to make sure they don't pick any green beans. They must mature, and then they will be gathered later. In the middle of the harvest, we have 120 to 150 workers and this gives an enormous amount of work, not just in measuring, but in the payment and sale of rice and other products: salt, dried fish, and a shrimp paste called jourc which smells rather bad. It is necessary to get used to the smell in order to eat this product, but it is otherwise very good. However, it exists in different levels of quality.

After the payment for the daily harvest, I begin to nurse Montagnards who have numerous sores on their legs. Much conjunctivitis occurs at the time of the sale in Laos, the io nam. The dust is responsible in most cases, and it is easily cured with eyewash. There is also a lot of dysentery for which sulfamides and other medications are given, depending on the severity of the case. I am anticipating a little; I want to speak again about the coffee, which is our principal activity, not counting all the fruit of the country that we were introduced to by Monsieur Eugene Poilane.

The coffee, once picked, is left on a cement surface.

It remains in a heap for the fermentation of the beans, which resemble a fat cherry in which the pulp is very thick. When the mildew forms very lightly, it is time to put the coffee on the surface and, several times a day, our Vietnamese workers rake through the coffee, using rakes and their bare feet, to aerate the coffee, which will begin to dry, becoming black. Each night, it will be put back into piles based on its degree of dryness and covered with corrugated iron to protect it in case of a sudden storm. When it is dry, it will then be grayish in color. The coffee will be placed in bags in a room, waiting for the time to be prepared to be sold.

One cannot imagine the work that is required to prepare the coffee before it is poured in a cup to enjoy! The harvesting of Chari is the highpoint of the year on the plantation, because it is then that we have the most workers. These Vietnamese workers coming from the plains, generally from Dong Ha and the area surrounding the plantation and who live on the premises with us, did all of the work drying the coffee and taking care of the plantation. Actually, the coffee trees require having their highest and dead branches removed, as well as little branches called "gourmands" which exhaust the tree. Each day the workers would be on the plantation with Felix to see what had to be done on such and such a section planted with coffee trees. The plantation was divided into planted hectares, separated one from the other by wide alleys for easier access by car and foot.

They would look to see if there were any trees that were too old or unproductive that had to be replaced. For that, we would have a nursery for young plants and each year in May the young plants would be put into prepared holes at least one month in advance to allow the soil to be aerated. The planting of young coffee trees required a lot of work and care, and it was necessary to survey their progress. In general, everything grew well in the rich soil of our plantation, but it was just as possible that a more robust tree would replace a vegetating plant.

Two times a year, the Montagnards would weed the whole plantation. This work would be done bit by bit, and then the price would be discussed according to the number of trees to be cleaned and the height of the plants. It is necessary for me to say that in periods of monsoons one saw vegetation grow right before one's eyes and I experimented with banana trees. We had many fruit trees: orange and mandrian trees of many species and banana trees with many different types of bananas. There were avocado trees, mango trees, persimmon trees of many species; one of which, a royal persimmon tree, had a little stem of green leaves. The jacquiers could be eaten as vegetables. There were jacquiers with wet fruit and jacquiers with dry fruit. I liked this fruit enormously and the Montagnards, knowing this, asked me if they could pick these fruits.

They would come and together we would enjoy this delicious fruit. There were papaya trees, lychee trees of very different kinds; also juicy limes and durians, fruits well liked by the Chinese. This fruit smells very bad, and it is necessary to hold one's nose before eating it. I never succeeded in being able to endure that odor and because of this, I deprived myself of a very delicious fruit. If you have a durian or ducian (the two words are interchangeable) in the house, it is impossible to sleep because the smell takes your breath away. The Chinese buy these fruits at the price of gold. There were longanes, kola nuts very prized by the Sengalese, and areca-nuts, which are used to prepare betel with the coca leaves we also had. We had superb mango trees, but alas, they did not bear any fruit. elix succeeded in growing a pepper plant. This little plant is a type of parasite since it needs support for life and bearing of its fruit.

The pepper is gathered in red grains and comes in two forms, white pepper and black pepper, the better of the two being white. The majority of tea plants served our own purposes; we sold very little of it. My father-in-law had succeeded in acclimating prune trees. The fruits were sold green because the Vietnamese would like to eat them in this fashion with salt and nuoc-mam (briny fish). We used to sell mandrian and oranges by the piece and there were an enormous amount, but one of every two years of harvest was even more abundant. While descending towards the streams where we used to get our water, there were superb mandrian trees. Our children, accompanied by the Montagnard children, would amuse themselves the moment harvest came by picking the green fruits to include oranges. Seven per cent of these fruits were truly delicious and gave a lot of juice. We also had large fruit trees called "abrasins" which bore nuts that were sold to make oil. We did not sell these nuts often because the people were not interested in these fruits. This was very unfortunate for us.

In thinking about this tour of the fruit trees, I forget undoubtedly about how the red soil was so rich that everything could grow. The French and Japanese species of plants and trees, introduced into the country by my father-in-law, were observed in his experimental garden at Land Tram. The President of the Republic, Ngo Dinh Diem, came to visit this garden in July 1959. That day, I had in my hand a notebook containing all the species and the observations made by my father-in-law. This manuscript was sent to the Museum of Natural History of Paris.

Our copy was lost at Khe Sanh at the time of the offensive in 1968. I regret this because in it were numerous species of trees listed along with useful observations. The museum did not want to entrust me with a copy with which I could make another copy. It's a shame that the manual could not have been printed or published!
During my pregnancy, I saw a gynecologist twice since I spent nearly all of my time at the plantation. I gave myself urine analysis, and everything went as well as could be. I continued to work on the crop harvest without further problems. The plantation and the harvest continued at its rhythm; the maintenance was taken care of as usual. I had begun to look after the Montagnards and to manage things well. In addition to that, I had also begun to learn from their children, using hand signs, how to speak their language. I wrote, as I understood them.

But in July, I was expecting once again a second child, which was very comforting. That year, on September 16, 1962 we had a very violent typhoon. This date is carved in my memory because I had never before seen such a destructive typhoon. Our house survived the storm, but all the roads to the plantation were cut off as the trees lay across them. We had to disentangle them, all which was an enormous job. In Khe Sanh, my father-in-law's house no longer had a roof and the rain and wind came in everywhere. But in these tropical regions, one is used to such violence in nature and quickly restores whatever is damaged or destroyed. That is what happened and life went on.

However, it was decided for my safety that I should wait to give birth in my stepfather's house at Hue. The workers came to arrange things. The gynecologist gave me shots to take every day during the first five months. Then it was blood tests every month because Felix and I had different RH factors. We had discovered an abnormality only thirteen days before the birth of Francoise. One took blood samples from me just for precaution.

This worried us a little because doctors in Vietnam were not properly equipped. Since we were so concerned, they gave me four tests instead of three to reassure us at the blood bank in Hue. Felix then started to come each weekend, generally from Saturday afternoon at noon to Monday morning. Thus, in this way, he spent the weekend with us. I had with me the wife of our cook and my little sister-in-law, Pierrette, to keep me company. Without any abnormality, we were overjoyed to have a very big boy weighing 5 kilos (11 lbs), Jean-Marie. I quickly returned from the clinic to stay a few days at Hue and to prepare for our return to the plantation. I nursed my two children for only a few weeks as I did have milk, but it was not substantial, so they had to have their bottles.
It was at this time that the attack (supposedly by the Vietnamese) against the Buddhists took place following false rumiors that they shot into a crowd gathered to celebrate the feast of Buddha. This caused a big commotion in Hue and in other cities. In Saigon, there were a few Buddhist monks who burned themselves in the public squares to show that the Catholics (represented by the President of the Republic and by his brothers) persecuted them. One of the brothers of President Diem was Archbishop of Hue. Someone spread a rumor that he had buried Buddhists alive in his garden. People were actually gullible enough to believe these tales and went there to see if it was true. This, for a very long time, made life in Vietnam very disturbing and annoying.

Dad returned quickly to the plantation to flee from these fanatics who became dangerous. Public opinion quickly becomes crazy with such storytellers. Once at our land at Cu-Bach (such was the name of the plantation), we were very peaceful and far from this turmoil. The harvest of the Chari had begun, and there was plenty of work to be done. Pierrette came to the house to help me, since I was still tired after giving birth to a big baby.

We took in a young girl who helped us as well to replace our cook's wife who felt too old. Life returned to normal at the plantation. Many friends came to visit and experience a little coolness, especially during school vacation. We also had friends who came up to hunt deer, tigers, and also the wild boar, which had caused a lot of havoc when it had gone into a section of coffee trees. It was worse than a tractor. There was also hunting for wild rooster and pheasant usually toward the end of the day. I would drive and my husband would be next to me, ready to shoot if he saw a rooster or a pheasant. In order to hunt at night, it was necessary to trace the animal's tracks before setting out on an expedition. A person would hold a light out at front and others would follow quietly behind the one who held the rifle. I went hunting at night once when Felix killed a civet cat. It made me so sick to my stomach to see it in its last throes of life.

But for us, however, hunting deer was a necessity if we wanted to have fresh meat. Furthermore, the deer spoiled the coffee trees. When scratched between the deer's two horns, the tree could decay and it was necessary to remedy this. It also gave Felix pleasure, as he loved hunting although he never abused it. If he killed one animal, he returned, as that was sufficient. The workers who went with him were happy, since for them there was also meat to garnish their meal consisting of rice, herbs, local vegetables, pimento, shrimp paste, and nuoc-mam, if they could get it. One must not forget while they were alone on the plantation that they had a family to feed in the plain.

I felt that I was rewarded, since if I liked these native people they would welcome me. This contributed a lot to my adapting. There was so much to do for these Montagnards who were so poor and lived in such backwards conditions, they didn't even realize it.
I spoke a lot with the women when it was possible for me to maintain a conversation. They were very natural with me and I with them. They spoke to me freely about their problems. I knew about their life and that became even truer gradually through the time I lived on the plantation. The principal problem of the women was to not have too many children and also how to take care of them. This was easy for me to explain to them after the birth of my daughter, Francolse. From the time of her birth, the women made a habit of saying "before Francoise or after Francoise." I wound up knowing the ages of the children from Ta-Con, the oldest and closest village to our plantation.

I continued my learning of the language. I also had a Montagnard named "Counta" who spoke French. He once jumped on a mine at Lao Bao during the time the French were there and had his leg cut off. My mother-in-law always took care of him at the hospital, and he was always grateful to us. He walked on crutches that we had made for him at Hue. He came in each day to help me write and speak "Bur," which was very helpful to me and in this way I progressed faster. I must admit that I was very attracted to these primitive people who were so very close to us. This influenced my desire to stay at the plantation. I felt that we could help them so much in every way.

In 1961, we returned to France. Francoise wasn't two years old yet. The plantation was once again put in the hands of Father Corentin and also of our overseer Anh Thu, who was very informed. With the help of Father, we were able to take two months vacation in France near the family. We planned on staying until Christmas, but we were called because Father had to go to the monastery at Hue to meet with Father Superior of the Benedictines. When we left, saying good-bye was painful for all of us.

Upon our return, we had found everything in perfect condition. It is true that we had as well a Vietnamese cook who spoke French and knew how to do French cooking. We also took in his wife as a thi ba for Francoise. With the work on the plantation, harvesting and the counting, etc., I found myself pretty busy and it was necessary to have someone to look after Francoise when the two of us were occupied.

At the beginning of 1962, I had a miscarriage, and not knowing what had caused it, I became very depressed. I returned to the plantation somewhat distressed and had trouble recovering. End of 1961. I omitted telling of one of Felix's successful hunting expeditions. The Montagnards of TaCon had had a young buffalo that a tiger had gotten. They came to ask Felix to help them to attract the tiger towards the spot where he was going to set the trap. It was an accessible place (and tigers like clean places) where he set up the infamous trap.

All this was an art. It was necessary to dig a hole and cover it with bush as nothing was there, since the tiger is a mistrustful animal. Near the trap, meat was half hidden. The night went by and then very early in the morning the workers told us that they had heard a roaring, the tiger must have gotten caught. Felix, accompanied by the workers, left with his rifle and indeed, the beast was there, her paw caught in the trap. She was struggling to try to free herself as it hurt her so. That is when one must have courage and know how to shoot at the right moment. There's no question of misfiring and that would be rather unfortunate. But Felix was a fine marksman, and he killed the tiger. Then, he sent the workers to find me so that I could bring the camera and take pictures right there on the spot in the middle of the bush. Then, it was the triumphant return with a very beautiful animal. He left the trap there, however, well camouflaged. Once again, two days later, a second animal was caught. That occurred between December 19th and December 21st, 1961. Felix was very happy with this ending as two beautiful animals were captured. We were going to eat them, of course! It's not bad at all when it's well prepared.

ow I'm going to speak a little about the events on the outside of the plantation -- actually, the war that was there. At the former French fort, there were at first seven American advisors who settled in there, without any well-defined mission except to observe what was happening in the region, which had been so calm. They put the fort back in shape after it had been abandoned for so long, so they would be able to live a little better rather than in tents. It was in February 1964 that an event occurred on Route 9. A French pharmacist from Dong Ha, a Mr. Wolff, was coming to visit Mr. Llinares who had been ill. Going down with his car, he was killed. One had taken him for an American, we thought. There also had previously been the discovery of a network of Viet Cong in the village situated near Mr. Llinares's fields (at the edge of the river Rao-Quan in a sort of deep ravine). Following this discovery, the Vietnamese authorities decided to regroup Montagnard villages that were inaccessible to the road into places where the jeeps could have access. At that time, a lot of Bru went over to the VC, several thousand, no doubt.

However, we weren't worried despite the death of our friend Mr. Wolff. A little while later, I went down with Father Poncet to have our car repaired. Everything went well, and we came back on Friday. Felix had to go down as far as Quang-Tri and returned without being worried. But on Monday, April 20, 1964, while we were going to the market as we did each day, we stopped at my father-in-law's at noon. His wife told us that he had left for QuangTri that very morning. She was worried following the death of the pharmacist. Felix reassured her by telling her that we just came down and went back up, first him and then me. He hadn't even finished his sentence when a Vietnamese soldier we knew well, rushed in and told us screaming. In Vietnamese, "Mr. Poilane is dead. He had been killed by the VC in his car." We were stunned and very strained by this news.

My husband brought me back to the plantation and asked Father Poncet to accompany him. He also asked for the presence of the Americans who were at the fort. They accepted and thus left under safe escort. I had said to Father Poncet, "Come to get me if my father-in-law is disfigured." We didn't know what we were going to find, alas.

While waiting, I took the hundred steps on the trail, and the Montagnards, seeing my sorrowful demeanor, asked me what was wrong. I explained, then, without having a lot of details. I waited more than two hours before Father Poncet came back to get me. Then, he told me, "You can come. He had been killed in his car by three deadly bullets close to his heart." The Viet Cong had thrown a grenade in the motor of the car. The body had thus been brought under good escort, one never knew. The car stayed in place, one serviced the hauling later.

It was then a Monday, the day of departure to the province of Quang-Tri's chief administrative office of Khe Sanh, and it's the first car that had been pulled, the soldiers in ambush didn't know who was going to come (ED. I believe that Madame Poilane is trying to say that the VC were waiting to ambush Quang-Tri's administrative chief but her father-inlaw rode into the ambush site and was killed instead.)

I was going then to my father-in-law's house there in Khe Sanh accompanied by Father Poncet. I was helping my husband to groom his father. We put him in the kitchen and began. The coffin was ordered, a big one made of good, exotic wood not at all eaten by termites. We then decided to bury him close to his sister on the plantation and close to the house. The children at Hue were expectedly angry and were arriving just at the moment of burial. He was buried with Buddhist rights. We hadn't kept the body two days and already there were little lines in the wounds from the gunshots -- it was completely hot already! We got together with the Fathers at our plantation -- Father Lefas, Father Petijean, Father Neyroud and Father Vincent, not to forget Father Corentin and Father Poncet.

Papa was 76 years old and he had to go get himself killed on the road just as he had regained his health, and his coronary thrombosis was cured. This experience we did not understand. Why would he be killed when he was known and liked by all? This ambush wasn't for him, but it is he who had been a victim unfortunately. The Fathers left for Hue, and life renewed at our home. The harvest didn't leave us any leisure, which was good.

After this discovery of the network of Viet Cong, the Americans did not stay at the fort. They asked us if they could occupy a small piece of land used by the French for aviation. This land was found at the end of the track at the boundary of our plantation and Papa's. We accepted, of course, and an air base was built starting there. Then, this land was expanded to about 30 hectares. The situation began deteriorating. The bridges on Route 9 began to get destroyed, and we could not travel this way anymore. It was a hard blow to the planters. How to sell the coffee and supply ourselves with rice and other products necessary to life in the bush. The Americans were equipped during this time and began to construct a lot on this base, which was a strategic point for them not far from the Ho Chi Minh Trail. This was hardly reassuring to us; we were thinking that with this installation we would have an inevitable less calm life at Khe Sanh and at the plantation.

One time Felix descended to Hue, and during this time I felt cold and I realized I had a strong ear infection. Impossible to find a Vietnamese nurse, Father Poncet was staying at the house doing everything possible to find who could take care of me. It was about 4pm when he succeeded at finding the American nurse. The latter spoke French and that made it easier. He gave me an injection of a sedative so that I would not suffer and gave me medicine for the ear infection. At the same time, Jean Marie was also sick with diarrhea. Felix returned in the evening and immediately left to ask if a helicopter could take us to Hue. The captain accepted, and at 8pm that evening we landed in Hue. I liked the helicopter as our means of transportation; it was very nice and practical.

In Hue, I saw the doctor and found out that the eardrum of my left ear had ruptured and that I would remain deaf for many months. As for Jean Marie, we tried many X-rays and types of examinations, but we didn't find out what he had. I still felt his burning forehead against mine. It all finally ended when we found out he had tonsillitis and his health improved. He was 16-months-old, and he started to walk. That set him back a bit.

We stayed in Hue to recover ourselves and then returned to the plantation. The weather was very bad since a typhoon had come from the Philippines. A little eight-Seat plane took us in its care. There was an American on board who took us back to the base along with our little dog Thai Dong. I had never been so afraid in my life. The plane dropped in air pockets. It was frightening and all of us were vomiting tripe. Felix and Jean Marie were stoic. The pilot shocked us when he told us he had plugged up the plane with rags; we were hysterical! But the most upsetting thing was that the plane could not cross the mountain despite several tries, and it turned back. We found ourselves again in Hue in a very sorry state. The Vietnamese soldiers seeing us like this took a jeep and brought us back to the Joan of Arc School. There, with a cup of boiling tea, my spirits lifted and I fell asleep.

It became important, however, to think of returning. The next day, Father Neyroud accompanied by Father Suval, took us by car. The weather didn't permit us to think once again of a plane. The route for going to Quang Tri and Dong Ha didn't present any difficulties. It was on Route 9 that a bridge had collapsed. We knew that it was not possible to pass and on the other side there waited a 1,400 kilo Renault that would take us to Khe Sanh. Having arrived at the spot of a blown up bridge we were terrified. It was necessary to descend into the deep ravine (there was water) and remount on the other side. 0h, with the children and baggage it was expected that we would make a lot of trips and in what conditions! With the help of the two priests, we crossed all the same and found a truck awaiting us. It was already quite full, but we got inside and fit rather well. My knees were folded because there were bags of rice on the floor.

We started moving, and I noticed a lady who remained on the stepladder. It was, in my opinion, a sign of gratitude for the V.C. for they were at least letting civilians pass with supplies. One had to make concessions. At KM 51, everyone got in the trailer as the danger zone had passed. It is necessary to explain that on Route 9 the places were distinguished by the number of KM, thus the plantation was at KM 51.

These are little details, but they had their importance in the mountains where it was easy to be attacked at will.

The return was not a burden -- a bit tiring, but we were lucky and happy to be back at the plantation, and all was quickly forgotten. Father Petitjean was waiting for us, and this was a great surprise. He had come before the typhoon and, with luck, had made it. He had gone to spend a few weeks in the cool weather, and it was always a pleasure to find our friends again in the bush. If one does not know, he can imagine how lonely it is to live alone in the wilderness. The Marines who had known the base and also our plantation were happy to see a house of blond haired children. It reminded them of their home far away in the USA. How many visitors we would have from the Marines, from soldiers to the Captains and Colonels.

One day, we had a visit from a four star general, who I believe came directly from the U.S. He stopped at our house simply to get the news. We had, at that time, problems with the leaves falling from the trees, caused by the wind sent from Laos. None of our durian trees that were more than twenty -five years old produced any longer, having lost all their leaves and their fruit. That made so much damage on the plantation that the trees looked funny. Upon leaving, he said goodbye to us and tapping on Felix's shoulder, said to his men, "Attention, when you go to Laos, be careful of the wind when you throw defoliation products." That is a true story!

Following this defoliation, we filed a damage claim at Quang Tri Province. We never received anything in return. We found out that the Americans had given aid, but the Vietnamese had to keep these subsidies for their side. These products had to be pretty toxic to have been able to kill trees like the durians, which are very strong. We surveyed the rest of the plantation because there were some coffee trees coming up. They were able to resist, or else we'd have replaced them, so the native population remained untouched by the consequences of this defoliation. Often, we used to see the planes go by that were going toward Laos. They were, of course, to defoliate the places that were too dense and also to always survey the territory of this cursed war.

For us, life continued to be pretty calm, but we were at present cut off from everything. The bridges on Route 9 had tumbled. That was, for us, a big handicap because it was necessary to live on the plantation. The Marine Base expanded itself, and the planes were landing on the runway that was lengthened for the circumstances. Felix spoke English well and continued to perfect it. It was necessary for our subsequent relationship with the Marines. They occupied our land and were kind enough to assure us of their help for all that we would need. And we were going to need their assistance to sell the coffee that formerly would have been sold on the premises and bought by merchants, who would come up with their trucks. The Marines then put themselves at our disposal when it was an absolute necessity for us to have planes to carry several tons of coffee to Dong Ha, Hue, or even Danang. In return, we were able to bring up rice and as many provisions as they needed. With our planter friends, we grouped ourselves together to avoid too many requests of our neighbors. A plane just for us, that was already too kind. In order to go down to Hue, it was the same thing -- planes or helicopters took us in their charge. From that time, I didn't have to go down to Hue more than once a year. It was a little hard for us all. However, our friends were able to come up to see us and to say thanks to the kindness of the Americans and their planes. They never refused to be of service to us which was vital for us all at Khe Sanh.

The time passed despite the impossibility of going by our own means to Hue or elsewhere. The harvest was done as in the past and the coffee sold well. It was necessary only to leave with the plane to accompany the coffee and sell it oneself on the spot. The same for the supplies -- there was an airplane for us alone and for our planter friends. It was necessary to ask, but we did not suffer too much. Everyone had to leave their coffee in the same way and bring back the provisions for everyone. Even Father Poncet acted in the same manner and brought back provisions as well for everybody. In the meantime, Father Mauvais had come to join him to help him in the apostleship. The coming of the nuns in the beginning of the year 1967 was not delayed for that, as one didn't know how long one could last and each got accustomed to it. The Vietnamese saw there a free means of bringing up the merchandise to Khe Sanh, and this side of things would please them well enough.

Our friends continued to come to spend their vacations and to visit us. I omitted to speak of the visit of a French friend who came to spend two months with us on the plantation. This was a friend from the region of Tours where I am from. She was a nurse who brought back from each trip a very profound and lasting memory. We write each other still to this day when I'm writing these lines.

I resume then with the nuns of St. Paul of Chartres moving in. There were four. The mother superior was a French woman whom we liked a lot, and Sister Paul Xavier had already been in Vietnam for a very long time. She lived very close to the house that the Fathers had constructed facing the village of CuBach. We had given them some land on the plantation, one hectare or more. The house was strong, that is to say concrete blocks and a roof of corrugated iron. There were two bedrooms, a little shower - very rudimentary -- fed through a big pond, and a little kitchen.

For the nuns, it was a house on piles that was constructed with wooden walls and an iron roof. Four big rooms, one for cooking and another that would serve as the chapel and the oratory. The Fathers said the mass every week in the little oratory and on Sunday in Khe Sanh for the Catholic population. The work of the Fathers and the nuns was to take care of the Montagnards. It was necessary to explain to the latter why the nuns were dressed with their habit and the veil, and finally their kind way of life. The Montagnards were dumbfounded while listening to us.

The nuns after having settled in already began to take care of them. There was much to do on this side. When they went into the village, I used to go up with them, as there was the language to learn. During this time, our two fathers did not remain inactive. They laid out the land of the plantation -the old abandoned pastures, a big school with a residence for the girls and boys of surrounding villages, a big kitchen and other necessary buildings, if one seriously wanted to take care of these people and to try to do a good, apostolic job.

Before the nuns arrived, Felix had built a large hut in front of our house so that I could have class with the children, and also with the Montagnard children who wanted to attend. I taught them "Bru" and also French. We had with us for about a year a little "Bru" girl named Tiou who lived totally with us. We treated her like our two children. She was five or six years old. A boy, named Plengue, was also with us. He was around twelve. He didn't want to have his meals with us but instead, he ate with the staff in the kitchen. He helped me by watching the children while I measured the coffee. I taught him how to clean house well, how to clean the bricks, how to wipe the furniture, and I might say that he turned out to be very skillful. Several times we took him to Hue. His eyes opened wide, he who left the bushes of his village!

To lay out my school, the Marines brought ammunition boxes to us that our workers had quickly transformed into benches and tables to furnish the school. We also found a dark green blackboard and a large desk for me made out of the same materials. To complete the furnishings there were notebooks, pencils, and chalk. Thus equipped, I was able to have class every morning. I had a correspondence course from Paris for Francoise. She would study seriously, and the other students profited from this teaching in addition to their "Bru." This gave me a chance to learn new words with the correct pronunciation. I taught them the rudiments of catechism in order to prepare them for the nuns and priests who would soon take over.

The Marines who arrived knew our school very well. And when passing by, they would stop and give treats to the children. They also brought food for the Montagnard children so they could have a balanced diet for their noon meal. They were content when the Marines left. We had a little "Bambi." We bought him from the Montagnards for 500 Piastres. He was found in the brush, his mother most likely had been killed. The commanding colonel at the Marine base was our friend. He often brought us powered milk. Bambi ate at least four times a day. There were a lot of photographs taken of the Marines on their many visits passing through the plantation.

The arrival of the nuns was a very good thing for me. I found myself less alone, especially with the Mother Superior who was French. I knew her very well. My health was not good after the death of my father-in-law. Being cut off from the town was difficult. We liked to get together with our friends from time to time, after experiencing the austere life that we had on the plantation. There were only Frenchmen at Khe Sanh, with the priest and our planter friends. We would gather every Sunday at the house to have our noon meal and evening with the priest and M. Llinares. After dinner, we would play tarot card games until midnight.

It was really our only distraction, since the work did not allow much during the coffee harvest. During the monsoon, there was no question of working. The rain never stopped. You must know tropical rains to really understand a monsoon. Then, there was the humidity, the drizzle and constant fog in February and March before ever seeing the sun in April.

It was then that an attack of the Viet Cong occurred on three hills, North 881,861 & 881, which were all visible from our house. The culminating point was the Tooth of the Tiger, at about 1700 meters, on a mountain located very close to us facing the Marine base. I think these three hills could be the natural boundary between the North and South, since we were said to be twenty kilometers from the border. That was difficult enough to evaluate. This attack lasted for three weeks. If my memory is good, it happened suddenly, with no one expecting it. Everything was calm, too calm. The Marines started bombing these three hills, trying to force the VC out. It was all in vain as the Viet Cong were at the bottom, well into the shelter of the mountain dugouts. They were able to prepare their food without anyone seeing the smoke. They had plenty of water and were content with what little they had to live on. They were, therefore, very strong while hearing the planes coming to bomb them.

From our house we could see the bombs leaving the planes. The bombing went on day and night. Other times, the Marines flew in reinforcements. When the Marines evacuated their wounded, the VC responded with machine guns, which they had camouflaged in the forest. We did not take it seriously and continued to harvest the coffee. The Marine visits became rare; we understood why. The Montagnards did not seem affected by what was going on around them. As for us, we became disturbed by the incessant rotations of the C-123 and C-130 airplanes. The noise stopped us from sleeping most nights. Our friend, the Colonel, took the time to give us any news. I think if there was any immediate danger, he would have been the first to tell us to leave the plantation.

s soon as there was a lull, the Marines came to our house to reassure us and to exchange a few ideas. The Colonel gave us his laundry (at our request.) That certainly freed him from an unpleasant job. His wife sent him packages from the United States, and he never failed to bring treats for the children and us.

The attack finally ended and everyone breathed a little easier. Each Monday morning the Colonel brought us his laundry. When he came to pick it up in the afternoon, he was all wet. The rescue of the three hills had cost a lot in human lives. He had however, saved Khe Sanh from an attack. One cannot forget that the Ho Chi Minh Trail was there, very near, and we all knew it.

One can ask how a surprise attack was possible. One must not forget that numerous Montagnards worked at the base and were able to observe the movements of planes, the locations of trenches, and where the machine guns were located. It is very possible that there were VC among the Montagnards. I am now able to say that the chief of the VC among the Montagnards was a woman, a young girl whom had taught me to speak "Bru." I earned her confidence, and she had confided in me. She came to the market at Khe Sanh, dressed as a simple Montagnard gathering information. It was difficult for me to betray the confidence she had entrusted in me.

The increase of men and materials at the base left us less calm than as we had been prior to the attacks on the three hills. The VC retreated but were regrouping and preparing for another offensive. Although we feared they would attack again, we remained at the plantation. The harvest was not finished; it was May or June of 1967. It was necessary to earn a living and eat. At that time of the year, the rains began, and the Montagnards' provisions were diminishing. They survived eating sweet potatoes, manioc, bamboo shoots, and whatever vegetables they could find in the brush.

During the next six months, it was calm. Nothing abnormal happened as the year came to an end. The Christmas celebrations continued as usual. I attended Fran~oise's eighth birthday party in October 1967. We made a nice cake, and the Marines brought an even bigger one. It took several Marines to carry it. I forgot to point out that Felix had killed a spotted panther the same day. The panther had killed a pig in a nearby village. He placed the trap the night before and his lure worked perfectly. Once it had been trapped, he shot it. The news quickly spread and everyone wanted to take a picture with the dead panther. Each person posed with it in a different manner. We had the skin sent home and tanned. I still have it along with two other skins from tigers which Felix also killed. They are all still in excellent condition.

January 1968 arrived, and the feast of Tet began early in February. Our workers left the plantation to celebrate. That was the only vacation time they were allowed during the year. When we were short of help, I took a Montagnard woman to do the cooking. She was very clean and cooked very well. Her name was M'Pi Ania. She had previously worked at the plantation during the time my mother-in-law ran operations.

The attack on Khe Sanh began at night on January 19th and 20th, 1968. We were surprised to hear the noise from the B-52s, which flew very high. The VC were in the village and had attacked the guard post, offices and the residence of the Chief of the District. We wanted to go to Mass but decided against it to keep the children out of danger. Father Mauvais had tried and was pushed back to the bridge of Khe Sanh, which crosses the Ta-Con River. The battle was becoming ferocious. No one left the Montagnard villages. The silence was unusual. Helicopters began bombing and firing at everything that moved. Disregarding the danger, late in the afternoon, we went to the home of Father Mauvais. Father Poncet was still in Hue City. Stray bullets from the helicopters struck the entrance to the home of the nuns, so we quickly returned to the plantation.

Felix called all of our workers to protect our house. They gathered things from the basement and slept on cots. The B-52s continued bombing and the noise was unbearable. Helicopters dropped off wounded South Vietnamese soldiers at the Old French Fort. Two of them managed to get to our house. I left the veranda and met another wounded soldier who told me his friend was seriously wounded and was hiding where we stored coffee. I called my husband Felix, who scolded me for leaving the house. Felix located the wounded soldier who was suffering from a broken shoulder. His bleeding had stopped and Felix decided not to change the soiled dressing, to prevent the bleeding from starting again. He gave him a shot of Penicillin and water, which seemed to revive him. Felix told both soldiers to remain where they were until the B-52s ceased bombing.

I omitted telling you that on Saturday, Mr. Miller, the American linguist, had came by the house to warn us that things were getting worse. My husband was not home at the time and when I later told him of the visit of Mr. Miller, he could see the fright on my face.

On Monday, there was still fighting in the village of Khe Sanh. It was rumored that the American forces were no longer giving ammunition to the Vietnamese Army. The nuns continued coming by the house as there was no question of their leaving. The Montagnards did not leave either. Towards the end of the afternoon, Mr. Llinares was able to join us. His son Emmanuel, remained at their house with the rest of the coolie workers.

On Tuesday, the Vietnamese from the villages of Khe Sanh and Cu Bach filed past the plantation carrying backpacks, heading towards the Marine base. Prior to the attack on the three hills, everything had been very peaceful. The sudden attack on the village of Khe Sanh had led to widespread panic. My husband Felix used his car to take the wounded Vietnamese soldiers to the Marine base. He was asked to drive the old and sick villagers to the Marine base. He made many trips in our old 2CV but had to stop, so the vehicle would be ready when it was our turn to leave. Some villagers offered Felix 500 Piastas for a ride, but he could not help them -we really needed the car. Felix instructed us to pack some necessary things and be ready to leave the plantation at any moment. The children were very scared and screamed every time the B-52s conducted a bombing raid. We just took with us the money we had received from the coffee crop we had sold, and a few trinkets and toiletries.

e were the last to leave the plantation. We released our dogs and little "Bambi," then locked the door and left for the Marine base in our old 2CV. When we arrived at the base there was total confusion. The planes that were to arrive to evacuate the villagers never arrived. The Marines did not know what to do. Father Mauvais, who did not want to leave, finally changed his mind and worked his way to the base. Felix spoke to the colonel in charge of Lang Vei, a village on the Lao Bao route. We told him we did not want to leave the area, and he suggested we go with him to Lang Vei. At that time, the North Vietnamese began firing rockets at the base and the children and I took refuge behind some metal barrels that contained pine tar, which got all over me. The children and I were an awful sight and scared to death. At that moment a civilian journalist began basking questions of us. What we were doing there, where we had come from, etc. I am sure she wasn't concerned that we were suffering and had left everything we loved behind; her concern was more of a journalistic nature. She took a picture of us that later appeared in the newspaper in France. Although the photo's appearance assured our families that we were okay, it just was not the proper time to take it.

Finally, the first C-123 arrived at the base. There was a great rush to get on the first plane. We waited, not wanting to be crushed or separated. We were ordered to join the crowd and get aboard. Felix refused, telling the Marines that they had to organize the villagers into groups to allow an orderly withdrawal. The Marines complied and when other planes arrived, it was done in an orderly manner. The planes were either going to Dong-Ha or Da Nang -- we would have preferred Hue.

We left with a heavy heart, leaving everything we loved behind. When we arrived at Da Nang, we met the Miller family, which was a very pleasant surprise. Somehow they had been made aware that we would be arriving. We asked to be taken to the house where the nuns lived. It was January 22, 1968 and nothing else had happened at Da Nang. I cleaned some of the sticky tar, which was very difficult to remove, off of my legs and skirt. Two days later we left for Hue City and the School of Joan of Arc. We had many attachments there and Tet was quickly approaching. This meant everyone would be leaving to join his or her families to celebrate together. We did not know if we would ever be able to return to Khe Sanh. We settled in, having only the bare essentials we had taken with us when we left the plantation. We would have to buy whatever things we would need.

On the night of 31 January 1968, the Tet offensive began all over South Vietnam. We were awakened by gunfire and immediately covered the windows with an armoire. We put our mattresses under the beds to stretch out on. When night came, we left, taking what little we had with us. We worked our way through the streets to the main central building of the school. We saw the first Viet Cong enter the city from the big main gate. We put mattresses over the windows and sealed the building the best we could. Sister Henri was very scared and hid under the covers most of the time.

The central building was located across the street from Saint Francois-Xavier Church, and the VC had taken up a position in the steeple. When shots were exchanged between them and the American forces, bullets would strike the bell in the steeple, it sounded like the song of a bird. Finally, the bell fell to the ground as if it finally gave up its spirit.

We took our meals when the situation allowed it. Mostly, we stayed under the mattresses. The Rossignols, instructors who lived next door to the church, joined us. Soon after, about fifty other people -- nuns and others preparing to be nuns -moved into our building. Fierce fighting broke out and at one point, the American soldiers almost attacked our building. We managed to warn them that we were all civilians, and it became necessary to evacuate the building. When we tried to make our way to the chapel there was street fighting everywhere! Civilians as well as the VC and American soldiers were running everywhere. We saw my Vietnamese mother-in-law with Jean-Vincent, Cosette and Nanou. They joined us and the American soldiers helped us get behind the chapel. We thought our last moments had arrived.

The Rossignols attempted to take refuge at the Faculty of Sciences building where everyone was being directed and which was now empty. We encountered a guard who refused to let anyone in. After a discussion, he allowed us entry but we were only given access to a room which was approximately 4 meters square. There wasn't food for anyone but at least we were not homeless. We stood back to back to use the least amount of space as possible. Little Jean-Marie, who was only four years old, cried that he wanted to go back to Joan of Arc. I did the best I could to calm him, although the sounds of the all night battle kept us awake all night.

The next morning the rest of the refugees arrived, those who knew the nuns cooked some rice. We each had a small bowl. It wasn't much but a comfort to our empty stomachs. Felix and two of the nuns went back to Joan of Arc and retrieved some blankets and small survival kits. Sister Paul Xavier brought back her black habit and some consecrated host. She gave communion to all the Christians at the shelter, which was a particularly moving moment. Jean-Marie watched very closely, his eyes speaking for him. For the first time, we knew he understood the significance of communion.

As more and more refugees arrived, the guards opened bigger rooms, which was a great improvement. We were finally able to stretch out. We did not know how long we would be at the shelter, so the extra room really helped. Felix began to organize the refugees, so we could all have at least two meals a day. The Americans gave Felix some raisins, cokes, and sugar. We had to guard them very closely, so that Franqoise and Jean-Marie could eat a little better.

The only place to do laundry was in the Perfume River. It was not safe to go there by yourself, so the Americans took us by bus. A group of journalists arrived and informed us through their intermediary that they had requested our evacuation through the American Consulate. On Feb. 11, 1968, all the nuns, the Rossignols, my mother-in-law and her children, and the Philippino family, and the doctor married to a French woman were able to get on a boat. The priests, including Fathers Poncet, Petit-Jean and Neyroud, stayed at the Providence School. The Viet Cong put Father Lefas and another Frenchman up against a wall. The VC thought they had a grenade in their pocket. They were saved when they discovered it was just a battery. We had to stay on the boat at Hue until February 12, because it was not safe to move. A helicopter arrived and escorted us to Da Nang.

When we arrived at the Da Nang American Consulate, Mary Ange and the Mother Superior of the Sacred Heart School greeted us. I had become sick on the boat and arrived wrapped in a blanket. We arrived at the school where we ate a good meal of meat and rice soup -- what a luxury! It was the first hot meal we had had in 12 days. For the first time, we enjoyed a little tranquility. It felt good to sleep in a warm bed. One could not describe the difference in accommodations, it was wonderful.

The city of Hue was still under attack and suffered enormous damage. The Joan of Arc School was destroyed, and the coffee we had stored there was stolen and sold by the VC. The VC looted many buildings, and some personally profited from their attack by selling our coffee crop for a good price. The main bridge, which spanned the Perfume River, was cut in half by the VC and the ferry remained the only way to get to Hue.

We were now refugees in Da Nang. Two days after our arrival, we learned that the VC somewhere near the Hue Canal had beaten Father Poncet and Father Cressonnier. Felix was devastated by the news and could not bring himself to tell me. Sister Xavier was the one who finally broke that news to me. When two of the Fathers learned that a nun had been seriously wounded in Hue at a location still under control of the VC, they returned to help her. Mr. Llinaires accompanied the Fathers. The VC executed both of the Fathers. No one ever learned why. Mr. Llinaires was wounded in the wrist and barely escaped by hiding in a trench.

After 14 days, Father Cressonier's Thi-Ba, the woman who was responsible for the priest home, was finally able to enter the liberated zone. Unbelievably, the bodies of the two Fathers were still where they had fallen. Her and another women placed the bodies in sacks and brought them back to the home of the priest where they were temporarily buried in the back yard. In time, they would be interred at the Priest Cemetery in the District of the Citadel. The cruelty of the VC was incredible -- how many other priests died, attempting to save a child, or say Mass is unknown.

The VC committed many atrocities. There was a group of German doctors who served at the Mission of the Order of Malte. They worked at the hospital at Hue, serving the entire population. One was a pediatrician and the others were general practitioners. One of their wives was pregnant and expecting her third baby. The VC kidnapped them and for a time, it was rumored that they had been taken to treat the wounded VC. Unfortunately, that proved to be untrue when they were found executed. One female German doctor who escaped execution, later returned to Germany with her three children.

Most of the massacres took place outside of Hue City on the plain going towards the Benedictine Monastery of Thien-An. Two French Fathers were among those massacred. Father Urbain and Father Guy had made a wrong turn and were captured by the VC. They, like the others, were made to dig their own graves. When the city was finally liberated, many corpses were found, some only half buried. It was hard to believe human beings could be responsible for such an abomination.

After the city of Hue was completely liberated, Felix and a group of nuns went to see the devastation. Felix took notes and recorded the widespread devastation. The Joan of Arc School suffered extensive damage. Felix, Fathers Lefas, Duval, Neyroud, along with Monsignor Urrutia, Jean-Vincent Poilane, and a Frenchmen who lived with the Fathers began salvage work at the school. I stayed in Hue with the children while they rotated back and forth from Da Nang to Hue as limited space on airplanes allowed.

We continued living at Sacred Heart, and had a very large room on the first floor. Most of our friends were leaving Viet Nam and returning to France. The Americans provided abundant food for the orphans who lived at the school. We ate at the sisters' guest table and were able to pay for our meals with the money we had received from the six tons. of coffee we had sold from the plantation at Khe Sanh. We made our own clothes from the American surplus, some of the dresses looked very nice. My mother-in-law and friends would also send us clothes -- clothes for Felix and the children that could not be found at the school. Time passed slowly, Khe Sanh was still under siege. Hopes of ever returning were starting to fade. The Montagnards were allowed to evacuate their villages. Most of them traveled by foot to Cam-Lo. They could not stay in their villages as they were completely out of food.

On April 9, 1968, Khe Sanh was finally liberated. Felix was ecstatic and immediately began contacting American authorities through a Philippine friend who spoke perfect English. Felix wanted to return to the plantation to see how much, if anything, remained. The Americans were reluctant, they said it was still very dangerous, the VC were still very close. Finally, they informed Felix he could return on April 12. Upon hearing the news, I hid his passport, as I did not want him to go back to Khe Sanh. He told me he was going, with or without a passport. Although I still did not want him to go, I returned it. On April 13, 1968, he departed by plane to Khe Sanh.

I did not hear from him on Easter Sunday, 14 April 1968, and immediately sensed something was wrong. A journalist informed Mother Angel of the tragic news. She kept it from me until Monday morning, fearing I would not sleep the night before. She sent for me on Monday, the pale look on her face told me something was indeed wrong. She informed me that something had happened at Khe Sanh, and that she was going to the American Consulate to learn the details. When I tried to go with her she refused, making me wait for her return. She returned and informed me that Felix's plane had been shot down over Khe Sanh. Felix was the only civilian on board. He died in the crash, with five of the fourteen military passengers being injured. One later died. The same nun that went to the consulate located the hospital where Felix's body had been brought. She and the other nuns took care of everything for me. They made the notifications to his mother, took care of the administrative papers, and ordered a coffin. I informed her of my wish to have his body returned to France. The nuns tried to dissuade me. The priests wanted to bury him next to Father Poncet. If he could have spoken to me, maybe that would have been his desire. I did not know, he loved this country so much.

The Americans embalmed his body and returned it to us on April 17, 1968. He was laid out in a little room that served as an office for the chapel. He was dressed in his dark, navy blue suit. A little drop of water and blood came falling from his right ear from time to time. He appeared to have just gone to sleep and was at peace. A tri-colored ribbon and simple bouquet of flowers adorned his coffin. Francoise and Jean-Marie had grim faces. Jean-Marie was especially affected. He came, looked at his Father, left and went back again. At five years old, he could not understand what was happening. Father Petit-Jean remained close to me to get me through the ordeal. I hugged Felix for a long time, his face against mine.

On 18 April 1968, funeral services were held at the Cathedral of Da Nang. Nine priests co-celebrated the mass, which was said by the Vietnamese parish priest. They were all his friends. Father Lefas eulogized Felix in a very solemn way. He had felt particular pain, as Felix was his student at the College of Providence at Hue. Among the many mourners was the lieutenant who had authorized Felix's plane trip; he felt responsible.

After the ceremony, the Americans took the body to Saigon to await transportation to France. I returned to Hue City with the nuns to clear up affairs with the bank. I found the city destroyed. It was still a dangerous time to be in Hue and several times during the night we had to hide on the first floor. Due to the still continuing dangerous situation in Vietnam, there was a delay in our leaving. During this time I could not take the pressure and had to get treatment to allow me to sleep. On 22 June 1968, the children and I left for France after making sure Felix's body would be returned. My stepsisters, Cosette and Nanou, and two nuns came with us. Goodbye Vietnam, where I left so many memories. A part of my life and heart remain in that country where I knew both joy and suffering at the plantation. Life goes on and I still have the children. But Vietnam remains forever engraved in me. It is still hard to describe all these events, it was so brutal.

Felix was 37 years old when he died. He was born on April 30, 1930 at Khe Sanh, and had gone back to die at Khe Sanh.

"BATCATS" SENSOR GO TO WAR

Bill Person USAF
553rd Recon Wing

ED NOTE: Bill Person, Captain, USAF. AFROTC, North Texas State, Pilot Training Class 60-F. Served at a radar station in New Mexico until selected in October 1962 to serve as liaison between Strike Command and USAF Security Service intercept site at Key West during the Cuban Missile Crisis. Granted a high level clearance for access to codeword material and then after an intensive Communications/ Signals Intelligence School, officer was assigned to the 6986th Radio Security Group at Wakkanai Air Station, Japan from August 1963 to May 1965. This secret radio listening post on the northern tip of Hokkaido was a hotbed location for peering behind the iron curtain to spy on the Russians. Soviet space activities, ICBM tests that pose a thermonuclear threat to the heartland of America, hostile MiGs and SAMs reacting to unarmed ferret flights, intrigue, even romance that made the futons in a cold place warmer in the midst of a cold war; it's all here.

Bill was an intelligence officer in Vietnam, assigned to the 553Rd Recon Wing. During the war, President Johnson became alarmed with the infiltration of South Vietnam, by the North Vietnam Army.
Bill was responsible for the planning, development, training And implementation of the sensor program, especially designed to aid the defenders of the Khe Sanh Combat Base, charged with blocking the infiltration routes of South Vietnam.

AUTHOR'S NOTE

The events described in this book took place in 1967 to 1968 when I was involved in a Priority One military project involving sensors.

The war in Southeast Asia was not going well and it was losing favor with the public. The White House, Lyndon B. Johnson and Robert S. McNamara seemed to be telling those fighting the war to make it an "enemy friendly" effort. It was resisting a war instead of assisting the Saigon government froma takeover from Hanoi. That was like a doctor telling his patient "let's hold off on the treatment and give the cancer a chance."

Seeing the way Washington was fighting the war in Vietnam left me depressed and angry. The communications intercept work at Wakkanai was extremely fascinating but again there were those who found delight in personal empire-building.

Now, Stewart Air Force Base in New York offered more problems to contend with on two more directions.

Major General Gordon H. Austin assumed command in what would be his final assignment before retiring. He had spent most of his career in fighters so he had little interest in the forming of the 553rd Reconnaissance Wing at Otis. Additionally, this Eastern NORAD/CONAD commander also took command of 1st Air Force and 26th Air Division hosted at the same base. The previous commander had never used the Special Security Office and Major Darrell Dubrow had never met either commander.

An additional problem came when I discovered that Army Lieutenant Colonel Neal Dawson insisted on changing the way an SSO shop should be changed to be like his Directorate of Intelligence section.

I had the job of changing these major problems and getting General Austin to finally learn about Special Intelligence information but also to truly support the new Recon Wing.
When I did this, I decided I also wanted to join this new Batcat Wing.

The military War College produces detailed contingency plans for numerous possible emergency situations that may arise in the future. This prompted The reasoning that once that particular activity happens; there would be too little time to start planning

Secretary McNamara had charged the Jason Group with a problem to solve what would stop the support from Hanoi for waging the war in South Vietnam. The 27 member think tank that comprised "our brightest minds" came up with a plausible idea. The JCS, Joint-Chiefs-of-Staff did not care for it, but McNamara liked it and called for COLLEGE NINE, nine college professors to develop the project. The plan was to adapt the Navy Anti-Submarine Warfare system to a land application. Sonobuoy listeners were converted to ground type sensors that could detect activity in the jungles and be identified on radio receivers in an airborne platform. A sufficient number of Navy EC-121s were mothballed at Davis-Monthan AFB, Arizona, and the appropriate ARR-52 radios were an on-shelf available items.

McNamara approved the final proposed plan and renamed it PRACTICE NINE.

On January 13, 1967, the National Security Action Memorandum number 358 was signed at the White House by W.W Rostow or Walt W. Rostow, Deputy Director to National Security Council. It assigned the highest National Priority for the Mk84, Mod 1, a 2000 pound bomb and to Project PRACTICE NINE. This was the implementation of the sensor program which was later called IGLOO WHITE. This was the second time this highest, or Priority One was used. The first time was the Manhattan Project to develop the atom bomb.

The people in charge had determined America no longer needed conventional bombs because we had atomic and thermonuclear weapons. ICBMs, sub-launched Polaris missiles and Strategic Air Command's big B-52s would keep America safe. Wars needing conventional weapons were now passe. All of the vast inventory had been sold to a foreign company who wanted to use the chemicals in industrial applications. This included acres and acres of the 250, 500 and 750 pound bombs. However, before even a small amount of the bombs could be moved, Vietnam happened. The repurchase price was many times higher than the sold price although they had never left the open storage bomb farm facility. The government spokesperson commented that this was done because it was too costly to maintain such a huge number of previously believed unneeded and deteriorating ordnance. Truth was that once the government cashed the purchasing check, ownership rested with the new owner regardless of their disposition. The German company was allowed to be compensated for anticipated profits to be derived from the sale of reprocessed otherwise explosive chemicals int6 a new useful civilian product.

A massive restoration of these aging bombs sped on for the war effort in Vietnam, but the secretive wars in Laos and the Congo raged on to use up a lot of the smaller ordnance units. This was because the smaller North American Corporation built T-28D trainer was the predominate plane in use in both far off places. Thousands of the T-28s were mothballed' because the Navy and Air Force ordered newer planes.

Getting trained men with proper equipment and supplies to a distant hot spot was a huge problem. From the time a situation needing action is identified and an appropriate response can be accomplished can take a while. This happened to members of the new 553rd Reconnaissance Wing and also in a related type secretive project. While the 553rd Batcat mission to locate targets passively in Laos on the Ho Chi Minh Trail, the secret combat units trained at Hurlburt were to put those bombs on them. The EC-121R Super Constellation could operate from a base in Thailand and fly at high altitudes for long periods of time. However the short ranged T-28 Trojan needed to be closer to the action, and too, we were not suppose to be in Laos; the Congo either. Both were "by invitation only" wars.

PRACTICE NINE was to be developed at the same time the personnel were training in the use of the refurbished camouflaged EC-121R Connies and its sensor equipment. The paths of these two separate projects were mere miles apart on the Florida coast at Eglin and Hurlburt Air Force Bases. The 553rd Reconnaissance Wing was dubbed Batcats because of their pending role in the war.

Volunteer Cuban mercenaries were trained and sent to the Congo while the CIA recruited and trained "borrowed" U.S military Caucasian personnel as well as some civilians for Laos. The reasoning was that the slightly darker faces needed to be sent to the darker Congo while the paler faces belonged in Laos. Hurlburt AFB, Florida was horne to most of this specialty super secret combat training and the Cubans intermixed with Americans there. The local Florida coastal residents, civilian and military were subjected to the frequent buzzing of T-28 Trojans like so many annoying bees.

My first contact with these special "civilians" was in Bangkok, Thailand in April 1965. Because of the exposure of such close contact with the Cuban volunteers who were exiled from their island home, some influence naturally rubbed off on the others. A special comical greeting arose from this association with the Spanish/Cuban culture and was carried over with real enthusiasm into Thailand and Laos. Being from Texas, I laughed heartily when I first heard it.

"Hey-ey-ey PEEDro!"

Of course it was an inside special greeting joke, but I recognized it for what it was the first time I ever heard it. The Air America Choctaw H-34 helicopter pilots began using Pedro as a call sign. Someone created a bigger than life sized plywood cutout image of a skinny Pedro with a huge charro sombrero that covered his face. It was displayed next to the one the resctie people had of the now famous: "Jolly HO HO HO, Green Giant!"

IGLOON WHITE PROJECT

President Johnson was concerned with the war in South Vietnam and the lack of favor of the American public. He did not want to increase the war against North Vietnam but somehow wished to restrict the supply of arms into South Vietnam.

Professors Jerome Wiesner of MIT and George Kistiakowsky of Harvard recruited the Jason Study Group to meet at Wellesley. Their proposal was a more passive, less destructive approach to an all out bombing of North Vietnam and blockading their ports.

Robert S. McNamara directed the Jason Group, a 47 member "think tank' to provide a means to deny men and supplies to the war.

"Infringe on the flow of men and materials to South Vietnam," was the wording.

This group decided to use the Navy Anti-Submarine Warfare system to be used on the Ho Chi Minh Trail. This system used sonic sensing probes dropped from P2V Neptunes up to the plane's ARR-52, Aircraft Radio Receivers. These items were already in use and so were Navy and Air Force C-121 Constellations in mothballs at Davis- Monthan AFB, Arizona.

McNamara and Johnson were desperate for a low cost method for the poor showing of the badly run war. However, the project he wanted cost over a billion dollars for not buying the planes or radios to be used. He approved a closer look at a completed study which was the brainchild of two college professors and seven others joined them in this planning group.

It was codenamed COLLEGE NINE, for 'a stitch in time saves lives,' as directed by the White House to fulfill Johnson's requirement.
National Security Action Memorandum No. 358 was signed on January 13, 1967, with a rating "Assignment of the Highest National Priority to the Mk 84, Mod 1 2000 Ib Bomb and to Project PRACTICE NINE. This was first used for the MANHATTAN PROJECT, the development of the atom bomb.

Army Lt.Gen. Alfred Starbird was named as head of the Defense Communications Planning Group overriding the Department of Defense for the project. DCPG was located in the old Navy building in Washington.

The system modified the existing Navy system for an anti- filtration project by using sensors and monitoring radios. It was changed to ILLINOIS CITY on June 14, 1967. Then again to DYE MARKER on July 14, 1967. MUSCLE SHOALS was the new codename on September 13, 1967. Then once in place in SEA in December 1967, as a part of Task Force Alpha, a mostly civilian outfit at Nakhon Phanom. Later it renamed IGLOO WHITE in June 1968. The IBM 360 processing section was known as Infiltration Surveillance Center.

Electronics Systems Development part of MIT's Research Electronics, ESDMITRE developed the modified ground sensors. It was determined that an anti-probing means needed to be installed that had an explosion bomb inside to avoid detection or examination from the enemy. The sound affects of the sensor let the sensor monitors know when that sensor was captured and when it exploded by enemy inspection.

The C-121s were flown from Davis-Monthan to Ontario, California for modification. This meant removing the radars and domes to install racks of ARR-52 radio receivers with antennas and painting the planes a camouflaged color. Lockheed was the plane manufacturer and they joined with Martin-Marietta in Baltimore to complete the changeover.

Defense Communications Planning Group was then the final authority for this sensor project and they hired VITRO for testing at Eglin AFB, Florida.

There were other names for this project like DUNE MOON and POT LID and the Navy VO-67 was named DUEL BLADE and MUD RIVER.
I was part of the testing at Eglin but only for the flying part. I saw DCPG's mock-up sensors but did not see the final sensor package. New large buildings with four derrick mounted antennas were built at Nakhon Phanom (Naked Phanny) for Task Force Alpha which became IGLOO WHITE.

Small Air Force electronic technicians and some Navy techs too, handled the sensors. This was done at NKP and Ubon where these sensors were placed in Laos and Vietnam.

The Navy also had another group at NKP that flew P2V Neptunes over the Ho Chi Minh Trail to emplace sensors and monitor their signals. The Combat Intelligence Monitors were primarily intended as back-up since TFA's ISC was supposed to handle all the intercepts from active sensors while the Connies were merely a relay part. DCPG back in D.C. determined that we did not need to have too many Air Force guys up in the air over there. They came up with a single engine plane, a Beechcraft F-33 Debonair with a remote controlled system. This plane could not climb high enough to transmit signals to reach TFA's antennas. Khe Sanh and other orbits south of the DMZ restricted the signal to reach NKP.

A pilot had to fly the plane to override the remote control system and it was limited on the number of sensor inputs from the ground.

I met a pilot who had to bailout of this troubled QU -22 'Mini- bat' .

Nothing worked properly so the Batcats managed to make the sensor program work, especially at Khe Sanh and other Army camps near the DMZ. ISC's IBM 360 was not programmed to handle enemy activities around Khe Sanh and other bases in South Vietnam.

My story is about how we used the sensor inputs to work despite what McNamara and DCPG planned. This was a first hand observation approach to fight the ground war.

I briefed President Johnson in September 1968 to see that he proposed using the sensor program the way DCPG intended and knew that the Batcats, as I knew them, would end.
I worked with CIM training at Otis to train newer crews of what I knew were working back at Korat. Shortly afterwards I was sent down to Eglin AFB on IGNITION SWITCH to test improved sensors yet to be sent to Thailand. I then went TOY to California to test a new sensor program designed by Hughes Aircraft, Electronics Department. We flew to Navy Air Base Los Alamitos to fly our test flights out over the Pacific.

We stayed at Buena Park next to Knots Berry Farm, the Wax Museum and Disneyland.

Hughes' test failed and we were sent back again as DCPG wanted that equipment approved. I used my technicians to help change a few things to pass their test.

Hughes got a lot of money for this project on equipment we never used.

I did fly one of our EC-121Rs down to Davis-Monthan AFB to mothball it. We were told that the plane had to be made ready to fly again so all its problems were fixed in case it was needed again.

While I watched this process, several men in coveralls came in to start removing all the ARR-52s, the AN/ARC 89 S band ADR relay device and all our communications radios. I asked but was told to ignore seeing the sensor backend equipment being recovered by the Navy.

After I was the sent to McClellan AFB, I was told to go back to Arizona to recover the mothballed plane to take it to Tel Aviv Israel. We were selling one of our planes to Israeli's Air Force and I was to go over to teach them how to use the equipment.

I told my boss that this could be done because I had seen all the sensor equipment removed. They believed me and the program was cancelled.

It would have been an interesting trip for me since I knew was getting out on July 31, 1971.

I knew that everything was changing with our sensor program over in SEA and that there was no future for this program.

The Navy's Observation Squadron Sixty-Seven (VO -67) existed for just a little over a year, a total of 500 days, from February 1967 to July 1968. The "Observation" in the name is meaningless. It hid, at the time, what was a highly classified mission. The "67" stood for the year it came into being. VO-67 was a vital part of project Muscle Shoals. The mission of the project was to detect, classify, hinder and penalize the North Vietnamese Army infiltration into the South. Steel Tiger was the code name for the Ho Chi Minh trail in Laos. IGLOO WHITE was the code-name for the technologies associated with the project located at NKP and operated by USAF Task Force Alpha.

After intense personnel training and extensive modifications to twelve P2V-S Neptune aircraft, now OP-2E's, the squadron deployed to Nakhon Phanom Royal Thai Air Force Base, Thailand, nine miles from the Laotian boarder. Since being officially declassified in 1998 the story of this unique aircraft squadron can now be told. Do to its then very sensitive and secret operations, few records were made or exist. Because its flight crews were constantly in jeopardy of being shot down and captured few details of individual combat missions, performance, and accomplishments were shared. Each squadron member had his part of the story and little else. The many acts of heroism and sacrifice the flight crews endured will forever remain undocumented.

The concept of the VO-67 mission was not totally unique. As Navy ASW crews search for and track submarines in our world's oceans, VO-67 would search the sea of green jungle in Laos and Vietnam for truck and troop movements south along the famous "Ho Chi Minh Trail". The dangerous air space above the trail, "The Hard Air", that place where death lingered will remain etched in the minds of all who served there. The trail was regarded as one of the most heavily defended areas in the Vietnam War. Many 37 and S7mm radar controlled AAA guns 'Firecan' and small arms awaited the slow lumbering OP-2E Neptune's as they made there long straight line run in to implant the coded sensors. The squadron would eventually implant several thousand "Acoubuoys" (electronic listening devices) along the trail. At times approaching the target area at 50 feet above the terrain then popping up to 500 feet just before the target, implant sensors, and then a max-power jinking clime out. VO-67 was also the only aircraft squadron, of any service, to use the famous Norden Bombsight during the Vietnam War. The sight was used to implant the "Adsid" sensor, Air Delivered Seismic Detection Sensor, at altitudes of 2000 to 3000 feet.

The squadron has also been cited for its intense aerial support of the Marine base at Khe Sanh, South Vietnam, during the 1968 Tet Offensive. VO-67 implanted sensor fields around the base that was under siege by over 20,000 NVA troops supported tanks and anti-aircraft weapons. Marines at the base believe their casualties would have been double had the sensors not been used. In 2005 the enlisted combat flight crews of VO-67 were awarded the silver "Combat Aircrew Wings "by the Marine Corps, a high honor indeed.

Estimates of 75% loss of VO-67 Aircraft and combat crews by planners fortunately did not occur. Thanks to the Air Force FAC Pilots training and intelligence reports only 3 aircraft and 20 crewmembers were lost. The FAC Pilots taught the VO-67 pilots how to survive the heavily defended air space over the trail.

The men of VO-67 were dedicated to the mission they assigned. After each aircraft shot down with the loss of their close friends and fellow airmen, their resolve became more determined to stop the flow of war supplies down the Ho Chi Minh trail.

The VO-67 ground support teams were also extremely instrumental in the success of this special mission. VO-67 never lost an engine and operational aircraft were always ready for the next mission without fail.

When the squadron was abruptly disestablished in June of 1968,its members were scattered to the winds. Squadron members were sworn to secrecy and ordered never to talk about the mission they had participated in.

The VO-67 Squadron, an amazing and dedicated group of men that made up this very unique squadron assigned a mission never before performed. Throughout the history of our great nation, men like these came from all walks of life in times of need and performed unbelievable feats and many made the ultimate sacrifice for love of country, democracy and their fellow man.

VO-67 History

HUNTING FOR SUBMARINES IN THE MEKONG RIVER?

SEE: Additional History - VPNAVY - VO-67

At the height of the Vietnam War, a secret Navy 12 plane squadron arrived at the Nakhon Phanom Air Commando base in Thailand. The squadron aircraft were old P2V-SF anti-submarine patrol planes that had been considerably modified into armed, jungle green gun ships. Of course, every would-be comic that saw them at Nakhon Phanom asked, What's the Navy going to do, hunt for subs in the Mekong?

North Vietnam was moving massive amounts of munitions by truck and troops down the Ho Chi Minh Trail undetected in mid-1966. Secretary of Defense, Robert McNamara was opposed to attacking North Vietnam military targets and infrastructure and to stopping the movement of war materials into North Vietnam by mining their harbors as advocated by the military. In the fall of 1966, he ordered the military to submit a proposed plan for an anti-infiltration system designed to stop or greatly reduce the flow of men and war material from North Vietnam into South Vietnam. The quickest solution available was to modify and employ the Navy's sonobuoy (a listening device used to detect submarines underwater) to implant in the jungle canopy to detect the movement of NVA trucks and troops.

The converted sonobouys, dubbed 'Acoubuoys', were camouflaged jungle green and parachuted into the jungle, snagged in the top jungle canopy, and hung unseen high off the ground.

Sensitive microphones that replaced the hydrophones could pick up the sound of truck and troop movement below.
The Navy had a number of anti-submarine aircraft in its inventory with sonobuoy racks installed and capable of delivering the modified listening devices.
The Navy determined that available P2V-SFs would be the quickest and the best delivery platform to modify for implanting the modified sonobuoys along the Ho Chi Minh Trail.

By this stage of the war, the North Vietnamese Army (NVA) had heavily fortified the trail with highly mobile ZPU-23mm, 37mm, and some radar controlled S7mm guns. Survivability of the slow, lumbering P2V-SF in this environment was questionable. But the need was urgent; our troops in South Vietnam were taking heavy casualties. The Defense Department decided to deploy the P2V-SFs to provide an interim capability until Air Force F-4 jets could be modified to take over the task.

The initial overhaul was done in three phases at the Martin Aircraft Company in Baltimore, MD. This overhaul and replacement of electronics included installing new self-sealing bladder fuel tanks (capable of holding 2800 gallons of fuel and sustaining small arms and shrapnel hits), and painting the aircraft a flat, jungle green. After this modification, the aircraft were redesignated as the OP-2E.

Modifications to the aircraft continued well into the deployment and operational phase of the squadron. Much of the modification work was done by the VO-67 squadron maintenance organization. The APS-20E submarine search radar, with its large radar dome, and the MAD gear and boom (used to magnetically detect submerged submarines) were removed. Wingtip tanks were removed and extensive armor plating was added, primarily in the bombardier's nose station, cockpit, flight deck, and the aft gunner's stations to protect the crews. Two under wing SUU-ll six-barreled mini guns were installed

A 'Chaff' dispenser was added aft where the MAD boom had protruded. LORAN C, a new version of the Long Range Aide to Navigation, replaced the old LORAN system used by the Navy at that time and was used to drop sensors during the monsoon season Internal mounts for the M-60 machine guns were installed at both hatches in the after station of the OP-2E aircraft. These hand-held 7.62mm guns fired 550 rounds per minute and were manned by two crewmembers.

To facilitate egress for the crew forward of the wing beam to bailout, the deck hatch to the nose gear tunnel was enlarged. Threat-detection electronics and a terrain-clearance radar were added. Bomb bay racks were fabricated to carry additional Acoubuoys. A Norden bombsight as installed in the plexiglass nose of the OP-2E.

This was the result of the added mission of implanting the Air-delivered Seismic Detection Sensor (ADSID) that presented a problem that the old P2V aircraft was not equipped to handle. The addition of the J-34s to the P2V-5Fs had reduced the under-wing launch stubs from 16 to 8 stations.VO-67 overcame this shortage of stations by using MER weapon racks that could hold three ADSIDS on each of these eight stations. However, the real problem was the lack of an accurate delivery system for the ADSIDS. Navy patrol plane pilots dropped sonobuoys and torpedoes at low altitude by sight or timing. An accurate means of dropping the ADSID from 2500 feet or higher was needed.

The Norden bombsight had been used extensively in WW-II and had been installed in the Navy's PB4Y-2 aircraft. VO-67 requested Norden bombsights and after demonstrating their accuracy at Eglin AFB, Pentagon officials agreed that the Norden bombsight was what was needed and had the Rock Island Arsenal overhaul twelve bombsights (for this they had to locate and recall retired WW-II Norden bombsight technicians).

An Air Force Norden bombsight instructor, Lt Col Conrad Brown, was found and sent to NAS Alameda, California to help train the bombardiers. Lt Col Brown located a battered copy of a WW-II training film on the Norden bombsight in the Smithsonian Institute. He had it shipped PRIORITY ONE to VO-67 and used it to train the Squadron bombardiers. Lt Col Brown deployed with the squadron to continue training the VO-67 third pilots who developed into qualified bombardiers.

The first flight of three OP-2Es departed NAS Alameda, California on 6 November 1967 for Nakhon Phanom Royal Thai Air Force Base (NKP) in Thailand led by CAPT Wallace 'Wally' Sharp. The last flight of three OP-2Es arrived at Nakhon Phanom on 15 November 1967. Much credit for the smooth deployment must be given to the Air Force Military Air Transport service for the professional job they did in moving the rest of the squadron. Eighteen C-141s arrived at NAS Alameda, California right on schedule. Because of the runway landing Weight limitations at Nakhon Phanom, each C-141 was limited to 45,000 pounds of cargo. One after another they were efficiently loaded and departed with loads ranging from large electronic vans to administrative files. In all, they airlifted 629,021 pounds of VO-67 personnel and cargo to NKP.

The personnel compliment of VO-67 when they arrived at NKP was 1 Captain, 8 Commanders, 3 Commander Selectees,5 Lieutenant Commanders, 40 junior officers, 23 Chief Petty Officers, 220 rated enlisted personnel, and 14 Airmen. They also had 5 civilian representatives attached to the squadron; 1 from Lockheed, 1 from Hazeltine, 1 from Martin Marietta, and 2 from Sandia Lab.

On arrival at Nakhon Phanom, the VO-67 pilots immediately began flying combat missions with the Air Force FACs (Forward Air Controllers) in the small Cessna 0-2A (Nail) aircraft to familiarize themselves with the Ho Chi Minh Trail and enemy gun emplacements. The Air Force FAC pilots helped the newly arrived Navy pilots tremendously. The FAC pilots became a valuable intelligence asset to the VO-67. CAPT Sharp initiated a close working relationship shortly after VO-67's arrival at NKP by inviting the FAC pilots to a party with the VO-67 pilots at the NKP Officer's club. The FACs flew every day and night and kept track, for their own survival and that of the strike aircraft they marked the targets for, of where the North Vietnamese moved their antiaircraft guns. The FACs that had flown the night before provided the latest NVA triple-A firing positions for the following day's VO-67 combat missions.

Close friendships developed among the Air Force FAC and Navy pilots; two of them were highly instrumental in the later rescue of seven VO-67 crew members after their plane was hit by AAA fire and they bailed out over hostile territory. The Air Force 0-2A FAC, A-1E, and Navy VO-67 pilots at Nakhon Phanom quickly bonded into a mutual respect support group.

Each VO-67 crew was responsible for planning their own assigned missions. They studied the NVA triple-A gun positions and terrain to determine the safest light path and altitude profile in and out of the target area. Some missions were as simple as diving from 12,000 feet on the sensor implant heading, leveling off at drop altitude, slowing to drop airspeed, laying the sensor string, and climbing back to 12,000 feet and heading home. Drop altitude for the Acoubuoys was always 500 feet.

The ADSIDS were dropped from 2,500 feet and later 5,000 feet. Missions in heavy areas of enemy AAA concentrations required the crews to use terrain masking wherever possible. The high karst outcroppings in some target areas were ideal for this tactic. Some called for jinking dives to sensor implant altitude and numerous heading changes to the target to avoid the anti-aircraft gun emplacements. Acoubuoy drops in heavily defended areas were made by running into the area at tree top level, popping up to 500 feet, laying the sensors, dropping back to the deck and flying safest route out.

On 11 January 1968, the VO-67 Executive Officer (XO), CDR Dell Olson, was on an Acoubuoy drop mission over the Ho Chi Minh Trail; at 9:57 AM radio contact with his aircraft was lost (the FAC working the mission had also lost visual contact with the OP-2E). Two other OP-2Es were working the trail that morning. They tried to reestablish radio contact with Crew 2. One OP-2E went under the overcast and spent three hours searching the area. There were some karst outcropping in the area but it was mostly dense jungle. The base of the overcast was above the highest terrain in the area so they were able to search the whole area. The jungle was so dense in most places that a plane crashing into it would not leave a discernible entry point and the crash could not be seen from the air. No trace of the Crew 2 aircraft was found by the searching VO-67 aircraft.

On 23 January an Air Force A-1 located a suspected crash site. On 25 January an 0-2 from Nakon Phanom photographed the site. Photo interpretation determined that the wreckage was that of BUNO 131436, Crew 2's aircraft. It was located on the north side of a cliff, 150 feet below the 4,583-foot ridgeline. Due to the hostile environment in the crash site area, it was decided not to insert an Investigation and Recovery team.

On February 17, 1968, CDR Glenn Hayden and his Crew 5 were dropping Acoubuoys over the trail in Laos. He had two F-4 escorts out of DaNang and an 0-2A FAC spotter. After coming off his first target run, CDR Hayden reported that they had been hit by small arms fire in the starboard wing but were continuing on with their second assigned target run. During the second run, the fighter escort radioed to the OP-2E that its starboard engine was on fire, CDR Hayden acknowledged and reported that he was aborting the mission and returning to base.

The F-4s climbed through the overcast with the intention of joining the OP-2E on top and escorting him back to base. The last radio transmission they heard from the OP-2E was, 'We're beat up pretty bad .... .'. The F-4s dropped back down below the overcast and found the burning wreckage of the OP-2E; no parachutes were seen or emergency beepers were heard.

Ten days later, VO-67 suffered its third combat loss on 27 February. CDR Paul Milius's OP-2E was shot down while implanting sensors in Laos. The aircraft was flying at 5,000 feet above the jungle tops. There weren't any 57mm radar controlled guns reported to be in the area of his drop, but if it wasn't that, had to be the best 37mm gun crew in the world. No flack was spotted before the aircraft was hit, so it almost had to be a direct hit on the first salvo. The aircraft was hit in the radar well area where the old APS -20E radar had been removed. One crewman, P02 John F. Hartzheim, was killed instantly. The hydraulic and electrical systems were severely damaged and the aircraft immediately filled with acrid smoke and fumes. CDR Milius ordered his crew to bail out. He remained at the controls of the stricken aircraft until the remaining seven crewmen had successfully bailed out.

One 02 FAC pilot, Major Sam Weaver, flew alongside MR-7 as the crew bailed out and kept a plot where each crewman had landed. Another FAC pilot, Major Phil Maywald also came to assist in the rescue. The 'Sandys', A-1H aircraft, that provided fire protection for downed airmen, and the rescue helicopters, better known as the 'Jolly Greens' and 'Buffs', were soon on the scene. Sandys were from the 602nd Fighter Commando Squadron and helicopters from the 37th Air Rescue Squadron at Nakhon Phanom participated in the rescue along with other Air Rescue Recovery Squadrons from DaNang and Udorn. The FACs vectored the helos to each of the downed crewmen. Since they were in a very hostile area, the helos wasted no time in picking up the crew and getting out of there.

CDR Milius was seen to bailout, but never located and listed as MIA. He was promoted to the Rank of Captain on 1 July 1972. On 26 April 1978, he was officially pronounced 'presumed killed in action' and posthumously awarded the Navy Cross.

On 23 November 1996, the Aegis Guided Missile Destroyer Milius (DDG 69) was commissioned in his honor at the Ingalls Shipbuilding, Pascagoula, Mississippi.

On 29 February 1968, two days after MR-7 was shot down, the last one of the 12 fully modified OP-2Es arrived at NKP. With the three losses, VO-67 was now a nine-plane squadron. MR-ll was repainted to MR-7 and the rescued members of Crew 7 continued to fly as a crew.

The North Vietnamese Tet offensive of 1968 was an all-out effort to take the U.S. Marine Base at Khe Sanh. On 22 January 1968 VO-67 commenced implanting extensive Acoubuoy sensor fields around the combat base and it's approaches to assist in lifting the siege of the Marine stronghold.

The special bomb bay racks to hold additional Acoubuoys in the OP-2E were used for the first time in the close-in support of Khe Sanh. These Acoubuoy flights were classic mission profiles of Squadron developed tactics and what they had trained for in California and Florida. The OP-2Es came into the area skimming above the jungle tree tops or rivers, popped up to 500 feet, laid their string of sensors, dropped back down on the deck, and got the hell out of there as fast as the old, lumbering patrol planes would take them!

Estimates of the number of North Vietnamese that took part in the siege of Khe Sanh vary, but most agree there were upwards of 20,000 NVA troops supported by tanks and anti-aircraft weapons. The latter accounted for eight U.S. aircraft during January and February. VO-67 flight crews that participated in implanting Acquobuoys in defense of Khe Sanh were awarded the Navy Commendation Metal with Combat 'V' for missions that were, of the very highest priority' and for achieving their goals, '-- despite poor weather, rugged terrain and enemy defenses which included surface-to-air missiles and anti-aircraft guns'.

On May 25 1968, the Chief of Naval Operations set the date for the disestablishment of VO-67 as of 1 July 1968. At that time the mission was to be taken over by the Air Force's 25th Tactical Fighter Squadron. In June of 1968, the squadron received a message from the Navy disestablishing VO-67.As of 1 July 1968, the squadron no longer existed; personnel were ordered to return to the States for further assignment.

The last squadron combat mission implanting sensors was on 25 June 1968. VO-67 lost 25% of its aircraft in combat and 20 crewmen, less than half of what the planners had expected and predicted. This was due to the outstanding airmanship of one of the finest multi-engine squadrons ever assembled.

However, a large part of the credit must be given to the Air Force FAC pilots at NKP and the training and intelligence they provided the VO-67 pilots. They taught the VO-67 pilots the Ho Chi Minh Trail and how to survive in the air spaces over it. The FAC pilots returning from night missions would mark the maps in NKP Intelligence with the location of the AAA guns they saw firing. This knowledge was an invaluable contribution to the survival of the OP -2E missions the next day.

Capt Sharp became fast friends with Lt Col Palaster, the Commanding Officer of the 0-2 FAC Squadron, as did many of the VO-67 pilots. He was so respected that when he was promoted to full Colonel while at Nakhon Phanom, the officers of VO-67 threw him a traditional Navy 'wetting down' party and made him an Honorary Naval Aviator.

The FAC pilots flying the little 02 aircraft came from Air Force fighter, attack, and even SAC commands and their daring and courage was respected by all the Air Force, Navy, and Marine pilots in the Vietnam War. The Navy and VO-67 owe a deep debt of gratitude to these brave pilots and good friends.

Air Force reported that truck kills tripled, for a like period, after the sensors were implanted and used How many American and South Vietnamese lives were saved by the courage and sacrifices of VO-67 in successfully planting sensors along the Ho Chi Min Trail and around Khe Sanh will never be known. The to detect and pinpoint targets. Senior Marine officers estimated at casualties at the siege of Khe Sanh would have been double that experienced if it had notbeen for the sensors implanted by the VO-67 Navy crews.

New York City Vietnam Veterans "Welcome Home" Parade On May 7, 1985
By Jim Velcheck

Delta Co. 1st Bn, 1st Marines, 1st Marine Division - 10/67 – 08/68

Marching in the New York City Vietnam Veterans Welcome Home Parade was a memorable experience for me, one that I will never forget. What made it so memorable was the enthusiasm of the parade watchers and the camaraderie of what for many of us was the first attempt to reconnect with our fellow Vietnam Veterans; this was certainly true for me. When we first came home from Vietnam – for me that was August 1968 – we resumed our lives from where we had left off before we left for the service. Some of us had a more difficult time with that return to civilian life than others and for most of us it took some amount of time before we were ready to examine our Vietnam experiences and attempt to reconnect with those with whom we had served. This parade was held seventeen years after my return from Vietnam and pretty much corresponded with my readiness to reconnect with my Vietnam experience and comrades.

Some Vietnam Veterans I had spoken with before the parade were not interested in participating in it. They said things like "Too little, too late!". They were still bitter at the way the war was conducted and the treatment they received when they returned home from the government, veterans organizations and from some elements of American society. They would have marched in a parade right after they came home, but because society blamed the Vietnam Veteran for a lot of the negativity associated with the war, and because of the way the war ended gradually and without a victory, the mood of the country, civilian and veteran, was not conducive to parades at the time we came home. Over time, however, society changed and realized that the veteran did not lose the war.

Welcome Home Parades were held in many cities around the country. When I heard that the NYC parade was going to be held I knew I wanted to participate. It was a wonderful experience! This change in societal attitude has evolved into support for today's war veterans and is why we now hear "Thank you for your service" from so many people. I know that some Vietnam Vets are uncomfortable hearing that , but I do appreciate hearing it and typically respond "Thank you for your Thank You; I appreciate it, we did not hear that in the past when we first came home".

I grew up in South Bound Brook, New Jersey, a small town about 30 miles outside New York City. I graduated from Bound Brook High School in 1965 and went to work at first one then another local factory. I don't remember having any early interest in joining any branch of the military. I do remember my US History teacher in high school, Mr. Weidner, telling us boys that some of us would likely serve in the military in the conflict in Vietnam that was just then heating up. I didn't think it was likely that I would. A while after graduation one of my best friends decided he was going to join the Marine Corps. I said to him "Good luck, buddy, more power to ya". I still had no interest in the military. Then he issued a dare. That got to me. I went right off to the Marine recruiting office and joined up!

Anyway, when I got out in 1968 I worked for a year and then went to college for a year. I got married to my lovely wife, Sara (45 years in February, 2016), and had three kids within 2 ½ years (first a girl then twin boys). I was too busy to think about Vietnam or the people I served with there. I was doing rotating shift work in a factory and working on the weekends as a bartender at the Riverside Pub, a local neighborhood bar in South Bound Brook co-owned by a friend of mine. So seventeen years was just about the right amount of time for me to have developed the interest in getting back in touch with my experiences and the people I served with. I'm sure that the dedication of The Vietnam Memorial in Washington DC just a few years previous to the parade was also a factor in making me ready.

During construction of The Wall I was not too interested in it. The controversy over the design and the fact that I was just so busy with life contributed to my lack of interest. But then over the months after it was dedicated I developed a strong interest in seeing it. When I finally got up the nerve to mention that to my wife the Spring after the dedication she said "You should go to DC by yourself next weekend and see The Wall." My mother had saved all the letters I sent home and she gave them all to me. I went to The Wall, got a room at the Alexandria WMCA (all I could afford) and read all the letters and cried when all the memories came flooding back. I was then ready to reconnect.

The day of the parade I was working midnight shift. I took a bus into New York City to Cadman Plaza, just on the Brooklyn side of the Brooklyn Bridge where the parade was forming. There were thousands of Vietnam Veterans milling about. They made an announcement "All Marines to the front!" Everyone was asking "What unit were you with?" and "When were you there?" trying to reconnect with people we served with. Some people actually wrote their units and dates on the back of their shirts to let people know in their attempt to reconnect. After the officials and dignitaries stepped off to start the parade they fed in a group of 50 or so Marines. Between each group of veterans they would insert a band or some other organization. I was in that first group. I had pretty well checked out everybody in that group and didn't reconnect with anybody I had served with. They apparently didn't have a band ready so after the first group of Marines they just left a gap and then another group of 50 or so Marines.

We were in the middle of the Brooklyn Bridge when I decided I would stand to the side and wait for the next group to catch up so I could join them and check out that group. I joined the first ranks of that second group and as we came down into Manhattan we could see the crowds of people and the tickertape coming down on the first group. There was at least one fireboat in the river spraying red, white and blue water up into the air. A flight of Huey gunships flew over the bridge. It was a wonderful experience! We were coming down Broadway as pretty much just a mob when a vet in a Park Service uniform, who said he had been a DI, got out in front of us and started calling cadence. We straightened up, formed ranks and started marching like Marines!

At some point I noticed the man marching next to me on my left in that front rank was looking at me as though he recognized me. He was not someone I recognized at all. Eventually we started talking as we marched. We asked each other the usual questions, "Who were you with?" and "When were you there?" Nothing matched. He was with the 26th Marines and was in Khe Sanh for the siege. I was with 1/1 and didn't get in to the Khe Sanh area until I participated in Operation Pegasus that broke the siege and was on hills 558, 881S and 689 up until the Khe Sanh area was abandoned in July 1968 (Check out the photos of me on Hill 689!). He didn't look at all familiar to me. Finally, I said to him

"I don't think we know each other." He wouldn't let it go. He kept looking at me and I could see he was still trying to make the connection. Finally, he got a big smile on his face, snapped his fingers and exclaimed "I got it, you're one of the bartenders at the Riverside Pub!"

You know him as Sid Patricio, otherwise known as "Fish". I can't imagine how he got that nickname. Sid had a car repair garage in New Brunswick just a few miles away from my home and a friend of his was one of the owners of the Riverside Pub, the bar in South Bound Brook, where I was part-time bartender. He had been in a few times and recognized me from there. Small world! Sid paid my first dues for the Khe Sanh Vet organization. I still owe you $20, Sid!

I had my camera with me at the parade and took the accompanying pictures. I also have a DVD of the parade that was produced by an educational video company. It shows Sid and me marching in the front rank. If any of you were in that parade and would like a copy of the DVD get in touch JimVelcheck@msn.com). Included are also pictures of my wife and a couple of our kids at the Vietnam Veterans Memorial in Lower Manhattan that was dedicated at the same time as the parade. The only Khe Sanh Vet reunion I have made it to was the one in DC in 1993 when the Memorial Plaque and tree (See photos) were dedicated in the pouring rain! I do hope to make it to another reunion before too much longer.

Welcome Home everyone and thank you for your service!

LOUIS F. ARMBRUSTER, CAPTAIN USAF, 20TH TACTICAL AIR SUPPORT SQUADRON AT KHE SANH

I was a FAC (Forward Air Controller), flying the O1E (Bird Dog), a little puddle jumping, high wing Cessna, 213 hp single engine, tractor propeller driven airplane with a tailwheel. It was an excellent observation platform because both side windows could be opened for a clear unobstructed view or magnified with 7X50 binoculars. Our typical ordinance was four 2.75 inch rockets, two under each wing for marking targets. I also carried rifle grenades in the pouches behind my cockpit seat with the smoke bombs. This was very low tech like Snoopy in the Peanuts cartoon flying his Sopwith Camel during WWI. I would stick a rifle grenade out the right window, pull the pin, fly a track over the intended target, estimate a reverse lead, and let go. The grenade was stabilized with a circular fin and would detonate on ground contact. It wasn't a Norton bomb sight, but with a little guesstimating practice, surprising accuracy was possible. This would be too dangerous for close air support, but a technique used with some success for harassing the enemy. We also carried an AR15 (the M16 precursor) in the airplane, because we weren't issued parachutes, and if we were forced down, any rifle would be better protection than our 6 shot .38 Special Smith & Wesson revolver. We were specifically instructed not to trade shots out the window with any enemy, especially those protected behind a tree or in a foxhole, because it wouldn't be prudent from a vulnerable position without cover.

Khe Sanh FACs flew four different types of missions while I was there. One of our missions was artillery support. Around June, 1967 I flew a Marine, 1st Lt. "Lucky" Luciano, in my back seat, while he directed a 105 mm artillery strike north of base and south of hill 1015. All I had to do was keep us out of the shells trajectory to observe impact. Another mission was going north of the DMZ into the SAM (surface to air missile) environment of North Vietnam, looking for targets of opportunity. I heard of a SAM blowing a USAF O1E out of the sky, because he was directing air strikes on a high value target. Normally, the NVA wouldn't waste a SAM on us. I was only assigned into North Vietnam two times. Still another mission was working with Army Ranger SOG patrol teams doing insertions and extractions via helicopter.

Our primary mission and about 90% of my activity involved daytime patrol of the Ho Chi Minh trail in Laos. We were tasked with interdicting war supplies moving on the Ho Chi Minh trail from North Vietnam through Laos into South Vietnam. This trail was actually a dirt road capable of handling heavy trucks and tanks. In July of 1967 my first mission of each day would reveal new trails constructed by bulldozers overnight just west of Khe Sanh in Laos. This was part of the NVA buildup for the 68 Siege.

Shortly after daybreak on July 21, 1967 I was in Laos just west of where a branch of the trail dropped into the north end of the Ahe Shau valley. I was trying to locate a 37mm anti-aircraft gun on a ridge line I saw previously until the NVA camouflaged it, and I lost visual contact in a turn. Due to the early horizontal sunlight I spotted 3 long hootches with grass thatched roofs, under a triple jungle canopy near the main trail road. I had flown this same area multiple times previously, but always under typical daytime vertical lighting so the hootches never stood out. After making a mental note of the location, I continued flying down the road, like I hadn't seen anything. The airborne C-130 Command Post call sign, "Hillsboro," handed me a flight of 2 USAF A1E Skyraiders. After they came on station, I went back to the hootch complex and dove in marking the target with a 2.75 inch rocket having a 10 pound white phosphorous warhead. It exploded producing dense white smoke, and I advised Skyraider lead to "hit my smoke". They had unusually large bombs that day, 5,000 pounders to the best of my recollection, mounted centerline under the fuselage. When the flight leader's bomb exploded a visible fog concussion wave moved outward through the humid air till the blast buffeted my aircraft.

I adjusted Skyraider #2 to hit 12 o'clock from lead's impact on their attack heading. After the dust and leaves settled, I went over the target for a closer look. Now I could see a zigzag trenchline in the perimeter around what remained of the hootches. The NVA knew they were spotted and cut loose with everything they had. A golden bullet came through the lower door on the right side, penetrated my map case and shattered my right femur leg bone. My knee and lower leg was displaced about 4 inches higher than my upper thigh due to the seatbelt securing my hips. I was alone in my airplane, so I made a radio call to the fighters and another O1E pilot who was observing the mission from high cover, that I was hit. The other Bird Dog pilot was a newbie on his first flight out of Khe Sanh and I recall some initial confusion over whether my airplane was hit or if I was physically hit. As that was being clarified, I took a direct course for Khe Sanh, since that was the closest friendly runway in enemy territory.

The two Skyraiders broke off their attack to escort me home, but couldn't render any direct assistance. I was on my own! I knew there was a tourniquet somewhere in my survival vest, but I couldn't find it, so I improvised with a gill net for survival fishing instead. I wanted to keep from bleeding out by tying the net with a knot on my upper leg above the wound. After that was as tight as I could get it, I became aware of shock setting in, because I was having unusual difficulty operating the radio. I finally got contact with Rich Coppess, who was our Air Force Intel guy at Khe Sanh. (He later told me he thought I blacked out 3 or 4 times, but I don't recall loosing consciousness, and probably wouldn't remember if I did.) Then he gave me the winds, which were the next bad news. They were out of the south and a direct crosswind to the runway at 30 knots. It didn't matter wind wise which way I landed. The runway had a substantial slope downhill to the east and uphill to the west.

Landing a taildragger airplane in a strong crosswind is an adventure even with two good legs for rudder and brake directional control. I opted to land uphill and let gravity help slow me down. I knew the wind would weathervane me left to the south, so I landed on the extreme right side of the runway in a crab. The wind immediately caught my vertical stabilizer causing the O1E to veer sharply left, raising the right wheel off the ground till the left wing contacted the metal plank runway. Now I was going south across the runway and wound up in the first string of concertina wire, which wrapped around the idling prop, stopping it. That ignited a trip flare attached to the concertina wire burning under my engine while the plane was leaking 100 octane gasoline. I looked up to see several Marines on top of a defensive bunker beyond the wires, giving me a look that said, What is this crazy fly boy trying to do?" Luckily again, the same winds that sent me off the runway blew the fumes away from the flare, till a big Marine with about a size 13 boot stomped it out.

While I was landing west, Rich was driving east down the runway in a jeep. He had witnessed other FAC pilots burn to death in crashes, and it isn't a pretty sight or any bodies first choice of ways to go. Rich got to me quickly, within seconds of my stopping. As they tried to pull me out of the cockpit, my right leg didn't want to follow. I quickly and loudly hollered to advise them of the problem. After I was extricated from the wrecked O1E, they placed me in the back of the jeep and took me to the field hospital tent. The Navy surgeon on duty chuckled and said the sharply deformed jacket of the bullet had brushed my femoral artery and I was lucky to have a flexible and rubbery artery due to being only 25 years old. He also said I was even more lucky to be going home, and gave me the bullet for a souvenir, which I have to this day.

Ultimately I was air evacuated via Danang AB, Yakota AFB, Elmendorf AFB, and Andrews AFB, to Wright-Patterson AFB hospital, from where I walked away on a cane 13 months later. I watched the siege of Khel Sanh on the TV evening news from my hospital bed. That experience was paradoxical, because on one hand I was glad to be safely home, but on the other I felt guilty for not being able to help my brothers, who were completely surrounded.

Now that I am retired in the autumn of my years, I have more time to reminisce and reprocess what happened at Khe Sanh. I was surprised by some of the details I remembered, and have second guessed my decision to land west. There wasn't a procedure for this scenario in my check list, so I just wanted to get down to terra firma and land as soon as possible, while still conscious.

Today, from the comfort of my easy chair, and not in shock from trauma and blood loss, I have thought of other options like landing east downhill, or even south across the runway into the wind. No one can predict those outcomes with certainty, so now we will never know anyway. I remember an AF Officer asking me while I was drugged up in the Da Nang hospital why I didn't use my AR15 to push on the right rudder for directional control. I don't remember what I said, but I know exactly what I was thinking.

"You no good REMF can dream up all sorts of solutions from the safety of your desk. Let's see what can you can think of when you're wounded and in shock!"

The bottom line is I survived the landing without additional injury, even if the O1E was totaled. Today, I wish I had written this experience immediately after learning about the Khe Sanh Vets organization, and becoming a lifetime member. If I had done that, brothers who are now gone or currently in the fog of dementia, could have shared their memories

I would like to solicit information from anyone who saw or remembers my crash landing on the south side of Khe Sanh runway the morning of July 21, 1967. I would also appreciate any pictures of my damaged O1E airplane in the wire, and apologize to the Marines who had to repair the wire. My e-mail is la97113@yahoo.com and/or cell 971-734-4234. Thanks for reading this far to the conclusion.

RICH COPPESS COVEY 5A
KHE SANH VETERAN
RICH COPPESS MEMORY OF
INCIDENT IN LOU ARMBRUSTER ARTICLE

In 1967 I was the "S2" in Marine jargon for a Special Forces SOG unit at Khe Sanh. My call sign was 5 Alpha and I flew dozens of missions into Laos and occasionally, "North". Also I briefed our pilots before missions and debriefed them afterward, forwarding on to DaNang the results along with photos taken by myself or our pilots. In addition I directed air and artillery strikes.

In early June LtCol. Jack Roberts introduced me to a young replacement pilot, Lou Armbruster, instructing me to share our mission and brief him on operations. I informed the Capt. that I would prepare a set of maps for him. An hour or so later he returned for his maps. I had not yet had time to work on them as I had more important things to do. Lou left somewhat agitated. He returned about a half hour later and informed me that Col. Jack had explained to him the facts of life at Khe Sanh. He then said "what can I do to help you? In the 14 months I spent at Khe Sanh Lou was the only Pilot that ever helped me prepare his maps. They included a set of 5 topographical maps with all target designations printed on them and covered with a heavy clear plastic. Lou still has them today. We became instant best friends.
On 21 July I had returned from an early flight and overheard Lou's emergency call. I grabbed the radio mike and asked his condition as well as the planes. I sent the radio operator out of the bunker to watch for Lou's plane. Lou kept passing out or at times not able to answer. I just kept yelling at him. When he was in sight I jumped in a jeep, drove to the aid tent, picked up a stretcher and a medic and headed east down the flight line. Lou was about to touch down. Because we had such a strong cross wind I knew the plane would careen off to the south side of the runway as Lou could not control the rudder as his right femur was shattered. The plane crashed into a sandbag guard post and concertina wire with several trip flares ignited by the crash. I was horrified at the thought of Lou being burned to death as I had witnessed 3 other pilots suffer that fate. I was the second one to reach the plane as a gunny in the guard post was first, exclaiming "I can't get the____ door open. I pushed him aside yelling I can get the door ____open and did so. I was so afraid the plane would go up in flames I was determined Lou would not! We are still best of friends to this day.

VIETNAM VETERAN SURVIVED INJURIES, EARNED SILVER STAR

Though a "million dollar wound" gave his time in Vietnam an early end, Capt. Ronald Hoover stands as one of the most accomplished Marines to have been involved in the war.

Hoover, 79, of Carlisle, enlisted in the Marine Corps in 1954. He said his decision to enlist was inspired by several of his friends who had enlisted before him.

"I had some friends from high school that went in (to the Marines) during the Korean time," Hoover said. "They came back and we were talking, and I said that the Marines was the place I wanted to go. I thought the Marine Corps was the best outfit. I made a lot of good friends there and decided I would stay and make 20 years out of it."

During his career, Hoover served two tours at Marine Corps Recruit Depot Parris Island, South Carolina as a drill instructor and he also served on the Inspector Instructor staff of the 78th Rifle Company in Williamsport. He achieved the title of Master of Fitness, which had only been accomplished by 22 Marines ever at the time of his retirement.

Hoover served in two tours during Vietnam. His first tour was spent with Alpha Company, Third Reconnaissance Battalion from 1966 to 1967.

"One of the big problems we had was when we would get in a situation out there, we would sometimes run up against 30 to 40 guys and we would need some kind of support," Hoover said. "We were responsible for each other and (for) making sure that all the people we had were coming home safe and sound; that was the primary thing in my mind." After coming back to the United States for three months, Hoover returned to Vietnam for a second tour from 1968 to 1969 – this time as Company Commander of India Company, Third Battalion, 26th Marines.

"The situation I was in as a commander was similar to that movie 'We Were Soldiers,'" Hoover said. "We walked into three machine guns one night and we lost 157 marines in about two hours. We stayed there the whole night and we actually had hand-to-hand combat for about two hours. My company sergeant, from PA, got the medal of honor posthumously."

It was during this tour that Hoover suffered injuries significant enough to end his involvement in the war.

"A mortar round came in and blew me away and left me off the ground," Hoover said. "I had wounds in my back, arms and legs. I got my 'million dollar wound,' as they say; I did not go back into (Vietnam) again."

Hoover spent nine months at a hospital in Guam before he was finally transported back to the United States.

"I stayed (in Guam) for nine months and got put back together," Hoover said. "From there, I went to Okinawa and got back on my feet and came home."

Hoover was awarded the Silver Star – just one of a list of accumulated personal awards that includes a Bronze Star with combat valor, a Navy and Marine Corps Commendation Medal with combat valor, a Purple Heart, a Marine Corps Good Conduct Medal, a Vietnam Service Medal, a Vietnam Cross of Gallantry Star and a Vietnam Campaign Ribbon.

After officially retiring from the Marine Corps in 1974, Hoover remained involved with public service as a law enforcement official.

"I was a people person," Hoover said, "so I ended up going into law enforcement."

Hoover served as a deputy sheriff for 10 years with the Reno Nevada Sheriff's Department and served another 12 years with the California Department of Corrections before retiring again in 1994.

Hoover currently resides in Carlisle.
"I'm 79 years old and there is not too much I can do," Hoover said. "I'm kind of slowed down a bit, but I do what I can."

Hoover said that Vietnam, as a whole, should stand as a lesson to modern America.

The government needs to adhere to the lessons we learned in Vietnam," Hoover said. "We won the battles over there, but we did not win the wars."

TANKS INSIDE THE WIRE

Pete Meca

Sgt. Nickolas Fragos couldn't believe his eyes. North Vietnamese PT-76 tanks were moving on the Lang Troai Road, heading straight for the Special Forces camp at Lang Vei. Fragos dashed to the TOC (Tactical Operations Center) to report his observation. The 24 Americans at Lang Vei knew the odds were stacked against them. Seven would die, along with 309 Montagnard mercenaries and Vietnamese CIDG soldiers.

A young lieutenant, Paul Longgrear, was there to tackle the onslaught. This is his story.
He candidly admitted, "I was a pretty rotten kid. After being kicked out of high school, I was sent to live with an uncle in Oregon. He managed to straighten me out, a little, but after attending two different colleges that 'encouraged' me to join the military, I moved to California. Uncle Sam sent his 'greetings' in 1965."

On basic training at Fort Polk, La.: "I fell in love with the Army. I needed someone to point me in the right direction plus provide structure in my life. The Army fit the bill." Longgrear was an honor graduate.

He completed advanced infantry training at Fort Ord, Calif., then refused an offer to stay on as a drill instructor. "I wanted to go to Vietnam to kill the bad guys, then come home a hero," he said. "To my surprise, I wasn't as stupid as I thought. They sent me to OCS (Officer Candidate School)." In May of 1966, Longgrear pinned on the butter bars of a 2nd lieutenant at Fort Benning.

US Army 1ST LT Paul R. Longgrear is assisted by a US Marine during thr evacuation from Lang Vei, on 7 Feb 1968. Longgrear was wounded in the head, wrist, ankle.

Worried the war would be over before he could see action, Longgrear called the Pentagon for three straight weeks before a major asked him, "Are you sure about this?" Longgrear responded, "Major, I've called for three weeks. What else do I need to do?" Asked his choice of units, he told the major, "The Screaming Eagles, sir, the 101st Airborne." The major suggested Special Forces training. Longgrear asked, "You mean I'd get to wear a Green Beret?" The major concurred. Longgrear said, "Major, would you like a kiss?"

Married with his wife expecting, Longgrear reported to Fort Bragg, N.C. Awarded a Green Beret in June of 1967, Longgrear was finally en route to Nam in October, a week after the birth of their first child.

Assigned to a mobile strike force at Lang Vei Special Forces Camp near the South Vietnamese border with Laos, Longgrear recalled, "I was put in charge of a company of Montagnard mercenaries, mountain people, very ferocious and aggressive fighters. From October through January we patrolled near the Laotian border, but something just wasn't right. The enemy would not engage, they ran from a fight."
Unbeknownst to the men at Lang Vei, the North Vietnamese Army (NVA) was under orders to avoid combat to build up and position their forces for the upcoming infamous 1968 Tet Offensive. "We started receiving incoming every day near the end of January," Longgrear said. "The NVA positioned artillery inside the caves of Co Roc Mountain, across the Xe Pone River. Their artillery zeroed in on Lang Vie without using spotters because they could spot their own artillery from the mountain."

Lang Vei soon received a warning from the NSA to stop patrolling trails. The NSA had overheard NVA orders to set up ambushes and reposition men and equipment. The "beast" was stirring.

"The NVA overran the village of Khe Sanh near the Marine base in late January," Longgrear recalled. "Apparently they thought the Marines would bail out the village, but our mobile strike force hit the NVA from their rear. We killed a bunch of bad guys, but it caused the NVA to change tactics. Instead of using tanks against the Khe Sanh Marine base, they used two tank battalions against Lang Vei, that's 16 PT-76 tanks."
Feb. 6, 2330 hours: Sgt. Nickolas Fragos reports, "tanks inside the wire."

"That's when all your training kicks in," Longgrear said. "We left the TOC to man 81mm mortars. It was pitch dark outside, so we lit up the night with illumination rounds so the Montagnards could see the NVA infantry. A tank without infantry support is a rolling coffin."

The Lang Vei defenders used M-72 LAWs (Light Anti-armor Weapons) plus 106mm recoilless rifle fire to knock out 11 of the 16 tanks.

Early morning, Feb. 7: "Our defensive line had been decimated by then," Longgrear said. "We were out of LAWs, the NVA knocked out our 106mm, and their three or four remaining tanks commanded the ground. We surrounded the TOC to defend it as long as possible because they were calling in airstrikes and artillery support. At that time I engaged and killed a four-man sapper team."

An enemy tank pulled up and prepared to fire. Longgrear said, "We ran into the bunker, knowing reinforcements would be sent from Khe Sanh. Then we heard an NVA soldier yell, 'G.I., you surrender.' Somebody in the bunker shouted back something about his momma. 'G.I., you no surrender, we blow up bunker.' Someone else insinuated the soldier had had sex with this mother. Well, they blew the bunker by shoving an explosive charge down the side of an air vent. The blast knocked us out. When I awoke, I noticed a big hole in the wall. We fought for our lives."

The NVA attacked the bunker with grenades and flame throwers, but the survivors fought on. "We suddenly heard explosions and screams outside," Longgrear said. "Our A1E Skyraiders had arrived to bomb and strafe the enemy, but the battle continued, from dawn until 1630 that afternoon."

The TOC received disappointing news; the Marines from Khe Sanh were not coming to the rescue. With only seven Americans left in the bunker, the Marines claimed they would lose more than seven Leathernecks in a rescue attempt. "I was angry," Longgrear said. "I told the guys if they wanted to stay in the TOC and die like worms, that's up to them, but I'm going outside to at least die like a man."

Longgrear had 19 bullets left, one man had five rounds in a .45 automatic: they knew death awaited them topside. "The Skyraiders reported the NVA had occupied our former fighting positions for protection from the bombing and strafing," Longgrear said. "The flyboys kept the enemies' attention as we sprinted out. I told the men, 'if hit, stay on the ground.' A machine gun starting firing at me, but I knocked it out. Then my gun jammed. I'd been wounded in the head, my wrist, and ankle. Trying to run, my ankle popped and I went head over heels. I'd injured my arm, plus everybody had left me. At first I got mad, but then realized that's what I'd told them to do if hit."

As Longgrear awaited his fate, he thought of his spouse, a very religious lady. "I gave my life to the Lord," he said. "I got saved, then got up and got off that hill. We rendezvoused with a chopper out of Khe Sanh, and well, that's why we're able to have this conversation today."

Longgrear received extended medical care in the Philippines, then Japan before returning stateside. He spent over 26 years in the service of his country. Colonel Longgrear became an ordained minister and pastored four churches before his retirement. He still teaches the Word. He was inducted into the Army Ranger Hall of Fame and is the founding father of the Georgia Military Veterans Hall of Fame. "Yes, I grew up the hard way, at a place called Lang Vei," he said, smiling. "That's my story and I'm sticking to it."

JOSEPH JJ JOHNSON
USMC SUB UNIT 5

Joseph JJ Johnson was a radioman at Khe Sanh with Sub Unit 5 3rd Marine Division. He spent most of 1967 there. He was a good friend of mine and well liked by the platoon. When I first started looking for Marines I had served with about 12-14 years ago, I only remembered two names JJ and Sgt Drum. I managed to find both of them. Sgt Drum stayed in and retired as a Master Sgt. He died of Agent Orange related cancer and other diseases a few years ago.

JJ had found the good life in the woods of northern Maine. I would lose contact with him for months at a time. I would think he had packed and left the country. But then I would get a letter or a call. He was still in Houlton, Maine at the same address. Just before Christmas I got a call from his ex wife saying he had died on December 11th, 2015. I sure do miss him. SF JJ RIP

CHARLIE MADDOCKS
USMC VMO-2

The warrior life of Charlie Maddocks ended on 12 Feb 2016 during surgery for brain cancer. Information from his brother, Mike, indicated that he would be laid to rest in ARLINGTON at a date to be determined by Arlington National Cemetery. Charlie had served three tours as a crew chief with VMO-2 in 1966-68. Charlie served many years writing articles for POPASMOKE (magazine) and the CHERRY DEUCE publication in the 1990's. We at POPASMOKE owe much to Charlie for making the USMC Combat Helicopter Association what it is today

CHAPLAIN'S CORNER WINTER 2016
Chicken Soup for the Combat Veteran

By Khe Sanh Veterans Chaplain Ron Rayner

"Finally, brothers, whatever is true, whatever is noble, whatever is right, whatever is pure, whatever is lovely, whatever is admirable—if anything is excellent or praiseworthy--think about such things. Whatever you have learned or received or heard from me, or seen in me—put into practice. And the GOD of PEACE will be with you." Philippians 4:8-9

Peace of mind is something is elusive to those that suffer from Post-Traumatic-Stress-Disorder. There are many symptoms of PTSD and emotional numbness has been the one that has bothered me the most in recent years. It has come in handy when as a chaplain I perform funeral services where I very seldom choke up. It is devastating when I try to talk to the people I love. While suicide is the most talked about sad result of PTSD, isolation, divorce and estrangements from relatives and friends are the most prevalent result.

Communication is of the utmost importance in relationships. I recently read Chicken Soup for the Christian Soul. Many of the stories brought tears to my eyes and made me realize I have a need to clarify my feelings with those who mean the most to me. It also made me realize that being by myself or running away from home is the last thing I want or need to do.

What Chicken Soup for the Christian Soul has done for me, as one who has many PTSD issues, is give me a vehicle to reach out to the people I love. One of the stories was about the reconciliation of a strict father with a son he had driven away with harsh discipline. I asked my son to read the story and then we talked about our relationship. There were similar stories for friends and relatives.

If you want to open communications with someone important to you, I recommend reading Chicken Soup for the Christian Soul and find a story that may apply to your situation. One of the endorsements in the front of the book compared these short stories to the parables Jesus used to get his messages across. The stories I have read in the Chicken Soup series of books have been quite inspiring and there many helpful messages for many different situations.

"Consider it pure joy, my brothers, whenever you face trials of many kinds, because you know that the testing of your faith develops perseverance. Perseverance must finish its work so that you may be mature and complete, not lacking anything. If any of you lacks wisdom, he should ask God, who gives generously to all without finding fault, and it will be given to him. But when he asks, he must believe and not doubt, because he who doubts is like a wave of the sea, blown and tossed by the wind...Blessed is the man who perseveres under trial, because when he has stood the test, he will receive the crown of life that God has promised to those who love him." James 1:2-12 (NIV)

RAYFORD W. ADDINGTON, USMC
KHE SANH VETERAN
INDIA CO 3/26, HILL 881S

Rayford "Ray" William Addington, Jr., age 69, passed away at his home in Boerne surrounded by his family on Sunday, December 27th, 2015.

Mr. Addington is survived by his wife, Martha, and two daughters, Moshelle Carlson of Ladera Ranch, CA and Meredith Wiskur of Murphy, TX. He also leaves behind five grandchildren, Nathan, Sophie, Anna, Avery and Lilly; sons-in-law, Todd Carlson and Matt Wiskur; his sister, Shelley Addington of Dallas, TX; and brother, Mike Addington of Lynchburg, VA.

Ray grew up in Dallas, the eldest son of Rayford Addington, Sr. and Martha Addington. He served two years with distinction as a Marine in the Vietnam War. Marine Sargent Ray "Big D" Addington fought in the Battle of Khe Sahn, Hill 881 South in a desperate 77 day fight where the only way out was to be "Flown Off or Blown Off." The discipline, patriotism, and servanthood he learned in the Marines never left him, as friends and family will attest. He will be remembered fondly by many as "Uncle Ray", the "go-to" guy at Reinhardt Bible Church and Christ is Life Ministries, always willing to teach the children's Sunday school class, drive the church bus to camp, and to lift, carry, or fetch anything needed. He had fond memories of singing with the Firewheel Bible Fellowship Choir (he loved to sing, dance, perform and make people laugh). In later years, he spent his time teaching Bible study to prisoners as a chaplain at the Kendall County Jail and collecting food for Hill Country Daily Bread.

We find comfort that his was a life well lived and now he is reaping his eternal reward in heaven with his Lord and Savior.

Visitation will on Friday, January 1st from 5:00 to 7:00 p.m. at Ebensberger-Fisher Funeral Home. A graveside service and burial with military honors was held Saturday, January 2nd at 9:00 a.m. at Fort Sam Houston National Cemetery, 1520 Harry Wurzbach Rd.,San Antonio. A Memorial Service was held Saturday, January 2nd at 10:30 a.m. at Faith Bible Church, 1 Bergman Rd., Boerne, TX.
In lieu of or in addition to flowers, please send donations to Cal Farley's Boys Ranch and Girls Town online www.calfarley.org. To leave condolences for the family and to view a video of Ray's life, please visit www.ebensberger-fisher.com and select the Obituaries tab.

New Citation sent to me by Doug Sterner: The President of the United States of America takes pride in presenting the Distinguished Flying Cross (Posthumously) to Lance Corporal David Ralf Devik (MCSN: 2196100), United States Marine Corps, for heroism and extraordinary achievement while participating in aerial flight while serving with Marine Aerial Refueler/Transport Squadron

ONE HUNDRED FIFTY-TWO, FIRST Marine Aircraft Wing, in connection with operations against the enemy in the Republic of Vietnam. On 10 February 1968, Lance Corporal Devik was the Radio Operator aboard a KC-130 transport aircraft which was delivering a combat logistics load of JP-4 fuel bladders to the besieged Marine base at Khe Sanh. During the final landing approach to the runway, his aircraft was hit by intense North Vietnamese machine gun fire which ignited the fuel containers, immediately engulfing the cargo compartment in flames. Despite the intense heat, Lance Corporal Devik remained in the smoke-filled rear compartment, advising the aircraft commander of the situation until he was killed when another explosion caused the entire aircraft to burst into flames. Lance Corporal Devik's courage, superior professionalism and unwavering devotion to duty were in keeping with the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and the United States Naval Service. He gallantly gave his life in the service of his country.

ANOTHER SMALL WORLD STORY BY CRAIG TOURTE HQ BTRY 1/13

Memorial Day in my corner of New Hampshire is always the same. A clutch of veterans from the Second World War to the Gulf march around the common, followed by the town band, and the scouts, and the fifth-graders. The band plays "Anchors Aweigh," "My Country, Tis of Thee," "God bless America," and in an alarming nod to modernity, Ray Steven's "Everything is Beautiful (In Its Own Way)"....One of the town's selectmen gives a short speech, so do a couple of representatives from the state organizations, and then the fifth-graders recite the Gettysburg Address and the Great War's great poetry. There's a brief prayer and a three-gun salute, exciting the dogs and babies. Wreaths are laid. And then the crowd wends slowly up the hill to the Legion hut for ice cream, and a few veterans wonder, as they always do, if anybody understands what they did, and why they did it." – quote from the book "The Undocumented Mark Steyn."

There was a time when wearing a Khe Sanh hat or shirt I'd often receive a "Thank you for your service." but not so much anymore. The truth is, few now remember or care about battles long fought, lives changed or the broken bodies of veterans. Time has moved on and there are other and immediate concerns for those younger. Jobs, the economy, terrorism, education, housing, taxes and for some, even climate change is an immediate pressing pending catastrophe to worry about. I have attended a number of parades in my now long years of life, many just like the one described by Mr. Steyn, and I have even been asked to participate in a few, but have not, preferring the focus to be on others much more deserving But as to Mr. Steyn's question, I too have wondered if "anyone understands what they did, and why they did it." Later on in this most interesting book Mr. Steyn answers that question when he quotes a poem penned by his then 10-year old daughter, "The stars and stripes, red white, and blue. Wave above our heroes true. It makes cry, it makes us weep, but in our hearts we will keep. The sacrifice our soldiers gave, they shall not die in vain. For they have given us the freedom they have fought to gain." Imagine that, the answer coming from a 10-year old. I was quite moved when I read this little story and wanted to share it with you.

48TH ANNIVERSARY THE SIEGE BEGAN

January 21, 2016 Craig W. Tourte

We had an outstanding showing of Khe Sanh Veterans and supporting community members on January 21st at the Table Mountain Golf Course located in Oroville California, commemorating the 48th year of the start of the Siege at the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh. With little public notice of our annual even, I was astonished when over 30 folks showed up. Tom Horchler (HQ/1/13) is the driving force behind this honorable event. It is because of Toms commitment to Veterans and his love of community that his many friends and acquaintances attend. The setting could not have been more conducive with an abundance of food and beverages and beautiful view of the golf course. We had a couple of display tables filled with photographs and memorabilia. Ken Soerensen (B/1/13) proudly wore his Dress Blues and provided the Marine Corps place mats and napkins along with displaying the Marine Corps and MIA flags on the walls.

Steve Wiese (B/1/26) attended along with David Tonick (A/1/26), Ken (Buzz) Sawyer (HQ /1/13), Ned (I/3/3) and his brother Nels Borlaug (E/5/11), Marco Soto (A/1/26), Andres (Pete) Torres (G/2/26), Dan Ferguson (W/1/13), Bob Singleton (A/3rd/SP) Chuck Teasley (C/1/26) and Bruce Kates (HQ/1/13). Neil Kenny (L/3/26) and his wife Alice all the way from New Jersey won the longest travel award. Dianne Jackson, an ardent supporter Khe Sanh Veterans joined us again, her presents is always appreciated. I apologize for not mentioning everyone, I'm quite sure I have left many off this list but please forgive me and know that you are important to us, that we appreciate you and are grateful that you attended. We meet informally but with a reverent purpose. I mumbled a few incomprehensible words but my theme was we gather to remember those who fought at Khe Sanh, those who did not come home with us, those who have passed and those who continue to serve.

Posted on January 21, 2016 at 09:06:45 PM by Marco Soto

Tom, thanks for putting together such a nice gathering. The food, people, weather and the words could not have been better. I always look forward to gathering with all the great guys. It makes this time of year a little easier to deal with.

KHE SANH VETERANS, INC. SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION

GOVERNING RULES FOR OPERATIONS OF THE KHE SANH VETERANS, INC. SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION:

1. The purpose of the Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. Scholarship Foundation (KSVSF) is to provide financial aid to high school graduates who plan to attend an accredited institution as a full time student OR who are currently enrolled full time in an accredited post-secondary curriculum.
2. Scholarships will be awarded to applicant students who have at least one parent, legal guardian, or grandparent who is a paid member in good standing of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., a 501(c)(19) charitable organization.
3. IT IS THE RESPONSIBILITY OF THE STUDENT TO SEE THAT THE SCHOLARSHIP APPLICATION REQUIREMENTS ARE FULLY COMPLETED AND SENT DIRECTLY TO THE SCHOLARSHIP CHAIR BEFORE 5/1/2016 AT THE ADDRESS BELOW;

Mr. Dan Fisher
KSVSF Committee Chairman
6050 52nd St. North
Oakdale, -1MN 55128317

CRITERIA FOR SELECTION

Applicants must be the legal child or grandchild of a paid up member of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. (See member definition in the KSV Association bylaws.) This includes deceased, life members of KSV and those Khe Sanh Veterans listed as KIA/MIA in Vietnam if family members are paid up, associate members of KSV, Inc. Children or grandchildren of KSV associate members are not eligible.

Information provided by each candidate on the attached application forms will focus on the following qualities considered for selection to KSVSF financial aid: good grades, character, citizenship, leadership experience and personal essay. A point selection system is included in the application forms.

Examples of these above mentioned qualities could be in the classroom, in extracurricular activities or in service to the community, church or nation.

A Scholarship Foundation Review Committee will serve the President of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., and will accept, review and grade each correctly completed application. This committee will provide a scholarship financial report and short summaries of the selected candidates at the annual KSV reunion for publication in the "Red Clay" Newsletter.

SCHOLARSHIP AWARDS

The amount of financial award per applicant will be determined by the Review Committee's scoring results. The awards will be granted for a maximum of 4 years per student. A new application will be required for each continuous year applied.

Achievement Award Levels are:

The Col. David E. Lownds Award – for top achievement in Application Review (one award or tie)
The Sgt. Major James T. Gaynor Award – for high achievement in Application Review (5 awards)
The Col. William H. Dabney Award – for honorable achievement in Application Review (6 awards)

2.. The KSV Scholarship money will be awarded upon presentation of proof of registration for the appropriate term. Proof of registration should be sent to the chairman's address on page one of this application.

Scholarship Guidelines and Purpose

1. The financial award is to be used to help defray costs of tuition, fees and books at an accredited institution of the applicant's choice as a full time student.
2. If a recipient of the KSVSF scholarship does not enter a post high school institution during the next school year, the award for his/her benefit shall be cancelled and the money awarded to an alternate applicant. An alternate of each scholarship award is to be chosen at the time of selection of recipients.
3. The KSVSF Committee Chair and the Treasurer of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., will send a check for the full years' award amount to the selected students upon final approval by the KSV President.
4. The recipient of a scholarship shall be notified no later than the end of the month of August of the coming school year.
5. Scholarship Applications must be received by the Committee Chair on or before MAY 1 of the school year applied for.  (This is an important, NEW change to previous years)**
6. KSV, Inc. Scholarship recipients must agree to maintain a standard of personal performance both in and out of school that conforms to the moral standards set down by Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., members.

7. Criteria: Point Selection System /Maximum of 100 regular points or 115 with bonus points

a. Scholastic achievement / grade point average. Max = 40 points max. (Please attach last school GPA transcript) example below:

A GPA of 4.0 x 10 = 40 points or a GPA of 3.0 x 10 = 30 points

BOOK REVIEW

"THE LONG GOODBYE"
By MICHAEL ARCHER

MICHAEL ARCHER grew up in northern California and served in Vietnam as a U.S. Marine in 1967-68. His books include A Patch of Ground: Khe Sanh Remembered, which VIETNAM magazine called "the best first-hand account of the battle of Khe Sanh;" A Man of His Word: The Life and Times of Nevada's Senator William J. Raggio; and, his most recent book, The Long Goodbye: Khe Sanh Revisited, chronicling his search for answers to a friend's mysterious death at Khe Sanh.

His articles and essays have appeared in The Nevada Review, The Political History of Nevada; Reno-Tahoe magazine, Red Clay magazine as well as a variety of newspapers.

Michael's research is frequently cited in works by writers of historical non-fiction. He was invited to Hollywood as a technical adviser on the 2013 short film Guarding Charlie and was a cast member in the 2015 documentary film The Siege of Khe Sanh.

Michael has participated in book events and spoken on a variety of topics at venues across the country, including: Eastern Kentucky University, University of Delaware, Bentley University in Massachusetts, Casper College in Wyoming and the University of Nevada, Reno.

In addition to his writing, Michael is currently a staff member with the Senate Committee on Finance of the Nevada State Legislature and lives in Reno.

WHAT OTHERS ARE SAYING

"Michael Archer established himself as a worthy spokesman for Vietnam War veterans in 2004 with publication of his poignant combat memoir, A Patch of Ground: Khe Sanh Remembered. Now, Archer has delivered a powerful sequel in The Long Goodbye, a brutally honest and impassioned work of nonfiction that takes us even deeper inside America's faltering war in Vietnam in early 1968. The focal point of The Long Goodbye is Archer's best friend from high school, Lance Corporal Thomas Patrick Mahoney III, who survives his combat debut at Hue City, only to disappear under mysterious circumstances at Khe Sanh. The Long Goodbye builds to a climax in contemporary Vietnam, with Archer playing the role of relentless cold-case detective, driven by loyalty and devotion to unravel the mystery of Tommy Mahoney's disappearance, and to bring home his beloved friend. Many Americans would rather not remember the anguish of our lost crusade in Vietnam. In The Long Goodbye, Michael Archer reminds us why we should never forget."

GREGG JONES has been a foreign correspondent, investigative journalist and Pulitzer Prize finalist author. His critically acclaimed works of nonfiction include Last Stand at Khe Sanh and Honor in the Dust.

"Marines don't leave their dead behind, goes the adage, and in The Long Goodbye Mike Archer demonstrates the truth of that statement and the double-edges of its meaning... Archer gifts us with the vivid, utterly compelling story of his stubborn devotion to a friend and of the grim reality of war and its long echoes into the lives of veterans. This is a book that will leave its grip on your heart. It deserves to stand with the classics not only of the Vietnam War but of all wars." —WAYNE KARLIN is an award-winning author and editor. His numerous works of fiction and nonfiction include Wandering Souls: Journeys With the Dead and the Living in Viet Nam. A Marine veteran of combat in Vietnam, Wayne teaches languages and literature at the College of Southern Maryland.

"Mike Archer's gripping description of the decade-long search for his friend's remains speaks volumes about the motto of the Corps, Semper Fidelis --Always Faithful."-- DICK CAMP is a retired Marine Corps colonel, former company commander at Khe Sanh, and formerly Deputy Director of the Marine Corps' History Division. He has authored numerous books, both fiction and nonfiction, including Boots on the Ground and Battleship Arizona's Marines at War.

"Skillfully blending history and biography, Michael Archer tells a compelling story of the Vietnam conflict and its aftermath. His timely revisiting of the epic battle of Khe Sanh reminds us that for those who experience combat a war may never end."-- GEORGE HERRING, Alumni Professor of History Emeritus at the University of Kentucky, is a leading authority on U.S. foreign relations. His books include America's Longest War and From Colony to Superpower.

Michael Archer writes the simply gripping and astounding story of the death of his childhood friend and fellow Marine in The Long Goodbye, one that goes to great lengths to place that terrible event into its proper personal, historical, and geopolitical context. —CALEB CAGE is a West Point graduate, decorated for his leadership and courage in combat during Operation Iraqi Freedom II and coauthor of the book T*he Gods of Diyala.*

"Exhaustively researched... will bring tears to the eyes of the most hardened reader and fresh knowledge to the most well-read historian. It is a terrific book that deserves a wide readership." KENNETH J. CAMPBELL, Associate Professor Emeritus, Department of Political Science & International Relations, University of Delaware.

"Part battlefield account and part detective story...The Long Goodbye is riveting ands brilliantly told." DAN BARNETT, Book Columnist, Chico Enterprise-Record

The Long Goodbye: Khe Sanh Revisited by Michael Archer This is not a review of Mr. Archers latest book. I could contribute very little to what has already been expressed by so many. All experts in their various fields, professional historians, career military officers, acclaimed authors and those with great knowledge and influence. By now you should know the book is about the loss of Mr. Archer's childhood friend and fellow Marine who was killed in action and body not recovered on Hill 881S and his search for his remains, but that is just the vehicle that drives you to the ending, still leaving many questions yet unanswered

What made this book intriguing - at least for me - was the well written and painstaking research Mr. Archer compiled about the preparations of the North Vietnamese as they closed in on the Khe Sanh Combat Base anticipating a swift and fatal defeat of the defenders. "It was one of the largest and best supported attack forces ever fielded by the Vietnamese, and, as it tightened the noose around the scattered and out-numbered American at Khe Sanh, seemed invincible." (Kindle 21%) I read this book late into the night, stopping ever few chapters to digest the words and remember back to those trying times as a young Marine, not really aware of much other than what was immediately around me and yes, during the read PTSD raised its head just a little.

As emotional as this book was for me to read, drawing suppressed recalled recollections, I envisioned Mr. Archer struggling with his own emotions recalling so many memoires and experiences, also alone in the dark of night and

UPDATE (June 21, 2016)

In the closing hours of the American occupation of Khe Sanh Combat Base in July 1968, after the longest and bloodiest battle of the Vietnam War, Tom Mahoney inexplicably walked away from his platoon, unarmed, and was shot to death by enemy soldiers hiding nearby. His body was never recovered.

After decades of exhaustive research, I have been able to describe in The Long Goodbye why Tom, my high school buddy and fellow Marine, took that mysterious walk into oblivion. However, several attempts over the years by American and Vietnamese search teams to locate his remains (and even the use of a psychic) have been disappointing. As such, I'm delighted to report that another effort by a joint U.S.-Vietnamese search team last week, this time taking with them for the first time actual eyewitnesses to the events of that tragic afternoon, returned with news that this long, painful quest may soon be coming closer to fruition.
Frank Ahearn and Tom Northrop, two members of Tom Mahoney's platoon the day he was killed, and involved in repeated attempts to recover the body from under an intense enemy ambush, led the searchers to the correct area of the hill (about 500 meters from where the teams had been previously looking).

According to Tom Northrop's email to me yesterday, they were able to locate a convergence of two trench lines at the location of the gate through which Mahoney had walked to his death. The team then searched the area with metal detectors, clearing away a good deal of underbrush, and soon located several pieces of barbed wire, and what appeared to be some grenade fragments, pins, and detonators. Also nearby in an old bomb crater they found a decaying old, plastic poncho, a belt of fifty -caliber machine gun ammunition, several spent bullet casings and a metal ammo box—all issued to American forces in that period. Not far away they located a sizable fragment of the tube from a Marine light anti-tank weapon (LAW), shoulder-fired rocket launcher

Those familiar with the details of Tom's death from reading The Long Goodbye will be excited by how promising these initial findings are because Tom was lost not far from the barbed wire defenses around the gate area. The hand grenade pieces are even more encouraging because the fighting that day by six Marine volunteers to retrieve his body (three of whom were wounded) was hampered by the inability of everyone involved (including the enemy soldiers using Tom's body as bait) to identify targets amid the thick vegetation—forcing all into a lengthy hand grenade duel.

Parts of old hand grenades recently located near the surface on Hill 881 South at the site identified by Ahearn and Northrop as where Tom Mahoney was last seen.

It is now up to the U.S. Defense POW-MIA Accountability Agency to now decide when to begin excavating for Tom. I'll keep you posted as more information arrives.

KHE SANH VETERANS IN THE NEWS

RONALD RAYNER USMC
KHE SANH VETERAN
KSV CHAPLAIN ALPHA CO 1/26

In this 50th year Anniversary of the Vietnam War, Vietnam veteran and Chaplain Ronald Rayner reflects on his journey from his service as a machine gunner in Vietnam to his current service, as a chaplain for the Waterford Regional Fire Department. Rayner was 19 years old, when he enlisted in the U.S. Marine Corps in 1967 and now at 67, 49 years later, he is still serving his country, veterans and community.

Rayner enlisted in August of 1967 and after training was sent to Vietnam in 1968, where his Military Occupational Specialty was 0331/M-60 Machine Gunner. He said that after being there two weeks, they handed him a machine gun and made him a Squad Leader. He arrived in Vietnam as the Tet Offensive was beginning and served through it and the Siege of Khe Sanh. Both were major battles.

Rayner, a resident of Davisburg, is from Pontiac and graduated from Pontiac Northern in 1966. He attended Central Michigan University for a year, before enlisting. After leg injuries, he was sent home to heal. He was awarded a Bronze Star and Purple Heart for his service.

As he looks back at the Vietnam War, he says that regardless of how history evaluates it: "When my country calls, I go. You do what they ask you to do. So many guys do it. You take your turn. You don't get to choose your war. "Back home, he married his wife Cathy and started a family. He now has four children and six grandchildren.

He earned a Bachelor's degree from Carthage College in Kenosha, Wisconsin with a major in history and a minor in Physical Education. He taught U.S. History at Waterford Kettering for two years before becoming a Pontiac Firefighter. He served there for 22 years from 1972 until his retirement in 1994. He then became a chaplain for the Pontiac Fire Department in 2003 and served there until 2012, when it became the Waterford Regional Fire Department and he is still serving.

Rayner said that it is an honor and a privilege to serve as the department's chaplain and that he is proud of the people he serves, who willingly risk their lives daily to save someone else's. "I pray for the right words to help and bring comfort to people and I know that if I have faith, the Lord will provide the right words and then the biggest thing is to make myself available. That's all," Rayner said. Rayner said it was important to make it clear that he's no angel or saint, but the chaplain who trained him said, "All they had was sinners to choose from." "So many veterans who served so many years ago still serve today in various service organizations to serve other veterans and their communities," Rayner said. As a volunteer, Rayner conducts funeral services regularly at Great Lakes National Cemetery, is a chaplain for Vietnam Veterans of America Chapter 133 in Pontiac and Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc

EDWARD GEORGE LAWIDA . USMC KHE SANH VETERAN, HQ BTRY 1/13

Edward George Lawida succumbed to Parkinson's disease at his home in Brattleboro Vermont on May 7, 2016, four days after his 68th birthday. A fighter for his country and community, Ed approached his last years with an unmatched effervescence. If Parkinson's threw him a punch, his response was a joke. If he lost his ability to step, he danced the shuffle instead.

His drive to serve his country led him to sign up for the Marines in 1966. At just shy of 18 years old, Ed fought in the battle of Khe Sanh where the horrors of war inspired his lifelong commitment to peace. His military service took him from the jungles of Vietnam to the streets of Moscow, where he served as an Marine Guard at the U.S. Embassy during the height of the Cold War, and later as a field agent for the CIA. While in Moscow, he uncovered that the Russians were secretly microwaving the Marines, something that the U.S. government knew but denied. Ed spent countless years advocating for declassification of U.S. intelligence in an effort to reveal the truth and protect the health of current and future servicemen.

Ed was forever curious about the world around him. From the distant shores of Vietnam and Moscow, he traveled the world visiting Europe, the South Pacific, India, South America, and Africa. He traversed Denali and the Amazon, leaving a trail of new friends in his wake. His good humor and optimism served as a beacon for anyone who crossed his path, providing a sense of openness and accessibility to even the least known stranger.

Ever optimistic and good humored Ed never once complained about his pain and declining health. quick to serve those in his closest communities. He was a gracious host and he maintained a wit in conversation that kept even the darkest of Vermont winters just a little brighter.

His desire to be of help to those around him continued even as he lost his ability to do so. Instead of chopping fire wood, Ed became the expert fire builder – arranging his fire place just so – so that at the flick of a Bic, he would be able to provide warmth for his guests. Even after he could no longer stand on his own, his eagerness to help lent itself to his sense of humor.

Ed was the first to say that he never intended to be a family man. He was content to live his post-military life enjoying outdoor pursuits including skiing, scuba diving, bungie-jumping, fishing, and gardening. He worked for the U.S. Postal Service where he served the membership as a tireless and highly effective Union Representative. His life of serving those around him was punctuated when he moved to Vermont and met Mary. He was a devoted man, who strove for nothing more than to make Mary, the love of his life, smile, which she did all the time. They traveled the world together as partners in exploration; to Spain, France, Croatia, Montenegro, and Cuba. He introduced Mary to the sport of fishing and they surfcast from the Jersey shore to the rocky coast of Maine. Ed believed fishing taught important life lessons such as patience and optimism (if the fish aren't biting today, they surely will tomorrow). Clearly Mary came too late to the sport to develop those virtues!

He joined Mary's family and became a father to Caitlin and Sarah as both girls were attending and about to enter high school. To say Ed's greatest virtue as a father was patience, would have belied the word.

But he was a quick learner with the Holt girls, applying support and love from the start. He loved them through all the ups and downs that come with raising teenage girls. He instilled in them his sense of marvel and curiosity with the outside world, and tried his best to engage them in politics and world affairs. He taught Sarah how to drive a stickshift and managed never to say a word as the gears grinded. Through it all he was a shoulder to cry on and a voice of support in concert with his loving wife. He was truly happy as a father, one who loved his daughters and who was ever grateful for the unexpected gift of Caitlin and Sarah in his life.

In the end, Ed left the world with a legacy of love, family and service. Parkinson's took his ability to walk and his vast intelligence, but it failed to take his spirit and character. A week before he died he sat in the living room of their home waiting for Mary to finish preparing a meal.

"Mary, can I help with anything?" He offered with a chuckle and a glimmer in his eye.

"Well, yes my love I have lots for you to do," she replied from the kitchen. Both of them aware of the absurdity of the moment, and still humored by the sweetness of the offer. Even after he couldn't physically serve those around him, Ed's offer of support was always there.

A private celebration of Ed's life will be held in June. Memorial gifts in Ed's memory may be made to the Michael J. Fox Foundation for Parkinson's Research.

IT STARTS WITH AN APOLOGY

By Craig Tourte
HQ BTRY 1/13

It starts with an apology, something like this "Oh, I was just a ....." those who feel as if they did not do enough, were not heroic, didn't fix their bayonet and charge up the hill, and are in many incidences even embarrassed talking about their military contributions. The 2015/88 edition of Red Clay has a great article about Donald Saunders who was KIA at Khe Sanh on March 4, 1968. Donald didn't fix his bayonet nor charge the enemy trench line. Donald spent most of his time at Khe Sanh digging the trench line, filling sand bags, building bunkers and fighting positions, walking out of the base at night to the isolated listening posts, humping ammunition for the artillery pieces along with other necessary and dangerous jobs too numerous to mention. I have often thought that just identifying one's MOS does not necessarily described what they experienced.

Captain Dabney once told me that he had a variety of MOS's on hill 881S, including cooks, truck drivers and clerks as replacements for those who had been killed or wounded and to get off of this "only a cook stuff." That said, I thought I'd repost a little something I wrote a number of years ago for those, who to this day, still feel that little twinge of guilt because they were "just a ..."

MOS AND CASUALITIES

Marines are pretty much Marines, regardless of any particular Military Occupational Specialty (MOS). I never fixed my bayonet like Marines Mike Powers and John Rowland who served with Delta Company, 1st Battalion, 26th Marine Regiment and I never charged an entrenched enemy bunker or ridge line like Marine Steve Wiese who Served with Bravo Company, 1st Battalion, 26th Marine Regiment, did during his 18 month Vietnam combat tour. I never sat month after cold isolated month on the top of a lonely hill in an isolated corner of Vietnam, like Marine Phil Nuchereno, watching his friends being picked off one at a time, wondering when and how his time would come. I never commanded men on an isolated entrenched hilltop, like Lieutenant Ernie Spencer, Commanding Officer of Delta Company, 1st Battalion, 26th Marine Regiment, and to say that I was particularly brave or extraordinary would be a stretch. After all, I was just a private and did the job the Marine Corps assigned to me; I was just a regular Joe. I knew a lot of just regular Joes at the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh in 1967 and during the terrible 77-day Siege of that base in 1968. Marines like Bill Poland and Beryl Bushaw who went about their very dangerous job with little sleep and little food. Men who fought their own battles for survival every day and somehow, perhaps through just plain luck, persevered.

Some are surprised to learn that there were, "other than infantry (grunts) at Khe Sanh." Marines like Donald Saunders, Ken Williams and Wilbur Stovall, the Company Clerk of Headquarters Battery, 1st Battalion, 13th Marine Regiment. All Killed in Action at Khe Sanh during that long and bloody Siege. None assigned to infantry units, but all three were Marines.

Although my personal knowledge of the Marine Corps Combat Base at Khe Sanh is somewhat limited to the period of time I was there, roughly July/August 1967 to sometime in April/May 1968, as I look back it seems like I was there forever. To this day, certain experiences remain vivid in my memory and dreams. I have read extensively about the events of the Siege and have spoken to numerous individuals who were there with me. Each recalls a somewhat different yet similar experience.

Certainly the Military Occupational Specialty of the men in the various services were dissimilar, however I am quite sure infantry and supporting arms made up the majority of those on the base and surrounding hills. As such, it would make sense that most causalities were to those that held the MOS of an infantryman or related combat specialty. It is generally assumed, there were anywhere from 5,000 to 6,000 men at the Khe Sanh Combat Base in late 1967, a fair amount of military personnel, at least by Marine Corps standards. But regardless of the exact number of U.S. and allied personal at Khe Sanh, it is accepted that the number of North Vietnamese Army troops in the area was somewhere in the neighborhood of 40,000 men with supporting arms including tanks (Attack of the Lang Vi Special Forces Base by NVA tanks.)

I don't know the ratio of infantry to other Military Occupational Specialties on the base, but there were certainly many different and varied military specialties present among the Marine, Army, Navy and Air Force personnel. Cook's, truck drivers, office clerks, engineers, Navy Seabees, medical personnel, electricians, mechanics, wiremen, artillery, forward observers, graves registration, supply, radar, fork lift drivers, heavy equipment operators, air traffic control, tanks, supporting arms (50's and twin 40's) to name just a few. To look at those who were present, you could not tell one from the other, they all looked the same. Each carrying their individual weapon wherever they went. Red clay stained ratty green uniform, tired, scared, skinny, undernourished and exhausted, grunt, clerk and cook. Each MOS took casualties and all faced the same dangers together. All had their time in the V ring, not one safer nor job easier than the other.

Marine Tom Horchler was a truck driver with Headquarters Battery, 1st Battalion, 13th Marine Regiment, who risked his life daily, taking rounds while he drove his truck to the dump, hauled water, C rations, sandbags, artillery shells from the landing strip to the guns and picking up the dead, gently transporting their lifeless bodies to Grave Registration. A moving exposed high value target, no trench, armor, sandbags or overhead to protect him, unable to hear the rounds leaving the guns of the enemy, unable to run, hide or even hope, all he had was just luck and a prayer. Continuing his very dangerous duty all day and then standing guard half the night in the trench line waiting for the expected ground attack.

Tom Horchler knew he had a dangerous job; no one had to tell him it was dangerous and no one had to thank him for his effort at supporting "them." It was the job the Marine Corps assigned to him, and at the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh, it was just as valuable, just as necessary and just as dangerous as any other. There were many at Khe Sanh during the 77-day Siege of 1968 just like Tom Horchler, not an infantryman, but a Marine, doing a job which was just as dangerous, just as dirty and just as necessary as the rest of the jobs that had to be done.

At Khe Sanh we were all the same and it did not matter what MOS the military had given us. There was no safe place, no place to rest, to hide or sleep, no place safer than another. We were all the same at Khe Sanh no matter the MOS, officer, enlisted or civilian contractor. We all shared in the danger equally and our casualties reflected our presence.

Part One of Two posts.. For All Khe Sanh Vets No Matter the MOS, and Especially the Grunts in K/3/26

By Dennis Mannion

Background Info:

On 861 in April '68...two days before being lifted to 881s. Trey Meade (Rocky) and I joined Kilo the same day in late Sept '67 at Camp Evans. He was a machine gunner He was with us when Kilo (and many other companies) were sent to Khe Sanh as part of the buildup in mid-Dec.

Just before Christmas, the malaria that he had contracted caught up with him and he was sent from KS to DaNang for medical treatment. He hated leaving us. He was on his way back to Kilo when the NVA partially overran 861 that first night 21/22Jan.

They kept him down at the base for a few days to help ID our initial KIA's He felt so guilty about not being there at the start that when his 13 months were up he signed on for another 6 months....as a machine gunner!

Shot through both hips on his second tour, he received blood transfusions that had been unknowingly contaminated with Hepatitis B.

Plagued with liver problems all his life, he never married...no kids....no brothers or sisters and his parents were both only children too. He died of liver cancer 5 years ago.

There is a sentence in what you will read in Part Two that references the fact that in 30 years of teaching in a public high school, I maybe ate in the teacher's cafeteria 5 times. Just always felt out of place there.

Part Two of Two posts.. For All Khe Sanh Vets No Matter the MOS, and Especially the Grunts in K/3/26

Canape may be a little like Lt Black. There are some guys that returned completely wrecked from the experience. They want nothing to remind them of that time.

It was different for me. I came back wild and angry, but as I mentioned before, it took me awhile to diagnose that my rage and alienation were the result of what I came back to, not what happened over there. I hated this country or what it did to those of us who had seen the cauldron, who had been asked to give absolutely everything we had to give in a conflict this nation wasn't to follow through with. At the same time though, I wish I had handled a couple of isolated incidents differently (though the results would have been identical) I did nothing I am ashamed of. War is hell. It has always be hell, and always will be. I'm proud of my service in Nam and will f---- up anyone, anywhere who in any way attempts to demean that service.

I've often conjured an image of you sitting in your office at school, involved in a solitary lunch. You were always alone in a world of people (often well intentioned, though alien nonetheless) having no conception of your history. How do you communicate with individuals who have never lived that far beyond the norm?, have never gathered the body parts of their friends, never cringed as sheets of automatic weapons fire scythed the foliage around them or curled into human knots as incoming artillery projectiles rocked the earth on its axis?, never believed they would see another sunrise. For years I hated every noncombatant Mother--------- alive. Now I reserve my contempt for criminals and terrorist and dictators, and those in our society who apologize for their behavior.

I guess it all comes down to how a veteran perceives his behavior in the time he spent on the battlefield. I have nothing to be ashamed of and neither do you. I know you saved our asses on many occasions. On a smaller scale I would like to believe I did as well. I learned a great deal about life and death, in the Nam. I was also fortunate enough to have walked through the most beautiful and mysterious terrain on this planet,and was privileged to have met some of the most stand up bastards it has been my good luck to have known. All of us who spent extended periods of time on those grass less hills and in those hallucinatory jungles have brought back memories which will forever estrange us from the overwhelming majority of our fellow creatures.

REPLIES

Dennis,

My earlier message that did not come through was simply the word "WOW!" I was momentarily at a loss for words after reading Mr. Meade's observations.

Pure honesty about oneself very often unlocks an inherent eloquence that is difficult to replicate. Warriors-turned-writers like Remarque, O'Brien, Marlantes, and others had it in fiction. And for me, Graves (Goodbye to All That) and Manchester (Goodbye, Darkness!) had it nonfiction—most likely influencing the title of my most recent effort. In his too-short-of life, your friend, Trey, did too.

There is a kind Holy Grail out there for war writers that is often described as the "awful beauty;" originally from a piece written in a periodical at the time of the Civil War: "War is a sublime and awful beauty---a fearful and terrible loveliness--that atones in deeds of high enterprise and acts of heroic valor for the carnage, desolation and slaughter." I think Trey tapped into that notion powerfully and honorably as only a survivor of intense combat can.

Thanks for sharing it.
Mike Archer

Dennis,

This is an extraordinary post; one (1) of the best ever. I had tears in my eyes as I was reading it. This is exactly how I've felt for the past forty seven and a half (47.5) years; ever since I returned to the United States following my first tour—what Trey W. 'Rocky' Meade said here is a significant part of why I served a second tour. Trey just said it so much more eloquently than I've ever been able to express myself. Of particular I found the following most profound; "I came back [from Viet Nam] wild and angry, but, as I mentioned before, it took me awhile to diagnose that my rage and alienation were the result of what I came back to, not what happened over there. I hated this country for what it did to those of us who had been in the cauldron, who had been asked to give absolutely everything we had to give in a conflict this nation wasn't willing to follow through with. At the same time, though I wish I had handled a couple isolated incidents differently—though the results would have been identical—I did absolutely nothing I am ashamed of. War is hell. It always has been and always will be. I'm proud of my service in Nam." My God is that so true for so many of us.

After reading this post I just had to do an Internet search on 'Rocky' to learn more about the man. I was disheartened—to say the least—with what I found. His entire obituary, @ < http://www.tributes.com/obituary/show/Trey-Witter-Meade-91123146 > reads; "Trey was born on November 9, 1948 and passed away on Friday, March 18, 2011. Trey was a resident of Burnet, Texas."

The obituary Web Site asks: "Do you know something about Trey's life? You can enhance Trey Witter Meade's memory by upgrading Trey's public record with words and pictures, signing Trey's memory book, recording an audio memory or lighting a candle. The information in this obituary is based on data from the US Government's Social Security Death Index. No further information is available. More details on this data source are provided in our Frequently Asked Questions section."

There are no entries in the memory book. I'll leave it to those of you who served with and knew him to leave a lasting memory of the man.

May he rest in eternal peace. God Bless and Semper Fidelis!!!

Dennis-

Once again, thanks for sharing. I feel the same. I'm proud of my service with Mike 2, 3/26 and I'm proud of all the young Men, regardless of MOS that served around me, some driving themselves all the way to "going crazy" in the process. I joined them at Camp Evans as an 0311 replacement on or around Sept. 11 or 12, 67 with two other replacements. I learned a lot about my fellow human beings over there. Mike Co. was in the process of rebuilding after being hit hard in a battle up north "Operation Kingfisher" I think, where 3/26 was hit by the 324th NVA Regiment near Con Thien.

My second night with Mike 2, I and another new replacement were sent out on an LP to the west of the perimeter at Camp Evans with one of Mike's survivors from the battle up north. You could see in his eye's and hear in his speech that he was terrified of sometime in a very serious way. Around midnight or one o'clock, I and the other new kid were finding it all to exciting and were talking amongst ourselves. The "old salt" whispered for both of us to shut the blank up dam it.

Well, a short while later we were whispering amongst ourselves again and the more experienced kid just came unglued and basically began screaming at the top of his lungs that if we didn't shut the blank up right now he was going to kill us himself. You could see in his eyes and hear in his voice that he was terrified of something that we had no clue about yet but would come to understand as the months ahead exposed us to experiences that defy description with mere words. As you guys all know, you have to experience some things in person to actually understand the barbaric nature of War and what it can do to the heart.

After the first night there were NVA and marine bodies all outside the perimeter. We loaded the Marines on a tank and when reinforcements came out in trucks they hit us with rockets. I was hit in the leg and had trouble walking the next day Mike took the brunt of the attack NVA were wearing Marine flack jackets they took from our dead/I have lived with the guilt of getting on the medevac since Walter Hammond wrote a song about the battle and I have it on a CD

For some reason this song always gets to me --- Sam

These mist covered mountains
Are a home now for me
But my home is the lowlands
And always will be Someday you'll return to
Your valleys and your farms
And you'll no longer burn
To be brothers in arms

Through these fields of destruction
Baptisms of fire
I've witnessed your suffering
As the battle raged higher
And though they did hurt me so bad
In the fear and alarm
You did not desert me
My brothers in arms

There's so many different worlds
So many different suns
And we have just one world
But we live in different ones
Now the sun's gone to hell and
The moon's riding high
Let me bid you farewell
Every man has to die
But it's written in the starlight
And every line in your palm
We are fools to make war
On our brothers in arms

JIM KAYLOR USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN, ECHO CO 2/26, HILL 861A

Jim served in the United States Marine Corps during the Vietnam war where he fought at the battle of Khe Sanh. Jim was awarded the Silver Star, our nations 3rd highest medal for valor and a purple heart at ConThien.

Jim was a Sergeant and worked for the Los Angeles Sheriff's Department for 38 years in various departments.

A full synopsis of Jim's Silver Star

The President of the United States of America takes pleasure in presenting the Silver Star to Private First Class James N. KaylorCSN: 2349911), United States Marine Corps, for conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity in action while serving with Company E, Second Battalion, Twenty-Sixth Marines, THIRD Marine Division, in the Republic of Vietnam, on 7 June 1968. While serving with the Second Platoon and on security patrol near Con Thien, Private First Class Kaylor and the patrol were ambushed by approximately two companies of enemy forces. Surrounded and pinned down for four hours without communications, an order was given to charge the enemy. Although Private First Class Kaylor's grenade launcher became inoperable as the attack went forth, he drew his side arm and commenced firing on the enemy. Within a short time, all of his fellow Marines on the front lines were killed by enemy automatic weapons fire. Alone and with only three rounds of ammunition left, he called to the rear and located the only two remaining Marines. Moving into a crater which was near enough for them to supply him with grenades, he then singlehandedly attacked the enemy until there was no return fire. As he and two of his comrades prepared to assault the enemy bunkers again, the remnants of the Second Platoon came on to relieve them. Private First Class Kaylor's courage, bold initiative, and unwavering devotion to duty in the face of great personal danger were in keeping with the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and the United States Naval Service. Action Date: 7-Jun-68

JIM KAYLOR MEMORIAL

Jim Kaylor's Memorial was a sad, but fitting tribute to an outstanding Marine, Los Angeles County Sheriff's Deputy, Khe Sanh Veteran and Silver Star recipient. An overflow crowd of more than 300 filled the little chapel at the 5th Marine area of Camp Pendleton. It was clear that Jim Kaylor was well respected, loved, admired and will be sorely missed by his family, countless friends and colleagues. Khe Sanh Veterans wanted to insure that those present recognized Jim was one of us, that we were present and paying our respects, as many were plainly visible in Khe Sanh shirts amongst the various in Marine Corps, Los Angeles County Sheriff and other allied law enforcement and public safety uniforms. I introduced ourselves to his wife Terry who thanked us for coming. Retired Lieutenant Colonel Ken Pipes - one of the most revered and respected Marines in the San Diego Camp Pendleton area - provided a wonderful, magnificent and fitting Eulogy. Steve Wiese and Jim were friends and as such, Steve shared a few memoires of his association with Jim. Steve's moving and inspirational parting words from the podium were, "Be sad that Jim is gone, but happy that he was here."

A Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department Bag Piper accompanied by two drummers marched into the Chapel playing the Marine Corps Hymn and out again as is tradition, followed by the Sheriff's Honor Guard which presented an American Flag to Terry. Outside a Marine Corps Honor Guard in Dress Blues provide a rifle volley salute. The time honored bugle call of taps played at all military funerals was a fitting tribute to a fine warrior. As the memorial was coming to a close, two Marine Corps H23 Helicopters made two low passes overhead, one trailing an American Flag.

Jim's Memorial announcement has a closing line which reads in part, "Jim was a gigantic presence...fiercely loved his family but the Marine Corps was his heart and soul."

OBIT

LIEUTENANT COLONEL FREDERICK J. MCEWAN, JR., USMC KHE SANH VETERAN HQ CO S-4

Lieutenant Colonel Frederick J. McEwan, Jr. Lieutenant Colonel Frederick J. McEwan, Jr., born in Windsor, Ontario, Canada on September 27, 1928, passed away on Hilton Head Island on Wednesday, June 29, 2016. The Colonel, the son of parents who were U. S. and Canadian citizens, chose U. S. citizenship and volunteered to serve in the United States Marine Corps during the Korean War. The Colonel chose to continue to serve the United States for over twenty-five years, serving in myriad posts around the globe, to include service with the storied 26th Marine Regiment @ Khe Sanh, Quang Tri Province, Republic of Viet Nam during the 1968 Tet Offensive.

He received his Bachelor of Science degree at Assumption College in Windsor. He attended the University of Detroit Law School for two years, before joining the Marines. He is survived by his wife Faye Tillett, his three children Wilhelmina McEwan, Frederick McEwan III, Mary McEwan, & their mother Mary Ellen McEwan of Rembert, S.C., his stepson Todd Payne of Hilton Head, S.C., granddaughters, Victoria McEwan of Lexington, KY, Laura Grace Payne of Hilton Head, S.C., his sister Barbara Prew & brother-in-law Clifford Prew of Bloomfield Hills, MI, his brother Richard McEwan of Windsor, Ontario, niece Andrea Odette (Andrew) Federer, niece Ann Odette (Kevin) Kaye, nephew Edward (Lisa) Odette, and nephew Curtis (Karen) Odette all of Toronto, Canada, nephews Clifford, Douglas, Bobby, & John Prew of Birmingham, MI, and nephews Jeffery & Kenneth McEwan of Windsor, Ontario. He is predeceased by his sister & brother-in-law Gloria & Ed Odette of Toronto, Canada. The world lost a giant of a man when Lieutenant Colonel Frederick J. McEwan, Jr., age eighty-seven went to his eternal reward. The Colonel now rests in the all-knowing, all-loving, all-forgiving, all-merciful, all-powerful arms of our Lord and Savior. The Irishman that he is, the Colonel did not 'go quietly into the night' as he fought a long battle with several illnesses, which our government has attributed to the Agent Orange herbicide he was exposed to while serving in Viet Nam. Among his many proud accomplishments, Lieutenant Colonel McEwan was the S-4 Logistics Officer for the 26th Marine Regiment during the intense seventy-seven day fight @ Khe Sanh, the seminal battle of the Viet Nam War. Lieutenant Colonel McEwan was responsible for keeping the combat base and surrounding hilltop outposts properly supplied and he did an absolutely extraordinary job; without his leadership and efforts the Marines could not have sustained their defense and that battle would have been lost.

Following that assignment, for which he was highly recognized, Lieutenant Colonel McEwan was the Commanding Officer for the 1st Battalion, 26th Marine Regiment during the spring and summer of 1968, again doing an exemplary job while earning the respect of his seniors for accomplishing an extremely difficult mission, but more importantly to him, earning the admiration and respect of the Marines who served under his command, many of whom volunteered without reservation to follow him into the most dangerous of assignments.

Rest in Peace Colonel. Mission Accomplished!!! He will be sorely missed. Family and friends are invited to a Mass of Christian Burial, Friday, July 8, 10:00 AM at Holy Family Catholic Church, 24 Pope Ave. Hilton Head, Interment will follow at Six Oaks Cemetery in Sea Pines, Hilton Head. A visitation will be held Thursday evening, 6-8 PM at Keith Funeral Home, 63 Arrow Road, Hilton Head. In lieu of flowers, memorial donations in the memory of Fred can be made to Khe Sahn, Veterans, Inc. Scholarship Foundation. C/O Thomas J. Eichler, 3221 N. Opal St. Chicago, IL 60634. . -

KEN RODGERS, BRAVO CO 1/26 AND HIS WIFE, BETTY, DIRECTORS & CO PRODUCERS OF THE FEATURE LENGTH FILM, "BRAVO" COMMON MEN UNCOMMON VALOR, RECEIVED SEVERAL HONORS, FOR THEIR VIDEO

THE MAJOR NORMAN HATCH AWARD GIVEN FOR THE BEST FEATURE LENGTH DOCUMENTARY FILM. GIVEN AT THE MUSEUM OF THE MARINE CORPS & THE DAUGHTERS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION ELLEN HARDIN WALWORTH FOUNDERS MEDAL FOR PATRIOTISM, GIVEN IN BOISE IDAHO

Story By Ken & Betty

It was a heady experience being at the Marine Corps Heritage Foundation's 2016 Awards Ceremony at the National Museum of the Marine Corps outside the gates of Marine Corps Base Quantico in Virginia.

BRAVO! was recognized and honored with the Major Norman Hatch Award for best feature length documentary film.

Betty and I arrived a few days before the big event and journeyed to Lexington, Virginia, to visit good friends. While there we checked out Thomas "Stonewall" Jackson's home. Stonewall was an instructor at Virginia Military Institute (located in Lexington) before the Civil War.

The following day, BRAVO! Marine Michael E. O'Hara and his son-in-law Daniel Folz went with us to tour the National Museum of the Marine Corps. Betty and I have visited the museum three times before this journey and we are always amazed at the constant change in the individual exhibits as well as the continued expansion of the museum, which speaks to the level of commitment and passion by all the donors and personnel involved.

Later that afternoon, we were invited to The Basic School for new Marine Corps officers to talk about the history of Bravo Company, 1/26, at the Siege of Khe Sanh, and observe how The Basic School is using Bravo Company's patrol outside the wire on February 25, 1968, as a case study in their Patrolling and Scouting class.

Upon arrival we were greeted by the commanding officer of The Basic School, Colonel Christian Wortman, and three instructors: Captain Joe Albano, Captain Josh White and Captain Jason Duehring.

We will post a blog later about the specifics of our visit to The Basic School but I must say that we are gratified that the experiences of the Marines at Khe Sanh are being used to prepare the Marine officers of the future for combat.

Later that evening we dined at The Globe and Laurel restaurant owned by Retired Major Rick Spooner who also received an award from the Foundation for one of his works of fiction, THE DRAGON OF DESTINY AND THE SAGA OF SHANGHAI POOLEY. The Globe and Laurel is a museum of Marine Corps history in its own right, and we enjoyed looking around at the posters, photos and other memorabilia of days gone by in the lives of Marines. If you are ever in the area and want to see a fabulous array of Marine Corps history, consider dining there.

On Saturday, friend and supporter of BRAVO!, Betty Plevney came up from Richmond, Virginia, to join us for the Awards Ceremony. Betty has been a great resource for the producers of the film. Her expertise and opinions have helped guide us along the path to where we are now.

Before the main event, we were joined in the museum's Scuttlebutt Theater by many of the other honorees and their friends and families. The medals were presented by the Heritage Foundation's

Vice-President for Administration, Mrs. Susan Hodges, Retired Lieutenant General Robert Blackman (President and Chief Executive Office of the Foundation), Commandant of the Marine Corps General Robert Neller, Retired General John Kelly (the Foundation's Chairman of the Board), Retired General Walter Boomer (past Chairman of the Board), and Sergeant Major of the Marine Corps Ronald Green.

Betty and I were very proud to have General Neller shake our hands and in my case get my medal ribbon untangled from my red bowtie

After the awards ceremony we went into the main atrium of the museum to join over four-hundred-forty guests for a great meal and an informative—and at times inspiring—program that included the Commandant, General Kelley, General Boomer, Lt. General Blackman, noted actor and Marine Wilfred Brimley, and former Virginia Senator and Secretary of the Navy John Warner.

One of the most satisfying moments for Betty and me happened immediately after they screened the official trailer for BRAVO! on large screens strategically positioned around the atrium so that all the guests could watch. Earlier in the trip, we had asked if Michael O'Hara could join us on stage when the Commandant presented us with our medals. We were informed that the space was too small—and it was—but they would recognize him after they played the trailer.

When the that moment came, Lt. General Blackman announced that Michael was my guest and that he had served with B/1/26 at the Siege and had received three purple hearts during that seventy-seven day battle. One of the cameras that was filming and projecting the night's events focused in on Michael and he appeared on all the big screens in the building. He stood to a great chorus of ooorahs, cheers and much applause.

All through our time with Michael and Daniel, Daniel photographed the events so we could enjoy them later. Thank you, Daniel. The two men departed early the next morning, and Betty Plevney joined us for a leisurely breakfast before she headed back home. Betty Rodgers and I returned to the Museum of the Marine Corps and spent quite a bit of time wandering through the extensive outdoor gardens and memorials adjacent to the museum The weather was sublime and the dogwoods were blooming in all their spring glory. As we strolled past memorials to a whole host of different Marine Corps organizations and events, I pondered what had occurred for us during our time in Quantico.

When I was in the Corps, I made it a matter of personal policy to hightail it as far as possible any time a general, a colonel, a sergeant major came around. I was an enlisted man and I didn't want any encounters with officers above the rank of captain or any non-commissioned officers above the rank of gunnery sergeant. For me, those people almost came from another species, so on this visit, when I got to talk to the commandant, as well as a number of other generals, colonels and lieutenant-colonels, I came to the conclusion that they are folks just like me. Much more committed to the Marine Corps than I ever was, but folks none the less.

Thinking that made me remember what my drill instructors in boot camp used to say when we were about to be inspected by officers: "Just remember, they put their trousers on just like you do, one leg at a time."

Betty and I send along a hearty thanks to the Marine Corps Heritage Foundation—which, by the way, gave us some seed money to begin the process of making BRAVO!—and all the folks who honored BRAVO! and made our stay in Virginia a great success.

If you or your organization would like to host a screening of BRAVO! in your town this coming summer, fall, winter or next spring please contact us immediately.

NSDAR CEREMONY

A Marine veteran who turned his company's harrowing tale from the 77-day siege of Khe Sanh during the Vietnam War into a documentary film will be honored with the National Society Daughters of the American Revolution's highest award.

Ken Rodgers, of Eagle, Idaho, will receive the Ellen Hardin Walworth Founders Medal for Patriotism on May 12 in Boise, the society announced in a statement. The medal honors an adult who has displayed "outstanding patriotism in the promotion of NDSAR's ideals of God, home and country through faithful and meritorious service to our community, state and nation."

Rodgers, along with his wife, Betty, directed and co-produced the award-winning film, "Bravo! Common Men, Uncommon Valor." The film won the best documentary feature prize in 2015 at the GI Film Festival San Diego's Local Film Showcase.

"Ken is an amazing person, veteran and Idahoan," Barbara Grant of the NSDAR Eagle chapter said in an email to Stars and Stripes. Ken and the others "fought so valiantly to preserve and uphold the freedoms we as Americans hold so dear."

"Bravo! Common Men, Uncommon Valor" details the bloody Khe Sanh battle from the perspective of Company B, 1st Battalion, 26th Marine Regiment, complete with interviews from more than a dozen survivors, never-before-heard audio, after-action reports and photos. Participants in the battle said the process allowed many of them to heal old wounds.

The battle for Khe Sanh came to symbolize the American involvement and resolve in Vietnam as well as the war's complexities. During the 11-week siege in early 1968, a single surrounded and supporting forces stood in defiance of three North Vietnamese Army divisions — about 20,000 troops. They were victorious, but only after 66 deaths, including 27, with 19 wounded and one taken prisoner on a single patrol. The base was later abandoned to the enemy.

NSDAR is a service organization dedicated to promoting patriotism, preserving American history, and supporting better education for American children. It was founded in 1890 and boasts 165,000 members in approximately 3,000 chapters worldwide.

The Worst Day Of My Life June 7th, 1967, 50 years ago...

by Thomas Hanks
Bravo Co 1/26

I was on mess duty at headquarters in Khe Sanh, Vietnam. I had been listening to a long battle off in the distance, It seemed to go on forever. Eleven months in country and I never heard anything like it. A Marine coming through the mess line who knew me, said "Hanks, that's your company out there".

The company was Bravo Company, 1st Battalion 26th Marines, surrounded and being attacked by a larger North Vietnamese Army force. I was so upset that I couldn't stop shaking to serve mess.

The Mess Sergeant said "Go see if you can help". I ran down to the airfield, there were body bags scattered around. I saw another friend walking toward me and that is when I heard about the deaths of my friends. Among the dead was one of my best friends, Ron Crooks from Hickory, NC, 22, wife and kids back home. Ron and I had been friends 15 months, since the formation of Bravo Company at Camp Pendleton in March 1966. He and I only had two months till we were due to come home from our tour in Vietnam.The Silver Star Awarded, posthumously, for actions, during the Vietnam War: Corporal, Crooks was participating, with his platoon, in a search and clear operation, west, of Khe Sanh. The entire, sweeping unit was taken under, heavy and accurate, mortar fire by North Vietnamese, regular forces. While mortar rounds, continued, falling upon the patrol's position, the patrol, was assaulted, by a North Vietnamese platoon, from well-concealed positions. Corporal, Crooks immediately put, his machine gun into action, in the most, advantageous positions and returned, accurate fire upon the enemy, with telling effect. An enemy, grenade explosion, knocked him, from his gun and seriously, wounded him. He refused, medical treatment and returned, to his gun and continued, to deliver accurate, fire, until a second grenade mortally, wounded him. By his courageous, actions and devotion, to duty, Corporal, Crooks contributed, substantially and directly to the success, of the patrol, in containing and repelling, the enemy. His selfless efforts in behalf, of others served to inspire, all, who observed, him and were, in keeping with the highest, traditions, of the Marine Corps and the United States, Naval Service. He gallantly gave his life, for his country. Action Date: 7-Jun-67, Service: Marine Corps, Rank: Corporal, Company: Company B, Battalion: 1st, Battalion, Regiment: 26th, Marines Division, 3d, Marine Division, (Rein.) FMF.

Also among the dead was Kenneth M Johnson, from San Diego, the young Marine who took my place that day as an "0351 Anti-tank Assault Man".

At the moment I heard the awful news, I crumpled to the ground, I couldn't move and I couldn't stop sobbing.

A few minutes later, when I finally regained my composure, I was in the middle of a dirt road, I looked up and there was a huge truckload of Marines, on their way to board helicopters to reinforce Bravo Company. They were waiting for me to get up. No honking, no yelling, they were totally silent, just looking at me and waiting.

Two weeks later I volunteered to go back out into the field, my request was granted and I was back out with Bravo company. I was assigned to be the gunner on the 106 recoilless rifle on top of Hill 881, a few miles outside of Khe Sanh.

I wanted revenge, it never came. I returned home two months later. June 7th 1967. A sad day for all Americans

Bravo Company - 1st Battalion - 26th Marine Infantry Regiment

Addendum:

The 1st Battalion 26th Marines Command Chronology contains the following entry: On the afternoon of June 7th, 1967, 2 platoons of Bravo Co were attacked while on patrol at XD 760445, vicinity of Hill 821, came under a heavy small arms and mortar attack from XD 756439. Bravo Co received approximately 20-30 rounds of 82mm mortar rounds.

Bravo Company was then assaulted from the west by 30-40 NVA. The enemy troops attacked under cover of their mortar fire, which enabled them to get within grenade range of Bravo Co. The attack was repulsed at close range by small arms fire and hand grenades. The enemy's mortar positions were destroyed by artillery and air strikes. The enemy withdrew to the west.

When the medi-vac helicopter landed, small arms fire was received from the north. Two platoons and the CP group from Alpha Company were helilifted to Hill 881s to support Bravo Co. The 3rd platoon from Bravo Co and the Alpha Co Command Group moved from Hill 881s to Hill 821 to provide security for the movement of Bravo Co. Under cover of Air, the Alpha Company Command Group returned with Bravo Co to Hill 881s.

It is estimated that the enemy unit was 1 NVA Company with another NVA Company located to the north of Hill 821. The enemy suffered 23 KIA (C) and 17 KIA (P) as a result of the action.

The Operations Log includes the notation that two of the 18 men killed on June 7th were with an artillery Forward Observer team from A Battery, 1/13 Marines. In addition, two of the four seriously wounded men died from their injuries.

20 Americans - 19 Marines and 1 Navy Corpsman - died as a result of the fight at Hill 821 on June 7, 1967•

The Bravo Company "Hill 821" battle on June 7, 1967 received very little state-side press. "The 6 Day War" that took place June 5 -10th 1967 was dominating the press at that time.

REPLIES:

Thomas – Thank you for your post. These things are difficult to recall, painful to write but necessary to share these remembrances. especially with your brothers here on this board, because we understand and share the same experiences and emotions and continue to mourn for those who did not return with us. If you read this board frequently, you'll find that many feel a terrible guilt, a sense of loss and that they did not do enough or contribute enough. Glad you made it home, hang in there....

Tom, As you know I was out there that day, no matter what you do , it's never enough when you lose your brothers. We do what we are told and assigned the rest is up to powers beyond our control.

REMEMBERING MARCH 30

By Craig Tourte
HQ Btry 1/13

March 30, 1968 – Battalion of Kings pg 267 "The specter, terror, and horror of what happened on 25 February became an 'idee fixe' (obsession) continually gnawing at the souls of those still alive at Khe Sanh, especially within the command and staff of 1/26. Almost immediately, the battalion staff initiated plans for a return to the ambush site to retrieved the MIAs...In what would be the first offensive action out of the Combat Base, approximately 75 - 80% of the NCOs and enlisted men from the company had been there only a short time and although there was no way to rehearse the plan of attack nor train for it, several days prior to the attack, briefings were given repeatedly to the troops in the trenches. The mission was to attack a known fortified position with an alternate mission of attempting to establish and if possible, recover our comrades who had been ambushed on 25th of February 1968..."

So with bayonets fixed the brave reconstituted Bravo company of the 1st Battalion 26th Marine Corps Regiment once again crossed the wire to attack the same enemy fortified positon they had previously tangled with a month prior with the loss of 24 Marines. The February 25th battle was known as the "Ghost Patrol" by those who survived that most horrific battle. This March 30th attack would forever be referred to as the "Revenge Patrol." The CO of the Company Capt Ken Pipes stated, "I believe all of the young Marines that we had in the company had been waiting several weeks for this opportunity. ....once the kids started, there was nothing, it seemed, that could stop them...." A later body count confirmed approximately 115 North Vietnamese Army soldiers were actually killed by kids using small arms fire, grenades, bayonets and M79s, all weapons organic to an infantry company...." The loss of 19 brave Marines, many having survived the battle of February 25th and volunteering to go back out once again to face the enemy is a testament to the bravery and spirt of those brave young Marines On this day, the survivors of both battles, those who served at Khe Sanh and the family and friends of those lost, remember the 43 brave Marines who lost their lives on February 25th and March 30th. A day that continues to haunt the survivors and a day for all of us to take a few minutes to remember those, oh so brave young men, who without hesitation, charged into the claws of the beast of war.

Posted on Facebook by Michael O'Hara The morning fog is lifting. It is about to begin 48 yrs ago today. Those of us who survived this ordeal have crossed this trench every morning for 48 yrs.

30 March 1968 Khe Sanh Vietnam

30 March 1968. The most vicious battle of the Vietnam War is coming to a close. My Bravo Company, 1st Battalion, 26th Marine Regiment will depart the Khe Sanh Combat Base pre-dawn this day. A large percentage of our 120 man company are new replacements as we had been mauled badly on 25 February by the communist North Vietnamese Army. Nearly thirty Marines had been killed during an unescapable ambush and we were ordered to leave them lie some 800 meters to our front. Today the score would be settled tenfold on what has become known as "the Payback Patrol", but at the cost of over a dozen more brave young Marine Warriors.

It began with overhead artillery and what is known as a "Rolling Box Barrage" with the use of multiple Batteries of heavy artillery. After the initial prep fires the end of the box opened up as Bravo moved in to close with what turned out to be a battalion of communist troops. Once in, the box would close behind us trapping Marines and NVA alike inside. It became a fight of unprecedented fury. To see those young Marines, some of whom only six weeks before had been home with their families, charging machine gun bunkers with their flamethrowers, satchel charges and fixed bayonets. It was a sight to behold. The Communist gunners quickly learned what the Germans had learned at Belleau Wood some 50 years before when the German High Command asked: "Wer sind diese Teufelshunde ? Who are these Devil Dogs?" When it seemed to be coming to a close, hours later, we began to pull back, collecting our dead and wounded, we realized what a price we had just paid. We had fought a very determined, well-disciplined enemy who, still to this day commands our respect as fellow Warriors. When our enemies tried to reinforce, it was at that point, as they were bearing down on us, that we came to appreciate those Marines who were part of our "Air Wing", as the F4 Phantoms screamed in at treetop level with their Napalm bombs, dropping so close you could feel the heat of the inferno adjacent to our positions. As the pilot rolled his jet around to the left we could see him give us all a "Thumbs Up". Our Commander Captain Ken Pipes, who had been seriously wounded and had lost most of his Command Group, had maintained contact with the air and artillery and had masterfully coordinated their firepower to our benefit.

In the end Bravo would suffer more casualties (58 KIA's) than any other company of the Regiment (REIN). For their valor they would earn three Navy Crosses, our nation's second highest award. Only one would live to collect it. After attacking numerous bunkers within the enemy complex Donald Rash, one of our newest members, laid down on the edge of a bomb crater to cover our withdrawal, knowing full well he would never get up again. His mother would be handed a folded flag along with his Navy Cross. That kind of heroism and dedication to your fellow Marines brings a whole new meaning to the verse in John 15:13, "Greater Love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends". Ten Silver Star Medals and fourteen Bronze Star Medals with V for valor were awarded as well. Over two hundred Purple Heart Medals as many were wounded on multiple occasions. Numerous Navy Commendations were earned and they contributed greatly to the Regiment earning the prestigious Presidential Unit Citation (PUC).

April brought new leadership to the company as many of our Officers had been wounded or killed. New men arrived and the wounded were evacuated. Our fallen Marine's remains were recovered within days. It would be five long years before we were told one of our members, Sgt Ronald Ridgeway, had been captured and held prisoner and had survived the war. It has now been nearly fifty years and those men, those brave young Marines will live in my memory forever. I hope the world will always remember as well.

Where do we get such men? What a privilege and an Honor it was to have served with and to have known them.

Semper Fidelis and may God always hold them in His arms

I GET MAIL

I am the Green Beret who took the old color photo of the Poilane Family on the cover of the most recent "Red Clay" Magazine. I read the story and was overwhelmed by the memories it brought back to me. In 1964, I remember driving past their European style house quite frequently as we drove between the old French Fort and the airfield. We had dinner with the Poilane Family on at least a couple of occasions, and sometimes discussed the VC situation with Felix. I had no knowledge of what happened to them until I returned to Khe Sanh in 2013. Then I met Dennis Mannion at the KSV Reunion in Nashville in 2013 where we exchanged photos and information on the whereabouts of the Poilane Family

What a courageous family they were, and are today. I'm looking forward to making contact with Jean-Marie and Francoise and sharing some old memories with them.

Thanks for this post. I was wondering if someone could retrieve you in my message on this board. Finally "Red Clay" magazine allowed this ! Thanks again for the photo of my parents, my sister and me and thanks for this message. Actually Dennis Mannion sent me an email reporting me your post. Of course I will give you my email to correspond with you and I hope that my sister Françoise will do the same.

Warmest regards.

PERSONAL MEMORIES FROM THE WEB

I returned from Vietnam with all my body parts intact and no holes in them except those that were intended to be there. For that I am grateful, and I still have that body today. The only part of my body I ever lost (other than a few of my teeth), was the tip of the middle finger on my right hand. It was cut off in a jointer in shop class when I was in the 9th grade. The vivax and falciparum malaria I contracted in Vietnam has never recurred. I didn't want to bring those parasites home with me anyway.

When I came through Okinawa on my way home, I bought a hand carved serving tray. The ox cart and ox that were carved three dimensionally in the tray were intended to be covered by a sheet of glass, inset on the rim that was left for that purpose, in order to make a level surface. I gave it to my mother but she never used it as a serving tray. Instead she hung it on the wall in her dining room, and it remained there as a conversation piece until she died at age 87.

On the wall of my mother's living room, right next to the front door where everyone would see it, she hung the large, framed, head and shoulders picture of me in my uniform that was taken at some photo studio in San Diego after I graduated from boot camp. I was one of five siblings, and I think over the years my brother and sisters came to hate that picture because it was so prominently displayed.

My mother and I were not particularly close (I didn't particularly enjoy being whipped by her and my father), but I think she wanted to be closer to me. I left home when I was 16 and lived on my own, working two jobs and staying out of trouble until I turned 18. I joined the Marine Corps less than two weeks after my birthday. When I returned home before leaving for Vietnam, I had enough money to pay off all of my mother's debts (she lived a very frugal life, and my father was disabled with MS and couldn't work), so I did that as a non-verbal way of thanking her for putting up with me.

After I returned from Vietnam my mother saved all the letters she received about my military career and accomplishments from the Commandant of the Marine Corps on down. She also received and saved all the grade reports and newspaper articles about me from my college and law school days. My sister and I found them after she died, in the place where she kept her prized possessions. She and my father had 6th grade educations, and I was the only one of her children who served in the military and attended college, so she saved all those memories.

Now my wife has that tray, but she also just wants to display it. At this point some of the glue that held it together has dried and doesn't hold the tray together as well, but she loves the look and feel of the tray so it is on display in our home now. One reason she loves it is because I am an ox under the Chinese zodiac, and she even calls me Niu Bao, which means ox baby. For her, the ox carving is like a depiction of me.

My wife also has that framed picture of me, hanging in our home, to remind me (according to her) that I wasted the best years of my life before she and I met and married each other.

When I arrived at Camp Lejeune after Vietnam, I went to the PX and proudly bought things with the Marine Corps Emblem on them, but none of them survived the years. Coffee cups tend to get broken, and when you move a lot, other things tend to disappear.

Then after I finished OCS and The Basic School, I bought a black, leather-covered box that officers tend to buy at the PX, much like a man's jewelry box, to hold things like my ribbons and medals and warrant officer bars. But I put something else in that box because it meant something to me. Over the years, many more things disappeared from my Marine Corps days. Even my Marine Corps officer's sword with my name on the blade disappeared along with its black scabbard and belt, and I don't have a single item of my uniform or covers or emblems left. Even my dog tags disappeared somewhere along the way.

But that one little item survived in that black box and remains there today. My kids have marveled at it and tried to use it. My grandkids are curious about it, but have trouble believing that it could be used for its intended purpose.

Have you guessed what it is? Yes, it is the last C-Ration opener that I used in Vietnam. It looks old, and it is, but it served its purpose well, helped keep me alive, and still works after all these years. It earned its place of honor in that little black box.

Other than that, all I have left are the memories; that is, all the memories that still remain.

Now there is no particular reason that you should care about this story, and you may wonder why I wrote it, but to be honest I didn't write it just to post it on this message board. I have calculated, right or wrong, that one thing I can leave for my family and my descendants are stories about their ancestors that might survive, and may even increase in value to them over time, so when I write a story like this, I save it with all the other stories I have written. I wish some of my ancestors had done the same, but it would have been more difficult to do without computers and electricity.

I also wrote a book that was published in 2009, and republished in 2010. It is based on true stories about my life, but fictionalized enough to make it more interesting, and it actually got great reviews on Amazon. I wanted to capture those memories for my descendants while they still existed.

For whatever it is worth, I shared this story with you, because you are my fellow Khe Sanh Veterans, and you may also see some value in that old C-Ration opener because you saved yours as well.

Last night, C/1/26 spent the night at 1/9's old position at the rock quarry. The morning of the 17th, we moved to the LZ in the vicinity of the drop zone, formed into heliteams and prepared to leave Khe Sanh. We watched 46s bring in new troops, one bird touching down with the tail ramp in a mine fields. As troops left the bird, several mines were tripped and Marines wounded. Welcome to Khe Sanh. We headed to Wonder Beach and as we lifted off I had a knot in my stomach until the base faded from view. We had cleared the AO and were out of there, completely. As I get older, my memory retains less about time on the ground and the siege, but leaving Khe Sanh is remembered like it happened yesterday. Unlike Dennis, within a few hours we had hot showers, clean utilities and a hot meal.

Sadly, the months ahead would bring some intense combat near the DMZ and guys that survived Khe Sanh went home in body bags. War sucks.

WARNING TURNS INTO FRIENDSHIP

Just a quick quote, and the story! I'm on my way to Hill 861as the new Doc! A fellow Doc calls me aside, and tells me to stay away from Rockets, and Machine gunners. When I reach the 3rd Plt. trench line, a Marine starts screaming for me to get down, and in comes a mortar round. That Marines name was John Snowder, and he was in fact a Rocket Man. A few minutes later, I meet another Marine named Mike Bradbury, who also was a Rocket man. My home ending up between Rockets & Machine Guns. We would become life long friends, and later a grunt named Randy Mapel, also a Rocket man would join this club! These three MARINES just spent the week with me, encouraging me, never letting me spend a penny on anything. Much adapt overcome persever for me. It's the most I've eaten in 6 months□. They took from their own lives and gave much to me! It is a true picture of the United States Marine Corps helping their own! To everyone of you out there, thank you so much, and Semper fi!

Doc,

Doc, I am sure other Marines have already told you this, but we depended so much on our Corpsmen and every time we lost one of them, we took it personally.

Did you know Doc Toner? He was returning from R&R not long after I arrived at Khe Sanh. His plane was shot down and everyone on board died. He was the first of what seemed like an endless stream of Corpsmen I knew who were injured or killed in Vietnam.

Much of what happened in Vietnam has been lost or shut out of my mind over the years. Even the name of the Corpsman who died a hero not 5 minutes after he left my side to go to the aid of a seriously injured Marine remains in my memory, but I have never forgotten how he sacrificed his live to help that Marine.

At that time I was carrying the company radio and Doc was at the command post, such as it was, with the company commander and me. I heard the cry for Corpsman Up on the radio and Doc heard it as well and was already grabbing his bag. We were under heavy fire but Doc ignored it and ran to help the downed Marine. But as soon as he arrived and started to treat the Marine, who had a sucking chest wound, I heard the frantic call on the radio. They got Doc too, same kind of wound to the chest, and Doc lost his life that day.

It was two more days and many more dead and wounded before we fought our way out of that mess. I may not remember his name, but I can still see Doc's face and will never forget his bravery and his sacrifice.

MISSION TO VIETNAM A ATASCOCITA VETERANON MISSION TO EXUME KIA MARINES

By Melanie Feuk

KSV IN THE NEWS

Peter Post of Atascocita and his fellow Marines made their way up Hill 700 at Khe Sanh in Vietnam, they came under small arms fire April 6, 1968.

"We were at Khe Sanh for the 77-day siege," Post said. "At the end, we (were) assigned to patrol Hill 700, right in the middle of Hills 881, 861 and 558 which are the more famous Hills. There was still some North Vietnamese Army (NVA) there."
On the other side of the hill, there were two large bomb craters where many of the troops were taking cover. Squad leader James Trimble and radioman PFC Anthony Pepper were in the right-hand bunker when a mortar round landed in the crater; taking both of their lives.

The battle lasted for two days; those who could, continued pushing on. Those wounded were recovered and brought back for medical attention. However, many of those who lost their lives in battle had to be left for retrieval at a later, safer time.
"It was a tough two days," Post said. "As we got to the very ridge of the hill, the fire got really intense. We had a couple of Marines that were out over the edge and we were trying to get back. The battalion pulled us back off the hill and brought in artillery. We thought we'd go right back up. We had the wounded off the hill, but we knew we didn't have all of those Killed in Action (KIA.)

"They held us down there all night. We went back the next day joined by the Fox Company on the right, and we took the hill. But, when we went back up, we couldn't find any traces of Trimble and Pepper. We took the hill on April 7(1968,) cleaned everything up and got everybody identified except for those two. So, that's been an ongoing case."

In 2014, Post was approached by the Joint POW/MIA Accounting Command (JPAC) regarding an investigative mission into the case of the unrecovered Marines.

"JPAC in Honolulu has teams that go back to recover MIAs or unaccounted-for servicemen," Post said. "They asked if I would help them with this investigation. So, we went to Vietnam in June 2014 with a 16-person team."

Post navigated the team to the bomb craters. After they examined the craters and properly catalogued the information, Post showed them the exact site where Pepper and Trimble were killed, although the location of their bodies remained unknown.
Determined in their attempt to bring some closure to this case, Post and JPAC began working their way through another approval process which would permit them to conduct a dig on Hill 700. In the end, they were successful and return to Vietnam Wednesday, Aug. 10 in the hopes of exhuming any remains of the fallen heroes, Trimble and Pepper.

"It took two years to get everything in place," Post said. "We'll be doing a sort of anthropological dig. There could still be remains at the edge of the crater. They will sift the dirt and dig it out very carefully. Our hopes are that we recover something, which will most likely be bone fragments or something like that. The lab in Honolulu has DNA for the both of them, so they can test anything we find."

The excavation process will take time and may not yield the desired results, but Post remains optimistic.

"It takes approximately 30 days for them to do this dig," Post said. "There's enough probability of finding something for this to have been approved. If there was no chance of finding something, we would not have been given the funding."
According to Post, exhumed remains of Pepper and Trimble would likely be buried at Arlington National Cemetery.

A REFLECTION ON FATHER'S DAY

By Gene Weresow

Yesterday was fathers day and today I was reflecting on how fortunate I am to have survived this long. After Khe Sanh my children and grandchildren bought me a little something. But beyond the gift was a note from my grandchildren. It read " We have a Hero we call him Grandpa" now I'm not normally a sentimental guy but this touched me beyond words.

So today I was relaxing and reflecting back on my Dad (that's what us old guys do these days) in a way he was a hero to me too, and I regret never telling him so, he's gone many years now and I miss him

So I decided to listen to some of the music he had written over the years. As many of you may know, he wrote Symphony No 6 Khe Sanh in 1968. As I listened to it again I came to realize how truly remarkable it is and what a labor of love it must have been for him. Thanks dad for leaving me this wonderful work which I can enjoy when ever I miss you.

Now you gotta realize he penned this this thing, each instrument each note and my daughter God bless her spent countless hours converting it all to a computerized symphony I received on fathers day about 8 years ago.

How truly blessed I am to have such great children , grandchildren, a wonderful wife and a father who cared to pen this music for me.

AN UNHEARD SYMPHONY, AND A RUTGERS COMPUTER WHIZ'S WORK TO BRING IT ALL TO LIFE

"Catherine Weresow labored late into the night to convert her grandfather's score into sound"

By Mary Jo Patterson

Most families have heirlooms of some sort, providing a precious link between generations. A pocket watch. A chair. An old teddy bear.

This is a tale about a symphony – four movements, handwritten on sheet music – that passed from one generation to the next. A family heirloom, to be sure, but one that was not heard for 42 years until Catherine Weresow, an application developer at Rutgers brought it to life.

The work was composed during the Vietnam War in New Jersey by Dymitry Weresow, a father of six, including a Marine defending a remote Vietnam outpost known as Khe Sanh. In January of 1968, one of the war's most brutal battles began at Khe Sanh. As Weresow watched news reports of the 77-day-long siege, he was so inspired by the courage of his son, Gene, and other Marines that he wrote a symphony and dedicated it to them.

Gene survived the battle and came home. He wanted desperately to hear the symphony, especially after Dymitry's death in 1985. But that did not happen until December 2010, when his 36-year-old daughter, Catherine, who works in Rutgers' Office of Instructional Research and Technology, began experimenting with software used for music composition.

After work for three months, Catherine labored late into the night to convert her grandfather's orchestrated score into sound. She decided to make the result a surprise Christmas present for her father.

One evening in December, while visiting her parents, she set up her laptop with speakers and clicked on the link she'd created, http://zdh.com/khesahn. Here, she announced, come the first two movements of Dimitry Weresow's Symphony No. 6, "Khe Sahn". Her father listened. He was elated.

"I was overwhelmed," he said. "I'd been wanting to hear this thing for years. Not being as gifted as my dad, I couldn't hear the music just by reading the notes."

Catherine hadn't been able to imagine her grandfather's symphony, either. She had taken violin lessons as a child, but wasn't a fan of classical music. Making music as an adult meant playing the drums or Rock Band on her Xbox. She knew, from childhood visits to her grandparents' home, that Dymitry had a room in back filled with records. She remembered him playing the piano, and knew he was choirmaster at church. But she did not understand that her grandfather, who made a living as a laborer, was a composer. When he died, he left behind seven symphonies, several operas, and a number of shorter works.

Dymitry Weresow had no formal music education, according to his son, but he had a great-uncle who was a well-known Russian composer, Alexander Scriaben. He taught himself to play the piano and joined a performing arts troupe as a young man. During World War II he was captured by the Germans, and later he became one of the thousands of exiles from eastern Europe who resettled in the United States.

During the last days of his life, Weresow told Gene he hoped his music would find recognition some day. After he died, his son sent the Khe Sanh symphony score around to orchestras around the country, hoping to kindle their interest.

"I got back some very nice responses, but basically nothing happened," he said. After graduating from Rutgers in 1997 his daughter, now skilled in computers, used technology to tackle the project. It was a formidable task; software was costly, her grandfather's writing was hard to read, and the score was filled with obscure notations and unfamiliar Italian phrases. She gave up.

In October 2010, Catherine tried again. Newer, less expensive software allowed her to slowly convert the pages into sound, note by note. When she was stumped, she studied musical composition, or consulted a handful of experts she had met online.

Catherine Weresow, Gene's Daughter

good. It sounded interesting."

It was hard work, but exciting. She was learning, using technology, and writing family history. At night, she went to bed hearing the music in her head. At work, she found herself humming.

She completed the job on the night of Jan. 12, 2011. After some post-production tweaking, to adjust the volume of certain instruments, she sent her father an e-mail, "I'm finished!"

Now Weresow plans to produce her grandfather's other works. But she hopes that will not be the end of the story.

"We would still like to hear it performed live. Who knows? It's possible, we could find someone who takes an interest," she said. "I figure, the more I do, the better. Maybe one of them will catch someone's ear. "

Decades after a man wrote a symphony honoring his son and other Marines in Vietnam, his granddaughter has converted the orchestrated score into sound

Eugene -What a wonderful tribute to your father. On Friday June 17, a number of us met in Oceanside California for dinner prior to attending the Memorial Service for Jim Kaylor on Saturday at Camp Pendleton. I don't recall what caused the subject to come up, but Larry McCartney asked me, "Of all of the people who have lived on this planet who would you most like to have a conversation with." I'll admit I was stuck for an answer, although I may have considered having a conversation with some of intelligence and influence I am quite sure the conversation would have been one sided. I think I mumbled something of a none answer that I can't now remember. I guess I have never been too fascinated with celebrities, stature or power, perhaps I am too narcissistic to be overly impressed by others. About 0200 Saturday I was awake and the answer to Larry's most interesting question came to me, I'll blame an overabundance of adult beverage for not thinking of it when asked, because it is certainly something I have thought about most of my life. My father passed away in 1950 at the age of 35, I was only 3 years old. My parents had separated and my mother had moved on with another man who pretty much resented having to raise another man's child. By now you'll have correctly reasoned that the person I would most like to have talked to was my natural father. Although I never knew him, many have told me what a wonderful man he was. He certainly wasn't wealthy, scholarly nor cultured, just a farm laborer who did his best both before and after serving in WWII. On the few days when I pass through the small dusty farm community where he is buried, I often stop and remove the weeds from his little white military granite head stone and have a few private words with him. I look at the only photographs of him from his high school year book that sits on my desk, there is not a day goes by that I don't think about him, I think he knows that.

ED DIAZ, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN
FOXTROT COMPANY 2/26

TRIBUTE"

My Rocket Man
By Captain Terrence Arndt
Memories of Ed Diaz

I served with Cpl. Ed Diaz in the Republic of Vietnam during the period of November 1968 to April 1969. I was his platoon commander. I am saddenedby the loss of Ed. He was liked and respected by all. My prayers go out to his wife Jenny and family & friends. I would be with you if it were not for the health of my wife and the requirement for 24/7 care.

Ed was a Marine through and through. With 2nd Platoon, Fox, 2/26, Ed participated in the defense of the Khe Sanh Combat Base in which the 26th Marine Regiment was awarded the Presidential Unit Citation for one of the 77-day siege of the combat base. It was one of the largest battles of the Vietnam War.

He participated in operations LZ Margo, Valiant Hunt, Eager Pursuit, Meade River, and Bold Mariner. During Operation Bold Mariner, February 1969 our platoon, with Ed playing a key role, was successful in capturing over 100 enemy personnel including a complete Sapper Company (56), the largest intact enemy unit captured during the war to that date.

My fondest memory of Ed was on Operation Meade River, November 1968. This was a 10 battalion operation that killed over 1100 NVA. A tough, close, at the tip of the spear fighting. Ed was section leader in 3.5 rockets assigned to our platoon. The 3.5 Rocked Launcher was an old weapon from WWII. It was large but effective if the gunner could shoot. The platoon was returning from a dangerous patrol in front of friendly lines trying to find and close enemy escape routes. It was a quiet patrol until we were returning to our lines. We were pinned down by enemy sniper and machine gun fire. The platoon organized a defense while under fire. We were all trying to crawl into our helmets. I called Rockets up and Ed came forward with his Assistant Gunner. Now we were all scared. Ed was scared, but he was courageous. I explained to Ed that we had to use his rocket launcher to knock out a small house/bunker complex the North Vietnamese were using to fire at us. Ed, kneeling and exposing himself to enemy fire, aimed his rocket launcher at the complex.

He took careful aim while always knowing that the snipers want to kill him before he can launch the rocket. They did not. He was successful with a direct hit, destroying the complex and suppressing enemy fire. Not only did he hit the complex but he put the round through the window. Some shot! This allowed the platoon to safely return to friendly lines and was then that Ed, forever, became, My Rocket Man.

After the war we all came home, put it away, and got on with our lives. In 1985 there was a parade in NYC and the dedication of the New York City Veterans Memorial Plaza. I was working at the American Express Company and the building formed part of the plaza. Late in the afternoon I decided to go down and see what was happening. The was a notice that the 26th Marines were gathering at a hotel and all who served were invited. The Khe Sanh group put on a slide show of the battle in a hot dark, crowed room. When it was over, I looked across and I thought recognized three Marines. I went over and introduced myself and they all said Lt. Arndt, good to see you. They were Ed Diaz, Ed Brown, and Rich (G?). We proceed to tell too many sea stories, late into the night. It began a lifelong friendship with Ed, Ed Brown until he passed away and Carlos Morales. Ed Brown is buried here and Ed wanted to be buried with his Vietnam Brother, Ed Brown.

We stayed on contact, and even attended a couple of Khe Sanh Veterans reunions.

I shall miss him, his humility, smile, friendship. Semper Fi my good brother and I will see you with Sky Six soon.

JULY 15 2016 JIM HEBRON DIED IN THE PHILIPINES. JIM WAS INSTRUMENTAL IN ESTABLISHING THE KHE SANH VETERANS ORGANIZATION AND WAS THE KEY PLAYER IN SETTING UP THE 1985 NY TICKER TAPE PARADE.

Another sad loss. Spent many reunions with JIM. The life of the party when he was around, but humble at the same time. I had to hear from others that he was partly responsible for the NYC Welcome Home Parade (which was my introduction to the KSV) and the Khe Sanh Veterans. He will be missed.

TOM FORD
Foxtrot Co 2/26

I am sad to hear about Jim's passing. Jim was second squad leader B/3 at Khe Sanh. he rotated out 4 days before the "Ghost Patrol" arriving home on Feb 25. We were good friends for many years. He contacted all of the families of those KIA on the patrol to offer his condolences and share memoirs of their loved ones lost that day. He was also instrumental in the in organizing and running the 1985 Welcome Home Parade for Vietnam Veterans in the city of New York . Until he moved to the Philippines to retire , he attended all of our Khe Sanh reunions. He was a good friend, a good man. and a Great Marine! RIP our brother! Semper Fi.

Tuesday, just after midnight at The Wall on 9Nov82....three days before the dedication:

I had driven down from CT earlier on that Monday to "be a part of the dedication" even though I was not a member of any veterans groups and I did not know a single veteran there.

Checked into a motel in Alexandria at 2200 hrs. Called home and spoke with Joan. Then drove to the Wall and stayed within 400 meters of it for the next 36 hours straight. There was only a temporary paved walkway then, and there was a least 8 feet of grass between it and the wall itself.

It was raining and had been so for hours, so with all the foot traffic, the grass had been churned into serious mud. In addition, there were no small flood lights at the bottoms of the panels, so it was an occasional flashlight, lighter, or matches. I had none of these. I overheard someone in the dark explaining how the wall "worked" with names in alphabetical order by day and, it took me some time to zero in on April 1968. I was looking for Lt. Steve Fordham -- KIA on 15April in the saddle of terrain between 881s and 881n. Somehow, I needed to find him first. It must have been around 4 in the morning, and suddenly there he was. His panel is on the Washington Monument side at a point where the wall is only three feet high.

I was stunned, shaken, overtaken with grief and seemed to be weighted down. I sank to my knees in the mud, leaned against the glistening marble panel, touched his name and wept. It seemed that the Wall was shedding tears right along with me. Not sure how long I was there -- motionless and wracked with sobbing -- maybe half an hour or more. Suddenly, a hand on my shoulder and a quiet voice, "You OK, buddy? Is this your first visit? Let me help you up."

He and the woman he was with helped me to my feet and we shook hands. He told me his name -- Jim Hebron -- and he introduced me to the woman he was with. I have forgotten her first name but I have never forgotten who she was. A sister of Lt. Don Jacques. I saw them on and off together for the next two days, and I remember sitting on the steps of the Lincoln Memorial (in the daytime) as we compared our USMC time. He was clearly haunted and guilt ridden by the fact that he had rotated out of KS a few days before the ambush of the ghost patrol. I think Jim said he was in Okinawa when he heard the news reports about it.

We stayed in touch for a few years...I saw him at the NYC Parade in '85 and at one of the D.C. reunions. Last I had heard (till now) was that he had moved out of the country. So sad.

Semper Fi, Jim, and God Bless.

Conversation in San Antonio

by

Khe Sanh Veterans Chaplain Ron Rayner

This election year has polarized our country as no other since 1968. I see no middle ground. It is my suggestion that politics are left at home while the Khe Sanh Vets are in San Antonio. The Bible offers much advice on what should be said

"Let no evil talk come out of your mouths, but only what is useful for building up, as there is need, so that your words may give grace to those who hear." Ephesians 4:29

"A perverse person stirs up dissension, and a gossip separates close friends." Proverbs 16:28 (NIV)

"Words satisfy the soul as food satisfies the stomach; the right words on a person's lips bring satisfaction. Those who love to talk will experience the consequences, for the tongue can kill or nourish life."

Proverbs 18:20-21 (NLT)

Three simple criteria for speaking: Is it true? Is it kind? Is it going to help the situation?

I am going to try and get a notice in my local newspaper about our San Antonio reunion in September. It is always nice to see new faces as well as familiar faces at the reunions. I believe we all have a duty to promote the Khe Sanh Veterans and the annual reunion.

"Reckless words pierce like a sword, but the tongue of the wise brings healing." Proverbs 12:18 (NIV)

Our Father, please speak to us through the words of the Bible and help us to see how to apply their truth daily. Amen.

MORE WEB GEMS

It was late into the night and as usual I was awake and laying on the couch channel surfing while my wife was tucked safe and snug in bed 3 hours into her restful sleep pattern. I happened to come across Oliver North's War Stories series about the Siege of the Khe Sanh Combat Base, my recall is that it was produced or first shown in 1991. There were a number participant of that battle who were interviewed and all of them did an excellent job articulating their first hand narratives. I guess because I know them personally, I was particular interested in the dialogs of Ray Stubbe, Bruce Geiger and Dennis Mannion, each eloquently described their individual experiences and perceptions of that battle.

They were of course younger men then and although sixteen years has now passed since that interview, relative speaking, to this day they still look fit and distinguished. Calm, composed, articulate yet coupled with great heart felt emotion, they were able to paint a clear and concise biography of events. I was thinking, the producer of the series could not have chosen a better assemblage of Khe Sanh Veterans to have told the story of that now legendary battle. I was proud of them and proud that I am able to call myself a Khe Sanh Veteran. Their words spoke for all of us, an accurate and historical account of our endurance, deprivation, struggles, bravery, individual triumphs and great loss, now forever etched into the soul of American history.

OBIT

JERRY WAYNE WILLIAMS
USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN
BRAVO BTRY 1/13

(October 21, 1947 - July 18, 2016)

Jerry Wayne Williams, 68, of Harpers Ferry, WV passed away at Reston Hospital Center in Reston, Virginia.

Born October 21, 1947 in Madisonville, Kentucky, he was the son of the late Marvin C. Williams and Marguerite Hoskins Williams of Harpers Ferry, WV.

He was a veteran of the US Marine Corps from 1966 to 1970, serving three tours in Vietnam, and was involved in 23 major operations. Jerry received 14 ribbons which included the CAR (Combat Action Ribbon) and three Presidential Unit Citations. Jerry was a direct down to earth man. He absolutely loved and enjoyed every minute he spent with his granddaughters, Rachael and Emily, and his wife, Sherry, his pride and joy for over 43 years.

Jerry was a member of St. James Catholic Church in Charles Town, WV and a 1966 graduate of Madisonville High School.

In addition to his mother, he is survived by his wife of 43 years, Sherry Lathe Williams, at home; son, Timothy David Williams of Harpers Ferry, WV; and two granddaughters, Rachael and Emily Williams of Harpers Ferry. He was preceded in death by his father, one sister, Linda Jones and one brother, Curtis Williams.

A funeral liturgy was held at 11:00 am on Friday, July 22, 2016 at Eackles-Spencer & Norton Funeral Home, 256 Halltown Road, Harpers Ferry, WV. Interment in Pleasant View memory Gardens in Martinsburg, WV with military honors.

TRIBUTE TO A BROTHER

I am sure that everyone knows about the little ceremony that Tom Keaton and I have every year at our property just outside of Mount Airy, NC to remember the brothers lost so long ago and all the ones since. Jerry called Tom to tell him that he would be unable to attend this year because his camper had a problem. This excuse sounded sort of lame but as time grew nearer, Jerry said he and Sherry would just come down and stay in the Best Western, but brought his camper anyway.

He had asked Tom and me to plan a trip to Camp Lejeune after our ceremony and before he had to return home, to see the MEN of the 10th Marines. He really liked being down there around men that he trusted. We could see that he would need some help with mobility so I borrowed an electric wheelchair from my American Legion Post. It worked well until I got it to the base, then Murphy's Law took over. Batteries would not charge. I was in panic mode so I went to our friends of 2nd Division for some help and was steered to the Wounded Warrior Battalion.

We had been invited to attend the retirement ceremony of a Master Sergeant on Friday the 8th, and Jerry would need something that he could maneuver around at the ceremony. The NCOIC at Wounded Warrior Battalion East was very accommodating and let us use the "rascal" in the lobby. Mission Accomplished and the only casualty was my nerves. Once back at the BOQ, we parked the vehicles under a tree to unwind from a hectic day and our group had a B/S Formation on the tailgate of my pickup, complete with music, lawn chairs and a couple of adult beverages. Great time for all and Jerry loved it.

The next morning we headed to the Wounded Warrior Battalion East Complex for the retirement ceremony. After the program and a few pictures, our group headed to the PX. While our wives and daughters shopped, and Jerry rode the scooter, Tom, Bob and I reported to the SNCO Club to talk to the MEN of the 10th Marines. But alas, all good things must end. It was time to return to the "Last Firebase" in Mt Airy. Jerry and Sherry had to leave for Charles Town, West Virginia early Saturday Morning for a Doctor's appointment on Tuesday. Tom had to get Jerry's camper ready to travel before he could return to Pittsburgh on Sunday, so Lynn and I said our good byes on Friday Night, Tom and Mary said theirs on Saturday Morning, we dismissed the formation and were looking forward to next year.

This little story of the last days Tom and I spent with Jerry did not do justice for him. All of us had experiences such as this almost 50 years ago where we had friends one minute and they may be gone the next. We walked together and watched each other's back. We still do and will continue to do so until future events dictate otherwise. We may not always get along and will get on each other's nerves, so make the most of our times together because it might be the last time we will do so.

NEW INFORMATION FROM THE DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS THAT EFFECT OUR KHE SANH NATIVE AMERICAN BROTHERS

38 CFR Part 14
RIN 2900 –AP51

Recognition of Tribal Organizations for Representation to VA Claimants

AGENCY Department of Veterans Affairs
ACTION: Proposed Rule

SUMMARY: The Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) is proposing to amend its regulations concerning recognition of certain national, State, and regional or local organizations for purposes of VA claims representation. Specifically, this rulemaking would allow the Secretary of Veterans Affairs to recognize tribal organizations in a similar manner as the Secretary recognizes State organizations.

The proposed rule would allow a tribal organization that is established and funded by one or more tribal governments to be recognized for the purpose of providing assistance on VA benefit claims. In addition, the proposed rule would allow an employee of a tribal government to become accredited through a recognized State organization in a similar manner as a County Veterans' Service Officer (CVSO) may become accredited through a recognized State organization. The intended effect of this proposed rule is to improve access of Native American veterans to VA-recognized organizations and VA-accredited individuals who may assist them on their benefit claims.

DATES: Written comments must be received on or before September 19, 2016.

ADDRESSES: Written comments may be submitted through http:// www.regulations.gov; by mail or hand delivery to the Director, Regulation Policy and Management (OOREG), Department of Veterans Affairs, 810 Vermont Avenue NW., Room 1068, Washington, DC 20420; or by fax to (202) 273-9026. Comments should indicate that they are submitted in response to "RIN 2900-AP51, Recognition of Tribal Organizations for Representation of VA Claimants."

Copies of comments received will be available for public inspection in the Office of Regulation Policy and Management, Room 1068, between the hours of 8 a.m. and 4:30 p.m., Monday through Friday (except holidays). Please call (202) 461-4902 for an appointment. (This is not a toll-free number.) In addition, during the comment period, comments may be viewed online through the Federal Docket Management System at http://www.regulations.gov/.

SUPPLEMENTARY INFORMATION:
This proposed rule would amend part 14 of title 38, Code of Federal Regulations, to provide for the recognition of tribal organizations that are established and funded by tribal governments so that representatives of the organizations may assist Native American veterans and their families in the preparation, presentation, and prosecution of their VA benefit claims.

The purpose of this proposed rule is to address the needs of Native American populations who are geographically isolated from existing recognized Veterans Service Organizations (VSOs) or who may not be utilizing other recognized VSOs due to cultural barriers or lack of familiarity with those organizations.

Native American veterans face challenges accessing representation in VA claims because many live in remote areas that are far from the nearest accredited representative. In addition, some Native American veterans may prefer to seek assistance from organizations that are associated with their tribal government, rather than using other organizations that are not as familiar to them.

This proposed rule would help facilitate the V A recognition of tribal organizations that are established and funded by one or more tribal governments and whose primary purpose is to serve Native American veterans.

Pursuant to 38 U.S.C. 5902, VA recognizes organizations and accredits their representatives for the preparation, presentation, and prosecution of claims under laws administered by VA. VA's regulation regarding the recognition of such organizations is 38 CFR 14.628, which currently does not expressly allow for the recognition of tribal organizations. Under the current regulations, however, any organization, including an organization created by one or more tribal governments, may apply for recognition by V A as either: (1) A national organization, or (2) a regional or local organization. To be recognized as a national organization, the organization must meet the requirements of § 14.628(a) and (d). Tobe recognized as a regional or local organization, the organization must meet the requirements of § 14.628(c) and (d). VA also accredits State organizations. To be recognized as a State organization, the organization must meet the requirements of § 14.628(b) and (d). Under the current regulations, VA has received only a few inquiries from tribal governments expressing interest in pursuing any type of VA recognition other than the type of recognition granted to State organizations. Pursuant to 38 CFR 14.627 and 14.629, VA recognition of a State organization is limited to organizations established and funded by a State, possession, territory, or Commonwealth of the United States, and the District of Columbia.

This proposed rule would allow tribal governments to establish and fund tribal organizations in a similar manner as the State governments have established and funded State organizations. Allowing organizations that are created and funded by tribal governments to be recognized as "tribal organizations" rather than as national, regional or local organizations would afford VA the opportunity to acknowledge and affirm the long-standing recognition by the Federal government of tribes' inherent sovereignty and right to self-government.

This proposed rule would amend 38 CFR 14.627 by adding a paragraph ® that would provide that tribal government means the Federally recognized governing body of any Indian tribe, band, nation, or other organized group or community, including any Alaska Native village or Regional or Village Corporation as defined in or established pursuant to the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act, which is recognized as eligible for the special programs and services provided by the United States to Indians because of their status as Indians. This is consistent with the definition of Indian tribe in 38 CFR 39.2.

This proposed rule would amend current § 14.628(b) by re-designating it as paragraph (b)(l), "State organization," and adding paragraph (b)(2), "Tribal organization." V A would clarify that Tribal organization, for the purposes of 38 CFR 14.626 through 14.637, is a legally established organization that is primarily funded and controlled, sanctioned, or chartered by one or more tribal governments and that has a primary purpose of serving the needs of Native American veterans; that only one tribal organization may be recognized for each tribal government; and, that, if a tribal organization is created and funded by more than one tribal government, the approval of each tribal government must be obtained prior to applying for VA recognition and that, if one of the supporting tribal governments withdraws from the tribal organization, the tribal organization must notify VA of the withdrawal and certify that the tribal organization can continue to meet the recognition requirements in § 14.628(d) without the participation of that tribal government.

This change is intended to allow tribal organizations to be recognized in a similar manner as State organizations, while still taking into account the unique circumstances of tribal governments being sovereign nations and of varying sizes.

In order to ensure that all claimants for VA benefits receive responsible, qualified representation in the preparation, presentation, and criteria that apply to all organizations requesting VA recognition as a national, State, regional, or local organization under § 14.628(a) through (c). Therefore, tribal organizations would also need to meet these same general requirements in order to be recognized. Pursuant to § 14.628 (d), an organization requesting recognition must: (1) Have as a primary purpose serving veterans, (2) demonstrate a substantial service commitment to veterans either by showing a sizable organizational membership or by showing performance of veterans' services to a sizable number of veterans, (3) commit a significant portion of its assets to veterans' services and have adequate funding to properly perform those services, (4) maintain a policy and capability of providing complete claims service to each claimant requesting representation or give written notice of any limitation in its claims service with advice concerning the availability of alternative sources of claims service, and (5) take affirmative action, including training and monitoring of accredited representatives, to ensure proper handling of claims.

We recognize the varying sizes of tribal governments. We further recognize that, due to the size of certain smaller Indian tribes, a single tribal government may be unable to establish an organization that could demonstrate a substantial service commitment to veterans either by showing a sizable organizational membership or by showing performance of veterans' services to a sizable number of veterans.

A single tribal government may also be unable to establish an organization that would be able to adequately fund the necessary services of a tribal organization that provides assistance with VA benefit claims. Therefore, VA would consider applications from a tribal organization that is established and funded by one or more tribal governments to be recognized for the purpose of providing assistance on VA benefit claims. The approval of each tribal government would be necessary for VA to process the request for VA recognition.

While VA is sensitive to the fact that some tribal governments may have difficulty meeting the substantial service commitment and funding requirements, VA must ensure that VA accredited organizations can provide long-term, competent representation. Therefore, VA would require that, if one of the supporting tribal governments withdraws from the tribal organization, the tribal organization must notify VA of the withdrawal and certify that the tribal organization continues to meet the recognition requirements in § 14.628(d) without the participation of that tribal government. We note that 25 U.S.C.450b(l) recognizes the existence of tribal coalitions in the definition of tribal organization for the purpose of entering into contracts or grants for certain educational benefits. Additionally, in 38CFR 39.2, VA has recognized the existence of a parallel concept for the purpose of applying for cemetery grants.

Based on our experience in applying § 14.628, we believe the proposed addition to the regulation would facilitate the recognition of Tribal organizations and would improve Native American veterans' access to accredited representatives.

Once a tribal organization has been recognized by VA, the certifying official of the organization would be able to file for VA accreditation for the individuals that the organization wishes to become accredited as its representatives. See 38 CFR 14.629.

VA further recognizes that not all tribal governments may want to establish their own Tribal veterans organization and some may have already established working relationships with their respective State organizations to help ad dress the needs of their Native American veteran population. We, therefore, propose to amend 38 CFR 14.629(a)(2) to allow for an employee of a tribal government that is not associated with a tribal organization, to become accredited as a representative of a State organization in a similar manner as a county employee, i.e., a CVSO. In 1990, in order to further ensure the availability of competent representation for VA claimants, VA extended the opportunity for accreditation through State organizations to county veterans' service officers. See 54 FR 50772; 55 FR 38056. In extending this opportunity, VA cited the close association between States and county veterans' service officers, likening the association to that of a State employee under 54 FR 50772.

In a previous rulemaking. VA recognized the fact that State governments do not have direct supervision of, or accountability or, CVSO, and therefore, to ensure adequate training and fitness to serve as a VA accredited representative, VA prescribed criteria that such officers must meet in order to become accredited. The criteria for a CVSO to become accredited through a State organization are outlined in § 14.629(a)(2)(i) through (Hi). In order for a CVSO to be recommended for VA accreditation by a VA-recognized State organization, the officer must be a paid employee of the county working for it not less than 1,000 hours annually; have successfully completed a course of training and an examination which have been approved by a Regional Counsel with jurisdiction for the State; and receive either regular supervision and monitoring or annual training to assure continued qualification as a representative in the claims process.

We note that the VA Office of the General Counsel (OGC) has recently undergone realignment and under the new structure Regional Counsels are now referred to as Chief Counsels. To avoid unnecessary confusion and because we intend to issue a direct final rule addressing the realignment of OGC and the changing of titles of certain OGC positions in the accreditation regulations in a single rulemaking, we are continuing to use the outdated title of Regional Counsel for this rulemaking.

Although tribal governments are not politically subordinate to State governments like county governments are, tribal governments often do have close, productive relationships with State governments through gaming compacts, cross-deputization, and other cooperative agreements. Therefore, we believe that the collaborative nature of the relationship between tribes and States supports the proposed concept of recognizing tribal veterans' service officers in a manner similar to county veterans' service officers.

As stated above, we believe this additional path to become an accredited representative would further facilitate veterans obtaining representation across county State, and tribal borders.

For consistency, the proposed rule would also amend 38 CFR 14.635 to extend office space opportunities already granted to certain employees of State organizations to employees of tribal organizations. The proposed rule would allow the Secretary to furnish office space and facilities, when available, to both State and tribal organization employees who are also accredited to national organizations for the purpose of assisting claimants in the preparation, presentation, and prosecution of claims for benefits.

We are also requesting from the Office of Management and Budget (OMB) approval for the provisions of § 14.628(d) that constitute a collection of information under the Paperwork Reduction Act of 1995 (44 U.S.C. 3501-3521). Therefore, we would remove the current OMB control number parenthetical at the end of § 14.628 and add, in its place, a placeholder parenthetical.

Finally, we would make a technical amendment to § 14.629(a)(2) to correct "county veteran's service officer" to read as "county veterans' service officer". In a prior rulemaking, we misplaced the location of the apostrophe associated with the previously mentioned phrase. See 54 FR 50772 (Dec. 11,1989); 55 FR 38056 (Sept. 17, 1990). Therefore, we would correct that error in this rulemaking. Paperwork Reduction Act

This proposed rule includes provisions constituting collections of information under the Paperwork Reduction Act of 1995 (44 U.S.C.3501- 3521) that require approval by OMB.

Accordingly, under 44 U.S.C. 3507(d),VA has submitted a copy of this rulemaking action to OMB for review.

OMB assigns control numbers to collections of information it approves.VA may not conduct or sponsor, and a person is not required to respond to, a collection of information unless it displays a currently valid OMB control number. Proposed § 14.628 contains a collection of information under the Paperwork Reduction Act of 1995. If OMB does not approve the collection of information as requested, VA will immediately remove the provisions containing a collection of information or take such other action as is directed by OMB.

Comments on the collection of information contained in this proposed rule should be submitted to the Office of Management and Budget, Attention: Desk Officer for the Department of Veterans Affairs, Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs, Washington, DC 20503, with copies sent by mail or hand delivery to the Director, Regulation Policy and Management (OOREG), Department of Veterans Affairs, 810 Vermont Avenue NW., Room 1068, Washington, DC 20420; fax to (202) 273-9026; email to www.Regulations.gov. Comments should indicate that they are submitted in response to "RIN 2900-AP51."

OMB is required to make a decision concerning the collections of information contained in this proposed rule between 30 and 60 days after publication of this document in the Federal Register. Therefore, a comment to OMB is best assured of having its full effect if OMB receives it within 30 days of publication. This does not affect the deadline for the public to comment on the proposed rule.

The Department considers comments by the public on proposed collections of information in- • Evaluating whether the proposed collections of information are necessary for the proper performance of the functions of the Department, including whether the information will have practical utility;

• Evaluating the accuracy of the Department's estimate of the burden of the proposed collections of information, including the validity of the methodology and assumptions used;

• Enhancing the quality, usefulness, and clarity of the information to be collected; and

• Minimizing the burden of the collections of information on those who are to respond, including through the use of appropriate automated, electronic, mechanical, or other technological collection techniques or other forms of information technology, e.g., permitting electronic submission of responses.

The collection of information contained in 38 CFR 14.628 is described immediately following this paragraph, under its respective title.

Title: Requirements for Recognition as a VA Accredited Organization.

- Summary of collection of information: The collection of information in 38 CFR 14.628 would require organizations seeking VA accreditation under § 14.628 to submit certain documentation to certify that the organization meets the requirements for VA accreditation. Pursuant to § 14.628(d), an organization requesting recognition must have as a primary purpose serving veterans. In establishing that it meets this requirement, an organization requesting recognition shall submit a statement establishing the purpose of the organization and that veterans would benefit by recognition of the organization.

The organization must also demonstrate a substantial service commitment to veterans either by showing a sizable organizational membership or by showing performance of veterans' services to a sizable number of veterans. In establishing that it meets his requirement, an organization requesting recognition shall submit: The number of members and number of posts, chapters, or offices and their addresses; a copy of the articles of incorporation, constitution, charter, and bylaws of the organization, as appropriate; a description of the services performed or to be performed in connection with programs administered by VA, with an approximation of the number of veterans, survivors, and dependents served or to be served by the organization in each type of service designated; and a description of the type of services, if any, performed in connection with other Federal and State programs which are designed to assist former Armed Forces personnel and their dependents, with an approximation of the number of veterans, survivors, and dependents served by the organization under each program designated.

An organization requesting recognition must commit a significant portion of its assets to veterans' services and have adequate funding to properly perform those services. In establishing that it meets this requirement, an organization requesting recognition shall submit: A copy of the last financial statement of the organization indicating the amount of funds allocated for conducting particular veterans' services (VA may, in cases where it deems necessary, require an audited financial statement); and a statement indicating that use of the organization's funding is not subject to limitations imposed under any Federal grant or law which would prevent it from representing claimants before VA.

An organization requesting recognition must maintain a policy and capability of providing complete claims service to each claimant requesting representation or give written notice of any limitation in its claims service with advice concerning the availability of alternative sources of claims service. In establishing that it meets this requirement, an organization requesting recognition shall submit evidence of its capability to represent claimants before VA regional offices and before the Board of Veterans' Appeals.

If an organization does not intend to represent claimants before the Board of Veterans' Appeals, the organization shall submit evidence of an association or agreement with a recognized service organization for the purpose of representation before the Board of Veterans' Appeals, or the proposed method of informing claimants of the limitations in service that can be provided, with advice concerning the availability of alternative sources of claims service. If an organization does not intend to represent each claimant requesting assistance, the organization shall submit a statement of its policy concerning the selection of claimants and the proposed method of informing claimants of this policy, with advice concerning the availability of alternative sources of claims service.

An organization requesting recognition must take affirmative action, including training and monitoring of accredited representatives, to ensure proper handling of claims. In establishing that it meets this requirement, an organization requesting recognition shall submit: A statement of the skills, training, and other qualifications of current paid or volunteer staff personnel for handling veterans' claims; and a plan for recruiting and training qualified claim representatives, including the number of hours of formal classroom instruction, the subjects to be taught, the period of on-the-job training, a schedule or timetable for training, the projected number of trainees for the first year, and the name (s) and qualifications of the individual (s) primarily responsible for the training.

In addition, the organization requesting recognition shall supply: A statement that neither the organization nor its accredited representatives will charge or accept a fee or gratuity for service to a claimant and that the organization will not represent to the public that VA recognition of the organization is for any purpose other than claimant representation; and the names, titles, and addresses of officers and the official (s) authorized to certify representatives.

• Description of need for information and proposed use of information: The information is used by VA in reviewing accreditation applications to determine whether organizations meet the requirements for V A accreditation under § 14.628.

• Description of likely respondents:

•

Organizations seeking VA accreditation under § 14.628.

• Estimated number of respondents: 5 applicants per year.

• Estimated frequency of responses:

This is a one-time collection.

• Estimated average burden per response: 5 hours.

• Estimated total annual reporting and recordkeeping burden: 25 hours per year.

Regulatory Flexibility Act

The Secretary hereby certifies that this proposed rule would not have a significant economic impact on a substantial number of small entities as they are defined in the Regulatory Flexibility Act, 5 V.S.C. 601-612. It does not require any action on the part of any entity but merely provides a new opportunity for tribal organizations to become recognized by VA for the purpose of assisting VA claimants in the preparation, presentation, and prosecution of claims for VA benefits. Therefore, pursuant to 5 V.S.C. 605(b), this rulemaking is exempt from the initial and final regulatory flexibility analysis requirements of sections 603 and 604.

Executive Order 13175

Executive Order 13175 provides that Federal agencies may not issue a regulation that has tribal implications, that imposes substantial direct compliance costs on tribal governments, and that is not required by statute, unless the Federal government provides the funds necessary to pay the direct compliance costs incurred by the tribal governments or the Federal agency consults with tribal officials early in the process of developing the proposed regulation, develops and publishes in the Federal Register a tribal summary impact statement, and provides to the Director of OMB any written communications submitted to the agency by the tribal officials.

On March 3 and 10, 2016, respectively, VA issued letters to tribal leaders as well as a Federal Register notice, 81 FR 12626, seeking comment on VA's consideration of issuing a proposed rule that would amend part 14 of title 38, Code of Federal Regulations, to expressly provide for the recognition of tribal organizations so that representatives of the organizations may assist Native American claimants in the preparation, presentation, and prosecution of their VA benefit claims. Those interested in providing comment were given 30-days to respond. Based on requests from commenters, VA expanded the comment period an additional 15 days to April 26, 2016. VA received comments from 36 commenters. A few commenters submitted more than one comment. Overall, the comments were supportive of issuing such a proposed rule.

One commenter wrote that, currently, their tribal representatives are being accredited through their State as well as other national organizations and was curious as to the "road blocks" other tribal organizations were facing. This commenter did not provide any suggestions, and therefore, no change to this rulemaking is warranted.

Several commenters noted that currently Native American veterans face many roadblocks to obtaining representation. One commenter noted that geography, economic, and culture barriers prevent Native American veterans from utilizing currently available representation. These comments were offered in support of the proposed rule, and therefore, no change to this rulemaking is warranted.

A few commenters misinterpreted the language provided in the consultation and notice as meaning that VA intended to propose that VA's recognition of a tribal organization would be tied to VA's recognition of the corresponding State organization. One commenter stated that V A should recognize a tribal organization as "equal to" a State organization. VA is not tying VA recognition of a tribal organization to a State and is choosing not to make value judgements as to the importance of the recognition granted to State organizations and Tribal organizations. Recognition of a tribal organization would stand on its own. VA has chosen to use the term similar rather than the term equal in this proposed rule because we are proposing some differences in the requirements for VA recognition of a tribal organization and therequirements for State organizations Specifically, the proposed rule would allow a single tribal government, or multiple tribal governments to join together to establish and fund a tribal organization, but such allowance is not permitted for State governments.

A few commenters misinterpreted the language provided in the consultation and notice as limiting recognition of a tribal veterans' service officer through a State. One commenter asked for clarification on what type of employees would be eligible to become accredited by VA. The commenter stated that employees of a tribal nation as well as a tribal organization should be eligible. We agree, and the proposed rule would allow for both avenues to attain VA accreditation depending on the tribal government's size, relationships with other tribal governments, relationships with States, and the needs of Native American veterans in their area.

After tribal organization becomes recognized by VA, that organization would be able to request to have its own representatives accredited under 38 CFR 14.629. In addition to proposing to recognize tribal organizations and accredit their representatives, VA would provide an additional means by which VA may recognize an employee of a tribal government as a tribal veterans' service officer through a State organization. This accreditation would be akin to acreditation given to county veterans' service officers through State organizations and is only meant to provide an additional path to VA accreditation. We propose that the requirements for a tribal veterans' service officer to become accredited as a representative through a State organization be the same as the requirements for a county veterans service officer. Therefore, VA makes no changes based on these comments.

One commenter asked what happens to the accreditation of a tribal organization if the Director is relinquished. It seems this comment stems from the misinterpretation previously discussed regarding the accreditation of a tribal organization and the corresponding State organization.

The commenter also asked what happens if the State refuses to sponsor the replacement officer. As discussed above, once a tribal organization becomes recognized by VA, that organization would be able to request to have its own representatives accredited under § 14.629. The tribal organization can file with VA to have a replacement officer accredited. Therefore, VA makes no changes based on this comment.

Several commenters also expressed concern over the requirements for recognition in § 14.628(d). Specifically, the commenters expressed concern that many tribal organizations may not be able to satisfy the primary purpose, size, funding, and training requirements, to include providing the required, supporting documentation.

One commenter suggested that VA provide the funding for tribes "to engage in this work." Another commenter suggested including Indian Health Services for funding assistance. A few commenters expressed concern about the requirement that the organization must maintain a policy of either providing complete claims representation or provide "written notice of any limitation in its claims service with advice concerning the availability of alternative sources of claims service." 38 CFR 14.628(d)(1)(iv). One commenter seemed to believe V A was questioning the level of competence of tribal representatives. VA must ensure that VA accredited organizations can provide long-term, competent representation and has found that the § 14.628 (d) requirements are protective of that mission. These requirements apply to all organizations seeking VA recognition. Exempting tribal organizations from meeting the § 14.628(d) requirements would not be consistent with the purpose of VA recognition to ensure that veterans are receiving qualified, competent representation on their VA benefit claims. As previously discussed, VA has provided additional means to achieve VA recognition or accreditation for those tribal governments that may have difficulty establishing a tribal organization capable of meeting the § 14.628(d) requirements, to include the ability for one or more tribal governments to establish and fund a tribal organization and the ability of an employee of a tribal government to become accredited as a tribal veterans' service officer through a recognized State organization. Therefore, VA makes no changes based on these comments.

One commenter suggested that VA grant accreditation to tribes through a Memorandum of Understanding and included their tribe's Memorandum of Understanding with their State. The commenter also questioned the role of VA in the accreditation and monitoring process. The laws governing VA accreditation are set out at 38 U.S.C.5902 and 5904 and 38 CFR 14.626- 14.637. These laws apply to all organizations, agents, and attorneys seeking VA accreditation. Pursuant to § 14.628, the organization requesting VA accreditation must certify to VA that the organization meets the § 14.628 (d) requirements for recognition. Therefore, a Memorandum of Understanding between VA and a tribe is not sufficient for applying for V A accreditation. Furthermore, VA does monitor its accredited organizations, agents, and attorneys and handles disciplinary matters as they arise. Therefore, VA makes no changes based on this comment.

One commenter suggested that VA engage in additional consultation with Tribes that would be "interested in becoming recognized veterans ['1 service organizations, but are unable to meet the requirements." In the proposed rule, VA offers alternative avenues for VA recognition and accreditation for tribal governments that may not be capable of establishing an organization that can meet the VA recognition requirements in the proposed rule on their own. VA further welcomes additional comments as to the suitability of those alternative avenues through comments on this proposed rule. VA declines to make any changes based on this comment.

One commenter also recommended that "VA enter into Memorandums of Understanding with [Federally-recognized tribes and tribal organizations for [veterans' [service officer training and service reimbursement, on individual bases."

Another commenter objected to the fact that there was "no mention of funding to train and maintain such a position." Section 5902, of title 38, United State Code, which is the law that authorizes VA to recognize organizations for the purpose of providing assistance on VA benefit claims, does not provide for the funding of such organizations to train and maintain representatives. Pursuant to § 14.628 (d)(iii)(B), organizations are not precluded from seeking and receiving other sources of State and Federal grant funding so long as the organization's funding is not subject to limitations imposed under any Federal grant or law which would prevent it from representing claimants before VA. Therefore, VA declines to make any changes based on these comments.

One commenter wrote that VA ". . should include [Federally-recognized tribes, not just tribal organizations funded by tribal governments, as an entity from which applications will be considered to be recognized for. . ." VA accreditation. Another commenter suggested adding "[Federally recognized tribes" or "[Federally recognized tribal governments" as part of the definition for tribal organizations. Another commenter suggested adding tribal communities. For the purposes of the regulations pertaining to the representation of VA claimants, VA proposes to define a tribal government to mean "the Federally recognized governing body of any Indian tribe, band, nation, or other organized group or community ... ". VA finds this definition to be inclusive of the comments, and therefore, no change is warranted.

One commenter suggested a legislative amendment to the definition of State in 38 U.S.C. 101 (20) to include "[Federally recognized tribal governments." Amending the statutory language is something that only Congress can accomplish. Since VA is defining the term "tribal government in regulation and providing an avenue for VA recognition of a tribal organization separate from a State organization, VA does not find such a legislative amendment necessary. Therefore, no change is warranted based on this comment.

Several commenters wrote that "[special attention must be paid to what specifically is meant by a '[tribal organization' " and that VA should offer a clear definition of the term. The commenters did not offer any suggestions for such definition. As previously discussed, VA is defining this term for the purposes of this rulemaking. Therefore, VA does not make any changes based on this comment.

Several commenters asked VA to clarify whether tribal governments, including veterans departments within these governments, would be eligible for VA recognition. A Department of Veterans Affairs or a Veterans Affairs office that is established and funded by a tribal government would be included in the definition of tribal organization. Therefore, no change to this rulemaking is warranted based on these comments.

One commenter asked that VA provide recognition for urban Indian organizations. The comment is unclear on whether such an organization would be able to apply for VA recognition as a tribal organization. VA declines to add an additional organization category at this time. In addition to the proposed amendments discussed in this rulemaking, an organization may still utilize other avenues to apply for VA recognition such as requesting VA recognition as a regional or local organization. To be recognized as a regional or local organization, an organization must meet the requirements of § 14.628(c) and (d).

Further, there are several ways that individuals, including tribal members, tribal government employees, and others who work within and serve tribal or Native American communities, may be accredited by VA to represent claimants. An individual may apply for accreditation as a representative through an existing VA-recognized organization under standards set forth in § 14.629(a).Alternatively, an individual may also seek accreditation in an individual capacity as either an agent or an attorney under the standards set forth in § 14.629(b). Therefore, VA declines to make any changes based on this comment.

A couple of commenters submitted statements certifying that their organization would meet the requirements for accreditation for a tribal organization. Applications for accreditation are outside the scope of this rulemaking. Therefore, no change is warranted based on these comments.

One commenter asked whether accredited tribal representatives would be granted access to software programs containing a veteran's claims file information and whether that access would be on tribal grounds. This issue is outside the scope of this rulemaking. Therefore, no change is warranted based on this comment.

One commenter expressed support for VA recognizing tribal organizations in an equal manner as VA recognizes State organizations but suggested that VA authorize a field office close to tribal administration locations and fund one or two veterans service officer positions. The tribal consultation and this proposed rulemaking are limited in scope to recognition for purposes of VA claims representation. The commenter's suggestion of adding a field office is beyond the scope, and therefore, VA declines to make any changes based on this comment. VA also declines to make any changes to the commenter's suggestion of funding job positions for veterans service officers. Part of the § 14.628(d) requirements is that an organization seeking accreditation must commit a significant portion of its assets to veterans' services and have adequate funding to properly perform those services. 38 CFR 14.628(d)(1)(iii).

A few commenters expressed concern that the proposed rulemaking is limiting VA recognition for the preparation, presentation, and prosecution of claims for VA benefits. One commenter seemed to think VA is depriving veterans from other title 38 benefits. The commenters did not specify what other accreditation they are seeking. As previously discussed, 38 CFR part 14 is limited in jurisdiction to recognizing organizations and accrediting individuals to assist in the preparation, presentation, and prosecution of VA benefit claims. Pursuant to section 5902, VA accreditation may not be granted for any other purpose. This rulemaking in no way deprives any veteran of any title 38 benefits. Therefore, no change is warranted based on these comments.

One commenter suggested that office space opportunities should be available to tribal governments and organizations in the same manner as they are available to State organizations. As previously discussed, this proposed rule would, under § 14.635, allow the Secretary to furnish office space and facilities, when available, to both State and tribal organization employees who are also accredited to national organizations for the purpose of assisting claimants in the preparation, presentation, and prosecution of claims for benefits. VA would be furnishing office space to tribal organizations in the same manner as it furnishes such space to State organizations. Therefore, no change is warranted based on this comment.

One commenter noted that VA should allow a tribal government employee to become accredited through an accredited body of their choice. VA in no way is limiting how a particular individual may apply to become an accredited VA representative. As previously discussed, VA is merely providing additional paths to VA accreditation than currently exist. Therefore, VA declines to make any changes to this rulemaking based on this comment.

Several commenters suggested further outreach and collaboration. One commenter suggested that VA form a tribal workgroup to allow representatives from tribal organizations to collaborate on implementing the new program. One commenter provided VA with their tribal consultation policy.

Other commenters suggested that VA engage in additional consultation with experts in Indian law and hold an all- tribes call to gather additional input for this rulemaking. VA appreciates this information. As previously noted, VA extended the comment period for an additional 15 days to ensure that all interested parties had an appropriate time to provide input. Therefore, VA finds that it has complied with the requirements of Executive Order 13175. VA notes that an additional 60-day comment period is provided for this proposed rule and invites any additional comment to this rulemaking to be provided during that time.

One commenter asked for the projected implementation date of this rulemaking. VA will publish a final rule to this proposed rule which will contain the effective date of the rulemaking. Executive Orders 12866 and 13563 Executive Orders 12866 and 13563 direct agencies to assess the costs and benefits of available regulatory alternatives and, when regulation is necessary, to select regulatory approaches that maximize net benefits (including potential economic, environmental, public health and safety effects, and other advantages; distributive impacts; and equity) Executive Order 13563 (Improving Regulation and Regulatory Review) emphasizes the importance of quantifying both costs and benefits, reducing costs, harmonizing rules, and promoting flexibility. Executive Order 12866 (Regulatory Planning and Review) defines a "significant regulatory action" requiring review by OMB, unless OMB waives such review, as "any regulatory action that is likely to result in a rule that may: (1) Have an annual effect on the economy of $100 million or more or adversely affect in a material way the economy, a sector of the economy, productivity, competition, jobs, the environment, public health or safety, or State, local, or tribal governments or communities; (2) Create a serious inconsistency or otherwise interfere with an action taken or planned by another agency; (3) Materially alter the budgetary impact of entitlements, grants, user fees, or loan programs or the rights and obligations or recipients thereof; or (4) Raise novel legal or policy issues arising out of legal mandates, the President's priorities, or the principles set forth in this Executive Order."

The economic, interagency, budgetary, legal, and policy implications of this regulatory action have been examined, and it has been determined not to be a significant regulatory action under Executive Order 12866. VA's impact analysis can be found as a supporting document at http://www.regulations.gov, usually within 48 hours after the rule making document is published. Additionally, a copy of this rulemaking and its impact analysis are available on VA's Web site at http://www.va.gov/orpm/.by following the link for "VA Regulations Published From FY 2004 Through Fiscal Year to Date."

FIRST EVER MEMORIAL FOR VETERANS LOST TO PTSD COMING TO CHANNAHON

By MIKE MALLORY - mmallory@shawmedia.com

CHANNAHON – Channahon State Park, Channahon, Illinois will be home to a one-of-a-kind memorial for military veterans who have lost their battles with post-traumatic stress disorder.

The Forgotten Warrior Memorial Wall will be a tribute to all veterans who have served in the U.S. Armed Forces and have been afflicted with PTSD and sacrificed their lives beyond the limits of active duty. The memorial, expected to open in November, was funded through private donations to Chicago-based nonprofit K9s For Veteran Warriors.

K9s For Veteran Warriors CEO Michael Tellerino said it's proper to have memorials for veterans who lost their lives in battle; however, currently no memorials exist for the countless veterans who have taken their own lives while fighting another war at home – PTSD.

"How can we honor them for paying the ultimate price?" Tellerino said. "They come home with wounds you can't see. People don't understand how serious this is."

One statistic Tellerino cited suggests about 22 veterans commit suicide each day, but that's just based on veterans who have registered for benefits. He said the real number is between 28 and 32 a day.

"That's not acceptable," he said. "We wanted to acknowledge that sons, daughters, brothers and sisters have not died in vain. We hope this will give some healing to their families and raise public awareness."

The memorial, which will cost more than $80,000, will be constructed in an existing circular turnaround area of the park and be comprised largely of granite. Tellerino initially wanted to etch the names of each veteran lost to PTSD into the memorial, but said it would be an exhaustive process to get every name from the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs.

Instead, families will have individual bricks etched with their loved ones' names on a volunteer basis. He said that since announcing the memorial last week, he received a call from a woman in tears.
"She was so excited about doing this," he said. "It's so long overdue for these guys."

The organization chose Channahon because it has easy access from the Chicago metropolitan area and the specific spot in the park is perfect for what the architects of the project have designed.

The nonprofit also wanted the memorial to be relatively close to Marseilles, which is home to the Middle East Conflicts Wall Memorial along the Illinois River.

Illinois State Parks and Recreation and state legislators have already signed off on the project, he said.

"This one-of-a-kind memorial will provide a place for family members, other veterans, and the public to honor those service men and women whose injuries, while perhaps not physically apparent, were no less devastating," Channahon Mayor Missey Moorman Schumacher said in a news release.

K9s For Veteran Warriors provides service dogs to veterans with PTSD, along with medical care and food for the life of the dog.

Tellerino said that although it is not a cure-all, the initiative plays a major role in improving the spirits of veterans.

VETERANS STILL NEED FAR BETTER TREATMENT

by Pat Barone | Updated 27 Jul 2016 at 11:25 AM

Ed Note: Interesting Article

Those who need help must get it promptly, fairly, and accurately

Not all veterans in this country suffer from PTSD (post-traumatic stress disorder). But virtually all veterans need our help in the form of freedom from dangerous stereotyping.

They also need far better services and treatment than they've been receiving — which is partly why Donald Trump pledged on Tuesday to "take care of our veterans like they have never been taken care of before.

Psychologists fear that labels such as PTSD — so routinely and often unfairly applied to any veteran who has a brush with the law — will discourage those in real need from reaching out for help. That, in turn, could deepen the stigma surrounding PTSD and other psychological disorders.

"The prognosis for recovery [from PTSD] is high when people are able to engage in treatment," said one expert.

There is an assumption that the term 'PTSD' is equivalent to 'crazy combat vet,' as well as a misconception that all veterans suffer from PTSD," mental health counselor Duane K. L. France told LifeZette. France is a retired Army veteran with combat experience, and director of veterans services at Family Care Center in Colorado Springs, Colorado.

Ben Rutt, Ph.D., of Silver Springs, Maryland, a psychologist who works with veterans with PTSD, agrees there's a misunderstanding.

"The majority of people with PTSD do not commit acts of violence," he said. "I am not aware of any research showing that people with PTSD are more likely to commit acts of violence, such as what Gavin Long did in Baton Rouge. Additional psychiatric diagnoses are more related to violent behavior than whether someone is diagnosed with PTSD."

The National Center for PTSD of the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs says various studies indicate that 4 to 17 percent of veterans have PTSD. The numbers are higher if a traumatic brain injury (TBI) is involved. Over 260,000 veterans have been diagnosed with TBI.

Comparatively, 7 to 8 percent of the entire population will suffer from PTSD at some point in time. The condition commonly occurs after assault, accidents, and sexual trauma, as well as among those continually exposed to trauma itself, such as police officers, firefighters, and first responders.

Fifty percent of veterans with PTSD do not seek treatment and, more concerning, only half of that 50 percent of people get "minimally adequate" treatment, according to an independent RAND Corporation study.

"Those who are diagnosed with PTSD are often viewed as dangerous and unstable," said Jennifer Wolkin, PhD, a New York City neuropsychologist. She told LifeZette that the media slant toward "dangerous and unstable" is damaging.

"While the incident in Baton Rouge clearly does not help curtail the stigma," she said, "it sheds light on a deeper and more insidious problem our society faces. Post-trauma treatment is often unavailable, denied, or administered poorly."

While veterans may seek treatment, their wait can be long and arduous. Also, they have less choice than private payers about whom to see for treatment, and they may have a hard time finding a therapist or counselor with whom they're comfortable revealing personal experiences.

As part of Trump's new plan for reforming the VA, he is calling for private medical options for vets. Our veterans would be able to receive care from any doctor or medical facility that accepts Medicare. It's a move that would help reduce wait times for those seeking care. The plan would also expand technology and mental health services.

Four types of symptoms must be present to warrant a diagnosis of PTSD: recurrent, unwanted, and distressing memories, dreams, or flashbacks of trauma; negative changes in thoughts and feelings due to the traumatic event; avoidance of the event and anything that reminds someone of the triggering event; and hyperarousal or being on guard when there is no threat of danger, irritability and anger, and difficultly sleeping.

Many people suffer with symptoms just below this threshold of diagnosis. Avoiding feelings about the event and any person or place that might trigger memories is the most common way of coping, but it cannot work long-term if there's going to be true healing.

Psychologist Rutt emphasized that healing occurs when one faces the resulting emotions with professional help. "The prognosis for recovery is high when people are able to engage in treatment. However, this involves no longer avoiding dealing with the trauma, which many people find difficult to do."

People with PTSD have experienced an injury due to a traumatic event — an injury that can be healed in time with treatment,'said Ben Rutt, Ph.D.

Other helpful treatments are Eye Movement Desensitization and Reprocessing, as well as Mindfulness-based Mind Fitness Training. The film "Free the Mind" shows the unique results from meditation, yoga, and mindfulness, which was discovered during research at the Center for Health Minds at the University of Wisconsin-Madison.

A veteran's personal network of friends and family is most important in treatment and recovery, said France.

"Family members, community members, peers, and colleagues who recognize a negative change in a veteran's behavior can help [him or her] seek treatment, but also continue encouragement throughout the course of the treatment," France noted.

With so much misunderstanding about PTSD, it's important to clearly define the condition and demystify it, so that anyone suffering from it can receive help.

It's important we change attitudes toward mental illness in general and PTSD in particular in our society," Rutt said. "People with PTSD are not crazy. They've experienced an injury due to a traumatic event, an injury that can be healed in time with treatment. We don't look down on people with cancer who have chemotherapy appointments. We shouldn't look down on people with PTSD for seeking treatment."

VETERANS SHELL-SHOCKED AT PTSD TREATMENT DENIAL

Unique tool is called a lifesaver, but many of our bravest can't get access to it

by Kathleen Krueger | 20 Jan 2016 at 5:04 AM

Post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) has been a disabling condition for many of our military personnel — and this was true even before it was given a name or label. The condition generally has meant years of cognitive therapy to help those affected learn to process their thoughts and feelings differently, along with medications for coping on a daily basis.

Ricardo Romeras, a Minnesota resident and a veteran of Operation Iraqi Freedom, returned home a changed person in 2006. While war changes everyone and some more than others, anxiety and other symptoms of his PTSD were disrupting his life. In his self-proclaimed stubbornness, he began to "self -medicate."

Seeing how tormented he was, his wife started searching for help. She came across an innovative therapy called Eye Movement Desensitization and Reprocessing (EMDR). This tool, she was told, was being used to treat PTSD with amazing success.

As far back as 1998, a study published in The Journal of Traumatic Stress showed that 77 percent of combat veterans were free of PTSD symptoms after 12 sessions. Not only that, they remained symptom-free at their nine-month follow-up appointments.

But when Romeras and his wife requested access to EMDR through their local Veterans Health Administration, they were told it was not an approved treatment, nor was it even available through their VA. That was in 2008.

They continued to seek care, and it wasn't long before they found an EMDR-certified therapist in private practice in St. Paul, Minnesota. Romeras began treatment.

Jane McCampbell, the licensed marriage and family therapist whom they turned to, had been using EMDR in her practice since she began training with it in 2008. In her eyes, EMDR is so successful she has been using it with 70 percent of her clients, not all of them veterans, she told LifeZette.

"My first use of EMDR therapy with a veteran was an incredibly moving experience," said McCampbell. One statement from her patient made an emotional impact: "I slept through the night for the first time in eight years."

The website Trauma Recovery says EMDR is a noninvasive, eight-phase treatment that identifies and addresses experiences that have overwhelmed the brain's natural resilience or coping capacity.

"Patients are able to reprocess traumatic information until it is no longer psychologically disruptive," according to the site. Sufferers learn to process the memory in a way that leads to a peaceful resolution.

Romeras credits EMDR therapy with giving him tools to manage his PTSD symptoms and move forward with his life. He now uses the rhythmic tools of EMDR therapy to control his symptoms.

"When I start feeling the way I used to feel in the past, I tap on my hand, my heart or my collar bone and it brings me back," he said.

Dr. Harold Kudler, chief mental health consultant for the Veterans Health Administration, has had training in EMDR therapy himself. He said the therapy has been well-documented as an effective evidence-based treatment for PTSD, along with other cognitive processing therapies.

Why it remains widely unavailable as a valuable treatment option for our veterans nearly 18 years after it was first found to be successful is a mystery.

EMDR therapy was added to the VA's Guidelines for Care as an evidence-based option for PTSD treatment in 2010. However, the VA has not yet developed a nationwide training program for this treatment option, as they have their other two evidence-based PTSD treatment options, Cognitive Processing Therapy (launched in 2006) and Prolonged Exposure Therapy (launched in 2007).

Romeras's therapy with McCampbell over a period of three years used a combination of cognitive trauma therapy plus EMDR.

"My wife and I went into debt to pay for my therapy," said Romeras. "At the time, I felt the only other option was killing myself, and I wasn't going to go that route."

Elaine Wynne, a clinical psychologist in Minneapolis who specializes in trauma recovery, has been encouraging the use of EMDR therapy for veterans since she received training in 1995. As a result, her veteran patients, she said, have had improved sleep and a lessening of the startle response associated with PTSD.

"It assists your brain in putting the memory into a stable place," she told LifeZette.

Still, a big challenge this psychologist faces is getting the message out to veterans that the therapy is an effective treatment option for PTSD. The therapy has not been made available through the Twin City VA facilities, so she's been working with several veterans who have benefited from EMDR to inform others about it.

Out of this advocacy has come The Resilience Project, with the mission of educating veterans about the benefits of EMDR and raising funds to pay for treatment through private providers in Minnesota. The funding aims to help veterans avoid the frustration of trying to gain access to the treatment through the VA benefit system.

Under the Veterans Choice Act of 2014, veterans everywhere should be able to seek help from health providers outside of the VA and have those services covered.

"If the VA clinician agrees with the veteran that EMDR therapy would be in the best interest of the veteran, the clinician can make the recommendation for the VA to purchase these services through a community provider," Kudler said.

Yet what sounds like a simple solution is complicated by bureaucratic red tape. Providers still need to be on an approved vendors list to receive reimbursement for services. This, along with a list of other stipulations included in the Veterans Choice program, add hurdles that limit the services available.

So, while the mental health community as a whole debates the effectiveness of EMDR in treating PTSD versus other evidence-based therapies -- veterans such as Ricardo Romeras say it has already been a life changer.

TO KILL AND BE KILLED
THE STORY OF KILO CO 3/9

The following rough draft pages reflect the most passionate and rewarding time of my life my time as Company Commander of Kilo Company, 3rd Battalion, 9th Marines from September 1966 through mid-July 1967. I would like to say that these writings are made from careful notes made during that time. That is not the case. I only have a few pieces such as Gunnery Sergeant Hatfield's field notebook to provide some specific times and events. My letters home to my family gave only give vague references to battles and dates as I was trying not to add to their apprehension.

Most of this is written from/through a forty year old memory, looking over faded pictures, reading a few letters from Marines within Kilo at that time and from conversations at Kilo reunions that began in 2000. What I know is that my recall of events, particularly timing, is at best a best guess. I have a clear picture in my mind of the events that I have written about but know that what I 'recall' and what actually happened may not be even close to the same. The mind 'fills-in-the-blanks' with logical scenes and feelings to complete a whole understandable event out of what may have been experienced as a total jumble of emotions, fears, sights, sounds and smells.

In talking with Marines who were near my side in different battles, I was always stunned to discover that their 'story' - the times, locations, trees, NVA, the sounds and the battle itself looked very little like what I was 'seeing' in my mind. I guess that's

TO Kill and Be Killed

THE "KIDS" OF KILO COMPANY, 3RD BATTALION, 9TH MARINES,VIETNAM, 1966-1967

By Jerry Giles

why in the law enforcement arena, 'eye witness' accounts are always taken with a grain of salt. I invited all the Marines from Kilo that I could contact to provide their stories for me prior to writing this story. Most said they really couldn't remember, several just didn't want to remember and others, written in my story, did write. I did have several provide some input via the phone and all comments are most valued. I hope that as I have attempted to weave our stories together I have valued each and everyone comments, thoughts and feelings.

These writings arc made to honor all the Marines of Kilo I've made no attempt to include other Marine unit's actions other than those in direct support of Kilo during battles. I am not a historian and can/will only write to those events to which I was directly involved.

Ed Murphy's book, 'The Hill Battles" is a well written and documented historical study of the first battle of' Khe Sanh. I used some of his dates and locations as reference points and gathered some key names from his writings. I did not include his specific stories about Kilo Marines from his book. He did those interviews and it's not my place to copy his writing. Joe O'Dell and Art Gennaro both provided me– with stories similar to what they provided to Ed Murphy. I hope to add more personal accounts from anyone that sends one this way. Enjoy the reading and for 'the Kids of-Kilo' - you were and are my heroes.

Semper Fidelis,
Jerry Giles

PROLOGUE

It's April 25, 1967. The call comes over the landline from the battalion operations officer to Kilo Company's command post at Camp Carroll. Giles, get your ass down here, we've got a hot mission for you and your company". Wow, a 'hot mission'. Something new and perhaps exciting. Kilo was the Bald Eagle Company, the rifle company designated as a quick reaction force for the 3rd Marine Division and I knew we were ready.

I'd been Kilo's company commander for seven months since September 1966 and we had spent most of that time running squad sized patrols (13 -18 Marines) or platoon patrols with a platoon of 45 Marine riflemen plus some machine gunners and 3.5 rocket Marines attached. Occasionally we would go out as a full rifle company with an average of four officers and 185 enlisted Marines. Up until this moment in time, company sized operations were more of a training exercise that a tactical necessity as we had been hunting down the elusive Viet Cong who prided themselves on not making a major contact with sizeable Marine forces. It had been classic guerilla warfare with an occasional sniper, a few rounds fired from afar, the ever present booby traps and the small threat from sharpened bamboo stakes.

We had been lucky up till now with few casualties. Back in on November 9, 1966 we suffered our first killed in action (KIA) during my tenure as Company Commander, Private First Class Bill Derksema tripped a booby trap and was killed instantly while acting as point man for his squad while on a platoon sized patrol. PFC Derksema had only been 'in-country' for about a two weeks.

From September through December of 1966 we, as part of the battalion, had operated north, south and east of Danang in the rice paddies and villages called 'injun' country. In January the entire battalion had deployed to Okinawa for re-training. While on Okinawa we trained, added new personnel, filled out the company to full. combat strength of six officers and 205 enlisted Marines. At the same time we were issued the new and highly vaunted M-16 rifle. The M-16 was lighter, had larger ammunition magazines, a more deadly bullet. that tumbled after striking flesh thus creating horrific wounds and, unfortunately, had not been field tested in the dust, mud and rain of Vietnam On the pristine rifle ranges of Okinawa few problems with this new 'miracle' weapon were observed. Sadly, that all was to change upon our redeployment to Vietnam on Valentines Day, 1967.

Back in Vietnam, Kilo was farmed out to another battalion to assist in securing a huge valley complex called Ba Long Valley. Once again it was platoon and occasional company sized patrols. The weather was miserable, rainy, windy and cold. When two platoons went out on patrol I would send my Executive Officer, 1st Lt Geoffrey Gaugish, out with them to give him some command time at a higher level that his previous time as a Platoon Commander. His best friend, 1st Lt. John Woodall, was the platoon commander of the 3rd Platoon and had about four months left on his Vietnam tour. 2nd Lieutenant Jerry Barlow commanded the First Platoon, 2nd Lieutenant Stephen Hepner the 2nd Platoon and 2nd Lieutenant Steven Cobb the Weapons Platoon Commander. Gaugish and Barlow were short tiers and would soon leave Kilo. Hepner and Cobb were both former enlisted Marines who had been selected for and had completed Officers Candidate school. They were the F ----- New Guys (FNG) of the Kilo's officer corps.

After some six weeks down in Ba Long Valley we rejoined our battalion, 3rd Battalion, 9 Marines, up closer to the DMZ at a 'lovely' place called Camp Carroll. Camp Carroll sat in a low valley some 15 kilometers south of the Demilitarized Zone. Almost directly north, some 13 kilometers away, you could see the vague outline of a small hill overlooking the Ben Hai River and North Vietnam, This dot on the landscape was Con Tien - a place that would turn into nothing more than an aiming stake for NVA artillery and rockets in the months and years to come. The heroics of the Marines in that hell-hole are written in pictures and words in Marine Corps history.

At Camp Carroll, large tents lined the well marked 'streets'. Showers were rigged from 55 gal drums suspended on finely engineered 2" X 4"s. Chow was a mixture of C-rations and incredible mess hall styled meals cooked by our Company Gunnery Sergeant, Gunny Hatfield in what was known as "Hatfield's Deli". Life-was good! Contact with the 'enemy' was limited. Being a Marine in a combat zone doesn't get any better than this. That was soon to change.

Gunny Hatfield was the most feared and respected Marine in Kilo Company. He had replaced my original company gunny, Gunny Gross, in December prior to our one month deployment to Okinawa for retraining and issue of the M-16 rifle. When Hatfield reported in to Kilo I was stunned. Gunny Gross was a quiet, well mannered and totally respectful Staff Non-commissioned Officer. Hatfield was the absolute anti-thesis of Gunny Gross.

Hatfield arrived at my command bunker looking like he had been on a month long drinking spree and as if he had just been run over by a M-48 tank and spit out on the road. Weighing all of 150 pounds stuffed into a well wrinkled set of utilities, he looked more like a well worn bag of rags than a Marine Drill Instructor.

The first words out of his mouth were, "The name is Hatfield, John C. Hatfield, Gunnery Sergeant, United States Marine Corps. My friends call me JC, you can call me Gunny". I thought in my mind, 'Now isn't that sweet, this Gunnery Sergeant is giving me permission to call him Gunny'. I nodded politely suppressing a smile as I tried to figure out where the Marine Corps had found this sad excuse for a Company Gunny. Hatfield then continued, "The sorry ass Marine Corps has sent me to this sorry ass country to fight this sorry ass war in your sorry ass company". Wow!!! I have really got my work cut out for me. First will be figuring out how to get this sorry ass Marine reassigned somewhere, anywhere but Kilo.

I decided to go through the motions of a 'Welcome Aboard" so that I could at least tell battalion that I tried. I invited Hatfield into my old French fort command bunker and sat down. He looked around and said: "Whore's the coffee?' Damn, now I get to play nurse maid to a hung - over derelict of a Marine. I broke out my small Coleman stove, heated some water and passed him a cup of coffee. He looked at the coffee, reached over and added another scoop of coffee grounds to his cup, swirled it around and made some comment about officers drinking pussy coffee.

He then asked, "Your not going to take that sorry ass stove to the field are you?" "Of course not", I replied. "I'll use the small heat tabs that come in the o-ration boxes to heat the water". "Too fing slow" he replied as he reached in to his upper utility jacket pocket and pulled out a small square of what looked like a piece of soap. I asked, "What's that? " He smiled, "C-4, the best damn coffee heating material ever invented". (C-4 is the explosive used to-blow bunkers and unexploded ordnance.) With that he pinched off a dime sized piece, set it between us and lighted it with a match.

Whoompps! !! A bright and very intense flame burned for a few moments and went out. Hatfield just looked at me and laughed and said, "Captain, that's the way sorry ass Marines heat water for a sorry ass cup of coffee.

This 'visit' was rapidly going down hill He then broke out his Marlboros and began asking rapid fire and very germane questions about Kilo's personnel, the officers, the Staff NCOs, the training and the enlisted Marines. Hmmmm, I was impressed. I noted that every other phrase was 'sorry ass' and every other word an appropriate and very descriptive, profane adjective. He seemed totally unimpressed with anything or anyone (including officers) that didn't have to do with taking care of the enlisted Marines. This I liked. His expectation of the enlisted Marines was simply that they be Marines 24 hours a day and there would be hell to pay for those that didn't live up to his expectations

His attitude toward the lieutenants was a 'wait and see'. Respect from Hatfield was to be earned, not given just because of some rank insignia on their uniforms. I knew from his intensity that the same 'rule' applied to me.

The 'Welcome Aboard' continued for well over an hour. I discovered that he had been in the Marine Corps for 17 years, had served with the 1st Marine Division in Korea and had fought in the misery, cold and hell of the Chosin Reservoir. Here was a Marine that had lived through and understood the meanings of life and death in combat. I had no idea at that time how incredibly valuable his advise, his mentoring, his friendship, his ass kicking, his strength, his leadership would be for me and the Marines of Kilo Gunnery Sergeant J.C. "Horrible" Hatfield would soon become a legend within the battalion for his commitment to Kilo Company and his absolute disrespect for the 'system'. Hatfield operated under his own very special set of rules. He would lie, cheat, steal, fight for the Marines of Kilo. Kilo had the best chow back in base camps, better utilities, more combat gear, more sandbags to fill and he even 'borrowed' an Army jeep for Kilo's use because he felt it was unfair that Kilo Marines did not to have decent transportation. I 'defended' Hatfield to those officers that felt offended with a simple comment: "Hatfield operates for the Marines of Kilo".

OFF TO KHE SANH

So now it's April 25, 1967 and Kilo has the Bald Eagle mission of being airlifted to Khe Sanh and help out a couple of Marine rifle companies that seemed to be in trouble in the hill surrounding Khe Sanh. Lieutenants Gaugish and Barlow had rotated home so I'm down to three officers and have Staff Sergeant Taylor as the Platoon Commander of the First Platoon. I decided to keep Lieutenant Cobb as Weapons Platoon Commander as I needed someone to provide good direction for our 60mm mortars and I had absolute trust in SSgt Taylor's ability to handle a platoon.

I proceed over to the battalion's command tent for the battalion Operations Officer's briefing which was short and limited on information. He only knew that the 3'" Marine Division has directed that Kilo go to Khe Sanh to reinforce the Marines at Khe Sanh. Due to the urgency of the orders, the operation officer 'guesses' that Kilo could become involved in some heavy combat so it is imperative that we mount out with a full load of ammunition, rations and water. His final words: "Check-in with the Khe Sanh Base Commander upon arrival for further instructions, he know what is going on down there". The helicopters were inbound to pick us up for the short flight to Khe Sanh so it's time to get moving.

The adrenalin is rushing as I trot back to the Kilo area. Finally, real combat. I quickly gather the platoon leaders and Gunny Hatfield and briefed him on our 'mission'. Their eyes light up, a real mission, a real war (perhaps). Kilo is ready!

Hatfield is operating in hyper-mode, ass kicking, no bullshit, just a great SNCO doing his job. The platoon leaders have done a good job of being prepared and Kilo forms up quickly for the short march to the helicopter landing zone. PFC Larry Stevanus wrote: "I had heard 'saddle up' many times in training. Hearing it for the first time in Vietnam made my heart pound so hard I thought it was going to rip a hole right through my fatigues. Grabbing our gear and moving out to the staging area was hectic and soon we were headed out on choppers to help another unit that was being clobbered in a place called Khe Sanh." I pass the simple instructions, "Load your sorry asses up in the helos and we will reform when we get to Khe Sanh. The helicopter, CH-46's, came thundering into the LZ, red dust rises, voices go unheard, heads down as we dash up the tail ramps into the shaking beasts. The ramps begin to close as we lift off in a swirl of dust.

As we rise above the red clay of Camp Carroll I begin to wonder about the days ahead. All my training for the past eight years has led to this moment. Are you really ready? How will I react if we get involved in heavy combat? Will my leadership be worth a damn? What will all this lead to? Damn, I hope I do a good job. My thoughts run amok as I look around the packed helicopter. Young kids, old Staff NCOs, young lieutenants, good NCOs'. I believe we are ready, but LCpl Joe Odell, the old man of his platoon and a squad leader at age 25, recalled: "As the ramp on the Ch-46 Chinook helicopter dropped to take us on board, I had no idea what the next 5 days would hold for us, the Marines of Kilo 3/9. I'm sure the rest of the company felt the same way as we departed Camp Carroll in a cloud of red dust on our way to an unknown destination. I looked out the porthole widow of the noisy, shaky Chinook and watched the green expanse of Vietnam stream by. "How many NVA were concealed in the hills and jungles below, he wondered". (The five days would turn into four weeks and Joe O 'Dell would be on the hospital ship Repose within a few days.)

HELLO TO KHE SANH

Landing in an LZ from a helicopter is a lesson in disorientation. No matter how you plan it, it's guaranteed that you will have no idea where you are, what direction you are facing or what unit, troops, Marine land next to you in the swirling dust and incredible noise. Luckily the LZ at Khe Sanh is a cold LZ. No incoming rockets or mortars, no rifle or machine guns are sweeping the landing zone and the helicopters. The moment the rear ramps begins to open Marines are lined up ready to dash out of the hulking beast.

We grunts appreciate the ride but have the greatest fear that our friendly helicopter will fall from the sky. Not a pretty picture so haste is the action once our ride to Khe Sanh is over.

The first lift of Kilo is now on the ground at Khe Sanh. I've got my company headquarters group of radio operators, Gunny Hatfield, my Arty Forward Observer Team, Forward Air Control team, supply NCO and senior Corpsman. The 3rd Platoon with Lt Woodall, the 1st Platoon with Staff Sergeant Taylor is reforming. The 2nd Platoon with Lieutenant Hepner and the Weapons Platoon with Lieutenant Cobb will soon arrive on the second flight of 46's. A young lieutenant from the Khe Sanh base meets us and point to an area east of the runway and tells us that is where Kilo will dig in for the night. I tell Gunny Hatfield to get the gaggle organized and set up in a night defensive position. (Due to the shortage of officers, Hatfield by this time is my Company Gunny and acting Company Executive Officer. (Nice to have a Korean War vet around to keep things moving.)

The Khe Sanh base seems rather extensive, neat and tidy, personnel tents with five layers of sandbags around the edges for protection from incoming fire, nice airstrip, ammunition bunkers, arty positions, lots of barbed wire, fighting positions and all totally exposed to the surrounding hills. Hmmm, this could become interesting. In the late afternoon sun it seems to be a clearly marked red clay aiming stake for NVA rockets and mortars .. I recall thinking and wondering if this place now called Khe Sanh was once called Dien Bien Phu by the French. Oh well, not to worry. After all, we had all the arty, air and naval gunfire at our disposal so the North Vietnamese certainly wouldn't put up to fierce of a battle. Probably just hit and run, again and again.

The Khe Sanh Base Commander, LtCol. Reeder had passed the word for me to come to his command bunker for a welcome to Khe Sanh briefing. LCpl Bob (Stew) Stewart, my 19 year old arty FO, and I walk the 300 meters over to his bunker. We were greeted outside by LtCol Reeder who invited me inside. Stew shrugged his shoulders at the lack of an invite and said he would go over to Fox. Battery, 2nd Battalion, 12th' Marines (Fox, 2/2) under the command of Captain Glen Golden) and scrounged some new utilities and get the latest scoop from his parent artillery group. LtCol Reeder seemed rather calm about the whole affair of the reinforcements for Khe Sanh. He mentioned some increase in North Vietnamese activity, pointed out on a map where he believed elements of Bravo Company, 1st Battalion 9th Marines were located with substantial casualties.

He also mentioned that Kilo Company, 3rd Battalion 3rd Marines had sustained rather heavy casualties in their attempt to gain control of Hill 861 to rescue a recon team and had suffered too many casualties to evacuate their wounded. LtCol Redder wasn't too sure of what role we of Kilo would play in the days ahead He was emphatic that his role was base commander, not the tactical commander.

We were assigned by the 3rd Marine Division to operate with the 3rd Battalion, 3rd Marines commanded by LtCol Wilder. LtCol Reeder, as base commander, had no command or control over our movements and employments. He said we were to spend the night at the base and that tomorrow a guide from the 3rd Battalion would guide us up to LtCol Wilder's position near Hill 861. He then added that he was a bit surprised at the North Vietnamese's tenacity and attacks as he knew that the NVA were poorly trained, poorly equipped, poorly fed, poorly led and suffered from low morale. With a smile, he ended the 'briefing' and said. "Besides, one Marine is worth 10 NVA any day of the week and the NVA will probably all be gone by the time you get there, all on their way back to the safety of North Vietnam".

I walked back to Kilo's position with a mixture of thoughts. Two Marine rifle companies plus a recon team had suffered extensive casualties from a supposedly poorly trained, poorly equipped, and poorly led and fed NVA force that is suffering from low morale? A military force that never sticks around to fight? Yet they did. Then again, the base commander of Khe Sanh should know what was going on in his area of operations.

(The failure: The historical writings by Ed Murphy in "The Hill Fights" and Chaplain Ray Stubbe's numerous and detailed books/articles clearly show that LtCol Reeder had been briefed/ advised by both ground and aerial reconnaissance units that large NVA forces had moved into the hills surrounding Khe Sanh. Small recon teams had encountered well trained and well equipped NVA units on numerous occasions. Recon units reported the NV A had built bunkers on Hills 861 and 881S. His response to such briefings was "Bullshit". His briefing to LtCol Wilder, CO of the 3rd Battalion 3rd Marines discounted the presence of large NVA units LtCol Wilder, being a former commander of a reconnaissance battalion likely placed more credence in the recon reports than those of LtCol Reeder.)

When I returned to the near darkness of the Kilo position I found that the platoon leaders and Gunny Hatfield had done all they could do to establish a defendable and relatively safe night defensive position near the west end of the runway. Based on the information from LtCol Reeder, I did not expect a ground attack and felt that with such a large combat base to shoot at as a target, it was unlikely that Kilo would be in any danger.

I called the lieutenants and the Gunny into a mall dimly lighted circle and briefed them on what I knew-which was not too much. LtCol Reeder had given me several sets of Khe Sanh areas maps which I passed out to the lieutenants, arty and forward air control Marines. We discussed our planned movements for early tomorrow and reinforced the requirement for plenty of water as we expected a hot and long day. The obvious question came up. "Are we going to see combat tomorrow?" My response was simply, "I have no idea. Right now all I know is that we are headed to Hill 861 and may be assisting in the medical evacuations of two rifle companies. Prepare your Marines for the possibility of seeing and helping with casualties. That's all I really know at this moment".

The lieutenants disappeared in the darkness. Gunny Hatfield pulled out a piece of C-4 and said, "Give me your sorry ass cup and I will make you a sorry ass cup of coffee". A small burst of flame later, boiling water made instant coffee and with lighted Marlboros we settle in for the night. "Horrible" Hatfield and I sat quietly with but a few words about what tomorrow might bring. He rarely talked about Korea and I didn't push him to do so. I had a strong feeling that there were deep and dark memories that drove him to push the Kilo Marines so hard. Yet, without saying so, it seemed that he cared. Cared that they lived, cared that they had the best he could scrounge and he demanded that should they die, they die like Marines. He didn't believe in heroics. Just being a Marine. Soon after Hatfield had arrived in Kilo he 'suggested' that all officers and SNCOs carry M-

16 rifles rather than the issued 45 caliber pistol strapped to their waist. As he said: "No reason to look special in the eyes of a NVA sniper and if the shit hits the fan, everyone is a rifleman."

All is quiet now. Hopefully the listening posts are alert. The stars are bright. I've got three young officers with me, 161 enlisted Marines and eight Navy Corpsmen. A grand total of 173 Marines of Kilo will arise tomorrow to perhaps face their greatest test. Hmmm, I wonder how we will do. It's 2315 hours and suddenly I hear the hissing whistling sound of the first round just a moment before it impact far to our left. A bright burst of light, a curumping explosion followed by another whistling sound. Many are yelling "Incoming!!!!" More rounds are landing, all to our far left. Hatfield yells, "Recoilless rifles!!!" I think, "How in the hell does he know? Oh yes, his Korea experience". A new sound, more faint in their arrival and landing in a walking pattern as NV A mortars pace back and forth across the runway.

I hear Hatfield counting the explosions. He's up to 29 and going strong. The rounds still search the other end of the runway as Hatfield reached 40. As suddenly as it started, it stops. Glenn Golden and his artillery battery are already returning fire. After about 40 friendly rounds out the tubes, all is silent again. Well, well, Kilo was just welcomed to Khe Sanh. No casualties, so far, so good.

Around 0700 in the morning the young Marine who will be our guide to LtCol Wilde!' s position shows up. He looks haggard and very tired, perhaps even a bit of fear in his eyes. I ask him what is going on up around Hill 861 and he just shakes his head and replies with an "I don't really know, Sir. I just know Colonel Wilder was really pissed about all the confusion of yesterday and win be glad to have you up on the hill".

"Well Marine, that is interesting. Do you know what we will be doing", I asked. Same head shaking, same look, same response. "I don't know, Sir." It was almost as if he does know more but is unwilling or had been told to say nothing. Hmmm, this is not starting out as a wonderful hike in the woods to help out a couple of Marine rifle companies. Seems a bit more serious.

Hill 861

At 0730 we move out towards Hill 861. The day was to be very hot and humid. Lieutenant Woodall and the Third Platoon, with guide in tow are leading the way. 1, with the Kilo command group are following with the SSgt Taylor and the First Platoon, then elements of Lieutenant Cobb's Weapons Platoon who have not been attached to the platoons (mortars and rockets) followed by Lieutenant Hepner and the Second platoon It's a long snake like procession out through the concertina wire of the combat base, across the deep red dust of the cleared fields of fire and then the slow rise into the hill surrounding Khe Sanh. The road becomes not much more than a trail after a thousand meters or so. The sun climbs, damn, it is getting very hot. Low lying ridge lines flank each side of our trail, green markers with the normal and occasional bomb or artillery crater. Just a slight reminder of what could be. After some 3000 meters we pass through an area of rice paddies, long ago abandoned but still with a fairly good trail leading the way to the mountains surrounding Khe Sanh. Obviously many patrols have gone up and down these trails. Both the good guys and the bad guys?

We stop every 45 minutes or so for a break. Damn, it is hot!!! No reason to create heat casualties. The heavy loads of ammo, the helmets and the ever present flapping and rustling flak jackets add to the heat. As we begin to climb the ridges toward Hill 861 we can hear the arty round passing through the few low hanging clouds, headed to Hill 861. Low rumbles in the distant, an occasional pair of jets swoop in low and disappear over the next ridgeline followed by a deep rumble and you could almost feel the air move as the sound past by your ears. LCpl Stevanus remembers, "There was much stopping and starting on the trail. Stopping a column of grunts is a study in disorganization to say the very least. Still we were quick to kneel down and face in opposite directions, be alert and be ready to move out when the column moved again".

As we moved closer I felt, this is more like it, real combat sounds. This is why I took the Marine Corps option to become 'an Officer of Marines" in college. The adrenalin is flowing and Kilo is moving. More hours pass as we move from the flatlands at 375 meters in height near Khe Sanh towards the saddle in the ridgeline some 800 meters short oft he crest of Hill 861. About 1300 and after a steep climb, the lead elements of Kilo link up with LtCol Wilder and his command group. The artillery is raining down on the backside of Hill 861. Marine jets are sweeping by. Wow, this is just like a John Wayne movie. As I walk to the crest of the ridgeline that leads to the top of Hill 861, I see a rather stocky Marine on the radio surrounded by other radio operator. Must be LtCol Wilder. The hill shakes from the concussion of the bombs. The jets leave and the arty start again. What wonderful coordination of fire support. I'm impressed. In my mind the Marine Corps Hymn is playing, I 'see' flags-a -waving. This is great!!!

As Gunny Hatfield and I are standing there, I notice two Marines running down the trail from the crest of Hill 861, dragging what looks like a bag of potatoes behind them. I'm curious, why would they be dragging a bag down the hill? They continue towards the Gunny and me and we step out of their way as they stop right in front of us. As they stop I see their faces-one is gaunt, hollow eyes, no expression other than gasping for breath. The other Marine is bending over, hands on his knees, dry heaving his guts out.

He looks up at the sky, says something I don't hear and he goes back to dry heaving again and again. I look down at the 'bag' the two Marines had pulled down the trail and so neatly deposited at my feet. The 'bag' was not a bag, it was a dead Marine. I am stunned. look into the dead Marines face; see his snow white skin, bright red freckles and his curly red hair neatly cut Marine Corps style. He looks as if he is asleep. A bit of blood stains his utility jacket. Suddenly I realize that the music is no longer playing in my mind, I'm not seeing pictures of flags waving and people cheering, all is silent and my only focus is on the young, dead Marine at my feet.

This is my first face-to-face look into the face of death. So this is what combat is all about. My mind spins, the joy is gone. I think, 'Here is this kid A moment ago, an hour ago, he was alive, being the best Marine he knew how to be. Now he's gone. Bullshit, gone is 'nice', face it - he is fing dead. Somewhere back in the States a Mom, a Dad, a brother or sister may be thinking about him right now. They think he is alive, they will pray for him tonight and then tomorrow, the next day or so, they will know what I know - he is dead I look up at the two Marines that dragged this Marine down the hill. The dry heaving has stopped. Two faceless Marines holding on to each other. Slowly they turn, face the trail back up the hill and with a huge sigh disappear through the tall elephant grass slowly back to the top of Hill 861.

They're gone as I again turn my attention to the dead Marine. How long I stood there staring down at this Marine I don't know. What I do know is that suddenly someone popped me hard on the shoulder, bringing me back to reality. I turned to my right and there is Gunny Hatfield standing rather close, eye slightly squinting with a look of intensity I had rarely seen. Very slowly and calmly he said "Captain, that Marine is dead. Our job is to take care of the living". I nodded my head in agreement, not saying a word. With that Hatfield turned and walked toward LtCol Wilders command group.

(This was the first of many Hatfield lessons for survival.in combat He became our combat tutor. Hatfield a gem, a gift to Kilo and me. I thought about thanking him but knew he would only respond with a typical Hatfield rebuff such as, "1 didn't say that tom save your sorry ass, I said it to save the Kilo Marine's sorry asses."I ever again 'saw' another dead Marine's face. To this day I recall only that young Marine's face despite the many casualties Kilo would endure over the next four months. Many years later I discovered that Hatfield's suggestion was the only way to maintain sanity in an incredible vulgar combat environment.)

I joined Hatfield at LtCol Wilder's hillside command post. He briefly explained the 'problem'. Bravo Company, 1st Battalion 9th Marines had been on extended combat patrols around Hill 861 when they became engaged with a large North Vietnamese Force. Bravo had sustained relatively heavy casualties and needed our assistance in evacuating their wounded and dead. Bravo, led by Captain Michael Sayers, was no longer in direct contact with the NVA so our mission was expected to be primarily one of assisting Bravo in their move to a safe medevac site.

Bravo was located in two separated areas so I sent one platoon to link up with Bravo's lonely platoon and I went with the other two platoons to link up with the main element of Bravo Company. The sun was hot and penetrating but huge rain clouds forewarned of a very wet afternoon. We move slowly but with a great sense that our mission would save some jives. No one talked, silence, each Marine in his own thoughts. I wondered how my Marines would respond, react, standup to the sights of many Marine dead and wounded. This was going to be a new experience for Kilo-for all of us: officers, SNCOs, NCOs and the enlisted Marines.

LCpl Stevanus realized this would be our first encounter with dead and wounded Marines. He saw almost a look of panic and fear all rolled into one. He could tell by the silence and the look on the Marine's faces in his squad. I wondered how a company commander would motivate Marines after they have seen that combat in an ugly, unforgiving and a final affair. No where in my officer's training had that subject been taught. My only thought was to lead by example, get focused on the job at hand, don't allow myself to be emotionally involved, demand excellence, be a Marine. Much easier said than done.

By early afternoon we began to see the aftermath of Bravo's struggles. A helmet here, a discarded pack there, bandages strewn across the trails and empty M-16 cartridges indicating contact with the NVA. I had the feeling that NVA eyes were watching, waiting for the right moment to add Kilo to their victory belt. But, all remained silent.

About 1400 the lead elements of Lt. Woodall's platoon linked up with the main element of Bravo 1/9. Lt. Woodall passed the word back to me that "This is not a pretty sight, Captain. Lots of dead, lots of wounded, they really need our help". As my command group moved forward we noticed the first of many dead Marines along the trail - some in grotesque positions, frozen in time by rigor mortis, others near peaceful-like, arms folded across their chests - evidently attended by a corpsman or Marine buddy in their last moments on this earth. Perhaps they were attempting to create some dignity for this Marine on a hill just called 861 in Vietnam. Damn, it's brutal and quick!

Joe O'Dell recalled, "As we arrived at their position I will never, so long as I live, forget the sight and smell of those dead Marines. I recall some of them had cleaning rod rammed down the muzzles of their M-16s in an effort to free the jammed round in the chamber". So much for the vaunted M-16.

The silence was deafening. I expected the wounded Marines would be crying out in pain, asking for mom and dad as I had seen in the movies. None of that was happening, just a few moans or a short outcries as we moved the wounded onto ponchos for their trip to safety. Morphine works. Being a Marine works even better. Our Kilo corpsmen joined in the care of the wounded, adding a bandage, offering some hope, providing another shot of morphine.

I looked around for some hint of NVA casualties. None! Not a pack, no weapons, not a body, no trace of what had caused the carnage among the Bravo Marines. How in the hell had they done so much damage? "Poorly led, poorly trained"? Not from what I was seeing.

My senior corpsman, Doc Hill, whose nickname was 'Spanky', caught Gunny Hatfield's eye. Spanky was leaning over, studying three small purple dots on a dead Marines chest. He was in awe that the purple dots were the only indication of where the NVA's bullets had entered the dead Marines body. As he rolled the Marine over to study the exit wounds Hatfield barked out, "God damn it Spanky, that Marine has done his job, it's time for you to get your sorry ass back to work and do your job - take care of the living". Without a moments hesitation Doc Spanky hustled off to care for the wounded of Bravo 1/9. No one, absolutely no one questioned Hatfield's 'advice'.

Captain Sayers and his NCOs bad done a good job of preparing for the trek down the hill to LtCol Wilder's position. He was absolutely insistent that we carefully search the area before we moved out to insure that all the living and dead were 'going home'. The Marines of Bravo 1/9 were without expression. Not defeated, just stoic with eyes that did not see, eyes that did not cry, eyes that had seen too much. There was a sense of 'we've been through hell, don't ask any questions, we don't want your sympathy, we just want off this hill'. We scrounged around the area and policed up all the weapons - no need to leave an M-16 for the NVA. However, they likely would have thrown the M-16 away as their AK-47 was much more reliable than our easily jammed 'Mattel Toy' rifles.

The rains began, first a few heavy drops and then the downpour. Each non- walking wounded and dead Marine was carried by four Marines, one each corner of a poncho or carrying a makeshift stretcher. The trail down, which had been a struggle for our Kilo Marines in a single column climbing up in dry weather, now became a nightmare of stumbles, near silent curses, slips in the mud, razor sharp elephant grass cutting into bare arms all compounded by the absolute fatigue of the Bravo Marines would slip and fall; the wounded would bounce to the ground, crying out in pain. The dead would slip off a poncho and slid forward like a log with limbs extended knocking other Marines to the ground. Other bodies slipped away into the gullies only to be retrieve and the procession would continue. It was move, stop, recover, wait, care, dry heave from exhaustion, pray for a drink of water and move on.

Now I understood the look on the faces of the first two Marines I had seen hours earlier. You could tell which Marine was from Bravo 1/9 and Kilo 3/9 by noticing the eyes. Bravo Marine's eyes told the story of seeing too much, seeing the unbelievable, seeing their buddies die before their eyes, some times in their arms. The faces were near expressionless, mouths partially open as they went about the sad task of moving down the hill. In some ways they were more resolute than the Kilo 3/9 Marines - no side glances, no acknowledgement of other Marines, just whatever was necessary to get off that damn hill.

About 1730 our lead elements made contact with Wilder's CP The long trek was over, fresh water flowed, more corpsmen tended the wounded and the helicopters were inbound. The evacuation was a success. But the price Bravo had paid for their three day engagement with a 'poorly trained, poorly equipped, poorly led and fed NVA force suffering from low morale' had been heavy - 19 killed, 4 missing and 42 wounded to be evacuated. It was time for Bravo 1/9 to move back to Khe Sanh and then to Dong Ha to refit, gather new personnel to fill their ranks and be prepared for new battles with the NVA.

Hatfield broke out his C-4 and created two much needed sorry ass cups of coffee. It had been a long ass day and yet the Marines of Kilo seemed to have held up well. one had broken down emotionally, no heat casualties, no casualties from enemy fire and even the C-Rations seemed palatable. Several times as he sipped on his coffee and took long drags on his Marlboro, Hatfield quietly said, 'They did good Captain, damn good".

I was briefing the platoon leaders on our possible security role for LtCol Wilder's CP group when the word came down to report to LtCol Wilder. Damn, I was just getting comfortable. I could tell by the look on Wilder's face that his briefing for me was not going to be filled with pleasantries. With hardly any acknowledgement of our afternoon role with Bravo 1/9, Wilder launched into his concerns for Kilo 3/3. Kilo had attempted on several occasion over the past three days to secures the crest of Hill 861 in hopes of securing the hill and rescuing a recon team that had been trapped there for days. Wilder had expected that after Kilo's initial contact and with the heavy air and artillery bombardments, the NVA would have long ago disengaged from the fight for Hill 861. They hadn't. With each attempt to send in helicopters for re-supply and medical evacuations, the NVA pounded the hill with mortars and small arms fire. Even now, in the late afternoon light, Marine jets screamed overhead, and "Puff the Magic Dragon" spewed its' Gatling Gun stream of machine gun rounds into NVA positions. Once the air power stopped, the arty began once again. Silence for a moment of time, helicopters move in, NVA mortars start again - and so it goes. Gutsy little bastards those NVA!

Wilder's mission for Kilo was simple, under the cover of darkness Kilo will move to Kilo 3/3s position on or near the crest of 861 and assist in recovering the dead and wounded and return to Wilder's CP prior to daylight. One platoon with major element of the weapons platoon would remain with Wilder's CP group as security. All other Kilo Marines were to prepare for a long, long night.

Joe O'Dell, a Fire Team Leader seemed to be aware of many details that that I totally missed. Perhaps it was his several years in the construction trade as a stone mason that tuned him into the details of hills, construction, things out of the ordinary. As we moved out to link up with Bravo 1/9 in the late afternoon's light he had noted that 'someone' had altered the 6 foot high elephant grass. He would later write: "One thing that I saw on the face of Hill 861 has still, to this day, caused me to wonder what it was Earlier in the afternoon, I was on the left end of the line of assault and a few feet to my right was this cleared path, maybe 12 feet wide. The elephant grass was all lying down and the tops of it were all pointing to the top of the hill. This, and I'll call it a path, went all the way to the crest of the hill. The only way I can explain how this path and elephant grass looked was as if someone had taken a 12 foot log and attached a chain/rope to each end and pulled it to the top of the hill. The elephant grass lay perfectly side by side neatly pointing up the hill. Was it the NVA's attempt to create fields of fire?" No one else seemed to notice and for Kilo it was fortunate that the NVA didn't have the opportunity to use it in defense of Hill 861. Perhaps Kilo 3/3s efforts had precluded long range, sweeping automatic weapons fire down that slope.

I designated Lt Hepner's 2nd Platoon as Wilder's CP security. Steve Hepner was a bit round and rotund and we had nicknamed him "Porky". His weight and size never seemed to slow him down and unknown to me he had vowed to 'win some medals' during as a platoon leader. He loved to laugh at himself and seemed destined to become a good officer.

I then directed Hatfield to organize the relief column with every able bodied Marine loaded with extra water and ammunition. We hoped for no contact with the NVA. The planned movement would start about 1830 with a plan of making contact at nightfall to provide the cover we needed to reach Kilo 3/3. Absolute silence was the 'word', no smoking, secure anything that would clank and move slowly.

As had become my mode, I directed that lst Lt. Woodall's 3rd Platoon lead the wav to the Kilo 3/3. John was my most experienced platoon leader and, while quiet and .unassuming, was well respected by his Marines. His nine months as a platoon leader had given him the experience to handle most any challenge. Along with the headquarters group of radio operators, senior corpsman, arty FO team and elements of the weapons platoon led by Steve Cobb, we followed in their track. Lt. Cobb was the quiet one of my three lieutenants. So far he had performed very well. Reliable SSgt. Taylor and the 1st platoon would bring up the rear

At dusk we moved out in a long silent column. Clouds formed and it looked like a wet night was in store for the Marines on Hill 861. The plan was a two hour trip to Kilo 3/3s position. Kilo 3/3 would send out a squad sized team after dark down the hill to link up with our lead elements. All seemed well planned. The trail to the top was fairly well defined and Woodall kept the pace that all could follow. As darkness settled in, the rains began. First a light mist, then a downpour. The firm footing of the first hour became a slippery quagmire of mud mixed with the tall elephant grass. Marines slipped, silently cursed and moved on. The hill became steeper. Still Kilo moved onward and upward towards Kilo 3/3.

About 2200 hours Lt. Woodall quietly radioed that he had linked up with Lt. Carter's squad sized element from Kilo. Success - at least so far. In the near pitch black night we moved into Kilo 3/3s perimeter. It was very difficult to see who were the-wounded, the dead and the ~e bodied. Captain Spivey had done all he could to prepare for the trip down the hill. The wounded and dead were laid out on poncho, more ponchos added by Kilo Marines. Kilo's corpsman moved among the casualties checking for life, providing morphine, sometimes just an encouraging word. The stench of death permeated the entire hill. Some of Kilo 3/3s Marines had died days earlier and in the heat of the days, bodies were bloated and frozen in the obscene position of their moment of death. I knew it was going to be a long, long journey back down the hill.

Suddenly out of the darkness came this hulking Marine - probably a SNCO from Kilo 3/3. He walked up to me and with his face but inches from mine and almost quietly said, "You dumb son-of-a bitch! Are you trying to get us all killed?" Without a pause he continued, "Look at your dumb fing watch, ass hole. It's glowing like a fing aiming stake for the NVA". I looked down and sure enough, my precious SCUBA diving watch glowed brightly in the darkness of Hill 861. Without a word I reached down and rotated the face of the watch 180 degrees to face inward, looked back at the Marine and said, "Thank you". With that he disappeared in the darkness, never knowing that I was the Company Commander of Kilo. Obviously Gunny Hatfield's advice that all Marines of Kilo carry M-16s, wear no rank insignias and look like every PFC in the company was working. To that Marine I was nothing special, just a dumb shit trying to get his Marines killed. Good lesson for me. Thanks Gunny.

Captain Spivey and I set the plan in motion for the evacuation. The more details we looked at, the more impossible the task seemed to become. The rain was now heavy, the darkness total. We called Wilder and suggested an early morning evacuation. That conversation ended quickly with a Bullshit, get everyone off that hill, NOW!"

The plan was for Lt, Woodall to lead the column. Lt. Cobb would 'work' the middle and Captain Sayers float from front to rear holding things together. I would bring up the rear with SSgt Taylor, All radios were on the same frequency. Control and silence were the keys. Bodies and the wounded were slowly laid out in a line so that as the column began the downward trek, 3 - 4 Marines could pick up their precious loads.

LCpl Art Gennaro, an 18 year old rifleman of Kilo 3/9 wrote home just 12 days after the battles on 861 and 881S. He writes about our night rescue mission: "When we reached them (K/3/3) they were in bad shape. There were about 10 dead and 15 wounded. They were up there for three days and had little food or water. We made stretcher and got the wounded and dead on them and started down the mountain. It was so dark we had to almost touch each other to keep together. The fog rolled in and it started to rain, luckily. I say luckily because just as we left, some 10 minutes later, the NVA mortared the hilltop. Movement was slow. The guys in front of me had to make trail. The NVA didn't know where we were but mortared all around us. We finally stopped walking at 0500. We had moved all night, no sleep, wet and cold.

And just where were the NVA? What were their plans? They seemed to be in control throughout the day but never made that final assault to eliminate Kilo 3/3. They knew Bravo's position, mortared it each time a helo arrived, occasionally sprayed the area with small arms fire, yet no final assault. Perhaps they were planning a quick, intense early morning assault before air and arty support was activated. As with Bravo 1/9, Kilo's small perimeter only showed the damage suffered by the Marines. No NVA dead, gear, no weapons. Damn!!!

About 45 minutes after the lead platoon started their move down the hill the final body was hoisted by four Marines and they disappeared down the narrow trail. Following them was a lonely Marine and I asked him what he was doing alone and he replied, "I'm tail-end Charlie, Sir. My job is rear security". I smiled inwardly and said, "Well Marine your not alone, for whatever it's worth, you've got me and my two radio operators."

As if on cue the skies opened up with a downpour and then in moved the fog. 'Sight' was more like touch, feel and listen for the grunts of the Marine next to you. I again marveled at the silence of the wounded. How did they do 'it'? Incredible. The column moved ever so slowly, stopping often as bodies were lost down a gulley, only to be slowly retrieved. Marines slipped, fell, were cut by the razor sharp elephant grass - but they oved on. The hour turned into excruciating long hours and yet the column moved on. Near daylight Lt Woodall radioed that he had finally linked up with Wilder's CP group. A margin of relief, we had made it. There was no elated welcome, only a somber reprieve from the night from Hell.

The dead were laid out in rows. Corpsman checked each one to insure no living Marines were misplaced. The badly wounded were staged so that the most seriously wounded could be the first out on the incoming medevac helos. The walking wounded and the dead would be the last. Corpsman moved among the wounded, adjusting bandages, offering encouragement, sometimes simply holding an out-stretched hand.

The helos arrived at first light, touching down for a moment in time. Able bodied Marines hustled the wounded aboard. Ramps up and off they flew to Khe Sanh for initial medical evaluation and then (many of them) on to the hospital ship USS Repose. The walking wounded were next and the dead were the last to be added to the cargos of pain.

As quickly as it had begun, silence now enveloped the small knoll as the last helicopter disappeared into the overcast morning. Few Marines spoke, all likely buried in their thoughts of the past three days or the journey down the ridgeline. I wondered how the last 24 hours was affecting the Marines of Kilo. Tills had been an incredibly vulgar introduction to the reality of war. Few shots fired, only an occasional enemy seen in the distance and yet over 100 dead and wounded Marines. Would they be next?

Now a pair of voices broke the stillness. Gunny Hatfield was on his feet, challenging the Kilo Marines to be Marines in his own special way. "You sorry ass Marines, get your sorry ass moving. Get those weapons cleaned, square your ass away, you've got to do and that is being a sorry ass Marine." A SNCO from Kilo 3/3 was doing the same. No slack, be a Marine. Their attitudes began to shift and I could feel a sense of pride in what they had accomplished beginning to take hold. I marveled at the Gunny's skills

LtCol Wilder passed the word that we would be moving back to Khe Sanh to regroup, add some supplies and get some much needed rest. Captain Spivey, though offered the opportunity to be trucked to the combat based, refused and proudly led the remaining Marines of Kilo 3/3 down the narrow trail to Khe Sanh and a C-130 flight back to Dong Ha. Some of the Kilo 3/3 Marines were less than impressed.

ON TO HILL 881S

On 27 April two replacement rifle companies joined LtCol Wilder's depleted battalion. The first was Mike 3/9 commanded by Captain Bob Swigart. Bob, being from my same parent battalion, was well known to me, He was supremely self -confident in words but indecisive in action. Likable among the officer of the 3rd Battalion, rumors floated freely that the Marines of Mike Company were less than impressed. His 'leadership' style was to bark out orders, dismiss junior officer and SNCO's suggestions and information and demean the enlisted Marines. This was compounded by his inability to correctly read a map while on company sized patrol thus moving to the wrong objective or becoming hopelessly lost. Added to this he was in poor physical shape and the first to call for a halt as he could not keep up with his better conditioned Marines. On occasions he even ask members of his command group to carry his pack - supposedly to provide himself with more freedom to maneuver. I doubted that LtCol Wilder was aware of Swigart's shortfall and likely trusted that he would perform, as a competent officer of Marines.

The second rifle company was the return of Mike 3/3 to Wilder's control. Mike 3/3 was a combat hardened and experienced rifle company. Unfortunately their company commander, Captain Raymond Bennett, was not. Fifteen days earlier Captain Bennett was in command of a Marine Corps detachment aboard an aircraft carrier off the North Vietnamese coast and had volunteered to get some combat time with any rifle company in need of a 'hard charging' Marine captain. With Wilder's approval he was assigned to Mike 3/3 to temporarily replace their company commander who was going on a short, well earned R & R vacation from Vietnam. Some Mike Marines were unimpressed with Bennett's overly eager attitude to engage the NVA in close and intense combat. They knew what combat was like, Bennett could only imagine.

On the 29th the battalion moved out towards their objective for the 30th - Hill 881S. Reconnaissance reports had placed a large number of NVA troops on the hill and reports from both aerial observers and ground recon team had stated that the NVA were building defensive bunkers on the crest of the hill. Wilder was aware of the reports and briefed us that he expected resistance but the hill would be !saturated with artillery and air strikes prior to our assault. (Our 8" and 175 Howitzers located at Dong Ha could reach 881 S but due to the angle of fire, close-in support would be risky to friendly troops. The 175 howitzer had a potential range error of 400 meters thus negating their use as close-in arty support) LtCol wilder directed that Mike 3/9 lead the battalion with Mike 3/3 and Wilder's command group following in their trace. Kilo 3/9 would follow as battalion reserve. I didn't argue with Wilder's decision for Kilo to be the reserve Company. Perhaps he felt we had already 'paid the price' of Khe Sanh in our recovery of Kilo 3/3 and Bravo . 1/9. The plan was that the battalion would skirt the base 861 and advance to a position some 700-800 meters north, northwest of Hill 881S. The assault up the slopes of Hill 881S by Mike 3/9 would commence the early morning of 30 April.

So much for a plan. About three hours into the movement I heard a firefight break out to the front/right of our route of march. The firing was intense and I was surprised contact with the NV A had been made so early. By my map, the battalion still should have been some 2000 meters short of our nighttime objective. The column held up and the firefight waned and burst again and again into an explosion of grenades and small arms fire. I listened in on the battalion command net for clues as to what was going on. I could tell that LtCol Wilder was pissed. Captain Swigart was calling for support, Wilder calling for him to withdraw from the contact - NOW! Then it became clear to me, Swigart, for unknown reasons, had veered off the route of march and was moving up the wrong hill, a southerly finger of Hill 861. Damn, I thought, another example of Bob's inability to read a map.

From Wilder's small ridge top position overlooking the fire fight, both the Marines of Mike 3/9 and the NVA could be clearly seen. LCpl Don Hossack, the radio man for the2nd Platoon of Mike 3/3, recalled Wilder's anger and frustration and Wilder's refusal to provide any support for the wayward Mike 3/9 Marines. Hossack felt that plunging small arm and machine gun fire would save lives and assist Mike Company in disengaging from the small battle. Wilder would have none of that and he repeatedly ordered Swigart to disengage. Swigart reluctantly agreed, withdrew with his two dead and some 10 wounded Marines. The NVA at the base of 861 were left to fight another day.

LtCol Wilder ordered Mike 3/3 to take the lead and continue towards the night objective near the base of881S. We of Kilo followed in their trace. Mike 3/9 now became 'tail-end-Charlie', the battalion reserve. Though the Mike 3/9 Marines were infuriated by Wilder's seemingly self-centered and rather heartless approach to their dilemma and casualties, it would turn out that Swigart's blunder was a disguised blessing for the Marines of Mike 3/9.

As we moved through the thick elephant grass near the stream beds at the base of 881 S a Marine to my front pointed out a grisly sight about 20 meters off the trail. There, stuck on cut bamboo stakes were two skulls, their hollow eye sockets staring at the passing Marines. I walked over to inspect, to see what was going on. There at the base of the bamboo stakes were two freshly dug-up graves. I could see from the remnants of the uniforms that still clothed parts of their bodies that they were not Marines. I was relieved but questioned why good Marines would dig up graves and put on a Halloween show. I then decided that it must be something that the South Vietnamese Rangers must done to 'warn' the NVA that this was their territory. Any way I looked at 'it', desecration of the dead was only something I had read about and never expected to see. My learning process about the vulgarity of war was escalating.

As dusk settled in, Mike 3/3 and the remainder of the battalion arrived and dug in for the night near the base of Hill 881S. Mike 3/3 was the closest to Hill 881S, near its' base with the remainder of the battalion some 800 meters away on the crest of a small hill. The steepness of 881S and the stark face of tile two major ridgelines leading to the top seemed an open invitation to disaster. I wondered just what tomorrow would bring.

As darkness settled in, Mike 3/3 reported some NVA activity on the crest of 881S. A few errant NVA 82 nun Mortar rounds were launched at Mike's position and our 105 battery at Khe Sanh responded with accurate suppressive fire. Mike Company reported that the NVA were taunting the Marine with "You die, Marine" comments that spread eerily throughout the night. We of Kilo heard very little from our position some 600 meters away.

After all units had settled in for the night, LtCol Wilder called the company commanders together for his plan of attack the next morning. Mike 3/3 would lead the assault with Kilo 3/9 moving to and remaining at Mike's night defensive position to await orders from Wilder to reinforce Mike Company should they need it. Mike 3/9 and the battalion command group would remain in their night defensive position some 800 meters away from the crest of 881S. Lt Col Wilder decided on a one company assault based on the limited routes up 881 S and possibly his belief that the NVA had likely evacuated the hill after the severe prep fire of the previous days. That had been the NVA' s mode of operation, make a contact and then disappear to fight on another day of their choosing. After all, they were "Poorly trained, poorly equipped, poorly fed and poorly led". Right?

Wrong! The first clue might have been their ferocious defense and skills in fighting Bravo 1/9 and Kilo 3/3 on 861 and that both rifle companies had noted well built NVA bunkers and fighting positions. A second clue was the 82mrn mortar team that sent a few round down the hill earlier in the evening. It was well known that 82mm mortar teams were associated with NVA battalion, not small teams of NVA scouts. The third clue, ignored all the way back to Saigon, was that the NVA were led by a highly skilled cadre of officers and enlisted soldiers who had defeated the French years earlier. Such arrogance or ignorance would play into the NVA plans for the Marines on Hill 881S., sadly, became a part of the misguided leadership.

At first light we of Kilo mounted up for our move to Mike 3/3 ' s night defensive position. As LCpl Joe O'Dell recalled: "The day was hot and clear. A day more suited for a family picnic, not a day to do combat. We had long ago gotten used to the heat, even with our flak jackets. We moved out from our base camp and began our way to the base of Hill 881S. I noticed the bleached, faded camouflage covers on our helmets contrasted sharply with the ever present green elephant grass. It was a strange sight to see the faded, camouflaged covers protruding and bobbing above the top of the grass as we moved along. Joe O'Dell thought, what a great aiming point for an NVA Sniper." didn't notice.

As we arrived at Mike's position around 0800,they had already moved out and I could see two columns of Marines moving towards the crest up the only two available ridgelines leading to the top of 881 S.

Mike Company had discarded their flak jacket as they left the Khe Sanh perimeter-either on orders from Captain Bennett or LtCol Wilder. Wilder, being a recon Marine, evidently believed the flak jackets were of marginal value, would create unnecessary heat casualties and would slow the Marine's advance up the steep hill surrounding Khe Sanh. As mentioned earlier, Mike Company was commanded by Captain Raymond Bennett. His unproven leadership style would soon be tested by the battled hardened NVA.

From our position at the base of 881S we could not see the top of the hill some 300 meters steeply above us. The left ridgeline leading to the crest of the hill was rather narrow and rose steeply just before cresting the hill. The right ridgeline was broader and, though steep, would provide some maneuver room prior to moving over the military crest. Looking at my map I could see that once you crested the hill, the top was rather flat rising from right to a highpoint on the left. LtCol Wilder had not provided a 'guesstimate' as to NVA strength on the hill and I 'guessed' that since he was sending only one rifle company up the hill that he expected nothing more than light harassing fire and contact.

I don't recall watching Mike 3/3 struggle up the steep slope of 881S. I suspect I was more concerned about how we of Kilo would get up the hill if events dictated that we reinforce Mike 3/3. I decided on sending the 3rd Platoon with JohnWoodall up the left ridgeline, if needed. The 2nd Platoon with Lt. Hepner would move up the right ridgeline some 100 to the right of the 3rd Platoon. I planned to send the Weapons Platoon with Lt. Cobb and their 60mm mortars and rockets to a small knoll near the base of 881S and yet with a good view of the crest of the hill. Each platoon had a machine gun section of two guns attached for the possible assault. The first Platoon with SSgt. Taylor would be Kilo's reserve and my command group would travel in trace of the 2nd Platoon as that ridgeline provided more maneuver room. I pointed out to the platoon leaders that great care must be taken to insure that our friendly fire didn't create friendly casualties among M 3/3 Marines or between our platoons as they would be coming into the crest of the hill from different directions. All seemed confident and we waited for 'the word' from LtCol Wilder.

The morning seemed to drag on. The crest of 881 S very quiet. Mike 3/3 Marines now were nowhere in sight. I thought they must have crested the hill without contact and that was good. Around] 100 hours 881 S erupted in an explosion of small arms and automatic weapons fire. The air was punctuated with small explosions and then louder one that seemed like mortars. We could see nothing other than some smoke and dirt rising in the air. We waited. My battalion radio operator reported that Mike 3/3 was calling in to battalion with reports of heavy enemy contact and casualties. We waited. The noise on the hill seemed to rise and fall almost like a planned 4th of July celebration - but we knew no one was celebrating on the crest of 881S. We waited.

About 1200 hours, Wilder passed the word that Mike 3/3 was in serious trouble on the crest of the hill and that Kilo was to link up and reinforce their positions By 1215 hours Kilo was 'online' and moving toward the crest of 881S. Lt Cobb was already in place with his Weapons Platoon. All was going well. My plan now was simple. The 3rd and 2nd Platoon would move to and secure the military crest of the hill. If possible they would link up in the saddle that separated the two knolls of HiII 881S. Based on Woodall's and Hepner's information at that time, I planned to commit the 1st platoon to reinforce the 2nd Platoon and we would move from our right to left, rolling up the NVA defenses and link up with elements . of W/3/3 It was a simple plan based on my belief that there might be 50- 100 NVA on the hill who had been pounded with artillery and air strikes the previous days. A simple plan based on my briefing at the Khe Sanh airstrip that the NY A forces in the Khe Sanh area were " ... poorly trained, poorly equipped, poorly led and fed and would likely not stick around to face a full fledged attack by Marine forces". As elements of the 2nd Platoon came into view of LCpl Donald Hossack of Mike 3/3, he suddenly began to believe that he was going to live rather than die on a no-named mountain called 881S. Hossack had been badly wounded in the initial burst of small arms fire and subsequently suffered a sucking chest wound from a mortar round that Marine buddy in his lap for a half hour, looking to the sky, praying some miracle that would deliver them from the hell going on around them.

When his buddy died, Don knew that he was next. Now, as he looked down the slope he could see Marines coming his way. Perhaps, just perhaps he might live to see another day. He did.

As the 3rd Platoon neared the crest of the hill it became a hand-over-hand pull up the steep slope through the shattered trees and brush from our artillery and air strikes. Deploying into a 'platoon on-line' was impossible and Lt Woodall, traveling with his lead squad, evidently decided they would deploy and disperse after reaching the more open and flatter crest of the hill. The 2nd Platoon was having it a bit easier with two squads nearly 'on-line' and a squad in reserve.

We had seen several Mike 3/3 Marines, obviously wounded and helping each other, scrambling down the face of 881S. The quiet simple assault was now turning into a raging battle of killing and being killed. As my command group moved slowly toward the crest some 100 meters to the rear of the 2nd Platoon, I noted a pair of Marines sitting in a small bomb crater some 150 meters down from the crest of the hill. It was now about 1230 hours and the battle had raged on the hill for over an hour and a half. Gunny Hatfield and I walked over to see what the two Marines were doing and to find out why they were not with their unit. To my great, great surprise, there sat Captain Bennett, the hard charging Company Commander of Mike 3/3, rocking back and forth, his face pale and expressionless. I said, "What the hen are you doing down here?" Bennett replied, "I don't know what to do. They're all dying up there and I don't know what to do". I then asked, "What's going on up there?" Again, Bennett replied, "I don't know, they're all dying up there". I looked at the other Marine and recognized Bennett's Artillery Officer, Lt. Rogers, who was sitting there, shaking his head in disbelief, obviously stunned by Bennett's loss of command and control.

I looked back at Bennett and again attempted to gain some information as to Mike Company's whereabouts on the hill and what was happening. No response-just the. same rocking and "I don't knows". Gunny Hatfield slowly moved up next to me, leaned over and at a slight whisper said, "Let me shoot the sorry-ass son-of-a-bitch and put him out of his misery". I, with nearly a smile in my voice said, "No Gunny, we're not shooting Captains today". He quietly shrugged his shoulders and we move on. Based on what I was seeing and hearing, the situation on the crest of the hill was much worse than I had originally believed

I called my Arty Forward observer team over, pointed out a small rise on the ridgeline leading to the crest of the hill and told LCpl Bob Stewart to move forward to the large remnants of a tree and see if he could figure out where we could run some artillery fire. I likely suggested either some white phosphorous round for smoke cover or perhaps some high explosives round on the back side of the hill where the NVA mortars might be hiding. Without hesitation Stewart and his radio operator, LCpl John Krohn moved out from the command group and made their way up the hill to the tree.

John Woodall, now at the military crest of the Hill, called in to report that he had just seen two NVA soldiers standing on top of the hill, holding hands and waving at his platoon. John asked for instructions and I said. "Go get'em, tiger". I then called Lt. Hepner and he related that he also was near the crest and ready to move out. I repeated my 'order', "Go get'em, tiger". There radios became silent as the crescendo of fire on the hill rose again to an unbelievable level.

Within a few minutes I received a call from LCpl Krohn that my arty FO Bob Stewart, had been shot in the butt and was seriously wounded. John would help his down the hill and then return to my command group. Damn, a NVA sniper had picked out someone who looked important, had a map and field glasses and BAM, I'm currently out of artillery support. Moments later I receive another call, this time from my weapons platoon radio operator that Lt. Cobb has been wounded and needed evacuation.

Obviously, Lt. Cobb, following the action with binoculars in hand, also looked important. Damn, within two minutes some NVA sniper has picked out two very important Marines of Kilo and with two long ranged shot, both are out of action. It happened that the tree that I had sent LCpl Stewart to and the small knoll where the Weapons Platoon was emplaced were both in view down the long slope of the right broad faced slope of 881S. Stewart was likely 150 meters from the sniper's position and Cobb some 150 meters further down the hill. Obviously some 'good shooting' by the "poorly trained and led NVA". My simple plan no longer looked simple. Things were not looking good.

I call Lt Woodall for and update. Silence. I call Lt Hepner to see how things are going. Silence. The battle on the crest of the hill raged on. We of the command group were now about 100 meters short of the military crest of the hill with the 1st Platoon directly below me. Bullets are zinging by, about six - eight feet over head. At least we are not in the kill zone - yet.

My company radio operator looks stunned, shaking his head and quietly reports, "Lt. Woodall is a KIA". What the fuck' screams in my mind. Now I'm down to one lieutenant.

Eighteen year old Pfc Art Gennaro, moving with the 1st Squad of the 3rd Platoon, wrote home to his parents the horrific story about what happened to the 3rd Platoon when they crested the hill into the NVA killing fields. He wrote upon his return to Khe Sanh on May 12th: ..... I remember going up the hill in a column. At first it seemed like an easy climb. Then it felt like it was almost straight up. The trees and roots gave us something to hold onto, or push up with your feet. We were on stomach, not for just the obvious reason but because the last few yards were so steep.

I, luckily on this day, was the thirteenth man in line of our squad. The lead Marine was Flowers, next Pitts, then Aponte, Nevarez, Lt. Woodall, his radio operator, my squad leader, three machine gunners, Knight, Appleton and them me. The other two squads were behind me.

I was about on top when I heard a sniper shoot at the lead Marine. Someone yelled for a corpsman. As he ran up, I saw a guy in front of me kneeling down. Another shot was fired and I saw his helmet fall off his head and he fell over, shot in the head. Then all hell broke loose. The NVA fired M-79 rounds at us landing 10 yards from me. (Perhaps the M-79 weapons were recovered from Mike 3/3 casualties) The tree line to my left opened up on me. We hit the deck. The NVA ran from the tree line throwing grenades. The guy in front of me (Appleton who came over here with me) caught it in the face and chest and he was dead. We fired back and tossed grenades. The NVA kept coming. Some looked doped up, showing their teeth and wide eyes. We fired back and threw grenades. I said to myself: 'This is it Art you're going to die but you will go down fighting'. Some of our weapons jammed and wouldn't fire. Two guys behind me caught parts of a grenade and one was shot in the arm. Word was passed to pull back. We let the wounded go first then I left."

Lt Woodall was one of the first Marines killed. When the initial battle erupted, he realized his platoon was in a killing zone and he passed the word for everyone to pull back. He then, without consideration for his own safety, knelt down and took the NVA positions under fire to provide some cover for his Marines. After a few burst from his M-16, he was hit by a fusillade of automatic weapons fire from a NVA bunker some 30 meters to his front. He died instantly. (Lt. Woodall was awarded a Silver Star -posthumously for his courageous action.)

About the same time that the 3rd Platoon was fighting for their lives and attempting to evacuate their wounded, I noticed a Marine trotting stumbling down the hill from the 3rd Platoons position. As he came nearer I could see in was SSgt Manson, Platoon Sergeant for the 3rd Platoon. Gunny Hatfield yelled at Manson to get his sorry ass over to our position. A few moments later and there stood SSgt. Manson, breathing heavily but not making eye contact with the Gunny or me. He just looked at the ground. I said, "Manson, what the hell are you doing down here?" (Hoping he was on some special mission for his platoon) He looked up, shook his head and slowly spoke. "Captain, I can't go back up there, I've got a family at home, I've got young kids that I want to see again". I exploded. "You son of a bitch, you've got a whole platoon of young kids up on that hill. That is where you need to be. Do you understand?" Manson just stood there, shaking his head and finally said, "I just can't go back up that hill". I was totally pissed and frustrated. More heated warnings and orders and Manson just stood there. I then realized that the last thing the real Marines on top of the hill needed was a totally ineffective Platoon Sergeant. He would just get in their way, get someone killed. I decided to not spend anymore time with Manson, no warnings about a court martial, no further words other than "You're relieved, get your sorry ass to the bottom of the hill and help with casualties. I just didn't have time for his bullshit. Manson would just have to live the rest of his life knowing that he abandoned his platoon. The Gunny and I continued our movement across the face of 881.

Moments later my radio operator reports again, "Lt. Hepner is likely a KIA. He hasn't moved since he shouted out. "We can't kill these son-of-bitches hiding behind a log" With that he had jumped up with his M-16 blazing away and attacked an NVA bunker single-handedly. He made it but a few steps across an open patch of ground before being cut down by automatic weapons fire from at least two bunkers. He lays still. No one can get to him. His body totally exposed to NVA fire. No sign of-life. So much for earning a medal.

LCpl Joe O'Dell was with one of the two squads that Lt. Hepner used to crest the right hand ridge of 881S. He writes: "The din of the battle could e heard further up the hill. There was indeed lots of stuff going on up there. I have read articles about how steep Hill 881S was but where I went, I had no such problem. I had moved past the predominant tree line to my right when I discovered that the members of my fire team were not with me. I knelt down on one knee and waited a short time thinking that they would show up. They didn't.

Small arms were whizzing and puffs of dust kicking up around me. I thought I had better get away from the open ground and seek come cover - which seemed very scarce. In front of me on the other side of a cleared area was an NVA bunker. I decided it was better to be inside the bunker than to be in the open and exposed to enemy snipers of which there were many.

I ran across the clearing with my rifle at the ready and entered the bunker and found it to be vacant. I was amazed at how neat and carefully it had been constructed. The top was two layers of 8" - 10" logs crisscrossed inside. The dirt walls were perfectly plumb and straight. There were two entry points and one exit point out the back. The exit point went out six feet and angled to the left towards the tall elephant grass facing my position in the bunker.

I had not been there very long when out of the elephant grass came a chicom grenade. I knew the NV A soldier was close because the chicom came at me as if it had been thrown underhanded. Before the grenades exploded I would duck down in the bunker to get clear of any shrapnel. After it exploded I would rise up and empty a magazine clip into the elephant grass from where the grenade had come. I carried plenty of ammo and fired my M-16 on full automatic. This exchange took place 3-4 times until the grenades stopped coming my way. I might add, the times I fired my M-16 in Vietnam it performed flawlessly.

After this exchange, I raised a little out of the bunker and shortly a sniper round clipped a twig off a bush near me and I could feel the round whiz by inches from my right ear Luckily his aim was off. Leaning out of the bunker opening I heard some incoming mortar rounds. I didn't duck back into the bunker fast enough. I recall a very loud noise as the round landed and sucked all the air out of my lungs. I fell back into the bunker but felt no pain. I don't recall a corpsman tending to my wounds. I simply lay there, stunned, until I got my bearings. At some point I somehow exited the bunker and, with my flak jacket torn apart, crawled, walked, stumbled down the hill to the medevac site. Thanks God for the flak jacket, it saved me from serious back and chest wounds. Later that evening I was choppered to the USS Repose where I was treated for multiple fragmentation wounds to my legs and lower back."

The NVA, with their troops in bunkers or fighting holes were free to mortar the crest of the hill. They 'walked' mortars back and forth among the exposed Marines all afternoon creating extensive casualties. Brilliant plan. In the meantime we couldn't use our artillery or air power for fear of creating friendly casualties.

It's now 1400 hours and I've lost all my officers and artillery forward observer. I had little or no contact with the surviving elements of Mike 3/3. I knew the general disposition of the 3rd and 2nd platoons but no idea where the surviving members of Mike 3/3 were located.

I should have had some clue as to the nature of the NVA units on Hill 881S. The previous night they had taunted Mike 3/3 with voice and bugle calls. They had randomly fired their 82 mm mortars on or near Mike 3/3 position early in the night. Now I understood; piss off some Marines and they will attack you head-on. After all, they were just 'gooks' and we were Marines. No one mentioned that 82 mm mortar teams travel with NVA battalions of 350 - 550 soldiers. It didn't register with me either. The two NVA that Lt. Woodall saw at the crest of the hill, holding hand and waving at his platoon was just another example of the NVA understanding our culture and sucking another platoon into a deadly kill zone. My response to the hand waving had been: Go get 'em tiger."I was clueless as to the tactics and tenacity of the NVA. In World War II the 'rule' was that the should outnumber the defenders by at least four to one. On Tarawa it was six to one and Iwo Jima, five to one. On Hill 881S it likely was much less than one to one.

As Gunny Hatfield and . I traversed the face of 881S towards the broader slope near the 2nd Platoon's position, I attempted to make contact with platoon radio operators that might have some idea of what was going on top of the hill The reports were not pretty. Some radio operators reported that they were the only living Marine in the area Others reported small groups fighting furiously, while others were in bomb craters praying for reinforcements. There seemed to no one in command or control of the platoons, just small groups here and there, separated by intense NVA fire.

The Gunny and I began to do a knee/elbow and belly crawl as we approached the crest. The 1st platoon was some 25 meters behind us. We were now about 60 meters short of the military crest and could feel the automatic rounds zing through the air just above our heads. Several Marines, evidently wounded, came stumbling down the hill through our position. They were motioned to the bottom of the hill by Gunny Hatfield.

Earlier, around 1400 hours, Corporal Orville Fulkerson, the squad leader of the reserve squad for the 2nd platoon, moved to link up with the surviving elements of his platoon. As he began his move towards the military crest he noted his platoon Gunnery Sergeant standing near motionless on the face of the slope. When Fulkerson's squad approached, the gunny pointed to a trail to his left and the lead Marine moved toward the crest. Fulkerson passed by the Gunny and, for a moment, wondered why he wasn't with the platoon. Fulkerson, nicknamed "Mad Dog", didn't hesitate long for he had a job to do, link up With his platoon take Hill 881S. Fulkerson didn't go directly up the ridgeline as he could see that the ridgeline was covered with casualties. He actually crossed the ridgeline some 60 meter short of the first knoll and was able to maneuver safely around and further up the hill than he might have had he followed in the fatal footsteps of his platoon.

Cpl Fulkerson remembers his first sights on the hill... another squad leader had just repulsed a strong NVA counter-attack and was in no shape to continue the battle. LCpl 'Little Joe" Bob Purro had shot an NV A soldier three times as the NVA rushed his position. The man fell on top of Little Joe and bled all over him. Soon after. a NVA mortar round landed behind Little Joe and wounded him in the neck, just above his flak jacket. LCpl Bill Van Devander rushed to his aid thinking Little Joe was seriously wounded in the chest due to all the blood. Little Joe kept telling his buddy that it was NVA blood, not his. Finally, Bill realized that Little Joe was not seriously wounded and both continued the fight.

Fulkerson continued: ... We could hear lots of firing to our left as we worked up the trail to the true crest of the hill. Everything around us looked undisturbed. The canopy was of low brush and undergrowth and yet there was a lot of noise .... We crawled forward, looking into the clearing beyond the hill's undergrowth.. Out there, there were at least 30 dead Marines and NVA. Not a good feeling, No one alive.

He continues: ... We crawled up to the edge of the clearing and could see at least three squads of Marines, along with their machine guns and radios in the 'beaten zone'. We pulled back and then saw an NVA mortar team setting up a mortar on the crest of the main hill of 881S, above us some 150 meters away. I called Captain Giles and asked for mortar fire. I was refused. (Due to the unknown location of M3/3 and elements of K/3/9, all requests for arty, mortar and air support were denied by battalion to limit friendly casualties from friendly fire.)

Corporal Fulkerson's story continues: ... We (his squad) then work our way back down the hill where we could still hear some firing. . .. We came upon a low ridge running up the mountain and my first fire team moved forward and were fired upon. They took cover in a small hole just beyond where they had been hit. LCpl Stoudt who was in front of me when the NVA opened up was shot and killed. LCpl Ed Bohannon and LCpl Terzi were now trapped in the small hole forward of my position. Unknowingly, we had pushed up on the NVA's main defensive positions. Due to heavy enemy fire the remaining members of my squad we repulsed and, for a moment in time, had to leave my two Marines in no man's land between us and the NVA. LCpl Svoboda, lying next to me got shot in the helmet, clipped his hair - about as close to death as you can get. We moved back just before the ground where we had been erupted in little geysers of dried leaves and dust. Life is always a game of inches. We then regrouped and tried another way to get to the top. It was becoming very complicated and chaotic.

We came across another clearing with yet another firefight in progress. We then jumped into a bomb crater and discovered a badly wounded Marine who had been laying there for several hours in the hot sun. He died about the same time we told him we had come to take him home.

We then made our way to the wooded top of the hill. The NVA were now below us so we could crawl under their automatic weapons fire. We crawled forward to a 'firing line' made up mostly of dead Marines who formed a wall of protection from the NVA weapons fire. From this position I could see where Bohannon and Terzi were pinned down in the small fighting hole between us and the NV A .

.. .I hollered out to them to stay down and so we could put out some suppressive fire to cover their movement to our position. The line of dead Marines and NVA took the impact of the NVA rounds coming our way. I recall so vividly the bodies jumping like jelly as the stream of automatic :fire was directed our way. I moved to the top of the piles of dead and hollered, "Bo, can you hear me?" "Yes, I can hear you" came the voice floating back across the bodies. "Sit tight, Bo. We need to get more firepower up here to pry you loose". Bo replied, "We can only hold out for so long" . ... I kept calling Captain Giles for reinforcements and getting nothing. The answer was always, 'we on the way' but no one shows up. I decided to use the Marines that I had and got them into position to lay down suppressive fire. On my command, we opened up, leaving a zone in the center for my two Marines to safely scramble through. Up they came, over the tops of the bodies and back to the 'safety' of my squad. 'Safety 'meant alive for this moment.

. .. After two more mortar attacks, Captain Giles passed the word to pull back. I was the senior Marine and NCO left on the ridgeline. My Platoon Leader, Lt. Hepner, had been killed early in the battle. My Platoon Sergeant had quit. Good NCOs had either been killed, wounded or had retired from the hill with their wounded. I was pissed!!! We had paid the price to own this place, a very high price and now were being ordered to pull back. We were not annihilated, we were still there. I gave the order to pull back with all our wounded. No wounded would be left on that damn hill. Angrily I led my Marines to the base of the hill, passing by groups of Marines, possibly sent as reinforcements, safely huddled in bomb craters on the hill sides. My battle on Hill 881S was over. The memories will last a lifetime.

By 1500, the situation on Hill 881S had become an individual battle between small valiant groups of Marines of M/3/3 and Kilo/3/9. At the very best, my command and control over Kilo was limited. I had one remaining platoon that r could commit to the fight in the area of the 2nd Platoon. The word that I was getting was that the NVA were still operating from bunkers and fighting holes while our Marines were exposed and fighting for their lives.

As my command group held up near crest of the hill, I knew that some hard decisions would need to be made. About that time, Captain Bob Swigart, CO of Mike 3/9 came crawling up to my position. He asked what was going on and r explained the situation very briefly with some words likely that, "We are in a world of shit!" He then asked what he could do and I said, "Stick with me and get your ass killed. After all, this seems like a great place to die". With that Bob swirls around on his belly and disappears down the hill like a large lizard, all belly, knees and elbows. I had no idea that LtCol Wilder had decided to commit M/3/9 to the battle and Bob, for whatever reasons, did not mention it.

I believed that I could commit the 1st Platoon to reinforce the small holdings gained by elements of the 2nd Platoon. Squad leaders from both the 3rd Platoon and 2nd Platoon had been requesting reinforcements from nearly the start of the battle. The 2nd Platoon area looked liked the best shot at success. The area where Cpl Fulkerson was fighting was on or near the small knoll which included the lower 1/4th of the ridgeline. To reinforce there might give us ownership of the lower of the two knolls on the 881S ridgeline. The NVA would still 'own' the actual crest of the hill along with their bunkers and fighting holes with clear lines of fire down the ridgeline into the 2nd Platoon's position. I believed we could gain the small knoll but felt it was unlikely were could 'own' and control the entire crest of the hill prior to dark.

My thoughts then went back to three days earlier when we were briefed on the problems Kilo 3/3 was having on 861. Kilo gained the crest of Hill 861 but didn't own the hill. The NVA had created sufficient casualties among Kilo 3/3 so that Kilo was stuck in place. Able to fight, yes. Able to move and maneuver, no. They didn't have enough able bodied Marines left to move their wounded let alone recover their dead. They fought bravely for three days, with limited water and ammunition in the hot sun. The NVA, seemingly at their leisure, pounded the hill with mortars and burst of automatic weapons fire. Our great artillery fire support from Khe Sanh and airstrikes seemed only to quiet the NVA weapons for moments at a time. Finally, under the cover of darkness, we had been able to extract Kilo 3/3. I didn't want the same scenario for the Marines of Mike 3/3 and Kilo 3/9.

Was the price we were paying for 881S too much? Just what the fk was this hill worth? The NVA showed no intention of withdrawing from their bunkered defensive positions as long as they could continue to inflict casualties on the Mike and Kilo Marines. "Poorly trained, poorly led, poorly equipped and fed"? Bullshit!!! As the afternoon progressed I had watched as streams of wounded and totally disoriented Marines stumbled and struggled down the face of 881S to a totally disorganized medevac site. No one was prepared for the chaos on that hill= least of all the young Marines led or ordered over the military crest into a perfectly prepared ambush on a grand scale.

I called LtCol Wilder on the radio. "Sir, I believe that if I commit my reserve platoon we can gain the crest of the rights side of the ridgeline. However, there is no guarantee that we will be able to own the entire hill. I believe that sending more troops into the battle will create huge numbers of additional casualties and we may end up like Kilo 3/3, stuck in the middle of a hill we don't own with night approaching. Sir, I recommend we use all available Marines to get the living Marines off the hill, and do that now!" There was but a slight pause and Wilder responded, "Pass the word to withdraw".

I had my radio operator pass the word to the widely separated squads of the 2nd and 3rd platoons to withdraw and to make certain that all the wounded were brought down the hill. Some had already begun the movement back over the military crest to the safety of the bomb craters on the side of the hill. This was not a smooth, by the book withdrawal. For some it was orderly, for other a dash through a hail of automatic weapons fire. With no radio contact with the survivors of Mike 3/3, I could only pray that they were also getting the word to withdraw from Wilder's headquarters.

LCpl Gennaro recalls the 'evacuation'. "When we reached the bottom of the hill we realized that the eleven Marines in front of me were still up there. We believed all were dead. About the same time we started down, I could see the 2nd Platoon carry their wounded down from the hill." Gennaro was thankful to be alive. Only he and one other Marine from his squad had made it off the hill that day.

By now, Gunny Hatfield was 'working' the entire face of Hill 881S, directing wounded to the initial medevac site and writing names in his small green notebook. Confusion reigned. He kept asking, "Are you absolutely certain that you got all the wounded off the hill. One answer was unacceptable to the battle hardened Hatfield. Someone from the 3rd Platoon said, "I think so". "Thinking so" was bullshit to Hatfield's ears and he ordered a composite squad from the 2nd and 3nl platoons to get their 'sorry asses' back up the hill and check for any additional survivors.

LCpl Gennaro was one of those 'chosen' to return to the top of the hill. He wrote: "Boy, I felt like hiding someplace but I knew I couldn't live with myself if I didn't go back up with my platoon. So up I went again. We reached the top and turned left to find the Marines we had left behind. We crawled all the way. The NVA snipers were good shots and bodies lay all over the place like leaves off a tree in the fall. It was hot as hell.

As we passed a crater I looked in it and there Pfc Flowers (a guy from my squad) lying there with blood all over his right side, from top to bottom. Somehow he had survived, one out of the initial eleven that had crested the hill. He said that when his platoon had initially pulled back, the NVA came out of the tree line, threw grenades and shot all the bodies on the hill. Flowers had rolled under some brush and the NVA shot at his head three times, missed and left him for dead."

Hatfield was ruthless about the possibility that wounded Marines might have been left on the hill. As Gennaro and his squad of Marines moved through the NVA sniper fire, they were met by a two squad of Marines from Mike 3/3 also ordered back to the crest of 881S to look for possible wounded Marines. Gennaro writes further: "Then the NVA mortared us again while we were on top. Again I said 'Art, this is it, I'm going to die on this damn hill'. Thankfully, Mike 3/9 sent a platoon up after us. They also got pinned down. Every five minutes someone got shot or hit by grenade or mortar fragments. It was now about 1830 and darkness would settle in an hour. The fog was rolling in."

Gennaro and five other Marines made a stretcher out of a poncho to carry Flowers down the hill. He recalled, "When we lifted Flowers up to carry him down the hill, a sniper opened up with automatic weapons fire. We hit the deck. We tried again and the NV A mortared us again. We finally agreed to get up and just keep moving."

The Mike 3/9 platoon set up on the military crest of the hill and began to provide effective suppressive fire with their machine guns. Cpl Gordon Herbert recalls the intense NVA fire directed at them. "The logs were jumping up and down as the NVA fire swept near their position. We returned their fire and it seemed to slow them down a bit. We watched as the five Marines slowly gathered their courage once again to make the dash down the hill with their wounded buddy in tow". With snipers firing and mortars falling Gennaro and his five Marines rose quickly and kept going down the hill. His summation, "It was crazy!"

Darkness was beginning to settle in over the slopes of Hill 881S. Hatfield and I believed that all the living were off the hill. A bit earlier, the 'check fire' for artillery was lifted and white phosphorous (WP) rounds covered the hill to provide some cover for the withdrawing Marines. That fire mission was granted by the battalion as 'they' felt the value of the smoke would outweigh the possibility of further casualties. It seemed to work. However several Marines were wounded by burns and one seriously wounded as the WP round landed next to him. As I walked back and forth between the medevac site and the base of the hill I marveled at the guts shown by both the wounded and non wounded Marines. No one cared about unit loyalty, just the loyalty between Marines Theirs was an attitude of getting the job done, get the wounded out and regroup. Just at dusk, a Marine off to my right flank called out that he detected some movement coming down the face of the hill. Marines went on alert. Then we saw him, a Marine staggering down the hill with a body cradled in his arms. Slowly the Marine approached my position and I could see it was a black Marine carrying Corporal Mieczkowski. Mieczkowski, a slender and slightly built Marine, was obviously dead. His head, arms and legs bobbed limply with each step of the black Marine. I said. "What the hell are you trying to do Marine, get yourself killed?" He stopped for a moment, looked at me and I could see that he had been crying. With absolutely no apology, the young black Marine looked at me and said, "Sir, this is my squad leader. I just couldn't leave him on the hill tonight". I knew Mieczkowski as a damn good NCO, no frills, no bullshit, just a good NCO. Up until that moment I had no idea how good he really must have been. Damn!! The black Marine then slowly moved to the medevac site, laid his precious cargo on the ground paused for a moment and disappeared into the night. That level of respect- and loyalty is earned by too few of us in leadership positions.

Night settled in on the base of Hill 881S. Mike 3/3 off to the left, Kilo 3/9 near the center where we had started some 10 hours earlier and Mike 3/9 off to our right. Everyone dug in for the expected mortar barrages. Silence. Gunny Hatfield went from platoon to platoon and then to the medevac sight and back to the platoons counting casualties, listing names, looking for the missing. By midnight he had accounted for all the Kilo Marines even though about 14 bodies remained on the hill. Those that we weren't absolutely certain that they were dead were listed as 'Probable Killed in Action'.

That was Lt Hepner, Corporal Ives, LCpl Nevarez and Cpl Stoudt. After being hit, they had not moved but no one physically got to their position to confirm their deaths. The other 13 Kilo Marines that had died on that hill were confirmed by someone in their squad or platoon. Thirty-two Kilo Marines were wounded seriously enough for medevac while eleven others were wounded and returned to duty to their platoons. Another eighteen Kilo Marines were listed as non-battle casualties with such ailments as twisted ankle and knees, stomach cramps, beat exhaustion, foot injuries, and two with acute depression. How many, if any, of these non-battle casualties were evacuated I have no record. What I do know is that Kilo started the day with four officers, eight corpsman and 161 enlisted Marines. By days end, were had one officer, five corpsman and about 110 enlisted Marines. Nearly 30% casualties. A tough day for Kilo and a grim introduction to combat with the "poorly trained, poorly led poorly fed and equipped North Vietnamese".

BACK TO THE CREST

The night remained relatively quiet and at first light we expected to resume the assault on 881 S after heavy artillery barrages and air strikes. Wilder was having none of that. He directed artillery and air strikes all day long, stripping the hill of all trees and most vegetation. The Marines of Kilo enjoyed the show, cleaned their weapons and regrouped as a cohesive fighting unit. Mike 3/3, having suffered heavier casualties than Kilo, was declared combat ineffective and moved back down to Khe Sanh and then on to Dong Ha for additions of personnel, equipment and redeployment to other battle area on another day.

As night fell we were informed that the 'final assault' would commence the next morning. I wondered throughout the night how the Marines of Kilo would react, going back up the hill when so many of their buddies had died and had lain for two days in the hot sun. I learned at first light what the key to motivating battle weary Marines was Hatfield. Hatfield was walking through our position his voice raised on high so all could hear. "You sorry ass Marines, you get your sorry ass shit together, clean your weapons again and you had better shave. Kilo Marines live and die like Marines and if I find one of your sorry asses dead on the hill today and you are not squared away and haven't shaved, I'll leave your sorry ass body out there to bloat and rot for a few days. Now get off your miserable sorry asses and get moving. Your buddies have already paid their price for owning that hill and now it's your turn!" No sympathy, no 'woe is me, ain't it awful' ,just boot camp toughness, take them back to where they will follow commands without questions and be Marines. Brilliant and typical of Hatfield.

Around 1100 Kilo and Mike 3/9 moved up the bleak and barren face of 881S. We expected some resistance. What we got was silence, dead silence. As we crested the military crest where so many Marines had died two days earlier, we were met only by a gentle breeze and the stench of death. The artillery and airstrikes had denuded the entire hill. Only stumps of tree remained standing. Then came the sight of the remains of bodies. Horrific, a leg here, an arm there. A possible torso half buried in the red clay. All were Marines. Not a single NVA casualty was found, no wounded, no dead. The NVA had stripped the hill of all signs of their presence except for several of their sturdy bunkers that remained standing despite the bombings. No NVA weapons were found and it seemed as if they had even picked up the expended brass. 881S, clean as a park except for the Marine dead that permeated the air and ground.

As we walked the. crest of the hill where two larger NVA bunkers remained intact, Gunny Hatfield suddenly said, 'Holy shit, look what those bastards have done." I walked over and there, very neatly lay two dead Marines spread eagled on the roof of the bunkers their bloated faces and bodies facing the sun. I then saw what Hatfield was talking about. Both Marines had evidently been laid out on top of the bunkers, their trousers opened and their penis's exposed. What a gross insult to these heroic Marines. I just walked away. Hatfield was cursing out loud.

Kilo was given the security mission of the left (highest) point of the hill with Mike 3/9 to our right. The Gunny found us an unoccupied NVA bunker and claimed it for our 881S CP. Our radio operators and arty FO team found fighting holes and trenches for their security. The search for bodies and spare parts of Marines continued for two days.

Many Kilo Marines just stopped eating due to the stench of death. Late on the afternoon of the first day, a young Marines came up to me and said. "Sir, we've got Lt. Woodall's and Lt. Hepner's bodies laid out for evacuation. Do you want to see them and 'say goodbye' before we load them up?' I thought for a moment, thanked the Marine for his courtesy and said. "No, want to remember them as they were, young, excited and good Marine officers and men." I hoped the Marine understood, -

We sent out patrols for the next five days. Some small squad sized and others platoons reinforced. No enemy contact was made. The NVA seemed to have disappeared just as easily as they had appeared, built bunkers, laid an ambush, extracted a heavy toll of Marine casualties and once again disappeared. I too often went back to my initial briefing at Khe Sanh, "Don't worry about the NVA, they are poorly trained poorly led, poorly fed and equipped. One Marine is worth ten NVA any day of the week.

AFTERTHOUGHT COMMENTS

Sadly, that was not the case and as I was to learn in later battles that we were facing a well disciplined, well trained and well equipped enemy that was willing to pay the 10 to 1 price, if necessary, to extract their toll on Marines.

This was my first, but not last, exposure to a classic NVA tactic loosely translated as "Close to the belt". It was a simple tactic with a deadly outcome for American units in Vietnam. The NVA would create a well camouflaged defensive position with cleared fields of fire. When the well armed and well supported Americans would approached, the NVA, showing great fire discipline, would wait until the lead elements were either within their positions or just a few meters away. They would then open fire with their automatic weapons, mortars and grenades. The Americans were exposed, the NVA, mostly in bunkers or fighting holes. Since friendly forces were intermingled with or very close to the NVA positions it was impossible to use our overwhelming artillery and air power. The battle would rage on, rifleman against rifleman, machine gun versus machine guns and grenades galore on both side of the battle. With the NVA holding the prepared defensive positions, American casualties were high. When the American units were finally able to withdraw with their wounded, the NVA knew that arty and air support was 'on-the-way. In most cases the NVA had just enough time to police up their casualties and disappear to fight another day.

The total number of Marines killed on Hill 881S is listed as 42 by various estimates. In talking with my Marines they related that they had killed up to 50 NVA during the heated battles. Double that number due to NVA killed by Marines who lost their lives and due to the heavy bombardments we get an estimated NVA casualty number of 100 or so. No confirmed numbers are available. However, I was not surprised when years later I read in official Marine Corps historical documents that over 500 NVA were confirmed killed on 881S with another 150 probably killed. That would track nicely with my initial briefing that one Marine is worth ten NVA any day of the week. It also would make the casualties as reported back to the 'States' more palatable.

The M-16 rifle caused many Marines to die needlessly. Particularly, Marines in Mike 3/3 reported or were found dead with rifle cleaning rods jammed in the barrel of their rifles in their last futile attempt to clear the spent cartridge from the chamber of their rifles. Within Kilo, about 10 percent of the Marines reported problems with their weapons jamming as did Marines in Bravo 1/9 and Kilo 3/3. Due to the proximity of Mike 3/3 casualties, Kilo Marines often picked up a serviceable weapon or a M-60 machine gun and continued the advance. Sadly, the Marine chain of command blamed the M-16's failure on the Marines not cleaning their weapons properly. Even General Walt, the "Marine's Marine", laid the blame on the individual Marines rather than on the weapon itself. Historically, the Marines were vindicated. The chambers of the M-16 were retooled and the problem solved. No one in an official capacity ever admitted it was the weapons problem, not gutsy Marines. Some two weeks after our initial assault up Hill 881S, it was time for Kilo to return to our parent battalion at Camp Carroll. Kilo walked off the hill wiser, perhaps closer knit as a company as a result of the hell under fire of April 30, 1967. There was no celebration, just quiet resolute Marines leaving a hill where so many of their buddies had died. We all knew that this battle would not be our last. Hopefully we all would be wiser next time.

(The most insulting surprises that came to me regarding the battle for* 881S showed up in my mail in late 2006. Here was this old newspaper clipping with a great head and shoulders shot of Captain Bennett. The write-up was a summation of the Bronze Star Medal, with Combat V"device awarded to Captain Bennett for his heroic leadership on 881S. In essence it stated that Captain Bennett, showing courageous leadership skills, had led his rifle company in the initial assault on 881S and after personally directing artillery and air strikes had courageously led his company in securing Hill 881S from a tenacious NVA force. Total bullshit! Captain Bennett never made it to the crest of Hill 881S and was back in Dong Ha or Camp Carroll with elements of Mike 3/3 when Hill 881S was secured by Marines of Mike and Kilo 3/9.

How such a travesty of justice occurred we will never know. Any and all Marines who made it over the Military crest should have received at least a Bronze Star. They were the heroes despite the leadership (including mine) that sent them to hell and back

My plan is to continue the story of Kilo through July 10,1967. Kilo was subsequently involved in two major battles with NVA forces after Hill 881S. On May 20, thanks to an incredibly stupid battalion commander, Kilo was cut off and surrounded for 16 hours. On July 2 - 4, 1967 Kilo was the bald eagle company, again, for the beginning of Operation Buffalo. In both battles, the Marines of Kilo exceeded, in my mind, the words Semper Fidelis - always faithful.

ANOTHER KHE SANH VETERAN?

By Craig Tourte

Sometimes I think there just couldn't be too many more idiots out there and then I meet one more. I would think making the claim of being a Khe Sanh Veteran and getting called on it with sideway and doubting looks after so many years would be sufficient to dissuade those from making questionable claims. Now when someone makes the claim "I served at Khe Sanh" it usually means they served on the base or hills during the Siege, otherwise it was just another tour stop, another hump, another battle, important and certainly a great contribution but they were not part of the Siege which was news worthy and captured the attention of the world. I'm not saying here that simply being at Khe Sanh during the Siege was any more or less of a contribution, just that that service represents a noteworthy historic event, an event that represents sacrifice, deprivation and courage of which many would like to be identified as having participated in.

Now to my story...so I'm in the little lounge I occasionally frequent after golf when I am called over to another table by some fellows I know. One of them says he wanted me to meet his good friend who was also a Marine and served at Khe Sanh. "Really" I respond, finding that unusual because I know most of the regulars and they know my and Steve Wiese's history of serving at Khe Sanh which we remind them every year during the Marine Corps Birthday. Anyway the guy has his head down and is checking his phone when I walk up and he kind of nods in agreement with the statement made the by person who was making the introduction. I stick out my hand and he looks up at me. I ask him when and where and who he served with at Khe Sanh. There as a slight pause and now all eyes are on him.

He clearly appears uncomfortable and now here it comes and I can see it on his face, "Will, I never really was on the base I was just South of it." I say where was that, the Rockpile, Camp Carrol, where were you, I could see he clearly didn't know where or what any of those places were?" He says he was in the jungle south of Khe Sanh where there was a big mountain. He said he served with 1/5 in 1966. I just smiled and said welcome home and walked away leaving him with his friends who by this time were all looking at him with doubting expressions. I didn't hang around to hear his explanation to them. But the message was clear and another pseudo Khe Sanh Veteran bites the dust.

AND WHEN HE GOES TO HEAVEN ST PETER HE WILL TELL

TO THE PROTESTERS

HE FIGHTS IN A LAND THAT IS FOREIGN AND FAR, WHILE YOU PROTEST AND PLAY YOUR GUITAR!

HIS KIND IS KNOWN THROUGHOUT THE PAST, NEVER TO RUN ALWAYS STAND FAST!

HE WADES THROUGH THE MUCK,MRE AND FILTH, WHILE AT HOME YOU LAUGH AT HIS BLOOD BEING SPILT!

GO AHEAD BURN YOUR DRAFT CARDS, HAVE YOUR PARTIES AND FUN,WHILE OVER THERE YOU HAVE COUNTRYMEN DYING UNDER A HOT BURNING SUN!

HE LOVES HIS COUNTRY AND WHAT IT STANDS FOR, HE'D RATHER FIGHT THERE THAN AT YOUR FRONT DOOR!

HE WALKS STRAIGHT AND PROUD, HE HOLDS HIS HEAD HIGH, HE'S SEEN FRIENDS KILLED, HE'S SEEN GROWN MEN CRY!

HE'S BEEN SHOT AT AND WOUNDED, BUT COMES BACK FOR MORE, ON SPIRIT LIKE THIS HAS BEEN BUILT THE CORPS!
FOR NOTHING CAN STOP THESE GREEN MACHINES, BETTER KNOWN AS: UNITED STATES MARINES!!

JUST ONE LETTER THAT DAN FISHER RECEIVES FROM OUR AWARDEES

I am so incredibly honored to have received this award and cannot thanks the KSV Scholarship Foundation enough for their selection. This award means so much to me, as Col. Dabney was my Grandfathers Colonel, and a man he very much admired and respected. More importantly, receiving this award meant everything to my Grandmother. You may never fully understand just how special it was for her to see the video of me opening the letter to find the scholarship inside. With my grandfather's recent passing, it felt like he had been taken away just before he would get to see any of his grandchildren graduate high school, and unfortunately I will never be able to watch the Texas Longhorns play a Thanksgiving Day game with him as an actual Longhorn. But because of this award, my grandfather is able to leave behind support that he cannot be here to physically pass on, and it means the world to my grandmother that they were able to help assist me in college through this scholarship opportunity. Thank you so much to Khe Sanh Veterans organization for this award and their service, God bless the United States Marines.

KHE SANH VETERANS, INC. SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION

GOVERNING RULES FOR OPERATIONS OF THE KHE SANH VETERANS, INC. SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION:

1. The purpose of the Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. Scholarship Foundation (KSVSF) is to provide financial aid to high school graduates who plan to attend an accredited institution as a full time student OR who are currently enrolled full time in an accredited post-secondary curriculum.

2. Scholarships will be awarded to applicant students who have at least one parent, legal guardian, or grandparent who is a paid member in good standing of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., a 501(c)(19) charitable organization.

3. IT IS THE RESPONSIBILITY OF THE STUDENT TO SEE THAT THE SCHOLARSHIP APPLICATION REQUIREMENTS ARE FULLY COMPLETED AND SENT DIRECTLY TO THE SCHOLARSHIP CHAIR BEFORE 5/1/Governing Year AT THE ADDRESS BELOW;

Mr. Dan Fisher
KSVSF Committee Chairman 52ND
6050 52ND St. North
Oakdale, MN 55128-1317

CRITERIA FOR SELECTION

Applicants must be the legal child or grandchild of a paid up member of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. (See member definition in the KSV Association bylaws.) This includes deceased, life members of KSV and those Khe Sanh Veterans listed as KIA/MIA in Vietnam if family members are paid up, associate members of KSV, Inc. Children or grandchildren of KSV associate members are not eligible.

Information provided by each candidate on the attached application forms will focus on the following qualities considered for selection to KSVSF financial aid: good grades, character, citizenship, leadership experience and personal essay. A point selection system is included in the application forms. Examples of these above mentioned qualities could be in the classroom, in extracurricular activities or in service to the community, church or nation.

A Scholarship Foundation Review Committee will serve the President of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., and will accept, review and grade each correctly completed application. This committee will provide a scholarship financial report and short summaries of the selected candidates at the annual KSV reunion for publication in the Red Clay" Newsletter.

SCHOLARSHIP AWARDS

The amount of financial award per applicant will be determined by the Review Committee's scoring results. The awards will be granted for a maximum of 4 years per student. A new application will be required for each continuous year applied.

Achievement Award Levels are:

The Col. David E. Lownds Award - for top achievement in Application Review (one award or tie)
The Sgt. Major James T. Gaynor Award - for high achievement in Application Review (5 awards)
The Col. William H. Dabney Award - for honorable achievement in Application Review (6 awards)

The KSV Scholarship money will be awarded upon presentation of proof of registration for the appropriate term. Proof of registration should be sent to the chairman's address on page one of this application.

Scholarship Guidelines and Purpose

1. The financial award is to be used to help defray costs of tuition, fees and books at an accredited Institution of the applicant's choice as a full time student.

2. If a recipient of the KSVSF scholarship does not enter a post high school institution during the next school year, the award for his/her benefit shall be cancelled and the money awarded to an alternate applicant. An alternate of each scholarship award is to be chosen at the time of selection of recipients.

3. The KSVSF Committee Chair and the Treasurer of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., will send a check for the full years' award amount to the selected students upon final approval by the KSV President.

4. The recipient of a scholarship shall be notified no later than the end of the month of August of the coming school year.

5. Scholarship Applications must be received by the Committee Chair on or before MAY 1 of the school year applied for.  (This is an important, NEW change to previous years)

6. KSV, Inc. Scholarship recipients must agree to maintain a standard of personal performance both in and out of school that conforms to the moral standards set down by Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., members.

7. Criteria: Point Selection System !Maximum of 110 regular points or 125 with bonus points

a. Scholastic achievement / grade point average. Max =40 points max. (Please attach last school GPA transcript) example below:

MERLYN MCFEE: A SURVIVOR OF KHE SANH

MERLYN L. MCFEE, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN H&S CO 1/26
Jim Offner the Courier

WATERLOO Not even a full year out of Independence High School, Merlyn McFee found himself in the middle of the Vietnam War, with the U.S. Marines.

During my senior year, I signed up; that summer, I was heading for the Marine Corps," McFee said.

That's when the lessons began. And, once McFee was in Vietnam, in January 1968, he found the enemy to be a pretty nasty teacher.

Those lessons got under way soon after McFee arrived, first at the Phu Bai Combat Base and, about a week later at the Khe Sanh Combat Base. It was during this time the North Vietnamese Army conducted a five-month siege of the base and surrounding outposts. NVA ground, artillery, mortar and rocket attacks pelted McFee's unit for 77 straight days, and it started at almost the exact time McFee arrived for his first day, where his job was cook but "technically" was infantryman.

First day on the job -- this is the interesting part," he said. "Get up early, go to the mess hall with your M -16. Wasn't an hour later, all hell broke loose. They said, 'incoming.' We head for the trenches and they just bombarded us with everything they could. "The area was engulfed in haze the whole day, he said.

"I'm in the Foxhole and their asking me, "where's your M-16" McFee said. His weapon was in the tent. I'm scared; I had no weapon.". "Everything slowed down at the end of the day and everybody got everything together. I got my M-16. It was not a pleasant day.

"McFee said he did not understand Khe Sanh's importance to the North Vietnamese; yet, they came at the base day after day. In three days, they had their own trenches. I don't know how many of them were out there," but it was spooky. "I was told their were 6,000 of us up there

A long siege can wear on a unit, McFee said, and he and his comrades could expect anything. You see a lot of weird stuff," he said. "You get sniped at. It's an eerie feeling. You know something happened, but you don't know what. Of course, you see others getting shot at. If there was a nightmare scenario to imagine in that war, McFee said he probably saw some version of it – friends getting hit in trenches, helicopters going down, regular bombardments"

"We're setting on a flat area and, on this side, there's mountains," he said. "There was a ravine on this side, which I didn't see until we flew out of there. When I first got there, it was all green. When we left, it was all orange, because of their ground, which was kind of that color

McFee's first mission in the field was Operation Scotland. Where we were I couldn't tell you, but it was hot," he said. "When we landed by the DMZ, for us, it got kind of hot. There was real tall grass and there was more rounds coming in. Shrapnel got the last guy in my squad. Then, we kind of marched back and it started raining

McFee said patrols could be unnerving.

"Some areas are real thick," he said. "In fact, one time I almost came to shooting somebody. Our patrol came across something. We kind of sat there. through the thicket, I saw these two ARVNs . I'm scared to death. Then, I see an American with them. We were going through odd stuff. You can't see who is who.

"Sometimes, patrols had to navigate grass as tall as the soldiers, McFee said. Then, you run into thicket," he said. "Then you have open fields with grass and mounds and stuff like that. I didn't see anything on that operation."

The threat of death never seemed to abate, McFee said There are certain days you thought you were gonna die," he said" There was one night the Air Force saved us." There's no way to prepare for what might happen, McFee said. Jets would spray the ground; B-52s just rumbled, and you felt the vibrations," he said. "You slept in the trenches sometimes with your flak jacket. You just say whatever happens is gonna happen whatever you do; it's not a good feeling

When McFee and his unit weren't being bombarded, they were digging, he said. The normal thing was you knew it was coming, you did what you had to do," he said. "It almost was a safe environment because you knew what your mind was going through. Nothing was going on, but, of course, "you knew they were out there."

Other memories from Khe Sanh stand out, McFee said. "Taking showers in the rain, naked, and stuff like that," he said. "I got a Dear John letter over there and that didn't make me feel good. That was devastating at that point because you felt connected with this person

Boynton Beach Veteran Wants Dying Brother To Get On Honor Flight

By Eliot Kleinberg -
Palm Beach Post Staff Writer

When the next Honor Flight departs, Andy Mayer hopes to make it a family affair.

He has plans to escort not just his father Robert, a World War II veteran, but brother Daniel, who was in Vietnam. It's a sad reason for this longtime military family: Daniel is dying of cancer.

Since 2009, the nonprofit Stuart-based Southeast Florida Honor Flight, one of 133 such operations nationwide, has taken more than 2,100 veterans, free of charge, from Palm Beach International Airport to Washington and back.

Honor Flight operates solely on corporate and individual donations. Its four flights a year comprise a daylong trip to see the World War II Memorial, the Iwo Jima Memorial and Arlington National Cemetery.

The Mayers were scheduled to go out on Saturday, but the flight was canceled because of Hurricane Matthew. The flight was to have 56 Korean War veterans, along with 25 from World War II. The oldest vet who planned to go on the flight was 99. The youngest would have been Daniel, 68. Priorities are World War II veterans and anyone with a terminal disease.

Andy, who lives in suburban Boynton Beach, had seen news coverage of past flights, and worked to arrange for his dad, who lives in northern Broward County, and Daniel, who's still working at MacDill Air Force Base in Tampa, to go.

But he was told flights were booked up; the earliest opening was April 2017. Andy explained to organizers his concerns about his dad, 89, and his brother, fighting cancer.

"Time is of the essence, I guess you could say," he told The Palm Beach Post last week. Before Hurricane Matthew struck, space had been found.

Honor Flight Chair Todd Tucker "came back and he's, 'Hey. We made some adjustments. You're good to go for October,'" Andy said. As of press time, it was uncertain when the next flight will be scheduled.

Tucker said in a release before the cancellation that "when this special situation came to my attention, and especially in light of Daniel's exemplary military career, I knew we had to make it happen."

Daniel Mayer was a Marine from 1966 to 1968, and was in the Battle of Khe Sanh. He says he had helicopters shot down from under him a few times and was shot twice. He received two Purple Hearts and a Bronze Star. He later went back in with Army Special Forces — the Green Berets, he said last week from Tampa.

Daniel would work in Special Forces until he retired in 2003; he then stayed on as a civilian at MacDill. Now 68, he's married with two grown children.

In April 2015, he was diagnosed with a brain tumor. He had surgery as recently as August, and continues to undergo treatment.

Andy, now 60, served in the Air Force from 1976 to 1980, working search-and-rescue helicopters in sites that included Turkey, Guyana and Nicaragua. Now a civilian consultant, he's also married with two grown children.

During World War II, Robert Allen Mayer's father didn't want him to join and wouldn't grant permission. So Robert waited until he turned 17, then enlisted in the Navy. He served aboard the USS Maryland from 1945 to 1947.

His ship spent the immediate postwar period ferrying men from Pearl Harbor back to the U.S. west coast.

"They called it 'the magic carpet ride,'" Robert said last week from his Deerfield Beach home. He said he might have missed action, but he heard plenty of hair-raising stories from men whose ships had been hit by Japanese torpedoes and even Kamikaze suicide planes.

After the war, Robert worked for decades on the presses at the Columbus Dispatch newspaper in the Ohio capital. He retired to South Florida in 1978.
He says he did not push his sons into the military, and in fact tried to dissuade Daniel from joining the Marines.

"I said, 'You gotta be nuts.' I couldn't talk him out of it," Robert recalled. Whenever the flight is rescheduled, Robert hopes his day of honor with his two sons to be "very special." Daniel's and Andy's mom died at 55 around 1982, their sister at 49 around 2002. Both from cancer. Andy said he doesn't suspect heredity. If anything, he said, there's a chance Agent Orange contributed to Daniel's cancer. But, he said, "my brother won't go there. He says 'it is what it is.'"

Dialogues Show War Through Veterans' Eyes

Rebecca Burylo , Montgomery Advertiser

WETUMPKA — Marine veteran Jerry Duncan spent 77 days in a foxhole in Vietnam. Outnumbered and surrounded he was bombarded by enemy mortar shells and artillery and lived to tell about it.

JERRY DUNCAN

He talked freely about the horror he lived through to a group gathered in an Elmore County museum.

About 20 people sat in a circle Tuesday night, blending with the rich history around them as they shared personal stories of war and death. They, like the items around them, revealed well-worn snapshots of history, moments of past wars that they lived first-hand.

This past week was the second in a series called Dialogues on the Experience of War inviting people with former or active military backgrounds, spouses and relatives of veterans gathered to discover and discuss stories of service from World War I and the Vietnam War and how it correlates to their own stories of service.

Duncan arrived in Vietnam to serve in the war in 1967. He remembers the stench at Khe Sanh was "unbearable."

The stress and fear of war was even more so for some of his fellow Marines. One man stood up and yelled, "Kill me, kill me!" A bullet struck him dead. Duncan hunkered even lower in the foxhole hoping that was not his fate. To say he wasn't scared is a lie.

"War changes you. You think it's going to be glorious and fantastic and you'll go home with a chest full of medals," Duncan said. "It's not what you think. You're priorities in life change. Being warm and having three meals a day doesn't matter. You were there to survive."

Duncan left Vietnam after two tours in 1969. He was wounded and flown out after taking machine gun rounds to the back of his shoulder. He spent a year in a hospital to recover.

Dialogues on the Experience of War is a series of meetings that will go until March and will discuss a total of four books and two films. The group went over several short historic nonfiction that showed a particular aspect of war. Duncan related his story to that of "Rosa," a story of a French soldier who was overcome by the stress and fear of war and shot himself as a way to escape.

It was previously reported that 22 veterans commit suicide each day and is one of the leading causes of death among those in the military. However, new data provided by the U.S. Veteran Affairs for 2014 show 20 veterans kill themselves daily.

Maria Church is a military spouse. Her husband is currently stationed at Maxwell Air Force Base and has been deployed 10 times. She understands there is a strong connection between the military and mental health.

"War can sometimes be the trigger for those thoughts of suicide," Church said. "That's why the military has so much mental health training and suicide prevention courses."

Those thoughts are the same no matter what war a person has fought in Duncan said. "War is war."
"I have the same feelings I had 45 years ago and they have the same today whether it's Saudi Arabia or Iran," Duncan said.

JAIME VAZQUEZ, USMC KHE SANH VETERAN, DELTA CO 1/1

Jaime Vazquez, the former Jersey City councilman and longtime voice for the city's Latino and veterans

The 19th annual Memorial Day Commemoration to honor the young men from Jersey City who died as a result of the Vietnam War and those who died from war related causes after they returned home took place at the Vietnam Veterans Memorial in Pershing Field in Jersey City on Monday, May 25, 2015. Pictured: Vietnam Veteran Jaime Vazquez, 65, of Jersey City. Michael Dempsey | The Jersey Journal communities, died of a massive heart attack late last night. He was 67.

Vazquez is being remembered as a fighter for his constituents, a war hero and an unabashed social liberal. He was elected to represent Downtown on the City Council in 1985 and remained in the seat for 12 years.

"He was the Puerto Rican/Latino leader of the '60s, '70s and '80s, when Downtown was burning," said Councilman-at-large Daniel Rivera. "The guy was a true advocate."

Vazquez's death came the night before he was set to be honored along with four other Latino ex-council members at tonight's City Council meeting.

A U.S. Marine who fought in the Vietnam War as part of Delta Company, First Battalion, First Marine Regiment, Vazquez received a Purple Heart for injuries he suffered when a grenade exploded near him in Khe Sanh, according to his brother Carlos. He still walked around with pieces of shrapnel embedded in his leg.

Vazquez, who lived on Pacific Avenue with his mother, was the oldest of seven children. Carlos told The Jersey Journal that Vazquez was a "leader" even as a child.

"He was a rebel," Carlos said.

Vazquez's rebel streak never abated.

He quit as a deputy mayor under Bret Schundler in 1999 after firing off a letter to Schundler calling him "an extremist and a nut." At the time Schundler said he was surprised by the letter and called it "hysterical" in tone.

In 2006, he and controversial radio host Hal Turner scuffled after Vazquez protested outside Turner's home holding a sign calling the radio host a racist, bigot and coward. Vazquez said he broke his wrist after Turner pushed him into the street. The two men filed dueling assault claims that a municipal judge later dismissed.

Vazquez suffered a heart attack and died just before midnight on his way to Jersey City Medical Center, Carlos said. He is survived by his mother, five siblings — Carlos, Jose, Linda, Raymond, Zaida and Ricardo — and three children, Cynthia, Jaime and Anthony.

Freeholder Bill O'Dea served with Vazquez on the council from 1985 to 1993. O'Dea remembers Vazquez arguing passionately from the dais about issues that were never under the city's control, like nuclear disarmament or gun control (his title in the Schundler administration was deputy mayor of international affairs and economic development).

In the late '80s, O'Dea said, Vazquez collected several hundred dollars' worth of toy guns and had them crushed by a steamroller behind City Hall as his young son watched. Vazquez's son was not happy to watch the toys be destroyed, but his father wanted to make a point, O'Dea said.

"That was how Jaime was able to convey a message of how those toy guns ultimately created a mentality that could lead to more violent behavior as someone got older," he said. "He'll be missed."

City Clerk Robert Byrne, who has worked with dozens of council members during his time as clerk, said Vazquez "set the bar pretty high." Being a councilman, Byrne said, "was his only gig."

"That's what he did," he said. "When anyone walked in, he never asked what their address was or what ward they lived in."

In 2001, Vazquez became the head of the newly created city department of veterans affairs. He held the position for more than a decade, and he was a regular at city events honoring veterans, wearing his military cap and medals pinned to his jacket.

"The best way to describe Jaime was our Marine Corps mantra of Semper Fidelis, which means always faithful," Mayor Steve Fulop, a former Downtown councilman himself, said in a statement. "Jaime was a special kind of leader and fighter. He always put his whole heart into every issue, never backing down when he saw an injustice or a cause he believed in. He will be missed greatly by everyone who knew him."

The pride Vazquez felt in his military service is evident in a 1999 letter he wrote to The Jersey Journal and addressed to a fellow U.S. Marine killed in action in Vietnam in 1968.

"Keep an eye on us from your lofty porch,"

Vazquez wrote to the man. "We could always use the help of a good Guardian Angel. We will get to meet again, when we meet at Jesus's feet. Until then Semper Fi."

OBIT

JOHN J. KELLY, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN AND ACTIVIST

By Bryan Marquard Globe Staff
September 24, 2016

John J. Kelly's lifelong determination to help others

was apparent the first time he was injured in Vietnam and in the decades that followed when he advocated for fellow veterans in Massachusetts.

"The first time I was wounded, all I can remember is that my buddy George and I were in a foxhole behind two radio guys. Suddenly, it was like someone set off a giant firecracker in my face," he told the Globe in 1990. The radio operators died, his buddy was injured, and "I got a piece of shrapnel imbedded above my left eye," he added.

Some might have tried to turn that experience into their last battle. Not Marine Lance Corporal Kelly: "I spent the night in a hospital and returned to Khe Sanh."

He was 18 when a bullet paralyzed him in 1968 during the Vietnam War, and he spent the rest of his life offering a personal example of how to live without regrets. "He never complained about his injuries in the war," his brother-in-law George Rohlfing of Quincy said. "He always said that if he could walk again, he would enlist in the Marines again and go right back in."

Mr. Kelly, a longtime mainstay of veterans programs in Greater Boston, died Sept. 11 in the VA Medical Center in West Roxbury as his body failed after the lifelong wear from injuries he suffered. He was 67 and lived in Hyde Park.

"I remember him because he was a quiet hero as far as I was concerned," said Raymond L. Flynn, who was Boston's mayor when he shared a stage with Mr. Kelly in 1984 to announce the conversion of a vacant Roslindale school into a multiservice center for Vietnam veterans.

"Jack was a real hero. He didn't talk about what he did. He talked about the sacrifices that so many young people made there," Flynn said. "For all that he went through, and the sacrifice he made for our country, he was so quiet and unassuming. He never bragged about it; he never complained."

Mr. Kelly and a veteran friend had came up with the idea of turning the school into a place for Vietnam veterans. The center, he recalled at the 1984 ceremony, "is going to be all the things Vietnam veterans have needed, but never had. Things like vocational training and job placement and counseling. But most of all, it's going to mean recognition for the service Vietnam vets rendered the country."

"We never got it before because almost everyone who hated the war thought he had to hate the warriors," Mr. Kelly added, "but no more."

John J. Kelly Jr. wanted to be a warrior when he was growing up in Boston, the second of 13 children. His mother was the former Mary MacNeil. His father, John Sr., was in the painters' union.

"The thing with Johnny is he was pretty athletic as a kid," said his brother Jim, a retired Army sergeant major who lives in Stoughton and teaches at the Community Academy of Science and Health in Dorchester.

"He quit Hyde Park High School and joined the Marine Corps because he thought it was the right thing to do," Jim said. "People in 1966 were trying to get out of the war. He was trying to get in."

Only 17 when he enlisted, Mr. Kelly had turned 18 by the time he served in South Vietnam with the 26th Marine Regiment during the 77-day siege of Khe Sanh, which began in January 1968.

"After John survived Khe Sanh, he had an unbelievable respect for life," his brother said.

The bullet that paralyzed Mr. Kelly was fired while his company was awaiting transport for some much needed R&R, he recalled in the 1990 interview.

"It's impossible for me to relate exactly what happened," said Mr. Kelly, who didn't regain consciousness until many days after he was shot. "I only remember that there was a firefight that night, May 5th. One of our guys went berserk and was waving around a revolver. I remember reaching for him. A lot of us were reaching out to try to control him. Then, boom, his gun went off and I was hit."

Along with the Purple Heart for his earlier head wound, Mr. Kelly's many decorations include the Combat Action Ribbon, National Defense Service Medal, and Vietnam Service Medal, his family said. When Mr. Kelly returned to the United States, he initially was a quadriplegic until the swelling from the injuries subsided and feeling returned to part of his body, leaving him a paraplegic. "He was not sad, he was not depressed, he was just ecstatic to be alive, and he made a vow to himself that he was going to live life to the fullest," Jim said.

Mr. Kelly was a Boston police dispatcher until complications from his injuries curtailed his working life. He also ran unsuccessfully for state representative and coached sports. "He was a very giving person," his brother-in-law George said. "He always tried to help the community. He would be pushing people out of the way to help someone in need."

Using his sharp humor, Mr. Kelly liked to put at ease those unaccustomed to spending time with someone in a wheelchair. With football players, "He'd always say, 'Put the ball down; I'll show you how to kick it,' " his brother said. "He'd grab his leg and wave his foot around as if he was going to kick it, then he'd say, 'Oh, I can't do it. The pension guy is here.' "

At other times, Jim said, "Kids would ask him, 'Can you walk?' And he'd say, 'Yes, but I'm too rich to walk.' "

Mr. Kelly was at a party in 1972 when Jacqueline Rohlfing, who is known as Candy, walked past with one of his sisters.

"I thought she was pretty. I asked her if she wanted a Coke. She said yeah and we began to talk," Mr. Kelly said in 1990, adding: "I knew I was in love with her from the start." They married in 1976.

"He was an awesome husband," said Candy's brother George. "They were inseparable."

A service has been held for Mr. Kelly, who in addition to his wife and brother leaves three other brothers, Michael of West Roxbury, Stanley of Avon, and Daniel of Norwood; and three sisters, Peggy Mitchell of Las Cruces, N.M., and Julia Kuhn and Gail Faria, both of Stoughton.

Though Mr. Kelly was known for his courage, "Candy is the hero behind that guy," his brother Jim said. "I remember having these conversations with him and saying, 'You're truly a lucky guy.' He was lucky on a number of counts. To survive the war and to have someone like her? He was truly blessed."

And Mr. Kelly was never bitter. "Listen, I enlisted. I did the best I could," he said in 1990. "Had I been drafted, it might be a different story. But I enlisted. I'm a survivor. I'm a Marine. And I have Candy here."

OBIT

ROGER A. BULLEIGH – SERGEANT, USMC
KHE SANH VETERAN
MASS-3, MACG-18, 1st MAW, FMF Pac

Roger Bulleigh, age 69, passed away in Tulsa, Oklahoma, on Sunday, March 13th, 2016, surrounded by his large family. Roger was born on November 4th 1946, in Greeley, Colorado, and grew up there with his parents, Donald and Betty Bulleigh, his older sister Sharon, his twin sister Rita, and his little sister Janice. In his early teens they moved to Midland, Texas, where he graduated from high school in 1964. He joined the Marines on June 1st, 1964, and served until May 27th, 1968, spending two tours in Vietnam using his training in electronics, communications, radar and aviation fire control. He was present at the entire siege at Khe Sanh, from the beginning until the siege was lifted, he and his buddies maintaining the radar and calling in close air support.

Following his discharge, he lived in California for a brief time. He moved to Tulsa in 1969, where he met and married Juli Braunlich. He was the beloved father of nine children: Connie Caple, Aaron (Jacqueline) Bulleigh, Phyllis (Sean) McComb, Marla (Bradley) Hart, Joel (Kimberly) Bulleigh, Stephen (Alicia) Bulleigh, Adam (Jeannine) Bulleigh, Nathan (Jessica) Bulleigh, and Natalie (Soren) Michaelsen.

Roger was preceded in death by his parents and his father-in-law, Frank Braunlich, Jr. He is survived by his wife and children, his mother-in-law Phyllis Braunlich, sisters Sharon Herries, Rita Worley and Janice (Thomas) Gilbert, sisters-in-law Beverly Braunlich and Anita Long, and brother-in-law Thomas Braunlich, as well as his grandchildren: Blake (Michelle) Maggia; Lacy James; Joshua (Megan) Caple; Hadley, Brigette and Brandon Bulleigh; Evan, Julianna and Brigham McComb; Sophie and Chloe Hart; Raegan, Tyler, Claire and No lan Bulleigh; Thomas, Jillian, Elizabeth and Kathryn Bulleigh; Allen, Dahlia, Luke and Oliver Bulleigh; Pierce, Lauren and Lincoln Bulleigh; and Owen, Carter and Elise Michaelsen; and his great-grandchildren: Adriana and Brantley Maggia; Logan and Skylynn James; Triston Jacomine, and Madison Caple.

Roger was retired after 30 years of employment as an industrial electrician at the Ford Motor Company Tulsa Glass Plant and was an active member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. He was also a lifetime member of Disabled American Veterans.

A memorial service was held at the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in Broken Arrow, Oklahoma, on March 25th, 2016, followed by graveside service and burial with military honors later that same day at Fort Gibson National Cemetery in Fort Gibson, Oklahoma. There is an obituary page with a family video of old movies available at KennedyCares.com. Although his family will miss him immeasurably, we are relieved that his suffering has ended and we look forward to the day we can be reunited with him in love.

JOHN BLAIR INDUCTED INTO THE GEORGIA MILITARY VETERANS' HALL OF FAME

JOHN BLAIR, USMC KHE SANH VETERAN INDIA CO 3/4

October 18, 2016 by Valerie Villarreal

Longtime APRO member, rent-to-own veteran and RTO-industry vendor John Blair will be inducted into the Georgia Military Veterans' Hall of Fame in November. He was one of only 17—out of 106 nominees—to be selected for the honor this year. Prior to this year's inductees, there were only 49 other veterans in this prestigious group.

Blair, vice president of sales for PTS Direct Benefits & Tax Service, received the Hall of Fame honor for his service in the U.S. Marine Corp during what many consider one of the most harrowing periods of the Vietnam War. He served in the battle of Khe Sanh, for which he earned the prestigious Silver Star.

According to the Georgia Military Veterans' Hall of Fame board of directors, the evaluation and selection process for the Hall of Honor "was done in total secrecy and absolutely void of any outside influence. [Blair's] sterling active duty record and post military life served [him] well and gained for [him] this rare and noble honor." Recipients are awarded based on one of three categories: valor, achievement and service. Blair was honored for his valor during the Hall of Fame induction ceremony on November 5 in Columbus, Georgia.

In 1968, Blair was a member of the Third Battalion, Fourth Marines, India Co. stationed in Vietnam. APRO Executive Director Bill Keese was honored to be a spectator at a reunion of that company in 2006. One of Blair's Marine buddies told Keese, "I would follow John through hell—and I did. He got us out of that mess alive!" Others at the reunion agreed that Blair is a true hero. In an unpopular war, one in which many sought to avoid service, Blair reported for duty.

During the war's dramatic Tet Offensive, Blair's platoon came under heavy fire from a large North Vietnamese force. Blair, serving as squad leader, and his men were pinned down, but he didn't hesitate to maneuver his squad forward and launch an assault on the enemy. He was awarded the Silver Star for his leadership and for disregarding his own safety that day. After being promoted to sergeant later that year, Blair was awarded the Navy Achievement Medal.

WELCOME HOME: Town's former DPW director put engineering skills to good use in Vietnam

LEIGHTON F. "LEE" PECK USN KHE SANH VETERAN "SEABEES" CBMU-301

Former Plymouth DPW Director Lee Peck served with the U.S. Navy's Fighting Seabees in Vietnam from April 1968 to April 1969.

By Rich Harbert
rharbert@wickedlocal.com

PLYMOUTH – Leighton "Lee" Peck ran Plymouth's public works department for nearly two decades, but most people probably never knew he got his nickname in Vietnam.

Many probably never even knew he served in the war. It's a memory Peck rarely allows himself to visit.

Named Leighton for his father, a former Falmouth fire chief, Peck was known as "Junior" or "Chief" growing up on the Cape. His nickname changed forever to Lee while Peck served with the Navy in Vietnam in 1968 and 1969.

A heavy equipment operator for the Fighting Seabees, Peck would spend Sundays volunteering, using his civil engineering skills to help villagers with public works projects.

"It seemed like every kid over there was named Ly, so that's what they called me. They couldn't pronounce my name. The name 'Lee' came from Nam," Peck said.

A 1964 graduate of Lawrence High School in Falmouth, Peck earned an associate's degree in civil engineering at Wentworth Institute in 1966. He enlisted in the Navy later that same year, with the understanding that he would be able to put his skills to good use in the Seabees.

Peck spent his first year building a golf course on Midway Island. Work took a more serious turn when he landed in Da Nang in April 1968.

Assigned to the maintenance unit of a construction battalion, Peck found himself in demand because of his ability to operate heavy equipment.

Licensed to run cranes, bulldozers and earth movers, Peck spent months working on public works projects that years later, in peacetime, would become his life's work.

Lee Peck's abilities as a heavy equipment operator were in high demand in Vietnam. Lee spent most of the war at the controls of a heavy duty crane, like this one he mans at

"It was kind of a natural with my engineering degree. We did drainage and road projects. Not everyone understood about grades," Peck said.

Based out of Dong Ha, about eight miles south of the demilitarized zone, Peck spent four or five months alone assigned to a giant crane.

"Once you're assigned to something like that, you are the only one who runs it," he said. "So if they need to go 24 hours a day, you do that. If the machine was needed somewhere, you go with it."
Peck primarily used the machine to offload supplies for the troops, but as the enemy shelling of Dong Ha intensified, commanders decided to move operations farther from the border and used Peck's crane to lift huts onto trucks for the move south.

Peck's ability to operate heavy equipment landed him in Khe Sanh after the 11-week siege of the outpost ended in March 1968.

Peck's outfit was called in to help clean up the mess and dismantle the base.

The Seabees pulled up the aluminum airstrip and bulldozed bunkers in advance of the evacuation, all under harassing fire. "I buried a C-130 (airplane) there so the enemy couldn't get it, because we couldn't get it out of there. They blew the wings off it and we buried it. We did take a couple of engines but the idea was to destroy everything. All the bunkers, everything was blown up and filled in before we left," Peck said. "It was heart breaking to think we were there defending the place and then we blow it up."

By day, most Marines at the garrison stayed underground in bunkers while the Seabees did their work. At night, the Seabees would join Marines in protecting the base from attack.

"Up at Khe Sanh, every night we were on red alert, everyone was in the trenches," Peck said. "Outside the wire you could see where the enemy was digging trenches to try to get to you. There were rats out there as big as cats, supposedly because they were eating the dead NVA."

Thinking about it nearly 50 years later stills takes a toll on a man who went into the service with a goal of being constructive.

"Taking someone's life is not normal. I'm a kind soul. I like people. It's not me," Peck said. "But sometimes you're in a situation where you don't have much choice. It's either you or him."

Peck returned home in April 1969 and built on his public works experience. He earned a bachelor's degree in civil engineering on the G.I. Bill, started a family and went to work.

He served as superintendent of public works in Carver and Middleborough before taking over as director in Plymouth in 1986. He retired in 2003, but continues to work as a consultant.

Peck said he hasn't talked about the war, even to his children, since his return from Vietnam. He kept his dog tags and the attached P-38 can opener, but threw away most of his gear and photos.

A publication chronicling his Seabee unit's work in Vietnam offers the only glimpse of his service. Photos show Peck at the controls of his crane, not on guard in a trench.

"I went over there to do a job and did it the best I could," Peck said. "It makes you think about life and how precious it is. I always think how fortunate I was to come back physically and mentally undamaged."

MONOGRAPH BY "JOHNNY JAMES"

All names shown in quotation marks are fictitious. All pictures in this monograph are the property of the author and are used with his permission.

I graduated from a school where the graduates are expected not just attend college, but to excel in college. A Jesuit school, it limits enrollment to have smaller classes and attracts many of the brightest students in the area. (In my class, there was a descendent of one of the "robber barons" of the 1900s.) Of the graduates in the class of 1966, I believe I am the only one who did not go directly to college. About a week after graduation, on June 23, 1966, I was standing on the yellow footprints at Parris Island Recruit Depot I would be honorably discharged from the Marine Corps a little over six years later, on July 14,1972 - Bastille Day.

Upon completion of boot camp and training at Camp Lejeune, I was selected to attend avionics school at the Naval Air Station in Memphis, Tennessee. My hope was that I would get enough training in the Marine Corps that I could pursue a good-paying job upon discharge. During the course of avionics training, I" Sammy Sosa" (a friend and fellow Marine) and I decided that all we would learn from this training would be how to pull black boxes from airplanes. We were both looking at getting more advanced skills- skills that we could market after our time in the Marine Corps. We both decided to apply for training as ground control approach radar technicians - MOS 5951.

Classes for this MOS were held every six weeks and only a very limited number of people were accepted. One enticement to become a GCA tech was that, with this MOS, you would be entitled to what the Marine Corps called "shortage specialty pay", or what we called "proficiency pay". This was extra money paid monthly to retain people who had specialized skills that were in high demand in the Marine Corps. There were three levels of proficiency pay and MOS 5951 - GCA radar technician - was at the highest. But there was also a price to pay for attending this school- you had to extend your original four-year enlistment by two years. "Sammy" and I decided to go for it together. (While we were taking the oath to extend our enlistment by two years, I kept hearing a song by Johnny Rivers in my brain- "I Cast My Fate to the Winds".)

The school was in Glynco, Georgia, and if I remember correctly, there were six Marines and a few sailors that completed the training and were certified as GCA technicians in October 1966. Upon graduation, I was assigned to Marine Corps Air Station Quantico, Virginia. I was promptly assigned to guard duty and, in a gesture that the late Senator Specter would appreciate, I was given a single bullet and a rifle and told to protect the few planes and helicopters that were stationed at Quantico. Fortunately, my stay at Quantico was brief and I was given orders for Vietnam in mid-November.

I arrived at Da Nang on December 23, 1966. I was in Phu Bai the next day and had the worst Christmas in my life-I was kind of nonperson, isolated and alone in the Transient Barracks. During processing at Phu Bai, I was issued a rifle that had been fired so many times that it was blue. (The armorer had to pull the trigger three times to get it to fire.) The armorer told me that it was better than nothing and that I would need it where I was going. I hopped on an H-34, "a shuddering shit-house", and arrived at Dong Ha on December 28. I have two memories of that flight. The first was a fear that my seabag would fly out the open door when the pilot banked the chopper. My second memory is of the crew chief/door gunner pulling a wrench from his pocket and tightening up several connections while we were in the air. The flight left me quite a distance away from MATCU-62 and I walked past a lot of tents in which six-foot- long trenches had been dug next to the sleeping cots. This would allow a person to roll directly from the cot into the trench. When I finally got to MATCU-62, the first person I ran into was a radar technician bundled up in a field jacket with a large loaf of either French or Italian bread sticking from his pocket. The sergeant pointed me to where the living quarters were and I started my trek from the airfield to the MATCU 62 area. (The sergeant, I believe, was sent back to the states in the next few days with combat exhaustion.) During my walk to the living area, I came across some ghostly reminders of what had happened at Dong Ha, on September 3, 1967. The Marines had moved a helicopter squadron up to Dong Ha to improve support to the troops along the DMZ. The choppers- -CH 46s--were parked in revetments just north of the MATCU 62 living area.

On September 3, 1967, an artillery attack hit the Dong Ha ammunition dump. The helicopter squadron was decimated. Now, as I walked past, all that was left were the burned-in outlines of where those choppers were destroyed. My next stop was the MATCU 62 living area. MATCU 62, which-except for short stays at other locations-would be my home until August 1969. More precisely, MATCU 62 Dong Ha would be my home-Khe Sanh was too deadly a place to ever be called "home". I was a 19-year-old lance corporal (probably the lowest ranking person in the Marine Corps with my MOS) with little field experience, a peasant boy from the big city stationed in an area which would soon become the focus of the Vietnam War.

Before I go into detail about my experiences in Vietnam, it is important that you know about "the lights". I've often thought of life as rows of brightly colored lights planted in our bodies. Red lights, green lights, yellow lights, white lights, orange lights, blue lights every color of light that you could imagine. When we are born, all of these lights are as bright as can be. As we go through life, some of the lights dim, some of them burn out. Certain experiences, such as having a child, would make the lights shine brightly. Other experiences - and you can name them for yourselves - would dim the lights and sometimes burn them out entirely. In Vietnam, as in all wars, to survive, I believe, you had to control which of these lights are on and how bright they would be. To do this, you had to, in essence, numb yourself, closing off certain experiences from fully registering in your brain. Psychic numbing is what I believe the professionals call it. If the lights were too bright all or most of the time, you would go mad. After all, how could you continually ingest the madness that is war-the organized mass killing of strangers by strangers- without going mad? There was also danger if the lights were too dim - the danger of becoming a stone cold killer, impervious to the feelings of both yourself and others. To survive, you had to keep the lights functioning at a level that made you recognize the danger, yet not paralyze you with fear. If you could achieve that equilibrium, you would be able to perform your duties, while maintaining your humanity as the madness continually tried to engulf you. The key to survival as a human being was to keep some lights on brightly and to keep other lights dimmed.

I got lucky that first day at Dong Ha. The hooch I was assigned to was the northernmost one, the one closest to the area where the Marine helicopter squadron was destroyed on September 3. Because of the devastation caused by that attack, an underground bunker with bunk beds and a wooden floor was built next to the hooch. It was the only one of its kind in the compound. It was the safest place in all of MATCU 62's living area. It was a place where Marines who lived in other hooches would crowd into during barrages. But I was lucky because, in addition to having an underground bunker, the hooch was also home to a number of memorable people. There was a lively, full-of- life radio tech who made everyone feel at home. There was a veteran controller who everybody respected. And there was me and Sgt. Mac, who, like me, was a "Nicky New Guy".

Dong Ha received its share of shelling during January and February 1968. The barrages were regular enough that you either slept in your flak jacket or in a location or position where you were half of a body roll away from putting your flak jacket on. I remember my first artillery barrage, both Sergeant Mac and I were slow in getting from the hooch to the bunker. We were told about it in no uncertain terms by others in the hooch who had lived through September 3.

This bunker was constructed next to my hooch. Bunks were built in the bunker so everyone in my hooch could sleep in the bunker.

I was comfortable and confident in my work at Dong Ha, as the equipment I worked on (TPN-8) was the same that I had trained on. Although we had heard that the NVA were planning to attack Dong Ha (The Battle of Dai Do) and, although we were taking incoming on a fairly regular basis, the attention of the whole unit was focused on Khe Sanh.

We heard about the NVA using tanks and there were even rumors of North Vietnamese jets in the area. But it was the casualties that told us what was happening at Khe Sanh. Captain Flahive was killed and Sgt. Mac was seriously wounded when a piece of shrapnel went through his jaw. Soon enough, there were enough casualties that it was evident that another 5951 would have to go to Khe Sanh. The only 5951s left in our outfit were a senior enlisted man - a master sergeant I think - and me. I went into the master sergeant's office and told him, "It's my turn to go." Obviously, the people in charge were hesitant about sending me to Khe Sanh, where keeping the GCA radar operating was Priority 00. After all, I was a 19-year-old lance corporal with little field experience and GCA operations were vital in the resupply effort at Khe Sanh. Shortly after my visit with the master sergeant, it was decided that I would go to Khe Sanh, but another, more experienced, 5951 from Chu Lai would also be assigned as my backup.

Everyone knew how dangerous it was getting into and out of Khe Sanh. Helicopters were called "mortar magnets" because of the incoming fire they attracted. For that reason, the 5951 from Chu Lai and I would go to Khe Sanh on separate helicopters. I was the only passenger on the CH 46 that brought me to Khe Sanh. The crew chief explained that the chopper was also carrying an external load, an artillery piece, and that, so as to not attract incoming, the chopper would drop off the artillery piece, and then gain altitude. Hopefully, by gaining altitude, the NVA gunners would be fooled into thinking that there were no passengers on board for them to fire at. The crew chief explained that then the chopper would descend rapidly with just the back wheels touching the ground. He would then partially lower the ramp and give me the sign to disembark. That's how I entered Khe Sanh - stumbling off the ramp, burdened down with not just my equipment but with replacement cable. Oh yeah, the deception worked-there was no incoming.

When I reached the MATCU 62 area, one of my most important duties was to deliver eyeglasses to the OIC, Captain "John Paul Jones" (Some officers you just called Captain Jones or Captain Smith, but this officer was always "Captain "John Paul Jones" to me.)

My first impression of Khe Sanh was that it was like a city garbage dump. There was debris everywhere. It would remain that way for a long time. Stories about the and the bombardments at Khe

Well known picture, Note in this version several windows are missing and sandbags are on the roof.

Sanh have often been told-there is no need for me to repeat them. My most vivid memories of Khe Sanh are the short vignettes that follow. Most reflect incidents during which "the lights changed".

I remember the first time I was shot at. Not the first artillery fire, not the first mortar fire, not the first rocket fire, but the first time I was fired at by aimed rifle fire. I had had to climb above the sandbags protecting the equipment to do a repair. Immediately, I heard zing, zing, zing, and poc, poc, poco Having pulled targets on the rifle range, I knew these were bullets flying past me. I jumped down and said as much to myself as to anyone, "They're shooting at me! They're trying to kill me, me!" Artillery fire was fired at "to whom it may concern". This was different-this was enemy fire intended-in no uncertain terms-for Johnny J. James." This made the lights burn brighter and suddenly I wasn't as numb as I was before this happened. I could get killed here.

Whenever I went out to work on the equipment, I always stuffed some food in my pockets. That way, I could stay behind the sandbags rather than risk running for the underground bunker. I believed that, if the first barrage didn't get you, you are better off lying behind cover rather than running for a trench or bunker. I figured that if I stayed behind the sandbags that surrounded the equipment, they would have to score direct hit (or near direct hit) for me to be injured. My chances of survival would be better than if I gave them a moving target, a moving target in the open. The first time the sergeant from Chu Lai saw me sit out a barrage by opening a can of peaches and some crackers, he thought I was crazy. But the next day, I believe, he had stuffed some food in his pants also. The sergeant stayed at Khe Sanh for a week. He told the decision-makers that his presence at Khe Sanh was unnecessary and that I could handle the job.

The closest I ever came to getting killed was on Easter Sunday, April 14. Shorty, plus a sergeant who was a diesel mechanic, and I were hanging around what passed for a control tower. (It was actually a ground-level, small metal "enclosure" surrounded by sandbags.) Shorty was using a portable radio to control air traffic. We were out in the open when the first rounds came in, virtually on top of us. We scurried to the closest protected area, a sandbagged entryway to so-called "control tower". It was about 25 feet away, and we got there just as the second barrage of incoming hit. Shorty, the sergeant, and I crouched behind a row of sandbags. The sergeant had been hit in the finger and he didn't stay long. He ran for the underground bunker. Shorty and I stayed behind the sandbags as he worked the aircraft. After about 15 minutes, the barrage appeared to be over. Shorty and I ran to the underground bunker, each of us holding one end of the radio. We were told later, that no more than 30 feet in front of us, some Army guys were killed.

" Jimmy Jones" and I were escorting one of our casualties, a walking wounded case, to the medevac chopper. We were asked to help load the bodies of dead Marines on the CH 46. They were in body bags and on stretchers. After we had loaded about five or six, the floor of the helicopter was filled. As we started to climb the ramp and load the next body, I was on the back end of the stretcher and pulled the stretcher back. "Jimmy" turned around and looked at me-he knew what I was thinking. He said matter-of-factly, "We stack them." I hesitated but then started stacking the stretchers of dead Marines until all the stretchers were loaded. For me, this was another one of those "changing lights" times. Intellectually, I realized the need to get as many bodies on board the chopper so that they would make as few trips as possible and minimize their exposure to enemy fire. Emotionally, it just didn't seem right. After all, just a short while ago, all of these bodies were living, breathing, human beings. Now, we were treating them like pieces of wood, to be stacked and transported like any other piece of cargo. Maybe too many lights were still burning bright in me and I wasn't as numb as I should be. It was a rough time for me emotionally that night.

The scuttlebutt was that we were abandoning Khe Sanh either Easter weekend or the following week. In preparation for this move, I started to pull up the cables that were buried underground. It was during this work that I experienced another incident in which "the lights" and the psychic numbing were not in balance. A sergeant who was supposed to help me tear out the cables refused to go beyond the opening of the underground bunker. He had been lightly wounded before, but now he would not venture even one step beyond the threshold of the underground bunker. I lost a lot of respect for that person that day.

As it was, the scuttlebutt was false. We were not pulling out of Khe Sanh in the near future. It was during this time, that a young lieutenant came up from Dong Ha to take care some of the administrative duties - my memory says the matter concerned payroll. Anyway, when I reported to him, he stopped and said, "I just want to shake your hand." I don't know if that lieutenant remembers that incident today, but he should know that it was greatly appreciated by me at the time, and has become more treasured by me with every passing day.

In May, I was relieved by Sgt. "Baker" for about a month. I guess I just had too much of continuously living underground. I returned to Khe Sanh in early June, just in time for the closing of Khe Sanh on June 23, 1968. That date-June 23, 1968-was exactly 2 years to the day that I first put my feet on the yellow footprints at Parris Island. It had been some journey.

Back at Dong Ha, the next months seemed almost tranquil. We got our share of incoming but it was not as intense or as frequent as at Khe Sanh. The work seemed more normal but, because I was still a lance corporal and the other techs (even the new guys) outranked me, I still pulled guard duty for a month and had to burn the shitters, etc. The one reprieve was that I was assigned 30 days of temporary duty at Monkey Mountain (Hill 647) where some of the United States most sophisticated and sensitive radar equipment was located. (The Vietnamese, whose access to the top of the mountain was restricted, thought that we had "our gods" located on that hill.) In December 1968, I extended my tour by six months so that I could go home for Christmas. I didn't want to spend another lousy Christmas in Vietnam.

When I returned from leave, not much it changed. Rather than working in the job I was trained to do, I was assigned to mess duty for 30 days. Because I was still collecting proficiency pay, I was probably the highest paid enlisted man on mess duty. My time in Vietnam ended late August 1969 when I was given two days' notice that I would be part of the first wave of Marines to be pulled out of Vietnam. I was glad that I was not part of MATCU 62's move south.

My next four years in the Marine Corps were pretty routine, except for the fact, that exactly one year to the day that I was in Travis Air Force Base coming home from Vietnam, I was again in Travis Air Force Base headed to MCAS Iwakuni, Japan. Supposedly, there was an "urgent need" for 5951 sat Iwakuni. The "urgent need" resulted in my being assigned as the night-time Duty NCO-checking in Marines before midnight to ensure they hadn't violated Cinderella liberty.

The other notable occurrence in my last four years in the Marine Corps was when, in protest of the continuing Vietnam War, I mailed back my decorations to President Nixon. My protest was not unlike that of the previous year by the Vietnam Veterans Against the War (WAW). Mail call was quite an occasion on the day I received a return package from the White House. Everyone in the unit, senior staff and the OIC included, waited around in the hanger until I came in from the field. Everyone wanted to see what was in the small packet that had "The White House" emblazoned on it. Inside were my decorations and a brief note signed by a White House staffer, Michael B. Smith. The note was short, polite, and a bit dismissive. The note was 35 words long, of which 17 were three letters long or less. The following two short paragraphs summarize my reflections on my time in Vietnam.

I am glad the Vietnam Wall was built and I have supported it financially over the years. It serves the vital purpose of reminding everyone that war is not statistics, war is not sophisticated equipment, and that war is certainly not a scorecard of battles won and lost. The Wall reminds us all that war is the killing of individuals-men and women with names, with families. But, as much as I think the Wall is proper, fitting, and necessary, I will not go and see the Wall. I need no reminders of the sorrow and suffering of Vietnam. I need no reminders of the effects of the Vietnam War. Too many of my lights are still dimmed by the Vietnam War.

As for my military service in Vietnam, my feelings are best captured by lyrics of an old 1970s tune by Melanie, some of which are:

Look what they've done to my brain.
Look what they've done to my soul, Ma.
Look what they've done to my soul
Yeah they tied it up in a plastic bag and they shook me upside down, Ma.
Look what they've done to my soul, Ma.
Look what they've done to my soul.

Look what they've done to my song, Ma.
Look what they've done to my song.
Well, it's the only thing I can do half right and it's come out all wrong, Ma.
Look what they've done to my song.

Look what they've done to my brain, Ma.
Look what they've done to my brain.
Yeah they picked it like a chicken bone and I think I'm half insane, Ma.

This is a long shot looking North from Khe Sanh. Hill 950 and Hill 1015 are clearly visable as the terrain feature known as the "Witch's Tit".

OBIT

Col. John E. Davis, U.S. Air Force (retired) passed away on Wednesday, Oct. 19, 2016 in Fairhope, Alabama.

Col. Davis was born on July 4, 1929 at a coal-mining camp in Farmington, West Virginia, and graduated from East Fairmont High School in 1947. In 1948, he began a 29-year career in the U.S.A.F. He completed pilot training and was commissioned in 1951. He retired as a full colonel in 1977.

He earned a master's of science degree in personnel management from Troy State University in 1978. Following his military retirement, he became a corporate pilot until retiring again in 1991.

He is survived by his wife, Sarah F. Davis; his children, Carol Jo Davis and Jennifer (Kevin) O'Neil in Atlanta, Georgia, Christine Davis in Zionsville, Indiana; and his former wife, Josephine Davis. Also surviving are grandchildren, Nancy Hudson and Sarah (Brian) Horne; and five great-grandchildren.

Col. Davis was an "American hero" and "patriot." He had service during the Korean and Vietnam conflicts. His decorations include the Legion of Merit, three Distinguished Flying Crosses, the Bronze Star and 10 Air Medals. He was twice awarded the Vietnam Cross of Gallantry, with two silver stars. His service ribbons display 10 battle stars.

During more than 40 years as a pilot he amassed more than 15,500 hours flying, including more than 1,300 flown in actual combat. He has more combat hours than any other pilot serving in the Korean and Vietnam conflicts.

His noteworthy assignments include commander, 314th Tactical Airlift and wing commander at Little Rock Air Force Base, the largest combat wing in the world with 95 C-130 aircraft. He also served as commander, 16th Special Operations Squadron in Ubon, Thailand, equipped with 16 heavily armed AC-130 gunships.

Other noteworthy accomplishments include flying the first-ever typhoon penetrations in a C-130 aircraft and flying the first C-130 gunship. Col. Davis delivered emergency helicopter fuel to Khe Sanh regional combat base while under siege and heavy fire by the Viet Cong.

He spent five consecutive years, from 1968 to 1972, in direct support of the Vietnam conflict. Through his missions, he saved countless allied and American lives.

SEMPER FIDELIS

BY JOHN "DOC" NUNN
USN, KHE SANH VETERAN KILO CO 3/4

This Latin phrase can mean always faithful or always loyal, but it it meant to us Marines back in Vietnam nearly 50 years ago was a lot more practical a helluva lot more personal. For one of my beloved brother Marines, Michael "Red" Reagan, the notion of being always faithful, or always loyal, did not cease being a mission once he escaped the hell of war and returned home to the U.S.A. Indeed, Mike continued to remain forever loyal and faithful all these years later thanks to his amazing labor of love, the Fallen Heroes ,www.fallenheroesproject.org
On National Medal of Honor Day here in the U.S., March 25 2015, Mike was awarded the prestigious Congressional Medal of Honor for Service, known as the Citizen Service Before Self Honors Medal, with the historic landmark, Arlington National Cemetery, serving as amazing backdrop. I am proud to say that I had the privilege to personally witness this incredible honor for my brother Marine, Michael Reagan. In fact, this was one of the proudest days of my life because a brother Marine, a Vietnam veteran, was being lauded for continuing to fulfill the solemn promise that we all made to each other as kids in a foreign land 50 years ago: he remains eternally faithful and loyal to his brothers in Arms. Frankly, I felt that we all were having that amazing medal placed und our collective necks when the medal was placed upon Mike!

In Vietnam, we did not necessarily know who the enemy was, and often times, we did not see the enemy, but we sure as hell knew who our allies were: more often than not, the only ally that we could count on was the brother Marine that stood side by side with us in the jungle, or on the hill, or in the foxhole, as we tried to help each other survive one more second in hell. As a Corpsman, I knew that my brothers counted on me to have their back, and they knew that I would never let a brother Marine down. I ran into more mortar attacks and firefights than I care to remember, but I always did it without hesitation because I knew that my brothers needed me. Whether a brother Marine was injured, or near death, I was there as a Corpsman to do all that I could to dress a wound, to administer morphine to dull excruciating pain, or to prepare a body to be removed from the battle field. I did it because I knew that my brothers would never hesitate to be there for me, if I ever needed their help. We were, indeed, always faithful, and always loyal to each other, and Mike was no different back than, and he remains no different today.

Michael Reagan, a corporal in Vietnam that we called "Red" due to his striking red hair, did not leave the notion of Semper Fidelis behind in Vietnam when he was lucky enough to come home in 1968. Indeed, Red has remained loyal to the cause of the USMC all these years later. In 2004, Mike founded the Fallen Heroes Project as his way of showing respect and love for all U.S. Military personnel, men and women, that made the ultimate sacrifice by laying down their lives in the name of our country's continued freedom. Red does this through his amazing artistic ability: Mike gave up a great job with the University of Washington to begin the humble task of hand-drawing custom portraits of our nation's Fallen Heroes in the basement studio of his home in Edmonds WA.

For the last eleven years and counting, Mike has completed nearly 4,600 of these breathless works of art with hundreds of thousands of sketching pencils in that magical right hand. Once a portrait is completed, Red, through the Fallen Heroes Project and the Michael G. Reagan Portrait Foundation, mails it to the Fallen Hero's surviving Gold Star family, absolutely free of charge, as a solemn gesture of sending the hero back home. Mike's gifts of art become so much more than beautiful portraits of deceased loved ones when they arrive at their intended destination; indeed, they become gifts of absolute love that bring the grieving Gold Star families a renewed sense of dignity, love, respect, closure, peace, and hope. And after all these years, while drawing in the solitude of the basement studio of his Edmonds, WA home, Red still is going strong: he always is hard at work, sketching the next Fallen Hero that he shall never forget, long after the last stroke of his pencil meets the canvas upon which the hero is forever immortalized.

The impetus for Mike's loyalty to Brothers in Arms that he never knew was one moment in time from 47 years ago, it was a morning in Vietnam that neither Red nor I shall ever forget as long as we both shall live. Back on March 28, 1968, nearly forty-seven years to the day before Mike received his well-earned Citizen Service Before Self Honors medal, Red and the rest of the platoon from Kilo Co., 3rd Battalion, 4th Marines, were guarding the District Headquarters in Carn Lo, Vietnam, near the DMZ.

The morning began like nearly every other morning during our time in that particular region of 'Nam: our company driver, LCPL Vincent B. Santaniello, a 19 year old kid from Jamaica, Queens (New York) that we affectionately called "Saint," greeted us on yet another run from Dong Ha headquarters. Saint brought the Marines many things on his runs, but most importantly, he brought some sanity into an absolutely insane freaking world because he brought us our most prized possessions in Vietnam: mail from our loved ones back home! Saint was a great kid and he was loved by all of his brother Marines: he was funny as hell and a wise guy in a fun way. Most importantly, like all of us, he was loyal: Saint didn't let mine-laden roads, or mortar attacks, keep him from performing his duties.

On March 28, 1968, Vinny's jeep arrived at our location. As he exited his jeep, carrying our loved ones' mail, the unexpected happened: we suddenly were under attack from the north. There was sort of an unwritten rule in Vietnam: attacks typically were done under the cover of darkness, or at least dusk. However, this day was different, as the NVA surprised us with a mortar strike, with rockets and artillery raining down on our position. Our platoon, including Red, instinctively jumped into the relative safety of the foxholes as the shells of hell whistled through the air towards us. Unfortunately, Saint was caught too far from a foxhole and too far from his jeep as the mortars rapidly approached him with unforgivingly deadly accuracy.

Soon after the ground stopped shaking and the explosions ceased, I heard the exclamation that I came to both fear and expect during my tour in Vietnam: CORPSMAN UP! The man calling for my assistance? Red. Why? Well, to my eternal sadness and chagrin, he was holding our beloved Saint in his arms, and Vinnie clearly was mortally wounded. However, that didn't stop Tony "Doc" Milazzo and me trying to save Saint's life. Saint was badly wounded, obviously, but he still was alive, so Doc Milazzo and I were doing what we could to stop the tremendous bleeding while administering pain-killing morphine. All of this took place while Red held Saint in his arms. Vinnie looked up at Mike and uttered his [mal words while Doc Milazzo and I tried in vain to save his life: "Mike, I just want to go home." With that, our beloved brother was gone.

Mike explained to me many years later that this moment, frozen in time, inspired him to give up his job at the University of Washington three and a half decades later to begin the Fallen Heroes Project. Vinnie wanted to go home that fateful morning of March 28, 1968, but the war ensured that he would not. Miraculously, Mike got to send Vinnie home 47 years later, on Easter Sunday of 2014, of all days, but not without an amazing exchange between him and me.

An ABC affiliate in the Seattle, WA area had done a special internet story on Mike, in early 2014. The reporter asked Michael about his inspiration for the Fallen Heroes Project, but the decades had caused Mike to forget the name of his muse! Mike could see Saint's face, as it was etched in his memory, and he clearly recalled that the young Marine that died in his arms was the Kilo Co. driver, but he could not remember his name. Mike called me and asked if I recalled the name of our company driver. Without hesitation, I exclaimed, "Saint ... Vinnie Santaniello!" Mike asked how I recalled the name without hesitation and I advised him that it was easy: I had been wearing a KIA bracelet to honor Saint for decades!

Armed with the name of his brother Marine, Mike turned to the ABC reporter and advised him of Saint's full name and the belief that Saint hailed from New York. Soon thereafter, the intrepid ABC News reporter found Saint's remaining family in New York all those years later, and Vinny's nephew, Ralph Vincent Morales (his middle name serves to honor the uncle that died 18 months before he was born in July 1969) joined Mike in WA for the 10th Anniversary of the Fallen Heroes Project. Thankfully, I was there, too, and I was fortunate enough to witness Mike send Vinnie home as Ralph accepted Mike's amazing portrait of his late uncle.

Vinnie's death had not been in vain; rather, it served as an inspiration. Vinnie's death inspired Mike decades later to send other Fallen Heroes home to their loved ones. Saint's death continues to serve as a beacon of hope to this day through Mike's Fallen Heroes Project, as countless thousands of Gold Star families gain a sense of love, dignity, respect, peace, and closure - despite their profound sadness and loss - in the form of a unique hand-drawn portrait from the desk of one Michael Reagan. Incredibly, Saint's dying words continue to serve as a beacon to Mike today, as he sends heroes like Vinnie "Saint" Santaniello home every day of the week.

Fittingly, Saint's portrait received first class treatment on its trek home from Seattle to New York. The portrait and frame were much too large to store in an overhead bin, or under the airplane seat. Ralph explained his predicament to the crew at the gate and they told him that they'd see what they could do to accommodate the special cargo. Minutes later, the captain of the plane emerged from the gate, gestured for Ralph to approach, and told him, "It would be my honor to have your uncle's portrait stay with us in the cockpit for his ride home." And with that, Saint received firsts class, hero accommodations in the cockpit for the red eye flight from Seattle to New York!

On March 25,2015, virtually 47 years after holding his fallen brother, and hearing his final words, Michael G. Reagan - Red - received an incredible honor from the country that he served so valiantly a generation ago. I'm not ashamed to say that tears welled up in my eyes when the Citizen Service Before Self Honors medal nestled against Mike's chest that day because a brother Marine was getting his due. It was as if I was up there getting that medal, and Saint, and Doc Milazzo, and nearly 60,000 other brave souls that were not able to make it home from Vietnam. Michael Reagan is an angel walking amongst us and his unflinching devotion to bringing such peace and dignity to Gold Star families around our nation is a gift of untold riches. You see, Mike's art, his life's calling, brings Fallen Heroes home. Mike did not just pay lip service to the USMC credo of Semper Fi decades ago while in the Marine Corp.

You have to understand: Michael "Red" Reagan lives Semper Fi each and every day in continued service to his country by virtue of the amazingly spiritual impact his artwork has on Gold Star families and beyond. And he's got a Citizen Service Before Self Honors medal around his neck to prove it!

OBIT

GEORGE "MICKEY" HEARN USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN, DELTA CO 1/26

George "Mickey" Hearn, age 68, of Gulfport, passed away on October 20, 2016.

The funeral service was held October 26th, 2 PM at Riemann Funeral Home Gulfport, MS, If you wish you may offer condolences to his son Ryan phone number 228 297 2414, or the funeral home web site. attached is the obituary.

He was preceded in death by his father, Robert Harold Hearn, a brother, Robert Stanley Hearn, and a sister, Sherry Cupit Darnell.

Survivors include his wife, Gail Morgan Hearn, 4 children, Ryan (Dawn) Hearn, Morgan Hearn, Amber Hearn (Eric) Spurgeon, and Lauren Hearn (Barret) Biandis, 7 grandchildren, Tyler, Haley, Brennon, Jaren, Sinclaire, Brianna, and Sutton, his mother, Dorothy Wood Lindsay, a sister, Lynn Wood Moore, a brother, Ray Wood, and other relatives and friends.

Mickey was born 1948 in Laurel, MS., and a graduate of R.H. Watkins High School. Mickey and his wife, Gail Morgan, and their four children, lived in Laurel until 1987. They then relocated to Nashville and in 1990 moved to Gulfport.

Mickey, a veteran of the Vietnam War, served in the U.S. Marine Corp., Delta Co,1st Battalion 26th Marine Division, where he received two Purple Hearts, the Vietnamese Cross of Gallantry, and other medals of commendations during the Siege of Khe Sanh.
After his military service, he spent 30 years in the transportation and moving industry. He later became a Regional Sales Representative for Electric Mobility selling durable medical equipment to the VA hospitals across the south until his retirement.

Friends and family called him Mickey, and all 7 grandkids called him Papaw. Regardless of what you called him, Mickey was a wonderful and loving husband to his wife of 49 years Gail, and the best father anyone could ask for to his 4 children Ryan, Morgan, Amber, and Lauren. There was never a shortage of hugs and kisses for each one of his grandchildren and they all made sure to come give Papaw some love anytime they were around him. Mickey was warm, loving, and he always made everyone feel welcome. The only thing bigger than his heart and personality is the void that is left within all of us now that he is gone. Everyone that knew and loved Mickey will carry with them the memory of his bright smile, big heart and boisterous laugh, and for this we can all be thankful. We can only hope that small part will be enough to lessen the void that has been left in his passing.

Memorials may be sent to The Wounded Warrior Project or St. Jude Children's Research Hospital .

CITIZENS TO HOLD LONG OVERDUE "WELCOME HOME" PARADE FOR VIETNAM VETERANS

WELCOME HOME: Wayne Moore was posthumously awarded the Silver Star for his gallantry at Khe Sanh

By Rich Harbert
rharbert@wickedlocal.com

This is part of an ongoing series profiling local veterans of the Vietnam War. The town will recognize Vietnam veterans this November with a long overdue "Welcome Home" celebration on Veterans Day.

Wayne Moore liked playing army growing up in Plymouth late 1950s and early 1960s.

As a young man, he became the ultimate warrior, a fearless Marine whose heroics in Vietnam earned him one of the nation's highest military honors. Moore received the Silver Star for spearheading a decisive assault on entrenched enemy machine gunners in the battle of Khe Sanh. But it came at the ultimate price, posthumously.

Moore was one of four young men from Plymouth who died in the line of duty in Vietnam. Thanks to his squad leader in Vietnam and, more recently, fellow veterans in Plymouth, his courage will never be forgotten.

Born in California, Moore moved to his mother's hometown of Plymouth when he was 11. He joined the Marine Corps after graduating from high school here in 1965.

He enlisted in the Marine Corps the following spring. In December 1966, he was sent to Vietnam, a lance corporal with the first platoon of B Company of the First Battalion's 26th Marine Regiment. He was 21 when he died on March 30, 1968.

The newspaper, at the time, reported he had been killed in action by hostile fire in the vicinity of Quang Tri. He was thought to be the second local casualty of the war. He was buried that April in Vine Hills Cemetery and, for decades, little was known of his heroic service.

Though he married a local woman before shipping overseas, Moore was something of an enigma, even to fellow schoolmates and servicemen.

Ken Medeiros, who graduated a year after Moore and served with the Army's 101st st Airborne Division in Vietnam, remembers Moore as big and strong but quiet.

"He always dressed in black. Black boots, black shirt, black leather jacket. He looked like a tough guy, but I think inside he was just a regular kid," Medeiros said. "He liked to play army games when he was younger. He played a lot of war games."

Medeiros was one of several local veterans who helped create a permanent memorial to the town's four fallen Vietnam heroes in Memorial Hall several years ago.

They built a shadow box with Moore's known medals, but the exhibit will be getting an addition soon. Despite issuing a public plea for information about Moore several years ago, local veterans were able to find scant information about the Marine's service until just this week, when an Internet search revealed Moore had received the Silver Star, the nation's third-highest military decoration for valor, for his conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity in action. A copy of the citation explains that Moore's heroics occurred while B Company engaged a North Vietnamese Army battalion entrenched in a fortified bunker complex near Khe Sanh.

"When his squad became pinned down by intense automatic weapons and mortar fire in the initial moments of the fire fight, Lance Corporal Moore unhesitatingly moved across 25 meters of open terrain and aggressively assaulted an enemy bunker, destroying two hostile positions and killing two North Vietnamese soldiers," the citation reads.

"As the Marine launched an attack, he repeatedly disregarded his own safety to assist the wounded and provide suppressive fire for the advancing men. While he was maneuvering across the open terrain fearlessly attempting to draw the hostile fire way from his squad, Lance Corporal Moore was mortally wounded. By his courage, aggressive fighting spirit and selfless devotion to duty, Lance Corporal Moore inspired all who observed him and upheld the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and the United States Naval Service. He gallantly gave his life in the service of his country."

Steve Wiese was Moore's squad leader that day. Reached this week at his home in Lincoln, California, Wiese said he thinks of Moore and the many other friends and comrades he lost in Vietnam all the time.

"I think of him probably daily," Wiese said. "My time in Vietnam is not something I think of occasionally. I think of it daily, and nightly of course. I had the honor of serving with some amazing men."

Wiese said he was scheduled to leave Khe Sanh the day Moore was killed, but decided to stay on to lead his men into what became known as the payback patrol.

A month earlier, on Feb. 25, 1968, the Marines had lost dozens of men when they stumbled into the enemy ambush just outside the base perimeter. Marines are known from always carrying their casualties from the battlefield, but several of the men were left behind that day.

"They became known as the ghost patrol, because we feel like these guys are still out there patrolling," Wiese said.

On March 30, 1968, the Marines launched an attack to retrieve their dead, but almost immediately came under heavy fire.

Wiese recalls how Moore spearheaded the attack.
"He literally jumped out of the trench line and charged the enemy trench line single handedly," Wiese said. "He charged an enemy machine gun bunker head on and he kept on charging and shooting even though he was hit three or four times that I saw."

Moore's heroics prompted another member of the squad to charge as well.
Author (pronounced Arthur) Smith followed Moore and made it into the enemy bunker. The last Wiese saw of him, Smith was engaged in hand-to-hand combat with an enemy soldier. Like Moore, Smith died in the attack. Like Moore, he received the Silver Star posthumously.

Wiese, a corporal at the time, said he put both men up for the Medal of Honor, noting how their gallantry led the rest of the platoon to attack and defeat the enemy, and reclaim their fellow Marines' remains.

"I had major respect for that guy. He was a great Marine and seemed like a good guy in general. He was in my bunker with me so we spent a lot of time in close proximity. We spent many a day and night getting rocketed and mortared, so there weren't many secrets," Wiese said. "Wayne was amazingly courageous. He had no fear."

Big and strong as an ox, Moore rarely spoke of his life back home and planned to make a career of his service in the Marines, Wiese said.

"I can remember him also saying he was a warrior at heart and believed that he belonged in combat," Wiese said. "He said he wasn't going to leave Vietnam. This war wasn't going to end for him. He truly believed he was a combat soldier."

Wayne Moore will be among the nearly 180 men and women honored Nov. 11 as the town recognizes its Vietnam veterans with a long overdue welcome home.

VIETNAM POW: 'I'LL ALWAYS BE THERE'

It's been nearly 50 years since Dennis Thompson was captured by North Vietnamese forces as a prisoner of war. But he still sees the black enclosed room with no light where they kept him. For five years - he counted 1,864 days - the Vietnamese imprisoned him, 850 days of which were in continuous solitary confinement.

"I'll always be there," the 74-year-old veteran said.

Thompson, who now lives in Olympia, was one of more than 15 veterans who attended an event to honor paws at a home on Bunker Hill west of Longview on Saturday. Jeanette Brusco, whose deceased husband was Thompson's uncle, organized the event to mark national POW Recognition Day on Friday.

For Thompson, being a POW was no romantic notion. It was permanent damage. "It ain't like in the movies," he said. 'When somebody really stomps your a-, you don't run off with a heroine to the sunset."

February 1968 was when the North Vietnamese captured Thompson, along with a handful of other American soldiers, at the Lang Vei Special Forces camp in South Vietnam near the border of Laos.

Thompson, then a staff sergeant on the Mobile

Strike Force, was 5-foot-6, 165 pounds before his imprisonment. Five years later, he was 90 pounds. It began with interrogations and torture. His captors beat him, broke three of the fingers on his right hand, cut his bicep with wire, tied his elbows together and wound them tighter until his collarbone broke out of his chest.

Thompson said he never stopped trying to escape. Any brief slip from the guards - a sneeze, a glance in the other direction - and he would bolt.

And then the war ended. In February 1973, the International Control Commission gathered the remaining paws onto its aircraft. Thompson flew out of Vietnam and into the Clark Air Base in the Philippines, where he requested a Coke chilled to 33 degrees. The cooks used a C02 fire extinguisher to do it. "I slammed that thing down, and it was heaven," he said.

He spent half that day in the shower. He ate steak and eggs for breakfast. He had filet mignon, eggs and toast, then threw up outside.

And then they took him to San Francisco. There was his country, his wife, his two children who didn't know him. "They might as well have beamed me to a new planet. I didn't recognize a damn thing," he said. "Nobody knew I was alive until two weeks before I got home. You think it'd be, 'Oh thank God he's alive: It was more like, 'Oh s--.'"

About a year later he was divorced and a few years later remarried. Eventually he transferred to Fort Lewis in Tacoma as a first sergeant- the "high point of my existence" - near his hometown of Portland, Ore. But Thompson will never fully move on, he said. He wears a silver bracelet on which "Daniel Phillips" is engraved, the name of the last POW missing in action in Thompson's 5th Special Forces Group and never found.

And Thompson still has nightmares about his time imprisoned. "They seem to come in bursts, four or five nights in a row," he said. During his time in solitary confinement, Thompson found solace in his memories of a book he read as a child. The story was about a mountain climber who found himself in a whiteout and couldn't see the world around him. Instead the man put his entire focus on the one item there, a chair - what it felt like, what tools were used to make it, the pieces of the wood. Thompson said he focused on himself and his boundaries - how high he could jump, how fast he could run, what kind of education he received. It's how he kept his sanity.

"50 these dates are going by and I said, 'Looks like I'm going to be here indefinitely. I gotta bring things in perspective here, I gotta find reality."

The veteran, who enlisted at the age of 17, retired as a sergeant major after 23 years of service. He said he's content with his decisions, both as a POW and in his career, but he's no hero.

"I'm OK with myself, how I handled it," he said, "my whole career in the Army."

FOR 48 YEARS, HE DIDN'T WANT SEE HIS OLD BUDDIES FROM VIETNAM. THIS YEAR HE MADE AN EXCEPTION
RUDY GOMEZ KHE SANH VETERAN
I CO 3/26 3RD PLT

Rudy Gomez says that when he was a Marine deployed in Vietnam, he was warned not to get too close to the guys in his unit: "I always heard, 'Don't make very good close friendships because you might not be here in the next minute.'" So, he told 10 News, he didn't. In fact, he'd avoided getting together with his buddies for all of the subsequent 48 years.

Gomez enlisted in the Marines because as he put it:"I'd seen too many John Wayne movies and I always wanted to be a Marine. They were instilled in my brain, watching those war movies." Gomez was part of the storied 3/26 Marines, men who fought in World War II in the Battle of Iwo Jima before the 5th Marine Division was deactivated.

The 3/26 was reactivated in 1966 when Rudy and his buddies saw action in Vietnam. They fought in the bloody Battle of Khe Sanh, a battle in which, for 77 days, 6,000 Marines — including Rudy Gomez and his buddies — protected a crucial air strip by holding off a 20,000 man communist force.
History.com describes the scene:

"U.S. Marines and their South Vietnamese allies fought off an intense siege of the garrison, in one of the longest and bloodiest battles of the Vietnam War. Meanwhile, with U.S. and South Vietnamese attention focused on Khe Sanh, North Vietnamese and Viet Cong forces launched the Tet Offensive, a series of coordinated surprise attacks on cities and towns throughout South Vietnam."

Sergeant Gomez served under Marine legend Chesty Puller's son-in-law and was assigned to protect "Hill 881 South" in Khe Sanh."We lost a lot of people. One of the snipers that they had missed me four times from about five inches away, kicking up the dirt as I'm face down, laying on the dirt. I moved to the right. He shot again about a foot a way. Backed up. Missed again. grenades were thrown overhead." He was in the middle of hell. He kept his head down amid the sniper fire:

They were surrounded. He said he warned his Lieutenant to keep his head down, but he didn't — something that "pisses off" Gomez to this day.
Gomez told 10News it was horrible:

They were surrounded. He said he warned his Lieutenant to keep his head down, but he didn't — something that "pisses off" Gomez to this day. "A lot of fellow Marines falling down to the left and to the right of me. All of the sudden I see this explosion." The next morning, the Tet Offensive started and his hill was one of the targets.

He was wounded — blinded in his left eye. While in the hospital thumbing through magazines trying to find information about the war, he saw a photo of himself in Newsweek Magazine:

Despite all those movies he'd watched as a kid where John Wayne was best buddies with his guys and all, he couldn't remember the names of the men he'd served in combat.

He avoided his unit's reunions. Though he'd worked for 33 years at the Post Office, his PTSD made going outside and engaging in unfamiliar activities awkward. Hard. He still didn't want to get too close. He just wanted to forget.

In Gomez's oral history recorded by YouTube user, "Visual Journalist" (see below) he said maybe someday he would change his mind about seeing guys in his unit. Maybe someday, he reasoned, he'd want to see these guys, whose names he couldn't even remember, again:

"I'm hoping to go to one of these reunions very soon."
This week after 48 years, Gomez decided to reunite with his old unit at a commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the reactivation of the 3/26 Marines, which was held at San Diego's Mt. Soledad Veterans Memorial.

The memorial sits atop a peaceful hill overlooking the turquoise blue Pacific Ocean. It has been the subject of legal battles over the cross that marks the site.

But it was here that Gomez found peace:
Gomez's unit sealed the reunion with a plaque honoring the unit and its sacrifice:

Rudy Gomez's unit in Vietnam lost 391 men from 1966-1970.Looking back on his service, Gomez said the only public display of thanks after he came back from Vietnam was a bartender at a bowling alley who bought him a drink and escorted him home.

HAMPTON BAYS STUDENTS HONOR VIETNAM WAR VETERAN

Children in the Hampton Bays School District honor the nation's heroes by flying flags to salute their bravery.

HAMPTON BAYS, NY — The flag will be flying high in Hampton Bays for a Vietnam veteran.

The Hampton Bays School District will continue its goal of bringing history to life for students by paying tribute to Vietnam War veteran Paul Dargan; the American flag will fly in his honor in September.

"The district is proud to honor Mr. Dargan for his bravery and service to the United States," said Superintendent of Schools Lars Clemensen.

Dargan was honored at a ceremony held Sept. 9 at Hampton Bays Elementary School, during which the heroes of Sept. 11 were recognized as well, a release said.

Fourth-graders described Dargan's life, recited patriotic poems that wrote themselves, and sang "Peace Starts Within," an original song written by Southampton Supervisor Jay Schneiderman.

The ceremony culminated with the raising of the flag on the district's flagpole.

Here is a history of United States Marine Corps

Sgt. Paul Dargan, as provided by the Hampton Bays School District:

U.S. Marine Corps Sgt. Paul Dargan was born in Brooklyn on Aug. 27, 1946," the release said.
"After his father passed away, his family moved to Hampton Bays in 1957, where he went on to graduate from Hampton Bays High School, Class of 1966.
On June 29, 1966, Mr. Dargan enlisted in the Marine Corps and underwent basic infantry training at Parris Island, South Carolina. After graduation, he was transferred to Camp Lejeune in Jacksonville, North Carolina, and assigned to a recon unit for specialized training, which at the time was in desert warfare, in anticipation of assisting Israel in the 1967 Arab-Israeli War.

Since U.S. assistance wasn't needed in the Middle East, Mr. Dargan's unit was reassigned to Western Pacific Command. They were then trained at Camp Lejeune in mountain warfare. When training was complete, Mr. Dargan was granted leave to Hampton Bays for a short visit. Upon his return to Camp Lejeune, his unit flew to Vietnam via Okinawa, Japan. They arrived at Da Nang, Republic of South Vietnam, in late June.

Mr. Dargan's unit was Bravo Company, 3rd Recon Battalion, 26th Marine Regiment. They were flown to Khe Sanh (KAY SAHN), an old volcano that had been a French outpost in the mid-1950s. Khe Sanh could only be reached by air because the enemy had cut off roads and bridges. It was close to both the demilitarized zone and the border of Laos.

The job of recon units, and Mr. Dargan's eight-member squad, was to locate the enemy in enemy territory. They searched for soldiers, equipment and types of transportation like jeeps, trucks and even elephants. Unknown to Mr. Dargan and his fellow Marines, the enemy had two infantry divisions, two artillery (big cannons) regiments and an armored tank regiment in the area — approximately 20,000 enemy soldiers against roughly 6,000 Marines.

The infamous Battle of Khe Sanh began on Jan. 20, 1968. The outpost was bombarded by the enemy, who aimed for the ammunition supply. Since command knew an attack was imminent, the Marines were told to sleep with "their boots on." The Marines reinforced their bunkers with pieces of portable runway and covered them with sandbags. During this time, Mr. Dargan was on patrol when his squad came upon a new trail not on the map. They waited and set up a land mine. As Mr. Dargan was backing off, he heard a twig snap and saw the silhouette of an enemy soldier. He quickly warned his patrol.

During the siege, Mr. Dargan was wounded in the chest and leg by shrapnel. He refused the Purple Heart medal and continued duty as a Marine. At the end of the siege, the Marines went to the Quang Tri (KWANG TREE) province for rest and recuperation. It was at that time that the unit chaplain held a memorial ceremony for the 19 Marines from Bravo Company who were killed in action. Rifles were placed bayonet first into the ground with helmets placed on top. Mr. Dargan took several photos to honor his friends.

Following the war, Mr. Dargan's photos were put on display at the Wisconsin Veterans Museum in Madison, Wisconsin. More than 40 years later, he met Steve Alpert, an artist from Quogue, and shared his photos, telling Alpert, "I have your next military painting."

The result was the painting "Journey of Souls," which now hangs in the National Museum of the Marine Corps in Quantico, Virginia.

Mr. Dargan was honorably discharged from the Marine Corps in October 1969 and returned to Hampton Bays. There, he met Diana "Dee" Penny when they played tennis together. It was love at first sight. They built their own home and raised two daughters, Kalen and Lindsay, and a son, Ryan. They have four grandchildren: Kaya, Carissa, Vasili and Niko. Mrs. Dargan taught in Hampton Bays and even taught Superintendent of Schools Lars Clemensen."

Medal of Honor Recipient Khe Sanh Veteran Michael J. Fitzmaurice to speak at Wolsey-Wessington program Nov. 8

Posted: Thursday, Nov 3rd, 2016

avour native and Vietnam Army veteran Michael J. Fitzmaurice, who was awarded the Congressional Medal of Honor, will be the guest speaker at a Veteran's Day program Tuesday, Nov. 8, at 2:30 p.m., at the Wolsey-Wessington School. The public is invited to attend this program. Walking the hallways of the VA Medical Center in Sioux Falls, you may have crossed paths with Fitzmaurice, who served other veterans as a VA plumber from 1987-2011.

A humble man, he is never one to bring attention to his military service or the fact that he earned America's highest award for valor, the Congressional Medal of Honor, for his heroic actions at Khe Sanh, Republic of Vietnam in 1971. March 23, 1971, at Khe Sanh, Republic of Vietnam: Specialist Fitzmaurice and three fellow soldiers were occupying a bunker when a company of North Vietnamese sappers infiltrated the area. At the onset of the attack Specialist Fitzmaurice observed three explosive charges which had been thrown into the bunker by the enemy. Mike hurled two of the charges out of the bunker; then threw his flak vest and himself over the remaining charge. By this courageous act, he absorbed the blast and shielded his fellow soldiers. Although suffering from serious multiple wounds and partial loss of sight, he charged out of the bunker and engaged the enemy until his rifle was damaged by the blast of an enemy hand grenade. While in search of another weapon, Specialist Fitzmaurice encountered and overcame an enemy sapper in hand-to-hand combat. Having obtained another weapon, he returned to his original fighting position and inflicted additional casualties on the attacking enemy. Although seriously wounded, Specialist Fitzmaurice refused to be medically evacuated, preferring to remain at his post. He was evacuated and treated in Japan and then transferred back to the states where he was hospitalized for 14 months and was discharged from military service in 1972.

He went about life in South Dakota, married Patty, his wife of now nearly 43 years, and became father to two sons (and a grandfather to four). Fitzmaurice signed up with the South Dakota Army National Guard in April 1973, and was working in a meat packing plant when he was summoned to Washington, D.C., in November 1973. There, President Richard Nixon awarded him the Congressional Medal of Honor for his extraordinary heroism at

MICHAEL J. FITZMAURICE

Khe Sanh. "Specialist Fitzmaurice's conspicuous gallantry, extraordinary heroism, and intrepidity in action at the risk of his life contributed significantly to the successful defense of the position and resulted in saving the lives of a number of his fellow-soldiers," reads the Congressional Medal of Honor citation. "These acts of heroism go above and beyond the call of duty, are in keeping with the highest traditions of the military service, and reflect great credit on Specialist Four Fitzmaurice and the United States Army." In addition, Fitzmaurice received other honors for his bravery and sacrifices including the Vietnam Service Medal with Bronze Star, Vietnam Campaign Medal, and a Purple Heart.

He continued with the Army National Guard until discharge in April 1990. In May 1990, he joined the South Dakota Air National Guard and then retired from military service in May 1992 with 23 years of devoted military service. He was key to the VA Summer of Service event held at the Sioux Falls VA in June 2015, when the Medal of Honor Stamp honoring Vietnam Congressional Medal of Honor recipients was unveiled. He graciously autographed pages upon pages of stamps for other Veterans, their families, VA staff, volunteers and others – just another example of how he continues to serve Veterans, his former employer and his country. In recognition for his service to country, South Dakota re-named the State Veterans Home in his honor in 1998.

On March 30, 2016, he cut the ribbon on the newly constructed state Veterans Home. The Sioux Falls VA Health Care System is proud and honored to have had Fitzmaurice and his wife as members of the VA team.

ALBERT W. POTTS, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN, FOXTROT CO 2/3

Albert "Al" William Potts, Master Sergeant, went to his heavenly home on August 13,2016, after a courageous battle with cancer from Agent Orange, surrounded by his loved ones.

Al was born on April 20, 1946 to the late Betty Greve and Wilbert Potts in Ft. Wayne, Indiana. He was a 1964 graduate of Central High School and worked at General Electric before enlisting in the USMC. He served with USMC FOX 2/3/3 during the Vietnam War and was mentioned in "The First Hill Fights Battle of Khe Sanh" book. He was a member of the VFW and the American Legion Post 157.

The saying, "Once a Marine, always a Marine," was true to Al's life. He proudly served for 27 years and retired as a Master Sergeant in 1993. He stayed very close to the brave men that he called brothers.

Al retired from Riverside High School due to his illness.

He enjoyed reading and watching history films, John Wayne films, game shows, and old movie classics. Al loved animals; he rescued dogs and cats, and fed wild birds. He spent days fishing at the lake cottage in Orland, Indiana, while visiting his family. He was so proud of the Family Bowling league and always asked for the scores. His grandchildren grew up with fun times with "Grandpa Al" at camp in Holiday Camplands. Missing him dearly, his wife, Edyie Lefevre Potts. He was a wonderful father figure to Steve & Beth Bash, Douglas Hassler and Connie Hassler. His pride, joy and reason to live were his five grandchildren, Braeden, Camden & Lauren Bash, and Benjamen & Jonathan Hassler. He is survived by his mother-in-law, Verna Vargo, and his faithful companion, Cricket.

"Smiley" as his family nicknamed him, he was a dear brother to Susan & Doug Bedra, Donald (Lum) & Debra Edwards, Elaine & James Mowan, and Joan Potts, all of Indiana, and Wilbert Jr. & Kathy Potts of VA; his sisters-in-law, Judith & Joe Yekyll, and Cathy Jo & Dave Kardish of Ellwood City. He is also survived by numerous nieces, nephews and their children.

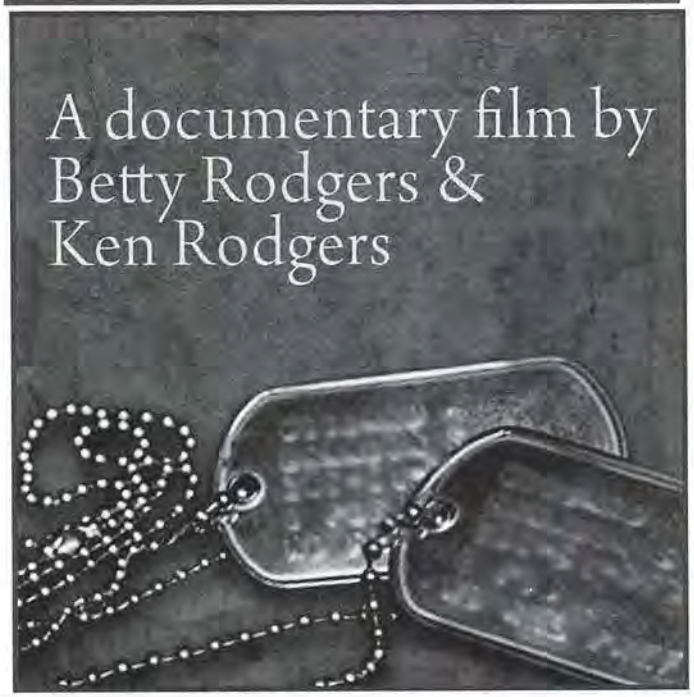
Preceding him in death, the man he called his dad, Donald Edwards; his baby sister, Tammy Edwards; his brothers, Merle and Walter Potts; his first wife of 33 years, Sara Kay McClearn, and her parents, Sara & Kenneth McClearn. The family wishes to thank the Hillman Cancer Center and the teams of Dr. Ohr and Dr. Bartlett. They'd also like to thank Amedisys Hospice Angels, Kathy, Amy, Peggy &

Michelle, Pastor Dave, and their neighbors and friends for food and care of Cricket.

I MARRIED THE WAR': KUNA COUPLE SHINES SPOTLIGHT ON VETERANS' WIVES



BOISE - Two years after releasing a documentary about one of the longest and bloodiest battles of the Vietnam War, a Kuna couple is back with a new film, called "I Married the War."

The documentary shines a spotlight on the wives of war veterans. It is told from the spouses' perspective, giving them a voice and showing the true impact of war at home.

"There are wives from World War II who are still alive, the Korean War, the Vietnam War, and the Middle East wars and everything in between," said Betty Rodgers. "This is a group of people who have been silent."

Ken and Betty Rodgers brought the Vietnam War to the forefront in their 2014 documentary, "Bravo! Common Men, Uncommon Valor." It told the story of the siege at Khe Sanh from the perspective of the men who lived through it.

"During our journey with 'Bravo,' it became very clear that there was another story out there," said Betty. "Think about how around the nation and around the world, how many wives are living with PTSD, traumatic brain injury, physical injury."

Betty knows how that feels. Her husband, Ken, is a Vietnam War vet.

"You come home from war, and I'm speaking as a man, a combat veteran, and you have all this pent-up emotion that you are not supposed to show because you are tough and this is what it took to get through combat," Ken said. "It all gets passed on to your family

KEN & BETTY RODGERS

That was the inspiration for the Rodgers' latest documentary, "I Married the War," which tells the stories of the wives of war vets - women who have fought to keep their marriages and families together.

"We are reaching out to women from around the country," said Betty.

They started in Idaho. Terri Topmiller is a mother and grandmother who lives in Star. She was married to a Vietnam War vet for 39 years before he passed. Her husband, Bob, lived for years with severe PTSD.

"My husband had nightmares from the day I met him," Terri said. "Every single night, he had the same nightmare over and over and over.

"The first 10 years we were married, he did not talk about the war, because back then nobody talked about the war," she added.

Years later, Terri joined a support group of military wives and realized she wasn't alone.

"It was about then that I really truly understood the ramifications of Vietnam," she said.

Laura Nickel is also featured in "I Married the War." Her husband, George, was the only survivor of a 2007 roadside bombing in Iraq. The blast left him injured both physically and emotionally.

"He struggled with undiagnosed PTSD and untreated traumatic brain injury for two years after he came back from Walter Reed," Laura said. "He started to have some severe problems re-adapting to civilian life."

In 2009, George Nickel was involved in an armed standoff with Boise police. Over a dozen rounds were fired, but incredibly, no one was injured. George went to jail, got treatment and went back to school, where he earned a bachelor's degree in psychology and his master's degree in social work.

He's now one of the Boise Police Department's allies, helping to make training videos for when police encounter veterans in crisis.

The Nickels are also the proud parents of a baby boy.

"It's been a long haul, but he's really turned things around and inspired other vets to get off their couches and make a positive difference and re-adapt," Laura said.

She had her own reasons for being a part of the documentary.

REUNION SECRETARIES REPORT (2016) BY CRAIG TOURTE KSV SECRETARY

Another wonderful reunion this year in San Antonio at the El Tropicana Riverwalk Hotel where Khe Sanh Veterans last visited in July 2010. The El Tropicana is the location where many of the interviews were recorded and filmed for the much-acclaimed and award winning documentary by Ken & Betty Rodgers, "Bravo, Common Men, Uncommon Valor." A couple of golf games were once again on the unofficial agenda. Thanks to Khe Sanh Veteran and PGA Professional Fred Bender for stepping up and making the T-Times at the Quarry and Riverside Golf Clubs. Besides myself and Fred those who enjoyed the games were Tom Horchler, Robert Longcrane, Tom Ford, Cisco Reyes and Ted Hummer. Thanks to Fred, we received a deep discount for both courses. All of those who played expressed their enjoyment and their desire to be included in the golf games next year at the reunion in Cleveland. These games are structured in such a manner that all who wish to play are welcome regardless of skill, handicap, gender or age. What is required is that you have a good time with friends.

Tom Eichler and Russ Turner, did their usually tireless job manning the registration desk and fielding complaints and suggestions along with welcoming those who returned for another reunion and those attending the reunion for the first time. Besides negotiating with the hotel, signing contracts, making sure there were sufficient rooms, meal banquet selections and negotiating parking fees months prior to the reunion they had to deal all the other unanticipated issues that arise. I don't know how they manage the time or find the energy for those twelve (12) hour days. Tom towed the Khe Sanh USMC Jeep all the way from Chicago, it was a big hit and must have been an impressive display seeing a military jeep being driven around the streets of San Antonio sporting an M60 on a tall stand with the words USMC and Khe Sanh painted in bright gold letters.

The Reunion PX is always popular, no one works harder at making it a success than Vice-President John Pessoni and Board Member-at-Large Tom Ford. Sgt-at-Arms Dave Meyer once again tirelessly manned the silent auction table. The funds from the silent auction and purchases from the PX which included the newly designed reunion shirts by Tom Eichler, along with the pins, button, hats, jackets, etc. helps support the various Khe Sanh non-profit Association functions including the Scholarship Fund. If you didn't make the reunion and would be interested in having some of these items which identifies you as a Khe Sanh Veteran, you may go to the Khe Sanh web site at Khesanh.org, click on PX and order the new (and previous) reunion shirts, jackets, hats and other items that were offered.

I understand the ladies meeting and luncheon was a huge success as was the benefit raffle, we thank them once again for their generosity. 4th Recon Marines from San Antonio had a static weapon display. Many veterans were surprised at the weight of the weapons and found it hard to accept they humped equivalent or even heavier weapons up, down and around the hills of Khe Sanh. On Thursday VFW Post 76 on the Riverwalk provided a BBQ for us. Jose "Cisco" Reyes provided the music and sound system while we all enjoyed a great meal and adult beverages.

ON Friday VFW Post 1533 also provided a BBQ for us. The post provided an excellent DJ and adult beverages. The membership enjoyed another evening of dancing and merriment.

As in each reunion, elections are held via written paper ballot for open board positons. There was however an exception this year as there was no opposition for the open positions so those who submitted their notice to run were selected and no ballot nor voting was necessary. Those interested were asked to contact Dave Meyer and/or myself in writing at least 30 days prior to the reunion so that ballots can be printed. The only requirement to run for office is the member be in good standing (current on dues) and having attended at least two (2) reunions within the past five (5) years. Those elected for the term 2017-2018 are: Vice-President – John Pessoni, Secretary – Craig W. Tourte. Board of Directors Member at Large – Wayne "Butch" Deverney, Bruce Geiger, Jose Reyes and Russ Wagner.

So many contributed their skill, time and effort to the success of this reunion I'd be remiss to name just a few without naming them all. But we all know who you are and appreciate your generous and selfless contribution. The By-Laws, Board of Directors and Membership Minutes are available for anyone who is interested in reading them. I place a folder on the registration table at the reunion for anyone who would like to look at them.

The reunion closed with the annual Khe Sanh Veterans Association Banquet. As anticipated, the turnout was huge and President Tom Eichler did his usual outstanding job as Master of Ceremonies, keeping everyone and everything running efficiently.

SAN ANTONIO VETERANS MEMORIAL
BY CRAIG W. TOURTE

I truly enjoyed another Khe Sanh Reunion in San Antonio. While walking around this historic city, my memories carried me back to the 2010 reunion. I fondly remembered Tom Horchler brought his beautiful companion dog Lucy and I was fortunate at that time to have taken a photograph of the both standing in front of the Alamo. Sadly, Lucy passed away and did not join us during this year's reunion. Once again I wandered around this most hospitable city and enjoyed the thrilling historical sites. During that 2010 reunion Marco Soto told me he had come across a Vietnam Memorial and thought I would be interested in seeing it. Dave Tonick, Marco and I walked over to the Memorial which is called "Veterans Memorial Plaza" located next to the San Antonio Municipal Auditorium. It was a stunning site with two bronze figures in utilities poised in combat, one appeared to be wounded and the other looking up into the sky.

There were several plaques attached to the base, one of which read "Hill 881 South. On April 30, 1967 one of the bloodiest hill battles of the Vietnam War took place at Hill 881 South. Over 50 United States Marines and over 300 North Vietnamese Regulars lost their lives. This scene was taken from that battle, an incident vividly recalled by Austin Deuel the Artist. On January 3, 1986 John D. Baines, commissioned Austin Deuel to sculpture Hill 881 South as a lasting tribute to all Vietnam Combat Veterans dedicated Sunday afternoon November 9, 1986."

On May 10, 2014 an article authored by Lt. Col Ray Madonna (Ret), read in part: "...when Hill 881 South was positioned on its base...it was no coincidence that the radio operator was looking upward at the American flag. In the actual battle scene, the young Marine was looking skyward for a medical evacuation helicopter. The height of the flag pole and the position of the radio operator's head were designed and constructed to have him looking at the Stars and Stripes for inspiration."

As I walked around the base I observed another plaque with a poem authored by then 1st Lieutenant David G. Rogers. The background for this poem is found on Mr. Rogers USMC Class 38th Alumni Profiles which reads the following. "On April 30, USMC Marines assaulted Hill 881 South. At the end of the day of bitter fighting 44 Marines lay dead and over 100 wounded. As the sun began to set, emergency MedEvacs were still being made to save the dying lives of young Marines. Perimeter defenses were set up for any possible counter-attack from the enemy forces still occupying Hill 881 South and surrounding areas. An air of uncertainty preoccupied the thoughts of those still living as a first quarter moon began to rise over a bloody battlefield. This poem is dedicated to those who fought and fell on that wretched hill in a far-off country where a battle for freedom was fought and won."

The poem on the plaque reads: "Death at My Door" "Day is over as danger hastens, young Marines at their battle stations, instruments of war outline the sky, means of death are standing by. Can it be on this high hill; forces will clash only to kill? Silence fills the near moonless night, restless thoughts of a bloody fight. Endless memories for those awake, meaningful discussion experience would make, thought silent world in which we live, permits only God's comfort to give. Somewhere through the darkness creeping, a date with death is in the keeping, alone I sit and question why, life itself, to be born to merely die? David G. Rogers, 1st Lt. USMC, April 30, 1967, Hill 881 South Republic of Vietnam."

As I continued around the base of the Memorial I came across another plaque which read: "Vietnam Veterans Memorial" In honor of those men and women who served our country during of its most trying times."

I enjoyed visiting this Memorial Park once again, walking over from the hotel by myself and taking a few minutes to consider the moment and reflect on what the dedication must have been like, now empty of others, quiet and even lonely. I wondered how many others had passed by this Memorial and stopped and considered the sacrifice of so many. My curiosity led me to located the dedication information. "San Antonio's Vietnam Veterans Memorial and Veterans Memorial Plaza was dedicated on Sunday, November 9th, 1986. The ceremony began with an Air Force F-16 flyover in the Missing Man formation, followed by a squadron of eight Army Huey Gunships stilling the emotions of a crowd estimated near 10,000...Retired Army General William Westmoreland was the keynote speaker..."
I don't know if I'll ever return to San Antonio or visit this wonderful Memorial Plaza again, but I'll never forget it. If I should ever find myself this way away I'll pay my respects and remember those who fought that horrific battle.

AFTER 5 DECADES MARINE OFFICERS REUNITE, REMINISCE ABOUT THE BASIC SCHOOL

BY DIANNA CAHN
STARS & STRIPES
NOVEMBER 11 2016

MARINE CORPS BASE QUANTICO, Va. — Most of them took the military road before they knew it was headed to Vietnam. They were high school graduates in 1962 – intelligent but not necessarily wealthy, and for many, ROTC scholarships meant a free ride to a college degree.

By the time they chose to become Marine Corps officers, there was no doubt where they'd be going. The war that would define them was burning on the horizon. It was their calling, and these boys on the verge of manhood were eager to take up the mantle. For five months in 1966, 184 young men from across the country came together for a brief, defining time here at The Basic School, where newly commissioned Marine Corps officers are trained. They started in June, in the deadly heat of summer and spent the coming months exhausted and covered in dirt and mosquito and tick bites. By November, they were camping and running in the cold rain, covered in mud.

"I learned to laugh at adversity with these guys," said Mike Wholley, who stayed in the Marine Corps for 30 years, retiring as a brigadier general. "These 200 guys from The Basic School – I love them. We all went through the same things. We laughed, we cried, we ate crappy chow, but we laughed through it all and we persevered." And then – almost to a man – they went to war.

THE BASIC SCHOOL

This year marks a half century since TBS class of fiscal year 1967 came through this campus. The buildings have all changed, and the technology is new.

The men of B Company, now in their 70s, laughed in amazement at the large size of the modern classrooms, the perks for new officers and the elaborate choices in the chow hall.

But some things never change.

When Marines on the chow line heard who the visitors were, they shook their hands. And the Marine spiel – with its pride and ethos -- brought the veterans back to their own young boots.

"This is where we introduce young men and women to what it truly means to be a Marine Officer," Maj. Dan Eagan, protocol officer at The Basic School, told the veterans during a briefing. "To lead, to take charge to make decisions when you are under stress, when the world is crashing down around your ears, and maybe the only thing that can be your saving grace is keeping your head on your shoulders, picking up a radio and getting the right support where you need it."

"You all know it because you lived it," he told the silent room.

The veterans had gathered on this autumn weekend to mark then and now, a 50th reunion for men who had been together fleetingly -- some before they could grow a full beard. (SEE PHOTO BACK PAGE OF COVER) But it was a seminal time, when they learned to take responsibility and were thrust into battle. Their mettle would be tested, and their ability to laugh, when fate would rightly have them shaking in fear, connected them in irrevocable ways.

For many Marines, service is a calling that bonds them like no other. But as these young lieutenants trained to be officers, they shouldered the added knowledge that they were preparing to take men into battle. For five months, day and night, they ran, jumped and crawled, cursed, fell, got up and did it again. They laughed when it got too hard, or something didn't go right.

"What are they going to do, send me to Vietnam? Oh wait, they are already doing that,'" they joked. They were hurting and dirty and knew that soon, they'd be at war, and not all of them would come home.

Some kept in contact, becoming lifelong friends. Others put the war behind them – or buried it. Ord Elliott put his manuscript in a drawer for nearly four decades before he published it. Wholley lived in Washington for years before he could bring himself to visit the Vietnam Veterans War Memorial.

"I had this irrational fear I would walk down and see my name. It was not rational. But there were a lot of names of good friends," he said. Now once a year, at 6 a.m., he heads to the Wall and spends an hour and a half there.

In 1996, 30 years after they graduated, classmate Bob Schmitt reached out to 12 classmates whose contacts he had and organized the first small reunion in California. Time passed, and every five years or so, they had an expanded gathering.

Now, about 50 of them were back where started so long ago.

They looked around at the young Marines training for new wars in a newfangled world, struck by how much had changed, but also, how much was familiar. Eagan's words to them struck home.

"As much as we evolve technology-wise, as much as we advance, incorporate new things, these young lieutenants when they graduate have more in common with you gentlemen than they do with their peers out in the civilian world," Eagan said. "Because the underlying fundamentals of what makes a Marine Corps leader are timeless. That they are going to be men and women of character. That they are going to make the right decision.
"That's the institution you passed on to us."

READY, SET, COMBAT

The class graduated at the end of November 1966. Some went on to flight school, dividing further into fixed wing or helicopters. Others landed ground jobs – riflemen or artillerymen -- and were on the front lines by early 1967.

They entered a war in full throttle. The number of American forces in Vietnam had surpassed 350,000, but troops were stretched thin. As American losses multiplied, public support waned.

By the time the first graduates of their class landed in the I Corps tactical zone – the northernmost quadrant of South Vietnam just south of the Demilitarized Zone – they were seeing signs at home of the anti-war sentiment that would punctuate their service and return from war.

Whether they served on the ground or in the air, they came home with the shared experience of combat that cemented their bonds.

"These are the guys that fought with you," said Ord Elliott, who commanded a rifle platoon through battle along the DMZ. "We can understand even though we had different experiences – the wing and the grunts like me – we can understand what that experience was.

"So when we share stories, it's warming," he said. "It's wonderful. It brings back the camaraderie we had as Marines."

"It's about spending time with Marines," said Bob Lund, a CH-46 helicopter pilot in Vietnam. "My whole life, I've been tremendously proud to be a Marine, and I have tremendous respect for other Marines because I know what happened to them. I know what they did."

A LEGACY OF SUCCESS

In the years that followed the war, the men of B Company had remarkable and successful lives. Hon Lee survived the ground war on Hill 881 South near Khe Sanh to be recruited by the CIA – first in their technical unit, and later, as a clandestine operative around the world.

Classmate Andy Vaart also worked for the CIA, as an analyst. He was born in Estonia before his mother escaped to the United States during World War II.

Mike Wholley, who joined the Marines so he could go to law school and become a politician, stayed 30 years, becoming a brigadier general and the top lawyer in the Marine Corps.

Hays Parks, a fellow lawyer who commanded a base security unit at 1st Marine Division headquarters near Da Nang, became the pre-eminent scholar on the laws of war, negotiating weapons agreements on behalf of the United States.

Others went into business or computer technology, or became doctors or surgeons. David Martin served as a U.S. Congressman and John Astle went from flying helicopters to serving two decades as a Maryland state senator.

"The underlying fundamentals of what makes a Marine Corps leader are timeless. That they are going to be men and women of character. That they are going to make the right decision."

- Maj. Dan Eagan, protocol officer

In 2014, Astle introduced legislation in Maryland that passed unanimously, making March 30 the official Welcome Home Vietnam Veterans Day in his state.

He said he had been spit on when he returned home and a friend he'd grown up with turned his back on him because of the war. The legislation, for him, was a way to reconcile the pride these Marines felt coming home with the shame many Americans felt about the war they fought.

"I tell people that of all the things I've done with my life, the thing about which I am most proud is my service as a Marine," Astle said.

A REUNION OF FAMILY

Last month, as they walked the campus of The Basic School, Vaart came across a dedication plaque with several names, including one that stopped him in his tracks: Lt. Col. Victor Ohanesian.

A Marine Corps major working with the Navy ROTC at the University of Rochester in 1964, Ohanesian recruited Vaart and Bob Rivers to join the Marines, not the Navy, at the end of their college scholarships.

He was Vaart's mentor, a Marine he wanted to emulate. It made him proud that Ohanesian had selected him.

Three years later, Vaart was a young lieutenant in Vietnam when he got word that Ohanesian was killed in combat in the DMZ.

Vaart reached out and ran his fingers over the name on the plaque. "He was the first person to see something worthy in me," he said.

The weekend took them to the Marine Corps Museum, where many of them relived their Vietnam battles. Lee stood on his Hill 881 South, John Sullivan and Lund under a Huey from their squadron – one they'd both flown dozens of times. Roger Hart and Astle walked down a CH-46 ramp, remembering how the Marines helped injured buddies onto a bird.

They rescued a lot of troops. But Astle hasn't forgotten one kid who died on the back of his helicopter.

Astle's helicopter had been called in for a rescue in an area where troops had come under heavy fire. But the security gunships were taking too long. He had to choose between risking the lives of himself and his crew to go it alone, or wait. He waited. The copter didn't end up getting shot at, he said. Maybe it was because they came in with the big guns. Or maybe the bad guys had already fled. Maybe the kid would have survived had he gone in sooner. The memory brings him to tears.

"I wrestled with that for a long time before I came to terms with it," he said.

For Bob Rivers, the camaraderie comes back the minute he gets into a room with these men.

"We shared something special," he said, emotion bubbling up as he spoke.

"This is coming home. These are my friends. This is who I am," he said.

LEFT BEHIND: THE STORIES BEHIND THE ITEMS LEFT AT THE VIETNAM VETERANS MEMORIAL WALL

By Jay Korff and Kevin Drennen/ABC7
Thursday, November 10th 2016

WASHINGTON (ABC7) — ABC 7 News has been working on a documentary for most of 2016 about items left behind at the Vietnam Veterans Memorial in Washington. We felt Veterans Day would be an appropriate time to release this powerful story. These very personal and intimate objects, like a rotor blade from a downed helicopter, speak not only to sacrifice but ultimately to our deepest desire to heal from a complicated and painful past. If you would like to share your story or provide feedback, we welcome it. Please email jkorff@sbgtv.com with your thoughts.

The Warehouse

When you step inside an unassuming warehouse in Hyattsville, Maryland you're reminded that extraordinary items are sometimes found in unremarkable places.

"We're always finding new and interesting things," says National Park Service museum technician Janet Donlin.

The National Park Service National Capital Region Museum Resource Center houses millions of treasured artifacts from America's past.

Writings, records and artwork from National Park Service sites in the D.C. region, like Ford's Theater and the Frederick Douglas estate, are carefully preserved and stored here when not on display.

National Park Service Park Curator Laura Anderson says, "These objects all tell a story and it's a very powerful experience to work with these objects."

But the bulk of this cavernous depository of history was actually amassed by you as a thank you.

Donlin says, "So everything in these boxes has been left at The Wall."

This place is not open to the public.

"We call it the floor. Its artifact storage and the blue boxes that you see in front of you are where we store the Vietnam collection," says Donlin.

Rows and rows of towering stacks soar nearly to the ceiling here. And for more than 30 years curators and technicians like Janet Donlin have been meticulously cataloging the hundreds of thousands of items left behind by those visiting the Vietnam Veterans Memorial in nearby Washington.

There are tributes, reminders and keepsakes that catapult you back to that tumultuous time. One veteran left his daily countdown calendar.

Another donated the POW flag he received upon returning stateside.

Donlin says, "He made the cross out of his toothpaste tube and he tied it together with his uniform while he was a prisoner of war."

There are hellos to heroes and unintended goodbyes to sons.

Donlin says "A generic happy birthday card but she received it back in the mail verified deceased return to sender."

Only a day after Air Force Major Leonard Niski's mother sent her son this birthday card in 1967 Niski was killed in action. She kept that card for more than 25 years before it was placed at The Wall.

Park Rangers have been picking up and keeping items placed at The Wall since 1984.

Their routine is like clockwork. At nightfall they pick up the pictures and packages left behind. From D.C. these items are taken to the warehouse where they are placed in a box to one day be catalogued.
To give you a sense of the size and scope of this collection curators and technicians have catalogued around 500 boxes. They still have another 1,000 boxes to look through.

Donlin says, "A lot of what's in the collection is what we call documentary artifacts."

Like poems, pictures and letters.

This massive stockpile of offerings varies from the routine to the remarkable.

"It's one of a kind," says Donlin as she lifts a white covering off of an old motorcycle with a timeless story.

Donlin says, "We call it the hero bike. It's the largest, the heaviest and most significant piece that we have in our collection."

The hero bike honors the 37 men from Wisconsin listed as either prisoners of war or missing in action.

"This motorcycle was left at The Wall in 1995 by this group of veterans. They were part of Rolling Thunder," says Donlin.

That year those veterans rolled 900 miles from Wisconsin to The Wall pulling a trailer loaded with that handcrafted chopper. They left that bike at The Wall to be consumed by history as a symbol of devotion to men left behind.

A cluster of dog tags are attached to the front of the hog. Each man is represented by one of those dog tags.

And inscription of the seat reads 'Bring 'em home or send us back.' This motorcycle has never been ridden. It can't until all 37 men come home.

The Wall

There are few places on the American landscape as revered as the Vietnam Veterans Memorial.

The Wall, simple in its power, is not political. It doesn't need to be.

"It symbolizes sacrifice," says Janet Sileo. Her uncle Jerry Elliott was killed during the Vietnam War. Hiding behind a sloping hillside this black granite monument, gleaming like a mirror, pays tribute to the more than 58,000 lives lost in a conflict that still haunts a nation. Every year millions gaze upon the cherished, chiseled names of the fallen.

The Vietnam Veteran's Memorial Fund (VVMF) is the nonprofit organization that built the Vietnam Veterans Memorial in Washington, D.C.

"It brings you closer to your lost loved ones," says Rick Prine. His brother Rob Prine perished during the war.

Here we reflect on a sorrowful past and for some, what is a still painful present.
It's become a tradition for Ed Holterman to return to a certain spot at The Wall every Memorial Day Weekend. But for nearly 50 years Holterman could not bear to be here, to walk the cobblestone path, to face an old friend he believes he disappointed so long ago.

Holterman says, "I knew these guys. The one guy saved my life and he's here."

Holterman says during the war he had too much to drink one night and couldn't work the next morning. The man who replaced him on that mission was killed.

"I wanted to say I was sorry. For all these years I've had a lot of guilt, a lot of anger and general disgust with myself and everything that happened," says Holterman.

Holterman recently left his original Vietnam Veterans ball cap at The Wall for that comrade to dull a pain that will never fully recede.

Other more unique items find their way here and then to The Warehouse so parents can share with the world a part of their soldier's story far removed from the blood soaked battlefields of Vietnam.

As technician Janet Donlin walks over a heavy carrying case to a display table she tells us, "So I cataloged this recently after discovering it in a box. I thought it was odd because of how heavy the box was so of course I had to look into it and see what was inside of it."

Roller skates. And not just any pair from anybody. Donlin reveals, "Terry Lee Moore Vietnam Veteran killed in action May 6, 1968."

Moore won nearly 100 trophies and metals in competitive skating before leaving the carefree world of the rink for the jungles of Southeast Asia.

Donlin says, "You can look on The Wall and see a name but you don't really know about the person until you see his story. It's kind of like piecing together a puzzle."

This wondrous gathering of memory also sits beside profound sadness. These shelves hold so many reminders of soldiers who can no longer speak for themselves.

But we found one small item, hidden from the public for a generation, which tells a young pilot's story in his own words.

Donlin says, "So this is a ¼ inch magnetic reel. It actually contains vocal recordings from a person who served in Vietnam. This was made by Robert Prine."

"Well hello. How is every little thing on the home front. I am in Bravo troop 1st of the 9th cavalry," says Prine in the recording.

The Tapes

"Well hello. How is every little thing on the home front? And I'm presently An Khe, Vietnam," says Prine in the recording.

Rob Prine grew up in Daytona Beach, Florida.

His younger brother Rick says life with Rob, the oldest brother, was never dull.

"It was a crazy household. There were six siblings. My mother was on her own as she had been divorced," says Rick Prine.
Rick says Rob willingly took on the role of surrogate father and when war called, Rob volunteered. Before shipping off to Southeast Asia Rick Prine made a promise to his sweetheart Sandy Yager. They decided to get married when Rob returned home.

Rick says, "Well I heard from my brother Rob that 'hey, when I get back Sandy and I are going to get married and we're going to have kids, lots of kids'." Rob Prine's connection to family ran deep. He corresponded with loved ones every chance he could while heading into harm's way. In fact Rick showed us a number of original post cards that Rob had sent him from abroad while heading to Vietnam.

But what Rob shipped stateside next is now a part of our nation's history.

National Park Service museum technician Janet Donlin holds up a small, flat, square container and says, "And he sent it to a Ms. Sandra Yager in Atlanta, Georgia. We actually had this recently digitized so I was probably the first person to listen to this recording since it was left at The Wall in 1989." Prine made reel-to-reel tape recordings.

"Well hello you all. I figured I would send you some words here," says Rob Prine on the recording.

It's late January 1968. Prine is based out of Ah Khe, the largest helicopter base in the world at the time. Ah Khe also served as a critical transportation and tactical hub for U.S. military operations.

Rob says in a recording, "I'll go forward Monday I believe. Either Monday or Tuesday and that's to our area of operation and that's where I guess we start the war." In the background of this particular recording you can clearly hearing helicopters landing or taking off.

But this recording would be the last time his family and his fiancé would hear Rob's voice. On only his 20th day in Vietnam, this 21-year-old crashed the helicopter he was piloting in foul weather.

Rob's brother Rick says, "In the process of trying to turn around he hit the mountain and that was it. I went ballistic. I could not control myself because he meant so much to me and the rest of the family and he was gone."

For years, Rick dreamed of a scenario never to be: that his resourceful brother had somehow survived. Rick says, "Of course that didn't happen but you always want to hope to see your brother again because he was special."

The tapes arrived stateside soon after Rob's death. Rick, while fighting back tears, says, "It was devastating to have to listen to him alive when we knew he was dead."

He adds that Rob's loss was especially difficult on the woman he wanted to marry.

"They loved each other tremendously. I was devastated but Sandy was doubly devastated by his loss because they loved each other so much," says Rick. In one of Rob Prine's final recordings he says to Sandy, "Take care of yourself. And I really can't think of all that much to tell you except I'm doing fine. Pretty good life here I guess. Pretty good start anyway."

The Prine family made sure Rob would live on in others. Rick named his son after his brother. His sister Mary did the same. When Sandy Yager married she also had a son. That young man, during an 8th grade field trip to Washington, D.C. in 1989, placed those recordings at The Wall so Rob Prine's story of devotion to family and to county could live on forever.

"Be good Sandy. I miss you. Bye-bye," says Rob.

The Rotor Blade

Three days before Rob Prine arrived in Vietnam, the infamous Battle of Khe Sanh erupted to the north. This engagement would prove to be among the longest and bloodiest of the war.

In the first hours of this ferocious siege, 19-year-old Private Jerry Elliott with the 282nd Assault Helicopter Company volunteered for a dangerous rescue mission.

According to first-hand accounts, helicopters headed to a barren mountaintop in search of wounded. Upon arrival enemy fire hit the lead chopper which erupted in flames and crashed. Survivors say Elliott hit the ground to aid crash survivors but was soon surrounded. That's the last time Jerry Elliott of Greenville, Mississippi was seen alive.

"The helicopters who had landed to help with the rescue mission pulled away and left men on the ground, one being my uncle," says Janet Sileo, Elliott's niece.

Sileo says when helicopters circled back several minutes later her uncle had vanished.

"And everyone was gone. There was no one. The casualties were on the ground. Everyone disappeared. No one knew where they were. Where did they go?" says Sileo.

Sileo, who lives in nearby Reston, comes to The Wall often to pay homage to a man who meant so much to her family.

Sileo says, "This is an uncle I have never met but I absolutely love and adore. His sacrifice for me, the freedoms I'm able to experience because his name is on The Wall. It's not just a name. It's a person. Someone who people love and the fact that this is all we have of him. This is it."

Jerry Elliott's remains were never found. But something else, something remarkable, did eventually come home thanks to a sister who refuses give up on her brother.

If there's an item at the warehouse that symbolizes the unfailing commitment to MIAs it may be this one.

Technician Janet Donlin carefully opens up an old, small pine box and says, "This is a part of a helicopter blade."

And not just any rotor blade.

"This is a piece of history directly from the site, from the era. This can't be replaced," says Donlin.
The spellbinding story behind this blade is one for the ages.

Thirty-one years after Jerry Elliott disappeared on that hilltop near Khe Sanh his sister Donna arrived in country with a team of experts in search of anything connected to her lost hero.

While interviewing people in the village task force members discovered that a farmer, years ago, had salvaged parts from the very helicopter that crashed moments before Jerry Elliott disappeared.

Donlin says, "They found some local Vietnamese who knew of what happened at the time. They told the crew about this guy who was using a helicopter blade that he found as a fence post in his cow pen."
Task force members bartered for that rotor blade and brought it home. On Memorial Day 2000 Donna Elliott and surviving members of that fateful rescue mission came to Washington. They placed the rotor blade in a pine box that was draped in an American flag. And they left it at The Wall so that the only link to a life lost was assured a place in history.

Jerry's sister Donna tells ABC7 News that in the summer of 2016 the crash site at Khe Sanh was excavated. She says additional helicopter debris was discovered. Jerry Elliott's remains were not found. Donna Elliott tells us she vows to never give up the search for her brother.

The Huey

There is a reality of war that most combat veterans cannot escape. The repercussions of battle often result in invisible scars that embed in the bones of soldiers.
For Aircraft Commander Walter McNees and Door Gunner Ralph Tutrani their recent and historic trip to The Wall reminds us that with a bit of luck and a lot of faith you can begin to heal wounds deep and wide by honoring your fallen brothers in arms.

"This project has helped me so much with maybe just coming to grips with it," says Carol Hewitt. Her brother Gary Dubach was killed in Vietnam.

This project, so improbable, began nearly 50 years ago with a call for help during the war near the town of Tay Ninh 100 kilometers northwest of old Saigon.

A Huey and its crew came under heavy fire while trying to save fellow soldiers.
"It has a serial number 174 and it was shot down on Valentine's Day in 1969. It was a medivac unit and it was going in for a rescue. There were five on board. There was a pilot, a co-pilot, crew chief, door gunner. It was leaking hydraulic fluid, low on fuel so it had to make crash landing in a hot zone."

After the helicopter landed at an angle crew chief Gary Dubach and Stephen Schumacher jumped out to set up a perimeter only to be hit and killed by the rotor blade.

"A lot of families were destroyed when these guys were killed," says McNees.

Those families and those survivors have struggled in the decades to follow.

McNees admits, "I have PTSD very bad and this mission was probably at the top of the list for causing that."

Out of that darkness emerged an unlikely light. A man connected in no way to that mission recently made an astounding discovery in a remote helicopter boneyard.

"So we found this in Show Low, Arizona which is in the White Mountains of Northeast Arizona," says

Dave Barron.

Retired Army Sgt. Dave Barron runs a non-profit that supports combat veterans grappling with PTSD. Light Horse Legacy is a benevolent educational organization designed to promote treatment and healing of Post Traumatic Stress suffered by all U.S. combat veterans.

A couple of years ago, Barron searched randomly for a battle-tested helicopter to restore. His idea was to rebuild a Vietnam-era Huey in a way that helps combat veterans talk about the silent fight burning inside them.

Barron determined after months of research that the old helicopter he found in that remote Arizona helicopter boneyard was the very Huey that crashed in Tay Ninh back in '69. And not only that, he found the relatives of crash victims Gary Dubach and Stephen Schumacher.

"I never would have thought I would have seen it again or seen it at all because it got shot down. I figured it would be in Vietnam," says Dubach's sister Carol Hewitt.

And then Barron, with the help of veteran's organizations, tracked down crew members like Ralph Tutrani.

"I got off the phone and I turned to my wife and I said you're not going to believe this. You're not going to believe what I just got off the phone and listened to," says Tutrani.

hen renowned artist Steve Maloney went to work, transforming that air ambulance into a spectacular 47-foot-long sculpture designed to inspire dialogue and healing. The piece, called "Take Me Home Huey", now tours the country and will be featured in the New York City Veterans Day event November 11. The sculpture then heads to exhibits on the west coast.

Take Me Home Huey is a partnership between Steve Maloney and Light Horse Legacy.

During Memorial Day weekend, victims' relatives and surviving crew members gathered at The National Museum of the Marine Corps in Virginia where the sculpture was on display.

There would be one last mission on this day to close a significant circle.

Tutrani says, "Maybe this project will say, you're home now. You can let go."
An original section of the Huey's door panel was removed so it could be left at The Wall. McNees and Tutrani, along with relatives of the victims of that crash, walked to the spot where the names of Gary Dubach and Stephen Schumacher are inscribed on The Wall.

During a short ceremony McNees and Tutrani presented a part of that Huey to the sisters of the fallen. Walter McNees says, "This is the panel of the aircraft that has been restored and we would like to give it to you ladies in honor and remembrance of Gary and Stephen and we'd like to go ahead and give this to you now."

And as Laura Anderson with the National Park Service walked away with that special section of that old Huey in her hands, to place in the country's archive, we are reminded of this memorial's timeless power.

Maybe in a way, The Wall is a reflection of ourselves: all we've seen, all we've learned in one nation's collective effort to better honor and to better treat the men and women who serve, fight and die for our freedom.

The Collection: An Unprecedented Phenomenon

Due to the sheer volume of items the National Park Service cannot keep every item left behind at The Wall. For that and other reasons the agency in early November 2016 updated its Scope of Collection Statement. It spells out in detail how items will be collected and cared for.
his statement says many things about the historical importance of this collection and the unprecedented nature of visitors leaving behind so many items that speak to the healing power of The Wall.

Moving forward the Vietnam Veterans Memorial cultural collection will generally keep "Items with a discernible connection to service in the Vietnam War…" The statement adds items not added to the collection will include offerings left by school groups, perishable items, mass-produced items and objects tied to wars or movements not associated the Vietnam War.

NOVEMBER 10, 2016

Each year on or around 10 November, Marines gather in groups large and small to celebrate our history, honor the memory of those who have gone before us, and rekindle the bond that unites all generations of Marines. This year, we mark the 241st anniversary of our Corps—241 years of uncommon valor, innovation, and combat excellence.

Marines, we are part of something bigger than any of us could imagine. Whether you fought in the battles of World War I, in the Pacific during World War II, in Korea or Vietnam, in Desert Shield or Desert Storm, or in the streets of Iraq and Afghanistan—or you are just starting out on your Marine Corps journey—we are all part of an elite family of warriors. For the rest of your life, the first term people use to describe you will be "Marine."

When the Continental Congress stood up two battalions of Marines in 1775, a culture of discipline, vigilance, professionalism, and military excellence was born that has characterized our Corps for nearly two and a half centuries. As Marines, we have a profound respect for our traditions and heritage, and for taking care of each other. We know we're strongest when we're together as a team. Wherever you are celebrating our Corps' birthday this year, look around at the Marines beside you and remember the bonds forged in training, in garrison, and in combat. Take this time to reconnect.

We are Marines for life. It's our responsibility, our duty, to maintain and build upon the legacy of those who have gone before us. What we do today, guided by what we've learned from past generations, will determine the future of our Corps. So as we celebrate this 241st anniversary of our Corps, we also look ahead and prepare for our next success. Take pride in carrying our legacy forward.

Happy Birthday, Marines!
Semper Fidelis,
Robert B. Neller

HOW A MARINE UNIT BECAME "THE WALKING DEAD"

One Marine Corps unit exemplifies traditions through its actions and its enduring nickname: the Dead. Through nearly four years of combat in Vietnam, the 1st Battalion, 9th Marines earned its place in Marine Corps history. Amazing Combat Stories

In the annals of Marine Corps history there are many famous units and numerous famous men. There are tales of valor and loss.

But one unit truly exemplifies these traditions through its actions and its enduring nickname: the Walking Dead.

Through nearly four years of combat in Vietnam, the 1st Battalion, 9th Marines earned its place in Marine Corps history.

Lance Cpl. Spencer Cohen, rifleman with 1st platoon, Alpha Company, Battalion Landing Team 1st Battalion, 9th Marine Regiment, 24th Marine Expeditionary Unit, traverses a path for his team through rocky terrain during a mechanized assault as part of a live fire range in Djibouti, Africa, March 29. (Photo by Sgt. Alex C. Sauceda)

The 1st Battalion first arrived in Vietnam in June 1965 as part of the troop increase and escalation that year as U.S. forces took over most combat operations from the South Vietnamese. By August they were involved in offensive combat operations as part of Operation Blastout — a search and clear mission.

More missions continued throughout 1965 and into 1966. In their first year in Vietnam the Marines of 1/9 would conduct hundreds of company-sized or larger missions. The Marines of the 1st battalion, as part of a greater effort by the 9th Marine Regiment, also developed the SPARROW HAWK concept. This was essentially a heliborne quick reaction force that could be called in to help win a fight in which Marines on patrol had found themselves. The 1st Battalion, 9th Marines then rotated out of Vietnam for a few brief months beginning in October 1966.

When the unit returned in December 1966 the operations tempo greatly increased. The 1st battalion Marines started 1967 with the anti-climactic Operation Deckhouse V. From there operations picked up in the 9th Marines tactical area of responsibility. This area just south of the Demilitarized Zone became known as "Leatherneck Square" for the high number of Marine casualties. The Marines there swore the wind, rather than blowing, made a sucking sound. It was in this area that the 1st Battalion 9th Marines became the legendary Walking Dead.

The battalion participated in three phases of Operation Prairie within Leatherneck Square. Casualties were heavy as the Marines conducted search-and-destroy missions. In less than a month through mid-1967, Marine casualties during Prairie IV were 167 killed, and over 1,200 wounded.

In July, 1/9 participated in Operation Buffalo, a clearing mission up Highway 561. On the first day of the operation, July 2, the Marines of A and B companies encountered strong NVA resistance. The fighting was bitter. The NVA used flamethrowers to burn the vegetation and force the Marines into the open. An NVA artillery round wiped out the entire company headquarters for B company.

Soon the commander of 1/9 sent in C and D companies to relieve the battered Marines. With significant support they were finally able to force the NVA to break contact. The battalion suffered 84 Marines killed and 190 wounded. The next day only 27 Marines from B company and 90 from A company were fit for duty.

A combination of the remnants of Companies A and C several days later was able to get some payback on the NVA, inflicting 154 enemy killed. By the middle of July Operation Buffalo came to an end. Almost immediately the men of the 9th Marines were back in action as part of Operation Kingfisher in the Western portion of Leatherneck Square. This operation drug on until the end of October 1967. The sporadic but intense combat saw another 340 Marines killed and over 1,400 wounded in Leatherneck Square.

January 1968 found the battalion reinforcing the infamous Khe Sanh Combat Base just south of the Demilitarized Zone and west of Leatherneck Square. The Marines at Khe Sanh not only held the base but also fought in the hills surrounding it. Just over a week before the Tet Offensive began on January 30, 1968, the North Vietnamese began laying siege to Khe Sanh. Some 6,000 Marines, including 1/9, would endure daily shelling and close-combat for 77 days before being relieved. In all, 205 Americans were killed and over 1,600 wounded defending Khe Sanh. A further 200 Marines died in the bloody fighting in the hills surrounding Khe Sanh.

The lifting of the siege was hardly the end for the Walking Dead though. Immediately upon relief of duty from the defense of Khe Sanh they began Operation Scotland II to clear the area nearby. Following the conclusion of Scotland II, the Marines of 1/9 returned to the Con Thien area and took part in Operation Kentucky. This action would last until near the end of 1968.

In early 1969, the 1st battalion, as part of the larger 9th Marine Regiment, launched Operation Dewey Canyon, the last major Marine Corps operation in Vietnam. During this time the Marines swept through the NVA controlled A Shau valley and other areas near the DMZ. In a heroic action on February 22, 1968, then-Lt. Wesley Fox earned the Medal of Honor. The Marines suffered over 1,000 casualties during the operation. The entire regiment was awarded a Presidential Unit Citation for their extraordinary heroism during Operation Dewey Canyon.

The Walking Dead — along with the rest of the 9th Marines — redeployed from Vietnam in the summer of 1969 to Okinawa.

The name "the Walking Dead" was originally used by Ho Chi Minh talking about the Marines in the A Shau valley. Later, after the 1stBattalion suffered extraordinarily high casualty rates, they used the term to describe themselves. Of a standard battalion strength of 800 Marines, the battalion had 747 killed in action with many times that number wounded. They also were in sustained combat operations for just short of four years. Both of these are Marine Corps records.

The unit was disbanded in mid-2000, reactivated for Operation Enduring Freedom and Operation Iraqi Freedom, then was disbanded again in 2015.

REFLECTIONS

By Glenn Griffin
Delta Co 1/1

Its been a month since returning from San Antonio Reunion. Since returning I have undergone major surgery for cancer and will shortly start a series of radiation and chemo treatments. This is second go around did this seven years ago. Agent orange seems to be relentless as the NVA at TET.

Times like these tend to motivate me to reflect on life experiences. A year ago I sent a note to me kids and grandkids with a copy of Red Clay Magazine. That particular issue contained article on my Battalions' 1/1/ memorial dedication at Quantico.

Thanks to Tom Eichler and all Khe Sanh Vets for providing an outlet for us old beaten up guys can rally around. I can't express how fortunate I feel to be a member of this great group and will be no matter how long I hang around.

I am attaching a copy of note I sent to my family and once again want to express the gratitude to Tom for publishing our event in the Red Clay. The magazine itself is one of the best historical references and chronicle of what we experienced and until a few years ago we were scorned by our own countrymen.

December 24th, 2015

Dear kids and grandkids;

I want to wish all a very Merry Christmas and Happy New year. As a different and special gift I want you all to have a copy of a magazine called Red Clay. It is a publication from Khe Sanh Veterans Organization to which I am a member. This is one of the groups that mom and I enjoy a reunion every year. It is composed of Marines , Army, Air Force , and Navy veterans who served in the Khe Sanh Area during the Vietnam War. It was also where one of the largest and longest battle of the war was fought. I was lucky to survive this duty but lost some of my best buddies during the three months we fought there.

The reason I want all of you to have this copy of Red Clay is because it includes an article and pictures of a dedication of a special monument to my Battalion and the 567 men we lost during the war. This is a project that was initiated by myself and a buddy by the name of Bill Ring. It started as an idea in North Myrtle Beach a couple of years ago and grew into a major accomplishment and monument that will last as long as our country survives. It is located at the marine Corps Museum in Quantico Virginia. I hope all of you will get to see it in person someday. It will be there long after all of the men who served in 1/1 during 1965-71 including me will have passed on ot guard heavens streets.

The Article itself is titled the Journey and starts on Page 70 of the Magazine. A speech given by a good friend of mine Rob Koury gives a great snapshot of what life was like for a combat marine during those times. In addition there are some great pictures located towards the back of this issue of the monument itself and parts of the ceremonies. Even better than this are some videos you can view on our website or u tube of the ceremonies.

Please keep this magazine to share with the kids and maybe someday their kids. There are also some photos of your mom in this issue. She enjoys these times so much and of course all the folks just love your mom. The closest friends a person ever has are those who served together in life and death situations. The war continues to haunt us as Agent Orange is killing off veterans with cancers that are caused from chemicals used in the war. I was lucky mine was caught early enough to treat it.

The things I am most proud of in my life are my wife, kids and grandkids that would not have ever happened if I wasn't blessed by God to make it home. The next most important and proudest thing is my time in the USMC and the great guys I served with. I hope that none of you will ever have to experience war but I know you would do your part to preserve the freedoms and great life this country has created since 1776.

HILL 64 KHE SANH

By John "Jack" Wells
A CO 1/7 & H Btry 3/11

In January 2016 I was contacted by US Army Captain, Dustin Colegate. He had read the chapter in Class of 67 about 2ndLt Terry Roach who was killed along with 23 of his 1st Platoon men in the attack on Hill 64 on 8 February 1968. Capt. Colegate's grandfather was one of the Marines who died that day.

Captain Colegate was attending Expeditionary Warfare School, an advance Infantry school at Quantico, VA, and he was the only officer in the class that had a relative that died during the siege at Khe Sanh. Because of that, he was assigned to make a presentation to the class about the battle at Khe Sanh.

Capt. Colegate asked if we could meet in Vietnam and if I could arrange to go to the hill where his grandfather, PFC William Colegate, 1st Platoon, Alpha Co. 1/9 was killed.

He was able to get DOD approval for a trip to Vietnam and arrived at Da Nang on 3 April. A few days later I arranged for a vehicle and driver to take us to Khe Sanh and also arranged for a guide. During my time in Vietnam with 7th and 11th Marines, I did not get farther north than Phu Bai, so all I had were the grid coordinates for the Alpha 1, Hill 64 position.

I was referred to Pham Cam Thach, a DMZ tour guide, who said she could take us to Hill 64. We met her at a restaurant in Dong Ha and then the hour trip to Khe Sanh. Thach had secured permission to enter the coffee plantation that was now part of Hill 64 and knew of an old jeep path that led towards the hill.

It had been raining part of that afternoon and when the jeep trail ended, we left the vehicle and proceeded on foot. Seeing how it was now late in the afternoon and muddy from the rain, we did not stay long. It would have been great to have someone who was on Hill 64 to point out where the different defensive positions were located.

Before we left, Dustin and I embedded a USMC emblem on one of the coffee trees in memory of his grandfather and the other brave men of 1st Platoon. By fate, I happened to spot, barely visible, in the wet red clay of Hill 64, a plate from a flak jacket. After Capt. Radcliffe's relief force repelled the remaining NVA attackers after first light on 8 February, the survivors of 1st Platoon were evacuated and the position abandoned and destroyed by air strikes that afternoon. Gear and some flak jackets that were abandoned were forever scattered by the air strikes. I told Dustin that it was possible that the plate from the flak jacket belonged to his grandfather, and gave the plate to Capt. Colegate.

MERRY CHRISTMAS, MY FRIEND

By Lance Corporal James M. Schmidt

Twas the night before Christmas, he lived all alone,
In a one bedroom house made of plaster & stone.
I had come down the chimney, with presents to give, And to see just who in this home did live.

As I looked all about, a strange sight I did see,
No tinsel, no presents, not even a tree. No stocking by the fire, just boots filled with sand, On the wall hung pictures of a far distant land.

With medals and badges, awards of all kind,
A sobering thought soon came to my mind.
For this house was different, unlike any I'd seen,
This was the home of a U.S. Marine.

I'd heard stories about them, I had to see more,
So I walked down the hall and pushed open the door. And there he lay sleeping, silent, alone,
Curled up on the floor in his one-bedroom home.

He seemed so gentle, his face so serene, Not how I pictured a U.S. Marine. Was this the hero, of whom I'd just read, Curled up in his poncho, a floor for his bed?

His head was clean-shaven, his weathered face tan,
I soon understood, this was more than a man. For I realized the families that I saw that night, Owed their lives to these men, who were willing to fight.

Soon around the Nation, the children would play,
And grown-ups would celebrate on a bright Christmas day. They all enjoyed freedom, each month and all year, Because of Marines like this one lying here.

I couldn't help wonder how many lay alone,
On a cold Christmas Eve, in a land far from home.
Just the very thought brought a tear to my eye,
I dropped to my knees and I started to cry.

He must have awoken, for I heard a rough voice,
"Santa, don't cry, this life is my choice. I fight for freedom, I don't ask for more, My life is my God, my country, my Corps."

With that he rolled over, drifted off into sleep,
I couldn't control it, I continued to weep. I watched him for hours, so silent and still, I noticed he shivered from the cold night's chill.

So I took off my jacket, the one made of red,
And covered this Marine from his toes to his head.
Then I put on his T-shirt of scarlet and gold,
With eagle, globe and anchor emblazoned so bold.

Although it barely fit me, I began to swell with pride, And for one shining moment, I was Marine Corps deep inside. I didn't want to leave him so quiet in the night, This guardian of honor so willing to fight.

But half asleep he rolled over, and in a voice clean and pure, Said "Carry on, Santa, it's Christmas Day, all's secure." One look at my watch and I knew he was right. Merry Christmas, my friend, Semper Fi and good night.

James M. Schmidt wrote this poem back in 1986 while a Lance Corporal stationed in Washington, D.C., serving as Battalion Counter Sniper at the Marine Barracks 8th & I under Commandant P.X. Kelly and Battalion Commander D.J. Myers [in 1986].

Schmidt hung this poem on the door of the Gym in the BEQ. When Colonel Myers came upon it, he read it and immediately had copies sent to each department at the Barracks and promptly dismissed the entire Battalion early for Christmas leave. The poem was placed that day in the Marine Corps Gazette, distributed worldwide, and later submitted to Leatherneck Magazine.

Schmidt's original version, entitled "Merry Christmas, My Friend," was published in Leatherneck (Magazine of the Marines) in December 1991, "Gyrene Gyngles," Page 79. As Leatherneck wrote of the poem's author in 2003:

By-Laws
Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc.;
Wisconsin Corporation

I. Name: The name of the corporation shall be Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc.

II. Purpose: The purpose of the Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc shall be a fraternal association of veterans of the Vietnam War as set forth below and other purposes approved by the Board of Directors or voting members, authorized by chapter 181 of the Wisconsin Statutes and in accord with Section 501(c)(19) of the Internal Revenue Code.

A) General Purpose:

1) To promote renewed fellowship of all who lived and served in the area of, or in direct support of, Khe Sanh, Quang Tri Province, Republic of Vietnam, during the period of 1954 through and including 1975;

2) To locate and account for all who so served;

3) To promote preservation of an accurate historical account of such service;

4) To promote research, understanding and healing with a regard to those who so served; and, to promote artistic expression of the Khe Sanh experience.

B) Non Profit: None of the aforementioned objectives shall be construed to authorize the association to conduct activities for monetary profit or financial gain, to attempt to influence legislation, or to engage in any activity not consistent with the organization status as any exempt organization under 501(c)(19) of the Internal Revenue Code.

III. Members:

A) Criteria: Persons who satisfy the following criteria shall be eligible for voting membership in and affiliation with the association:

1) Any and all persons who were members of the Armed Forces of the United States of America, allied military forces and civilians assigned to support U. S. and allied military forces who lived at or served in the area of, or in direct support of, Khe Sanh, Quang Tri Province, Republic of Vietnam, during the period of 1954 through and including 1975.

2) All such persons who pay dues shall be considered a voting member in good standing.

3) Dues shall be established in the amount of $40.00 per year, or such other amount as the Board of Directors may establish from time to time. The annual dues payment may be satisfied by a single (life membership payment) lump sum payment of $250.00. The lifetime membership fee may be adjusted from time to time by the Board of Directors.

B) Friends/Associates Unit: The association shall provide for a Friends/Associates unit of non-voting members. A Friend/Associate non-voting membership may be granted to any spouse or relative within two (2) degrees of consanguinity of a member, or any other interested person who supports the purposes of the organization. However, at least seventy five (75) percent of all Friends/Associate members must be war veterans, or related to a war veteran within two (2) degrees of consanguinity (ie. grandparent, brother, sister and grandchild represent the most distant allowable relationship). All Friends! Associates members shall pay dues as set forth in paragraph III) A) 3) and these funds shall be paid directly to the association.

C) Voting Members: Voting members in good standing shall have all privileges of membership and shall be entitled to one vote (1) on any matter requiring a vote.

D) Non-Voting Members: Non-voting members shall be members of the Friends/Associates Unit whose applications for membership have been approved by the Board of Directors and who have paid the prescribed membership fee. Non-voting members shall be entitled to receive publications, attend meetings and have any other association privileges, but they shall not be entitled to vote.

E) Removal of Members: Upon a recommendation by a vote of seventy five (75) percent of the Board of Directors and for just cause, members may be removed from the organiza tion.

F) Meetings of Members:

i) Annual Meeting: In each calendar year, an annual meeting of members shall be held at a time and place as determined by the Board of Directors. The Board of Directors shall give at least thirty (30) days written notice of an annual meeting to each member (voting or non-voting) at the address of the member shown in the records of the association. It shall be the responsibility of each member to inform the association of any change in address.

ii) Special Meetings: Special meetings of members may be called by the President, by a majority of the Board of Directors, or by a written request signed by five (5) percent of the voting members. Special meetings shall be on five (5) days written notice, which shall describe generally the specific business to be transacted at the meeting.

iii) Place of Meetings: All meetings of members shall be held within the United States of America.

iv) Voting: Voting shall be by voting members present at a meeting. Proxy voting shall not be allowed.

v) Procedure: Meetings shall be conducted pursuant to Robert's Rules of Order unless some other procedure is approved by a two-thirds (2/3) vote of voting members present and voting.

vi) Adjournment: Meetings may be adjourned by the Board of Directors from time to time without further notice.

IV. Directors:

IV) Directors:

A) Number: The management of the association shall be vested in a Board of Directors consisting of no more than (13) voting members.

B) Powers of Directors: The Board of Directors shall have the authority to manage the business of the association to the extent provided by Wisconsin law. However, the Board of Directors shall not disperse association funds for any charitable purpose unless such dis bursement has been approved by a majority of the voting members present and voting at an authorized meeting.

C) Eligibility:

i) Only voting members of the association who honorably served in the Armed Forces of the United States of America may hold any position on the Board of Directors of the association.

ii) Within forty five (45) days of election or appointment to any position on the Board of Direc tors of the association, that voting member must provide the Board of Directors acceptable proof of honorable service in the Armed Forces of the of the United States of America; only official documents which verify an Honorable Discharge or a General Discharge Under Hon orable Conditions are acceptable qualifying proof of honorable service.

D) Term: The term of each member of the Board of Director shall be two (2) years. Terms shall be staggered with six (6) of the positions commencing in even numbered years and six 6) of the positions commencing in odd numbered years. In the odd number years, the election of the four (4) Members-at-Large shall take place after the election of the President and Treasurer. In even number years, the election of the four (4) Members-at-Large shall take place after the election of the Vice President and the Secretary.

E) Election: Election of the Board of Directors shall take place at the annual meeting of voting members. Each voting member may cast one (1) vote for each position open for election at such meeting. Election shall be awarded to the candidates receiving the largest number of votes.

F) Vacancies:

i) In the event of a vacancy on the Board of Directors, the President shall appoint a qualified voting member to fill the vacancy for the remainder of the term for that position.

ii) Should a voting member hold two (2) positions as authorized in paragraph V) D), the President shall appoint an additional Member-at-Large for the remainder of the term for the open position.

G) Meeting of Directors:

i) Annual Meeting: There shall be an annual meeting of Board of Directors held immediately prior to the annual meeting of members. The Board of Directors shall give at least thirty (30) days written notice of the annual Board of Directors meeting at the same time notice is given of the annual membership meeting.

telephone conference call or other satisfactory electronic means.

iv) Place of Meetings: All meetings of Board of Directors shall be held within the United States of America.

v) Voting: Voting shall be by members of the Board of Directors present at the meeting, or actively participating if by telephone conference call or other electronic means. Proxy voting shall not be allowed.

vi) Procedure: Meetings shall be conducted pursuant to Robert's Rules of Order unless some other procedure is approved by a two-thirds (2/3rds) vote of members of the Board of Directors present and voting.

vii) Alternate Voting Procedures: Acting by unanimous consent or conducting meet ings telephonically or through other electronic means shall be permitted to the extent and under the conditions permitted by law.

H) Quorum: A majority of members of the Board of Directors shall constitute a quorum for the purpose of conducting a meeting. Directors may be present in person, by telephone or by other satisfactory electronic means to be fully informed on the issues discussed.

I) Compensation: Members of the Board of Directors shall receive no compensation but shall be entitled to reimbursement of out-of-pocket expenses as approved by a majority vote of the Board of Directors. There shall be no reimbursement for transportation, lodging or per diem expenses incurred unless prior approval is obtained by a majority vote of the Board of Directors.

J) Indemnification: Members of the Board of Directors shall be entitled to indemnification for actions taken while conducting the business of the association to the extent permitted by Wisconsin law.

K) Committees: The President may establish any standing or special committee as he deems appropriate, provided that such committees may not exercise the powers of the Board of Directors and all decisions and determinations are subject to formal approval by the Board of Directors.

V. Officers of the Association:

A) In General: The officers of the association shall consist of a President, a Vice Presi dent, a Secretary, a Treasurer, the Immediate Past President and eight (8) Members-at-Large. The Immediate Past President shall be entitled to vote on all issues and shall be in cluded in the number of members of the Board of Directors.

B) Election and Terms: The officers shall be elected by the voting members as outlined in paragraph IV), C) of these By-Laws. A member of the Board of Directors may be removed at any time for just cause by a two-thirds (2/3) vote of the Board of Directors.

C) Duties: The duties of each office shall include, but not be limited to, duties pre scribed bylaw and those additional duties set forth below. The President may assign addition al duties to any member of the Board of Directors as he deems appropriate.

i) President: The President shall generally manage the day-to-day operations of the association subject to the direction of the Board of Directors. The President shall preside at all meetings of the Board of Directors and voting members. A person seeking the office of President and Vice President is required to have served a minimum of four (4) years on the Board of Directors of the Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc ii) Vice President: The Vice President shall exercise the duties of the President in the absence or incapacity of the President. If the President should die, resign, or be removed from office, the Vice President shall succeed to the office of the President.

iii) Secretary: The Secretary shall maintain all records of the association and shall prepare minutes of all meetings of the Board of Directors and members.

iv) Treasurer: The Treasurer shall have custody of the funds of the association and shall maintain all financial records of the association. The Treasurer shall report to the Board of Directors and the voting members on the financial status of the association.

v) Members-at-Large: The Members-at-Large are directors of the association who shall take part in all meetings of the association; they shall participate in conducting the business of the association and shall perform such necessary duties as assigned by the President.

vi) Sergeant-at-Arms: The Sergeant-at-Arms is a non-voting position on the Board of Directors. The President will appoint an appropriately qualified voting member to serve as the Sergeant-at-Arms at each venue where the Board of Directors and voting members conduct meetings. The Sergeant-at-Arms shall be responsible for maintaining order during all meetings. The Sergeant-at-Arms shall ensure that only qualified voting members vote at general and special meetings of the association; he shall collect and count any and all written ballots when secret elections or other secret votes are conducted.

vii) Chaplain: The President will appoint an appropriately qualified individual to serve as Chaplain, which is a non-voting position on the Board of Directors. The Chaplain shall be responsible for providing the pastoral services to the association.

viii) Parliamentarian: The President shall appoint an appropriately qualified voting member as a Parliamentarian; said Parliamentarian will be responsible for maintaining proper decorum during all meetings of the association.

D) One (1) voting member may hold no more than two (2) of the elected offices, except that the offices of President and Vice President and President and Secretary may not be combined.

VI. Amendment: These By-Laws may be amended by a vote of two-thirds (2/3) of the voting members of the association present and voting at a meeting duly called for such purpose. Written notice of the meeting must be given to each voting member at least sixty (60) days prior to the date of the meeting. Prior to any vote to amend these By-Laws, the members must have had the opportunity to review and comment on the proposed changes.

VII. Dissolution:

A) This association may only be dissolved at any meeting of the voting members upon a two thirds (2/3) vote of all voting members present and in good standing, provided that an an-

B) In the event the association is dissolved, the assets of the association shall first be equally distributed between the National Military Medical Museum and Youth Education Center and the Fisher Foundation, provided said organization (s) qualify as an exempt organization under the Internal Revenue Code of the United States, as amended, or any successor statute thereto.

If said organization is not qualified, or is no longer in existence, the assets shall be distributed to such other similar qualifying entity as determined by a two thirds (2/3rds) vote of the voting members attending the meeting; provided that any organization receiving the assets of the association agrees to maintain all memorial plaques created by the Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc.

Approved this 01 day of September, 2012.
