Veterans Day, November 11, 2016 at the Living Memorial Sculpture Garden, Weed, CA.

By Craig W. Tourte

Though the day was forecast with cold and rain, a small gathering of Khe Sanh and Vietnam Veterans once again came to these hallowed grounds where the sculptures inspired and created by Dennis Smith replicate the painful experience and very personal sacrifice, bravery and horrors of those who have engaged in armed conflicts. There is a poem in the Living Memorial Sculpture Garden pamphlet that begins with the words, "A place to remember where we have been. A place to remember what we've been through. A place to remember those faces so well of friends and loved ones..." Dennis Smith is a former Marine and survivor of the historic and horrific Siege of the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh in what was then the country of South Vietnam. Dennis is quoted as saying, "Each sculpture has personal meaning for me in terms of life experiences and personal incidents."

So, we gather together to pay homage to those who have gone before us. As others are enjoying a "day off on this holiday" many make the often long and difficult journey past the diminutive mountain towns of Mount Shasta and Weed into the Northern shadows of majestic Mount Shasta, 14,179 feet high, observed from 150 miles away. A journey made specifically to honor and pay tribute to our fallen warriors. A place that is reverently significant for those of us who served at Khe Sanh.
It was once again an honor and privilege to be in the presence of Khe Sanh and Vietnam Veterans who made the journey.

Nearly 50 of the some 184 classmates from the 1966 year at Marine Corps officer training at The Basic School reunited at the school on Oct. 21, 2016. The 50th reunion was the largest the classmates had had since their five-month training at the school ahead of Vi etnam. Article & additional pictures on pages 37 to 40

Larry Friese and Anthony Zinni, alumni of the Basic School Class 1-66, which gathered aboard Marine Corps Base Quantico Oct. 3 and 4 for its first-ever reunion 51 years after graduating, pose together in the Leatherneck Gallery at the National Museum of the Marine Corps. Friese spent 5 years and one month as a prisoner of war in the Hanoi Hilton in Vietnam and later became an oceanographer for the Navy. Zinni is a retired Marine Corps general who served as commander in chief of United States Central Command from 1996 to 2000.

WERE YOU IN COMBAT?
SMALL WORLD JOURNAL 27 MAR 2015
Keith Nightingale

For some, the time of combat is just the length of the tour. For others, they are always at war. For some, facets of a personal war are shrouded in the labyrinth of the mind-only to occasionally emerge to be seen by others. For all who experienced it, combat is a constant-sometimes controlled, sometimes not as are all life events. The person you see across the room or sitting in the subway may be in a place you cannot travel and he or she is dealing with issues you cannot see but they are very real. If the mind contains the distilled residue of the person's experience, some live constantly in a very dark and ferocious place while others may be blessed with sunshine. It's all very personal.

The smoke of battle may clear the field, but its residue resides in the minds of those who first saw its shades, tremors and drifts erupt at time since passed. A spark of suggestion may bring it back from the darkest recesses to which the individual relegated it to the brightest light of recognition and reaction. The war is always with you.

To some, it is shallow and always present-obscuring and modifying the present with highlights from the past. To others, it sits in quiet solitude amongst the denser neurons and erupts after only the strongest of impulses and the passage of time It is the shadow world of the mind and resides within anyone who has seen the tiger who always awaits a moment to spring forth and alter the present peace with the residue of the personal past.

Each participant in our wars returns with a personal kit of both controls and the uncontrolled and un programmable impulse of memories- One to counterbalance the other. Each person works to deal with a world they left in their own way-succeeding or failing as personal nature and makeup dictates while the constant combat between impulses and controls ebbs and flows within.

A child looks at his father, returned from his last of several deployments and asks the question-"Were you in combat?" For those that experienced the great difference between just deploying and serving and those that were seriously mortally engaged, the answer would have to be Yes…..But…..it's not that simple and much less opaque to the participant.

Combat changes people. It is not a simple matter of leaving it all behind when one boards the plane to return home. Everyone has some secret file cabinets of the mind that store the emotionally searing moments and darker residue of their lives. For the combat veteran, this vault can be quite extensive and subject to un programmed withdrawals and viewings. The human coping mechanism provides a variety of resolutions that each person draws upon to keep the vault closed and unknown to his or her domestic companions and relationships.

On the surface, there appears normally. Underneath, the suppressive mechanisms are hard at work keeping the darkness away. In many cases, the bearer is unaware of the activities until in some specific moment, gesture or scene, the past becomes present and a new part of the person is noted. Domestic relationships become adjusted as new aspects of a personality emerge. New obsessions, behavioral patterns, long moments of silence, inability to communicate as in the past or just a distant eye on a quiet day indicating the vault is opening. "Yes. I was in combat today-and always will be."

Walking through a farm field, aspects of the terrain take on new significance. Fields of fire are mentally plotted. The best defensive terrain is selected. Likely avenues of approach are scanned and noted. The new corn and soybean fields are seen as visual distractors as the mental military calculus unfolds-not to be noted by the walking companion who sees only the progress of the green. The fields he walked as a boy with his father are no longer friendly.

Crossing the street, a judgment is made as to sniper placement, the best building access point, the location of covering forces and the best position for over watch. Starbucks is just across the walkway but there is an imaginary platoon securing its perimeter.

The most important game of the year is on the tube a bright Sunday morning. A phone rings and a conversation unfolds. The game is ignored for considerable time. The conversationalists agree to meet at a specific time and place. The life partner mentions the conflict with an important family event. Unfortunate but this is more important and has to be done. This person on the other end was with me one dark day.

The helicopter ambulance passes overhead. A quick glance from sound to sight opens the vault full wide. Out pours a scene of some time ago with dust, smoke, streaking tracers, sudden explosions and enshrouding dark silence accompanied by great pain. No one else sees that but the one that opened the vault. Despite his location, he is in combat.

In a quiet moment, he can hear past conversations that are unheard by other people in the room. They are of hard cynical jokes with a morbid dark sense of humor. He hears the talk and in his mind's eye the faces of his fellow soldier's with shoulders against the mud dike of an unnamed village just discernible in the silver grey light of a dawn. We survived the night. Now we have to work on the day. "One more day God. One more day." There is a pause in the room while everyone looks at him as he returns from his world to theirs.

The kitchen has always been the repository of the best of family feelings. The aroma of a roast, a soup or a favorite pastry unlocks the most pleasant of memories. Sometimes, for whatever reason of stimulus-the aroma changes. It is harsh with cordite, hot JP 4 and the ugly deep breath of a newly opened abdomen. Blood has a unique odor that lingers far longer than it takes to wash off the hand. The reason for the sudden grimace amongst all the goodness is lost on the room. To clear his head, he walks out the door. The rich earth of his home yard as he rakes the rose bed suddenly becomes that pungent odor of the village last cleared. He is back from the war but he is still in combat.

Purple Hearts are awarded for wounds received in combat. The regulations require that they be the result of hostile action and require medical treatment. For those that receive the award, the wound is and was obvious. There is no provision for mental wounds and the weight carried by each combat participant as he or she struggles to keep that dark vault closed. Observers are privy to moments but never see the whole catalogue enclosed in the labyrinth of the mind. There is no Purple Heart authorization for wounds not seen and not treated-but they are wounds nonetheless. The child's innocent question-"Were you in combat?"-requires an affirmative answer. "Yes.I was in combat and I am now." There are many more wounds than awards.

FIFTY YEARS AGO

by former L/Cpl
Frederick Monahan Echo CO
2/3 Khe Sanh Vietnam-

Amphibious Ready Group #79.5 carrying 1,900 Marines and Sailors of Special Landing Force Bravo was headed east toward Subic Bay to secure overdue liberty for its crew, resupply fresh water and fuel and take on waiting crew replacements. Second Battalion, Third Marine Regiment and HMM-164 were aboard the USS Tripoli and USS Ogden and along for the ride and didn't complain that liberty was forty-eight hours away as long as inspections were passed.

The sun was setting on the South China Sea looking astern. With my newly issued M-16, I went to the fantail before early morning chow and saw the sun was rising in the ship's wake the same place as it was setting the night before. Just then the ship's captain announced we had gotten orders overnight to reverse course and return to I Corps Combat Tactical Zone waters and that liberty for crew was postponed.

This was on or about April 24, 1967. Only something serious would cause this change of course but no one knew anything except to follow orders. Orders called for 2/3 to disembark by landing craft and H-46s on the beach of a barrier island. To the hundreds of new Marines just picked up in Okinawa, this was what they joined for. After three days of pounding our boots into the sand dunes and checking out deserted fishing villages we were ordered to cease our mission and immediately proceed to the west side of the island. There we were picked up by one of the assortment of helicopters, some Republic of South Vietnam Air Force, Marine and U. S. Army and U.S. Navy and shuttled minutes away to the tarmac at Phu Bai.

We were desperately needed somewhere else. We waited an hour as the choppers returned with more 2/3 Marines. We boarded a C-130 and took off to the unknown, landing at Khe Sanh. A mysterious combat base in the north west corner of South Viet Nam surrounded by mountains. From the west end of the base we could see our fighter jets bombing and strafing and buzzing the highest hills to the northwest. I thought, 'Whatever the problem is, those jets will eliminate it and we won't have to go out there.'

Within an hour we columned up and stepped over the single strand of concertina wire and headed toward Hill 861 about two miles away. The trail led around smaller hills, across small streams and up and down gullies taking almost two hours to reach the base of Hill 861. Before us was a long gradual slope to the summit. We stopped only a few seconds to view three elephants, two adults and baby, about four hundred yards to our left. About half way up three raggedy assed Marines, gaunt and unshaven, wearing cut off shorts asked us for cigarettes as they approached us. We paused and asked them their outfit and couldn't help observing the contrast between our fresh starched and pressed pre camo utilities with shined brass and boots just and their battle worn condition.

They identified themselves as a remnant of a Bravo Company 1/9 platoon; all three of them. We then gave them more cigarettes. They said they were guarding Hill 861 for days with no food. Now late in afternoon of 28 April 1967, Echo Company bunched up having reached our objective. I always believed Golf and Hotel Companies had reached Hill 861 that morning and went beyond it toward Hill 881N. The Marines who had time in country first heard the rounds out of the North Vietnamese 82mm mortar squads one each almost a thousand yards to the northeast, the north and the west

The time in country Marines ran for the NVA fox holes on the rim of Hill 861 for cover. The new replacements just stood bewildered on the hilltop until the first mortar hit then followed the veterans to remaining cover. I ran toward the first explosion knowing subsequent rounds would not hit exactly in its crater. The east side of 861 had a drop off made most likely the result of the last few days air strikes. It appeared a bomb had blown out the top side of the hill which I jumped off onto the heads of Echo Co. Marines hugging the wall of the bombed out hill and lighting cigarettes.

With the amount of Marines bunched up on top of 861 and the amount of NVA mortar rounds, there were little to no casualties that I remember but Marines with minor wounds may have been instructed to walk back to Khe Sanh. I walked around the perimeter and counted the well camouflaged NVA bunkers fighting holes now occupied by 2/3 Marines, and reported the totals to Echo Co. First Sergeant, a Veteran of WWII and Korea. He pointed to an NVA fighting hole on the west side of Hill 861 to occupy for the night along with the company messenger who spoke little English.

Not suspecting the NVA to attack and face the air strikes again and like very one else having not slept much for three nights we opened "C" rations and nibbled to stay awake. An hour into daylight on 29 April a patrol returned from the northwest with what we believed were three Bravo 1/9 Marine KIAs. The back end of the patrol had armloads of the WWII Marine web gear that was standard issue that we used and called "782 gear." They said it was found in a fox hole a few hundred yards away. Either stashed there by NVA or Marines to deny use by the NVA. I used my poncho and one borrowed to cover the bodies.

On the west slope of Hill 861 Echo Co. formed into a column to move out toward our objective Hill 881N. In the hills on our left flank was Kilo and Mike 3/3 together with Kilo and Mike Companies 3/9 whose objective was Hill 881S. Across the ridges on our right flank was Golf and Hotel Company 2/3 whose objective was like that of Echo Company, Hill 881N but with an approach from the northeast. Echo would attack Hill 881N from the southwest. Almost two-thousand Marines went after Ho-Chi-Minh's finest that morning. At least what was left of them after the pounding by artillery and air strikes. No one believed anyone was left on those hills to put up a resistance. One Marine joked, "The hills should be renamed 880 North and South to account for one meter of dirt blown off the tops."

Word was passed back for an Echo Co. scout to accompany the Third Division photographer with us off into the right flank to allow him to take pictures of some NVA hootch's in dense foliage on the reverse slope from Khe Sanh Combat Base. I passed the word toward the rear of the column, "Two Marines checking out the right flank." "Keep eyes open for them." He took the pictures and I turned back and after a few yards cupped my hands on each side of my mouth and half hollered in perfect English, "Photographer coming back into column."

The column proceeded along a stream bed to a fresh bomb crater next to the stream. I searched the two dead NVA soldiers for papers, etc. after slicing their pockets open with my K-Bar. One was lying in the stream water that we had filled our canteens with a short while before we discovered them. Further upstream we climbed over the debris from a bomb crater that hit the creek bank creating a dam at the bottom of a ravine about 20 yards high. As the column proceeded through the pooled water each Marine had to point out a trip wire leading to an M-26 hand grenade taped in full view to a sapling on the bank of the creek. It was obvious this was set by Marines during the fighting the last few days and I needn't send in a report with a diagram to the S-2 chief. Spent 5.56 rifle rounds from Hotel Company were snapping above us into the trees at the top of the swampy ravine. Some of the bullets would make whistling noises a TV western sound effects crew would be proud of.

Hotel company was about a quarter mile to our right flank going in an opposite direction and made contact with the NVA and called air support which dropped napalm in a draw below them. Gunnery Sergeant Ed Crawford relates that a platoon of NVA ran from their burning hiding positions on fire and screaming. Ed was 39 years old and had fought in WWII and Korea. A Marine next to him raised his rifle to sight in on running NVA and Ed scolded, "Don't fire at them." "Save ammo and let them burn." He told his men to stay in place and went down the draw alone and tripped on an NVA rifle barrel sticking out of a bush. The NVA soldier Behind it opened up and emptied a magazine between his, shredding his jungle trousers below the knee severely wounding him. He avenged his wounds before he fell. Hotel Company Marines went down with a Corpsman to carry him back to the ridge line.

Because the draw was still unsecured, Hotel Marines wouldn't let petite photographer Catherine Leroy go with them. She then walked past the stalled column and caught up to Golf Company where she stayed with Cpl. Mellon as her body guard. From the amount of spent rounds zinging over our heads while in the flooded ravine it sounded like Hotel Company was having a good time. Like at an amusement park shooting gallery.

Echo Company had to get out of that steep ravine to higher ground but couldn't. Our Engineer section from 3rd Engineers had a coil of line and sent their smallest most wiry Marine to claw to the top with one end of the rope tied to him. After he secured it to a tree the 200 + men of Echo one-by-one climbed up out of the potential ambush trap we were in. The bullets zinging over our heads stopped. When the last Marine reached the top the word passed back to bring the rope forward. where it was secured to another tree and dropped back down into the ravine. First Sergeant Patrinos (47) declared, "If anyone breaks an ankle we're going to carry you to all the way to Hanoi."

As each Echo Marine repelled down the rope Army Ranger style into a new creek and began the climb up the far bank using saplings, rocks and bulging tree roots as hand holds, a big city wise guy Marine, like myself, said, "Top, do we get Ranger pay for this?" The First Shirt replied, "No, you don't even rate Navy Sailor pay let alone Marine pay." Now we were supposed to be quiet but the NVA on Hill 881S could clearly see us but their mortar teams were out of sorts from all the bombing that turned the summit into a barren moonscape

We were carrying all kinds of weapons and gear made easier by leaving our flack jackets as ordered aboard ship. The NVA were no doubt also watching the approaching Kilo Company 3/9 over the next hill or three from us on our left flank. Scores of snipers in trees always waited until a valuable target carrying a radio or close to one entered their sights. The report from the sniper rifle would alert his dug in buddies and on our side, a Marine of lower rank would have to make a decision to take out the sniper or go around him.

We climbed a small hill or knoll covered in high grass and dug in and defended the holes with a rarely used three Marines each not knowing that right next to us were the NVA on Hill 881S, its base less than 200 yards.

First thing the next morning a squad was sent down to the creek we crossed the day before. Each Marine carried all the canteens he could manage. I picked up six myself and we took off to catch up with the detail. Being last I sat at the top of the steep creek bank. The canteens were filled at the bottom of a ten foot high waterfall we only quickly got to glance at the day before. After the last Marine struggled up the bank by reaching and clinging to roots and rocks with ten canteens stuffed in their utility jackets, I climbed down to the water fall to quickly fill the my canteens. When filled I tied them together and pulled myself uphill and saw no one was guarding for me. Back up on our position I returned the filled canteens to their owners and was asked, "Where were you, we have to move out." As company scout I would not be appointed point man for the day.

It was 30 April, 1967. Third platoon of Echo Company had already moved out. I joined up with 2nd Lt. Jim Cannon and his 2nd platoon. First platoon squad stayed on the hill to secure it if we had to pull back to higher ground. Second platoon's column departed the hill and headed north through shoulder high grass toward Hill 881N. We heard a horrendous commotion about 100 yards to our left flank about half way up Hill 881S. The rear of our column paused to watch a squad with a 3.5 rocket launcher moving parallel to us up on 881S approach a draw that instantly lit up light a Christmas Tree Taking on a high volume of automatic rifle fire from a wooded area of the draw which had escaped the bombs of the air strikes. Green tracers poured out of the draw from the top of Hill 881S forming a "V" meeting at the squad's position. Four or five Marines dropped immediately and the 3.5 rocket team ran past them to get a shot higher up into the draw with a WP round. It quieted the NVA long enough for a Corpsman to roll two wounded Marines down the steep side of Hill 881S.

The squad followed the rolling WIAs by sitting on the hillside and sliding down feet first on their seat pants kicking up dust as they slid to reach some cover. We fired a few magazines up into the draw to provide covering fire. Cannon observed a covered path running straight up 881S that the NVA made. Some of its cover had been blown off and he observed an NVA appear carrying ammo for their machine-gunners firing on the main body of Marines at the rear of the 3.5 rocket squad. He used a quickly borrowed M-16 and a Marine's shoulder to rest the rifle to get a good shot at the NVA replacements descending the covered tunnel when the NVA reached the exposed portion.

As this same time, Golf Company 2/3 was assaulting hills between Hills 861 and 881N. They had the luxury of having all the foliage denuded. It was here that while attacking NVA diehards who survived the air strikes that the world famous Life Magazine photos were taken by Catherine Leroy of Navy Corpsman Vernon Wike attending in vain to Philadelphia Lance Corporal Bill Junior "Rock" Roldan, KIA, a Boot Camp buddy from a year earlier.

The oldest 2nd Lt. in the Marine Corps and Korea veteran, 37 year old Andy McFarlane, led his platoon beyond the neutralized NVA positions into a wooded area and lost some Marines WIA and KIA He had to wait to retrieve them next day and more Golf Company Marines were lost.

On top of the hill we just spent the last night, our Echo Company CO, Captain Al Lyon radioed to Cannon's 2nd platoon, asking for a situation report? Ans: Alpha Sierra (All Secure) We aborted our assistance on the Hill 881S attack and got on with our mission. Stopping after running at a trot less than 75 yards, in back of Lt. Cannon who wore a red bandana, a single rifle shot rang out from across a narrow gully to our right rear.

An NVA sniper round aimed behind Cannon's right ear was deflected when it hit the muzzle end of an M-79 grenade launcher he had slung on his shoulder. He unslung the weapon, looked at the dented barrel and said, "This won't be of use anymore," as he tossed it into the elephant grass and rubbed his shoulder and upper arm looking for blood. God knows where the ricochet went.

After some more trotting, Lt. Cannon turned to me and said, "Return to the hill we stayed last night and bring the rest of the command group to this spot." As I neared the area from where the sniper round came, I was about to pass a tree trunk, my right foot snagged ground vines. The instant I freed it and leaned forward to run again, a sniper round creased the tree trunk inches in front of my face. I hid behind the tree for one second, then dashed out the same way I came in to the bullet bashed bark side of the tree and emptied a magazine at the tree limb I thought he was lying behind.

I went behind the same tree and tossed a grenade over to the far side of the gully, and took off running before it exploded. The XO's Command group was already off the hill and on the trail as I ran toward them. They picked up their pace and about fifty of us passed the snipers nest without incident.

As we entered the rendezvous point, Lt. Cannon's 2nd platoon was gone. I had been looking back every thirty yards or so to see if the group was keeping up with my pace and saw the point Marine holding his palm up signaling me to stop. The NVA were expecting us to assault Hill 881S but we turned our backs on 881S and started up this unnamed hill. The high grass was too dense to advance on line. Echo company XO, Lt. Adinolfi pointed up hill and I started up a narrow path with grass leaning over for concealment. The grass had to be parted to see ahead. Suddenly there was what appeared to be an NVA listening post position. 'Any second now.' I thought, nothing." Ahead a vacant NVA fighting hole. 'Again any second 'expecting a burst from just yards away.

Machine gun fire erupted from the east side of the hill and I expected it to spread to us. I heard voices ahead from up on the hill. I pulled my helmet off to hear better. Echo had walked up on this hill with four columns. The voices were from two point Marines meeting each other surprised there was no NVA opposition. In a few minutes we were a mob on top of this hill. Weapons platoon was in a fight down below the east side and lost their commander Lt. Cantor while leading a machine gun charge with a .45 in his hand he was shot three times and fell to his knees.

The medevac chopper accompanied by a COBRA for protection stayed on hovering thirty feet above us on the top of this hill and firing for all it was worth at the NVA positions down hill. The chopper was directly over me and I froze at what I thought were rounds hitting all around me when something hit my helmet. I relaxed when I realized it was expended linkage dropping. As soon as the COBRA left, 106mm recoilless from Hill 861 began blasting the trees lower down on the hill.

Platoons had formed up around the perimeter all thought we had walked up on a recently abandoned NVA command headquarters neatly dug and camouflaged bunkers and fighting holes. Each bunker had black Lima-Lima (land line) wire running from it and down the heavily wooded east side of the hill which was actually a cliff. A count of the holes and bunkers was radioed to battalion and S-2.

Echo company was mortared the next morning 1 May67. We were warned it was a big Commie Holiday and they would celebrate. Twenty incoming 82mm rounds, two KIA and six WIA. A Marine dove into an empty bunker and was immediately joined by me and another Marine behind me. The three of us hug the split bamboo walls to make room for all then see the third Marine remove his hand from below his nose to see all blood. I gave him my battle dressing and told him to bite on it. All his teeth had been blown out. Another Marine, a Chicagoan, on the hill had his lower jaw removed from the same mortar attack. They shared a medevac ride along with our air officer who lost an ear and part of his neck.

Air strikes continue on Hill 881N.The composite battalion of Kilo and Mike 3/3 and Kilo and Mike 3/9 has Hill 881S secure and are searching for their MIAs.

A kilometer to Echo's right flank, Hotel Company 2/3 chased the NVA off their positions. 3rd Engineers, 1st platoon, A Company is given the word to blow up the freshly constructed NVA bunkers. Setting the C-4 charges, a Marine from the Engineer section finds maps, flags and a Samurai sword in its scabbard. A mystery to this day. Did the sword belong to the son of a Vietnamese woman and a Japanese soldier from the occupation in 1945? Or did a 40 something WWII Japanese soldier still sore from losing 22 years earlier sign on to fight U. S. Marines for North Vietnam? And whoever they were, did they take it to South Viet Nam for good luck against the Marines? Or did they plan to behead captured U. S. Marines when they captured Khe Sanh Combat Base? A bigger mystery is who has them now? The Pennsylvania Marine demo man who found them was told, "We'll send them to the USS Ogden and you'll get the sword back aboard ship," of which he didn't believe a word.

On 2 May 67 Echo column begins assault on Hill 881N but has to turn back in strong wind and thunderstorm. After a late start from waiting for the go-ahead to assault Hill 881N, the whole of Echo Co. was strung out in a column up 881N with its tail end in a ravine when a spotter plane above asks Echo if we have completely left our last position. After checking an affirmative is given to the spotter pilot. The pilot responds, "Well there are NVA running around on your last position." The spotter then had to leave to avoid the severe storm just forming. XO Lt. Adinolfi looked at me and said, "Get back up there and fire a couple rounds in each bunker." It took ten minutes after passing the tail end of the column to reach the top where I took another deep breath and ran from bunker to bunker yelling at each one in proper Philadelphase, "YO," while ready to blast any NVA who showed his face. It was an area about the size of a baseball infield to cover and I was surprised no NVA were on base. As I reached the tail end, now point, of Echo's column, who had already started back up from this aborted mission. I sat in the pouring rain at the side of the trail and looked every passing Echo Marine in the eyes again just as I had when going up to the hill top. For some, it would be the last time.

Word was passed to reoccupy the same positions from last two nights. Our Engineers were to blow the bunkers and join the end of the column to 881N but wanted to save C-4 for later and only demolished one. Now thunder, lightning and drenching rain in receding daylight. I sat on the edge of my fighting hole which doubled as the entrance to my NVA bunker and waited for my night watch mate of the last four nights to share watch with me. He never showed. No poncho and the flack jackets were all ordered left on the USS Tripoli and Ogden to make us light infantry. No C-rats. No cigarettes or water. My old Echo 3rd platoon squad had developed a method to collect rain water by raising the right arm palm down and canteen in left hand held under the right elbow where rain water dropped in a steady fast drip in heavy rain. I wished I was with my old squad somewhere on this former NVA hill. If missing something, a buddy usually had a spare. The whole company was manning the perimeter drenched to the bone except for the tops of our heads under our helmets. I had a dry bunker but did not want to go in.

It was well after mid-night and now 3 May 67 and couldn't imagine the NVA attacking. I crept into the bunker. I lay on the woven grass mat and awoke a short time later to explosions outside. Thinking a jumpy Echo Marine had thrown a grenade, until I heard a NVA soldier shouting commands. I was lying on my stomach in two inches of rain water and pulled my knees up to kneel on my hands and knees. My M-16 in my right hand was quivering. My whole body was shaking in an uncontrollable shiver I could not shake. (years later the word hypothermia was added to my vocabulary)

On my knees in the small bunker my body shook like it was strapped to a vibrating machine in a hole in the ground. Here it was, after all the training and being sent 10,000 miles around the world and under attack by 500 NVA, it was SHOWTIME and I'm in a bunker doing push-ups. Hoping to get my muscles warm enough to stop the violent shivering and return fire with the rest of the Echo Marines. I try deep breathing taking long breaths to get oxygen. Segments from my twenty and one half years of life flashed through my mind.

Then I hear voices above. Who is that? It's in English. It's Lt. Eller (35) my former platoon commander and L/Cpl Hall with Pfc. Maio. I was glad to hear them but couldn't talk. After another deep breath I called out, "Hall, is that you?" The CO, Capt. Lyon radioed Lt. Eller to get a squad up here to assault downhill into the NVA. Hall and Maio pulled me up out of the bunker and if it were not so dark but daylight they could see the big smile on my face. There are no other Marines I would prefer to die with.

From the two days on this hill, (30Apr. and 1May) we knew there was a zig-zag trench just five yards from my hole and Hall and Maio eased down into it. just then a volley of three chi-com grenades splashed just five feet in front of us. Boiling hot mud hit the tops of our helmets and plastered my forehead and eyeglasses which protected my eyes. The explosions were immediately followed by blasts from three AK-47's. Hall yelled in a muffled voice, "Monahan, are you OK?" "Yeah. How about you?" At that point Maio opened up, then Hall, then me. Firing downhill into the dark at the darker wet forms struggling uphill in the mud. Beyond the forms was a fog from the rain and dampness. Next we hear a scream from our left front. "HELP, THEY'RE TAKING ME AWAY." Hall says, "That's Kruger." Seconds later a grenade explodes in the fog just downhill from the scream. Then silence. A squad of second platoon was KIA and Pfc. Kruger and another Marine of his third platoon fire team took over the unmanned positions. Hall and Maio took over the seemingly unmanned sector that was mine. After a few more NVA fire team uphill rushes at us, Hall and Maio were moved to another sector around the hill. In the dark, Doc Burke ran up to my bunker and asked if there was room. I stood up and exited my hole and he and another Marine with a hand blown off entered the bunker about the size of the back seat area of a VolksWagen. The wounded Marine held in his good hand his rifle which he donated to me. Bipods and all to keep it out of the mud.

Now recovered from waking up in a rain puddle, I had a field of fire covering the main trail leading up past my hole on the north end of the hill. On the back side of my three foot high dirt and log covered bunker there was no approach due to a fifteen foot drop-off in back of it.

My hole with attached bunker was right at the military crest on the north end of the nameless hill. From my hole, the top of Hill 881N could be seen and the trail the 225 strong company pounded to mud in the effort to reach Hill 881N came right up to my hole.

I removed my helmet and placed it an arms length to my left to act as a decoy to draw fire. Now this created a problem. My eyeglasses tied to my head became useless with rain smeared on them. When eyesight was needed I used a finger as a windshield wiper.

At my feet in the fighting hole was my WWII issue haversack holding six grenades, one WP grenade and a metal ammo box of 5.56mm holding hundreds of rounds. I passed the ammo box to Doc Burke and asked him to fill my magazines, all three of them.

49 years ago this past week I returned to Viet Nam after spending a month in the hospital after being wounded in Hue City on 28 February. This picture was taken at LZ Stud just outside Khe Sanh as Operation Pegasus was starting. Alpha 1/1 would be helicoptered onto Hill 861A and relieve a Company of Marines, Echo 2/26 who had been there for the 77 day seize. I would meet one Marine who was in that company that day, Barry Fixler at a MCL Golf outing a few years ago. We have become good, GREAT friends since that day. In this picture I am eating my favorite C-Rat meal, Beans and Meatballs. YES, I remember what I was eating that day. I was NEVER the same after returning to Viet Nam after being wounded. And even 49 years later I am still pissed that I wasn't.

JANUARY 21 , NOT JUST ANOTHER DATE

BY CRAIG TOURTE
HQ BTRY 1/13

We gathered once again this year at the Table Mountain Golf Course in Oroville California. As usual this luncheon, held to honor so many, would not have occurred if it were not for the unselfish devotion to Veterans like Tom Horchler.

January 21st is not just another date in time, for those who served at the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh, that date represents not only a historical battle in the annals of American history but forever a life changing event for all who served in that area of operation during the Vietnam War. On January 21st where ever a Khe Sanh Veteran finds himself, he knows he is not alone, he knows others he served with are remembering what he is remembering and feeling the painful memories and loss of the many who did not return with him. That is why on that date we gather together to commemorate that battle and to remember those who served on the base, on the hills and area of operation. To remember those who did not come home with us and to honor those who have and continue to serve.

I Tommy,

I am sending you a copy of a letter which I composed and forwarded to Congressman Doug LaMalfo 1st District, Northern California Region. I corresponded with Chaplain Ray Stubbe a few days ago and sent some pictures of our reunion, and dinner. Also told him what a great reunion it was.

This reunion was very special for me. I finally got to greet a fellow Artillery F/O/RO from A/1/13. Cpl Sam "Red" Roach attached to Echo Co. This was his first ever Khe Sanh Reunion and ours after 48 years, Tears & words flowed freely while visiting the Hill 881S memorial, A place where I spent much time when not on patrol, at Khe Sanh.

I think my letter to the Congressman may be an inspiration, to other Khe Sanh Veterans who are struggling with government bureaucracies regarding their service in Khe Sanh.

THE LETTER

Thomas Ken Soerensen
USMC, Khe Sanh Veteran
20 November 2016

Honorable
Congressman
Doug LaMalfo
1st District, Northern California Region

Dear Congressman LaMalfo,

Nearly 50 years Ago on a dark night, I disembarked a Continental Airliner, at the Marine Base located in El Toro California. I was in the company of many other Marines returning from Vietnam. Myself after a nineteen month tour. Needless to say there were no brass bands or cheering people to greet us.

The next coming months would expose me to many hateful acts by the public protesting the Vietnam war. Maybe this was just a new form of a welcome home ceremony for the battle weary survivors. It seemed like the returning dead suffering was over and the survivors ordeal began. Today, once again, we face those hateful masses, who deny freedom of choice, and freedom of speech to the American people.

For more than forty years, I have lived in an alien world, where I had few friends, meaningless jobs, and could not even find true love. Consuming alcohol became my way of feeling secure in this insecure world.

At the end of my first year of being back in the world (Home), I came to realize that the only time anything felt normal, was after I consumed large quantities of Alcohol. I sought answers and help from the VA beginning in the fall of 1968, while starting my first semester of College.

The VA informed me that I had no proof that I was suffering nightmares, deprived of sleep, fits of anger, rage and despair along with a continuous ringing in my ears.

Ten years after my discharge in 1968, I was awarded the Bronze Star Medal with a combat "V." Representatives from the Marine Corps travelled to my home in Eugene Oregon to present the award. The recommendation for the award was for actions while serving at the Khe Sanh Combat Base, Vietnam in 1967,with B CO 1/26 as a artillery F.O.

This award, along with my Purple Heart did not mean much except bring memories of all my radio operators, who had been killed in action by NVA soldiers whom daily tried to kill as many Marines as they could.

I managed to exist somehow in spite of the alcohol abuse, a failed marriage, and very few true friends. I could not settle in one place constant moving, sometimes becoming homeless.

In 2012 I was informed by a VA clinic employee from Chico, California, that I should submit for an exam for PTSD Syndrome. Again, after forty years, the VA gave me a hard time in regards to supplying proof prior to scheduling my psychiatric exam. I was then diagnosed with PTSD and awarded a minimum of 50 per cent for hearing loss, with a total 70 per sent disability rating.

During this process I became aware of the existence of documentation when I first filed for help from the VA in 1968. The letter from the VA in 1998 informing me of an examination date In LA California for P.T.S.D. was also on file. I could not make the 1998 exam since I was at that time homeless, with no transportation, and no Drivers License from a DUI conviction.

I wrote the VA a letter asking for a postponement/ rescheduling for that exam. That was the last time I ever heard from the VA regarding my P.T.S.D.

Later in 2012, I sought further help from the Butte County Veterans Services Hannah Williamson. At that time I was able to view the letters for help which I had written requesting medical help in 1968 and the letter requesting a rescheduling my exam for PTSD. All this documentation was available at the VA Regional Office in Oakland California.

When I attempted to file for Vocational Rehab or un -employability, at the Vocational Rehab office in Chico, I was informed by Mr. Larry Bonnington that I had a better chance of achieving this, if I were to become medically incapacitated. The word cancer somehow came up in our conversation. I was told that Vocational Rehab was out of the question due to my age.

I have been a healthy, physically fit person all my personal and military life, with Marine Corps Values.

During a recent ultra-sound exam of my gallstone area performed at Mather VA hospital, and a follow up Cat-Scan/MRI, some abnormalities were observed on my lug and neck.

After a follow up MRI & PET Scan, and needle biopsy, I was diagnosed with MDS cancer. It is located in my bone marrow, after a sample was taken from my right hip bone.

I am scheduled to start treatment soon, after obtaining a second opinion from Dr. Robert Greenburg at Stanford Cancer Research Medical Center on November, 2016.

Hannah Williamson has been attempting to have the Veterans Department acknowledge my existing PTSD back to the original contact date of 1998. I have personally written letters to the Assistant Director of the VA, all for naught.

I requested all of my medical records from them, After waiting for a year, I received a CD containing all my correspondence, and medical records. It included the 1998 letter from the VA informing me of my scheduled 1998 exam, and my request for another date, that never materialized.

NOTE: I have watched a presentation of a VA whistle blower who revealed that this was a common practice of the VA in the "90's. They would contact a veteran once, if there was no response there would be no further communication with the Veteran, regarding His/her PTSD.

I finally had to terminate my employment this year after my employer / agents refused to accommodate my VA Sanctioned 20 Hour maximum work week because of PTSD brought on by stress.

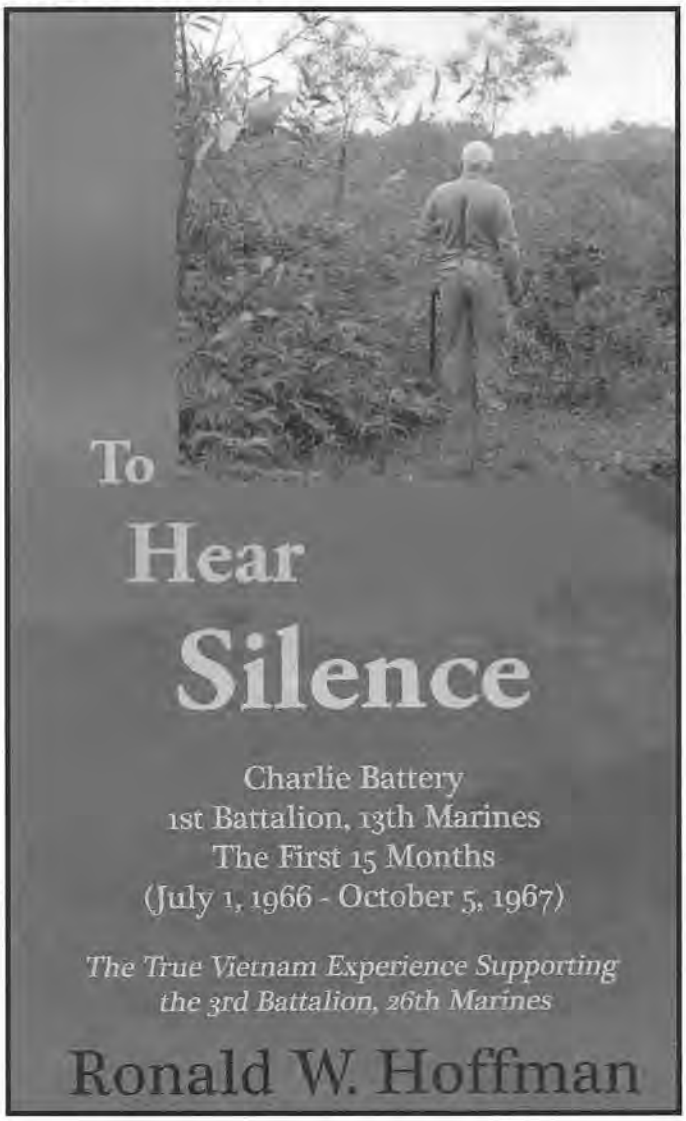
Now I am also experiencing a few of the Symptoms related to the type of cancer I have been diagnosed with. My existing PTSD deprives me of normal sleep for nearly fifty years. It is presently 0145 hours, I have been trying to sleep since 8:00 P.m.'s Now I also have nausea, headaches, and a constant fever.

My time is running out, I do not have the energy to go on trying to get the VA to right a wrong! I attend a weekly group therapy session and also one counseling session. (And have been for 3 years)

Congressman, I have spoken with you on several occasions, recently at the Oroville Air Show. I am aquatinted with Bill Connelly and a loyal supporter of you as my congressional Representative of the US Congress. If you can manage to allocate time to this matter before yoyo, I would be sincerely appreciative.

Gratefully Yours,
Thomas Ken Soerensen

BOOK REVIEW



To Hear Silence is the history of Charlie Battery, 1st Battalion, 13th Marines, from the time of its formation at Camp Horno, California, in July 1966, until the original members left Vietnam in early October 1967. Although partly written in narrative format, this book paints an accurate portrayal of the experiences of what really happened in 1966 and 1967 through its day-to-day, and often minute-to-minute, accounts of the members' time in Vietnam. This book is based on a diary kept by the author while in Vietnam, the actual declassified documents kept by the Marine Corps, and the memories of those who lived through it.

Ronald Hoffman knows the entire population of northeast Wisconsin does not even come close to the number of people who died during the Vietnam War. Anywhere from 1.5 million to 5 million people were killed during the war, he said.

It was a war Hoffman, a retired U.S. Marine living in Green Bay, knows all too well. It is also the main focus of his new book, "To Hear Silence."

Hoffman said he heard that most presentations should start with a joke.

"I could not think of a single joke about war and about people being killed," Hoffman said. "We're just going to have to skip that."

By the end of 1965, more than 200,000 American troops were deployed in Vietnam. On Jan. 27, 1966, Hoffman was drafted, which he found ironic because he had been rejected because of bad eyesight when he tried to join the military two years earlier. That changed when Congress approved the Gulf of Tonkin resolution in 1964, authorizing President Lyndon B. Johnson to use military force in Vietnam.

"It was the year we started questioning everything," Hoffman said. "Some were good things. Some were bad. After '64, everything changed. Before then, nobody even knew where Vietnam was."

Hoffman remembers all too well the night when he and his fellow Marines were attacked when he was a part of Operation Chinook, which started on Dec. 10, 1967.

Reading an excerpt from his book Wednesday, Hoffman recounted seeing fellow soldiers killed and maimed, and he questioned whether he would make it out alive.

"I slipped into my fighting hole, and it is only then I discovered the rain has washed away my poncho," Hoffman read. "Now the rain and the mud have started to join me in my hole. It is at this same time that all hell breaks loose. The North Vietnamese Army and the Viet Cong both start pounding us with mortars and rockets.

"As I lay there with the ground shaking as each mortar hits, I start to think about people I hadn't seen in years, and I start to wonder, is this the way it is before you die? I start to think, will the next round hit on top of me? God, don't make me suffer."

Military strategy and people's reactions differentiated Vietnam from World War II, Hoffman said.

In World War II, soldiers were in the war for the duration, he said, while soldiers in Vietnam were rotated every 12 to 13 months.

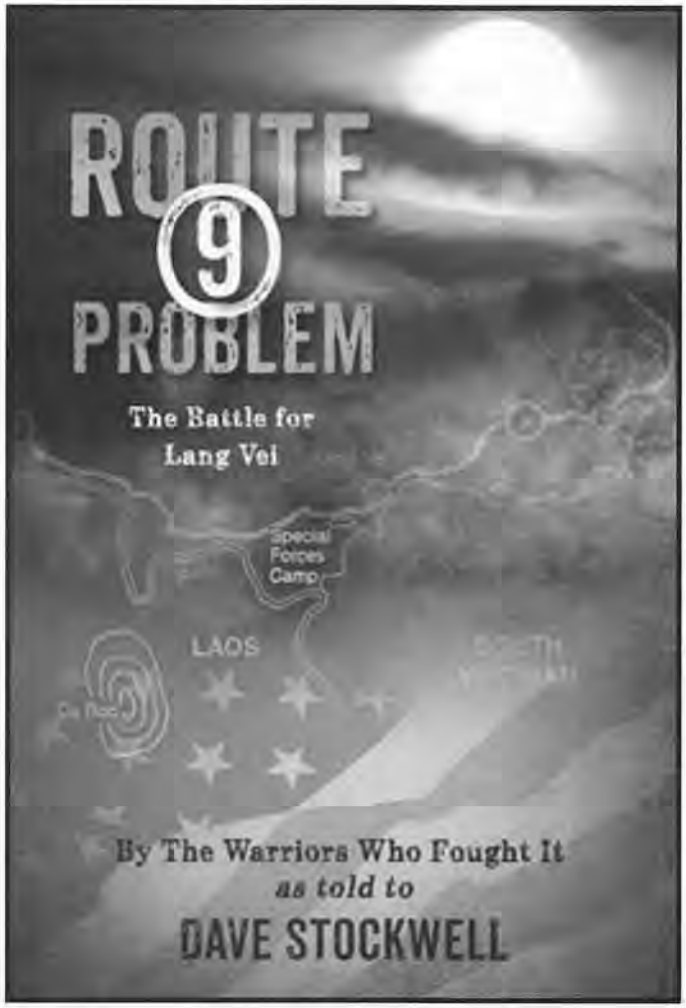
"By the time you got the lay of the land and how to do things over there, your time was up, and you got new people in there," Hoffman said.

Anti-war protests at home also hurt the soldiers, according to Hoffman.

"It was great fodder for the enemy. 'Look, even your own people back home hate you,'" he said.
Hoffman urged people to remember that a lot of young Americans give up a lot to protect the freedom that the United States enjoy.

"Wars are not fought by old men; they're remembered by old men like me," Hoffman said.

BOOK REVIEW



AGAINST ALL ODDS BROTHERHOOD, TENACITY, AND COURAGE AT LANG VEI

When the North Vietnamese Army (NVA) planned to send forty thousand troops to attack the six thousand US Marines at Khe Sanh in 1968, it expected a decisive victory. Certainly the small US Special Forces camp in the way at Lang Vei would be quickly overrun.

The Tough tenacious defenders at Lang Vei had other ideas. The two dozen US Army Green Berets and their four hundred tribesmen at Lang Vei gave the NVA such a monumental headache that they became known as the "Route 9 problem" all the way to the highest levels of the North Vietnamese government. Even the NVA's tanks-their first use in The war– couldn't completely defeat the stubborn US fighters.

More than an intense, moment-by-moment description of the battle, Route 9 Problem: The Battle/or Lang Vei details the personal side-who these men were, how they got there, who was waiting for them back home

Dave Stockwell has done an excellent job putting together so many different points of view and making them blend into the true story that will live as long as the US Army has soldiers that proudly wear the Green Beret.

William R. Phillips, Author of "Night of the Silver Stars": The Battle of Lang Vei

A masterpiece! The hair-raising account of the renowned fight will leave you feeling you were there. When enemy tanks breach the perimeter wire at the start of the battle, you'll break out in a sweat Route 9 Problem-The Battle for Lang Vei is a must-read lor every Viet Nam veteran and for anyone else who needs a good dose 01 patriotism.

- Gary linderer, US Army Ranger Hall of Fame Author of The Eyes of the Eagle and Others on Vietnam

One of the most outstanding books we have read, Route 9 Problem delivers an honest rendering of that conflict in the words of those who fought. By showcasing each branch of the service's unique capabilities, Stockwell provides a fresh and thoughtful look at Lang Vei's enduring truths of leading, planning, and showing courage in combat.

- Victor Holman, US Army Lieutenant Colonel Retired and Somalia Veteran, and Emmanuel Holman, US Army Captain and Iraq and Afghanistan Veteran.

DAVID B. STOCKWELL is a Retired US Army Lieutenant Colonel and author of "Tanks in the Wire"!: The first use of Enemy Armor in Vietnam. He and wife Sheryl, make their home in Murfreesboro, Tennessee.

MICHAEL ARCHER KICKS OFF CSM SPRING CONNECTIONS SERIES, FEB. 17, 2017

Every day at the College of Southern Maryland, professors work to broaden the minds and widen the perspective of students in the classroom. The annual Connections Literary Series is a chance for these lessons to be offered to a much wider audience – including both students and the Southern Maryland community through the experiences and perspectives of authors, poets and writers. On Feb. 17, CSM will kick off the Spring 2017 Connections Literary Series as Michael Archer reads from his works and speaks about his experiences at 7:30 p.m. on the Leonardtown Campus, Building A, Auditorium.

Two of Archer's books are about his own experiences in the Vietnam War as a U.S. Marine and the war's aftermath. Archer served in Vietnam in 1967 and 1968, when his closest friend was killed during the battle of Khe Sanh. As he researched his third book "The Long Goodbye: Khe Sanh Revisited," Archer returned to the scene of the battle to search for his friend's remains, which had never been found, and later he encountered one of the men who had killed his friend and dragged his friend's body away.

"Forty years later I met these guys we had fought against and I had a real epiphany," Archer said in a telephone interview. "I found out they were just guys like me." The man he met described being able to hear the American soldiers in their bunkers. "He said he could smell our cigarette smoke. ... He was never the demon that our government and our military tried to make him out to be," Archer said.

For Neal Dwyer, professor of Languages and Literature at CSM, who arranges the Connections series each year, epiphanies like Archer's are the exact reason the speaker series is important. Dwyer hopes to see the audience think of things in a new way, or gain a new perspective, and learn from the experiences of others. Archer's speech, Dwyer said, is likely to show that the aftermath of war goes far beyond the veterans who have left the battlefield and come home.

Dwyer said Archer's talk will resonate with the large veteran population in Southern Maryland, many of whom attend classes at CSM. "When students and the community come together for these events, I have seen people become very moved by the stories that are taught and shared by real people," Dwyer said. "We cannot replicate that kind of direct learning in the classroom."

Archer said he is looking forward to the reading and to share a presentation of photos from his trip to Vietnam, along with the history of the Vietnam War and the government actions that led to America's involvement. He will read an excerpt from his book, but what's important to Archer is that he will get a chance to connect with the audience in a way that could make a difference.

"I want to convey that there's a lot of survivors' guilt for the veterans of all wars," he said. "I want all veterans to know that they're not alone. You can get past it, but you have to learn to accept things that you might not want to acknowledge at first."

One of the biggest tragedies of the Vietnam War, Archer said, was that the war continued on in the minds of so many veterans, even after they were home. "Some researchers believe that twice as many American combatants later died by their own hand than were killed by the enemy in war," he said. By writing his books and speaking at events like Connections, Archer said he wants to show people that the reality of war is different than what is portrayed in the media. "Regardless of the necessity of it, war is never glorious. The people who fight are never the same again," Archer said.

For the veterans who become writers, they are serving the country in a whole new way. Dwyer said authors like Archer give their readers a chance to see the horrors of war without being on the front lines themselves. The idea is to make sure people understand what is really happening, and hopefully learn from the lessons of the people who lived these experiences.

"We can inform and engage the public, but it's not just an outreach; it's a forum for sharing ideas and learning through literature as a springboard," Dwyer said. "We're doing what we can in our little corner of Southern Maryland, and I know it works. I've seen the effect that programs like this have. … I believe in this."

Since it began in 1990, the program has featured writers such as National Book Award winners, Tim O'Brien and Robert Stone, Pulitzer Prize winning poets, Yusef Komunyakaa and Henry Taylor, and Maryland Poet Laureates Lucille Clifton and Michael Glaser. Connections readings offer the Southern Maryland community a chance to hear from and meet established and emerging local writers up-close-and-personal.

OBIT

CAPTAIN GEOEGE MICHAEL GRATZER, USA-KHE SANH VETERAN, COMMANDING OFFICER B CO 2ND BN, 2ND INF, 1ST INF DIV

George Michael Gratzer (Ret), "Sonny", 76, died early Wednesday, Dec. 7, 2016, as the direct result of long-term medical issues derived from wounds suffered in combat in Vietnam.

Sonny was born in Eveleth, Minnesota, to George and Dolly (Heelstone) Gratzer on May 5, 1940. His family moved to Butte shortly thereafter, where he attended grade schools and graduated from Butte Public High School. He played football and participated in track and field. He also boxed for the Racetrack Boxing Club and won a state boxing title. He played guitar and sang, often performing in high school and later in college. He worked summers as a hardrock miner, and was prevented from playing college football due to an accidental injury in the Emma Mine.

He was a proud member of the Butte Miners Union Local No. 1. He sold papers on the Rialto corner from age 9 through 11, and often skipped school on Mondays to earn a buck an hour pushing stock through the pens during sales at the stockyards. He graduated with a B.A. in history in 1963 from what was then Montana State University in Missoula

CAPTAIN GEORGE W. GRATZER

(Steve Miller) Gratzer, Karen (John) Doran; and brothers Steve and Karl Gratzer.

Although CPT Gratzer was authorized to be laid to rest at Arlington Cemetery in Virginia, his wishes were to remain in his home state.

A visitation was held on Wednesday, Dec. 14, 2016 from 4 to 7 p.m. at Garden City Funeral Home. A memorial service was held on Thursday, Dec. 15, at 1:30 p.m. at Garden City Funeral Home with a graveside at the Western Montana State Veterans Cemetery at 3:30 p.m. A catered reception followed at 6:00 p.m. at the Elks Club 112 N. Pattee, Missoula. Sonny requested that in lieu of flowers, donations may be made in his memory to Association for the Bladder Exstrophy Community, 204 37th Avenue North, Suite 157, Saint Petersburg, FL 33704; or Scoliosis Research Society, 555 East Wells St. Suite 1100, Milwaukee, WI 53202.

KHE SANH VETERANS IN THE NEWS 50TH ANNIVERSARY

A HERO MEMORIALIZED
WHISENHUNT DIED AT KHE SANH SAVING HIS PLATOON

By Jessica Cejnar, The Del Norte Triplicate
Published Feb 16, 2017 at 06:11AM

Michelle Barber remembers saying goodbye to her father. She was a little girl then, but the ER nurse, a Del Norte native, said she was clutching four angels from off her birthday cake when James Whisenhunt, a lance corporal in the U.S. Marines, left for Vietnam on Sept. 6, 1966.

Whisenhunt was killed in the First Battle of Khe Sanh, also known as the Hill Fights, on April 30, 1967. His platoon was trying to secure Hill 881S and were fired on from both sides by the Viet Cong, Barber said. He was 23 years old; she was 5.

"They were slaughtered," Barber said. "Guys were going down left and right. Dad could see the main bunker that was hitting the guys... Dad went up with his best friend, they had to take the bunker out. Dad knew it had to come out and he went across with no cover, no nothing, taking the bunker out. He got shot across the abdomen and he died instantly."

In addition to saving his platoon, Barber said her father brought two of his platoon mates, Donald Hossack and Tommy Wheeler, down from off the hill. He received two Purple Hearts and a Silver Star.

With the 50th anniversary of the Battle of Hill 881S approaching, Whisenhunt and the 46 other Marines who lost their lives have been commemorated on a plaque at the Vietnam War Memorial in San Antonio, Texas. The surviving members of Whisenhunt's platoon will hold a ceremony in observance of the anniversary on April 30 at the Veterans Memorial Park in San Antonio.

Whisenhunt was the youngest son of Noah and Iva Whisenhunt. Before he joined the Marines, Whisenhunt was a Crescent City Police Officer, joining the force at 20 years old and serving under Chief of Police Danny Nations.

where he became a Sigma Chi and was commissioned through the ROTC program as an Infantry officer. He married Janet Lee of Cut Bank in 1962 and the couple had four children

In 1963, Sonny trained at Fort Benning, Georgia, where, following Infantry Officers Basic, he earned Airborne Wings and a Ranger Tab, then served in Bamburg, Germany, working as a Mechanized Infantry Rifle Platoon Leader and a Rifle Company Executive Officer. He was then promoted to Captain and commanded Company B, 2d Battalion, 54th, Infantry, 4th Armored Division, and became executive officer of the same battalion. In Germany, CPT Gratzer earned the Expert Infantryman's Badge and was awarded the Army Commendation Medal. He completed the 120-credit-hour Special Forces Correspondence Course through the JFK Warfare Center at Fort Bragg, North Carolina.

CPT Gratzer earned a Jungle Expert Patch in Panama enroute to his first tour in Viet Nam, where he commanded Company B, 2d Battalion, 2d Infantry, 1st Infantry Division (The Big Red One) headquartered in Lai Khe, where he was wounded twice. CPT Gratzer was awarded the Combat Infantryman's Badge, the Silver Star (w/ OLC), the Soldier's Medal, the Bronze Star w/"V" device (w/ OLC), the Purple Heart (w/ two OLC), the Army Commendation Medal (w/ two OLC), the National Defense Service Medal, the Vietnamese Campaign Medal (w/ two Stars), two Vietnamese Crosses of Gallantry (w/Gold Star and Silver Star), and the Vietnamese Service Ribbon. In addition, his unit earned the Vietnamese Cross of Gallantry (w/ Palm) and the Vietnamese Civil Action Medal.

During his second tour to Vietnam while in combat, CPT Gratzer underwent direct enemy fire while attempting to save the life of one of his soldiers, and in turn, was shot by an AK round through the spine and internal organs on Feb. 9, 1968. CPT Gratzer spent seven months in military hospitals and the VA Spinal Cord Center in Long Beach, California, where he underwent extensive physical rehabilitation. He was informed he would never walk again, but as stubborn as he was, he learned to walk on his own without further professional rehabilitation. Due to his heroic actions, he was finally awarded his second Silver Star (OLC) 32 years later in December 2000, before the presentation of the Colors, on the 50 yard line at a University of Montana Grizzly game.

Sonny returned to graduate school, was inducted into the National History Honorary Society, and earned his MFA in Creative Writing, later publishing three books of poetry and his first novel, "Ninety Days." He was working on a second novel at the time of his death.

Sonny enjoyed summers at Flathead Lake, first at his Wildhorse Island land, and later at his Finley Point cabin. He was a member of the old Grizzly Century Club, the Grizzly Athletic Association, and then the Grizzly Scholarship Association. An avid fan, Sonny rarely missed a home game. He especially enjoyed watching his kids and grandkids participate in sporting events, and was one of the founders of the Sentinel Booster Club and its first president. He very much enjoyed corresponding with his many military brothers across the nation

He was a lifetime member of the following organizations: Sigma Chi Fraternity, Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Retired Officers Association, the Reserve Officers Association, the Disabled American Veterans, the National Rifle Association, the U.S. Army Ranger Association, Paralyzed Veterans of America, Military Order of the Purple Heart, the American Legion, the Montana Army National Guard Service Club, and the University of Montana Alumni Association. He was also a member of the Hell Gate Elks Lodge No. 383, the Butte High Golden B's, the Montana Shooting Sports Association, AF&M Sentinel Lodge No. 155, and was a Scottish Rite 32nd Degree Mason.

He was deeply loved, and his smile, laugh, compassion, my-way-or-the-highway demeanor, playing the guitar and singing, and sincere interest in family and friends and the world around him will be truly missed by all. His parents, son Steven Kurt Gratzer, and granddaughter Rachel Lynn Millhouse preceded him in death. Survivors include daughter Dana Gratzer Millhouse (Glenn); son Michael Gratzer (fiancée Maria Snow); daughter Rachel Gratzer Ross; grandchildren Sean (Whitney), Kyle, K.C., Mariah, and Ryan Millhouse; Gage Palmer; Treyvon Spirlin, and JD Strange; sisters Ruthe Fesperman, Vi (René) Marquez, Margie Scheley, Jill

According to Barber, her father was already a local hero before he joined the military.

"A guy had stolen a car out of the police department parking lot, and the cops left my dad there because he was the rookie," she said. "Dad took off running and caught the car. He's running alongside the car, holding the door handle with his gun out telling them to pull over. I have the newspaper clipping that tells you exactly that."

Barber said her dad felt the need to join the military after his brothers, Adreath, Everett and Alfred, joined the Army.

"Dad was the youngest out of the four boys so he didn't have to go, but he felt the need to go," Barber said. "He felt he was there for a reason and it was to give these people the same freedom we have."

Even though Whisenhunt wouldn't see his little girl grow up, Barber said her grandparents made sure she would know who her father was.

Iva Whisenhunt saved the oath her son took when he became a police officer. There's a telegram from Gen. Wallace M. Greene notifying her of her son's death; letters of condolences from U.S. Marine Corps Capt. W.R. Griggs and Congressman Don Clausen and a special letter to Barber from Gen. W.C. Westmoreland who commanded U.S. forces in Vietnam.

Barber also has clippings from the Crescent City American and the Del Norte Triplicate about her father as well as the transcript of a broadcast on KPOD and a proclamation from the Crescent City Council, which named May 15, 1967 Jim Whisenhunt Day.

Thirty-three years later, Barber would take the Oath of Allegiance using her father's badge and administered by her father's former boss. She was a Crescent City Police officer for 11 years before transitioning to the Del Norte County Sheriff's Office and later pursuing a nursing degree ultimately winding up in the emergency room at McKenzie-Willamette Medical Center in Eugene.

Barber said her grandparents put down good roots for her and her own daughter, Katie Kelly, who went into the U.S. Air Force. But it was her father's legacy that prompted her to follow in his footsteps and then strike out on her own path as a nurse.
"Dad was a very caring soul from what everybody has told me," Barber said. "Anybody that knew him, and there's a lot of people in this town that still know my father well, (would say) rather than take them to jail, he would take them home."

FLOYD D. DRAKE SR, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN, HQ BTRY 1/13

Drake loved the United States Marine Corps and served his country proudly and honorably, but what served as an even greater sense of pride for him was his family. He was a supportive father, a loving husband, and a loyal friend, and he left an impression on every single person he met. Mr. Drake is preceded in death by his sisters, Patricia and Micky as well as his daughter, Denise.

He is survived by his wife, Sompolsri; his children, Debbie, David and Tim; and his grandchildren, Melissa, Emory, Tylan, Ann, and Ashely as well as Jessie and Janna Menix; his great-grandchildren, Jessa, Mickey Jay, and Henry.Memorial services will were held on Tuesday, November 29, 2016 at 1pm at Kimbrell-Stern funeral home located at 1503 Dawson Road, Albany, GA 31707.

FROM: Daniel Hobart C CO 1/26

Dear Ray,
I have put together information about Hill 950 on Christmas Eve 1967. Understanding how different accounts can be told, this is the event that happened on that day and night. Also is a copy of the after action report.

Also is a poem I wrote and as you can see, it was put in The Library Of Congress. I hope if any of this helps tell our story about the time we spent in a place a lot call hell, helps in the history of Khe Sanh.

Perhaps you might find it worthy of being added to our magazine? It is always helpful talking to you and I want you to know, there is A special place in my heart for you. God has given us all these years, And I live every day with Brothers still here, and all the brothers we lost.

Thank you for all you have done and God Bless, Dan Hobart

It was December 24, 1967, on the radio relay station, called Hill 950. I was in guns with my team facing the Base at Khe Sanh. About 11:00 a.m. We were told our squad was going down the hill To set up an L.Z. We were to be picked up by choppers and a new platoon would relieve us.

At about 12:00 P.M. 3rd pit. Started to move Half the men cleared the area and the rest stood watch. About 3:00 PM A call came over the radio, saying the fog was moving in and the choppers would not be able to pick us up and drop off the new PLT. Word was climb back up the hill. The men were pissed off, about the climb back to the top. It was mud, wet, and we were drained from the work we just completed. Someone said light up. Meaning, smokes, joints, and we could care less if they heard us. Move out barked the squad leader. Up we started, but this time it was different.

We said to hell with the gooks and everybody talked, broke brush, trees, anything to hold on. It took us about two hours to get back to our bunkers. I got on top of my machine gun bunker and started yelling every dirty word I could Think of and then some.

I had just got into my live in bunker, it was getting dark. Minutes later Bullets started flying. Shoving my boots on, me and Burrows ran out and jumped on the M-60. Just as I opened up with a quick burst, it seemed like something hit the ammo can behind the M-60. The can of ammo was on the ground, between me and Burows. A grenade was thrown into our bunker and the blast put us and the machine gun out of order. Some of the other men pulled me and Burrows out of the bunker.

We were both hit, him worse then me. I can still hear the LT. yelling get another gun over here. The men put me (Hobart), and Burrows in our live in bunker, on our bunks, made out of steel stakes and ammo boxes.

More grenades followed and someone threw A willy peter grenade. From what I heard the wind changed and blew it back on some of our men. Three I think. It burned right threw you if you didn't get mud on The burn. Next day was Christmas and you could hear a chopper flying around The hill in the fog. It was the second day before the pilot found a Hole and dropped like a coin from a building, to get us out.

We were taken to the Bn. Aid Station for treatment and two beers. Burrows was sent to Japan because of his wounds. I know he lived, but never heard from him again. I was laid up in one of the Company Tents. It was a quick recovery. I heal quick and wanted to get back in The action.

That is the main part of Christmas Eve Dec.24, 1967. I want it to be the correct account. Some of the stories I have read seem to be different from what I saw where I was.

By the way the picture of us at the services was in the blue sector, where you went out to the water hole. South across from the ammo dump. That we all know was quite an experience. Also the airstrip ran from North to South.

A SECRET

I HAVE A SECRET BENEATH THE EARTH
ONLY ONE MAN CAN GIVE TO REBIRTH.

NO LONGER CAN I HOLD IT WITHIN FOR HE WHO IS GONE SHOULD KNOW WE DID WIN.

OUR YOUNG THAT WOULD NOW BE GROWING OLD DIED IN VAIN, SO WE ARE TOLD.

I BUT ONE MUST FIGHT TO MY DEATH FOR IN MY MIND I KNOW IT WAS MY TEST.

AS I RISE TO FOLLOW THE SUN

I LOOK THROUGH THOSE TIMES AND THINK OF MY SON.

FOR HE IS THE ONE I FOUGHT FOR IN VAIN IN HOPES ALL CHILDERN NEVER FEEL THAT PAIN.

TIS, THE BLOOD THAT WAS SPILLED ON THAT FOREIGN SOIL THAT BROUGHT HIM HOME IN SO MUCH TURMOIL.

THE LIFE THAT WAS LEFT, SOME MEN COULD BLAME
BUT TO HIM IT WAS THE GHOST THAT THEY COULD NOT SHAME.

OH LORD FORGIVE ME FOR CAUSING SO MUCH PAIN
FOR I HAVE A SECT BENEATH THIS EARTH THAT ONLY YOU CAN GIVE TO REBIRTH.

AGENT ORANGE A TOXIC LEGACY

by Daniel L. Hobart
C CO 1/26

On the eve of a possible revolution in Veteran's benefits relating to the acknowledgment of service-related birth defects, it's prudent that we reflect upon the history of dioxin-related problems.

When the Agent Orange manufacturers were selling their lethal product to the United states government for use in Vietnam, they knew much more about dioxn's deadly potential than they told the government. Correspondence between these manufacturers has been obtained and shows the horrifying FACTS:

1. A letter dated March 17, 1965, to Dr. R. Emmett Kelly, the medical director for Monsanto, states that "enclosed is a sample of dioxin. This was received from Dow Chemical Company, and according to them, it is the most toxic compound they have ever experienced. According to Dow, it is 100 times as toxic as parathion. It is, likewise, capable of causing incapacitating birth defects and infertility in both males and females."

2. A letter dated June 24, 1965, to Dow Chemical Company of Canada from Dow Chemical in Midland, Michigan, marked as "Dow Confidential" states:

"As you well know, we had a serious situation in our operating plants because of contamination of 2,4, 5-Tetrachloro-dibenzodioxin this material is exceptionally toxic; it has a tremendous potential for producing chloracne and systemic injury. If it is present in 2,4,5-Trichlorophenol, it will be carried through into the T acid and into the esters and hence into formulations which are to be sold to the public."

After reviewing the tragedy surrounding dioxin and Agent Orange, we should recognize a few factors. First, the history of these chemicals has been inundated with lies and deceit because admitting dioxin's deadly potential will cost the chemical, pulp, and paper, incineration industries billions of dollars in liability. Perhaps this is why dioxin stories in the media about infertility and birth defects are almost nonexistent.

More than likely, the chemical companies will say that this only affects women. Yet there are now studies that show the existence of dioxin in the seminal fluid of male Vietnam Veterans, and there is little doubt that this same dioxin can reach the egg of a female. A new study from Minnesota on exposure to 2,4,0 shows a strong connection to infertility and/or birth defects.

THE GREAT GHOST CHASE VISITS THE CIRCUS OF KHE SANH

Dale Dye is a Marine officer who rose through the ranks to retire as a Captain after 21 years of service in war and peace. He is a distinguished graduate of Missouri Military Academy who enlisted in the United States Marine Corps shortly after graduation. Sent to war in Southeast Asia, he served in Vietnam in 1965 and 1967 through 1970 surviving 31 major combat operations. Appointed a Warrant Officer in 1976, he later converted his commission and was a Captain when he deployed to Beirut, Lebanon with the Multinational Force in 1982-83. He served in a variety of assignments around the world and along the way attained a degree in English Literature from the University of Maryland. Following retirement from active duty in 1984, he spent time in Central America, reporting and training troops for guerrilla warfare in El Salvador, Honduras and Costa Rica. Upset with Hollywood's treatment of the American military, he went to Hollywood and established Warriors Inc., the preeminent military training and advisory service to the entertainment industry. He has worked on more than 50 movies and TV shows including several Academy Award and Emmy winning productions. He is a novelist, actor, director and show

This whole business of being a capitalist lackey and running dog imperialist war monger is a tough gig. I mean, it's a hard dollar when you make it by suppressing freedom loving peasants and supporting a puppet army. And if they'd told me I was going to spend most of my time at war cowering in fear of my own shadow? Why, hell no I wouldn't go. But I did—several times. I even came back nearly 50 years later on The Great Ghost Chase, which is now in Day 6, during which we discover just how evil us bastards were way back then.

Indeed. And if you fought here during the Vietnam War and really don't believe you are all or any of those things, if you believe at this remove that your heart was in the right place even if your body wasn't? Well, then. You just need to take a little jaunt along Vietnamese Route 9 toward what was once the Khe Sanh Combat Base and that'll do for your education—or re-education as the case may be. Up there, nearly in Laos and surrounded by mist-blanketed hills where Marines suffered under intense daily artillery barrages and held off legions of enemy soldiers trying to create Dien Bien Phu déjà vu, you'll learn a thing or two.

Right there in the little museum you'll learn that the peace-loving soldiers of the North Vietnamese Army didn't really want to attack the cowardly Yankee imperialists, but they just felt compelled by basic decency to trot on down the Ho Chi Minh trail and jerk a high-explosive knot in the American tail. And while they were at it, they killed 11,900 of the foreign invaders (real number of American KIA is 274), destroyed at least 400 aircraft piloted by Yankee Air Pirates (real numbers include one KC-130, two C-123s, and a half-dozen helicopters). The Khe Sanh museum also claims that tenacious fighters of the NVA sank 80 ships during the 77-day siege. But look who's counting. And there's no reason to consider that Khe Sanh is completely landlocked when you're amping up those numbers.

The whole show at what little is left of Khe Sanh Combat Base reeks of commie hokum. It's P.T. Barnum in NVA greasepaint, and it raises primitive hackles among a few of us Marine Combat Correspondents who served there at one point or another during the war. The joint is strewn with what purports to be captured U.S. equipment. There's even a partridge running along the overgrown airstrip. No sign of a pear tree. So let's ignore the cheap-jack concrete sandbags and misspelled American graffiti designed to paint us as poor uneducated peons forced to brutalize brave freedom fighters. Yes. And let's just give all that the old wink and nod while we ponder a few observations made on the trip to Khe Sanh from Hue.

There's the elaborate suspension bridge over the Cam Lo River right at one of the old Ho Chi Minh trail access points paid for and built by Cubans. You've got to figure the forebears of some of Castro's construction crews were here once before—up north where they served as anti-air advisors or POW interrogators. But no mention of that either.

Up here in the highlands, traveling a newly constructed highway that will lead to Thailand if you've got the time and inclination to make the trip by vehicle, there's always a spooky mist hanging on hilltops like The Rockpile and Hills 861 and Hills 881 North and South. In the days American Marines fought to hold those rocky tors, it was an evil mist that made every nightfall a nightmare. As convection forced the fog up the forested slopes, NVA infantry often accompanied it, jumping out at startled defenders like heavily armed Halloween ghouls. And at Ca Lu, a spot on the map-sheets that later became Vandegrift Combat Base, where Operation Pegasus kicked off in April 1968 to break the Khe Sanh encirclement, there's an elaborate graveyard and monuments to NVA soldiers killed in what became known to Marines as The Hill Fights. The numbers are a little more accurate here including a count of some 5,000 KIA. Mr. Vinh translates a sign indicating that they are all brave southern fighters of the National Liberation Front. He's got a great wink and nod

What's cool and a little disconcerting in this blowtorch barrage of propaganda are the Montagnards we see up here puttering around their stilt-supported straw huts as they've done for centuries. The ones we see are mostly Bru, one of the 13 recognized Montagnard tribes populating the mountainous areas of Vietnam and Laos. While most of Vietnam has morphed into a semi-modern nation, the Yards still live a fairly primitive existence. They don't want or need much from the government—which is fortunate because they are still a disadvantaged and depressed minority.

We see a lot of national flags everywhere. No upright or vertical stanchion is without that gold star on a red field. Could be there's a swivet of genuine patriots up here. Americans have no monopoly on flag-waving. Or it could be that the folks living a back-breaking stoop-and-bend lifestyle in the extremely rural areas just below the 17th parallel are anxious to let Big Brother know they came down on the right side of the fight that boiled through their backyards for so long.

And that's it for now. There's just one reliable treatment for massive sensory overload. It involves mass quantities of intoxicants and my keyboard will only suffer so much abuse. Stay tuned for a wrap-up which will be filed from the land of the free because of the brave

REMAINS OF MARINE SHOT DOWN DURING VIETNAM WAR HEADING HOME AFTER 48 YEARS. WELCOME HOME

1ST LT WILLIAM (BILLY) RYAN USMC

The remains of Marine Corps Reserve 1st Lt. William (Billy) Ryan, of Bogota, N.J., were identified through DNA tests conducted by the Defense Pow/MIA Accounting Agency at the Pentagon, the paper reported Friday.

Ryan's plane crashed on a combat mission in southern Laos near the Vietnam border on May 11, 1969, the day before his son's first birthday.

"I always knew my dad died in the crash, and that's what my mom told me," Michael Ryan, 48 told the paper. "What she didn't tell me is that part of her held out hope that maybe she'd see his face again." His aircraft was pulling out of a bombing run when it was hit by enemy fire. The pilot bailed out and was rescued.

Ryan was also shot down in 1968 over the Gulf of Tonkin but he survived that crash.

According to the Record, military investigators went to the Laos crash site in 1990 and found his plane seat. Investigators visited the site on six other occasions from May 2012 to January 2016 to look for remains. A lab identified the remains as Ryan's and notified Michael last month.

The next day Ryan's widow Judith was diagnosed with stage-4 stomach cancer.

"I don't know, it's strange to me," Michael told the paper. "We've waited 48 years for this. And now I'm looking up at God and saying, 'Can you give this woman a week to celebrate?'"

Billy Ryan will be laid to rest at Arlington National Cemetery on May 10, the eve of the crash anniversary.

THE STORY BEGAN LAST MONTH

Last month, sad comfort finally arrived. It came in a phone call on Jan. 3 from the Defense POW/MIA Accounting Agency, informing the family that the remains of Marine 1st Lt. William C. Ryan Jr. had been positively identified using DNA recovered from the crash site in Laos.

One day after she received the news, Judy was told she had an advanced form of cancer. Again the timing seemed important and strange, like maybe God and Judy had waited together all those 47 years.

"It's uncanny to me that this love story — and that's exactly what it is, a love story — ended the night before" the diagnosis, Michael said. "She got that feeling of hope and closure right before she starts the fight of her life."

TWICE A HERO

Billy Ryan was born in Hoboken in 1944 and grew up in Bogota, where his friends called him Rhino. Even at 5 feet 9 inches tall and a wiry 160 pounds, the nickname suited him.

Ryan was tough. He played quarterback and running back on the football team at St. Cecilia High School in Englewood, pitcher and shortstop on the baseball team, and point guard in basketball.

"Everything we did, he was just better. Faster, stronger, more coordinated," said Ed Ryan, 71, Billy's younger brother. "Absolutely, I looked up to Billy."

Billy attended St. Francis College in Pennsylvania, where he studied French and nursed a crush on a beautiful woman named Judith Ann Woolsey.

She ignored him for years. Then, one night, she didn't.

"My mom's super outgoing, and she thought he was too quiet and shy," Michael said. "Then they just went out to a local coffee shop, and she thought he was the nicest man she ever met."

TRAGIC VALOR OF MARINES
AT CON THIEN
(JULY, 1967)by Don North

It was known to local missionaries as "the Hill of Angels," but to the occupying Marines, Con Thien was a little piece of hell. Just two miles south of the Demilitarized Zone (the DMZ dividing line between North and South Vietnam), it was a barren, bulldozed plateau of red dirt 160 meters high and ringed with barbed wire, studded with artillery revetments and crisscrossed with trenches and sand bag-covered bunkers. To the east stretched the "McNamara Line," the 600-meter-wide "barrier" ordered by Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara which the Marines had cleared and sowed with seismic and acoustic sensors and minefields.

At Con Thien in 1967, American commanders in Vietnam failed to recognize that loyalty should flow downward as well as upward. The commanders' loyalty should have been to their Marines facing the North Vietnamese Army (NVA) as much as to their superiors in Washington. U.S. Marines died in droves at Con Thien; they deserved better of their commanders.

I was there. My ABC News team – consisting of cameraman Nguyen Van Quy, soundman Nguyen Xuan De, and myself – was next on the list for an assignment out of Saigon. We drew Con Thien, the most dangerous place in Vietnam that week. Nearly a half century later, as Memorial Day 2016 approached, I thought back on that assignment.

In that part of Quang Tri Province, the McNamara Line was anchored in the east by Firebase Gio Linh and in the west by Con Thien. Secretary McNamara, ever on the lookout for clever, logical and arms-length solutions for defeating the enemy, floated the idea of the barrier in March 1966, at a meeting of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff. High-ranking U.S. military professionals pretended to take his myopic vision seriously and construction began in April 1967. But anchored by those two fire bases, the McNamara Line could be flanked on either side of the combat bases. And the North Vietnamese side of the DMZ was off-limits from U.S. ground attack. NVA divisions, operating within range of their 135mm artillery, were free to target firebases and roving Marine patrols with deadly accuracy

A FLAWED STRATEGY

So, why was there a base at Con Thien in the first place? Simply because the 160-meter hill, if taken by the NVA, could have facilitated hits on the key U.S. staging area at Dong Ha. Aside from denying the hill to the enemy, there was little reason to protect Con Thien. But its vulnerabilities also made it an inviting target

The commander of NVA forces, the renowned General Vo Nguyen Giap, victor of Dien Bien Phu in 1954, was trying to replicate that victory along the DMZ. But the battle doctrines he followed were based on a rigid command structure and similarly rigid thinking, reflecting someone "unschooled in the art of war," according to Marine historian Eric Hammel. Nevertheless, Hammel concluded that "all of Giap's flaws as a planner and leader were more than compensated by the self-defeating policies and attitudes in the camp of his enemies. At least Giap took responsibility for his setbacks."

My news team found the First Battalion, Ninth Marines at Con Thien suffering from blazing heat and choking dust as they were targeted by snipers and under constant threat of ground attacks.

What made duty at the outpost a special misery was the hail of artillery from NVA batteries tucked away in the northern hills of the DMZ. The 135mm guns were well camouflaged and sheltered in caves; the NVA quickly rolled out the artillery to fire, then just as quickly rolled them back again to shelter. Although Americans retaliated with artillery and air strikes of their own, they were not able to stop the hundreds of shells that each day took a toll of Con Thien's defenders.

HEAVY CASUALTIES

On July 2, 1967, the Marines' Alpha and Bravo Companies launched Operation Buffalo, a sweep in the area north of the base. But faulty reconnaissance and inadequate observation allowed an undetected NVA force to ambush the Marines. Eighty-six Marines of Bravo Company were killed and 176 wounded; only 27 members of the Company walked out of the battle unaided. An estimated 1,290 NVA were killed, even so, by anyone's definition, including that of the Marines, it was the enemy's victory. Although American casualties in Vietnam were rarely specified, the Marines acknowledged that it "was the worst single disaster to befall a Marine Corps rifle company during the Vietnam War."

The NVA were well aware of the U.S. Marines tradition of not leaving their dead behind, and they prepared for the Marines' return. On July 3, air strikes and Marine artillery were directed to the battle area in preparation for retrieval of the bodies. Marine reinforcements lifted off from the carrier USS Okinawa, and early the morning of July 4, they attacked on a six-company front to reach the dead. Marine Skyhawk attack aircraft lay down suppressing fire as our ABC crew recorded the recovery operation.

As we slowly advanced with two battalions, it soon became obvious that the NVA had pulled out during the night but left numerous booby traps behind to further bleed the Marines. Many bodies had been rigged with grenades and almost all had been mutilated or desecrated in some way. The bodies were spread over a wide area of low bushes. Two days lying in the blistering sun had bloated the bodies and burned them black. One dead Marine had his genitals cut off and sewn to his face, with a photo of his girlfriend stabbed to his chest.

Many of the recovery teams wore gas masks as some protection from the ghastly stench, other Marines retched and vomited. They placed the corpses in green rubber body bags and carried them to a clearing where the remains were loaded on Marine tanks. Personal effects were collected and placed in upturned helmets.

Many in the work party made it forcefully known they were not pleased that a TV news crew was accompanying them on a mission to reclaim their dead. We shot sparingly and from a distance so as not to upset them. In any event, those grisly scenes would never be used in a U.S. news program.

THE AFTERMATH

The next morning, our ABC News crew entered the base at Con Thien. It felt like being at the heart of the war. We could look north across the Ben Hai river which marked the Seventeenth Parallel and see the North Vietnamese flag waving from a tall pole. We could look beyond the flag to see puffs of white smoke and hear the rumble of shells being fired in our direction, giving us about 20 seconds to find the nearest bunker. Late in the afternoon, one of the Marine artillery pieces took a direct hit; its crew had not been able to retreat to a bunker in time. As rockets and shells continued to drop in, an Army Special Forces medic jumped out of a bunker and joined a half dozen Marines trying to save the life of a badly wounded comrade. They took turns pumping his chest to strengthen a weak pulse and giving him direct mouth-to-mouth resuscitation while shouting encouragement. "C'mon Sidell, you can make it buddy! Don't give up!" Lance Corporal Jimmy Sidell from Atlanta, Georgia didn't respond with either a gasp or a pulse as his Marine buddies worked on him for almost an hour. Another NVA shell hit with a deafening impact just a few yards away. Our film camera was blown off the cameraman's shoulder; Sidell's buddies recoiled from the concussion but never missed a beat pumping his heart. Finally with the body growing stiff, it was clear Sidell wasn't coming back. Through sobs and curses, the Marines tied an identification label to his boot laces and carried him to a tank waiting outside the wire that would serve as his hearse

I cried too, even as I tried a "standupper" to conclude my report. In New York, ABC News located Sidell's parents in Atlanta and warned them the report of their son's death would be on national TV the following evening. It was clear that what motivated these Marines to endure the daily hell of Con Thien was not victory or satisfying the chain of command but their strong devotion to each other.

HIGH-LEVEL COMPLAINTS

moreland was not satisfied with the effort the Marines were putting into making the barrier work. In October 1967, he complained, "the barrier has not been accorded a priority consistent with operational importance." Engineer companies showed enormous courage working in daylight hours, in the open with heavy equipment and suffered a higher percentage of casualties than the rifle companies at Con Thien.

Another part of the problem was that Marines are traditionally an offensive organization. Building in-depth defenses is not their forte, especially questionable ones like the "McNamara Line." Marine Corps generals complained that the barrier plan was a constant irritant. Holding static defensive positions prevented the Marines from conducting "pacification programs" and from attacking the enemy's infiltration routes. Major General Rathon Tompkins, commander of the Third Marine Division, referred to the McNamara Line as "absurd." Lt. General Robert Cushman, the Marine commander in Vietnam, later admitted, "We just weren't going out getting everyone killed building that stupid fence."

After the Tet offensive which began on Jan. 30, 1968, and demonstrated the resilience and determination of the NVA and the Vietcong, Secretary McNamara agreed to step down. At the end of February 1968, a broken and distraught McNamara attended a farewell luncheon at the State Department and spoke tearfully of "the futility, the crushing futility of the air war." Perceiving him as growing soft on the war, President Lyndon Johnson quietly arranged for McNamara to take over the presidency of the World Bank.

General William Westmoreland was replaced on June 11, 1968, as commander of MACV. On Oct. 22, his successor GENERAL CREIGHTON ABRAMS ordered all construction associated with the McNamara Line halted. The fate of the barrier was finally sealed on Nov. 1, 1968, when President Johnson announced a bombing halt in the DMZ and North Vietnam. Marine units were under orders not to set foot or even fire into the DMZ.

TALLYING UP A FOLLY

During the period of the McNamara Line construction from September 1966 to October 1967, 3rd Marine Division casualties were 1,400 killed in action and 9,000 wounded. Forty-six years later, I am reviewing my scripts, video and notes from Con Thien. I see now that the anger I felt at the misguided strategy and the compassion we felt for the Marines' suffering was not fully expressed. It should have been much clearer that the U.S. strategy was not only flawed but resulted in an unnecessary waste of lives.

I am reminded of an observation by Chris Hedges, a former war correspondent for the New York Times: "Reporters who witness the worst of human suffering and return to newsrooms angry see their compassion washed out by layers of editors who stand between the reporter and reader. The creed of objectivity and balance ... disarms and cripples the press and transforms reporters into neutral observers or voyeurs."

As Marine historian Eric Hammel concluded, "Americans were bound by the moral poverty of their political leaders, and the North Vietnamese were bound by the intellectual inflexibility of their Communist Doctrines. The soldiers of each side suffered mightily in the stalemate that ensued."

We need to pay tribute to those who served at Con Thien and learn from their sacrifice. It can be fairly said that anyone who seeks glory in battle would not find it in the mud and heat of Con Thien, but anyone who seeks tales of extraordinary valor need look no further.

FILLING A HISTORICAL GAP – VETERAN CHRONICLES THE SERVICE OF AC-119 "SHADOW" GUNSHIPS IN VIETNAM

In the years following his service in the Vietnam War, local veteran Larry Fletcher fervently searched for books about the Air Force's special operations squadrons and the pilots and crews who operated the AC-119G "Shadow" gunships.

Larry Fletcher flew 177 combat missions aboard an AC-119G "Shadow" gunship during the Vietnam War, earning two Distinguished Flying Crosses. After the war, he went on to earn his doctorate in education, retired from the public school system and became a published author. Courtesy of Larry Fletcher

When he discovered this was a historical niche largely overlooked, the Air Force veteran chose to fill the gap with a narrative based upon his personal experiences.

"There just didn't seem to be anything about (the special operations squadrons), so I decided to take it upon myself and write about it," said the Lake Ozark veteran.

A 1961 graduate of California (Mo.) High School, Fletcher pursued an education by attending Southwest Missouri State College (now Missouri State University), graduating with a bachelor's in education in 1965. The following year, he graduated from the University of Missouri-Columbia with a master's degree in education.

My father fought the Japanese in the Pacific during World War II and then worked as a mechanic at the Ford garage (in California) much of his life," said Fletcher. "I remember him telling me I wasn't going to be a mechanic like him and that I was going to attend college," he added.

Initially, Fletcher's professional outlook did not gravitate toward a military career despite the war raging in Vietnam. Instead, he fulfilled his desire to become an educator by teaching at a high school in Illinois his first year out of college. In 1967, he transferred to St. Charles (Mo.) High School and began teaching several classes while also coaching sports.

"I remember the superintendents had to write letters to the Moniteau County draft board requesting a teacher deferment," said Fletcher. "But one day, during a current events class I was teaching, a student asked me how I kept from getting drafted."

Fletcher continued, "When I told him I had a teacher's deferment, you should have seen the look on his face … like I was a big chicken or something of the sort."

During a "snow day" at the school, Fletcher decided to visit a local recruiting office and was soon signing the enlistment papers to become an Air Force pilot although he had never before set foot on an airplane.

In June 1968, the young recruit arrived at Lackland AFB, Texas, undergoing a 90-day course designed to train officer candidates in the fundamentals of serving in the Air Force. Upon his graduation later that summer, the newly commissioned lieutenant moved to nearby Randolph AFB to begin 53 weeks of flight training.

Pilot training consisted of three stages—the first was 30 hours of flying a T-41, which was basically a Cessna 172 used for initial pilot training. After that," he explained, "we moved on to 60 hours in a T-37, which was a twin-engine subsonic jet. The final phase was 90 flying hours in a T-38 Talon." For a number of years, the T-38 held the world record for climb rate."

Completing his initial flight training in October 1969, Fletcher received his Air Force "silver wings." Shortly thereafter, he learned that he would be assigned to fly the AC-119—a prop twin-engine, side-firing gunship.

Survival and POW training in the states of Washington and Idaho were completed before the crew trained on AC-119 gunships in Ohio. In April 1970, Fletcher received orders for Vietnam, reporting to Tan Son Nut Air Base (near Saigon) as a member of the 17th Special Operations Squadron.

"We flew the AC-119Gs," he said, "which was the 'Shadow' model. It was a twin-engine gunship with four 7.62 mm mini-guns—one gun would fire 6,000 rounds per minute." He continued, "Our mission was direct close air support of American and Allied ground forces. We could talk directly to the troops on the ground from the airplane and direct our fire as necessary."

As the former pilot explained, the plane was equipped with a night observation scope (NOS) that would assist in the detection of enemy troops, mortar positions and anti-aircraft guns. Information from the NOS was processed through an onboard computer and relayed to the aircraft commander pilot's gun sight.

With a crew complement of four officers and four enlisted personnel, Fletcher affirms that their "Shadow "successfully operated on teamwork, completing 177 combat missions that carried them throughout Vietnam and Cambodia.

"It was like the Wild West with everything going on over there," he said, "but we were able to save a lot of friendly troops, villages, garrisons and convoys with our air support."

After leaving Vietnam in May 1971, the combat veteran remained in the Air Force until resigning his regular commission at the rank of captain on August 15, 1973 to return to his career in teaching. In later years, he earned his doctorate in education at the University of Missouri and served in several educational capacities to include superintendent of California R-1 School

Though retired since 1997, Fletcher has remained active in preserving the history of those who served in the special operations squadrons, dedicated to sharing stories from the Vietnam War that he believes have remained largely undocumented. He has written several novels based upon his experience in the Air Force including "Shadows of Saigon," "The Shadow Spirit" and "Charlie Chasers."

"It was the war of our generation … and it was a bad war," Fletcher said. "When I came back from Vietnam, I had two more years to serve on my five-year obligation. When I separated from the Air Force, I hung up my uniforms and went back to teaching. For years, hardly anybody even knew that I had served in the military. But, I went on thinking that someday a scholar would write about the special operations gunships, but nobody ever did."

With a brief moment of reflection, he concluded, "These books, everything I have written, is stuff that I carried in my head for 28 years. Much of what we did, especially the missions over Cambodia, were top secret and no one—not even those on the air base (Tan Son Nut)—knew what missions we had completed."

THE ONLY MARINE TO EARN A MEDAL OF HONOR FOR ACTIONS AS A POW, DONALD COOK WAS TRULY UNBREAKABLE IN THE FACE OF THE ENEMY

To be clear, there have been multiple Marines who displayed inexplicable gallantry in combat warranting a Medal of Honor before they were subsequently captured. However, if you are searching the halls of history for the one Marine Medal of Honor recipient whose actions as a POW earned him the medal, you will only find Donald Cook.

CAPT. DONALD COOK, USMC MOH

In fact, Captain Cook was only in Vietnam for 18 days before he was captured. He would spend the next three years enduring harsh captivity at the hands of the North Vietnamese. Despite deteriorating health, he would often give his food and medicine to his fellow prisoners in greater need. When questioned by the North Vietnamese, he never gave them more than his name, rank, service number, and date of birth. His captors didn't even know he was a Marine and just assumed he was an Army Officer.

Refusing to cooperate on multiple occasions, he found himself more than once being threatened at gunpoint. On one such occasion, Cook simply said, "You can't kill me, only God can decide when I die." For his actions during his captivity, Captain Cook was awarded the Medal of Honor.

A GIFTED LINGUIST

Donald Cook was born in Brooklyn New York in 1934. After high school, he chose to attend St. Michael's College as he was a man deeply guided by his faith. While in college, he would prove quite the gifted linguist and was fluent in Latin, German, and French by the time he graduated. In 1957, he was commissioned a second lieutenant in the Marine Corps and was assigned as a communications officer due to his natural gift with language.

He would serve as the officer-in-charge of an interrogation and translation team, before being assigned as an intelligence officer with the Fleet Marine Force Pacific.

As the war in Vietnam began to ramp up, Captain Cook took a personal interest and began to study the Vietnamese language. By 1964, he was eager to volunteer for service in Vietnam to put his skills to use. Unfortunately for Donald Cook, his time as a free Marine in Vietnam would be remarkably short. After only 18 days in country, Captain Cook and his fellow Marines became engaged in a firefight with the North Vietnamese and after being shot in the leg, Cook passed out from the loss of blood.

The "Little Vegas" area of Hỏa Lò Prison, built for American POWs in 1967. Shown in a final inspection in 1973 shortly before the Americans' release.

When he awoke, he found himself the first Marine officer taken prisoner in the Vietnam War. By all accounts, the action in which he was captured displayed none of the characteristics one might associate with a Medal of Honor recipient. Rather, Cook's place among the gallant men in the history of war would come as a POW.

OTHERS BEFORE HIMSELF

Shortly after capture, Cook had established himself as the senior officer among 10 other POWs and thus the legal spokesman for the group. Responsibility for leading the men through this ordeal would fall to him as well as official interactions with their captors.

The setting would be various jungle POW camps throughout Vietnam. They were given meager rations of rice and fish, quickly leading to malnourishment, sickness, and disease. As the senior officer, Cook would demand additional food and medicine, with some success but often at a high price to himself.

When food was scarce and medicine hard to come by, Cook would often ignore his own deteriorating physical health to feed and treat his fellow prisoners.

On more than one occasion when en route to a new POW camp, Cook would bear the burden of his fellow weaker prisoners packs to ensure they made it alive. Through his encouragement, leadership, and support his fellow prisoners would always make it. For Cook, it almost seemed unthinkable to give his captors the pleasure of their deaths or their cooperation.

Statue of Col. Cook on the campus of St. Michael's College in Colchester, Vermont.

One fellow POW would describe his relentless resistance by saying, "If Captain Cook thought the Viet Cong were using his feces for fertilizer, he would have stopped crapping."

On top of caring for his fellow prisoners, he would lead them in their defiance towards their enemy. Under extreme duress, it is common for POW's to submit to behavior outside of the code of conduct. However, Cook never relented.
Despite harsher treatment for doing so, it was his policy to give them "the big four and nothing more." "Name, rank, service number, and date of birth" is all the Vietnamese would ever learn about Donald Cook. However, the gifted linguist would work hard to stay one step ahead of his foe. He continued to learn and master the Vietnamese language while in captivity although he never once spoke it to his captors.

USS DONALD COOK AT SEA

Fellow prisoners report that he often seemed to be in the minds of the guards due to his ability to listen in on conversations unbeknownst to them.

FIGHTING UNTIL THE END

He helped lead a failed escape attempt on at least one occasion, but due to the weak physical condition of the prisoners they were unable to make it. He was severely beaten as the senior officer for doing so and it was on this occasion that a pistol was placed to his head and he gave his famous line "You can't kill me, only God can decide when I die".
As fate would have it, Captain Cook would prove that statement true.

wasn't the beatings, the starvation, or a bullet that took Captain Cook's life. Rather, was the bite of one mosquito. Captain Cook died of malaria in December 1967, just shy of three years in captivity.
The accounts of his fellow POWs brought his story back to the world and in 1980, Captain Cook was awarded the Medal of Honor by President Jimmy Carter.

It was presented to his widow, with his children looking on, and it reminded a nation to be thankful for a strong character like Captain Cook. His story is one of faith, commitment to his fellow prisoners, and a burning determination to fight until the very end.

PARA RESCUE JUMPER DUANE HACKNEY, THE MOST DECORATED ENLISTED MAN IN US AIR FORCE HISTORY

An Air Force Cross, the Silver Star, 4 Distinguished Flying Crosses with a Combat V, 2 Purple Hearts, 18 Air Medals, and ok, we have an article to write so we have to move on for time's sake. To list this man's 70 plus individual achievements would be overwhelming as Duane Hackney is by far the most decorated enlisted man in US Air Force history.

What is remarkable about Chief Master Sgt. Duane

Hackney is that he earned his accolades through the acts of saving others rather than gifting violence to the enemy. As a Pararescueman, it was his job to descend into the jungles of Vietnam and recover downed pilots before the enemy. He could rarely rely on the comfort of operating in mass numbers with fellow airmen, but this man took solace in the fact that he fulfilled the promise that if a pilot should go down, America would come looking for him. More often than not the materialization of that promise was none other than Duane Hackney.

BORN TO RESCUE

Duane Hackney is a native of Flint Michigan who joined the Air Force in 1965 to become a Pararescueman. As the Vietnam War was picking up steam, the United States began to use air superiority in an ever-increasing fashion to hold back a relentless enemy. And while the United States enjoyed technological superiority in the air, North Vietnamese ground fire and surface to air missiles were regularly enough to take its toll on the American planes. When one of these pilots would go down over the jungles of Vietnam, this typically meant death or capture that led to a less than courteous stay at the infamous Hanoi Hilton.

DUANE PREPARING TO JUMP IN A RESCUE

But America had made a promise to his pilots, that whenever possible and in cases when it seemed completely improbable that they would come looking for them thanks to men like Duane Hackney. This man would fly over 200 combat missions over 3 ½ years of volunteer duty in Vietnam. Just days after reporting for his first assignment, he took a .30 caliber slug to the leg and had it removed himself to avoid medical evacuation.

In the months ahead, he would see the helicopter on which he served shot down up to five times as they braved the most hostile of enemy territory in search for downed pilots.

By his own account, he couldn't recall the number of times he descended into the thick canopy of the Vietnamese jungle to search for downed pilots or exactly how many he was able to extract. But as the missions accumulated and the enemy fire came raining down, it became clear that each mission brought with it a necessity to display unprecedented valor and an opportunity for near certain death.

After a year plus of demonstrating such valor, one particular mission in February 1967 would set him apart and earn him the Air Force's second-highest military honor.

JOLLY GREEN 05

On February 3, 1967, Hackney was riding in one of two HH-3E jolly green giant long-range search and rescue helicopters over Vietnam. On his second rescue mission of the day near Mu Gia Pass North Vietnam, Hackney descended into the jungle as he had many times to search for the downed pilot.

Despite the presence of heavy enemy forces, he was able to locate the pilot and assist him in being hoisted up into the helicopter. Once the crew departed, they became subject to heavy 37 mm flak that tore into the craft creating an intense fire on board.

During the chaos, Hackney was able to take off his own parachute and place it upon the downed airmen with little regard for his own life. Just as Hackney made his way to the smoke-filled cabin and slipped another parachute around his own arms, a second burst of 37 mm flak tore into the craft sending it into an uncontrollable spin.

Unsecured Hackney was flung from the helicopter out the open door. Despite being dazed and confused, he was able to employee the parachute that was still unbuckled and made a successful landing over enemy territory. The rest on board this particular HH-3E, died in the crash, and Duane Hackney found himself on the opposite side of a rescue that he himself had conducted time and time again.

Eventually, another jolly green giant was able to locate Hackney and bring him to safety. It was for his actions on this particular mission that Duane Hackney was awarded the Air Force Cross. One might think such a close call would be plenty of cause to call it quits as surely one could only cheat death so many times, but Duane Hackney took his calling seriously and was earning distinguished flying crosses as late as 1970.

A GALLANT LIFE CUT SHORT

Before his career was over, Hackney would receive more than 70 individual awards making him the most decorated enlisted man in Air Force history. After 26 years of unprecedented service where he served at great risk to his own life in order to save others, Chief Master Sgt. Duane Hackney retired from the Air Force in 1991.

Tragically the man, the entire North Vietnamese Army couldn't seem to kill, died of a heart attack in 1993 at age 46. And while Hackney would claim he was just doing his job, his record of unprecedented gallantry is without rival in the Air Force.

I GET MAIL

Tommy, letter I sent to Reverend Stubbe after the last reunion in San Diego, CA in November 2016

Dear Pastor Stubbe,

Reading your passages of your 3 volumes of "Pebbles in my Boots" I became aware of your ultimate mission to all of us., whom you served with at Khe Sanh.

And before you took on the task of being our comm wire to God, you had to become a apostle, mingling, training, communicating, suffering hardships as we did. Identifying our joys, our pain, our bonding because of pain.

Wrapping yourself in a Chaplains robe, or setting up a temporary altar on the red clay of Khe Sanh, did not automatically establish you as our spokes person to God!

You had to suffer and endure, as we did. Jesus Christ and many of his apostles.

You walked the trails in our footsteps, slept in the red mud next to us. Jumped out of planes, to the same bullets and shell fragments as they travelled through space, seeking its ultimate destination of flesh and bone.

You had to starve, go thirsty and bleed as did we, before you became our warrior brother. Only than could your words to us and God, give us meaning, healing and acceptance of us all being one, with God in life and death.

That connection was made not only during your many in prompt set up services, but especially when you were with us on the trails or ambush site, giving comfort to the wounded, or last rites to a Marine in the throes of death.

This bond was also formed while out on a listening post, monitoring a radio in the darkness of night, drenched by monsoon rains, while fear and horror froze our facial expressions, as we listened for the sounds of death.

Your presence brought us memories of home, our parents, our siblings and our loved ones. We could relate and bring back visions of us being in church together, so long ago, back in the world.

Your connection with us and God calmed our anger, organized our despair, and minimized our physical suffering

Your presence gave us light when in the darkness of having witnessed death of a brother Marine.

Ray I have some other input if you do not mind listening to a philosophical Marine's ramblings.

Hope you had a nice Thanksgiving

Semper Fidelis

Go With God.

REVEREND STUBBE'S REPLY LETTER

Friday, 09 December 2016

Mr. Thomas Soerensen
3295 Hildale Ave.
Orville, CA 95966-6306
Dear Tom:

Thank you for one of the most important letters I've ever received! As a chaplain and pastor, it's always a matter of faithfulness to our calling since we usually don't receive any feedback on how we communicate our Lord's live and love, concern and healing, Presence and peace. Your letter expressed what I have always felt: that the presence and message of Christ is best communicated by life, not just words, by presence and deeds.

Your mention of Greek philosophers and mythology and your reading and interest in them also greatly impressed me. The ancients have much to give us. It's amazing that many of them lived at the same time of the Old Testament prophets, several centuries before Christ. I once looked through some volumes of Euclid's geometry and was absolutely stounded by the complexity of thought he expressed some three centuries before Christ-far exceeding what our high school kids are able to reason! Who would have thought-back 196B-that a muddied Marine Grunt would delve into Greek philosophy!!?

There's another volume (the fourth) in the Pebbles in* My *Boots series-this one covering the Jacques patrol of 25 February and also a biography of Colonel Lownds as well as some recent presentations and prayers. I don't plan to have any more printed, but if I did come out with another volume, I could like to quote your letter since it might be beneficial to chaplains who are now serving-the value of getting close to their troops and sharing life- communicating Christ through our actions and presence and not just words! If that would be OK, please let me know.

Speaking of communicating through life and actions, this is what Christmas communicates: that God is present with us in a most intimate manner and lives and suffers with us!
May our gracious Lord bless you richly at this special time of the year!

MORE MAIL

Mr. Tom Eichler:

I really do not know how to start this note. I am not really that educated, but here goes. My name is John M Moon. In Vietnam I was assigned to Charlie CO, 1/26 3RD PLT, 3RD SQD.

On 24 March 1968, I received an assignment to aid in the recovery of the bodies of 5 Marines who had been killed on 22 March 1968, during a rocket & mortar attack at Khe Sanh Combat Base.

Due to sustained Sniper and heavy shelling from the NVA we had to wait several days when it was safe so the bodies could be dug out of the remains of the bunker destroyed on 22 March 68

I was only 18 years old and barely out of high school. During retrieval, I came face to face with the horror that would stay with me through my entire time in Vietnam, and the rest of my life.

I was the first Marine to come into contact with the 5 Marines KIA. The sight was indescribable. To this day I have never told anyone what I observed that horrible day,I will take it to the grave with me.

My three ex wives and my entire family, did not know that any strange actions on my part were probably just reaching out. With little or no help I sit here trying to find some sanity that I lost.

I believe that Lt Bush was just 6 days from going home to get married.

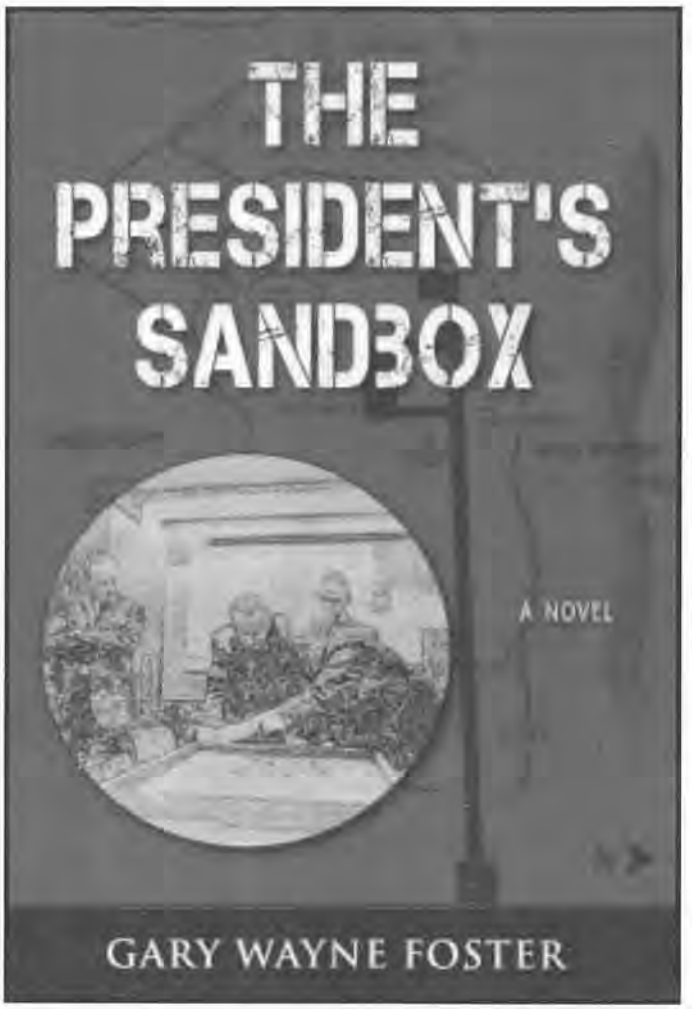
BOOK REVIEW



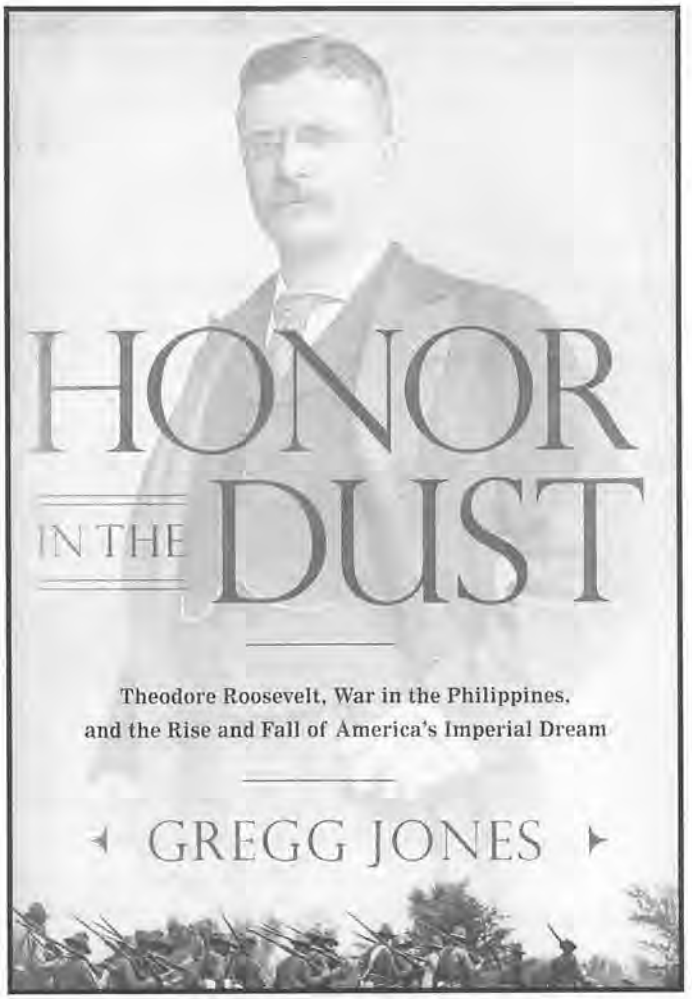
The year 1968 proved to be the defining year for the U.S. Marines fighting in Vietnam. One month after the New Year, the Tet Offensive shook the world. Just prior to that, the Marines were besieged at Khe Sanh, and would be so for 80 days.

Khe Sanh was one of the most dramatic and complicated conflicts of the entire war.

This novel relates the intricacies of the White House, Hanoi, Saigon, the main characters on both sides and the times.

Set in both Vietnam and Stateside, The President's Sandbox vividly recalls the dire events of early December 1967 through May 1968 while recreating the intense conversations and negotiations taking place on both sides of the conflict.

BOOK REVIEW



The first book I read by American journalist Gregg Jones was "Last Stand at Khe Sanh." I was absolutely enthralled with that effort and was unable to put it down. It was one of the most riveting and compelling works about that most horrific battle conveyed by the brave men who participated. Well written and informative, it is the most accurate depiction of personal events and descriptive moments of war that I have read about that battle, placing the reader in the trench line, sharing the fears, doubts, horrors and bravery of the men involve.

That book led me to Mr. Jones magnificently written "Honor in the Dust," A detailed account of a then imperialist America involved in defeating and exiling Spain from Cuba and the Philippians and then occupying the Philippians as essentially a colony. This book too follows the bloody trail of battle, politics behind imperialistic decisions, hardships of the soldiers, denial of atrocities by superiors and substantial suffering by the local populace. 464 Pages which makes it a rather long vacation read but a compelling read non-the less, about the war in the Philippines 1899-1902. Another scholarly masterpiece by Mr. Jones.

Honor in the Dust is a dramatic page -turner, told with marvelous reporting crackling writing, and original insights. Gregg Jones presents a fascinating cast of characters and gripping battle scenes in a story that moves with the speed and power of a battle ship. utterly absorbing."

JONATHON EIG. New York Times Bestselling Author Get Capone, Luckiest Man, and, Opening Day.

America's brutal war of conquest in the Philippines amazing little-known,1argely, ignored in our schoolbook and history museums. Yet its imperial hubris and it torture scandal eerily for shadow events of the last decade.

In his much-needed, highly readable book on this forgotten war, Gregg Jones has written both a compelling page-turner and a work of careful scholarship."

ADAM HOCHSCHILD. Author of King Leopold 's Ghost and To End All Wars

'Gregg Jones has produced a masterful and fa st-paced book. Honor in the Dust may be classified as a work of history but it read like a thriller. Foreshadowed are the war in Vietnam, Iraq, Afghani tan-and on. This book is the vital prequel to understanding the state of American empire today.

DALE MAHARIDE, Pulitzer Prize – winning Author of And Their Children After Them

'The Philippine occupation was the first of the United States quagmires. yet its lessons have been willfully ignored by later generations. Honor in the Dust recovers this essential history, from the bombast of a Washington's jingoism to the terror of the lost patrol in Samar. Gregg Jones does an admirable job of bringing this extraordinary period and it remarkable character to life."

ANNE NELSON, Author of Savages

"Honor in the Dust" is an absolutely riveting page -turner, a terrific read. Gregg Jones resurrects a long-forgotten but very important slice of American history in which the country's imperialistic dreams clashed with its sense of honor and justice, severely testing Theodore Roosevelt's young presidency and forcing Americans to confront the horrors of war. Any one interested in how America uses and abuses its power during times s of war should read this book.'

THIEVES TARGET MEDAL OF HONOR RECIPIENT

GRAIN VALLEY, Mo. -- Thieves targeted the only living Congressional Medal of Honor recipient in Missouri over the weekend -- stealing cash, gold coins, and weapons worth more than $100,000.

The burglary happened at Swan Lake Memorial Park in eastern Jackson County.

Col. Don "Doc" Ballard runs this cemetery for veterans and their families. All of the cash taken was used for his Forgotten Veterans program, which pays funeral expenses for veterans who don't qualify for benefits.

The crooks broke into a maintenance building at the cemetery during the weekend. Ballard and his wife were in Washington, D.C., presenting a civilian medal of honor award to an extraordinary citizen, while a different type of citizen was busy ransacking his back office.

Among the collectibles stolen were a Medal of Honor ring, gold coins, and honors given to Ballard by presidents and other dignitaries over the years.
"A lot of stuff I will never be able to recover because the type of person who stole this is probably going to melt it down rather than see the core value of it," Ballard said. "Rings, a Medal of Honor ring. Luckily I was wearing the Medal of Honor itself or it would have been gone."

The Ballards are in the process of moving and had been using the maintenance building to temporarily store some of their most prized possessions. The thieves got away with thousands of dollars in cash, the result of several months worth of fundraising, but Ballard said he won't let it stop his efforts to help veterans in need.

Jackson County Sheriff's deputies are investigating the break-in. If you can help detectives with information about this case, call the TIPS hotline at (816) 474-8477.

ONE OF THE GREATEST FEMALE PHOTOGRAPHERS YOU'VE NEVER HEARD OF: CATHERINE LEROY

One of the few female combat photographers in the war was also the most daring

Very few women went to Vietnam as journalists, and even fewer as dedicated war photojournalists. In fact, for most of the 1960s, there were only two: Dickie Chapelle, who was killed by a grenade in 1965, and Catherine Leroy.

Leroy was widely considered the most daring photographer in Vietnam. She almost certainly spent the most time in combat — in part because she had no money, having traveled from her native France to Vietnam as a freelancer in 1966 with no contracts and a short list of published work. Living with soldiers meant that she could eat rations and sleep in the countryside.

CATHERINE PREPARING TO JUMP DURING OPERATION JUNCTION CITY.

Leroy faced no shortage of sexism. After she parachuted into combat during Operation Junction City, in early 1967, rumors circulated that she had slept with a colonel in exchange for permission. In fact, she had earned her parachutist license as a teenager, and had already jumped 84 times. Still, she developed a reputation as a photographer quickly, selling photos to The Associated Press and U.P.I.

At one point during the Tet offensive, in early 1968, she was captured by the North Vietnamese Army while with the French journalist Francois Mazure. There was a young lieutenant that they could converse with in French. They explained that they were journalists and would do no harm, so the soldiers decided to let them go. But first she persuaded them to let her take photos, saying that it was important because only one side of the story was being seen. The photos ran as a cover story in Life magazine, which she wrote herself.

Leroy never promoted herself or her work, which is one reason she remains largely unknown among the war photographers of the day (though not forgotten: In 2015 the writer and filmmaker Jacques Menasche completed a documentary about her career, "Cathy at War"; a clip from the film is available). But she was one of the Vietnam War's most lauded photojournalists, winning Picture of the Year from the George Polk Awards and, for her later work in Lebanon, the Robert Capa Gold Medal.

Later in life, Leroy ran a vintage clothing website. She died in Santa Monica, Calif., in 2006.

Leroy's photo series of Vernon Wike became some of her most famous pictures, and in 2004 Paris Match magazine commissioned her to visit him at his home in Prescott, Ariz. Mr. Wike, 58, stood in his living room, his arms heavy with tattoos, including the names of fellow soldiers killed in Vietnam.

VIETNAM VET SHARES STORIES OF KHE SANH BATTLES

James D. Watts Jr.

He has stories from his days in law enforcement — 20 years with the Tulsa Police Department, most of those with the bomb squad, and 10 years as a U.S. Marshal.

Then there are the years he spent working in film and television as an actor and stuntman, a second career that began when he was chosen to play the police officer who kills Matt Dillon's character in the movie version of "The Outsiders."

Maras can talk about the exploits of his cousin, the late Roger Maris, who broke Babe Ruth's record for home runs in a single season, hitting 61 in Maras even has more than a few fishing stories, the result of a passion for fly fishing — a pastime that even his German shepherd, Gunny, enjoys thoroughly. But another significant story of Maras' life is one he hasn't been able to tell until now. "I never talked about it," he said, "because when I do, I see it all over again. And not much of it was pretty." In April and May 1967, as a 19-year-old member of the U.S. Marine Corps, Maras participated in one of the bloodiest battles of the Vietnam War: the Hill Fights at Khe Sanh.

He and his fellow Marines endured almost continuous firefights for more than two weeks as they fought to secure three strategic hills. "It was shooting and killing for breakfast, shooting and killing for lunch, shooting and killing for dinner," Maras said. "We got there on April 26, and on May 12 we left. And in all that time, I don't remember sleeping. I know I had to have slept some, but you were in such a constant state of alert that you couldn't relax."

Maras credits two people with getting him to tell his story about his time in Vietnam: Tom Hoffmann, a psychologist, and Charles W. Sasser, an Oklahoma writer whose published works include dozens of novels and non fiction books. Friends in New Mexico loaned Maras the use of their weekend home, and he spent three weeks writing out his memories of those weeks of battle, the horrors he witnessed, the friends he lost.

"I wept just about every day, reliving all those things," he said. Maras turned his manuscript over to Sasser, and the two worked it into "Blood in the Hills: The Story of Khe Sanh, the Most Savage Fight of the Vietnam War" (Lyons Press, $26.95).

The book sets Maras' personal experiences against the broader backdrop of the Vietnam War. It pays tribute to his companions who survived and those who did not. "We went in with 1,300 men, and there was only about 700 of us who came out," Maras said. "And I think a lot more Marines would have come out of those battles if it wasn't for the M16A1s we were given." That was one reason I decided to go ahead with this book — nobody wants to really tell the story of Khe Sanh because they would have to tell the story of M16A1."

Maras was a machine gunner, tasked with operating the large M-60 machine gun, which soldiers nicknamed "the Pig." Most Marines, however, had the M16A1, which quickly became notorious for its unreliability in combat. The gun frequently jammed because of poor design and manufacturing shortcuts.

"We would go to bring in the KIA, and we'd find Marines with all kinds of things jammed into their rifles, trying to unjam a round," Maras said. "There are things in this book that are probably going to make a lot of politicians angry, but not as angry as I am at them." In spite of the horrors of the situation in which Maras and his colleagues were immersed, he said there were lighter moments, such as when the Marines first landed and were greeted by tables of bottled Coca-Cola and plain bologna sandwiches.

"It was about 100 degrees, so the Cokes were hot as blazes," Maras recalled, chuckling. "You had to blow the red dirt off the sandwiches to take a bite. We're standing there eating these gritty sandwiches and my buddy Tony Leyba, who had the best sense of humor, said, 'Boy, when the Marines feed you this good, you know things are going to be bad.' "Maras also recalled an almost surreal moment of beauty during one of the worst skirmishes.

"It was during the battle for Hill 881 South," he said. "We were getting hit with mortars, small-arms fire, people were getting blown apart, there were body parts in the trees — everything bad that could be bad was happening.

All this is going on, and all of a sudden this parrot comes flying into the battle area. It was this huge bird, with these beautiful iridescent green feathers, this bright yellow head. And it just flew through all this gunfire It was such a beautiful sight, I literally stopped shooting just to watch this parrot fly by." "It was such a beautiful sight, I literally stopped shooting just to watch this parrot fly by." Maras paused for a moment, staring off into space. Then he said, "You know, I think that parrot came through there just for me, to give me that moment."

VA MAKES WAIT TIMES FOR PATIENTS TRANSPARENT FOR VETERANS

NEW ONLINE TOOL FIRST OF ITS KIND

WASHINGTON — The Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) is taking unprecedented steps to increase transparency. Today, VA launched a new Access and Quality Tool that provides Veterans with an easy-to-use, easy-to-understand way of accessing patient wait time and quality of care data. This tool not only provides Veterans with more information about VA services, it increases accountability and ensures VA is held to a higher standard. "Veterans must have access to information that is clear and understandable to make informed decisions about their health care," said Secretary of Veterans Affairs Dr. David J. Shulkin. "No other health -care system in the country releases this type of information on wait times.

This allows Veterans to see how VA is performing." The tool allows Veterans to access the average times patients are waiting to be seen in their local area; how Veterans describe their experiences scheduling primary- and specialty-care appointments at specific VA facilities; timeliness of appointments for care needed right away; and the quality of health care delivered at VA medical centers compared with local private-sector hospitals. The Access and Quality Tool is the most transparent and easy to understand wait time and quality data website in the health-care industry. "This tool is another example of VA leading the way," said Acting Under Secretary for Health Dr. Poonam Alaigh. "No one in the private sector publishes data this way. This tool will instill a spirit of competition and encourage our medical facilities to proactively address access and quality issues while empowering Veterans to make choices according to what works best for them and their families." VA will continue to make improvements to this tool based on the feedback it receives from Veterans.

The Access and Quality Tool can be found at www.accesstocare.va.gov. Watch this video to learn how the tool can be used.

To all my friends who have been following my latest battle with cancer. Just heard from my beautiful doctor-------drum roll---pet scan results are in-----good news we are in remission. Still experiencing some side effects but it appears we won round 2. Hope to never have a round 3. I guess I'm just to ugly and ornery to give in yet. Now we can live again with even more appreciation for how precious is.

Thanks to all for prayers and genuine concern cannot explain how grateful I am. Special thanks to my guardian angels who got me to radiation everyday when I was too weak to drive. These guys Pat Dolan , Rob Bates, Joe Ostuni, and Eddy Stevens (almost everyday last 2 weeks) were always there regardless of weather.

Finally to my beautiful wife Sandy who was by my side every second of everyday. A true example of our wedding vow in sickness or in health. She never waivered in attitude or activity. Fed me through a tube so I could maintain some strength when I couldn't eat at all. She is a true saint and angel. I will never be able to express my true gratitude to that lady.

Ok now watch out Vegas next month and two Marine Corps reunions this summer and of course our families traditional lobster fest. Guess I will get to use that huge handicap I've built up in golf.

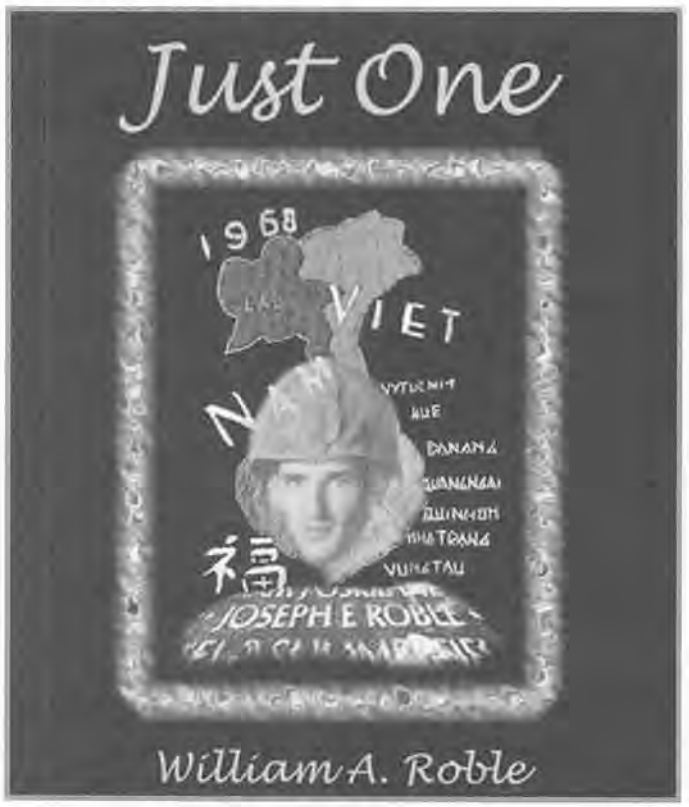
BOOK REVIEW



Just One covers the life of Bill Roble as he tries to learn why one name on the Vietnam Memorial Wall, that of his brother, Joseph Edward Roble, meant so much to so many. Throughout his younger years and into adulthood, Bill was influenced by correspondence his late brother sent while a Marine in Vietnam, as well as comments from his brother's friends and relatives.

This influence led to an enlistment in the U.S. Marine Corps, and later a meeting with many of his brother's comrades in arms all of which culminated in an attempt to retrace his brother's footsteps to Vietnam. Bill attempts to show how the loss of just one man in one war can impact many lives. Just One attempts to give the reader a new perspective on the ideals of the men and women that fought in Vietnam, as well as show how their lives impact some of us even today.

HERE ARE A FEW CHAPTERS

MY STORY

What could a four year old understand about the death and loss of a brother? I grew up hearing words that were not typical of an American boy's childhood. DMZ, Dong Ha, Con Tien, Khe Sanh, were places I learned of when I should have heard of Disneyland or the Smithsonian. My Childhood was not a bad one, but where did these locations fit in?

In May of 1968, my family decided to move to the east end of our hometown of Latrobe, Pennsylvania, into a house on Ohio Street. It was a big empty house when we moved in and I loved exploring it. I eventually made some friends and was content in my new surroundings, though my memories of those early days were few. I was oblivious to what my brother and many young men were doing a half a world away. He would never get a glimpse of this new house, as I would never have a memory of him. Though I don't remember it, the last time I would see Joe alive was at the Pittsburgh Airport approximately six months earlier, when he departed for Vietnam. Four months after we moved to Ohio Street, Joe would be gone and I would be left with wonder.

For years my memories of Joe were limited to letters sent from Vietnam and a jacket he sent me for my fourth birthday. I still have the jacket, which I wore with pride even after it no longer fit, and I also still have the letters. I still reflect on these items from time to time. I also remember when Joe's friend from Vietnam, Frenchy visited us after the war, but only his being at our house and nothing more. Other that that I received little information from the rest of my family and I knew no one else that new Joe. The words that touched me most were the letters that were written after his death. They made me wonder why one man meant so much to so many.

Joe was gone, but friends and family would never forget the man that brought humor in times of sadness, that greeted people with an actual concern for how they were feeling and would stop whatever he was doing to help another. After his death, the letters began to pour in from friends and relatives, many of which recalled memories.

Ken Seybold, wo joined the Navy and went to Vietnam, wrote to the local newspaper and talked about his and Joe's past days working on cars and getting their first jobs. He also talked about the days at the Highway Restaurant and their joining the service. He said " we joined to do our best, not to grow long hair, not to demonstrate, not to take drugs, but to help to do a job that had to be done." Ken mentioned that he learned from the Stars and Stripes , a magazine for military personnel, that Joe, "had completed his obligations to God and Country." Joe's friend, George Hill sister, Audrey, wrote in memoriam:

There is someone who missed you sadly
And finds the time long since you went
There is someone who thinks of you always
And tries to be brave and content
Gone is the face we loved so dear
Silent the voice we loved to hear
Tis sad, but true, we wonder why
The best are always the first to die

POEM BY AUDREY HILL & FAMILY

It was a simple, but beautiful poem that captured my perception of how most people thought about Joe. My cousin Rick's letter to the editor of the Latrobe Bulletin also offered insight to my brother's character. He gave a brief outline of Joe's short life and told of how everyone loved him. He would stop whatever he was doing to help a neighbor carry packages, fix a flat or just chat with people. "Rick called for the support of American troops in Vietnam and said that Joe's, "death enables millions of Vietnamese to live a life of freedom and democracy."

Many letters from Joe's friends in Vietnam also began to pour in, which further described Joe's character. Some of the letters came late as many of the men Joe fought with were wounded at LZ Margo around the same time as him. One even came from a man who never knew Joe, but heard of him. All expressed their deepest sympathy and regret, while also sharing their memories.

Jim (Frenchy) LeBlond would later come to visit our family, but just after Joe's death he wrote and informed us that he was the one who discovered Joe's body that day at LZ Margo. He said that , "Joe was the first one to help me understand my job over there and in all that time I grew to love him like a brother. "Joe was liked by everyone

And he would sit there and make me write a letter, and I would thank him for it now cause I realize how much my mother was worrying over me." Frenchy Added some humor by saying that he didn't like having to wake Joe for watch and complained that he would sometimes have to, stand half his watch for him." Frenchy would get even with him though when it was his turn for watch, pretending to be asleep.

Joe's squad leader, Sergeant James J. McDulty was also wounded at LZ Margo and was still recovering when he wrote to our family. His letter was full of emotion and clearly demonstrated the deepest respect he had for Joe. He addressed my father saying, "Sir, you have a lot to be proud of." "Your son joe was the best Marine in my squad." In fact as far as I know he was the number one Marine in the platoon. Everyone really liked him." Practically everything that I have learned about Vietnam, your son taught it to me." "I will never forget the name of your late son, Joseph Roble." "everyone in Echo Company, 3RD Platoon feels the same as I do."

Mike Worth had this to say about Joe. "He was always lifting everybody's spirits in the platoon. Everybody really ;loved him. Under the most terrible conditions he always stayed in such high spirits. Joe was the type of guy who would give you his last drink of water out of his canteen in 112 degree heat. Every time he would receive a package, he would divide everything up equally and pass it out among the squad. If a guy was wounded or hurt, Joe would always be the first one to volunteer to carry him to an area where he could be medevaced. He had plenty of guts as we call it. I really respected him. Everybody in Third Platoon and everybody who knew Joe over here, had nothing but the highest praise for him.

FIRST MEETING

I Went to Saint Louis to attend the KSV Reunion. I had no idea what to expect and did my best to think of what to say when I would meet Joe's friend's. I arrived at the hotel and was told that I had a message when I checked in. Larry McCartney said that he and some other men from Echo Company would be in the lounge when I arrived and that I should join them.

I went to my room and dropped my bags, then returned to the front desk to inquire about getting an iron. While standing at the desk, a men approached me and said" Billy Roble' I turned and found Larry approaching me he was the first of many of Joe's friends I would meet that day and in the future. We shook hands and I asked how he knew it was me. He said he just knew. We walked to the lounge and there I met Mike Worth, Bob Reed, Earle Breeding, David Spry and Bill Griffith. Vince Griffith arrived later, and they all told many comic stories about Joe. I was then made an honorary of Echo Company.

THE HERO

On October 14th, 1977, I had a message on my answering machine from Bill Griffith who said I should call him immediately as he has some good news. I called him he informed me that Joe was going to receive the Bronze star for actions on September 15th 1968. He told me that a copy of the certificate and citation, would be delivered.

I was extremely excited, as was my mother. Later that day I received a call from Lucille Biscaglio who put me on a 3 way conversation with Larry McCartney. It was only then that I learned how Joe and Eddie Ginn and braved machine gun fire and grenades to save Bill Griffith's life as well as attempt to save Stan Pettit. I then knew why Bill could not iterate enough what a great guy my brother was. I wondered how many more there were on the wall or even living whose self sacrifice went unnoticed

FROM WEBSITE

In keeping with Neil K's recent posts about getting in and out of the conflict, here is a link to a retrospective of the Vietnam War using Magazine Covers from Life, Time, Newsweek, and a few others.

They are in chronological order and they provide a unique glimpse at our getting in and getting out of the war ....and our society too. It's just the covers, but if you scroll slowly and process what you are seeing, you can get a real sense of when the overall mood of the country began to shift. At least I did. If I was a high school history teacher and doing a unit on the 60's and the War, I'd have my kids all over this. Some covers will produce "I remember that one," moments while many will not I won't say "enjoy" but it is fascinating.

MAGAZINE COVERS DURING THE VIETNAM WAR

Date: March 20, 2017Author: pdoggbiker

I spent some time researching the Big – 3 magazines: Life, Time and Newsweek, to see what their covers looked like during the years of the Vietnam War. I managed to collect over a hundred, which include Vietnam War photos or faces of those important people who were tied to the war effort at that time; all are posted below in chronological order. It's interesting to note the volume of coverage during the early part of the war and then again during the final months – and also seeing how the photos and headlines had changed over the years. I also found it odd that very little was published about the 1968 Tet Offensive and found only two covers.

The 60's were a decade of war, demonstrations, and other cultural changes – a time when censorship was challenged, and everybody pushed the envelope to see what they could get away with. The Vietnam War was the biggest event of my generation and the press exploited it. News reports brought the war right into our living rooms every evening during the dinner hour, while weekly magazines, some with vivid photos of the war – a constant reminder as they collected on our coffee tables. Photographers, both male and female, traveled with the troops in the jungles and rice paddies, taking pictures at every opportunity; all showed the mud, blood, horror and brutality of war, rushing the rolls of film to the states in hopes of making the next issue.

Many journalists and photographers lost their lives in Vietnam while in the bush covering the war, those on the top of my head are Larry Burrows, Dickey Chapelle, Bernard Fall and Errol Flynn's son, Sean among others. Unfortunately, most of the stories were depressing and eventually helped sway the public opinion against the war and its warriors. I did not see any covers showing the "uplifting" and "humane" things we accomplished during that war, i.e. orphanages, MedCap, irrigation, village wells, improved roads, medicine, etc., and I didn't see any pictures of me either. I'll just have to be content with my photo slide show and personal albums.

While viewing these covers, see if you can tell when the "social shift" begins and leave a comment at the end of this article with your observations about this collection. Enjoy!

KHE SANH VETERANS IN THE NEWS

AFTER 50 YEARS OF PUBLIC SERVICE, A WAR HERO RETIRES

BY TERI FIGUEROA WRITER

For more than 50 years, Ken Pipes wore a uniform — first as a long-time Marine officer who earned a Silver Star in Vietnam, then later as a reserve sheriff's deputy in North County, a role he held for 26 years.
That second job, he did for free. He didn't want the pay. He just wanted to contribute.

After five decades of public service, the Fallbrook man has finally called it quits, retiring in January as a reserve captain with administrative responsibility for all reserve deputies in North County.

With his 80th birthday approaching, said Pipes, it was time to "hang up my spurs."

"I think we all reach a point where you hate to leave something you enjoy and the relationships you have made, but there is a little clock inside all of us that says 'it's time to go,'" said the retired Marine Corps lieutenant colonel.

Service is important in his family — Sharon Pipes, his college sweetheart and wife of 56 years, has volunteered with the sheriff's department's senior patrol unit for the last 20 years. She has also volunteered with the Friends of the Fallbrook Library for many years.

Between the two of them, Ken Pipes figures, they may have done as much 30,000 hours of unpaid work.

Aside from his "honest desire to help protect our community," the reserves job fulfilled another need. "It gave me an opportunity to continue to serve alongside Marines," he said, noting that many former Marines move into law enforcement.

Growing up in Central California, Pipes wasn't thinking of going into public service. He wanted to play football. He credits the influence of his college coaches in Fresno for his decision to enlist in 1957. They were former Marines, and he wanted to be like them.

Pipes would spend 25 years in the service — the first three as a reservist, the next 22 on active duty and as a part of history.

In 1962, during the Cuban Missile Crisis, Pipes was a young officer aboard a ship headed toward the island nation.

Five years later, then-Capt. Pipes found himself in Vietnam, with two sons still in diapers back home. From late August 1967 until April 1968, he commanded two companies operating out of the Khe Sanh Combat Base.

That nine-month stretch included the Tet Offensive in 1968 and the 77-day siege of Khe Sanh. At the time, Pipes commanded Bravo company, which he said was responsible for defending a sector of the main base perimeter during the protracted and bloody battle. More than 60 men in his company died.

During the days and nights of fighting, he was nearly shot in the head. His helmet stopped the bullet. Sometimes at night, he'd walk the trenches, slipping a shot of whiskey to weary men.

His memories of Khe Sanh are included the feature-length documentary "Bravo! Common Men, Uncommon Valor."

His many awards and decorations from his time at Khe Sanh include the Silver Star — the nation's third highest honor for gallantry in combat — the Bronze Star, and the Purple Heart.

According to his Silver Star citation, on March 30, 1968, Pipes' company launched an attack but came under heavy fire from automatic weapons, mortars and rockets.

According to the citation, Pipes "fearlessly maneuvered across the fire-swept terrain, deploying his men and adjusting supporting arms fire on the enemy." Although he suffered a serious wound, he ignored the painful injury and continued to lead his men. He "repeatedly exposed himself to the intense fire as as he supervised the destruction of numerous bunkers and ensured that all wounded were treated and evacuated."

And when ordered to leave, he "unhesitatingly remained with the rear element of his command and directed an orderly withdrawal from the hazardous area."

1982, when Pipes retired as a lieutenant colonel, he stayed in San Diego County and began working in the security office at San Onofre Nuclear Generating Station.

He was still doing that job a few years later when he started reading headlines about a San Diego police officer who had been fatally shot. He groused to his wife about it.

"Sharon finally said quit complaining and do something about it," Pipes said. "That's when I enrolled in the police officers reserves academy."

He was 52 when he enrolled. While taking the six months of classes, he remained working full time at the nuclear power plant, driving to Carlsbad after work for five hours of law enforcement training every Tuesday and Thursday evening, as well as all day on Saturdays.

He left the power plant job about five years later, in 1995, and focused on his work in the sheriff's reserves.

Sheriff's Capt. Chuck Cinnamo, who runs the Vista sheriff's station, has known Pipes for about seven years and calls him "truly a lifelong public servant." "He is definitely dedicated to the cause of doing the right thing," Cinnamo said Friday. "That is what he is all about."

Over the years, Pipes also volunteered with a program called Veterans Moving Forward, where he counseled veterans in jail in hopes of getting them help and cutting recidivism rates.

Pipes, a Marine to his core, said that what he found most rewarding during his time in the reserves was the people that he worked alongside, particularly former Marines. He wants to see more of them step forward for the reserves job.

"When you are protecting and serving the public," Pipes said, "that is a noble calling."

TOM FORD, HANK MELANSON, ED SANCHEZ AND JOHN TOMECK, SIGNED UP FOR ANOTHER TOUR IN VIETNAM. HERE ARE A FEW PHOTOS OF THEIR CROSS COUNTRY TRIP IN VIETNAM.

FROM CALIFORNIA TO HILL 861
BY DENNIS MANNION
KILO CO 3/26 FO

I'll get to the photo in a few minutes, but first a bit of a "behind the scenes" glimpse of how I got from EI Toro Air Station to Khe Sanh and ultimately that particular hill.

14Sept67 and it was EI Toro to Okinawa on a Continental Airline jet...with a refueling on Wake Island. How I wished they'd have let us off the plane even for a few minutes just so I could have walked on that historic sand and coral. Kadena to Da Nang three days later on another Continental craft and the stewardesses standing the doorway saying, "Good Luck, Marine, see you in 13 months!" It was mid-afternoon and uncomfortable waiting around at the terminal -- brutal humidity, scorching sun -- awkward glances at the other FNG's, jealous looks at anyone in jungle boots and wondering how soon I could get out of stateside utilities and where I'd end up

A group of names called out -- mine was one of about 25 -- and on into another stifling room. We stood in a half-circle and all they said was "You're going up north in about two hours. Stick around." As it turned out, "north" meant a ride on a C-123 to Dong Ha and the two hour wait became almost four. When we got off the plane with our oversize, yellow travel envelopes as our only weapons, no one told us where to go next. It was already starting to get dark. There were a few large USMC trucks parked near the runway, and I climbed into the empty cab of one and "made myself as comfortable as possible." Relaxing was next to impossible what with planes and helicopters taking off, flares being shot up into the dark, and an occasional artillery piece booming away. Plus, I was a long way from home, hungry and sleep-deprived. I have no idea where I wandered to in the morning or how I even got there, but eventually I was told that I was going by truck to a place called Camp Carroll. Just that quickly I was in the back of an open, deuce and half truck with a dozen other Marines dressed the same as me. The driver and his buddy riding shotgun -- sporting a real shotgun -- were in ragged jungle boots and dirty, stained jungle utilities. More jealousy on my part. Out some sort of gate, a quick left and our single, vehicle convoy was barreling down a total dirt road heading west (I knew because of the position of the sun) with choking dust swirling up behind us. Not sure how long were on the move but I felt vulnerable as all get out. No weapons to be seen except for the driver's .45 and the shotgun. The land got steeper and we were beside river from time to time. Just like that, jutting up in the distance an unusual rock formation to our right front. Shotgun yelled to the driver, "You missed the turn to Carroll, you dumb SOB, this is the Rockpile! We're out here by our lone somes. We gotta turn the truck around!" We retraced the route for a period of time .... eventually took a right and a climb of a few 100 feet to the gate and the protective wire.

Two days at Camp Carroll -- and finally a helmet, flak jacket, jungle pants and jackets and jungle boots. I got what I had been wishing for, but everything was so shiny and new, I knew I still stood out as one of the FNG's. On day three and in light rain and mist, I flew by CH-34 to Khe Sanh. I reported in at C 1/13's headquarters and was told not to get too comfortable as I'd be detached out "fairly soon to an infantry company as part of its arty FO team." Not only was I brand new, I wasn't going to be around for very long so it did not seem like anyone was interested in talking to me much less getting to know me. I kept to myself, hung around my tent, and tried to get the shine off my jungle boots by walking in the mud and puddles every time I made the trek to the mess hall. We did have compartmentalized trays, but the only meal I remember having was a breakfast consisting of a single fried egg and a soft apple. The only word I got about the base in general was that there had been heavy fighting back in the spring, but that they had not taken so much as a sniper round since July. The weather was pouring rain .... light rain .... mist...low clouds for a week straight. I was also told that a Marine had died the week before my arrival when a bunker collapsed on him due to the wet and mud, and the week I was there, the same thing happened with another Marine losing his life. Finally, the weather broke and the sun came out. The only other place on earth I had seen with layered shades of green on the surrounding hills was Ireland. It was hard to believe I was in Vietnam. The natural beauty beyond the perimeter was breathtaking. Mesmerized, I was standing by the tent waiting to head to the mess hall when someone stepped out, yawned and stretched. He pointed and said, "Can you see that dirt covered hill in the distance? I said yes and he casually replied, "That's Hill 861." WTF!

I could not have been more shocked if he had said, "See that building over there? That's the Alamo." Or, "See that river down there? That's the Little Bighorn." Or, "See that distant beach? That's Omaha Beach." It was startling and stunning to be standing so close to an historic spot from recent, USMC lore. I judged it to be a few thousand meters away, and I was almost giddy with excitement at being so close to such a landmark. It meant so much to me that I turned, raced into the tent, dug out my Kodak Instamatic 126 and snapped a picture ..... just like a goofy tourist in Disneyland or NYC. I guess if it had been today, I'd have turned my back to the hill, stretched out my arm and taken a photo of myself with 861 in the background. But this was the last week of September in 1967.

When I tripped the shutter that morning, I had no way of knowing that I'd be on 861 three months later -- 26Dec to be exact. No way of knowing about the misery up there for over 77 days in 1968 -- sleeping on cardboard from C-Ration cases; one canteen of water and one meal per day; jungle pants rotted off at the knees and running around in "shorts" for weeks; never washing; being partially overrun; dead NVA hung up in our protective barbed wire and rotting to bare bones in a week's time; close-in air strikes, napalm, and artillery less than 75 meters from our trench lines; instant death as well as lingering death; terrible injuries; fear; anger; longing for home; the constant odor of gunpowder and burning flesh; living in the dirt; dying in the dirt; etc, etc, etc.

In the fall of 1967 I took a photo of history that had been made. In the spring of 1968 I was part of history. Almost fifty years later, and that hill is still locked up inside my head and the images and the memories -- good and bad -- have never diminished.

MUD, BLOOD AND TERROR: THE BRUTALITY OF THE VIETNAM WAR CAPTURED IN HARROWING IMAGES BY LESLIE LARSON

LIFE magazine war photographer, Larry Burrows, covered the fighting on the front lines during the Vietnam War and is now being remembered for his extraordinary work as the 41 year anniversary of his Death approaches.

Mr Burrows captured the compelling images of Operation Prairie, the U.S. offensive against the North Vietnamese near the Demilitarized Zone (DMZ), that lasted from August 3 to October 27, 1966.

His photographs of the bloody aftermath of the attack, juxtaposed against the lush and picturesque scenery of the Southeast Asian nation, are being revisited on LIFE.com as the London-born photojournalist is remembered.

An estimated 1,329 Americans were killed during the operation. More than 58,000 Americans lost their lives in the conflict in Indochina that ended in 1975.

One of the most famous images in the collection by Burrows is the shot 'Reaching Out,' the moment when wounded Gunnery Sgt. Jeremiah Purdie, photographed with a blood-stained bandage tied around his head, is drawn to his fellow soldier, who lays wounded on the ground.

Burrows himself suffered a tragic end as he worked on the front lines, he was killed on February 10, 1971 over Laos when his helicopter was shot down. He was 44-years-old.

In memory: The remains of Larry Burrows and the three other war photographers killed in the helicopter crash over Laos in 1971 were finally discovered some 37 years later. They now reside at a memorial (right) to fallen journalists at the Mewseum in Washington, D.C.

Fellow photographers Henri Huet, 43, of the Associated Press, Kent Potter, 23, of United Press International and Keisaburo Shimamoto, 34, of-Newsweek were also killed in the crash.

Ralph Graves, then LIFE magazine's managing editor, remembered the Englishman as 'the single bravest and most dedicated war photographer I know of,' in a moving tribute he wrote following Burrows' death.

'He spent nine years covering the Vietnam War under conditions of incredible danger, not just at odd times but over and over again.'

'The war was his story, and he would see it through. His dream was to stay until he could photograph a Vietnam at peace,' Mr Graves added in the 1971 issue dedicated to the fallen correspondent.

Though the lost photographers were mourned, their remains were not discovered until 37 years later thanks to the tireless effort spearheaded by AP writer Richard Pyle.

The remains of Mr Burrows, Mr Buet, Mr Potter and Mr Shimamoto now sit in a stainless-steel box beneath the floor of the Newseum in Washington, D.C., part of a memorial gallery honoring journalists killed in the line of duty.

A total of 2,156 individuals, dating back as far as 1837, are included in the museum's memorial.

LEGENDARY WAR PHOTOGRAPHER DICKEY CHAPELLE BACK IN FOCUS

By Meg Jones of the Journal Sentinel

After talking her way onto Iwo Jima during one of the famous battles of World War II, Dickey Chapelle recalled hearing the buzzing of wasps as she stood on a rocky outcrop snapping photos of Marines.

The Marines later told her there were no wasps on Iwo Jima. But there were Japanese snipers. The sounds she heard were enemy bullets whizzing by her head.

On assignment for a women's magazine, the Shorewood native was supposed to be covering the efforts of Navy nurses saving lives on a hospital ship anchored off the South Pacific island.

She wanted to get to the front lines, and persuaded the military to take her ashore.

Her fearlessness led to an impressive career covering the world's hot spots for two decades. One morning in November 1965 as Chapelle photographed a U.S. mission in Vietnam, a Marine walking in front of her tripped a booby trap. The explosion blew shrapnel into Chapelle's neck. She died within minutes.

A famous photo snapped by Associated Press photojournalist Henri Huet, who would die in Vietnam a few years later, shows a Navy chaplain performing the last rites for Chapelle. She was 47 — and the first American woman correspondent killed in action.

In anticipation of the 50th anniversary next year of Chapelle's death, the Milwaukee Press Club is inducting her into its hall of fame on Oct. 24. A book of her photos will be published next spring by the Wisconsin Historical Society Press. A playwright in California is writing a play about her. The Milwaukee Press Club is working with University of Wisconsin graduate students on a project to track down military members and journalists who interacted with Chapelle.

Chapelle put herself into harm's way over and over, covering the battles of Iwoima and Okinawa during World War II, and traveling to Algeria, Panama, Lebanon, Hungary, Cuba and Vietnam on assignment for National Geographic, Cosmopolitan, National Observer and other publications. She was captured by Russians while covering the uprising in Hungary in 1956 and held for 52 days, writing an article for Reader's Digest about spending Christmas in a Hungarian prison.

Born in Milwaukee, Georgette Meyer began calling herself Dickey because she admired polar explorer Admiral Richard Byrd, whose nickname was Dickey.

After graduating from Shorewood High School in 1935, she studied aeronautical design at MIT but flunked out when she didn't attend classes, instead hanging out at the airport to watch planes take off and land. When she returned home to Milwaukee, she worked at an airfield and wanted to earn her pilot's license.

Her parents sent her to Florida to live with her grandparents, and she found a job as a publicist at an air show. She was sent to Cuba to cover an air show and filed stories at the Havana bureaus of The New York Times and AP. She later moved to New York, met her husband Tony Chapelle, a pilot and photography instructor, and began working as a photographer for an airline.

After the attack on Pearl Harbor, Chapelle traveled to Panama for Look magazine to cover a U.S. Army unit. Eventually she made her way to the Pacific, where she covered the battles and took unflinching photos of severely wounded and dying Marines.

"She wanted an exciting life; she didn't want to be a kid from an ordinary suburb of Milwaukee. I think that motivation propelled her to do this for a long time," said John Garofolo, who is publishing a book next year of 150 to 180 of her photos.

With a grant from the Brico Fund funneled through the Milwaukee Press Club Endowment, Garofolo is also writing a play about Chapelle.

"She was raised in a family of pacifists who believed war was wrong. I think thiswas her way to reconcile that. She was showing how horrible war was, that she was willing to go to show people the terrible price wars exact," Garofolo said.

She traveled to Vietnam several times in the early '60s, when U.S. forces numbered only a few hundred advisers. In 1962 she met a young AP reporter who would later win a Pulitzer for his coverage of the Vietnam War. Peter Arnett, who became a household name during his coverage of the first Gulf War for CNN, met her at the Caravelle Hotel in Saigon, recalling that she was "petite and charming, not the brittle, aggressive personality I had envisaged from her legend."

As one of the first, if not the first, female journalists covering the Vietnam War, Chapelle had to cope with attempts by military leaders to ban her from missions. In 1962 an officer tried to deny her access to covering a field operation, arguing that there were no toilets for women in the jungle.

"According to my AP colleague Fred Waters, Dickey, in her olive drab field gear, and her feet firmly planted on the ground, snarled at him, 'Listen soldier don't worry about me, and when I have to I can piss standing up straight just like you do!' Of course, Dickey went on the patrol," Arnett recalled in an email interview.

Chapelle returned to Vietnam in October and November 1965 on assignment for the National Observer and RKO broadcasting company for a story about a Marine company, following the unit from training and into battle.

Huet's photo of Chapelle getting the last rites from a chaplain, along with a picture of Chapelle holding a camera and wearing Marine fatigues, were sent out by AP and widely printed shortly after her death.

"What was different about Vietnam is that photographers had incredible access to the war thanks to the U.S. military and particularly helicopters," said Hal Buell, who supervised AP photo operations during the Vietnam War.

"If you were accredited, and she was, if you heard there was a battle, all you had to do was hop aboard a chopper and off you went, you were in the middle of the battle. That's different compared to World War II and Korea and subsequent wars.

She really took advantage of that and saw a lot of action," said Buell, 83, who later became AP's executive news photo editor.

Jack Paxton was the Marine press officer who met Chapelle and other journalists the night before she was killed. Stationed with the 4th Marine Regiment in Chu Lai, Paxton briefed reporters about the next morning's mission to engage the Viet Cong. He had met Chapelle a decade earlier when she was covering an air show in Philadelphia and they laughed and reminisced that evening over dinner.

Chapelle loved the Marines, her fondness stemming from her first visit to the front lines on Iwo Jima. She called them "her Marines" and they responded in kind to the slender woman who didn't mind digging her own foxhole and ate the same chow as they did. Marine representatives will attend the Milwaukee Press Club hall of fame induction ceremony for Chapelle next week.

Perhaps it's fitting that she was with her beloved Marines when she was killed.

"She had seen more action than most of our Marines had at that time. Anyone going into any action is scared. I'm sure she was nervous, but she didn't show it," said Paxton, 84, president of the Marine Corps Combat Correspondents Association.

Greg Lake took part in the same battle but in a different Marine company than Chapelle. When she was killed just a few hours into the mission, word quickly spread among Marines despite the remote area.

"It passed like wildfire — 'Did you hear Dickey got killed?' The word-of-mouth was almost immediate throughout the company. What a shame," said Lake, who spent nine months in Vietnam and now lives in northern California.

LAST RIGHTS BEING GIVEN TO DICKEY BY CHAPLAIN

A Marine honor guard escorted her body home from Vietnam. On the first anniversary of her death, a monument was erected near where she was killed. The Marines who dedicated the memorial marker included these words on the plaque:

She was one of us and we will miss her.

AMERICA JUST LOST ONE OF THE MOST DECORATED SOLDIERS IN HISTORY

Lt. Gen. Thomas H. Tackaberry joined an Army at war, enlisting amid World War II.

He later served in Korea and Vietnam, becoming a hero of both conflicts. He'd go on to command the 82nd Airborne Division and, later, the 18th Airborne Corps and Fort Bragg.

But Lt. Gen. Tackaberry, who died Monday at the age of 93, wasn't defined by the three stars he wore on his uniform at the end of his 38-year military career.

Nor did the numerous medals that made him one of the most decorated officers in Army history — three Distinguished Service Crosses, five Silver Stars, a Distinguished Flying Cross and a Soldier's Medal, among many others — provide the full measure of a man long devoted to his country and his family.

"He never talked about his awards," said retired Brig. Gen. Burt Tackaberry, one of his oldest sons. "He was very humble. He knew what he achieved, but was very quiet about it."

After his Army career, the general lived quietly at the family home in Gates Four and later, in a Fayetteville nursing home, his son said. But he was fiercely proud of his service, especially within the 82nd Airborne Division and at Fort Bragg.

Instead of medals and war-time heroics, Brig. Gen. Tackaberry said his father's stories focused on soldiers, whom he treated much the same way he treated his own family.

"He loved soldiers, and he loved his children," Brig. Gen. Tackaberry said. "He gave both a lot of latitude and a lot of responsibility, and he expected you to get the job done."

"He was a soldier's soldier," his son added.

A September 1979 copy of The Fayetteville Times called Lt. Gen. Tackaberry a "grunt's angel."

"That's what they call a leader who goes out of his way to see his troops have enough beans and bullets to carry them through the long trek and the fight to follow," the author of the profile wrote.

Another article, dated June of the same year, described Lt. Gen. Tackaberry as a rugged, yet compassionate man "with John Wayne-like qualities." Brig. Gen. Tackaberry said his father taught him that leaders should be firm, but fair.

At a time when many commanders were known for bluster and an expletive-filled vocabulary, Lt. Gen. Tackaberry believed that motivating soldiers required more than scare tactics.

"He never harassed. There were no threats," his son said. "He taught me that you didn't have to scream. You didn't have to use four-letter words."

After his Army career, Lt. Gen. Tackaberry briefly served as a manager of a local real estate office before joining a private firm, BDC Corp., as the head of a six-person team that advised the military of the Republic of China.

As an Army leader and a father, Brig. Gen. Tackaberry said his dad led by example, often setting a high bar for fitness.

As the commander of the 82nd Airborne Division, then-Maj. Gen. Tackaberry would often lead paratroopers on lengthy runs from the division headquarters across Fort Bragg to Smith Lake and back. The general would have a picnic spread waiting for the soldiers' return, but few reported much of an appetite after the test of endurance.

Months before his passing, a member of the family jokingly challenged the retired general to push-ups. Brig. Gen. Tackaberry said his wheelchair-bound father didn't hesitate. He slipped out of his chair and promptly completed a set of 10 push-ups.
"It was unbelievable," he said.

Lt. Gen. Tackaberry's example instilled a devotion of duty to country not only in his soldiers, but in his family. His twin sons, Brig. Gen. Burt Tackaberry and retired Col. Kief Tackaberry, both served lengthy Army careers, including stints in the 82nd Airborne Division. And multiple grandchildren are serving.

Despite a busy Army career, Lt. Gen. Tackaberry always made time for his family.

"He was a family man," Brig. Gen. Tackaberry said. "He came to almost all of our games."

At Arlington National Cemetery later this year, the general will be buried next to two of his children who preceded him in death, Richard Tackaberry and Elizabeth Tackaberry.

He is survived by his wife, Lilian Tackaberry, and two other sons, Thomas H. Tackaberry and Steven S. Tackaberry.

On Fort Bragg, officials responded to news of Lt. Gen. Tackaberry's death by praising what he did for the post and the Army as a whole.

"We remember and honor the service, sacrifice, leadership and tremendous example of Lt. Gen. Thomas Tackaberry," said Maj. Gen. Paul J. LaCamera, deputy commanding general of the 18th Airborne Corps and acting senior commander of Fort Bragg. "We'll keep his family in our thoughts and prayers during this difficult time. Though he is no longer with us, his legacy is forever enshrined in the history of the 82nd Airborne Division, 18th Airborne Corps and our great Army."

A spokesman for the 82nd Airborne Division said the All Americans — who are celebrating the historic unit's 100th anniversary this year — were saddened by the loss of their former commander.

The spokesman, Lt. Col. Joseph Buccino, said the general "has a permanent place in the legacy of America's Guard of Honor."

Commanding the 82nd Airborne and the 18th Airborne Corps were "dreams come true" for Lt. Gen. Tackaberry, according to his son.

He led the division between 1974 and 1976, nearly three decades after he first served in the unit, as a private and machine gunner in the division's 504th Parachute Infantry Regiment. And he led the corps and Fort Bragg from 1979 to 1981.

Lt. Gen. Tackaberry came from humble beginnings, as the son of a barber and a tax collector in Los Angeles. But even from a young age, he seemed destined for greatness.

A high school sports star and valedictorian, Lt. Gen. Tackaberry was starring for the Occidental College track team when, as a 19-year-old, he enlisted in the Army Reserve while the nation was still at war.

After serving in various infantry and paratrooper infantry units, Lt. Gen. Tackaberry was commissioned as a second lieutenant and served from late 1945 to June 1948 in Germany as part of the Army of Occupation.

He performed several heroic acts while serving in Korea and Vietnam, thrice earning the nation's second-highest military award for valor, the Distinguished Service Cross, and earning the third-highest award for valor, the Silver Star, five times.

In Korea, he organized a volunteer patrol to go into enemy-held territory in search of wounded U.S. troops, leading the patrol under intense small arms fire, heavy mortar and artillery bombardment and through a known minefield to rescue the wounded and prevent others from being captured by the enemy, according to an award citation.

In another incident, he left the relative safety of his command post to cross a minefield under intense enemy artillery fire to aid a United Nations patrol that was under attack. While exposed to enemy fire, he organized efforts to care for the patrol's wounded and then covered the unit's escape with his weapon.
In Vietnam, then-Lt. Col. Tackaberry flew to the rescue of a besieged firebase under fire from three companies of North Vietnamese Regulars. At the firebase, he leaped from his helicopter, braving relentless enemy fire to move from position to position while leading the defense of the base, according to officials. He then left the base to direct an assault against the enemy.

In another incident, he led a search and destroy operation in which a 15-man platoon was pinned down and its leader killed. The general ordered his unarmed command helicopter to land near the firefight and ran through intense enemy fire to reach the platoon and assume command.

When reinforcements arrived, he led an assault on enemy bunkers, forcing the larger North Vietnamese force to retreat.

At the end of his career, Lt. Gen. Tackaberry said he had no regrets about his service.

"If I were given one wish, I'd ask to start all over again and jump on that street car in Los Angeles and tell the sergeant at that station that I wanted to join like I did on Oct. 23, 1942," he said.

His final assignment was as the commander of the 18th Airborne Corps and Fort Bragg, during which he helped foster what he called the "second golden age of the airborne."

Lt. Gen. Tackaberry led the corps as it assumed the role as the nation's "Strategic Army Corps," responsible to serve as a quick-strike force for immediate deployment to world hot spots.

He also played a hand in petitioning the Army to officially approve the maroon beret that is synonymous with paratroopers. The beret, which was long described as a "non-standard" uniform item by the Army, was briefly banned in the late 1970s.

Before that, Fort Bragg soldiers wore the berets on an unofficial basis, often carrying a signed card from their commander that they would show when challenged by officials from other units.

After the Army outright banned the beret, Lt. Gen. Tackaberry was among the leaders to ask for its return.

"I think the beret is good," he said while at the helm of Fort Bragg. "I didn't realize how important it really is to the young trooper, and veteran soldiers, for that matter, until I arrived."

Brig. Gen. Tackaberry said his father was always on the side of soldiers.

"His philosophy was 'Take care of soldiers and they would get the job done,'" he said. "He loved his soldiers. And he absolutely loved the Army."

OBIT

EDWIN DOUGLAS USN (RET)
KHE SANH VETERAN

On Thursday, February 16, 2017
Born in St. Petersburg, Florida on September 30, 1946, he was the son of the late Rev. Claude Stanfield and the late Wilma Clayton Stanfield. Capt. Stanfield was a graduate of the University of South Florida, Duke University Divinity School, and Princeton Theological Seminary. He enlisted in the U.S. Navy in 1966 as a seaman recruit and served with the Third Marine Division as the Leading Petty officer assigned to the Khe Sanh Combat Base during the 1968 Tet Offensive. Honorably discharged in January 1970, Stanfield became a member of the NC Methodist Conference and served churches in Rougemont and Pink Hill, NC before returning to military duty as a Chaplain Corps officer in 1978. Duty stations included the U.S. Naval Training Center in San Diego; the Destroyer Squadron Five; the U.S. Naval Academy in Annapolis; the U.S. Naval Station in Guam; the Marine Corps Recruit Depot in Parris Island; the Office of the Navy Chief of Chaplains in Washington D.C.; the U.S. Naval Base in Guantanamo Bay; the U.S. Coast Guard in Alameda; the Marine Corps Air Bases Western Region at Miramar; and the Naval Medical Center in San Diego.

Capt. Stanfield's awards include the Meritorious Service Medal, the Navy Commendation Medal, a Combat Action Ribbon, a Vietnam Service Medal, a Humanitarian Service Medal, and others. In 1983, Stanfield was named Armed Forces Chaplain of the Year.

He settled with his family in San Diego after retiring from active duty in 2005, and relocated to Piedmont last May.

Surviving are his wife, Vera Jaudon Stanfield, and son, Samuel Douglas Stanfield, of Piedmont, SC; two sisters, Linda Lewis and husband, Harmon, of Ocala, FL, and Amy Nottingham of Jacksonville, FL; and ten nieces and nephews.

Funeral services were held Thursday, March 2nd, at 11:00 AM at Bethesda United Methodist Church, 516 Piedmont Road, Easley, SC, with Rev. Dan Batson officiating. A naval honors memorial service and burial will be held in Arlington Cemetery at a later date.

I GET MAIL

Sharing a e-mail I was included in.....My brain is old and tired. I checked my "Red Clay" last night and the reunion information is there. I overlooked it. Sorry to have bothered you. Please pass on to all the KSV people who put the "Red Clay" together that from this old reconners perspective, the "Red Clay" it is by far the best, most superbly crafted and written publication of all the various veterans' groups I have read thru the years. Well done. It is still after all these decades strange for me to remember as our very small 3rd FRC Detachment Forward, maybe 15-20 Force Recon Marines and two Corpsman, relieved the SF and their Nung Strikers at Khe Sanh. They left to settled into their new Lang Vei compound in Nov/Dec '66'. The strange part is that we used to call the walk out to Hills 950 and 1015 "the Witches Tit"a 'milk' run to set up radio relay for our teams working the borders. And by Jan '68', the battle was on though the NVA platoons moving in and around Khe Sanh certainly kept the heat on us from Nov '66' thru Mar '67'. Lost count how many times our teams got shot out. Anyway, must get back to work. Again, Tom, I cannot thank you and the other good KSV guys and gals for keeping the memory of what we did and endured alive for our children and grandchildren.

"Then last night was the 'kicker'. I opened up the Spring 2015 Red Clay, by the Khe Sanh Veterans founded by Rev Ray W. Stubbe, Chaplain 1/26. On page 13/14 is a story of Cpl Jerry Clark Burkhead, age 21, M-60 machine-gun team leader in Alpha Company, 1st Battalion, 9th Marine Regiment ("the Walking Dead"), who died with 27 other Marines in his platoon on forward outpost Hill 64 under attack by a reinforced battalion of the 325A NVA Division. The same NVA Division we tracked and chased in '66-67' along with the 324B NVA Division. The Battle for Hill 64 was the last all-out attack by the NVA during the 77 day siege of the Khe Sanh Combat Base. Jerry was a graduate of a very rural Parksley High School, Class of 1965. Jerry, was my classmate and teammate on the Eagle's football team. In a graduating class of roughly 40 Seniors, 20 gals, 20 guys, six of us served. I am the only one left of those six men. Again, another night and no sleep."

I would never have known what happened to my old classmate if it were not for your superb "Red Clay". Thank you all.

INTERESTING INFORMATION FROM RAY MILLIGAN, KHE SANH VETERAN B CO 3RD RECON

UNDERSTANDING WHAT IT MEANS TO BE RATED 100% DISABLED

Unfortunately, many veterans are too often confused about Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) 100 percent disability ratings and whether or not they are allowed to secure gainful employment if rated at 100 percent. While complex, and sometimes confusing to the most experienced VSO, let's take a look at the four types of 100 percent disability ratings in plain, understandable English.

1.Combined. When a veteran's service-connected disabilities are combined to reach 100 percent, he/she is allowed to work full time or part time. For example, if a veteran is rated 70% for PTSD, and 30% for IBS, the two disabilities equal 100% (sometimes – see rating table), and the veteran is allowed to hold a full time or part time job.

2. TDIU or IU. Total Disability/Individual Unemployability. This is a specific type of claim made by a veteran, requesting that he/she be paid at the 100 percent rate even though his/her disabilities do not combine to reach 100%. The request is often made because the veteran is unable to maintain "gainful employment" because his/her service-connected disabilities prevent him/her from doing so. The basic eligibility to file for Individual Unemployability (IU) is that the veteran has one disability rated at 60 percent or one at 40 percent and enough other disabilities that result in a combined rating of 70 percent or more. The one disability at 40 percent criteria can be a combined rating of related disabilities. Meeting the basic criteria is not a guarantee that the veteran will be awarded 100 percent under IU criteria. The medical evidence must show that the veteran is unable to work in both a physical and sedentary job setting. A veteran not meeting the percentage criteria may still be awarded IU if the disabilities present a unique barrier to gainful employment. If a veteran is granted 100 percent under IU he is prohibited from working full-time, because in filing the claim for IU the veteran is stating he/she is unable to work because of his/her service-connected disabilities. However, receiving IU does not necessarily prevent a veteran from all employment circumstances. The veteran can work in a part-time "marginal" employment position and earn up to a certain amount annually, but not allowed to surpass a certain amount.

3. Temporary 100 percent rating. If a veteran is hospitalized 21 days or longer or had surgery for a service-connected disability that requires at least a 30-day convalescence period, the VA will pay at the 100 percent rate for the duration of the hospital stay or the convalescence period. For example, if a veteran has a total hip replacement for a service-connected hip disability, the VA will pay 100 percent compensation for up to 13 months, the standard recovery period for a replacement of a major joint. The duration of 100 percent temporary disability for any other type of surgery will depend on what the doctor reports as the recovery period.

4. Permanent and total. A 100 percent "permanent and total" rating is when the VA acknowledges that the service-connected conditions have no likelihood of improvement and the veteran will remain at 100 percent permanently with no future examinations. The P&T rating provides additional benefits, such as Chapter 35 education benefits for dependents, among others. Veterans sometimes make the mistake of requesting a P&T rating simply because they want education benefits for their dependents. The one caveat that veterans need to keep in mind is that when P&T is requested, all of their service-connected disabilities will be re-evaluated. If improvement is noted during the subsequent examinations, a reduction from 100 percent can possibly be proposed. Because many veterans are service-connected for conditions that VA says have a "likelihood of improvement," most ratings are not considered permanent and are subject to future review. The only time veterans can't work a full-time position, that is considered a gainfully-employed job is if they were awarded 100 percent disability through a claim for IU. Additionally, a 100 percent rating under either IU or combined ratings may or may not be rated as permanent and total. A temporary 100 percent rating is just that: temporary due to being hospitalized or recovering from surgery on a service-connected condition.

Keep in mind, it is always best for a veteran to work with an accredited Veteran Service Officer (VSO) who can explain the complex workings of the VA benefit system.

NICE HONORING OF KHE SANH VETERAN

GAMBOA, GUEST COLUMNIST: MARINE CPL. ROGER LEE STROUD, WACO NATIVE, DISPLAYED VALOR RIGHT TO THE END IN VIETNAM WAR COMBAT

ROBERT GAMBOA Guest columnist
May 14, 2014

Roger Lee Stroud, a Waco native who called it home even after his family relocated to Corpus Christi, is an example of the instinctive heroism that colored the history of the Vietnam War. He not only demonstrated a regard for the fallen but also the safety of his men — something he took seriously to his final breath. He is one of nine veterans with local ties being added to the Waco Vietnam Veterans Memorial this morning.

ROGER STROUD CHARLIE CO 1ST BATTALION, 1ST MARINES

Stroud arrived in Vietnam on March 27, 1968, two weeks after his 18th birthday. He soon was assigned as a machine gunner with C Company, 1st Battalion, 1st Marines, 1st Marine Division. The 1st Marine Regiment then was involved in Operation Pegasus, guarding an airstrip at Ca Lu. In mid-April, the 1st Division was ordered back to the Khe Sanh area in Quang Tri Province. Khe Sanh was home to the city of Hue, where the North Vietnamese Army (NVA) had begun their Tet Offensive months earlier. Hue was finally recaptured after the enemy suffered nearly 1,900 killed, but now the NVA had begun to reappear. It was time to clean them out.

There's no denying the danger. Elephant grass 4 to 6 feet high provided excellent cover for the enemy, not to mention the untold number of Viet Cong sympathizers. The area was also home to several battalions of the NVA.

May and June 1968 found Marine Cpl. Roger Stroud, by now a seasoned combat veteran, assigned as a platoon leader. C Company, 1st Battalion, was assigned to search-and-destroy missions. The NVA, well-entrenched in bunkers, were well-armed, professional fighting units. Monsoon rains from afternoon into night only added to the threat of ambushes.

On the night of July 6, the 1st Battalion was ordered up Hill 689. C Company was to follow D Company on the western slope. The NVA aggressively countered with mortars, tree snipers, rocket-propelled grenades, automatic fire and small-arms fire. D Company suffered extensive casualties and pulled back.

Meanwhile, C Company experienced NVA assaults along the defensive wire. During the night NVA soldiers yelled, and in perfect English, phrases such as, "Friendly Corpsman," "Get Down" and "I'm a Friendly," finally slipping into the 1st Battalion secure zone. Heavy fighting occurred on both sides of the wire.

The morning of July 7 found many D Company casualties, some left on the battlefield. C Company was ordered up on the southwestern slope of Hill 689 to recover the dead. Stroud's platoon took the lead and immediately moved against the main force of the 304th NVA Division. Tree snipers appeared everywhere.

Observing that several Marines from an adjacent platoon were wounded and exposed to continuous enemy fire, Stroud led several of his men across 50 meters of fire-swept terrain to the side of the casualties. There they administered medical aid to four men and directed evacuation of the wounded to safety.

During the three-hour battle, the NVA suffered 45 dead and countless wounded. C Company suffered seven dead and 30 wounded. Marine Cpl. Roger Lee Stroud lost his life on July 7, 1968, having served three months and 12 days with C Company. He was Vietnam War Casualty No. 30,449. He was awarded the Purple Heart and Silver Star Medal posthumously.

OBIT

FROM MICHAEL ARCHER

A PIECE I JUST SUBMITTED TO MY LOCAL NEWSPAPER, THE RENO-GAZETTE JOURNAL:

Retired Marine Corps Lieutenant General Martin L. Brandtner died in Reno on January 3, 2017. He and I initially met about a decade ago after my first book, A Patch of Ground: Khe Sanh Remembered, was published. He insisted on being called "Marty" which, as a former Marine enlisted man, required a bit of practice on my part in order to unlearn the proper military etiquette I'd been taught years ago. Marty was immediately supportive of my work, helping, along with Major General Mike Myatt and Reno banker David A. Funk, to have the book placed in the splendid library of the Marines' Memorial Club in San Francisco. This proved to be, not only an honor, but a timely source of encouragement in my fledgling writing career. I thought of Marty again with gratitude just last year upon the release of my third book The Long Goodbye: Khe Sanh Revisited.

Marty Brandtner was a modest man, with little to be modest about. Long before retiring in 1981 as Director of Operations for the Joint Chiefs of Staff, one of the most significant positions in the U.S. military, he had, as a captain, commanded a combat rifle company in Vietnam. There, he would earn the distinction of being one of only two people from that war to twice receive the Navy Cross, the second highest award for valor, only behind the Medal of Honor. Even more extraordinary, Brandtner would earn those two medals in September 1968 during combat actions just eight days apart!

LTGEN MARTIN BRANDTNER, USMC

Among the several acts of bravery described in those citations was one telling how, during fighting against an overwhelming North Vietnamese Army force attempting to overrun his company position, Captain Brandtner saw an enemy hand grenade land near some of his men, and "concerned only for the welfare of his fellow Marines, he knocked two of the men to the ground and quickly placed himself on top of them, thereby absorbing the fragments from the exploding grenade in his protective armor and preventing possible death or serious injury to his companions."

Just over a week later, when the enemy returned in a series of human wave attacks against his company, Brandtner "calmly moved among his men reorganizing, encouraging and rallying his outnumbered and dazed company into an inspired fighting unit." (The entire text of his commendations can be read at http://valor.militarytimes.com/cipient.php…)

WHY IT'S SO MEANINGFUL TO RETIRE A BATTALION FLAG

By Dan Doyle

Recently I had the honor to participate in a very special event at the National Museum of the Marine Corps in Triangle, VA, outside of the sprawling Quantico Marine Base. About 150 people attended the event to honor the veterans of 3rd Reconnaissance Battalion, 3rd Marine Division, who had served with that unit during the Vietnam War.

The reason for the gathering was to retire and transfer our Vietnam era flag to the museum where it will become part of the collection. We were also there to unveil a plaque honoring the Battalion to be permanently displayed along the peaceful, leafy path called the "Legacy Walk" that meanders through the woods and hills on the beautiful museum's grounds.

THE CEREMONY OPENS WITH RESPECT

The small crowd that gathered for the event included wives and some of the adult children of the gathered veterans as well as Marine Corps and Museum officials. The Battalion Chaplain, Gil Gibson, opened the ceremony with a prayer remembering those who had fallen and those present. There were tears as his voice quavered slightly with his own emotion. Those emotions seem to come more easily and readily to us now in our older years.

Major General Donald R. Gardner, USMC —who had been a Co. Commander for Charlie Co, 3rd Recon Bn, in Vietnam and would go on to end his career as Commanding General of the 3rd Marine Division— was the guest speaker. His remarks were charged with the history of the battalion and his own memories of his time with it. The Charlie Co. guidon flag from Vietnam was also retired to the museum at this ceremony.

BATTALION ACCOMPLISHMENTS

3rd Recon Battalion's accomplishments in Vietnam were many. 2,800 Marines and Corpsmen served under the battalion's colors that were retired to the museum at this ceremony. As the "eyes and ears" of the Marine Amphibious Force and the 3rd Marine Division, the men of this battalion paid a dear price in service to the nation. 1,333 Marines and Corpsmen were killed, wounded or missing during the battalion's service in country. The battalion suffered a 40% casualty rate, which was equivalent to that of many of the regiments who fought at Gettysburg, the bloodiest battle of the Civil War. But the Viet Cong and the North Vietnamese troops knew and feared the small, lightly armed patrols of the 3rd Recon Battalion. During the battalion's time in Vietnam 4 Medals of Honor, 13 Navy Crosses, 72 Silver Stars, and 56 Bronze Star were awarded to its Marines and Corpsmen.

FROM L-R "DOC" WINTERS, SGT LELAND UPSHAW AND "DOC" DAN DOYLE

WHEN WE WERE YOUNG MEN...

We 3rd Recon Battalion veterans were very young men when we patrolled and fought together in the steamy jungles, the rolling, elephant grass covered hills, and coastal plains of Quang Tri Province, in the I Corps area of South Vietnam. Bravo Co. endured the long siege at Khe Sanh during the Tet offensive of 1968. Five decades have passed behind us since then.

At this event we came together as a gathering of old men. We had reunited, once again, to remember that time in our lives when we faced the challenges and fears of lonely patrols and fierce combat together against a determined enemy. We were full of good cheer in each other's presence. We also bore with us the long held sorrows of loss for those heroes who had fought so hard with us there, but who did not come home. Those who have experienced the horrors of combat know the peculiar bond that exists between men who have survived and lived on with those memories.

...NOW THAT WE'VE GROWN

50 years ago we were thrown together as strangers and, after surviving the terrible crucible of combat together, we came away a band of brothers like no other. You may have heard the phrase more than once: "Once a Marine, always a Marine." It is not just a phrase to Marines; it is a felt truth, a reality. That identity lasts a lifetime. That was clearly evident amongst the attendees.

Those of us who attended the event felt great pride for our history together. The respect and the honor given to the 3rd Reconnaissance Battalion meant a lot to all of us. We have accepted the fact that this momentous time in our lives, and the battalion's role in Vietnam, is now 50 years in the past. We have lived long and productive lives, raised families, and are now, for the most part, experiencing the joys retirement and grandchildren. We know that we are the lucky ones. We have never forgotten those that we knew so well, who "gave the last full measure of their devotion." Those who did not come home with us remain forever brave and youthful in our memories. And when we think of them, we can not hold back the tears of loss and sorrow. They were, and remain, our real heroes.

THE DEDICATION OF THE PLAQUE

When the speeches were finished they were followed by a brief ceremony involving a Marine Corps Color Guard, the playing of the National Anthem and the Marine Corps Anthem. All of it was carried out with the usual Marine Corps precision, formality, and dignity. After the formal passing of the colors to the museum was complete, the plaque dedicated to us was unveiled by a Corpsman and a Marine. When the event was completed, my company, Bravo Co., which had the largest contingent of veterans at the event, gathered for a Company picture. While the cameras clicked one of the men started singing the Marine Corps Hymn and the rest of us spontaneously joined in with enthusiastic, if less than melodic voices. After words, we all went back into the museum to lift a few libations in the museum's Tun Tavern.

Amazing Grace and Finishing Strong

"Through many dangers, toils, and snares, I have already come; 'tis grace hath brought me safe thus far, and grace will lead me home."
John Newton

I would say that any Khe Sanh Vet for sure has been through many dangers, toils, and snares. Actually, everyone goes through many dangers, toils, and snares if only driving on an expressway. Grace, the undeserved favor of God, I believe is what has brought me safe thus far. Pushing seventy years old now I am making an effort to help the Lord by taking better care of myself. Falling and fracturing my skull last November as well as helping to take care of new grandchildren made me realize my obligations if I want to share in their lives.

At the Denver reunion in 2009, my first as KSV Chaplain, I spoke about finishing strong. Scripture as well as secular quotes reinforce how a person needs to take care of their mind, body, and soul to truly enjoy life.

"Do not have your concert first and tune your instruments afterward. Begin the day with God."
Hudson Taylor

Daily devotionals and prayer have brought me closer to God. A Silver Sneakers Card from Blue Cross gave me a free gym membership to work my body. Lumosity, an online daily quiz is helping my mind.

"For I know the plans I have for you," says the Lord, "They are plans for good and not for disaster, to give you a future and a hope. In those days when you pray, I will listen. If you look for me in earnest, you will find me when you seek me."
Jeremiah 29:11-13

My brother Tom is a fire department chaplain also. He has mentioned to me many times that I need to listen to and follow my own advice. Since my accident, I have realized just how right he was. My fractured skull left me a bit goofier than I was before and if I want to finish strong I have to daily pay attention to my mind, body and soul.

"...Because the hand of my God was on me, I took courage..."
Ezra 7:28

"Be strong and courageous! Do not be afraid of them! The Lord your God will go ahead of you. He will neither fail you nor forsake you."
Deuteronomy 31:6

"I command you—be strong and courageous! Do not be afraid or discouraged. For the Lord your God is with you wherever you go."
Joshua 1:9 (NLT)

"A pessimist is one who makes difficulties of his opportunities and an optimist is one who makes opportunities of his difficulties."

Harry Truman

"Things turn out best for the people who make the best of the way things turn out."

John Wooden

"...Hezekiah prayed for them, saying, 'May the Lord, who is good, pardon everyone who sets his heart on seeking God—the Lord, the God of his Fathers—even if he is not clean according to the rules of the sanctuary.' And the Lord heard Hezekiah and healed the people."
II Chronicles 30:18-20

There are many passages in the Bible that state "seek God" and one of my favorites is Psalm 9:9-10 "The Lord is a shelter for the oppressed, a refuge in times of trouble. Those who know your name trust in you, for you, "O Lord, you have never abandoned anyone who searches for you."
It is my hope to see many of you in Cleveland at the reunion.

Holy Spirit, Advocate, Comforter, help us to find strength and courage in your presence for all the challenges of our lives. "May the Lord bless you and protect you. May the Lord smile on you and be gracious to you. May the Lord show you his favor and give you his peace." Numbers 6:24-26 Amen.

LATE OBIT

JAMES B. THOMAS USN, KHE SANH VETERAN, KILO CO 3/26

James Byron Thomas died April 15, 2017 in Chickasha, Oklahoma. He was born March 2, 1947 in Lawton, Oklahoma to James Clarence Thomas and Ruth (Chapman) Thomas. After graduating from Lawton High, he enlisted in the Navy in 1966 and became a corpsman in Vietnam. He was shot down in a helicopter on May 29, 1968 and received a purple heart for his injuries.

James was married to Emma and that union resulted in two children, Scott and Michelle

James later moved to Lawton in 1979 where he met and married Terri Ganse in October 14, 1982. They were married 34.5 years. That marriage resulted in two sons, Kevin and Kyle

After getting out of the Navy, he went to Sparks in Ft. Smith, Arkansas and became a Radiologic Technologist. James worked in numerous hospitals in Lawton, Chickasha, and Oklahoma City. He retired from Mercy and The Heart Hospital in 2010.
James joined the Navy reserves for a while then transferred to the Air National Guard. He had a total of 36 years of service when he retired from the military and he achieved the rank of Master Sergeant.
Jim Thomas was preceded in death by his mother and father.

He is survived by his sister, Carolyn Pingry of Lawton; his wife, Terri; his son, Scott and wife, Nora and daughter, Michelle Elsey and husband, Bryan all of Sanger, TX; his son, Kevin of Norman, OK and son, Kyle of Chickasha, OK; grandchildren, Tanner and Madison Thomas, Brennan Bloom, Cody and Emma Elsey

KHE SANH VETERANS, INC. SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION

GOVERNING RULES FOR OPERATIONS OF THE KHE SANH VETERANS, INC. SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION:

1. The purpose of the Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. Scholarship Foundation (KSVSF) is to provide financial aid to high school graduates who plan to attend an accredited institution as a full time student OR who are currently enrolled full time in an accredited post-secondary curriculum.

2. Scholarships will be awarded to applicant students who have at least one parent, legal guardian, or grandparent who is a paid member in good standing of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., a 501(c)(19) charitable organization.

3. IT IS THE RESPONSIBILITY OF THE STUDENT TO SEE THAT THE SCHOLARSHIP APPLICATION REQUIREMENTS ARE FULLY COMPLETED AND SENT DIRECTLY TO THE SCHOLARSHIP CHAIR BEFORE 5/1/Governing Year AT THE ADDRESS BELOW;

Mr. Dan Fisher
KSVSF Committee Chairman 52ND
6050 52ND St. North
Oakdale, MN 55128-1317

CRITERIA FOR SELECTION

Applicants must be the legal child or grandchild of a paid up member of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. (See member definition in the KSV Association bylaws.) This includes deceased, life members of KSV and those Khe Sanh Veterans listed as KIA/MIA in Vietnam if family members are paid up, associate members of KSV, Inc. Children or grandchildren of KSV associate members are not eligible.

Information provided by each candidate on the attached application forms will focus on the following qualities considered for selection to KSVSF financial aid: good grades, character, citizenship, leadership experience and personal essay. A point selection system is included in the application forms. Examples of these above mentioned qualities could be in the classroom, in extracurricular activities or in service to the community, church or nation.

A Scholarship Foundation Review Committee will serve the President of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., and will accept, review and grade each correctly completed application. This committee will provide a scholarship financial report and short summaries of the selected candidates at the annual KSV reunion for publication in the Red Clay" Newsletter.

SCHOLARSHIP AWARDS

The amount of financial award per applicant will be determined by the Review Committee's scoring results. The awards will be granted for a maximum of 4 years per student. A new application will be required for each continuous year applied.

Achievement Award Levels are:

The CoI. David E. Lownds Award - for top achievement in Application Review (one award or tie)
The Sgt. Major James T. Gaynor Award - for high achievement in Application Review (5 awards)
The CoI. William H. Dabney Award - for honorable achievement in Application Review (6 awards)

The KSV Scholarship money will be awarded upon presentation of proof of registration for the appropriate term. Proof of registration should be sent to the chairman's address on page one of this application.

Scholarship Guidelines and Purpose

1. The financial award is to be used to help defray costs of tuition, fees and books at an accredited Institution of the applicant's choice as a full time student.

2. If a recipient of the KSVSF scholarship does not enter a post high school institution during the next school year, the award for his/her benefit shall be cancelled and the money awarded to an alternate applicant. An alternate of each scholarship award is to be chosen at the time of selection of recipients.

3. The KSVSF Committee Chair and the Treasurer of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., will send a check for the full years' award amount to the selected students upon final approval by the KSV President.

4. The recipient of a scholarship shall be notified no later than the end of the month of August of the coming school year.

5. Scholarship Applications must be received by the Committee Chair on or before MAY 1 of the school year applied for.  (This is an important, NEW change to previous years)

6. KSV, Inc. Scholarship recipients must agree to maintain a standard of personal performance both in and out of school that conforms to the moral standards set down by Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., members.

7. Criteria: Point Selection System !Maximum of 110 regular points or 125 with bonus points

a. Scholastic achievement / grade point average. Max =40 points max. (Please attach last school GPA transcript) example below:

A GPA of 4.0 x 10 =40 points or a GPA of 3.0 x 10 =30 points

Fifty years after Vietnam's bloodiest Battles, veterans gather for what could be a final reunion
Story by Michael E. Ruane
Published 29 April 2017
The Washington Post

Kathryn Barents got home from work that fall night in 1967 to find somber family members gathered in the living room, and her shaken father, Henry, waiting to speak with her. She feared this was about her husband, Paul, a Marine Corps lieutenant in Vietnam.

They had been married only a few months, and his class had just completed the Basic Officer Course in Quantico, Va., in August. Ten from the class had already been killed, and she figured that Paul, 23, had now been added to the list. Her father brought her into the kitchen, and they sat down. Paul had been grievously wounded in a friendly-fire incident. His legs had been shattered, and would later be amputated. But she was lucky. He was alive.

This week, Paul Barents, now 72, and Kathryn Barents, 71, of Easton, Md., will join scores of Marine Corps veterans and their spouses outside Washington for a 50-year reunion of Paul's graduating class from the Marines' Basic School for officers.

There were 516 of them in class 5-67, most college graduates, like Paul, in their early 20s who trained as infantry platoon leaders and were sent almost directly to the war, which was reaching its height. Dozens of Americans were being killed every day, and the toll was especially great for officers.

The men of 5-67 were the sons and grandsons of immigrants, and the sons of Marines who had fought in World War II. There was a college wrestling star, and a baseball player with a shot at the major leagues. Most of them were single. But a few were married, and some had children. One, 2nd Lt. Morrell J. Crary, was killed in action five days after his daughter was born back home in Salem, Ore.

Some lasted only a few days in Vietnam — two were killed Oct. 14, 1967, the day after they arrived, according to a classmate who knew them.

Others made it a few months before they were killed or wounded. One man was spared death when a buddy persuaded him to skip a flight on a transport plane that was shot down, killing everyone on board.

Thirty-nine from the class perished, in battles around well-known places like Khe Sanh, and Con Thien, and at forgotten locales like Thon Tham Ke, "Bastards Bridge" and "Antenna Valley."

Twelve would receive posthumous medals for courage — four got Navy Crosses, three Silver Stars, four Bronze Stars and one a Distinguished Flying Cross.

One classmate would be missing in action for 36 years, until his body was located in 2004. The remains of two others have never been found.

But many, like Barents, have moved beyond the lifelong physical scars from the war to enjoy successful and productive lives.

They are in their 70s now, with white hair and grandchildren. A few still have mementos of the war — faded telegrams sent to their families, a memorial card from a friend's funeral, snapshots of themselves in Vietnam.

This year and next year, when most of the men served, mark the 50th anniversaries of some of the bloodiest months of the Vietnam War. The year 1967 saw the deaths of 11,400 Americans, and 1968 claimed 16,900, the worst yearly toll of the war, according to the National Archives.

The two years account for almost half the 58,000 names on the Vietnam Veterans Memorial in Washington, which honors those killed by the war. Since the war, the men of class 5-67 haven't met often. This is only their fifth get-together. They went separate ways after the conflict and reunited for the first time in 2008.

Now 50 years have passed. Many survivors from the class have died. Some are too sick to attend the reunion. And while their four days together will be a time of comradeship and remembrance, one of them said, "we might not do this again."

Paul Barents, 72, was a second lieutenant serving in Vietnam when he was injured in a friendly-fire incident. His legs had been shattered, and would later be amputated. (Bill O'Leary/The Washington Post)

Second Lt. Paul Barents was setting up a night ambush south of the Vietnamese town Phu Bai when he got a radio call from his captain to be alert for an attack from across a river behind him. He passed the warning to his front-line Marines, and in a crouch began making his way through the underbrush to warn men he had posted in the rear. It was Dec. 7, 1967. Barents had been in Vietnam about 10 weeks and had yet to see much action. He and Kathryn, then 22, had been a married only a short time.

They were both from Massachusetts, she via northern New Jersey. They had met while they were college students, working in the kitchen of a dining hall at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst. They had hit it off, and were married June 17 at Our Lady of Sorrows Church in South Orange, N.J. He wore his dress white uniform. She was in a white wedding gown.

He had joined the Marine Corps right out of college. He believed it was an outfit with purpose, and he went to Vietnam "thinking we were doing a noble thing," he said. "I really did." Doubt emerged mainly in hindsight, he said.

Paul and Kathryn Barents, in a copy of a photo taken on their wedding day, will be attending a reunion with the men of class 5-67. (Bill O'Leary/The Washington Post)

He had been hesitant about marriage because he knew he would be going to the war. But Kathryn told him: "I'd rather be your wife for three months than not all."

"Starting in 1965, '66, we became more aware of the losses over there," she said. "So by the time the class of '67 went, we knew the fatalities were going to be pretty high."

"I was prepared for that," she said.

(Both of Paul's roommates at the basic school and a fellow who lived across the hall were killed in action.) The couple had lived in Woodbridge, Va., while he was at Quantico, and three months after their wedding they were saying goodbye at an airport in New York. She drove their 1963 Pontiac back to her parents' home in Andover, Mass., to await his return.

In Vietnam, he wrote Kathryn regularly and discussed, among other things, whether she should get her hair cut before they met in Hawaii when he had R&R."I wouldn't mind if you cut your hair for Hawaii," he wrote her nine days before he was wounded. "The only thing that has to be there is you." In another letter, he told her he had cut back on his smoking, and closed with, "Well, beautiful, I guess I better go."

Now, as he crept back to his men in the darkness, a new Marine in the platoon mistook him for an enemy soldier and opened fire with an M-16 rifle. Barents had always trained his men to aim low at night, so as not to miss high, and the bullets ripped into his legs. The slugs broke his right thigh bone, both bones in his lower left leg and lacerated critical arteries in both legs.

Barents collapsed, and hollered "Cease fire!" He asked his men to take off his boots, and someone gave him some shots of morphine. Medevac was called. He was placed on a poncho and hoisted into the helicopter. Before it left, one of his men said, "You were a damn good skipper, sir, a damn good skipper."

Barents was flown to Phu Bai, where he told a superior not to blame the man who shot him. "It was my fault," he said. "I should have had some kind of better communications."

He regretted being unable to complete his tour and his service. Plus, he thought: "How the hell am I going to make a living?"

And he wondered how Kathryn would react. "I'm not the guy [she] married," he said.

Back home, the commandant of the Marines had sent her a telegram reporting that Paul's condition was "serious with his prognosis fair." "Okay," she said she thought. "We knew this going in. . . . Just bring him home. We'll be fine." But her young husband of a few months now had amputated legs.

"It was a game changer," she said in a recent interview in their Maryland home. "It changed all our hopes and futures and plans and everything that we dreamed of."

She wondered whether she would still be attracted to him. He was crippled. There would be no more dancing, no more walks on the beach, she said.
Some people said to her: Wouldn't it be better if he had just been killed?

"No," she replied. "I'm one of the lucky ones. He's coming home."

Jack Callanan, sits in his Boston home in April. Callanan was reporting over the radio that he and his men had just seized part of the enemy hamlet of Lam Xuan when he was injured. (Katye Martens Brier for The Washington Post)

Paul was eventually moved to the Philadelphia Naval Hospital, where he would stay for 14 months. They were reunited there in early January 1968.He was in bed when she walked in. She remembers that he weighed about 75 pounds. He remembers that she looked terrific.

At dusk on Jan. 28, 1968, Jack Callanan, call sign "Gold Lemon 1," was studying a map and reporting over the radio that he and his men had just seized part of the enemy hamlet of Lam Xuan. He had collected documents from dead enemy soldiers and crammed them into his pockets for intelligence purposes. Suddenly his radioman yelled, "Grenade!"

Callanan never saw the North Vietnamese soldier who had popped out of a spider hole, and never saw the crude grenade he threw.

But he heard the "kerplunk" when it hit the ground between him and the radioman. It exploded with a bang, flipped him on his back and drove hot shrapnel into his abdomen, pelvis and left side.

Callanan, 23, was a second lieutenant from the Throgs Neck section of the Bronx in New York City, and one of the five children of parents who had been born in Ireland.

He was a math whiz, with an electrical engineering degree from Manhattan College. After leaving the Marines' Basic School he had gone to the Army's Fort Sill, Okla., for 12 weeks of artillery training.

Technically he was a forward observer, a spotter who would call in artillery fire when it was needed. But the fighting in Vietnam often came in such close quarters that it was too dangerous to ask for an artillery attack, lest Americans be hit.

He was stationed with other Marines aboard the USS Valley Forge, an amphibious assault ship just off northern South Vietnam, and had been involved in previous operations, most notably in late December 1967, near a village called Thon Tham Khe. It was part of Operation Badger Tooth, and aimed to find a large contingent of enemy soldiers reported to be in the area.

The Marines had stumbled on a superbly camouflaged North Vietnamese bunker fortress. We took it real bad," Callanan said in a recent interview in his home in Boston. Forty-eight Marines were killed. They included his Quantico classmate, 2nd Lt. George M. Broz, who had been in Vietnam a month.

Now, a month later, during the fight for Lam Xuan just south of the demilitarized zone dividing South and North Vietnam, he was leading a squad of Marines after another lieutenant had been killed by mortar fire.

"It was another one of these fortified villages," he recalled. "We had to cross some rice paddies, and they had these dikes. We were kind of pinned down on this dike . . . not quite 50 meters from the periphery of the hamlet."

"Anybody that stuck their head up over that dike got a bullet between the eyes," he said.

He maneuvered his men, took some foxholes in the village, and then seized the enemy command and control bunker. He was reporting in when the radioman yelled. Callanan didn't think he was that badly injured, although he was bleeding internally and a wing of his pelvis had been blown off.

"I was very much at ease," he remembered. He was wearing a religious medal his mother had given him. "Strangely enough, you're at peace," he said. "A calm comes over you. You basically say, you know, 'Here it is.' "

Medevac was called in under fire, and Callanan was placed on the helicopter beside the body of the officer he had replaced, 1st Lt. Kenneth W. Smith.

Smith, whom Callanan knew only as "Smitty," was one of eight Marines reportedly killed there that day.

Callanan underwent surgery — the first of many over the years — to have shrapnel removed and internal damage repaired, and shipped back to St. Albans Naval Hospital in New York City, where he would be for almost six months.

When a Marine officer came to his parents' house on Milton Place with the news of his wounds, his mother, Delia, fainted.

Later, she would keep pieces of shrapnel removed from her son's body in a teacup in a china cabinet at home.

Fighting at Khe Sanh, the Vietnam war's most famous siege

These are excerpts from a 1968 documentary film from Department of Defense outlining the timeline in the Battle of Khe Sanh.

A few weeks after he was wounded, while he was still in the Naval Hospital, he got word that his buddy and Quantico classmate, 2nd Lt. Ferdinando DiStefano Jr., 25, had been killed in a mortar attack near Khe Sanh.

DiStefano was the only child of Italian immigrants. He spoke several languages and wanted to go to language school. But he wound up in the infantry. The two men would travel together on visits home from Quantico, and Callanan had gone to DiStefano's to meet his parents.

DiStefano's mother, Antonietta, spoke little English. His father ran a grocery store on Central Avenue in Brooklyn's Bushwick neighborhood, according to a news account.

When Callanan was informed of DiStefano's death, he agreed to be an honorary pallbearer at the funeral. He got a hospital pass and attended the viewing. He introduced himself to DiStefano's parents, and his mother remembered him. He recalled her grief. "It was something that was searing," he said.

The funeral Mass was packed, he recalled. Callanan and other Marines walked behind the casket in dress blue uniforms. He also attended the burial. "It was a gray, cold, damp day," he said. "We had a bugler. . . When the casket was lowered into the ground, his mother [was] screaming."

George Chaconas, 72, poses for a portrait with boots he wore in Vietnam. Chaconas was spared death when a friend persuaded him to skip a flight on a transport plane that was shot down. (Matt McClain/The Washington

Fifty years later, he still has the laminated memorial card from the funeral. It bears a picture of DiStefano in his Marine Corps uniform.

"O Gentlest heart of Jesus," the prayer on the card says. "Send thy angels to conduct thy departed servant to a place of refreshment, light and peace. Amen."

Second Lt. George Chaconas had to get back to the Khe Sanh Combat Base. His week-long break from the grinding siege there was over. His R&R in Bangkok, away from the mud and the trenches and the pounding of enemy artillery, had been wonderful. But now it was time to return. He had made it as far as Da Nang, and had signed up for a flight that would make the dicey hop from Da Nang to Phu Bai to Khe Sanh, in what was then northwestern South Vietnam.

The C-123 cargo plane was scheduled to leave March 6, according to historian Gregg Jones. It would eventually carry, along with its crew, 43 Marines. Also onboard would be a young freelance photographer working for Newsweek magazine, Robert J. Ellison.

Ellison, 23, had been at Khe Sanh 10 days earlier and had taken a stunning series of photographs that

Newsweek would run March 18 in a spread called "The Agony of Khe Sanh."

One picture showed Marines dragging from the bush the body of 2nd Lt. Donald Jacques, 20, one of Chaconas's 5-67 classmates, who had just been killed. Now Ellison was heading back to the base.

Chaconas, 23, the grandson of Greek immigrants, had grown up in Northwest Washington and graduated from the University of Maryland. He had been at Khe Sanh before the siege began in January and would be peppered there by shrapnel from a North Vietnamese artillery or mortar round. Aside from brief leave, he would be present for the entire 77-day siege.

It was a subterranean experience lived in trenches and dugouts often filled with muddy water and populated with huge rats, he recalled in recent interviews in his Washington, D.C., home and via email. The canned rations were tasteless, and the possibility of death always present. Thousands of artillery shells and mortar rounds fell on the combat base from enemy positions in the surrounding highlands. Inside the base, where about 6,000 Marines were besieged by 20,000 to 40,000 enemy soldiers, a fellow officer gave Chaconas a copy of Bernard Fall's book, "Hell in a Very Small Place."

The historical account, which he still has, tells of the siege and fall of the French bastion of Dien Bien Phu to Vietnamese communists in 1954. "You gotta read this," Chaconas remembered his friend saying. Chaconas did, underlining parts in pink marker. " 'Whoa, this is exactly what's going on right now here at Khe Sanh,' " he thought at the time.

Nearly 50 years later, he said, "I'm sitting there in my hole, reading this thing . . . thinking, 'Holy cow!' "

Could Khe Sanh be another Dien Bien Phu?

No matter, Chaconas had to get back. In Da Nang he had met up with his Washington boyhood friend Dick Wooster. Chaconas and Wooster had gone to elementary and middle school together. Both had joined the Marines, and both were, for the moment, in Da Nang. They hung out, drank beer, and Wooster urged Chaconas to stay the night and skip his flight to Khe Sanh. He could catch one later. Chaconas agreed.

The next day, when he signed up for the trip to Khe Sanh, a flight coordinator did a double take: Lieutenant Chaconas? Weren't you on the airplane yesterday?" The C-123 had been shot down. Everyone onboard was killed. Officials were notifying families of those whose names had been on the doomed flight's passenger list.

"My name was on that list," Chaconas said. "They were filling out the paperwork to tell my parents that I had been killed in Vietnam."

The reunion of class 5-67 began May 3 and ran through May 6.

Jack Callanan, who uses a walker and wheelchair because of complications from his wounds, plans to fly in from Boston. Paul and Kathryn Barents plan to pick him up at the airport and give him a lift to the headquarters hotel in Arlington, Va.

George Chaconas, who is scheduled to lead a reunion tour of Washington, is putting up a couple of the visitors at his home. Others are expected from Nevada, Vermont, New York, North Carolina, California, Texas and elsewhere. They won't gather to tell war stories, said Tony Latorre, 76, who as a young Marine captain helped train class 5-67 a half-century ago and is also attending.

They assemble because "they all shared probably, with the exception of a marriage or the birth of a kid, the most unique experience . . . [of] their entire lives," he said. "They just revel in being . . . [in] standing there," he said, in knowing "that you survived it."

Killed in action

A list of 39 men from the Marine Corps' Quantico, Va., Basic Officer Course class of August 1967 who were killed during the Vietnam War.

2Lt. Eric Craig Egge, 22, of Hopkins, Minn., killed Oct. 14, 1967, at a place that became known as "Bastards Bridge," near Con Thien, in a bitter nighttime battle. He was one of 21 Marines killed there that day.

1Lt. Charles Yaghoobian Jr. , 23, of Pawtucket, R.I., killed Oct. 14, 1967, at the battle of "Bastards Bridge," near Con Thien.

2nd Lt. Larry Dean Bleeker, 24, of Ames, Iowa, killed by a sniper on Oct. 26, 1967, near Gio Son. He had sent tape recordings home to his family. A Christian, he had told his parents before he left for Vietnam: "Mom, Dad, I want you to know . . . I'm ready to live or] die . . . for the glory of Jesus Christ," a local newspaper reported.

2Lt. Leo Richard Schoff, 23, of West Homestead, Pa., killed Nov. 1, 1967, near Thon Bai An a month after his arrival in Vietnam. He was engaged to be married upon his return.

2Lt. Morrell Joseph Crary, 24, of Salem, Ore., killed Nov. 1, 1967, at Thon Bai An, a month after visiting home on leave. His wife, Jeanne, had given birth to their daughter, Shannon, five days before his death, and he had talked to her on the phone about the baby. Crary was posthumously given the Bronze Star medal for gallantry

2Lt. Robert Warren Miller Jr., 24, of San Antonio, killed Nov. 6, 1967, at Ap Bon in "Antenna Valley" during a failed attack in which he and his men were caught by enemy machine gun and mortar fire. He was one of 16 Marines killed

2Lt. Dale Russell Loudin, 22, of Atwater, Ohio, killed Nov. 7, 1967, in "Antenna Valley" in Quang Nam. His men carried his body all night to a place where it could be evacuated. "That night we took great care of a great man we cared about," a buddy remembered.

2Lt. Lloyd Chisolm Runnels Jr., 24, of San Diego, killed Nov. 23, 1967, south of Quang Tri airfield, when a land mine exploded, claiming him and two other Marines.

2Lt. Sam Dixon Warlick, 22, of Raeford, N.C., killed Nov. 30, 1967 at Gia Binh. He was one of 16 Marines killed there that day.

2Lt. Richard William Vaughn, 23, of San Luis Obispo, Calif., killed Dec. 6, 1967, in Thua Thien province by mortar fire "fragmentation wounds to the head and body," the telegram to his family said. He was survived by his parents and six sisters.

2Lt. George Michael Broz, 23, of Stanwood, Wash., killed Dec. 27, 1967, at the fierce but little known battle of Thon Tham Khe. More than 40 Marines were killed, 26 of them from Broz's Lima Company. Broz had been in Vietnam just over a month. He had been married one year and 18 day

2Lt. Thomas Drew Brindley, 24, of St. Paul, Minn., killed Jan. 20, 1968, during a firefight on a hill near Khe Sanh. He was given the Navy Cross posthumously "for his inspiring leadership and unyielding devotion to duty in the face of overwhelming odds."

2Lt. Michael Howard Thomas, 25, of Pawnee, Okla., killed Jan. 20, 1968, in the same battle near Khe Sanh as 2nd Lt. Thomas Brindley. Thomas was also given the Navy Cross posthumously for carrying wounded Marines to safety under fire.

2Lt. John Robert Burns Jr., 24, of St. Louis, killed Jan. 27, 1968, at the battle of "Mike's Hill," near Cam Lo, where 21 men died. He was posthumously given the Silver Star for courage displayed in a battle nine days earlier.

2Lt. Robert Edward Wright , 22, of Sacramento, killed Feb. 9, 1968, in Thua Thien in a mortar and small-arms attack.

2Lt. William Robert "Bill" Reese, 24, of Abeline, Tex., killed Feb. 14, 1968, near Ca Lu in fighting at "Valentine's Ridge." He was among six killed by a direct hit from an enemy mortar. Reese had just graduated from Abilene Christian University, where he had been a band drum major.

2Lt. Ferdinando DiStefano Jr., 25, of Brooklyn, killed Feb. 24, 1968, near Khe Sanh in a mortar attack. He spoke four languages and was the only child of Sicilian immigrants. His father ran a grocery store, and died several months later. His mother, Antonietta, returned to Sicily, but regularly ordered flowers for her son's grave. In 1980, DiStefano's death was remembered by newspaper columnist Jimmy Breslin.

2LT Donald Jacques, 20, of Rochester, N.Y., killed Feb. 25, 1968, in an ambush near Khe Sanh. A news photographer snapped a picture of his men dragging his body out of the underbrush. Jacques was among 26 killed that day. The night before, he wrote home: "We're just sitting here waiting for all hell to break loose." hotographer, Robert Ellison, 23, whose dramatic photo would run in Newsweek, was killed a week later when a plane he was in was shot down at Khe Sanh.

2Lt. Michael James Casey,, 23, of Dalton, Mass., killed March 18, 1968 in Thua Thien. He was posthumously given the Navy Cross for leading his men and carrying wounded to safety.

2Lt. Lawrence Ryland Koman, 23, of Aliquippa, Pa., killed March 30, 1968 at Khe Sanh in a mortar attack. He had attended the University of Cincinnati on a football scholarship and had written his parents that he was about to be promoted.

2Lt. Donald John Matocha, 23, of Smithville, Tex., killed April 5, 1968, on a reconnaissance patrol near Dong Ma Mountain. In the wake of the firefight, his body was not recovered. It remained lost for 36 years, until 2004, when a former North Vietnamese soldier who had buried him was located.

1Lt. Maxie Raymond Williams Jr., 22, of Waverly, Tenn., killed April 10, 1968, in Quang Tri province. His father, a Marine colonel, had served in Vietnam before him, and had been given the Navy Cross for gallantry at the World War II Battle of Tarawa.

1Lt. Benjamin Stephen Fordham, 24, of Monterrey, Mexico, killed April 15, 1968, in a mortar barrage on Hill 800 near Khe Sanh. He wrote to friends about the pain of losing his men and urged buddies back home to avoid going to Vietnam.

1Lt. Michael Pym Hayden, 24, of Detroit, killed April 16, 1968, at Hill 689 near Khe Sanh. Forty-one Marines were killed in the fierce battle, including 12 from Hayden's Alpha company.

1Lt. Daniel Joseph Jaskiewicz, 25, of Grand Rapids, Mich., killed April 16, 1968, in Quang Tri. He was survived by his wife, Kathleen.

1Lt. Michael Jay Warren , 24, of Moline, Ill., killed April 25, 1968, north of Quang Tri in a helicopter crash. The helicopter's tail rotor struck a forklift or crane while landing on a night medevac mission. The aircraft crashed and burned. Warren and another Marine were killed. Three others escaped.

1Lt. Allen Wesley Courtney Jr., 22, of Houston, killed May 17, 1968, by a mine near Khe Sanh. He was posthumously awarded the Bronze Star for heroism in a battle five months earlier

1Lt. Victor David Westphall III , 28, of Albuquerque, killed May 22, 1968, at An Dinh in a battle that claimed 25 Marines, 12 from his company. After his death his parents and brother built a memorial to him in rural Angel Fire, N.M., among the earliest such tributes to the fallen veterans of Vietnam.

1Lt James Warren Cockrell Jr., 23, of Macon, Miss., killed May 26, 1968, by an "explosive device" while on a reconnaissance mission in Quang Tri province.

1Lt. John Harvey Carson, 21, of San Antonio, died June 5, 1968, near Cam Lo when his jeep struck a mine, killing him and his driver. He was posthumously given the Bronze Star for heroic action two months earlier at Hill 190, in Quang Tri, on a mission to recover the body of a Marine killed.

1 Lt. Joseph Timothy Campbell, 24, of Stoneham, Mass., killed June 15, 1968, near An Hoa by a mortar. He was posthumously awarded the Navy Cross for helping evacuate wounded comrades from battle that day, even as he was dying from wounds he had received

1Lt. Robert Gerald Dodson, 25, from Bloomfield, N.J., killed in battle on July 7, 1968, at Hill 689 near Khe Sanh. He was posthumously given the Silver Star for gallantry in an assault he directed and continued, despite being wounded.

1Lt. Dennis Dee Andrews, 24, of Pittsburgh, reportedly killed by a mine on July 14, 1968, west of An Hoa. He was posthumously given the Bronze Star for actions two months earlier when he helped rescue those on board a helicopter that had been shot down. Before joining the Marines, he had been a champion wrestler at Allegheny College.

1Lt. Richard Eli Latimer Jr., 24, of Tinker Air Force Base, Okla., killed Dec. 2, 1968, when the tiny "Bird Dog" observation plane he was in was shot down near Quang Tri.

1Lt. Brian Lee Webber, 24, of Albuquerque, killed in battle Dec. 8, 1968, near Da Nang. He was wounded shortly after arriving in Vietnam, but recovered and returned to duty. He was posthumously given the Silver Star for heroism in fighting on Dec. 4 and 8.

1Lt. Jan Houston Nelson, 25, of Clearwater, Fla., killed April 11, 1970, when the A-4E attack jet he was flying was shot down in Quang Tri province. His body has never been recovered.

1Lt. Kurt Michael Wilbrecht, 26, of St. Paul, Minn., killed June 7, 1970, when his F-4 jet was shot down in Quang Nam province. His radio intercept officer ejected both of them as the aircraft went down. The radio intercept officer survived, but Wilbrecht's body was never recovered.

Capt. Benjamin Lee Tebault, 29, of Portland, Ore., killed June 4, 1972, when his F-4 jet was shot down near Phu Cat, in Binh Dinh province. He was on his second tour of Vietnam. In 1970, he had been given the Distinguished Flying Cross for attacking enemy positions during a rescue mission, despite heavy antiaircraft fire.

1Lt. John David Lawson, 26, of Topsfield, Mass., killed Sept. 1, 1970, when his A-4 attack jet was shot down on a bombing run near Ba Log. The jet, carrying napalm, was hit by antiaircraft fire and blew up.

OBIT

LT COL WALLACE E. FOGO , USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN, X/O 3/26

Wallace "Wally" Edward Fogo, 89, died Saturday, April 15, 2017, at his home at Kendal at Lexington. With family at his side, he died due to complications of dementia and cancer.

Born in East Liverpool, Ohio, on Aug. 16, 1927, the family was living in Wellsville, Ohio, where Wally spent much of his childhood. The family then moved to the Shaker Heights area of Cleveland where Wally graduated from Shaw High school. He graduated from the University of Maryland with a bachelor of arts and also from the Armed Forces Staff College.

He is survived by his wife of 57 years Dorothy "Dot" Fogo; his children, Paul B. Fogo (wife Elizabeth); grandson Matthew Wallace Fogo; and son Matthew H. Fogo (husband Kevin M. Manning). He is also survived by many nieces and nephews, a brother-in-law and sister-in-law, and many friends. He was preceded in death by his parents, a younger sister and a younger brother.

At the age of 17 he asked his mother to sign papers allowing him to join the Marine Corps. She signed and off he went, beginning what would be a 32-year career in the Marines Corps. Wally's life took him to many interesting places including China, Brazil, Japan, Hawaii, Korea, Vietnam, and many of the duty stations known well by all Marines.

Wally entered the Marine Corps at the age of 17 in February of 1945. His first duty station was in China. In China, he fought back the Japanese in an effort to keep them from destroying bridges and railroads. His assignment was to guard the railroads. Post China, the Marine Corps took him to Brazil where he was attached to the US Embassy. During his time in Brazil, Wally acted in plays and adopted a Doberman named Fritz. Fritz was flown home stateside courtesy of a ride in the cockpit of a military transport plane and lived with Wally's parents for the remainder of his life. Post Brazil, Wally attended additional military training and schooling, between Marine Corps Headquarters and Camp LeJeune, N.C. He was then deployed to Korea, his second war, alongside his first cousin. In the Korean War, Wally received a battlefield commission.

Wally met the love of his life, Dot, in 1955 at a good friend's wedding. Wally was the best man for his fellow Marine and Dot, a registered nurse at the time, was maid-of-honor to her good friend and nursing school classmate. This was Wally and Dot's first meeting, but fate was sealed. Wally courted Dot for five years and they married on Dec. 5, 1959. At the time, Wally was stationed on an aircraft carrier, the USS WASP, in Boston harbor. He was the Commanding Office of the Marine Corps detachment on the ship.

After serving on the WASP, Wally and Dot relocated to Washington, D.C., where Wally was stationed at Marine Corp Headquarters. During this time, the couple's son's Paul and Matt were born. After time in DC, the family moved to Camp LeJeune, N.C., then to Quantico, and then to Camp Pendleton, Calif. At that time, Wally was sent to battle again, this time in Vietnam. He served with the 2nd Battalion, 26th Marines, 5th Division as the Operations Officer to Vietnam fighting in Denang, Phu Bai, and Khe Sanh. Marines say that the most intense fighting of the Vietnam War occurred at Khe Sanh. He loved serving his country and was well decorated.

His decorations included the Bronze Star with Valor (saving fellow soldiers by pulling them from a overturned jeep under enemy fire), Joint Services Commendation Medal, Purple Heart Medal (for wounds suffered in Vietnam), Combat Action Ribbon, Presidential Unit Citation, Navy Unity Commendation, China Service Medal, Asiatic-Pacific Campaign Medal, Victory Medal World War 11, National Defense Service Medal, Korean Service Medal, Vietnam Service Medal, United Nations Service Medal, Korean Presidential Unit Citation, Republic of Vietnam Meritorious Unit Citation Gallantry Cross Color with Palm, Republic of Vietnam Campaign with Device, Vietnam Cross of Gallantry with Gold Star, Combat Action Ribbon, Letter of Appreciation – Second Award. Most of his time at war, he was on the front lines and he never asked the men he commanded to do anything he would not do himself. Needless to say, Wally served his country proudly. But, he never once bragged about his esteemed service. In fact, his family had to actually research some of this history as Wally rarely spoke of his time spent fighting for his country. His career took him into three conflicts, serving in WW11, Korea, and Vietnam. He loved the Marines. In 1977, after 32 years, he retired as a Lt. Colonel.

Life after the military opened up another interesting and rewarding chapter for Wally. After his retirement, he and his family moved to Lexington. He loved Lexington. In fact, when his family wanted to go on vacation, he'd say "but I live on vacation He found his next passion in real estate, eventually owning and operating a Century 21 franchise on Main Street. Many people tell stories of his honest, transparent, and forth-right way of running his business. Stories included helping people with real-estate needs and not charging a fee. Wally owned and managed his office for over 20 years. As the effects of dementia became more apparent, he retired for the second time in his life

Wally loved Lexington and everything about this community, and he enjoyed volunteering and serving many of the civic organizations of Lexington. Wally was a member of the R.E. Lee Memorial Episcopal Church for 37 years, serving on the vestry, the property committee, and as an usher. He was also past President of the Lexington Rotary Club, past Lt. Governor of the Rotary Club, a Paul Harris Fellow recipient (Rotary), was instrumental in securing the building for the Association of Retarded Citizens and was past Vice President of the Association of Retarded Citizens, past President of the Effinger Ruitan Club, past President of the Lexington SPCA, past President of the Board of Realtors, recognized as Realtor of the Year in 2002, and was the flag bearer and led the Lexington Hospice Hustle for 14 consecutive years, and delivered meals weekly to those in need for nearly 20 years. He loved giving back, but he kept quiet most of his volunteer efforts.

For anyone who knew Wally, they knew him as a gentle, kind, and humble man. He accepted everyone and welcomed everyone with a warm smile. He loved his God, his Marine Corps, his Church and community, and his family. Wally liked people and being with people. He never forgot his humble beginnings, thus giving him a sense of community, a sense of duty, and a need to help anyone in need. To be clear, Wally would be embarrassed about listing his accomplishments and activities, as he never talked about himself. But, his family is proud of him and wanted to honor him with this information. Wally loved many things, but his love for his wife Dot was nothing short of inspiring. He'd often say how lucky he was to have her as his wife, partner, and best friend. Wally was a good man, a man that did many good things that even his family will never know about, and will be sadly missed by his family, friends, and the community. Semper Fi, Wally!

The Fogo family would like to thank the care givers, particularly the staff at Kendal, Dianne, and Lexington Hospice for ensuring Wally was comfortable. The family requests donations be made, in memory of Wallace E. Fogo, to either the National Alzheimer's Association, Lexington Area Hospice, or the Fellowship Fund at Kendal of Lexington.

MONUMENT HONORING VIETNAM HELICOPTER CREWS APPROVED FOR ARLINGTON CEMETERY

It Has been three years in the making, but helicopter crews who flew during the Vietnam War will have their own monument at Arlington National Cemetery.

The Vietnam Helicopter Pilots Association and Congress came together for the Vietnam Helicopter Crew Monument Act, directing the secretary of the Army to place a 2 1/2-foot by 2 1/2-foot monument at the cemetery in Virginia. It will be placed in Section 35 along Memorial Drive, not far from the Tomb of the Unknowns. Retired Air Force Lt. Col. Bob Hesselbein, who flew AH-1 Cobra gunships in Vietnam, helped spearhead the campaign for the memorial.

In April 2014, Hesselbein, legacy committee chairman of the pilots association, and other members went to Arlington Cemetery to discuss donating a tree. Instead, one of the historians suggested donating a monument. We discovered that the greatest concentration of combat casualties who operated helicopters in the Vietnam War are in Arlington," he told Military Times on Thursday.

The tiebreaker went to then-Army Secretary John McHugh, who decided to not move forward with the monument.

The prime directive for the cemetery is to do everything it can not to initiate an action that would displace an otherwise-eligible veteran," McHugh told Time magazine in 2016. "On a very tough decision, that philosophy and unwritten rule was the determining factor."

McHugh said the association could donate the tree, as originally intended, but Hesselbein said just having the tree marker didn't give justice to those who lost their lives.

The Vietnam Helicopter Pilots Association members sought action from Congress, and through publicity and nationwide support from the community, the Vietnam Helicopter Crew Monument Act was passed in March. Sens. Tammy Baldwin, D-Wis., and Dan Sullivan, R-Alaska, introduced the bipartisan legislation. Companion legislation was introduced on the House side by Rep. Mark Amodei, R-Nev.

Baldwin told Army Times that she was moved by Hesselbein's stories of his own experiences during Vietnam, including "stories of his friends and comrades that he still knows and those that he lost," she

A PATROL CALLED KING KONG

Michael B. Taft VIETNAM '67 MAY 12, 2017

In early October 1966, the men of "A Co.," my rifle company, part of the 1st Battalion, 3rd Marine Regiment, boarded C-130 cargo planes for the short flight to a hilltop Special Forces base in the far northwest corner of South Vietnam called Khe Sanh. Within days, the entire battalion arrived, along with a battery of 105-millimiter howitzers.

THE AUTHOR, MICHAEL B. TAFT

My battalion, known as 1/3, had been deployed around Danang, along the Vietnamese coast, helping to "pacify" civilians — assisting with farming, improving security, anything to keep the Communists from extending their influence among the population. Now we had a new and much different mission. Decision makers in Saigon and Washington had charged the Marines with fortifying the northern border and defeating the influx of Communist forces.

At Khe Sanh, 1/3 was assigned base security, providing reaction forces for reconnaissance units and interdicting North Vietnamese activity in the area. It was a grueling job — but it also provided an up-close view of the crescendo of enemy activity that would culminate, months later, in the dramatic siege of Khe Sanh and the Tet offensive.

Astride the old French colonial Route 9 and just six miles east of Laos, the Khe Sanh Special Forces base sat on a plateau in a valley, deep within the Annamite Mountains. Immediately north of the plateau and hundreds of feet below, the spectacular, fast -moving Quang Tri River had cut a deep gorge on its way to the South China Sea at Dong Ha. To the west sat a mass of 3,000-foot hills, both an extraordinary spectacular beauty and a forbidding terrain of dense, triple-canopy forest growing in laterite soil. It would also soon be the scene of some of the bloodiest fighting of the war.

We patrolled in small fire teams, larger reinforced squads and platoon-size groups of 30 to 40 men. These patrols could last up to two weeks. We often climbed well into the 100-foot broad-leafed trees, observing the vast, impenetrable jungle and trying to find terrain features that corresponded to our maps. The maps were drawn from old French military maps and air photos interpreted by American sources, and they were usually highly inaccurate. For example, we might suddenly come across a ravine, hidden below the canopied forest, with sides so steep it could barely be climbed, hundreds of feet deep with a narrow stream at the bottom. We had no idea it was there — the mapmakers had simply missed it.

The abundance and diversity of wildlife was stunning. Bamboo vipers, six-foot cobras, foot-long centipedes, scorpions, small deer, multicolored Asian jungle birds and large monitor lizards. Occasionally, somewhere nearby, we would hear a tiger attacking wild hogs. The thunderous roar of a full-grown tiger was as frightening as any experience in Vietnam. But a bigger concern was much smaller: While on patrols, whenever we stopped to rest we would use lit cigarettes to shed our lower bodies of dozens of leeches.

Though we were in a tropical jungle, the weather was mostly a bone-chilling 45 degrees, under monsoon rains, fog and drizzle. We wore long underwear under our jungle utilities, and dried our socks by tying them around our waists. More-level parts of the region contained intermittent bamboo thickets and tall, sharp-edged elephant grass that cut, then infected, uncovered skin and tore apart our clothing. In late January 1967, we went out on one of the multitude of long and short range patrols in and around Khe Sanh. Codenamed King Kong, it was an A Co. operation.

I was the radio man for a reinforced rifle squad, which in those times consisted of about 20 Marines — 12 riflemen, a machine gun team, a corpsman (or medic), an artillery forward observer, his radioman and a patrol leader. The patrol was to last several days, and we would be resupplied with rations by helicopter.

Starting from our company's position on the Khe Sanh perimeter, we climbed down to the Quang Tri River. After fording the fast-moving, chest-high water, we built fires, dried our clothing and were on our way. Several large tiger tracks dotted the wet sand at the river's edge.

The terrain was extremely difficult, and we were lost more often than not. Since we'd been in these hills for months, the situation was in fact the normal course of events. What was not normal occurred during the last days of King Kong.

I was breaking brush for the patrol. Machete in hand, I led the way up a jungled hillside from the gorge bottom below. We were looking for someplace, any place, where we could make radio contact and could be resupplied. Suddenly, at the top of the hill, I broke into a large, hilltop open space that had been a position used by South Vietnamese Army units. It was well above a portion of Route 9, at a sharp bend in the Quang Tri River. Below, we could see several old colonial buildings, a bridge and the surrounding forest. Thankful for our good fortune, the Marines of King Kong set up defensive positions at the opening's edges, made radio contact and arranged for resupply and possible extraction.

Just then, someone noticed a large number of uniformed men below, bursting from what seemed to be everywhere, moving swiftly, headed east and away from us on Route 9. We thought they were North Vietnamese, and there were lots of them. Marine UH-1 helicopters arrived, dropped some rations and flew down to check the troops below. They confirmed our suspicions. King Kong had come across a small part of the huge enemy buildup that would explode into the bloody "hill fights" of 1967, which in turn culminated in the siege of Khe Sanh that fall.

We were in a tight spot. If the North Vietnamese decided to assault our position, the approaches they would probably take would be beyond the reach of our supporting artillery.

However, the reach of the artillery could bracket the North Vietnamese as they moved away, and the forward observer got right to work calling in 105-milimeter artillery fire from Khe Sanh. Several dozen 105 rounds crashed into the areas where the rapidly disappearing North Vietnamese had been.

The patrol leader discussed several options over the radio with our company commander, back in Khe Sanh. Night was quickly approaching. There were no helicopters available for extraction. One option would be to backtrack back down the hill we'd climbed earlier, but then we'd be out of radio contact and floundering in the darkness.

If we marched down to Route 9 and headed west, we would be headed to Khe Sanh, several miles away, but would be subject to ambush if any North Vietnamese were along the highway. Our existing position was acceptable for defense, and the decision was made to spend the night. We improved the existing fighting holes, set a listening post and positioned the machine gun to command the likely path of assault. It was a long, uneventful night for the exhausted members of King Kong. Morning came, and word arrived from Khe Sanh for the patrol to take Route 9 west and meet up with several trucks that would be sent east as far as possible from the base. Single file and extremely alert, we went down the hill to Route 9 — nothing yet. Once down, we spread out in single file along each side of the road, the Quang Tri River below on our left, the jungle on the right.

Moving briskly, we crossed several partially destroyed bridges during the several-hour march west. Suddenly we saw trucks with a rifle squad from our company hidden around them. We quickly climbed in and were on our way. Back at Khe Sanh, we were taken to a large, heated tent, where we would spend a free night, no guard duty. As a reward for our efforts, each of us had the choice of a can of soda or beer. I took the beer.

THE FATEFUL LAST MISSION OF JACK RITTICHIER, COAST GUARD RESCUE PILOT IN VIETNAM

Dec 12, 2016 Gabe Christy

The United States Coast Guard is world renowned for its excellence in helicopter rescue operations. Few people realize how effectively this was used during the Vietnam War. In particular, Lieutenant Jack Rittichier stood out from the rest of these skilled airmen and was highly decorated for his efforts.

AN HH-3E HOVERING DANANG AIR BASE 1968

Rittichier was born in Akron, Ohio, in 1933. After attending Kent State University, he enrolled in the United States Air Force and achieved the rank of Captain.

In 1962 he joined the United States Coast Guard Reserve, as a Lieutenant Junior Grade. Following a short career in the Reserves, he rejoined active-duty military life as a Lieutenant (equivalent to Air Force Captain) in the Coast Guard.

Rittichier then volunteered for an exchange program with the Air Force. This placed him in Vietnam, with the 37th Aerospace Rescue and Recovery Squadron (ARRS). His skills as a helicopter pilot, especially during high wind and rough weather rescue operations, made him a natural fit for this unit.

Their task, on paper at least, was simple: land their helicopters near downed airmen, or stranded troops, and extract them to safety.

This does not take into account the fact these airmen were being shot down deep in enemy territory; they and the helicopters were favorite targets for the North Vietnamese Army.

As a member of ARRS, Rittichier distinguished himself time and again. His first commendation came on April 21, 1968.

He was sitting in his barracks when a call came in for a volunteer crew. He immediately jumped at the task and was put on as copilot. They flew west, to an area known as the "Happy Valley." Later, in an interview, Rittichier remarked on what a misnomer that was. He saw the rescue operation was already in progress, and his helicopter was third in line.

They were aiming for a small landing zone, surrounded by the enemy. Eight US Army soldiers had been trapped there overnight when their helicopters had been shot down.

SPADs (attack aircraft) were circling overhead, and the first helicopter was already headed back to base. The second took ground fire while attempting the rescue, but was still able to pull out four men. Then Rittichier and his pilot went in. They were under intense, but inaccurate, ground fire and had to hover steadily while their PJ (pararescue operator) performed the rescue.

A US NAVY A-1 Sky Raider referred to as a SPAD. These incredibly accurate and powerful attack craft provided cover and support for the 37th ARRS operations in Vietnam.

Rittichier coordinated with the SPADs overhead, calling out enemy positions for them to attack with strafing runs. He described one enemy soldier being killed, only meters away from an American soldier, by machine gun fire from a 6-ton aircraft.

Thanks to Rittichier's communication skills, and the professionalism of the crew, their mission was a success, and they rescued all the remaining soldiers. He was awarded his first Distinguished Flying Cross.

Over the next few months, Rittichier participated in numerous operations. From investigating suspected crash sites, and dodging American artillery shells on the way, to extracting crews from his own squadron who had been shot down in enemy territory. Then, on June 9, 1968, he set out on his final heroic mission.

At 1026 that morning, the call came in that an A-4E Skyhawk, flown by First Lieutenant Walter Schmidt (callsign: Hellborne 215) had gone down in the A Shau Valley. The young Marine was part of a bombing mission, focused on slowing the flow of troops and supplies coming to Vietnam from Laos, along the Ho Chi Minh trail.

His plane had crashed within 2 miles of the Laotian border, next to the trail itself. He was surrounded by enemy troops and was a very high-value target Shortly after the first call came in, 2 HH-3Es, Jolly Green 22 (JG22), and Jolly Green 23, (JG23, flown by Rittichier) took off from Danang. Schmidt had reported his leg was wounded, and he could not walk.

Da Nang Air Base, during the Vietnam War

The rescuers would need to locate him, hover above and then drop their pararescue operators (PJs). The helicopters would be large, stationary objects, floating just above the treetops; in other words, easy targets.

To make matters worse, the helicopter crews did not know whether the calls were genuine or not. Schmidt could have been captured, and have been used as a lure to draw more forces into an easy trap. As the two rescue helicopters approached the crash site, they met up with the rest of their team. While the HH-3Es were well armored and equipped with a machine gun, they were not to attack aircraft by any means. To supplement them, SPADs, Huey Gunships, and forward air controllers (FAC), joined the flight. This was a delicate operation and needed a coordinated effort.

A flight from the 37th ARRS flying towards a rescue site. Within flight refueling, the HH-3Es could travel incredibly long distances.

As they approached, FAC Trail-35 reported there was ground fire, bunkers, and trunks near the crash site. These would need to be avoided or destroyed before a rescue could continue.

Despite the dangers Rittichier and his crew circled the crash site. The gunships sprayed rockets and machine gun fire into the surrounding forest, hoping to suppress the enemy. As the wood burned, JG22 dropped down to rescue Schmidt. As they drew near, the valley floor and hillsides nearby erupted in muzzle flashes, and bullets filled the air around the aircraft.

JG22 made another attempt but had to pull up quickly. They moved away, low on fuel and needing to refit. Attack aircraft made a series of sweeping passes around the crash site. Rittichier had to make the next rescue attempt, knowing all too well what was awaiting him when he did. Again, thinking more of the downed airman than his own safety, he brought JG23 to a hover over the crash. As his PJ prepared to leave the aircraft, gunfire came from every direction.

Attack aircraft made a series of sweeping passes around the crash site. Rittichier and his crew had to make the next rescue attempt, knowing all too well what was awaiting them. Again, thinking more of the downed airman than his own safety, he brought JG23 to a hover over the crash. As his PJ prepared to leave the aircraft, gunfire came from every direction.

The Vietcong had surrounded the crash site, and now in position, opened fire at the hovering helicopter. This time their fire was more accurate, and Rittichier felt rounds pounding into his airframe. Bullets poured into the craft just behind his head, into the base of the rotor mast. As Rittichier pulled away, a fire erupted behind him, and he knew he had to set down somewhere to deal with it. His crew's life was in grave danger, and he had to save them first. As he flew towards an opening in the forest, he tried to set down on a small berm, but it was too late.

The gunfire had damaged his rotor assembly. By the time they reached the clearing, the helicopter was in free fall. When the aircraft hit the ground, it exploded in fire. Tragically, all four men on board were killed.

The remains of Lieutenant Jack Rittichier return to the United States. Carried off of a USCG C-130 at Andrews Air Force Base.

Sadly, even rescue operators are not immune from enemy fire. These three brave Airmen and a Coastguardsman gave their lives for their fellow aviators. They exemplified two of the greatest virtues: dedication to others, and sacrifice of self. For their sacrifice on that day, Lieutenant Jack Rittichier, Captain Richard Yeend (his copilot) and Sergeant James Locke (his PJ) were all posthumously awarded the Silver Star. Their remains were not recovered until 2003; they are all now interred in the United States.

THEIR FATHERS WERE ENEMIES, BUT THE CHILDREN OF VIETNAM'S DEAD SHARE A BOND

By Michael E. Ruane May 25 at 7:20 PM

Vu Ngoc Xiem visits the Vietnam Memorial with as part of the 2 Sides project, a documentary featuring men and women who lost parents on both sides of the Vietnam War. (Evelyn Hockstein/For The Washington Post)

Susan Mitchell-Mattera leaned her small American flag and the framed picture of her family against the black stone of the Vietnam Veterans Memorial on Thursday and raised her father's old harmonica to her lips.

As she played the opening notes of taps, Vu Ngoc Xiem, a veteran of the North Vietnamese army whose father was killed in an American bombing attack during the war, reached out and steadied her hand.

Up on the wall, at Panel 14W, Row 14, was the name of Mitchell-Mattera's father, James C. Mitchell Jr., a sailor who was killed when his helicopter was shot down in 1970, days before he was to come home. He was 24.

Mitchell-Mattera played only a few notes, but they hung in the humid air on an overcast day when the Wall was just starting to dry from the overnight rain, revealing the names of the 58,000 American dead in the Vietnam War.

It was one part of an emotional morning as Vietnamese and American children of parents killed on opposite sides in the war gathered to honor lost fathers and mothers and to embrace each other as brothers and sisters.

There were many tears and hugs on both sides, and the laying of hands on the dark stone.

At the start of the Memorial Day weekend, the group was visiting Washington for the debut of a documentary about children who lost parents to the Vietnam War.

The film, which was shown Thursday at the GI Film Festival at the Navy Memorial in Northwest Washington, is part of the 2 Sides Project, an enterprise launched two years ago by Margot Carlson Delogne, 52, as she sought to fill the void left by the absence of her father, who was killed in the war.

The nonprofit aims to connect sons and daughters who lost parents on both sides of the Vietnam War. In 2015, Carlson Delogne took a film crew and a small group of Americans who had lost fathers in the war to Vietnam. They visited sites where their fathers were believed to have been killed and met with Vietnamese who had lost fathers and mothers in the fighting.

Several of the Vietnamese encountered on the trip, including Vu, 65, a veteran and retiree from Ho Chi Minh City, formerly Saigon, were invited to Washington for the opening of the film and the weekend's commemorations.

The Vietnamese had never been to the United States before.

They included Nguyen Thi Hong Diem, 49, also of Ho Chi Minh City, whose father and mother were killed fighting for the insurgent Viet Cong, and Dang Thi Le Phi, 53, of Da Nang, whose father died in the war when she was 2.

They were joined by several Americans who had made the trip in 2015. Among them were Ronald R. Reyes, 49, of Moorpark, Calif., whose 19-year-old father, Ronald, was killed serving with the Marines at Khe Sanh in 1968, and Mitchell-Mattera, 52, a nurse from Carson, Calif., whose father was shot down over the Mekong River Delta, in what was then South Vietnam.

Both of Nguyen Thi Hong Diem's parents were killed fighting for the Viet Cong. (N/A/Family photo)

The group arrived at the -memorial at 10 a.m., with Vu bearing a bouquet of flowers to leave there.

After a translator helped -explain how the names are -arranged on the Wall, and Reyes described it as "like a scar in the ground," the group descended the path into the memorial, which was thronged with visitors.

They paused at the center. Vu placed his flowers and spoke on behalf of the Vietnamese.

In an interview earlier in the week, he explained that his father was killed manning an anti-aircraft battery at the Ham Rong Bridge near Thanh Hoa against a fierce bombing campaign the Americans called Operation Rolling Thunder.

His father, Vu Ngoc Sam, then in his 40s, had been fighting in the army since the Vietnamese enemy had been the French.

He was rarely home, his son said, and the family saw him mainly when he passed their rice farm in Nam Dinh Province, south of Hanoi, on the march.

After the attack on the bridge, in 1965, there was nothing left of his father, no body to bury. So the family erected a small tomb near their home and left it empty.

More tragedy struck two years later, when Vu was in high school. He was 16 and a class leader. He had been outside checking the school's adjacent bomb shelters when U.S. jets attacked.

To illustrate, Vu lined up a candy bar, a package of cookies and a small recorder case on a hotel lobby countertop to show how the three buildings of his high school were arranged.

One bomb landed beside the first school building, he indicated with his finger. Another bomb landed near the third building. But the middle building suffered a direct hit.

The shock waves blew him off his feet and into a pond, he said. He recovered, ran to the -destroyed building and began trying to dig out his classmates. Dozens of them, and a teacher, were killed, he said. The incidents filled him with hostility, he said, and he went on to become a war correspondent during the closing chapters of the conflict.

Thursday, as he stood before the Wall in a coat and tie, hands clasped before him, he spoke of peace and healing.

"We are the sons and daughters of the Vietnamese war martyrs," he said through an interpreter. "We want to heal the wounds of the war . . . the pain and sacrifice and losses on both sides. Today I'm very moved standing here. I am the son of a war martyr, and also a veteran."

But "we travel on the same road," he said. The Vietnamese and Americans embraced and wept.
Then the group went to see the names of the American fathers.

When they reached the carving of Ronald Reyes's father's name, the son used his necktie to wipe moisture from the stone.

His father was a skinny teenager from La Puente, Calif., who joined the Marines and was killed in the fighting around Khe Sanh on March 30, 1968, weeks after his 19th birthday.

Reyes said his father's spirit has followed him his whole life.

Ronald Reyes, a Marine, was killed March 30, 1968, at Khe Sanh. His son Ron Reyes is participating in a meeting of adult children who lost parents in the Vietnam War. (N/A/Family photo)

As he held his hand over his father's name Thursday, Vu pressed his hand over Reyes's in a sign of affection.

When the group got to the name of Carlson Delogne's father, Air Force Capt. John W. Carlson, on Panel 13E, she said: "My father's name is not touchable. It's too high up."

But she explained how to count down from the top to Row 18, where he was listed.

Carlson Delogne, a resident of Walpole, Mass., was 2 when her father was shot down in an Air Force jet Dec. 7, 1966. His body has never been found, and although he has a tombstone in Arlington National Cemetery, there is no grave.

She said she remembers nothing of him.

"I have searched long and hard in my memory, and I have just nothing," she said in an interview this week. "I've asked over the years people who knew him, 'What was he like?' Always searching for what in me is from him.

"I've never had a satisfying answer," she said. Carlson Delogne also studied his letters and papers and listened to some of the cassette tapes he sent home to his family.

At the same time, she detested Vietnam for taking her father. "I had a hatred toward it," she said.

But her attitude started to change when she met other children of Americans killed in Vietnam. And she realized that bombs dropped by her father may have killed the fathers of Vietnamese women.

"I began to wonder . . . [if] there was . . . a daughter on the other side who was like me," she said. "I started to wonder how she felt and how she had grown up."

The 2 Sides Project seeks to answer such questions. As she stood at the Wall on Thursday, Carlson Delogne pointed up to Row 18.

"You see his name?" she asked.

Her Vietnamese friends said they did.

VIETNAM VET GETS BELATED MEDAL FOR HEROISM

The Courier-Post Published 10:30 a.m. ET May 25, 2017

HILL - Adrenaline was pumping through the body of a Marine rifleman from Pine Hill on a battlefield halfway around the world.

So at great personal risk, far outnumbered by the enemy and realizing he was facing death on Dec. 15, 1967, U.S. Marine Corps Lance Cpl. John Hunsinger advanced alone after his squad leader was wounded, rallied fellow Marines in his company to follow and saved them and himself from certain death.

His heroism inadvertently went unreported and unrewarded — until earlier this month when Hunsinger, now of Franklin Township, received the Bronze Star with Valor. Fifty years overdue, the hero's welcome included an escort in a motorcycle and first responder procession to American Legion Post 372 in Cherry Hill.

Retired Lt. Col. Robert Black of Tenafly, the last of Hunsinger's three company commanders in Vietnam, and retired Lt. Col. Al Bancroft of the Camden County Department of Veterans Affairs presented him the medal with the additional letter "V" for valor to a chorus of the Marine's signature "hoorah."

More than 100 veterans, first responders, legionnaires and members of the 'Nam Knights and Warriors' Watch Riders motorcycle clubs attended the ceremony and luncheon the legion hosted.

"It's very humbling... really I'm so very humbled," said Hunsinger.

Earlier he explained what happened on that December day when he suddenly was ordered by the platoon sergeant to assume command of the second squad from its wounded leader. They were part of B Company (Bravo) of the 1st Marine Battalion, 1st Marine Division.

We were pinned down and somebody had to make the move (to advance) and nobody was. I was given a job to take over and I just went out and did it," said the 69-year-old who left in his junior year at Overbook High School to join the Marines because he wanted to follow others and go to Vietnam.

"At the time, you were an 18-year-old who had so much adrenaline running through you in battle and I always felt like the hands of God were around me," he said.

All of the men in the squad deserved a medal, Hunsinger said, because they followed him that day during fierce fighting between approximately 110 men in his company ambushed by more than 500 North Vietnamese Army soldiers.

Hunsinger became the unexpected leader of the second squad of the first platoon in the defense of the American fortress at Nuie Con Thien. It was near the southern border of the Demilitarized Zone beyond which U.S. troops were not permitted to enter. Black read the medal citation, which outlined how Hunsinger maneuvered his squad into a better vantage point while under heavy automatic, mortar and artillery fire.

"Selflessly exposing himself, he personally charged, firing his rifle head-on another 25 meters through the killing zone under a murderous stream of small arms fire. His squad followed him and joined the third squad to stop the advance of the enemy.

"During the day-long fighting, Cpl. Hunsinger valiantly exposed himself time after time to enemy fire, shouting encouragement to his Marines, directing and controlling their fire, distributing ammunition and all the while moving and checking on his Marines with complete disregard for his own safety. The enemy attacked in waves, the citation continues, but each wave was thwarted in part by the corporal's "valiant leadership."

Hunsinger said he was told in Vietnam he was being recommended for the medal, but his company commanding officer Captain Clarence L. Baker was transferred suddenly and the new commander was killed shortly afterward in battle. Black then took over the company as a captain in early 1968.

Now a retired colonel, Baker wrote to the Marine headquarters in 2013 to start the process for Hunsinger's medal after Gaudencio Viloria Jr., a staff sergeant who commanded the first platoon and later was promoted to major, found out at a Marine reunion six years ago that Hunsinger had never received his Bronze Star. Baker and Viloria, who both live in California, were unable to attend.

In Vietnam, Hunsinger also took part in battles at Quang Tri, Hue City, Hill 881 in the Battle for Khe Sanh and the Tet Offensive in 1968. He was wounded by shrapnel in November 1967 and contracted double malaria after the Tet Offensive but always returned to his unit and the fight.

Hunsinger had an unexpected reunion with two other Overbrook High School buddies from Pine Hill

Big "O" VIETNAM REUNION. Three "buddies" at Overbrook Regional High school, held a reunion in Vietnam where all three were now stationed. who ended up in his company in Vietnam with him — Eddie Kramer and J.P. McKelvey.

Black praised Hunsinger as an exceptional Marine. "He was a Marine who ran toward the sound of gunfire and took responsibility for his action. These people are hard to find even in the Marines," the 75-year-old Black said after the ceremony.

"I had three rifle companies in Vietnam and he was the only enlisted man I consistently gave the top 5.0 rating to in his performance reviews."

Hunsinger received a joint state Senate and Assembly resolution from Sen. James Beach, D-Camden, and a congressional recognition certificate presented by a congressional staffer on behalf of Rep. Frank Lobiondo, R-N.J. Marine Corps League Detachment 775 veterans served as the honor guard.

Legion commander Tim Kraft, Bancroft and others said it was an honor to be at the medal ceremony and thanked others for their outpouring of patriotism. Warriors' Watch Riders, Delaware Valley chapter spokesman Brit Henderson of Audubon and Cherry Hill Councilwoman Carolyn Jacobs lamented the poor reception most Vietnam veterans like Hunsinger received when they came home.

"He is a true American hero and well-deserving (of the medal). As we know many were overlooked when they returned home, so the support we give is our payback to them," Henderson said.

COLLIERS BRIDGE TO BE DEDICATED TO VETERAN

CPL MARK COOL

COLLIERS — Marine Cpl. Mark Cool was 19 when he was injured in the Battle of Khe Sanh in Vietnam on Feb. 27, 1968, and died three days later in Okinawa, Japan.

Now, almost 40 years later, the Colliers Way Bridge, near where Cool grew up and lived most of his life before entering the Marines, will be renamed the Cpl. Mark D. Cool Bridge in his honor.

The re-dedication ceremony will be held at 6 p.m. Friday at the Brooke-Hancock Veterans Memorial Park in South Weirton, adjacent to the state Route 2 -U.S. Route 22 interchange. In the event of inclement weather, the event will be held at the Weirton Veterans of Foreign Wars located at 3534 Main St. What his surviving family, including his brother, Scott, and his 91-year-old mother, Arlene, want most of all is for those who knew Mark to attend the re-dedication. The family has relocated to New Manchester since Mark's death, and said they expect to see many friends at the ceremony, but hope that more will hear about the event and come to honor Mark's life and death.

"He sacrificed his life for the rest of the world and for those who didn't have a lot," Arlene Cool said. "I'm proud and surprised (about the renaming)."

Mark Cool was a 1966 Follansbee High School graduate and went straight into the Marines, something he had always wanted to do.

"I could have gone and gotten his diploma from Brooke High School after he died, but ... ," Arlene Cool said.

One of those who will be attending the ceremony will be state Del. Pat McGeehan, R-Hancock, who was the primary sponsor of House Concurrent Resolution 96, which renamed the bridge. McGeehan said an interested party — not the family — sent him information about Mark Cool in 2015, and he had been working to see the bridge renamed since.

"He was in the Battle of Khe Sanh, which was one of the most brutal battles (of Vietnam)," McGeehan said. "When I was in the Air Force Academy, I did a research paper my senior year on Khe Sanh. I received information on Cpl. Cool, and I started researching his life."

McGeehan said the re-dedication coming the Friday before Memorial Day was happy serendipity — it was simply a case of the right things coming together at the right time.

"I didn't want to tell (the family) before the bill was passed, because I didn't want to get anyone's hopes up," McGeehan said.

McGeehan will drive directly up to Weirton Friday evening from Charleston — it is important to him to see a Vietnam veteran properly remembered.

"The guys from Vietnam and Korea get overlooked, and the guys who went to Vietnam weren't treated very well in their day," McGeehan said. "I want to make sure that we remember and honor our Vietnam and Korean veterans."

"We are very honored, proud and grateful," Scott Cool said.

KHE SANH VETERANS IN THE NEWS

By Chris Brady, The Standard-Journal 27 May

STEVE HECKNAUER C CO 1/26

Editors Note: Today's feature is the first of two featuring Marine veteran Steve Hecknauer. Next week, Hecknauer takes readers through life at Khe Sanh, South Vietnam, during the siege of 1968.

Exploring the horrors of combat, and dealing with its effect afterword, is difficult for any veteran soldier. Hearing it from a Marine who survived the Siege of Khe Sanh 50 years ago is chilling.

"You deal with it," said Steve Hecknauer, who survived 77 day's at Khe Sanh, including the infamous siege in January 1968. "You see what is around you... it's a dam shame, but it's not me. It's tough, and you gotta deal with it every day."

Fighting the well trained North Vietnamese was something every Marine in I Corps section of South Vietnam had grown accustomed to.

"They hit and hit and hit," said Hecknauer. They were very disciplined and very good at camouflage. You might be right on top of their bunkers and never see them."

Hecknauer arrived in Vietnam in October 1967 and was assigned to Charlie Company 1st Battalion 26th Marine Regiment, 3rd Marine Division. Three months prior to arriving in Vietnam he was in the Mediterranean Sea training for landing assaults.

Stepping off the plane in Vietnam still carries with it, vivid memories for Hecknauer."I came off the plane and the first thing you are hit with is the heat and the smell, " he said. "The humidity was terrible. I thought, "What the heck." It was like someone took a hot blanket and threw it on you, it was so humid."

Weather conditions were tough, as was the terrain for Marines in and around Khe Sanh.

"I went from Danang to Phu Bai, where I spent two days, then they choppered me into Khe Sanh,"said Hecknauer. "The mountains were beautiful, lush green, until you got out there in the triple canopy, and elephant grass. That stuff will cut you to shreds."

Marines "humped" or hiked, everywhere, covering several kilometers a day at times while navigating elevations that soared thousands of feet—all while wearing rucksacks full of supplies, ammunitions and more.

Just 19 & 20 while he was in Vietnam, Hecknauer arrived feeling confident, as most Marines did.

"We had a lot of guerilla training with the French Foreign Legion, "he said. "That's kind of how felt-bulletproof, I didn't have fear of going to Vietnam."

In the days following his arrival in the Khe Sanh area, Hecknauer noted action was down from weeks prior. The spring of 1967, many Marines were killed in the hills surrounding Khe Sanh, he noted.

By Christmas action, was heating up again. "Hill 950 had been overrun in the spring and our platoon was to go up and relieve another platoon" said Hecknauer. "Every month, we'd rotate. This hill was steep and very muddy, and slippery. There were leeches everywhere. We had to hold on to trees just to climb it. We definitely were not sneaking up, on anybody.

Atop the hill, the men dug in, and on Christmas Eve the NVA began probing with a series of frags and small arms fire.

"it was foggy and you could barely see to the wire,"he remembered. "it was windy, so some ofour trip flares went off and scared us, made us think they were coming through the wire. It made our hearts beat a little quicker."

Hecknauer remembered being in a fighting position where he was close enough to hear Christmas music coming from a radio in a bunker.

His unit continued probing the area taking assignments closer toward the DMZ and west toward Laos. While contact was sporadic, signs of enemy action in the area was everywhere.

"you could see their bunkers, their positions, but no one was there," he said. They would wound a few Marines just to let us know they were still there. We never new how many were there and no one ever told us. Turns out there were several regiments out there– 20,000 to 30,000 and we're out there as a company."

SAD ANNIVERSARY
By Glenn T. Griffin D CO 1/1

It was 49 years ago today that Delta Company 1/1 took a walk in the sun from Hill 558 to hill 861 , it turned out to be a very difficult day. After spending a few relatively quiet days on 558 our job was to relieve Alpha Co. 1/1 on 861. We had recently moved off of 881 South which we manned for 30 plus days.

I was the Company radioman during this entire time period. Captain Harrison Haley from San Jose California was our Company Commander since around March in the Hue Phu Bai area during Tet . The night before our patrol to 861 I was offered a position as Chaplains assistant for the Battalion. I guess because I always attended mass whenever possible, at that time I had 11 months in the bush and some exciting experiences such as Operation Swift, Con Thien, operation Medina , etc. behind me and many close calls. In spite of opportunity to get out of the field I decided to remain with Company because of many close ties developed over previous 11 months in addition to my loyalty to Captain Haley.

The patrol from 558 was fairly uneventful for the most part. I think the only issue was we recovered the remains of a Marine who had been lost in a previous battle. The day was extremely warm and the sun shine was something new after rain and fog during previous month. We arrived just outside the wire on 861 when tragedy struck. We were getting organized and preparing to move through wire , at that time I asked the Gunny (Staff Sgt. Herb Kahrer) if we could proceed to locate CP bunker. He and the Captain agreed so I switched radios from Company net to Battalion with a corporal Hutchinson.

What then transpired was our 60 mortars team moved up on right flank and unbeknown to us into a minefield. Cpl. Arthur Crowell who had just returned from emergency leave due to a death in family stepped on and detonated a bouncing betty landmine,. he was KIA as was Captain Haley, many others were wounded severely including Hutch who was hit around head and shoulders. he survived but spent many months in hospital and was scarred for life. Hutch was a little taller than I so if I hadn't switched radios it probably would have tore my head off.

I'm not sure why God decided to spare me once again 49 years ago but I am thankful to survive, I think of Captain Haley and all of the other great Marines I served with and look forward to our next formation on Heavens streets someday. The Gunny came to me later that day and mentioned the Chaplain was coming in on a chopper to conduct a memorial for the skipper and asked if I wanted to reconsider the assistant position. Reluctantly I agreed with a few special requests regards who would fill my position as Company radioman. That is a story for another time. RIP Captain Haley and gunny Crowell.

PARKSLEY HONORS FALLEN MARINE, OTHERS AT WAR MEMORIAL DEDICATION

Clara Vaughn, Delmarva Now Correspondent

Hundreds gathered at the Parksley Town Square this Memorial Day to honor a fallen Vietnam War hero from a nearby town and all Accomack County veterans who have died in war.

Mayor James Eichelberger welcomed the crowd, which included dozens of veterans, state and local officials, residents, members of local veterans groups, and the friends, family and former comrades of Cpl. Jerry C. Burkhead.

"It's something that your never, ever get over— the loss of a child or a brother," said Shirley Johnson, who spearheaded the effort to raise a monument memorializing her brother and other fallen service members.

Burkhead was killed in action during the battle for Khe Sanh in Quang Tri Provence, Vietnam on Feb. 8, 1968. He was 21 years old.

He was born the youngest of 12 children to Junius and Velma Burkhead of Justiceville, near Parksley, in 1946.

Burkhead joined the United States Marine Corps after graduating from high school in 1966 and was deployed to Vietnam the next year.

He was one of 64 Marines defending an outpost known as Hill 64 during the battle that claimed his life and more than 20 others'.

His comrade Willi Lauterbach, who was wounded in the fight, attended Monday's ceremony honoring his fellow Marine.

"That day (Jerry was killed)… started on Hill 64 as rockets and the like and ended in hand-to-hand combat," Lauterbach said. "That morning was arduous; it was an endless barrage of putting in those hours of hand-to-hand combat, but I stand here today because Jerry and my other Marines lived up to the bond of warriors."

Johnson's original plan to raise $150 for a small plaque memorializing her brother blossomed into almost $50,000 in donations for the memorial in the town square.

The Town of Parksley donated the land for the monument, and gifts from Accomack County government officials including Sen. Lynwood Lewis and Delegate Robert Bloxom, local organizations and friends and family of veterans paid for the polished black monument adorned with flags honoring various military groups, benches and an empty POW seat in memory of those who went missing in war.

Nearly 40 years after her brother's death, Johnson simply wanted to memorialize him, she said.

"People like Shirley Johnson remind us of what we can achieve when we all pull together as one," Rear Adm. Craig Quigley said during his keynote address at the Memorial Day ceremony.

Family and friends can still purchase personalized bricks honoring war veterans to be displayed at the

Cpl. Jerry C. Burkhead/Town of Parksley War Memorial.

BUNNELL'S PFC JONATHAN NAT SPICER, A CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTOR, TO BE HONORED ON MEMORIAL DAY.

It isn't often that a conscientious objector who refused to carry a rifle in the thick of battle is the decorated hero to be recognized at a Memorial Day ceremony.

So it will be Monday when Private First Class Jonathan "Nat" Spicer, U.S. Marine Corps and former Flagler County resident and Bunnell High School student, is recognized for the Navy Cross for Courage Under Fire, awarded Spicer posthumously: he was killed in 1968 at the Battle of Khe Sanh, the fiercest of the Vietnam War. He had been a medic.
Several Memorial Day ceremonies are scheduled for Monday across the region. The events have been staggered, making it possible to attend each one–at 8 a.m. in Palm Coast, 10 a.m. at the county seat, and 1 p.m. in Flagler Beach.

Memorial Day has come to mark the beginning of summer, with barbecues, major retail sales and car races. That was not the intention. It is a Civil War-era holiday started by a Union soldier in remembrance of war dead. It had been preceded by Decoration Day, when the graves of civilians and soldiers alike were decorated with flags and flowers. It was only in 1971 that Memorial Day became a federal holiday. At the time, Congress set the date to remember the nearly 600,000 Americans who had died in what, until then, had been nine major wars and innumerable minor ones.

American soldiers have since been involved in wars in Grenada, Lebanon, Panama, Kuwait and Iraq in 1991, Iraq again starting in 2003, Somalia, the Balkans, Afghanistan, Libya, and now Syria.
Flagler County will mark Memorial Day starting at 10 a.m. in front of the Government Services Building in Bunnell, with Spicer's memory at center stage.

Marines sustained a 75-day siege at Khe Sanh in 1968, lost some 205 men, but inflicted casualties on the North Vietnamese forces at a ratio of between 50 to 1 to 75 to 1. The battle ultimately had little strategic value for either side, and the so-called "riddle of Khe Sanh" was never answered.
Gregg Jones wrote a detailed account of Spicer's last days in "Last Stand at Khe Sahn," a vivid account of the siege, which had begun in January.

"By early March, one of the most valued members of Finnegan's Charlie Med team was a slight, nineteen-year-old preacher's son from Florida. Private First Class Jonathan Nathaniel Spicer served as a stretcher bearer, carrying wounded Marines from arriving helicopters or ambulances to the Charlie Med triage area and then shuttling stabilized casualties to the helicopter pad for evacuation–all under enemy fire. Spicer had earned a reputation for bravery and selflessness, shielding the wounded with his own body as enemy shells rained down.

"After all that Spicer had done to prove himself, it was easy to forget the controversy that had accompanied his arrival at Charlie Med a month earlier. The trouble had started when he arrived at Khe Sanh and refused to carry a rifle in his assignment with the supply unit of Bravo 1/26. Spicer explained that he was a conscientious objector and couldn't kill anyone. He had loved animals growing up in Florida and had hoped to be assigned to a canine unit when he joined the Marines. But Spicer was designated a rifleman, and at every stop in the Marines, he was told to take up his claim of conscientious objector status at his next duty station.

"Spicer heard that line all the way to Vietnam, and the next thing he knew, he was in Bravo Company, enduring torment from his comrades for his pacifism, his Bible reading, and his rejection of the rough language that was a rite of passage in the Marine Corps. Spicer sought out Protestant chaplain Ray Stubbe at Kha Sanh in late January, and Stubbe came away from their conversation convinced that the Florida teenager was for real. He arranged for Spicer to be attached to Charlie Med as a stretcher bearer.

"Spicer was only about five foot seven and 140 pounds, but he impressed everyone at Charlie Med with his courage and hard work. He was pleasant and soft-spoken, fond about talking about the home and family he missed. He had written the name of
He felt bad about his time at Bravo Company and wanted to prove he wasn;t a coward. But he wasn;t going to fight, even if the [North Vietnamese Army] overran the base. 'I don't have any problem with dying,' he would say to ambulance driver Danny Sullivan. 'But I will not kill anyone.'

"On the afternoon of Friday, March 8, medevac flights arrived at the Kha Sanh helicopter pad during an intense North Vietnamese bombardment. Spicer and other stretcher bearers headed into the fire with litters loaded with wounded Marines and carried them aboard the waiting aircraft. Spicer had gotten his wounded aboard and had dashed back to get the final casualties out of the shell fire and onto a chopper. A mortar round burst among the knot of stretcher bearers and casualties, and shrapnel sliced into Spicer's chest, face, and legs. He had left his flack jacket unzipped, and a small metal fragment found the opening and pierced his heart. "Spicer held on for six days before he died.

On Monday, family and friends of Spicer will place a memorial wreath at the Veterans Monument in front of the Government Services Building. Golden Sands chapter of the Girl Scouts of America will place a Daisy Wreath at the monument. Flagler Palm Coast High School students will sing the national anthem. Randy Morris, a boyhood friend of Spicer's, will read the commendation, which notes: "Completely disregarding his own safety, he continued to expedite the loading of the wounded aboard the aircraft, despite the increasing intensity of the attack, and was the last man to seek shelter in a bunker at the edge of the air strip."

The Memorial Day ceremony will also feature U.S. Navy veteran Dr. Tracy Hejmanowski of Jacksonville Naval Hospital as the guest speaker. In her nine years as the Program Manager of the Naval Hospital Jacksonville Deployment Center, Dr. Hejmanowski has provided individual, group, and couples therapy for chronic operator fatigue and post-traumatic stress related conditions and has provided innovative alternative treatment modalities to military members from all service branches and components.

Jonathan Nathaniel Spicer: The Full Citation for His Navy Cross:

For extraordinary heroism while serving with Company C, Third Medical Battalion, Third Marine Division in the Republic of Vietnam on 8 March 1968. During an intense enemy rocket, mortar and artillery attack against the Khe Sanh Combat Base, Private Spicer unhesitatingly volunteered to serve as a stretcher bearer and assisted in embarking the numerous casualties aboard transport helicopters for evacuation. Completely disregarding his own safety, he continued to expedite the loading of the wounded aboard the aircraft, despite the increasing intensity of the attack, and was the last man to seek shelter in a bunker at the edge of the air strip. Observing a mortar round exploding near an evacuation helicopter loaded with casualties, he unhesitatingly left his position of relative safety to assist the wounded who were unable to move from their exposed position. Moments later, another round exploded within a few feet of Private Spicer, seriously wounding him, as he shielded a Marine from the blast with his own body. Unable to walk, he warned his comrades to remain in their protective positions while he attempted to crawl from the hazardous area to safety by himself. His selfless actions undoubtedly prevented serious injury or possible death to his fellow Marines and were an inspiration to all who observed him. By his dauntless courage, unfaltering determination and selfless devotion to duty at great risk, Private Spicer upheld the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and the United States Naval Service.

Herbert Bungartz was coming up the steps from the basement of his home when he saw the visitors, who were two Marines. "He looked at them and said, 'Oh, no," said one of Herbert Bungartz' sons, David. The Marines were there to announce Herbert Bungartz' 19-year-old son, Marine PFC Fredrick Willa Bungartz, was missing in action in the Battle of Khe Sanh in Vietnam on Valentine's Day 1968 Three to four weeks later, his body was found and identified. Fritz" Bungartz's death for years haunted one of his brothers, Dan Bungartz. It still deeply affects him to this day. "I just got over this in the last 10 years," Dan Bungartz said. "I can talk about it now, where I couldn't before."

Dan and brother David Bungartz, both of Bloomer, were on hand Monday at Chippewa Falls Senior High School as Frederick Bungartz was honored. Another brother, Michael Bungartz, a former police chief in Bloomer, was unable to attend.
Bielecki will be making a trip to Hawaii.Jake said he has gone on a previous trip to memorials in Washington, D.C. His grandfather, Henry Hurtgen of Glenwood City, is a veteran of the Vietnam War.Each of the frames given to the Bungartz brothers had a rubbing of Frederick Bungartz' name from an etching on the Vietnam Veterans Memorial in Washington, D.C.

The Flags 4 the Fallen program is starting a fund-raising effort today, Flag Day, to help pay for a trip to go to Pearl Harbor in Hawaii to honor local veterans buried there. The fund-raising effort at the school is going on through Saturday, and proceeds will be used to defray the cost of 30 students making the trip. John Kinville, an American government teacher at Chi-Hi and who directs the Flags 4 the Fallen program, said the students found in their research that Frederic Bungartz was friendly and courageous.

Frederick Bungartz graduated in 1967 from Chippewa Falls Senior High School and then joined the Marines.He was apparently ambushed while on patrol during the battle of Khe Sanh, which lasted from Jan. 21-July 9, 1968. During that battle, a reported 20,000 North Vietnamese Army regulars surrounded the 5,000 Marines at the Khe Sanh base. During the battle, 205 Marines were killed and 1,000 wounded, according to the Stars and Stripes website.

Dan Bungartz said he was 17 months younger than Frederick Bungartz. "We fought like any other brothers would fight. He was soft-spoken and good-hearted," he said.

David Bungartz was much younger, only seven years old when his older brother was killed. "I remember him (Frederick) really looking out for Mike and I," David Bungartz said.

Having the students remember their brother meant a lot to Dan and David Bungartz."I think it's very educational for them," Dave Bungartz said of the Flags 4 the Fallen program. "They are putting a face with a name, learning what Fritz was all about."

Dan Bungartz thanked the students for what they are doing and for honoring his brothersomethilt's ng that someone is being recognized from the Vietnam era," he said.
PFC Frederick Willa Bungartz is buried at St. Catherine Cemetery in Bloomer, off of Highway 64. His name is etched on Panel 39E and in row 29 of the Vietnam Veterans Memorial in Washington.

OBIT

1ST LT ROBERT I. MORGAN USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN, H&S CO 2/26-106 PLATOON.

March 13,1943 - June 2, 2017

TRIBUTE; By Rich Foley

I met Bob Morgan in March 1966. We had both enlisted in the Corps. I was in my senior year at LaSalle College and Bob had "left" VMI in his fourth year. We were assigned to the Third Battalion ("Disneyland"). Bob was in the third platoon, two floors above me. After the first week, twelve recruits were selected to be screened for Officer candidate School.

Escape from the DI's for any time at all was a treat. Bob could call cadence like a drillmaster and our merry group marched from mess hall to mess hall, delaying our return to our platoons as long as possible.

At ITR, Bob and I sealed our friendship. Eventually our orders to OCS arrived. I was assigned to a class ahead of Bob, but our friendship continued at the Basic School. We both requested and received designations as Infantry Officers. Our next meeting was in Quang Tri. Bob was a platoon commander in 2/26 and I was the Executive Officer of India, 3/26.

In December of 67 the entire regiment was sent to Khe Sanh. We would be there for the "Siege", seventy seven days under fire. me on Hill 881S and Bob, the 106 Platoon Commander on Hill 465.

We did not see each other again until 1970. We had both left: the Marine Corps. Bob was working for New York Life in D.C. His journeys after D.C were interesting. He attended the University of Mississippi, left to work in the Gulf and eventually found his way to Franklin Pierce Law School. He practiced law in New Hampshire until last: year, when his cancer was diagnosed with a very dire prognosis.

He started treatment at the VA Hospital in White Water Junction. When he learned of his condition my wife, Carol, insisted that he transfer his treatment to the VA hospital in Philadelphia and stay with us. Bob was a lifelong bachelor and with us he would have a solid support group. Little did we know how solid that support group would become..

Shortly after his arrival,, we introduced him to our friend, Eleanor, and they started playing bridge together. Determined not to meet his maker as a bachelor, Bob proposed to Eleanor in April. They were married in Claremont, New Hampshire on April 22, at the home of Jack and Nancy Yasinski. Jack was the former law partner of Bob and was now a judge. I was the best man, a role I never dreamed of having and carol was matron of honor.

Bob and Eleanor intended to leave for Roslyn. Virginia on May 2 to attend the 50th Reunion of Bob's Basic Class 5-67. "The Boys of Summer.- By May his condition had deteriorated significantly and Eleanor took him to the VA emergency room. He was admitted that day but on May 3 he insisted on leaving the hospital and heading for Roslyn. He was definitely attending his reunion.

Coincidentally, Carol and I were going to the D.C. area on May 1. With the assistance of Tom Esslinger, another KHE SANH vet, we put together a wonderful dinner at a Roslyn restaurant. Attending were Bob and Eleanor, Tom and Sung Esslinger, Dick and Sally Dworsky and several other of Bob's friends. Despite his pain, this trip invigorated him. He returned to the hospital on May 8 and was transferred to the nursing home on May 23 where he died on June 2.

Bob was the recipient of the Bronze Star Medal, two Purple Hearts and all the other Vietnam service medals. He served nineteen months in Vietnam.

He was my very best friend for fifty-one years and I always knew there wasn't anything he would not do for Carol and I that was within his power. He was stubborn beyond description, but the most principled person I ever knew. Those who knew him in New Hampshire found this "died In wool" Southerner an aggressive advocate for "you damn Yankees.· He never worried about his fee and if you had a legal problem, you had a lawyer.

Bob is survived by his brothers, Elliot, Ronald and Mitchell, his favorite cousin Claudia Simpson and several other cousins, nieces and nephews.

I frequently think about vanishing flags. These are the flags that appear in the newspaper obituaries of WWII and Korean War Veterans. Soon they all will have passed and our flags will replace them. I will miss Bob terribly, even the arguments we frequently had.

ST. PAUL POLICE TO PAY TRIBUTE TO FALLEN VIETNAM WAR MARINE AND EAST SIDE LEGEND

By S. M. Chavey | schavey@pioneerpress.com | Pioneer Press

Thomas Brindley was already somewhat of a legend on St. Paul's East Side even before he went off to war.

When East Siders gathers to memorialize Brindley on Thursday, they will recall the Marine as a hero whose actions on the battlefield 49 years ago cost him his life. They will also remember Brindley as a hockey star, jingle writer and entrepreneur.

Brindley was a lieutenant in the Vietnam War when he was killed in 1968. His battlefield actions were awarded the Navy Cross, the second-highest gallantry award from the U.S. military.

St. Paul police officers and Brindley family members will pay tribute to him at a 4 p.m. ceremony Thursday at the St. Paul Police Eastern District.

Brindley was only 24 when his platoon came under intense fire at Khe Sanh, near the northwestern province of Quang Tri. The lieutenant shifted his squad to temporary safety while recovering the casualties. He then directed an aggressive attack

"Tom Brindley, the third platoon commander, drew his .45 pistol from his holster and, like something out of the movies, began to move his people on line and move up the hill. It was nothing short of magnificent," a fellow U.S. Marine wrote in a letter to his parents a couple of weeks later. "They just kept moving — men falling as they went, but everyone else just walking, shooting from the hip and tossing grenades until they came over the top of the hill."

At the crest of the hill, however, the squad came under intense fire once again. Brindley was fatally struck. His Navy Cross is one of only 116 given to Minnesotans and only 29 to residents of St. Paul, according to Doug Thompson, curator at the Minnesota Military Museum.

Before enlisting in the Marine Corps, Brindley was heavily involved in St. Paul's East Side community.

He had a knack for business: As a young boy, he and a friend wrote a hot dog jingle to the tune of Yankee Doodle and sold it to a St. Paul hot dog company for $50. A few years later, he started printing business cards with a friend. He also helped his oldest brother Terry Brindley with a paper route.
Thomas was "very outgoing and open to other people. He was always happy to help his friends with whatever they were doing," Brindley's second oldest brother Greg Brindley said.

During high school, Brindley worked for the family gas station, Brindley's Oil Co.. at the corner of Payne and Cook avenues.

Brindley captained his high school's hockey team and was a key player in winning the consolation championship one year. His athletic success merited him a scholarship at Colorado College, where he studied economics.

While home from college in the summers, he worked at Hamm's Brewery, in the same building where many St. Paul police officers now work

St. Paul police Officer Lou Ferraro learned of Brindley's history from a former officer and helped organize the event. He said he wants East Side St. Paul residents and officers to understand the rich histories that are often lost.

"These community members have this huge family history," Ferraro said. "A lot of time it's really entrenched in the past and there's no way to know about it. It's important for me to bring these histories to the forefront."

Two of Brindley's brothers and other family members will attend the tribute at the 722 Payne Ave. police station. Brindley would have celebrated his 74th birthday on June 28

In addition to the Navy Cross, Brindley was also awarded the Purple Heart, the Combat Action Ribbon, the Navy Presidential Unit Citation, the national Defense Service Medal, the Vietnam Service Medal, the Vietnam Gallantry Cross Unit Citation, the Vietnam Civil Actions Unit Citation, and the Republic of Vietnam Campaign Medal.

In 2015, Ferraro led a tribute in honor of Robert Pruden, another highly decorated soldier from the Vietnam War.

REPLIES

Thanks, Mike for the magic you work on this website and relaying the news of the honors for Lt. Thomas Brindley. Approximately 100 people, members of his family, 20 or so St. Paul Police Officers and many veterans attended the ceremony in the precinct house. A police sergeant gave a slide show of Tom Brindley's life and service with "India" 3/26 on 881S and included reading the Navy Cross Award citation. Not a lot of dry eyes in the group. Even met another Khe Sanh Vet (2/1) who attended.
DAN FISHER D CO 1/26

Thanks for the information about one of our classmates from Basic Officer Class 5-67.It's nice that some still recall our fallen. A saying is on our class "coins": WHEN YOU GO HOME TELL THEM OF US, AND SAY FOR YOUR FREEDOM

Our class lost 39 from the 516 graduates. Also, some died of wounds after returning states side and those aren't listed. Tom was part of L-1, 5-67. Tom assisted me during that training and I always recall the nice person that he was. sf/tc

TERRY CHARBONNEAU

THE WALL THAT HEALS

BELLEVUE — Donn Rospert was 25 years old when he joined the United States Marine Corp.

He had been in college for two years, watching the war rage. He made the decision to leave the safety of school to serve his country.
He had just arrived home from boot camp when he received a call from the local funeral home.

"I was asked to go with a funeral director to pick up and escort a body back. That jarred me. I realized this war was really going on and I might end up there," Rospert said.

Rospert served in Vietnam from October 1967 and October 1968, including from Da Nang to the demilitarized zone to Khe Sanh and to the Laotian border. He was given command of a unit.

Rospert knew about 20 people whose names are now on the Vietnam War Memorial, Rospert said. Two names are deeply personal to him.

"They were Lee Rush from Sacramento, Calif., and Robert Gonzalez, from New York City," Rospert said. "Those were my men."

Rush was 20 and Gonzalez was 19 when they died April 3, 1968. in the fight for Quang Tri City.

Rospert has been to the Vietnam Veteran Memorial in Washington, D.C.. He also saw the traveling memorial when it came to Sandusky a few years ago and then again when it was brought to the Ohio Veterans Home.

"The names strike you. You touch the wall and run your figures over the names. You see your reflection. That wall speaks to you," Rospert said. "Time, prayer and therapy takes the sting away from the pain, but the memories remain."

Rospert is one of the organizers who helped bring The Wall That Heals to Bellevue.

Hundreds of people lined the streets Wednesday to honor the names on the Wall That Heals.

"I am totally overwhelmed. It was a good escort," said Don Rospert, one of the event organizers and a Vietnam veteran.

The escort for the Wall That Heals, otherwise known as the traveling Vietnam Memorial Wall, was more than 500 motorcycles, as well as police and fire vehicles from every jurisdiction the route traveled through. It went through Sandusky, Milan and Norwalk before arriving at its final destination at Central Park in Bellevue.

The wall, which is 250 feet long, is a replica of the Vietnam Wall memorial in Washington, D.C. It contains all of the approximate 58,000 names that are on the permanent memorial.

About 110 of the young men who died during the Vietnam War were from Erie, Seneca, Sandusky and Huron counties, he said.

Organizers spent two years planning the event, including hosting community fundraisers. Rospert said it was amazing to see people lining the route to pay their respect.on Smith, president of Bellevue City Council, was along Bellevue's Main Street to watch the arrival. He is scheduled to speak at the opening ceremony on Thursday.

Smith, who was in the Army, was a teenager when he served in Vietnam from February 1967 to February 1968.He recalled being shelled at night and running to the bunkers for protection The first time we were attacked I remember thinking 'Is this real?"' Smith said. "It affected me when I saw shrapnel holes by where I had been sleeping."

The wall brings back memories for everyone, some funny and some painful, he said.

Smith remembers when he heard Bellevue resident Tommy Norman had been shot and returned home. And he remembers Roy Beasley.

"He went to Vietnam before me. I talked to him before he shipped over. We were at my home on Roger Avenue," Smith said.

Beasley was killed Jan. 25, 1970 in the Quang Tin province. "It made me so angry, I wanted to go out and start shooting," Smith said. Both Smith and Rospert hope that for some who served, the wall, whether the traveling wall or the permanent wall in Washington D.C., brings closure.

Another Army veteran along Main Street was Bob Hahl who served in Vietnam from June 1966 to 1967.Hahl was a wheel vehicle mechanic in the 5th and 27th Artillery. He remembers William "Billy" Weidinger, who died March 20, 1968 in the Hua Nghia province.

"I am glad Vietnam veterans are getting recognized," he said. The wall opens to the public at noon Thursday.

A bell will be rung and all 110 names will be read in the official opening ceremony.

OBIT

DAVID A. MARTINEZ, USN
KHE SANH VETERAN,
HMM-163 & HMM-262 (HM1)

Martinez, David Milan, Michigan Age 81, passed away Oct. 3 in Ann Arbor, Michigan. He was born in ST Paul, Minnesota to parents Clayton and Agustina Martinez and raised in Milan. He joined the Navy in 1955 and served for eleven years as a Corpsman with the Marines. He served his country with valor in Vietnam between 1967-68 as a Corpsman with the HMM-163 (Ridge Runners).

He was in country at Quang Tri, Chu Lai, and served during the Tet offensive and the siege at Khe Sanh. As Corpsman who flew Medevac in Vietnam with the Marine Corps he was involved in two helicopter crashes. After one such assault, he woke with an injured back yet he managed to crawl from a mine field and gave aid to the injured crew. He flew 268 missions and was awarded 13 air medals and two Purple Hearts. During another assault, he leapt from the copter ignoring concern for his own safety to rescue an injured Marine.

He was once shot in the chest while giving aid to a fallen Marine but was spared by his bullet proof vest. During each battle or saving a soldier's life as a Corpsman, he always said a prayer when he thought it was necessary. He retired as a Senior Chief Hospital Corpsman in 1976 after 22 years of service. He then attended Eastern Michigan University where he received Bachelor's Degree in Nursing (1983). He was active in the community sponsoring and competing in Softball and the Saline Bowling League and a die-hard Michigan football fan. He was honored to serve three terms as the President of the Vietnam Veterans Chapter 310. Proceeded in death by his parents Clayton and Agustina Martinez and infant broth!

Augustin. He is survived by his wife of 58 years, Sandra Martinez, three sons, Jim, Richard and Deborah (Rogers) and David Martinez. Three sisters, Helen Opp, Rose Caswell, Mary and Harry Randolph, nephew Carl Opp, eight grandchildren and three great grand children Visitation tok place October 21, 3-8 pm at Ochalek-Stark Funeral Home, (734) 439-1100 in Milan.

A memorial for "Doc" was held at the Vietnam Veteran's Memorial at the Ypsilanti Township Civic Center (7200 S. Huron River Drive) on Saturday at 11 am October 22. A luncheon took place afterwards at the Immaculate Conception Hall on 420 North St. in Milan at 1 pm

Burial with full military honors were held at Quantico National Cemetery 18424 Joplin Rd Triangle VA on Tuesday Jan 3 11AM.

46 YEARS AFTER THE TERRIBLE SIEGE AT KHE SANH, A VIETNAM VETERAN REUNITES WITH HIS FELLOW MARINES

By Dan Doyle

The year was 1968, it was January, and the Tet Offensive had begun. My unit, Bravo Co., was at a forward air base called Khe Sanh — now surrounded by a force of about 20,000 North Vietnamese Army (NVA) troops — and, for seventy-seven days, the Marines at Khe Sanh would endure daily artillery, rocket, and mortar barrages.

Within days we had dug deep into the ground to make bunkers and eight-foot-deep trenches, connecting them in an effort to find some level of protection against the endless barrages. All too often, the size of the artillery and mortar rounds made all that effort an exercise in wishful thinking.

REUNION AND REFLECTION

That was 46 years ago. Today, I am in Sparks, Nevada, attending a reunion with my Marines from Bravo, 3rd Recon for the first time. It is proving to be a powerful experience. We are old men now. We were in our late teens and early twenties then. We were thinner, had all of our hair, and had the muscle and the energy of youth then. As life and luck would have it, we are old men, now in our late sixties and early seventies in varying stages of health.

But when we look at each other's ID tags and remember those names, we embrace. That brotherhood born in the crucible of that far away war reignites, and we settle quickly into recounting our old memories. While some of the shared memories are full of the pathos of those days, there is much laughter in our conversations, too. Somehow we have always been able to use humor to deal with the weird reality we found ourselves in. Many of our conversations are born out of that mutual experience and a sense of wonder that we survived all of that and even went on to have families and careers. We made lives for ourselves. But we never forget those whose lives ended back there. They are still missed and mourned for as if it were yesterday.
Many of these men have been coming to these reunions for years. This is my first time to be back with my brothers from Bravo Co., 3rd Recon. It has surprised me how quickly I felt at home with them all. There are men from the whole Battalion here, so there are many that I did not know then and am meeting for the first time here. But that doesn't make a difference — we are all Marines (even we Corpsmen).

TEDIUM AND TERROR

At the time the siege began Bravo, 3rd Recon about 110 men. At the end of it we had lost 19 of our brothers and many more had been wounded. We were a small unit on the base and our typical task of reconnaissance, being the "eyes and ears" of the 3rd Marine Division, had been rendered moot by the siege. We did not have to go sneaking around in the jungle looking for the enemy; the enemy had surrounded us and was at our perimeter. You could see them and their trenches creeping closer, testing our defenses every day. As a result we were often called upon to do other things.

For example, we were called upon regularly to collect the garbage on the base and then take it outside of the wires to the dump site. This was not as easy as it may sound, as the artillery and mortar barrages could come at any time. Getting caught out in the open, above ground, standing on a pile of garbage in the open bed of a truck, nowhere near a bunker was not good.

It seemed crazy, but it was an absolute necessity. We were already overrun with rats. They didn't need any more encouragement. When we went outside the wire to the dump site, we went with weapons locked and loaded. We pushed that trash off of the back end of that truck like madmen and retreated back behind the wires as fast as we could. Corpsmen were assigned the duty of burning the waste in the outhouses every day. That meant being exposed to sniper fire, or being away from the bunkers and trenches while you were engaged in this nasty job. But we did it, every day.

We would be called on occasion to help out at Graves Registration too. This was the difficult job of identifying and body-bagging our fellow Marines. Most of us were 18-22 year old kids, but we already knew the reality of death intimately. We lived with the threat of it on a daily basis. We smelled it. We touched it. And it touched us.

BROTHERS, AGAIN AND ALWAYS

My Bravo Co. and some of the men from Delta Co. were the only elements of the Battalion at Khe Sanh, but we all went on Recon patrols in our small squads and share the unique realities of that experience. We all know what it means to have each other's back. These men cared for one another, protected one another, helped one another with an affection unlike any other. This brotherhood is a phenomenon of war that much has been written about, but to be a part of it is one of the most cherished things in our lives. We are never strangers to one another. Even though we see each other rarely, when we do get together, we are brothers again.

Being here with my Recon Marines again has been a very moving experience for me. I am enjoying the old camaraderie and am taking it all in, for we will part again and go back to our homes to carry on with our lives as usual. But for these few days we can step out of the usual and remember that unusual reality that we shared and survived together so many years ago.

It is good to be with my Marines again. They are good men, one and all. I love them. They are my brothers.

BETTER A LITTLE LATE THAN EVER

More than 600 veterans, families and citizens of all ages gathered under sunny Monday morning skies to remember and honor those who have served in our armed forces. This year's ceremonies focused on veterans from the Vietnam era, with much sharing of personal recollections, remembrances and thoughts from that pivotal conflict more than half a century ago.

"Today we pause as a nation to honor our military veterans, particularly those who have made the ultimate sacrifice," said master of ceremonies and Edmonds Cemetery Board Chair Jerry Janacek. "Memorial Day was first proclaimed in May 1868 to honor those who gave their lives in the Civil War. Our ceremonies today pay particular attention to our veterans of the Vietnam era, and accordingly the flag we raise today honors a fallen soldier from our own community.

"Ronald Paschell graduated from Meadowdale High School in 1969," Janacek continued. "Shot down while on helicopter patrol near Quang Tri, South Vietnam, in 1972, he was listed as missing in action. Twenty years later his remains were found, and now rests with two of his fellow servicemen in Arlington National Cemetery."

After the presentation of colors by scout groups and honor guard, singing "America the Beautiful," reciting the Pledge of Allegiance, and a performance of "The Star Spangled Banner" by the Kinetic Singers, Janacek introduced Edmonds-Woodway sophomore Jenna Brock. Brock recited her original poem "Welcome Home," expressing recognition and deep gratitude for those veterans of Vietnam, often unsung and under-recognized, who physically survived that conflict, but bear inner scars for the remainder of their lives.

Mayor Dave Earling then took the podium to express his personal connection with the Vietnam conflict.

"While the previous two wars, World War II and Korea, happened when I was very young, Vietnam hits raw emotions and memories for me," he said. "I lived through those years in ways which have affected me for the balance of my life. It was a major force shaping my attitudes, outlook and values."

As a college teacher, Earling recalled, "I was confronted by the protests and political unrest engendered by that war, the assassinations of Robert F. Kennedy and Martin Luther King, Jr., and the ultimate resignation of President Richard Nixon. I watched demonstrations from my college office. I saw the names of acquaintances and friends on the daily casualty reports. I had a student commit suicide for fear of being drafted.

But the single biggest sadness for me which continues today was the anger and disrespect shown to our troops as they returned from Vietnam. The men and women who fought in that conflict are as noble and honorable as those who fought in any of our preceding calls to action. I salute our veterans from Vietnam."

Olivia Olson, three-time winner of the Veterans of Foreign Wars essay contest, next read her winning essay, "My Responsibility to America," in which she stressed the vital importance of caring for our country and those who have sacrificed in its name.

"We love our country and the freedoms and joys we share as Americans, but we must never forget that these have come with a price paid by the generations that preceded us," she said. "Being an American carries with it the responsibility to live these values; if we don't, we ignore the sacrifices others have made. Among these is respecting contrasting views, and working respectfully together for the common good regardless of politics, opinions or ideology. This is how we care for our country as it has cared for us. This is how we honor the sacrifices of our veterans. We owe it to ourselves and to future generations to nurture and inspire active citizenship from all."

Olson's address was followed by the White Table Ceremony led by Vietnam-era veteran Dan Doyle in honor of those who never came back — the prisoners of war and missing in action. "We must never forget the agonies of those who have endured, and may still be enduring, deprivation and imprisonment," he said. "This tribute bears witness to their continued absence, a testament that we will never forget them."

After an instrumental rendition of "America the Beautiful" by the Edmonds-Woodway High School Brass Quintet, Doyle returned to the stand to deliver an emotional and moving account of his experiences as a 20-year-old corpsman in Vietnam, focusing on enduring more than 77 days of constant bombardment in Khe Sanh.

"All hell had just broken loose," he recalled. "Within days our hooches had been destroyed, and we had to go underground, digging deep into the red clay of Khe Sanh. We could hear the thump of the rounds leaving the tubes from about four miles away in Laos. This would be followed by a brief silence, and then the intensifying sound like that of a freight train coming right at us. Then the terrifying explosions would shake the ground and fill our bunker with dust. It was impossible to build an underground bunker that could survive a direct hit by their artillery. One day a bunker took a direct hit, and only one of our brothers survived. We lived on C-rations and Kool Aid, unable to shower or bathe. That was our daily life. "

As he related his assignment to graves registration, where he had to tag and bag bodies of the fallen between artillery barrages, Doyle had to fight back the tears.

"Out of the original 110 brothers in our company, only 42 left together from that hell on earth. When those things happen to you at the age of 20, you're changed forever. You have faced your own mortality in ways that are immediate and certain. Your dependence on your brothers is total, and you form a bond like no other in this life.

"We went as young men, and left as old men, covered with the external and internal wounds of war. We will never forget our brothers who fell there in the red clay and dust of Khe Sanh. They are the ones who gave their last full measure that we may enjoy our freedoms today. We must never forget their sacrifice," he said.

ON MAY 3RD – 6TH, BASIC OFFICERS COURSE CLASS 5-67 (BOC 5-67) HELD THEIR 50TH ANNIVERSARY REUNION IN WASHINGTON, DC.

BY MIKE SOMMERS

BOC 5-67 graduated from The Basic School on August 30, 1967 and by the first week of October individual members were arriving in Vietnam. Over 30 officers were assigned to the 26th Marines while another eight were assigned to the 1st Battalion 9th Marines. In addition, several more officers were assigned to supporting artillery, engineering and motor transport units. Most of the officers would be involved in the 77 day Khe Sanh siege in 1968. In fact, the first officer casualties on January 18, 1968 were 2nd Lieutenants Mike Thomas and Tom Brindley both of India Company who were killed in the assault on Hill 881 North. Both officers were awarded Navy Crosses for their heroism that day. Over the next 120 days a total of 10 officers from 5-67 would pay the ultimate price while fighting in the Khe Sanh area of operations. These officers were: Ferndinando Distefano, Don Jacques, Larry Koman, Maxie Williams, Steve Fordham, Michael Hayden, Al Courtney and Robert Dodson.

The Reunion kicked off Wednesday evening with a dinner at the Fort Myers Officers Club. Congressman Seth Moulton of Massachusetts was the guest speaker. Congressman Moulton is a Marine Captain who completed four tours in Iraq. On Thursday, the Class went south on I-95 to Quantico to visit The Basic School (TBS), the scene of their education 50 years ago. All remnants of the past are gone and in their place, are new billeting, mess and classroom facilities. A briefing by the command staff, a demonstration of the Marine Corps Martial Arts Program and lunch in the new dinning facility were the highlights of the visit. It was then on to Semper Fidelis Trail at the National Museum of the Marine Corps for a memorial ceremony at the class monument to its 39 Vietnam KIAs. In addition to the Memorial Ceremony a brief presentation was made by The United States of America Vietnam War Commemoration Program personnel and our three attending General Officers: LtGen Marty Steele, MajGen Les Palm and MajGen Ray Smith. Upon returning to the hotel, the group enjoyed a relaxing reception where the guest of honor was the Marine Corps Mascot, "Chesty".

Friday was a free day with an optional tour to Gettysburg. The two busloads met professional guides at the park's entrance and were treated to an informative and worthwhile two-hour tour of the battleground. That evening it was off to Marine Barracks Washington, (8th & I), to observe the first Evening Parade of the season. The skies had threatened all day, but the rain held off for most of the ceremony. With 15 minutes to go the skies opened and a Vietnam style deluge was dumped on us all, which served as empathy training for the spouses and guests.

Saturday started off with two guided bus tours of Washington DC, which were thoroughly enjoyed by all participants. The Reunion ended with a formal dinner at the National Museum of the Marine Corps. As the Class disembarked the buses and entered the Museum they were greeted by Secretary of Defense General James Mattis, USMC (Retired). General Mattis' time was limited, but he hosted a reception line so that each member and guest had an opportunity to greet him and exchange in brief conversation.

During the entire reunion, those of our classmates who were killed in action were constantly in our thoughts, and their families in our prayers. We were blessed to have several members of our KIA's families with us, which added significance and context to our gathering.
We will not forget!

REMEMBERING LLOYD W. (SHORTROUND) SCUDDER

"Ponderings from A Bus Bench"

By Craig W. Tourte

I sold my house in the suburbs and moved back to the city and into the little house I have owned for the past 30 years. As could be expected, the neighborhood has gone through a few changes, but the same old lady still lives next door. I thought she was old thirty years ago, in reality she was much younger than I am now. The 60-year-old homes in the neighborhood are filled with mostly middle-aged blue-collar workers, retired people and a few young families.

The grocery store across the street is closed and boarded up with a tall chain link fence around the parking lot, as is the Kentucky Fried Chicken restaurant next door. There is a vacant lot where the old Chevron gas station once was. New fast food restaurants have sprung up along the busy main street and a 24-hour AM/PM opened on the corner a few years ago. Just down the street a few blocks sits the little neighborhood bar called Ernie's Interlude. Of course, Ernie has been deceased for many years now, and the place is currently owned by his nephew, who lives out of town and takes little interest in the place. Ernie's sits in a little 4-business strip mall that has seen better days. A nail solon run by Vietnamese ladies, a smoke shop and late-night liquor store with massive iron bars on the windows run by an East Indian are all neighbors of Ernie's. A broken-down car wash is in the back, where Ernie's regular customers park in the evening out of sight of the street and neighbors, their vehicles hidden from spouses, old lovers and the late night cruising of police cars.

A few nights ago, I found myself sitting at the bar in Ernie's. A U-shaped affair with 20 or so stools around the bar and a few tables off to the side. There are the perennial photographs in cheap dusty frames hanging on the walls. Old photographs of the now long deceased Ernie and his many customers. Mostly people now forgotten, who played golf and tennis in various tournaments and events sponsored by Ernie's establishment. Small, cozy and quiet, with libations that are reasonable priced and most often the 3 working television sets are tuned to the latest sporting event. Occasionally a customer will put a few dollars into the new satellite system music center (jukebox) and play a slow country song or oldies from the sixties or seventies. The bartenders and even a few of the regulars are starting to recognize me, but I still feel obscure and comfortable. Ernie's Interlude is my kind of place.

It was well into the evening and dark outside. I had walked into Ernie's around 9:30 PM; it was now around midnight and time for me to leave. Walking to Ernie's from my house is not much of a problem, but walking home can sometimes be a challenge for one who has spent any amount of time consuming adult beverages. The drink I ordered at Ernie's cost $4.00; the same drink cost me $11.00 (a single shot) at the Riverview Plaza Hotel in Mobile Alabama during the reunion this year (2006).

I must be very careful when walking home from Ernie's because I have to cross two, 2-lane city streets before walking into my neighborhood just a few blocks away. At times, the walk home can be a dangerous adventure. About half way home, there is this old bus bench that sits all alone near the roadway and next to the chain link fence that surrounds the now boarded up grocery store. There are several battered, rusted and long forgotten newspaper racks nearby and of course the area is littered with various amounts of trash and castoffs. It was cool and dark that evening, with few vehicles traveling along the normally busy street in front of me. I was not in a hurry to go home, I walked out of Ernie's because I knew that I still could make it home in my current condition. About half way home, I took a seat on the old bus bench. Here I was, an inebriated lonely, middle age Vietnam veteran sitting on a bus bench in the dark, late at night, next to some junky abandoned and rusting newspaper racks, surrounded by trash, pondering my failures and difficulties in life.

A police car drove slowly by and the two young policemen inside gave me the once over but did not stop and continued on down the street. The area has quite a number of low rent and government subsidized apartments, so it is not unusual to see interesting characters walking along the street at various times of the day and night, although I happened to be the only character out on that particular evening.

My thoughts went back many years ago, when I too drove a big shiny police car around the same beat and along the same street. I was a young man, former Marine and Vietnam veteran and a survivor of the Siege at Khe Sanh just a few years before, feeling fortunate to have a job and knowing that I had already faced danger much worse than anything a policeman could possibly face. On the lookout for various thieves, robbers, drunks, drug dealers and unscrupulous characters who might be sitting on vacant old bus benches in front of boarded up grocery stores late at night waiting for the opportunity to attack the innocent, rob late night business establishments or take what did not belong to them. I was deeply pensive and found myself lonely, depressed and feeling worthless.

My thoughts went to my friend Tom Horchler who I had served with at Khe Sanh in 1967 and 1968. In 2003 Tom suggested that we attend the Khe Sanh Veterans Association Reunion to be held in Charleston, South Carolina. I would not know anyone at the reunion but wanted to spend as much time with Tom as I could. In 2003, he was the first Khe Sanh veteran I had spoken to in 35 years and I felt a real comradeship with him.

It was a truly rewarding experience to be able to meet and talk to so many Khe Sanh veterans in Charleston. I don't think I had been around so many really interesting people before in my life. It was clear that many had been attending these reunions for years. The respect and affection they had for one another was overwhelming. I am not a particularly garrulous person, but I tried to meet as many as I could. Neil Kenny, John Pessoni, Bruce Geiger, Dave Drake, Dennis Mannon, Erick Clark, John Rowland, Jim Wodecki, Tom Eichler, Milton McNeely, Nick Romanetz, Lloyd W. Scudder, Cliff Treese and Ron Shouse are just a few of the many I met at the reunion, each a hero to me and each with their own individual experience and prospective of that time in history, they were a completely fascinating group of individuals.

I found it interesting to observe how each interacted with the other. Some were with their families and others came with other veterans or by themselves. I noticed that Lloyd W. Scudder drew an unusual amount of attention from the other veterans. Many walked over to meet him and have a picture taken with him. There was seldom a time when he was not engaged in conversation with someone. I noticed the great love, respect and admiration so many had for this man. He of course obliged them all and was more than accommodating with their requests.

I also noticed that Mr. Scudder was missing his hand at the end of each arm. I made my way to Mr. Scudder and introduced myself, he was happy to extend his arm to me and acknowledge me. I told him this was my first reunion and that I was pleased to meet him. We exchanged some small talk, but shortly others had gathered around and it was time for me to move along and allow them to have some time and conversation with him.

Over the next several days, I think Mr. Scudder came to recognize me. Towards the end of the reunion, I had the occasion to sit down and talk to Mr. Scudder and he told me a fascinating story about his injuries.

Mr. Scudder was with Bravo Company, 1st Battalion of the 26th Marine Regiment, at the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh in South Vietnam and was at Khe Sanh during the 77-day Siege that started on January 21, 1968. On February 25, 1968, 2/Lt Donald Jacques took Bravo Company across the wire located at the East end of Khe Sanh and into a horrific battle where numerous Marines were killed and few escaped the ambush. This event was later known as the Ghost Patrol. It just so happened that Mr. Scudder was visiting his brother at another base in Vietnam during the time that Bravo went across the wire and he returned to Khe Sanh with the gut wrenching feelings of loss and guilt that many such survivors carry in their hearts the rest of their lives.

When Mr. Scudder returned home from Vietnam he was assigned as a weapons instructor at the Marine Corps Camp Pendleton in California. One of his assignments was to instruct new Marines on the proper handling and throwing of the hand grenade. Mr. Scudder would accompany the new Marine into the grenade pit, no more than a hole in the ground, and instruct the Marine on how to hold the grenade, pull the pin enabling the safety spoon to be released when thrown, then to toss the grenade safely.

The Instructors where having problems with this particular batch of grenades and all of the instructors were apprehensive of their use. But in the Marine Corps, one does what he is ordered and the Marine Instructors carried on with their duties of instructing the new Marines, who would most certainly soon be on their way Vietnam.

Mr. Scudder was in the grenade pit with a young Marine and was giving him instructions on how to hold the grenade with the safety spoon against the palm, how to remove the pin and how to toss the grenade. He was standing directly in front of the Marine, instructing the Marine on how to place the grenade in one hand and how to remove the pin with the other hand, pull his arm back and toss the grenade. The young Marine managed to remove the safety pin on the grenade but then froze in place.

Mr. Scudder placed both of his hands around the hand of the young Marine so the Marine would not drop the grenade or release the spoon. As Mr. Scudder turned his head to the right to call another instructor over to place the safety pin back into the grenade it suddenly and without cause exploded in his hands, killing the young Marine and severely injuring Mr. Scudder. As a result of the tremendous blast Mr. Scudder lost both hands, the use of his left eye, damaged several ribs and suffered severe internal injury.

Gravely injured, Mr. Scudder was then transported to Oaknoll Naval Hospital in Oakland California where he lay for over three months recovering from injuries that many men would have succumbed to. On more than one occasion an officer came into his hospital room and interrogated him, questions where asked why he mishandled or dropped the grenade. Mr. Scudder wondered if the Marine Corps was blaming him for the accident, and holding him accountable for the deadly explosion. Mr. Scudder was discharged from the Marine Corps upon his release from Oaknoll Hospital, his pay was placed into the front pocket of his trousers and he was transported by pickup truck to the bus terminal in downtown Oakland California.

The Marine Corps pickup that transported Mr. Scudder into Oakland, parked across the street from the bus terminal and the driver opened the door for Mr. Scudder and pointed to the terminal. Unable to see clearly, he stumbled as best he could across the street and purchased a bus ticket home to Oregon. It was necessary for Mr. Scudder to ask the ticket agent behind the counter to remove money from the pocket of his trousers in order to pay for the bus ticket, Mr. Scudder told the ticket agent, "I don't have any hands."

Many years have passed since the accident, an accident which can be directly attributed to the Vietnam War. Training cycles were accelerated and shortened as young men were rushed to Vietnam. Munitions, weapons and equipment necessary for war were manufactured at a record pace. On occasion, newly manufactured munitions would unexplainable explode, fail to explode or somehow malfunction. Poorly made weapons like the newly issued M-16 rifle were placed into the hands of Soldiers and Marines with the prior knowledge that the rifle had serious deficiencies. Weapons would most often fail to fire during critical periods of combat. Weapons failure was blamed on poor cleaning and maintenance by the very men who were issued this poorly manufactured rifle. Thousands of young men were killed and injured as the result of these failures. It was later revealed that the Department Of Defense had prior knowledge of the weapons potential for failure.

Through these many years, Mr. Scudder has tried many alternatives and ill-fitting prosthetics provided by the Veterans Administration. After so many failures Mr. Scudder kind of gave up on the Veterans Administration and to a certain extent, I think the Veterans Administrating may have forgotten about Mr. Scudder. He has continued to persevere and endure these many years despite his injuries and the seemly lack of concern by the Veterans Administration. Mr. Scudder told me at this years Khe Sanh Veterans Reunion (2006) that the Veterans Administration was going to give him another try with something newly developed and he was looking forward to it's success.

It has been over 4 years since I first met Mr. Scudder, and I think about him every time I hear someone gripe or voice a complaint about an irrelevant event in their life. I think about a very brave man who faces real challenges each day, challenges most of us could never imagine. Mr. Scudder is popular at the Khe Sanh reunions, not because of his loss of limbs, but because of his bravery, inspiration and his perseverance.

Sitting on that old bus bench all alone in the dark after my departure from Ernie's Interlude, it was time for me to end my melancholy and leave. It was time for me to stop feeling lonely and sorry for myself, to stop feeling depressed and worthless. I opened up the door to my house, went in and went to bed where I knew I belonged. I was thankful for another day and so appreciative of the man who helped me to appreciate what I have. A man who was severely injured while trying his best to instill a little knowledge of combat and survival to someone else, a man who gave all that he could give, Lloyd W. Scudder, the bravest and toughest Marine I know.

KILLED' IN VIETNAM AND BURIED WITH COMRADES, ONE MARINE FROM THE DEAD

By Michael E. Ruane July 8 at 8:59 PM

Ronald L. Ridgeway was "killed" in Vietnam on Feb. 25, 1968.

The 18-year-old Marine Corps private first class fell with a bullet to the shoulder during a savage fire-fight with the enemy outside Khe Sanh.

Dozens of Marines, from what came to be called "the ghost patrol," perished there.

At first, Ridgeway was listed as missing in action. Back home in Texas, his old school, Sam Houston High, made an announcement over the intercom.

But his mother, Mildred, had a letter from his commanding officer saying there was little hope. And that August, she received a "deeply regret" telegram from the Marines saying he was dead.

On Sept. 10, he was buried in a national cemetery in St. Louis. A tombstone bearing his name and the names of eight others missing from the battle was erected over the grave. His mother went home with a folded American flag.

But as his comrades and family mourned, Ron Ridgeway sat in harsh North Vietnamese prisons for five years, often in solitary confinement, mentally at war with his captors and fighting for a life that was technically over.

Last month, almost 50 years after his supposed demise, Ridgeway, 68, a retired supervisor with Veterans Affairs, sat in his home here and recounted for the first time in detail one of the most remarkable stories of the Vietnam War.

As the United States marks a half-century since the height of the war in 1967 and '68, his "back-from-the-dead" saga is that of a young man's perseverance through combat, imprisonment and abuse.''

He was 17 when he signed up with the Marines in 1967. He was 18 when he was captured, 19 when his funeral was held and 23 when he was released from prison in 1973.

"You have to be willing to take it a day at a time," he said. "You have to set in your mind that you're going to survive. You have to believe that they are not going to defeat you, that you're going to win."

EVERYBODY'S DEAD'

About 9:30 on the morning of Feb. 25, Pfc. Ridgeway's four-man fire team charged an enemy trench line.

The curving trench seemed empty when they got there. But as Ridgeway and the others made their way along it, suddenly an enemy grenade dropped in.
"We back around the curve," he recalled. "It blows up."

"We throw a couple grenades," he said. "We backed off. . . . Then we realized the firing [from Marines] behind us had almost died down to nothing."

When they stood up to look around, they saw North Vietnamese soldiers walking through the underbrush toward them. "I guess they thought we were all dead," he said.

"We cut loose on them," he recalled. "They were easy targets."

Ridgeway had been part of a platoon of about 45 men sent out from the besieged Khe Sanh combat base, in what was then northern South Vietnam, to find enemy positions, and perhaps capture a prisoner.

The enemy's noose around the Marine base had been tightening, with heavy mortar and artillery fire, and the patrol was hazardous. Six thousand Americans were surrounded by 20,000 to 40,000 North Vietnamese soldiers.

On that foggy morning, the patrol's leader, 2nd Lt. Donald Jacques, 20, strayed off course and was drawn into a deadly ambush, said Jacques's company commander, Capt. Kenneth W. Pipes.

More than two dozen Marines, including Jacques, were killed. One of the Marines in the trench with Ridgeway, James R. Bruder, 18, of Allentown, Pa., was cut down as the enemy returned fire, according to author Ray Stubbe's book about Khe Sanh, "Battalion of Kings."

"Stitched him across the chest and killed him," Ridgeway remembered.

The fire team leader, Charles G. Geller, 20, of East St. Louis, Ill., took a peek, and a bullet creased his forehead, knocking him down.

"Everybody's dead," Geller said, according to Stubbe's book. "Everybody behind us is dead. . . . What are we going to do?"

They had to retreat. Geller left first, running back across the field where they had charged, followed by Ridgeway.

The son of a Southern Pacific railroad worker, Ridgeway came from a working-class neighborhood of Houston. He had a younger brother.

His parents were divorced. He had left high school and joined the Marines because "I wanted to get away," he recalled.

As he and Geller ran to the rear, they came upon Willie J. Ruff, 20, of Columbia, S.C., who was lying on his back with a broken arm.

"We were in a hurry," Ridgeway said. "But we stopped. He was wounded."

As Geller knelt beside Ruff, a bullet hit Geller in the face, leaving a terrible wound. Then Ridgeway was struck by a round that went through his shoulder. All three men were now down.

"All we could do was lay there and play dead," he said. "We were in the wide open."

Ridgeway said he drifted in and out of consciousness. When Geller, who was delirious, got to his knees, the enemy threw a grenade, killing him.

Ridgeway said the North Vietnamese then began shooting at Marines who had fallen in front of their trenches. "They're popping the bodies to make sure they're dead," he said.
One bullet hit the dirt near him. A second glanced off his helmet and struck him in the buttock, he said.

"When that hit, it jarred the body," he said. "They figured they got me. Left me for dead and kept working their way down past me."

Ridgeway passed out again. When he woke up, it was dark and American artillery was pounding the area.

Ruff said he had been hit again and begged Ridgeway not to leave him. Ridgeway said he wouldn't. At some point that night, Ruff died.

Ridgeway was awakened the following morning by someone pulling on his arm. He thought at first it was fellow Marines.

But when he looked up, he realized it was a young North Vietnamese soldier trying to pull off his wristwatch.

AGONY AND IDENTIFICATION

After the firefight, the shattered survivors of the patrol made it back to the combat base, and the dead were left on the battlefield.

A rescue mission was deemed unwise by higher-ups, who feared losing even more men and depleting the base's defenses, according to Pipes, who is now retired and lives in California.

In a telephone interview, he said that with binoculars, he could see Marines' bodies strewn on the battlefield. "It was worse than agony," he said. No further patrols outside the combat base were immediately permitted.

"We couldn't go get them," he said. "They laid out there for six weeks."

On March 17, he wrote to Ridgeway's mother: "I am sorry that I can offer no tangible basis for hope concerning Ronald's welfare."
Finally, on April 6, the Marines were able to return to the battlefield, Pipes said.

What was left of the dead was brought back to Khe Sanh's temporary morgue, where Pipes and others went about the grisly task of identifying the dead.
"There wasn't much there but bones and shoes and boots . . . [and] dog tags," he said.

In the end, of the 26 missing and presumed killed in action on Feb. 25, remains of all but nine were positively identified, according to Pipes and Stubbe.

The unassociated body parts were sent home and placed in two caskets that would be buried beneath a large tombstone bearing the nine names of those unaccounted for, Stubbe said.

The day of the funeral at the Jefferson Barracks National Cemetery was sunny and cool. Ridgeway's mother attended, and there were flags and solemn honors. A newspaper photographer took pictures.
Far away, in North Vietnam, the rainy season was on, and Ridgeway was in his seventh month as a POW.

THE WORK OF SURVIVING

As he sat alone in his windowless cell beside a wooden bed and the bucket he used for waste, Ridgeway went about creating a "make-believe" life.
There was no one to talk to, and he was allowed out only once a day to empty the bucket.

So he imagined that he was somewhere else, that he owned a pickup truck, that he had a wife and children, that he would go fishing.
It was a mental exercise, he said, and he found that spending three days in his make-believe world would take up a whole day in solitary.

Ridgeway said that by then, his captors considered him a "die-hard reactionary" and all Marines "animals."

He hadn't cooperated with his guards. He had lied to interrogators, pretended he was a green kid who had neverfired his rifle and gave them bogus military information.

The startled North Vietnamese soldier had locked and loaded his rifle when he realized Ridgeway was alive that morning.

Ridgeway expected to be killed. "You didn't hear about prisoners being taken," he said. But he was bandaged, fed and marched away, through Laos and into North Vietnam.

He spent time in several jungle camps, held in wooden leg stocks, and he eventually wound up in enemy prisons.

He got lice, malaria and dysentery and lost 50 pounds. He wore pink-and-gray-striped POW pajamas and rubber sandals, all of which he brought home with him when he was freed.

He was beaten with bamboo canes and tied up during interrogations.

One interrogator the Americans named "Cheese" — because he seemed to be the big cheese — was especially cruel.

He spoke English and sat up on a high chair as he questioned POWs tied on the floor. When he nodded his head, a guard would strike the prisoner with the bamboo cane.

He had a face like a rat, Ridgeway recalled, and was a "mean . . . sadistical son of a b----."

Ridgeway said he didn't dwell on the notion that people back home might think he was dead. They would be fine. His job was to survive.

In January 1973, he was in North Vietnam's notorious Hanoi Hilton prison when his captors abruptly announced that the POWs were to be freed as part of a peace agreement before the U.S. withdrawal from Vietnam.

When the list of POWs being released became public, Ridgeway's name was on it.

Back in Houston, his mother banged on a neighbor's door and said, "Ronnie's alive!"

MEMORY ETCHED IN STONE

Ridgeway was released on March 16, 1973. He came home, got married and went to college.

"I came back in basically one piece," he said. "I came back able to live my life.... We went over with a job to do. We did it to the best of our ability. We were lucky enough to come back."

Several months after his return, he and his wife, Marie, went to Jefferson Barracks to see his tombstone, which was later replaced.

"It brought back memories," he said. "The loss of life of those that I knew. It was a solemn experience."
Carved in the surface were the words "Ambushed Patrol Died in Vietnam Feb. 25, 1968."

Eight names from the top: Ronald L. Ridgeway.

Magda Jean-Louis contributed to this report.

After his disappearance, Ridgeway's name was etched onto a tombstone in a St. Louis cemetery, along with those of eight fellow Marines who went missing in the 1968 ambush. (Fred Waters/

Retired Marine Ronald L. Ridgeway, photographed at his Texas home, was 18 years old in 1968 when his patrol was attacked in Vietnam. He was captured and held prisoner for five years before being released, a time during which he was believed dead. (Matthew Busch for The Washington Post)

1971, Mrs.Mary Hoff, an MIA wife and member of the National League of American Prisoners and Missing in Southeast Asia, recognized the need for a symbol of our POW/MIAs. Prompted by an article in the Jacksonville, Florida TIMES-UNION, Mrs. Hoff contacted Norman Rivkees, Vice-President of Annin & Company which had made a banner for the newest member of the United Nations, the People's Republic of China, as a part of their policy to provide flags to all UN member nations. Mrs. Hoff found Mr. Rivkees very sympathetic to the POW/MIA issue, and he, along with Annin's advertising agency, designed a flag to represent our missing men. Following League approval, the flags were

I just don't know how President Tom Eichler and Board Member Russell Turner along with Russell's wonderful wife Kathy do it. The literally hundreds of hours of negotiations, travel, contracts, assurances, promises, complaints, reservations, miscellaneous shipping, transportation, excursions, name tags, meal costs, negotiating parking and additional business room fees, meal counts, attendees registration collected and tracked, supplies for the PX and hospitality room, artistic design of new shirts and paraphernalia along with long hours at the registration desk are just some of the many tasks they freely perform, and they undertake this job for us, each year, without complaint or compensation. All of which made this another outstanding reunion enjoyed by so many. The Cleveland Marriott East was one of the finest hotels we have visited. The rooms could not have been more comfortable and the staff more accommodating

There was much to offer this year in the way of excursions and entertainment. Tuesday and Wednesday some of us played golf at two (2) great courses. Stone Water Golf Club and Little Mountain Country Club. As he did last year, Khe Sanh Veteran and PGA Profession Golf Instructor Fred Bender (Pasa Hills Golf, Wesley Chapel, Florida (813) 857-5430) was kind enough to make the arraignments and T-Times for both courses at less than half the regular price. Besides my high handicap self and Fred Bender, those who participated were Tom Horchler, John Wolfe, Ted Hummer, Robert Longcrane, Tom Ford, Louie Reyes and Ted Rizo. As would be expected, Fred is a great golfer and I was humbled to have been able to play golf with him. Except for Fred, we all seemed to play to our handicaps. Fred was very kind, he just smiled, offered no advice or opinions and let us play our game. What a pleasure he was to watch, I tried to learn at least something, after all, it was free. On that note, there is no golf planned for the Washington D.C. reunion next year. I'll try to put something together in 2019 in Tacoma Washington if there is enough interest.

Who doesn't enjoy a romantic dinner cruise. On Thursday, we all boarded the "Nautica Queen" river boat for an enjoyable little cruise up the Cuyahoga River – famous for having been so polluted it caught fire in 1969 which spurred the environmental movement in the United State – now pristine, we had great views of the city lights and sites. At the dinner table, I sat next to Tom Horchler who had a remarkable17 year career in the food and beverage industry. I can personally attest to his experience and attributes as it pertains to food preparation and hospitality. I deferred to his expertise regarding the meal, his opinion was it was difficult to feed so many in such limited space but given the circumstances the food was pretty good and certainly plentiful. Many must have agreed; a quick glance around revealed many empty plates and looks of satisfaction.

While visiting with those around me Board Member Louie Reyes stopped by, accompanied by his 7-year -old granddaughter Presley (Torres). She introduced herself and informed me she was not named after the singer Elvis Presley but rather after USMC Lt. Presley O'Bannon (1776-1850). Presley told me she could sing the "Marine Corps Hymn" and asked if I wanted to hear it. Of course, I said yes and was absolutely stunned at her rendition and singing talent Rock and Roll Hall of Fame" just the name is intriguing. We traveled there on Friday and I don't think any were disappointed. The building was huge and as the name implies, loaded with thousands of memorabilia from notable bands and performers. Of interest was the Dick Clark - from American Bandstand – theater which played a continues film of then, not so famous performers. Phil Nuchereno and Board Member Bruce Geiger both thought this was one of the most interesting presentations of the hundreds of exhibits displayed.

The reunion concluded with the Saturday evening banquet. Another notable evening of pageantry, formality, introduction of officers, good humor, excellent food and sad goodbyes. The posting of colors representing all the military branches is always a proud and emotional moment for me. 7-year-old Presley stood before this large mature crowd and while holding the microphone, humbly sang the Marine Corps Hymn. I don't think there was a dry eye in the place

There are always the dependable at the Khe Sanh Reunions who volunteer their time and energy so that others may enjoy themselves. Without their devotion to the Association and love for their comrades the reunion would not continue to be the success it has become. Vice-President John Pessoni donates hundreds of hours to the Association by managing the PX both at the reunions and his home. Sergeant at Arms David Meyer and Board Member Tom Ford assist John in the PX, often forgoing their own enjoyment and entertainment so they may be available to assist others. Merle Moritz and his wife Rita assisted by Board Member Mike Fishbaugh ensure the hospitality room is stocked with the finest available, a never-ending task and huge responsibility so very much appreciated by the attendees

Board Member Mike Fishbaugh deserves individual recognition for his tireless efforts. He always seems available to any member who contacts him with a request for assistance. His skill at the computer does not go unnoticed and is so greatly appreciated by so many who have asked for guidance in researching important and often complex personal issues

Board Member Louie Reyes skills in electronics with the microphone and speakers is so appreciated. As experience has shown, his talent and expertise has saved the Association in funds often charged by the various host hotels. I have it on good authority Louie has a wonderful signing voice, now we know where his granddaughter got her talent

There are those who always ascend to the task and volunteer to assist in any way they can to contribute in making the reunion a success. Rolland Kutzbach is just such an individual. A professional commercial driver he freely volunteers his time, transportation knowledge and skills along with any other odd job that needs doing

Sid Patricio is often seen in the background with several cameras hanging around his neck. For those who do not know Sid or have failed to introduce yourself, Sid is one of the original founding members of the Khe Sanh Association and to my knowledge, has never missed a reunion since its inception. Sid is a fine man and outstanding Marine who served with Delta Company in Weapons Platoon. If you have ever had questions regarding the Association, past members or the history of its founding, please don't hesitate to ask him, he warrants our praise and respect.

Our Wonderful, lovely, Khe Sanh Ladies enjoyed a Luncheon while their men folk discussed Khe Sanh Veterans affairs at the General Membership meeting. They held their own little auction of gifts they personally donated and raised over 1,000 for the Scholarship Fund.

An Election for Board members was held for the position of President, Treasurer, and four Mmbers at Large positions.Tom Eichler, our current Presidentb & Treasurer ran unopposed and was reelected. Bruce Geiger, Tom Ford, Russell Turner, were all elected for another term. Ted Rizo replaced John Wolfe .We want to thank John for his dedicated service to the Khe Sanh Veterans organization.

Were you one of the fortunate who made the 2017 Reunion in Cleveland Ohio? I think I may have missed one in the past 14 years and told myself if I was capable, I'd never miss another. I can think of several members just off the top of my head, who were unable to make this reunion but certainly would have, had they been able. I am confident they would have had a wonderful time seeing and visiting with their many old friends and making new ones, swapping stories and recalling encounters, remembrances and so looking forward to next year's reunion. I can see their happy faces and caring smiles and I remember the many conversations I had with each. Doc (Corpsman) Jim Thomas missed this year's reunion as did Board Member Kenneth Martin.

The always inspirational Lloyd (Shortround) Scudder didn't make the reunion this year, neither did former Marine Corps Drill Instructor Bruce Kates who joined us for golf at the San Diego reunion and who I spoke with at Khe Sanh shortly before he was seriously wounded. No, none of those mentioned made the reunion in Cleveland Ohio this year. Sadly, they have passed on, but they were missed and not forgotten, as were so many more we have lost over the years. If you haven't attended a Khe Sanh Reunion in a while or have never attended, please consider attending the reunion next year in Washington D.C. This reunion commemorates 50 years since the start of the Siege at the combat base however, this reunion is for everyone who served in that area of operation during the Vietnam War, dependents, associates, guests and anyone else who would like to honor and support Khe Sanh Veterans, anyone and all are welcomed and invited to attend.

TWO DAYS AT THIS KHE SANH VETERANS' REUNION HAS BEEN BETTER THAN TWENTY YEARS OF THERAPY

BY

KHE SANH VETERANS CHAPLAIN RON RAYNER

Programs for the Khe Sanh memorial service were available at the check in table at this year's reunion in Cleveland. Inside the program was a section to write people's names that are connected to Khe Sanh that have passed on. I had a program open and I had written the names of some people who I knew because of my Khe Sanh experience. Others had already written more names on the program.

One of the first ladies that checked in after I had sat down at the check in table looked at the program and saw the name "Short Round" and proceeded to tell a "Short Round" story that validated the whole purpose of having a place in the Memorial Service program to write remembrances.

First of all, it had to be established which "Short Round" we were talking about as there is more than one guy called "Short Round". The lady said, "Lloyd and Patricia Scudder." Her story follows:

She and her husband met Lloyd and Patricia Scudder at the Khe Sanh Reunion in 1997. A few days into the reunion she had been walking through the hotel and happened to see Patricia sitting somewhere and crying. The lady asked if there was something she could do. Patricia responded, "Oh no, everything is just fine. Two days here at this Khe Sanh Veteran's reunion had helped Lloyd more than twenty years of therapy."
Jesus said, "... I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly." John 10:10 (KJV)

The Cleveland reunion went great. The people that attended smiled a lot and enjoyed the camaraderie. Enjoying life is something God wants us to do. Enjoying life is what I believe we owe to the more than the 1.1 million men and women who have lost their lives serving this country.

If you have not been to a reunion in a while or not at all, I highly recommend going to Washington D.C. next year and meeting some very friendly happy people. Remember it is not what happens to you in life, but how you handle what happens to you in life.

Gracious God, thank you for bringing into our lives friends who brighten our dark moments. Please guide us to transform our own struggles into compassion for others. Amen.

CAPTAIN ANDREW BRUCE "MAC" MCFARLANE, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN, F, G & H&S CO 2/3, HILLS 881N&S

Andrew Bruce "Mac" McFarlane, 87, of Saddle Brook, NJ passed away on Tuesday, August 8, 2017 at home surrounded by his loving family.

Born January 26, 1930 in Teaneck, NJ to Andrew and Mary (Docherty), he was raised in Rutherford, NJ and was a 1947 graduate of Rutherford High School lettering in three varsity sports - soccer, basketball and baseball.

In November of 1948, he enlisted in the US Marine Corps were he remained on continuous active service for 22 years until retiring in 1971 with the rank of Captain. During his service, he saw direct combat with the First Marine Division in Korea from September 1950 to August 1951 and serving twice in Vietnam, September 1966 to October 1967 as an Infantry Officer with the Third Marine Division and from April 1970 to January 1971 as an Infantry Captain. His courageous and valiant service earned him three Bronze Star Medals with combat "V" for heroic action during direct combat. The first was awarded in 1951 for his service in Korea as a Private First Class and two were awarded for his service in Vietnam in 1966 and 1967. In 1970, he was the recipient of the Navy/Marine Corps Commendation Medal with combat "V" for meritorious service and a Vietnamese Cross of Gallantry with Silver Star. Additional service awards earned for his devoted service include the Combat Action Ribbon twice for direct combat in Korea and Vietnam, four Presidential Unit citations for Korea and Vietnam with the First and Third Marine Division, six battle stars on the Korean Service Medal and three battle stars on the Vietnam Service Medal.

Upon retirement from the Marine Corps in 1971, he became employed with the Bergen County Prosecutors Office in Hackensack as a County Investigator where he remained until his retirement in 1991 with the rank of Lieutenant of County Investigators. He was a retired member of the NJ Police Benevolent Associations - Local #221 Prosecutors Office and Local #600 NJ Retired.

From 1991 to 2002, he was a professional baseball scout with the Cleveland Indians, NY Yankees and the Tampa Bay Devil Rays.

Mac held life memberships with V.F.W. Post 3484 of Saddle Brook, American Legion Post 415 of Saddle Brook, First, Second and Third Marine Division Associations, Military Officers Association of America and Korean War Veterans and Vietnam War Veterans of America. Other memberships included the Marine Corp League, The Chosin Few - First Marine Division during winter of 1950 North Korea, Marine Corps Officers Mustang Association, Khe Sanh Veterans of Vietnam, NJ Vietnam Veterans Memorial & Education Center, founder and charter member of the Rutherford High School Athletic Hall of Fame and committee member of the Greater Bergen County YMCA of Hackensack annual Sports Awards Banquet where he served from 1993-2005 and in 2001 received the Richard Poor Service to the Community Award.

His tireless and dedicated service to the community included serving as a youth baseball coach with the Saddle Brook recreational programs and American Legion Baseball League, field Manager of the Saddle Brook Colonial Baseball Team of the Metropolitan Baseball League as well as league Commissioner, President of the NJ College Baseball Association, CYO Boys Basketball coach at St. Philip the Apostle Church and founder and Commissioner of the Saddle Brook Boys/Girls Recreation Soccer Programs.

His exceptional athletic ability earned him induction into the following - Rutherford High School Athletic Hall of Fame Association, Metropolitan Baseball League Hall of Fame, Bergen County Semi-Pro Baseball Hall of Fame and the Saddle Brook Colonials Baseball Team of the Metropolitan Baseball League Hall of Fame.

Beloved husband of the late Joan (Cartier) McFarlane. Loving and devoted father of Andrew Bruce McFarlane and Douglas McFarlane and wife Annmarie. Cherished grandfather of Kelsey and Ryan McFarlane. Dear brother of the late May. He is also survived by many loving nieces, nephews and cousins.

COLONEL BRUCE F. MEYERS, USMC KHE SANH VETERAN, CO 26TH MARINES

Colonel Bruce F. Meyers, USMC passed away peacefully on August 7, 2017. He was born August 10, 1925, in Bellevue, WA, to Major Herbert and Bess France Meyers. Bruce grew Up in the Pacific Northwest with his brother George and step-brother Douglas. The Meyers boys loved their active outdoor boyhood - swimming, diving, skiing and mountaineering. Bruce had climbed the six major peaks in Washington by the age of 16, and became a pilot at 19. At Franklin High School in Seattle, to which he commuted by ferry across Lake Washington and bike or streetcar up to school, he was active in student government, played football and ran track. His .academic and sports careers continued at the University of Washington where he played football and rowed crew as a Husky.

Graduating early from high school, Bruce enlisted in the UW Naval ROTC program in 1942 and was commissioned as a 2nd Lt. in the Marine Corps. After WWII, still in the Marine Reserves and still attending classes at UW, Bruce became a forest ranger in a fire lookout on Mt. Rainier. Bruce married Jo-Anne Hopf in March, 1948, the same year he graduated from the university with a BS in geology. Two years later he received a BA Law degree from UW, then a JD (with honors) from George Washington University in 1963 (Order of the Coif, Law Review). Postgraduate study included a year at Brown University, and completion of his LLM at Yale University, 1980.

2nd Lt Meyers rose to the rank of Marine Colonel, a career spanning 28 years of military service. He commanded a rifle company in Korea (1951); had a pivotal role in forming Force Recon, becoming the Commanding Officer of First Force Recon (1957); became Battalion Commander of the Sixth Fleet Landing Force (1966) and Commander, Special Landing Force Alpha aboard the (LPH) Iwo Jima. In Viet Nam, Colonel Meyers commanded the 26th Marines at Khe Sanh, during the Tet offensive in 1968.

DAVID A. DOEHRMAN, USMC KHE SANH VETERAN, B CO 3RD RECON

DAVID ALLEN DOEHRMAN, 69, of Fort Wayne, passed away on Saturday, August 19, 2017 surrounded by his family. He was the son of Alfred and Opal Doehrman. He proudly served his country in the United States Marine Corps from 1967 to 1969 as a SCUBA Qualified Reconnaissance Marine. He was a Viet Nam veteran, stationed at Khe Sanh Combat Base during Tet Offensive. He received numerous commendations, including the Navy Commendation medal with Combat "V"; the National Defense Service medal; the Viet Nam Service medal; the Republic of Viet Nam Campaign medal; and two Presidential Unit Citations. After being discharged from the military he spent 30 years working in the trucking industry and retired from Centennial Wireless as Director of Reporting/Database Management. He is survived by his wife, Thomacine "Tommie" Doehrman; five children, Michael (Gail) Doehrman, James Doehrman, Michelle (Steve) Bade, RaeLynn Doehrman, and Mark Thayer; 13 grandchildren; and three great-grandchildren. Preceded in death by his mother, father, sister, Susan Parks and one grandson. At his request, there will be no visitation or funeral services. Celebration of Life will be held at a later date.

OBIT

JAMES "DOC" THOMAS, USN KHE SANH VETERAN, KILO CO 3/26 HN 3RD PLT

James Byron Thomas died April 15, 2017 in Chickasha Oklahoma. He was born March 2, 1947 in Lawton, Oklahoma to James Clarence Thomas and Ruth (Chapman) Thomas. After graduating from Lawton High he enlisted in the Navy in 1966 and became a corpsman in Vietnam. He was shot down in a helicopter on May 29, 1968 and received a purple heart for his injuries.

James was married to Emma and that union resulted in two children, Scott and Michelle.

Lames later moved to Lawton in 1979 where he married Terri Ganse in October 14 1982. They were married for 34 and a half years. That marriage resulted in two sons, Kevin and Kyle.

After getting out of the Navy, he went to Sparks in Ft. Smith Arkansas and became a Radiologic Technologist. James worked in numerous hospitals in Lawton, Chickasha, and Oklahoma City. He retired from Mercy and the Heart Hospital in 2010.

James joined the Navy reserves for a while then transferred to the Air National Guard. He had a total o 36 Years of service when he retired from the military and he achieved the rank of Master Sergeant.

VIETNAM VETERAN FROM EAST HAMPTON HONORED FOR 2 TOURS AT WAR

PARKSLEY HONORS FALLEN MARINE, OTHERS AT WAR MEMORIAL DEDICATION

Hundreds gathered at the Parksley Town Square this Memorial Day to honor a fallen Vietnam War hero from a nearby town and all Accomack County veterans who have died in war.

Mayor James Eichelberger welcomed the crowd, which included dozens of veterans, state and local officials, residents, members of local veterans groups, and the friends, family and former comrades of Cpl. Jerry C. Burkhead.

"It's something that your never, ever get over— the loss of a child or a brother," said Shirley Johnson, who spearheaded the effort to raise a monument memorializing her brother and other fallen service members.

Burkhead was killed in action during the battle for Khe Sanh in Quang Tri Provence, Vietnam on Feb. 8, 1968. He was 21 years old.

He was born the youngest of 12 children to Junius and Velma Burkhead of Justiceville, near Parksley, in 1946.

Burkhead joined the United States Marine Corps after graduating from high school in 1966 and was deployed to Vietnam the next year.

He was one of 64 Marines defending an outpost known as Hill 64 during the battle that claimed his life and more than 20 others'.

His comrade Willi Lauterbach, who was wounded in the fight, attended Monday's ceremony honoring his fellow Marine.

"That day (Jerry was killed)… started on Hill 64 as rockets and the like and ended in hand-to-hand combat," Lauterbach said. "That morning was arduous; it was an endless barrage of putting in those hours of hand-to-hand combat, but I stand here today because Jerry and my other Marines lived up to the bond of warriors."

Johnson's original plan to raise $150 for a small plaque memorializing her brother blossomed into almost $50,000 in donations for the memorial in the town square

The Town of Parksley donated the land for the monument, and gifts from Accomack County government officials including Sen. Lynwood Lewis and Delegate Robert Bloxom, local organizations and friends and family of veterans paid for the polished black monument adorned with flags honoring various military groups, benches and an empty POW seat in memory of those who went missing in war.

Nearly 40 years after her brother's death, Johnson simply wanted to memorialize him, she said.

"People like Shirley Johnson remind us of what we can achieve when we all pull together as one," Rear Adm. Craig Quigley said during his keynote address at the Memorial Day ceremony.

Family and friends can still purchase personalized bricks honoring war veterans to be displayed at the Cpl. Jerry C. Burkhead/Town of Parksley War Memorial.

VIETNAM VETERAN FROM EAST HAMPTON HONORED FOR 2 TOURS AT WAR 'REAL HERO RIGHT IN OUR MIDST,' VIETNAM VET FINALLY ISSUED HIS DUE FOR 2 TOURS AT WAR

PUBLISHED 1:54 PM, FRIDAY, AUGUST 18, 2017

EAST HAMPTON >> Bolstered by friends and family in the library's community meeting room, Robert Olivieri confronted a harrowing part of his past Thursday morning.

As he stood quietly in khaki chinos and a blue polo shirt embossed with the bold letters USMC, Olivieri was cast back nearly half a century — and half a world away — to Vietnam.

As an aide read a citation for the Navy/Marine Commendation Medal, friends who have known Oliveri for years and even his own grandchildren learned about a whole other dimension of the man U.S. Rep. Joe Courtney, D-Connecticut, called "a real hero right here in our midst."

Oliveri had earned the medal in 1969 but never received it. It was only this past November that he contacted the congressman's office about tracking down the medal, Courtney's district director Ayanti E. Grant said.

"He said it was not so much for himself but for his family, his lineage, his grandchildren," Grant said.
Ironically, Olivieri was being recognized for actions he took during his second tour in Vietnam, the one he promised his anxious mother would not be so hectic — or as dangerous — as his first tour.

While a Hartford native fresh out of high school, Olivieri joined the Marine Corps at 17. He arrived in Vietnam in 1967 and was assigned to I Corps, the farthest, most northern part of South Vietnam.
Olivieri ticked off a litany of places where he served, places now largely forgotten by all except the men who served there and the families of men who died there: Khe Sanh, Con Thien, Hill 881.

Olivieri was "a grunt," an infantryman, with Bravo Co. 1/9 Marines (First Battalion/9th Marine Regiment, 3rd Marine Division). The 1/9's nickname in Vietnam was "The Walking Dead." Bravo Co.'s nickname was the "Battling Bastards," Olivieri said.

In 1967, the 1/9 was engaged in "hill fights" with tough, battle-hardened North Vietnamese Army regulars — thousands of them, Oliveri explained.

"The enemy was devastating. We got our [rears] kicked so bad" so the 1/9 rotated back to Okinawa three times during his tour to regroup, refit and fill its ranks with fresh new Marines, Oliveri said.

Oliveri has forgotten — or suppressed — many of his memories of those harrowing hill fights fought in deep jungles routinely swept by torrential rains, he said.

After 13 months, he came home to an America at war with itself over the war. He quickly realized he was estranged from "my supposed friends" whose knowledge of the true facts of the war were naive and simplistic.

"I told them, 'You don't have a freaking clue,'" Olivieri said.

Shortly thereafter, he volunteered to return to Vietnam for a second tour because "all my friends were there and I can't be here with all these idiots." His mother did not take the decision well, Olivieri acknowledged. So he made her a promise: "I wasn't going to be a grunt again."

Instead, he wound up as a military policeman at the sprawling base in DaNang.

And it was there on April 27, 1969, that the incident occurred which earned Olivieri the commendation medal.

Olivieri was flanked by Courtney and his Veterans Service Representative Manuel F. "Manny" Meneses as Meneses, a retired Navy master chief, read the citation.

A fire began in the ammunition storage supply point at the Amphibious Force Transient Facility in DaNang, he said. The fire, raging out of control, ignited stored munitions.

"With complete disregard for his own safety, Sgt. Olivieri voluntarily joined a detail which was directed to proceed to the highly explosive service area and ensure the safety of the Armory, which held 382 M-16 rifles and the Money Conversion Unit, which contained $450,000," Meneses read.

"After fearlessly maintaining his position until he was ordered to evacuate the area [Olivieri] volunteered to return as a member of the security force, despite the danger of falling debris."

Olivieri then "remained on the perimeter ... until the explosive ordnance disposal team had successfully cleared the area.

"By his courage, bold initiative and unwavering devotion to duty, Sgt. Olivieri was instrumental in safeguarding valuable government property," he continued. In doing so, "he upheld the finest traditions of the Marine Corps and of the United States Naval Service," the citation concluded.

The nearly two dozen people in the room rose as one as they applauded Olivieri, who moved to East Hampton in 2011.

Courtney's staff had prepared a further tribute, organizing all 10 of the medals Olivieri earned in the Marine Corps in a shadow box. As he presented them to Oliveri "on behalf of a grateful nation," Courtney looked at the medals and the man who earned them and said, "What an incredible array."

"I appreciate everyone who came (to the ceremony)", Olivieri began. "I didn't think it would be that big a deal" for anyone but his immediate family: his wife Bonnie, his son Eric and his wife and two children, Paige and Heath.

Olivieri also has another son, Craig, who lives in Wyoming with his two other granddaughters, Amaya and Indi.

He became emotional as he said his thoughts were of the 58,212 men — and eight women — who gave up their lives in Vietnam.

"It's not easy for me to think about the people who died in a ridiculous war, as I see it now," Olivieri said.

Still, following the ceremony, Olivieri said he remains "proud to have been a Marine and proud to have served my country."

Olivieri invited the assembled group to join him for "pizza for breakfast," but was persuaded to settle for more traditional fare. Even though it invoked painful memories of Vietnam, the simple ceremony honoring a man Courtney said was "a real patriot" was a perfect tonic to what has been a sour week.

Courtney acknowledged as much as he said one of the benefits of his job is "I get a chance to learn more about people on a deeper level. It's pretty moving when you get a chance for more than just a glimpse of some of the amazing people like Bob that I have gotten to meet," the congressman continued.

The medal ceremony was particularly moving, Courtney said, "because it lets us get back to the basics: service to the country, unity and coming together."

IN VIETNAM, THESE HELICOPTER SCOUTS SAW COMBAT UP CLOSE COBRAS AND LOACHES, TWO VASTLY DIFFERENT AIRCRAFT, RELIED ON EACH OTHER TO FIGHT THE ENEMY.

You were right in the enemy's face with a helicopter and had to know what you were doing," recalls warrant officer Clyde Romero of his 1,100 hours flying scout missions over South Vietnam in 1971.

"It's like a street cop going into a bad neighborhood. You can have all the guns, vests, and radios you want, but you need street smarts or you're going to be dead within an hour."

Although most combat aircraft in Vietnam aimed for altitudes and speeds that helped them avoid anti-aircraft weapons, U.S. Army crews flying Hughes OH -6A Cayuse helicopters flew low and drew fire—to set up the shots for the Bell AH-1G Cobras circling above. These hunter-killer missions, among the most hazardous of the Vietnam War, tested the resolve of the OH-6 pilots and the aerial observers sitting beside them. Although many were still teenagers, their survival depended on well-honed instincts and razor-sharp reflexes, along with plenty of luck.

In 1965, the concept of helicopter-borne fighting forces was still new and largely untested, and units in Vietnam invented tactics on the spot. The U.S. Army began to use Bell OH-13 Sioux and Hiller OH-23 Raven helicopters, once artillery spotters, to scout ahead of UH-1D Huey formations in the moments before air assaults to gather information about landing zones and enemy locations. Vietnam's mountainous terrain stressed the underpowered, obsolete helicopters to their limits: They could neither fly fast enough to escape enemy fire nor carry enough armament to pose a meaningful threat. Units in Vietnam began sending UH-1Bs outfitted with rocket pods and machine guns to circle over the scouts at around 600 feet and attack anything that might interfere with the imminent troop landing. But the Hueys proved too slow to do the job properly, and the need to replace both scouts and protectors was immediately evident.

Within that same year, help was on the way. An inventive Bell Helicopter engineer was already at work on the world's first attack helicopter, and Bell's decision to keep the project hidden until complete let the model slip into service as a Huey derivative (see "The Birth of the Cobra," Aug. 2017). In August 1967, the AH-1G Cobra arrived in Vietnam.

The Cobra was fast and deadly. From the rear cockpit, the pilot fired rockets from launchers fixed to the stub wings on either side; the copilot in the front operated a chin turret that held a minigun and grenade launcher. Unlike its troop-carrying ancestors, "a Cobra was like a World War II fighter," says Jim Kane, who arrived in Vietnam fresh out of Purdue University. "It was a joy to fly." Kane, who today sells securities in Richmond, Virginia, flew AH-1s in Vietnam from 1968 to 1971.

Following a contentious selection process that included allegations of industrial espionage and political favoritism, the first Hughes OH-6A observation helicopters arrived in Vietnam in December 1967. Army troops called the OH-6As Loaches, a contraction of "light observation helicopters." The ship was unusually light and had plenty of power, perfect for flying nap-of-the-earth missions, and its 26-foot-diameter main rotor made getting into tight landing zones a snap. It had no hydraulic system and its electrical setup was used primarily to start up the engine—simple even by 1960s standards, which for practical purposes meant it was easier to maintain and harder to shoot down than other helicopters. But the light aluminum skin could be easily pierced by rifle bullets, and it also crumpled and absorbed energy in a crash, and a strong structural truss protected critical systems—like the people inside. Loach crews regularly walked away from crashes that would doom others.

As the H-13s were phased out, Loaches were paired with Cobra gunships. Loaches, usually with a pilot and observer and sometimes a door gunner aboard, flew as little as 10 feet above the treetops at between about 45 and 60 mph, scouting for signs of the enemy. Cobras, nicknamed Snakes, flew circles 1,500 feet above the scouts, waiting to pounce on whatever the Loach found. But the Vietnam War was unlike any previous American conflict; there were few real definable frontlines, and combatants needed to know what was happening all around them, all the time. "We operated from fixed bases that were islands, if you will, of allied control," says Hugh Mills, who flew both Loaches and Cobras in Vietnam from 1968 to 1972, and went on to fly helicopters for the Kansas City Police Department. He recalls: "360 degrees around you was enemy territory, and the ability to work with American and [South Vietnamese] units on the ground really required aviation to be able to look eye to eye to tell the good guys from the bad guys." Loach-Cobra pairings were sent out more and more frequently, until their main role was to gather general intelligence rather than prepare landing zones.

Missions began every day at dawn, when crews were briefed on where to fly and what to look for. To hunt for encampments, bunkers, or other signs of the enemy, commanders would deploy a flight of one scouting Loach and one supporting Cobra, called Pink Teams. (Scouts were known as White Teams and Cobras as Red; the two colors combine to become pink. In some areas, Purple Teams—one Loach and two Cobras—were also common, as were other variations.) "We were so close to the elephant grass that we'd blow the grass apart to see if anyone was hiding in there," observer Bob Moses says. Moses, a 19-year-old draftee, arrived in Vietnam in July 1970 for the first of two year-long tours, and later worked for the Department of Veterans Affairs as a therapist and administrator. Even trampled grass was a clue; it meant that enemy troops had passed through the area within eight hours, the time it took for grass to dry upright. Since units were all but permanently assigned to particular areas, they came to know the local geography intimately and could spot anything out of the ordinary. "We were combat trackers," says Mills. "I followed footsteps. I could see a cigarette butt still burning. I could tell how old a footprint was by how it looked.

"Most of our engagements [we] were 25 to 50 feet [away] when we opened up on [the Viet Cong]," Mills continues. "I've seen them, whites of the eyes, and they've seen me, whites of the eyes.... I have come home with blood on my windshield. A little gory but that's how close we were." As the Loach flew among the trees, the rear-seat pilot in the Snake circling above kept a close eye on the little scout and the front-seat gunner jotted down whatever the Loach observers radioed. Upon encountering enemy fire, Loaches were to leave immediately, dropping smoke grenades to mark the target so that within seconds, the Cobra could roll in. Loach crews were equipped with small arms and returned fire as they fled. They could also use grenades and on occasion even homebuilt explosives; more aggressive units mounted forward-firing miniguns. Cobras generally attacked with rockets, preferred for long-range accuracy, switching to the less-accurate chin-mounted machine gun and grenade launcher only if they were far enough away from friendly troops or if the rockets—AH-1s could carry as many as 76 rockets—ran out. Four troop-carrying Hueys (called a Blue Team) often sat idle somewhere nearby, ready to insert troops if the Pink Team discovered an interesting target—or were shot down and needed rescuing.

Loach and Cobra were in constant radio communication, and because of the intensity of hunter-killer missions, it wasn't long before pairs in each type knew each other well enough to anticipate the other's moves. "It had to do with the timbre of your voice-—how you talked to other guys on the radio," says Romero, who arrived in Vietnam in 1970, initially as a Huey co-pilot. (He later transferred to the Air Force and flew F-4 Phantoms, and eventually became an airline captain.) Loach and Cobra crews lived together, and schedulers generally paired the teams with the partners they requested, though given the high turnover rate, that wasn't always possible. "To this day I am closer to those guys I flew with in Vietnam than my own brothers," says Mills. "I spent more time with them."

For most of the war, there was no formal Army training to prepare scout pilots and observers. Army headquarters developed doctrine by building on what worked in the field, rather than the other way around, and each unit in-country did things slightly differently. Though Cobra pilots were trained Stateside, most Loach pilots didn't take control of OH-6s until arriving in Vietnam. "You had a couple of flights in the Huey, then you rode front seat in a Cobra," scout pilot Allan Krausz recounts. Krausz was ordered to Vietnam in April 1971, and today teaches Army students how to fly the Eurocopter UH-72 Lakota, a twin-engine trainer. After around 10 hours at the controls of a Loach, the pilots were deemed worthy of flying in combat.

Warrant officer John Shafer was 21 when he arrived on October 16, 1970, to fly Loaches. "I was just out of flight school when I went to Vietnam." He flew Loaches for the next 11 months, and today is an accountant in Seattle.

The observers and gunners had even less experience. "There was one day of initial training," says Bob Moses, who was first trained as a tank crewman and then as infantry before a sudden transition to helicopter door gunner. "I went up in a Loach with an M60 machine gun to get used to firing the weapon. That was about it."
Another such gunner was 19-year-old Joel Boucher, drafted and sent to Vietnam from 1967 to 1969.

Boucher quickly discovered that life as a qualified crewman was extremely dangerous. "We flew down along the Ho Chi Minh Trail," he says of the supply route that wound through Vietnam and neighboring Laos and Cambodia. "The NVA [North Vietnamese army] was everywhere. Each time we went out, we got shot at. One time we ran into hundreds of enemy troops. We thought they were ARVNs [Army of the Republic of Vietnam] until they started running. It was pretty hairy, and we got the hell out of there." But Boucher got a rush from the missions, and stayed six months beyond what was required of a draftee. Upon returning to the United States, he established a career in the construction industry and settled in rural Sierra City, California.

Other Army pilots, most of whom flew Cobras or Hueys, thought of Loach pilots as a little offbeat. "Scout pilots were a different breed of cat," says Cobra pilot Jim Kane, who likens his former colleagues to the airborne equivalent of the Tunnel Rats, soldiers who crawled head-first into Viet Cong-built tunnels without any idea what awaited them there. "I was wounded three times and shot down nine times," Romero reports. "The shelf life of a scout pilot was probably six months. You were killed, shot down, or got scared and quit. I liked it because in the Bronx, I was a ghetto kid. I was used to getting up close and personal with the enemy." Mills, who served two tours in Loaches and one in Cobras, was shot down 16 times—all but once in OH-6s. The Army dictated that after 300 hours of flight time, each Loach go through a thorough inspection, but in practice such inspections were rare: Few Loaches survived to reach that mark.

"I had a wingman shot down," pilot John Shafer says. "They went down in the jungle, and both [members of the crew] survived. I had another lead that went through 150 feet of trees, and they survived."

Shafer himself had brushes with disaster, and his luck nearly ran out on a mission west of Dak To, near the border with Laos. "I got shot down on my 22nd birthday," March 27, 1971. "I was flying wing and just dropped into the AO [Area of Operations]. Following the lead, we got peppered with rounds." The Loach had a bad vibration, but he made it about half a mile before he had to land. "Just as I set it down,the tail rotor spun off. The enemy was moving toward us when a [command and control] ship picked us up. Cobras rolled in and blew the downed aircraft up—taking with it about 15 bad guys standing around it."

Jim Kane's Vietnam tour abruptly ended one day in February 1971. NVA troops shot down a Cobra, killing the crew. Kane was dispatched to the crash site in another Cobra with copilot Jim Casher. While they were circling the wreckage, enemy rounds hit their ship. Kane recalls, "The vibrations were so harsh I had to return to base camp at Khe Sanh," seven miles from the Laotian border. Upon landing, an inspection revealed a damaged pitch link, a rotor head component so critical that had it failed, they too would have crashed.

"We got into another aircraft and went back out. We were about ready to call in tactical air support to blow up the wrecked ship when another Cobra took a lot of fire. So I engaged the enemy, but didn't make it out of that one.

"We got hit by incendiary .51-caliber rounds, and the phosphorus ignited the Cobra's hydraulic fluid. The flames covered my boots and lower legs. It was the same for Jim. I still have scars on my legs—it was terrifying. I tried to move the stuck controls and prayed for a place to set down." It took all of Kane's strength to pull out of a steep dive, and they crash-landed with a horrific thud. "Jim was unconscious when I helped pull him out of the burning aircraft."

Kane's commanding officer flew his command-and-control Huey to the ravine where Kane and Casher huddled. The Huey descended gingerly into a clearing smaller than its main rotor diameter, the aircraft's rotor blades chopping tree limbs as it descended. Kane and Casher were pulled aboard and returned to Khe Sanh, but the Huey barely made it back; slicing trees had left -its blades shredded, and the tail section had almost separated. It never flew again.

The hunter-killer tactic worked well for a few years, but by the time the United States left Vietnam, it was obsolete, says Mills. In 1972, as U.S. troops slowly withdrew, the NVA began a major push that became known as the Easter Offensive. The campaign included the first major use in the war of Soviet-built, shoulder-launched anti-aircraft missiles. SA-7 Grail heat-seeking missiles could down a Loach before its crew even realized they were under fire. The Cobras high above had a few seconds of warning—they could spot the missile's exhaust plume—but were all the more tempting because at their higher altitudes they were more easily seen than the smaller Loaches. The North Vietnamese deployed hundreds of the missiles, and from then on, both hunter and killer tried to stay well hidden.

By the end of the war, the Loach's replacement was imminent. Despite a strong outcry from crews in Vietnam, the Bell OH-58A Kiowa, powered by the same Allison T-63 engine as the OH-6, was being distributed to Army units. Scout crews argued that the Kiowa was nowhere near as nimble as the Cayuse, but scouting flights were changing. The high-low hunter-killer combination gave way to uniform-altitude missions, with all helicopters flying nap of the earth. Kiowas, largely relegated to low-threat cargo and liaison missions in Vietnam, were after the war tasked to spot targets from afar and guide Cobras (and later, Boeing AH-64 Apaches) to good firing spots.

A sobering statistic: Out of 1,419 Loaches built, 842 were destroyed in Vietnam, most shot down and many others succumbing to crashes resulting from low-level flying. In contrast, of the nearly 1,100 Cobras delivered to the Army, 300 were lost.

Both Loach and Cobra have been in production, on and off, in one form or another ever since.

The Loach-derived MD-500 and other civilian variants still roll off the assembly lines at MD Helicopters, Inc., while Boeing produces an upgraded variant, the AH-6 Little Bird, for military forces (including an autonomous drone version). The Little Bird's weaponry is a far cry from the M60 machine gun carried aboard a Loach in Vietnam: AH-6s can carry miniguns, rocket pods, grenade launchers, Hellfire missiles, and air-to-air Stinger missiles. The AH-6 and its troop-carrying sibling, the MH-6, are still heavily used by U.S. special-operations forces, as everything from airborne sniper platforms to transports inserting small teams to expeditionary light attack helicopters.

The U.S. Marine Corps still flies AH-1 SuperCobras as its main attack helicopter, with the latest version—the AH-1Z Viper— so upgraded and modernized that a Vietnam-era pilot might be hard-pressed to recognize it. Its cockpit teems with electronics and sensors, and its stub wings are heavy with heat-seeking Sidewinder air-to-air missiles, laser-guided Hellfires, rockets (like those used in Vietnam), and even fuel-filled drop tanks. The guidance systems on newer attack helicopters—often working with or even controlling the cameras of reconnaissance drones—have relegated to history the hunter role in the hunter-killer missions. The killer role persists.

DR EDWARD FELDMAN USN, DOCTOR, "CHARLIE MED", KHE SANH VETERAN

It is with great sadness that the family of Edward Michael Feldman announces his passing on October 3, 2017. He was surrounded by his loving family and will be forever remembered by his beautiful wife Patricia and his children Stuart (Carol), David (Erin), Jessica Grunvald (Dan). He was loved and adored by his seven grandchildren Carly, Ally, Sophia, Dahlia, Luca, Jordan and Preston. Edward is predeceased by his parents Sid and Ann and his brother John.

Funeral services were held Tuesday, October 17th 2017 at 12:30 PM Miramar National Cemetery, San Diego, CA

The President of the United States of America takes pleasure in presenting the Silver Star to Lieutenant (MC) Edward M. Feldman (NSN: 0-724224), United States Navy, for conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity in action while serving as Surgeon of the First Battalion, Twenty-Sixth Marines, THIRD Marine Division, in connection with operations against the enemy in the Republic of Vietnam, on 21 January 1968. When the Khe Sanh Combat Base came under heavy mortar and rocket attack on 21 January 1968, a wounded Marine was taken to the Battalion Aid

Station where preliminary examinations revealed a metal object protruding from a wound in his abdominal region. Further examination disclosed the possibility of the object being a live enemy mortar round. Quickly assessing the situation, Lieutenant Feldman directed the erection of a sandbag barricade around the patient over which he would attempt to operate and summoned an ordnance expert to identify the object and assist in removing the suspected explosive device from the injured man. Disregarding his own safety, Lieutenant Feldman removed his helmet and armored vest and exposed himself to the danger of a possible explosion as he began to operate. Displaying exceptional professional ability while performing the delicate surgery under flashlights, he succeeded in removing the live round from the Marine and directed an assistant to carry it outside for disposal. By his courage, exceptional professionalism and selfless devotion to duty at great personal risk, Lieutenant Feldman undoubtedly saved the life of a Marine and upheld the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and of the United States Naval Service

DONG HA, Vietnam — "This is surely one of the most beautiful spots on earth," my Marine companion rhapsodized early in 1967 as we walked in South Vietnam's mysterious, brooding Annamite Mountains, swathed in carpets of deep green and black, tumbling precipitously from rebellious skies into deep valleys. Emperors once hunted for tigers in the untamed landscape. French "colons" later established coffee plantations here.

The Marine and a few buddies lived among the hill tribes in their wood houses on stilts as part of an innovative American program to win Vietnamese "hearts and minds." It was an almost indolent lifestyle, and war seemed far away at that moment.

I had recently arrived in-country, a somewhat bewildered recent British immigrant to the United States who had been plucked by the vagaries of the military draft from a bucolic Midwest life reporting on Iowa's hog markets for the U.P.I. news agency. I was now assigned to be a combat correspondent with the Third Marine Division, headquartered along the Demilitarized Zone between North and South Vietnam. Little did we suspect during my visit that the Marines were witnessing the last days of natural splendor in a place that would play a central role in the war: Khe Sanh.

Shortly afterward, that isolated northwest corner of South Vietnam was transformed into the sort of landscape that the author and journalist Bernard Fall called "hell in a very small place." That was the title of his book describing the siege of Dien Bien Phu, 13 years earlier, when the Viet Minh army decisively defeated the French, ending their reign in Vietnam. The siege of Khe Sanh would become so eerily reminiscent of that earlier battle that a spooked President Lyndon Johnson publicly demanded a pledge from his military commanders that it would not end in a similar debacle.

The struggle at Khe Sanh crept up on the world almost stealthily. It began with the little remembered "hill fights" of 1967, small-unit actions between the Marines and North Vietnamese to seize and hold vital high points in northern South Vietnam — Hill 861, Hill 881 South, Hill 881 North — that loomed over a small Marine air strip at Khe Sanh, a tiny plateau far below.

The North Vietnamese were slowly closing in, but we didn't realize it. As the fighting moved up and down the peaks, lush jungle landscape was ripped apart by airstrikes and artillery fire and reduced to craters and shattered tree stumps, with body parts protruding from the pulverized earth.

Marine patrols battled an often elusive enemy and the equally challenging jungle. Grunts wore condoms to protect themselves from leeches that could burrow inside genitals. Once, when I was sprawled on the jungle floor during one halt, a huge snake slithered across my hand, and to this day I am convinced I levitated several feet in shock.

We'd be submerged for days by monsoon rains, wading through rice paddies and shivering at night in sodden jungle fatigues until our feet began to rot and we felt as cold as being naked on winter's day in Chicago. The cold wetness was often followed, within hours, by tropical heat so stifling that Marines fell like ninepins from dehydration despite gulping handfuls of salt tablets.

We lived in terror of a night ambush — every sound and movement was undoubtedly an enemy soldier. It took hours to "come down" from that experience even when there was no contact. Marines doused themselves with mosquito repellent so evil-smelling that experts said the North Vietnamese and Vietcong soldiers could identify us over long distances and avoid contact. Eventually a less toxic mosquito formula was introduced.

As the North Vietnamese stranglehold tightened around the Khe Sanh combat base itself, Marines burrowed into often shallow trenches, reminiscent of those of World War I, that offered only modest protection against incoming fire. Streams of visiting civilian journalists refused shelter in the public information trench and bribed Navy Seabees with liquor to share their impressively constructed bunker.

My commander was bitten by rats. Despite his violent protests, he was medevaced "to the rear" for rabies treatment, which meant taking two helicopter or fixed-wing trips on the "death run" from the Khe Sanh airfield as North Vietnamese gunners bracketed aircraft and the airstrip with nonstop shelling.
What became known as the siege of Khe Sanh — probably the most reported fight of the entire war — began in late January 1968 and stretched into a protracted artillery slugfest, a grim daily struggle for survival dominated by a virtual curtain of death rained down by high-flying bombers we rarely saw but constantly blessed in our prayers.

As the encirclement was finally lifted in April, I returned to Khe Sanh as a civilian correspondent for U.P.I., having recently finished my military service. In an awesome fleet of gunships (yes, war can look beautiful at times) and clean jungle fatigues, the Army's First Air Cavalry Division hopscotched from hilltop to hilltop into Khe Sanh base and planted a sign declaring, "Under New Management."

I accompanied a sullen unit of Marines who had not changed their fatigues, taken a proper shower or eaten a good meal for weeks or months, as they left by battered trucks or on foot, some muttering their admiration for the North Vietnamese Army rather than any gratitude to the Air Cav.

I had first become aware of this Army-Marine animosity during a stopover in Japan on route to war, when frustrated Marines confined aboard a troop ship had tossed overboard dozens of inebriated soldiers returning from shore leave. And now it had resurfaced in Khe Sanh, and I feared an all-American shootout.

The base was abandoned shortly after the siege itself was lifted, but controversy swirls around Khe Sanh even today. Why were the Marines there in the first place, and why were so many lives sacrificed, seemingly in vain?

Were the North Vietnamese determined to seize Khe Sanh, or was the siege a feint to camouflage the forthcoming nationwide Communist 1968 Tet offensive? Common sense suggests that it was a combination of both. Had the North Vietnamese overrun the base it would have been their biggest victory of the war, affecting the outcome even more decisively than the Tet offensive.

And though the North Vietnamese were not successful in that aim, the battle did distract Gen. William Westmoreland and the Americans from developments in other parts of South Vietnam. Under pressure from Saigon, the Marines had also abandoned their promising hearts and minds campaign in the northern operational area, known as I Corps.
I arrived at Khe Sanh and the surrounding Quang Tri Province as a Marine with a rifle, but returned a half-century later with a piece of chalk as a full-time volunteer English teacher in a Vietnamese high school.

Today, the region, which was subject to possibly the heaviest aerial bombing and defoliation campaign in history, is still dotted with unexploded ordnance despite years of mine clearance and more than 7,000 postwar casualties. Farmers, children and mine clearers themselves continue to be victims. Families suffer the lingering effects of Agent Orange and babies continue to be born deformed.

Some 100,000 tons of ordnance were dropped around Khe Sanh itself, turning the region into a wild moonscape of pulverized red soil. But the mountains are again cloaked in green. Bomb craters have been transformed into duck ponds. The ghostly armies of camouflaged North Vietnamese soldiers slipping down the nearby Ho Chi Minh Trail have been replaced by commercial traders traveling to and from neighboring Laos and Cambodia.

Coffee plantations and split-level homes steadily encroach on the former Marine base, A Vietnamese victory museum there bizarrely claims "80 ships were destroyed" during the climactic battle, even though the base is 70 miles from the sea or other navigable waterways.

The Vietnamese are remarkably generous in their forgiveness of a war that devastated their country and killed one million to three million people (estimates depend on the source), or as high as 10 percent of the population. American deaths were slightly more than 58,000. Despite this carnage, locals have overcome the trauma of the war more quickly than Americans, and I am warmly welcomed into homes and classrooms everywhere, including Khe Sanh.

One skinny kid who begged candy from passing Marines in 1967 is now a friend and a successful businessman. A farmer friend was a South Vietnamese soldier. His wife was a Vietcong antiaircraft gunner. Their daughter, Nhung, attempts to teach me Vietnamese, a language most Marines did not need because we were not allowed to fraternize with locals, only shoot at them.

I recently met Lan, who had been at Khe Sanh as a NVA nurse at the same time I was. She survived by snuggling close to the Marine wire in a strip of land around the base that American bombers avoided to prevent friendly casualties. Thousands of her fellow soldiers were "simply blown apart — we could do nothing for them," she recalled.

Until our meeting, Lan said she had never talked about Khe Sanh except with her husband, though a picture of a beautiful young woman in uniform sits proudly on the wall of her home. After forging that deepest bond, possible only amid the horror and memories of war, sometimes even with former enemies, we agreed to revisit Khe Sanh — this time together as friends.

WAS AMERICA DUPED AT KHE SANH?

At the time, he seemed like the perfect fit: a tall, articulate, handsome paladin. His posture was always ramrod straight, his uniform constantly and precisely starched. He had punched all the right tickets: Eagle Scout, first captain of the West Point class of 1936, commander of both the elite 504th Parachute Infantry of the 82nd Airborne Division and later the 101st Airborne Division, superintendent of West Point and honorary member of the Society of Cincinnati. So when Lyndon Johnson went looking for someone to command the overall anti-Communist crusade in Vietnam in 1964, Gen. William Westmoreland's name was at the top of a shortlist.

Johnson had taken over the presidency, and the challenges in Southeast Asia, from John Kennedy in November 1963. Kennedy's plan to contain Communism in that part of the world had been to supply aid — both monetary and in the form of American military advisers — to the anti-Communist regime of President Ngo Dinh Diem of South Vietnam. By the time of Kennedy's death, the United States had more than 16,000 soldiers advising the Army of the Republic of Vietnam, and it wasn't working. At the Battle of Ap Bac, in January 1963, a force of 1,500 South Vietnamese, despite superior firepower, was decimated by a few hundred Vietcong. Johnson's top aides offered two solutions to the American president: get in or get out. Clad in the panoply of American exceptionalism, Johnson opted for the former and turned to Westmoreland to lead the charge at the head of the Military Assistance Command, Vietnam — MACV for short.

In the first major engagement under Westmoreland's leadership, the Battle of the Ia Drang Valley in November 1965, American forces killed 10 enemy soldiers for every one of their own lost. The hard-fought victory persuaded Westmoreland to adopt a strategy of attrition — if American troops killed enough North Vietnamese and Viet Cong, the enemy would have to sue for peace. Westmoreland explained his plan to an old friend, Senator Fritz Hollings of South Carolina. "Westy," Hollings explained, "the American people don't care about the 10, they care about the one."

Westmoreland's opposite number in North Vietnam, Gen. Vo Nguyen Giap, had also punched the right tickets. A former history teacher and a self-taught military strategist, he had led the Viet Minh resistance against the Japanese during World War II and later commanded the Viet Minh troops who defeated the French forces at Dien Bien Phu in 1954. Considered one of the greatest military strategists of the 20th century, Giap had as his goal not a classic military victory, but rather, as he wrote later, "to break the will of the American government" — just as he had done against the French.

In late 1967, Giap concentrated some 40,000 soldiers in the hills of northwest South Vietnam and orchestrated a series of assaults on a string of American combat bases in the highlands, not far from a Marine base called Khe Sanh, which the North besieged in January 1968. Giap later called these attacks a "diversion" to trick the Americans into moving forces from the populated areas to defensive positions in the hinterland. Most American leaders fell for it; one of the few who didn't, Adm. U. S. Grant Sharp, Westmoreland's nominal superior, presciently argued that "the Communist strategy continued to reflect an effort to draw Allied forces into remote areas," therefore "leaving the populated areas unprotected."

To Westmoreland, the North Vietnamese gambit looked more like the beginning of the end for the North. Called home that fall to convince America that the war was close to being won, he famously claimed, "I begin to see the light at the end of the tunnel" — coincidentally, nearly the same language used by his French predecessor, Gen. Henry Navarre, not long before Dien Bien Phu. For "the light" to glow full orbed, it was essential that the Marine position at Khe Sanh be held.

Both Westmoreland and Johnson quickly became obsessed with Khe Sanh; the president even had a scale model of the outpost built in the Situation Room of the White House so that he could track the course of the battle daily. He also demanded a signed affirmation from the Joint Chiefs of Staff that the base could and would be successfully defended. For both men, the landmark French defeat — likewise a siege against a hilly outpost far to the north — hung over them heavily. "I don't want any damn Dien Bien Phu," Johnson told his staff in 1967, while Westmoreland requested a thorough analysis of the 1954 battle "to ascertain that we are taking all countering actions possible in relationship to the analogous Khe Sanh situation," according to a MACV memo. Khe Sanh likewise took hold of the American public, which bought into the notion of a pivotal battle that would leave one side sprawling and the other limping to final defeat.

Westmoreland threw everything he could at Khe Sanh. During the 77-day siege, American jets flew more than 24,000 sorties, dropping 110,000 tons of bombs on the enemy positions. At one point, Westmoreland even considered the use of tactical nuclear weapons to defend the Marine garrison.

But Khe Sanh was only a prelude to an even bigger campaign: an all-out and unexpected assault on the more densely populated areas in the South, which, Hanoi hoped, would trigger a general uprising against the South Vietnamese government and the Americans. The attack, during the cease-fire for the lunar new year, known as Tet, involved close to 80,000 North Vietnamese and Vietcong fighters who had sneaked into nearly 100 hamlets, villages, cities and towns across South Vietnam.

Though caught off guard, the Americans and their allies reacted quickly and inflicted heavy casualties on the enemy force, an estimated 37,000 in the first few weeks of fighting (separate phases of the offensive, which ran into the summer, brought their losses above 100,000). But it came at great cost: The South Vietnamese lost 21,000 men; the Americans and other allies lost nearly 24,000; and tens of thousands of civilians were killed or wounded. A suicide squad of 19 Vietcong sappers breached the American Embassy grounds in Saigon — allegedly one of the most secure locations in South Vietnam. Many of the buildings in the ancient capital of Hue were totally razed during a month long battle, resulting in thousands of deaths and tens of thousands of refugees.

American forces broke the siege of Khe Sanh in April 1968 but withdrew a few months later. Afterward, North Vietnamese forces moved into the area, unopposed, and held it until 1971.

Was Westmoreland duped? Was the attack on the Marines at Khe Sanh simply a ruse to beguile the sclerotic Americans, and especially their obdurate leadership, into believing that Giap was attempting a repeat of the Dien Bien Phu victory? Or were they two separate campaigns? After all, Giap was skeptical of the Tet offensive and paid meticulous attention to Khe Sanh (and, conveniently, was sent to Hungary for medical treatment in the fall of 1967, as the planners behind Tet put the final touches on their offensive).

Duped or not, Westmoreland was replaced soon after the Tet offensive ended. The well-respected CBS newsman Walter Cronkite — a former supporter of the war — now thought the best that the United States could hope for was a "draw." Johnson chose not to run for a second term as president, and Richard Nixon was elected that fall primarily because of his promise to end the fighting. Whether Khe Sanh and Tet were part of the same campaign, they contributed equally to the emotional collapse of American support for the war, and for their leaders.

John Mason Glen is a retired college history professor who flew medical evacuation helicopters in Vietnam from 1971 to 1972.

CAPTAIN BILL PERSON 553RD RECON WING,USAF KHE SANH VETERAN

Captain Billy Joe "Bill" Person went on his last mission November 27th after a long courageous battle with cancer and COPD. Born and raised in Olney, he went on his chosen path of Boy scouts, Civil Air Patrol, graduated ROTC from North Texas into the Air Force and the Intelligence Security Services with 2 tours of Vietnam. Survived being shot down and was involved in some amazing Intelligence programs. His passion was always Flying aircraft, he loved being in the sky. An avid military historian and author of 7 books; Avatar Dawn, Critic Makers, Ravenworks Sanction, Queen Bee Delta Project and his latest Batcats as well as a lovely book "Stories Remembered from the Past" about a history of the North Texas area as well as a children's book of illustrated poems all available from Amazon. He was a successful motivational speaker and trainer at Brown and Root after his military service. Later as a rancher in Jack county with his brothers Richard and Claude as well as an Oil and Gas man. Active in VFW - Bowie, American Legion - Bowie, Khe Sanh Veterans, Forward Air Controllers, Batcats, he enjoyed attending those reunions and a brotherhood of military history writers. A very sweet loving giving man, always positive and generous to everyone

His eyes smiled and his wit always sparkled. He enjoyed being a celebrity of late with his many caregivers, Doctors, nurses and home health in the New Braunfels area who doted on the man.

The world lost a sweet good man and I lost my brother, best friend, debate partner and father. On that last Sunday evening, we watched some football, he did one of his Sudoku puzzles, had a conversation with a Vietnam marine Harrier pilot next to him and we were able to hold each other and say I love you.

He will be honored to be next to his father Claude Oliver Person WW1 and his brave uncle Aaron WW2 in our Person family home at the Hastings Oklahoma cemetery in January 2018.

A STUDY SHOWS PARASITE FROM VIETNAM MAY BE KILLING VETS

Veterans returned to the U.S. after fighting in the jungles of Vietnam a half century ago, but hundreds of them may be dying from a silent bullet — a slow-killing parasite living in the men decades after the war, a new study revealed.

Liver flukes, parasites that infect a human when raw or undercooked fish is eaten, are being investigated as the cause of a rare bile duct cancer among veterans who served in the Vietnam War. It could take years for symptoms to show up, but when they do, the host is left with tremendous pain and given just a few months to live.

The Department of Veterans Affairs this spring commissioned a small pilot study to look into the link between liver flukes and the cancer. More than 20 percent of the 50 blood samples submitted to the study came back positive or bordering positive for liver fluke antibodies, said Sung-Tae Hong, the tropical medicine specialist who carried out the tests at Seoul National University in South Korea.

Gerry Wiggins, who served in Vietnam from 1968 to 1969, agreed to take part in the study even though he didn't have any symptoms. The 69-year-old said he has already lost friends to the disease. To his surprise, liver fluke antibodies were detected in him.
"I was in a state of shock," he said. "I didn't think it would be me."

SALMONELLA POISONING SYMPTOMS AND WARNING SIGNS

Further tests showed two cysts on his bile duct what could develop into cancer known as cholangiocarcinoma. They were removed and Wiggins is doing well.

Everyone who tested positive for the antibodies was notified, Northport VA Medical Center spokesman Christopher Goodman told the Associated Press. Goodman would not comment on the findings. The parasites infect about 25 million people worldwide, mostly in Asia. It's very uncommon among Americans.

The parasites can be killed in infected humans through drugs during the early stages. But they can also live in humans without treatment for decades because no symptoms show up — much like veterans who fought in the jungles of Vietnam during the war. Over time, swelling and inflammation of the bile duct can lead to cancer. Jaundice, itchy skin, weight loss and other symptoms appear only when the disease is in its final stages.

Mike Baughman, 65, who has bile duct cancer that his doctor said was "more likely than not" caused by liver flukes, was granted a claim for service-related benefits early this year after being denied three times. Baughman was probably infected when his unit ate uncooked fish in the Vietnam jungle after they ran out of rations. He gets about $3,100 a month and said he's relieved to know his wife will continue to receive benefits after he dies. But he remains angry that other veterans' last days are consumed by fighting the same government they went to war for as young men.

"In the best of all worlds, if you came down with cholangiocarcinoma, just like Agent Orange, you automatically were in," he said, referring to benefits granted to veterans exposed to the toxic defoliant sprayed in Vietnam. "You didn't have to go fighting."

"Personally, I got what I needed, but if you look at the bigger picture with all these other veterans, they don't know what necessarily to do," he said. "None of them have even heard of it before. A lot of them give me that blank stare like, 'You've got what?'"

MOM JAILED OVER SON'S 'SENSELESS' STREP THROAT DEATH

The VA study, along with a call by Senate Minority Leader Charles Schumer of New York for broader research into liver flukes and cancer-stricken veterans, began after The Associated Press raised the issue in a story last year. The reporting found that about 700 veterans with cholangiocarcinoma have been seen by the VA in the past 15 years. Less than half of them submitted claims for service-related benefits, mostly because they were not aware of a possible connection to Vietnam. The VA rejected 80 percent of the requests, but decisions often appeared to be haphazard or contradictory, depending on what desks they landed on, the AP found.

The number of claims submitted reached 60 in 2017, up from 41 last year. Nearly three out of four of those cases were also denied, even though the government posted a warning on its website this year saying veterans who ate raw or undercooked freshwater fish while in Vietnam might be at risk. It stopped short of urging them to get ultrasounds or other tests, saying there was currently no evidence the vets had higher infection rates than the general population.

We are taking this seriously,'said Curt Cashour, a spokesman with the Department of Veterans Affairs. But until further research, a recommendation cannot be made either way."

REPLIES FROM THE KSV WEBSITE

"Untreated" water was also noted as a possible cause. I assume that didn't include mountain streams and rivers in the Khe Sanh area.

On occasion, many of the different rifle companies would be assigned to protect villages, especially around DaNang. The villagers would often trade local food for C-rations. They would cook fish, piglets and chicken but not everyone would partake. Happy Thanksgiving!

John Kaheny

When we left Khe Sahn, C/1/26 was positioned at Red Beach for a few weeks to get cleaned up and refitted for future missions. A village chief lived on the base because the VC had a bounty on his head for being friendly to the Americans. His village was on the beach facing the ocean. My platoon was tasked with taking him to the village one day for a village gathering of the elders/leaders. The good ole boys shared a luncheon of local food and discussed politics. My platoon sergeant, a second tour SSgt, was grinning as we left the base. Upon getting to the village, he said I was the "guest of honor', being the platoon commander, and would dine with the village elders. He bid me a farewell salute and said to "enjoy your meal." He knew what I was in for but I didn't.

The meal basically consisted of lumpy, dirty looking rice, mostly raw fish from the ocean catch that morning, some slightly cooked, an appetizer of raw fish eyes, nuc mong (sp) and home brewed tea and perhaps a shot of their "moonshine." The mamma sans did all of the serving of food, mostly in cracked, dirty ceramic bowls and plates and throughout the meal their second most important job was to keep shooing the flies away. Fortunately. my platoon sergeant said not to finish everything on my plate as that would mean they did not feed me enough. Thank God that was a one time deal. I did not finish much of my food, came down with dysentery 24 hrs later and was just miserable until the bug ran its course with scant medial assistance from our medical personnel. So far, no apparent symptoms of the disease mentioned in these posts. "C" rats really aren't that bad in the grand scheme of things.

DOC TOPMILLER MEMORIAL CEREMONY BY MICHAEL ARCHER

On November 11, Eastern Kentucky University hosted a wonderfully meaningful ceremony to dedicate a memorial to veterans who have given that last full measure of devotion, both during the war and after, including my friend Robert "Doc" Topmiller. The memorial sculpture was created by artist, and former Khe Sanh siege survivor, Allen Ferg. I was honored to be asked to give the keynote address (that text can be found at www.michaelarcher.net). Among other participants and guests who came to pay their respects were several other Khe Sanh

at the November 11, 2017 Veterans Day ceremony at Eastern Kentucky University to dedicate a monument in memory of my friend Robert "Doc" Topmiller and other fallen veterans. For those of you who were unable to attend, here is the text of that speech :

President Benson, Doctor Morris, distinguished guests. What an honor it is for me to be preceded at this podium by Dr. George Herring. Dr. Herring, a Navy veteran, is one of the country's leading, and most sought after, experts on U.S. foreign policy and diplomacy. But more importantly to the theme of today's ceremony, beginning in the late 1970's, when our country was still very much politically divided over the recently ended war in Vietnam, domestic unrest, Nixonian abuses of power, and the decline of American prestige abroad, Dr. Herring's balanced examination of that era in his books and treatises, helped us to understand how we had gotten to that place and were instrumental in moving this nation past that "long national nightmare."

I would also like to thank Dr. Chris Taylor and Dr. Brett Morris for inviting me here today; for their generous hospitality and for the extraordinary work they did over the last few years in advancing this meaningful project, not merely to remember those who gave that last full measure of devotion in the service of our country, but as guardians of something even more precious—their reputations. This is my fourth trip to Eastern Kentucky University and each time I return I'm pleasantly reminded of the real sense of community and spirit of purpose displayed by students and faculty. There is certainly no timelier example of that spirit than in our presence here this morning.

In 2004, I reunited with EKU history professor Robert "Doc" Topmiller, my close friend from the Vietnam War. Despite it being 34 years since we last spoke, it seemed like almost no time had passed, picking up on threads of conversations we had started back then and soon relapsing into the grim, satiric humor that we'd developed in combat—a coping mechanism I later recognized—to deal with issues that might otherwise have overwhelmed us emotionally. Doc invited me to speak to his students, and, on my first day here on campus, he took the opportunity to tease me by fabricating a darkly humorous hypothesis. In January 1968 I had been with a platoon then guarding the District Headquarters compound in Khe Sanh town when we were suddenly attacked by several hundred enemy assault troops. Though badly outnumbered, we fought for two days and then managed to escape just as we were running out of ammunition, allowing those communist forces a substantial propaganda coup from having captured, up to that point in the war, the first seat of government within South Vietnam.

Doc amusingly spun that event for his students, saying that this boost in enemy morale "created by PFC Archer's surrender," had transformed the northern forces into a juggernaut and thus was directly responsible for the fall of Saigon seven years later. Accordingly, he introduced me to each class as: "The person who single-handedly lost the Vietnam War." While most of his students knew it was a joke and laughed, there were always a few faces that remained contorted in revulsion throughout my lecture. I, of course, loved every moment of it, basking in the joy of our renewed special bond and pleased that nothing seemed to have changed over the years. But I was wrong.

By 2006, I'd come to realize my friend was now spiraling into PTSD-fueled despair, but I was encouraged that several PTSD researchers at the time were of the opinion that some of this disorder stemmed from a combat vet's sense of alienation after returning home. This was not necessarily due to being shunned, as had been experienced by most Vietnam War vets; but rather because they longed for the loyalty, trust, cooperation and self-sacrifice that typified good soldiering in battle that was not easily found in modern civilian society. As such, I naively believed that our grim but comical wartime patois at the absurdity of the human condition, was just the medicine Doc needed to overcome this; the same way it had appeared to work in combat years before. However, it proved to be far more complicated than that.

As a nineteen-year-old combat corpsman-medic during the brutal 77-day siege of Khe Sanh, Doc Topmiller had been thrust into the unimaginable position of each day having to save many, of what turned out to be, nearly 400 killed and 2,500 wounded young Americans; treating injuries ranging from relatively clean bullet holes to gaping artillery shrapnel wounds and horribly burned bodies, all within a filthy underground environment with few sophisticated medical tools at his disposal, some literally dying in his arms.

It was not until two years later, when he ended his life, that I was forced accept the reality that each wound Doc had touched at Khe Sanh, physical or not, had become his own and was painfully reminded of a doleful verse by A.E. Housman a century before: "The saviors come not home tonight. Themselves they could not save."

There is no good data on how many Vietnam veterans took their own lives because they could not cope, but no doubt many did. Psychiatrist/author Jonathan Shay suggested that fully twice as many of those veterans died by their own hand than by the enemy's. And while many PTSD researchers concede that high levels of intrusive memories among combat vets can predict the relative risk of suicide, other predictors are unclear. All we do know is that many American veterans of all wars are struggling with this life and death issue each day and more awareness of the seriousness and complexity of their plight is needed. To further that end, this academic institution dedicated a memorial bench a few years ago.

Sadly, in addition to today's unveiling of the monument commemorating those lost in war; we are also here to witness a new name being added to that bench, honoring a veteran who later succumbed to such invisible, unhealed wounds suffered in his service to our nation.

The most profound lesson I learned in my search to understand post-war trauma, is that wars do not end once the shooting stops. War ends within families. For those who we have come to honor today, the war is over. But, for those who have suffered the immeasurable sorrow of having lost a son or daughter, father or mother, brother or sister, the war never ends. And so, it is only fitting that today, and on every occasion when we stop to pay tribute to those who have made the ultimate sacrifice for their country, we never forget those they left behind with a piece missing from their lives and a perpetual anguish at "what might have been."

In battle, soldiers often bond into ties similar to a family that has been compared, since at least the time of Shakespeare's Henry V, to a "band of brothers." Among them, grief for a fallen friend can be equally intense. About eight years ago I came to know a former Marine, Allen V. Williams, who had fought at Khe Sanh, though in a different unit than mine, and had been wounded in an unsuccessful attempt retrieve the body of his close friend, Tom Mahoney. Mahoney, one of the last Americans to die at Khe Sanh, and on the very day that infamous combat base was finally abandoned, had been my high school buddy and we had joined the Marines together. My later search for Tom, and for answers to the unusual circumstances surrounding his death, became the subject of my book The Long Goodbye. It was during that research that I found Allen, who, as it turned out spent months in a New York Naval Hospital recovering from his wounds, and then had a long, accomplished career as an actor in television and Hollywood films. Despite this uncommon level of fame and success throughout his life, Allen told me: "A day never goes by that I don't think of Tommy. For a long time, I thought of trying to talk to someone about it, but for the most part, I just buried it in some deep part of my heart." Needless to say, we immediately bonded in the commonality of our grief. On Veterans Day 2010, both Allen and I received the same eloquent and heartfelt message from his daughter Carrie.

In closing, I would like to share her words with you and dedicate her sentiment to my fellow veterans here today:

"I wish you had never had to endure the tragedy and turmoil of war, or had to grow up too fast, or lose your best friends in combat. I could never understand where you have been. I can only be grateful for the impact you both have made on my life. Thank you for your service to our country, for your love of each other, and the example you set for the next generation."
Thank you.

DEDICATION OF THE FALLEN SOLDIER CROSS

RICHMOND, Ky. (WTVQ) – Tommy Fagan found his purpose in life, his sense of belonging through his service in the military.

The Richmond native returned from the battlefield, even went on to earn two degrees from Eastern Kentucky University, but like so many of his fellow soldiers, found that the scars of war never really heal. At age 34, he passed away last year from a massive seizure.

Now, however, thanks to a recent addition to the Veterans Memorial at EKU, his life of service will never be forgotten. In Veterans Day ceremonies on Saturday, Nov. 11, the University unveiled a Fallen Soldier Cross in memory of all those who lost their lives because of their service, but not while in active service.

The sculpture was fashioned by Allen Ferg, a platoon mate of fellow Vietnam veteran and former EKU history professor Dr. Robert Topmiller, another of the day's honorees. It features a bronze casting of the traditional upside-down rifle, boots and helmet, surrounded by a stainless steel sphere that "symbolizes that PTSD is not unique to America, and represents the global nature of the problems facing all warriors after they leave service," said Dr. Brett Morris, former professor of military science with the University's ROTC program, who has been involved with the Veterans Memorial project since its inception. Family members of Fagan, Topmiller and others were invited to attach replica "dog tags" to the sphere to create a wind chime effect.

Dr. Aaron Thompson, an EKU faculty member now serving as vice president of the Kentucky Council on Postsecondary Education, was a friend and mentor to Fagan, and among the speakers at the Veterans Day ceremony.

After two years in the Army, including combat in the Middle East, Fagan came home at age 21, but "he never really left Iraq and Afghanistan. He came home suffering from so much. He had flashbacks and nightmares, difficulty sleeping and trouble concentrating."

Just as he had been assisted by staff at the EKU Military and Veterans Affairs Office and others, Fagan went on to help his fellow veterans in any way he could and was a certified active volunteer at the Cincinnati VA Medical Center. In fact, he was planning to help some fellow veterans move on the day he passed away.

Fagan's name was added to a bench adjacent to the new sculpture.

The speakers also included George Herring, a professor of history at the University of Kentucky and a prominent scholar of the Vietnam War, and keynote speaker Michael Archer, whose book "The Long Goodbye: Khe Sanh Revisited" won Foreword magazine's 2016 INDIES Book of the Year award for war and military nonfiction.

"Like no other event in our history, Vietnam caused us to confront a set of beliefs as a people," Herring said, recalling the words of novelist Robert Stone, who once likened the unpopular war to a piece of shrapnel "embedded in our definition of who we are."

"Bob Topmiller (a medic at Khe Sanh) served nobly in Vietnam and was dedicated to understanding the war he had fought in," Herring said. "His tragically short life reminds us that wars don't end on the day the shooting stops."

Archer, who called himself an "old friend" of Topmiller, said, "We do know that veterans of all wars deal with life and death situations every day. For those we honor today, the war is over."

For Topmiller, the war "ended" with his passing in 2008. In a letter to the editor of The Eastern Progress, Peter Szok recalled his former teaching colleague's "open and generous spirit" and his focus on "contributing to his community and broadening his own understanding of humanity. I was particularly impressed with Bob's volunteer work, his willingness to share his knowledge with innumerable groups and his deep concern for his fellow veterans and for the people of Vietnam. It is difficult to see Bob's death as anything but a tragedy. Over the last days, I've felt a great sense of sorrow, but also an enormous feeling of privilege for having spent time with this extraordinary person."

Approximately $15,000 was raised to fund the Fallen Soldier Cross sculpture. Donations to the Veterans Memorial Fund at Eastern can still be made through the University's Development Office, online at and designating the gift to the Veterans Memorial Fund, or by mail to University Development, Coates CPO 19, Eastern Kentucky University, 521 Lancaster Ave., Richmond, Kentucky, 40475. Gifts of $100 or more are remembered by brick pavers that name the donors or someone they wish to recognize.

The Veterans Day ceremony was preceded by a special roll-call tribute to Vietnam veterans with the reading of names of the 1,100 Kentuckians killed in action in the Vietnam War. A day earlier, the campus community participated in the National Roll Call, a reading of approximately 7,000 names as part of a grassroots effort to honor service members lost in recent military conflicts.

MICHAEL ARCHER :

Grew up in northern California and served in Vietnam as a U.S. Marine in 1967-68. His books include A Patch of Ground: Khe Sanh Remembered, which VIETNAM magazine called "the best first-hand account of the battle of Khe Sanh;" A Man of His Word: The Life and Times of Nevada's Senator William J. Raggio; and, his most recent book, The Long Goodbye: Khe Sanh Revisited, chronicling his search for answers to a friend's mysterious death at Khe Sanh. The Long Goodbye was named the 2016 INDIES Book of the Year in the category of War & Military nonfiction by a panel of librarians and booksellers from among hundreds of submissions by independent publishers and university presses from across the nation.

Michael's articles and essays have appeared in The Nevada Review, Political History of Nevada 2016; Reno-Tahoe and Red Clay magazines. His research is frequently cited in works by writers of historical non-fiction. He was a technical adviser in preparing the screenplay for the 2013 short film about Khe Sanh, Guarding Charlie and was a cast member in the 2015 documentary film The Siege of Khe Sanh.

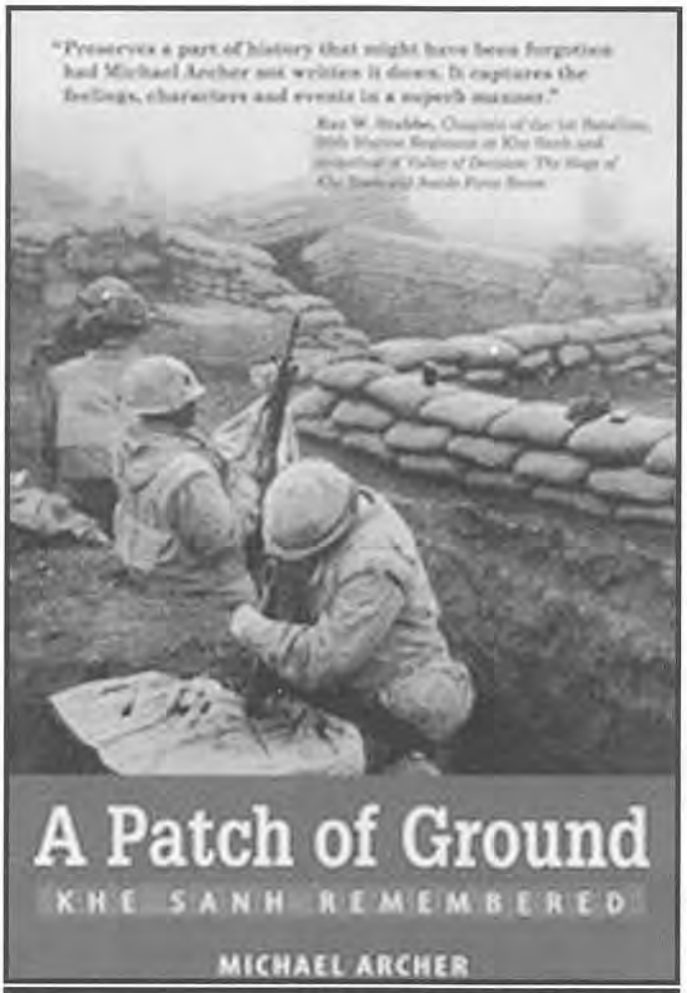
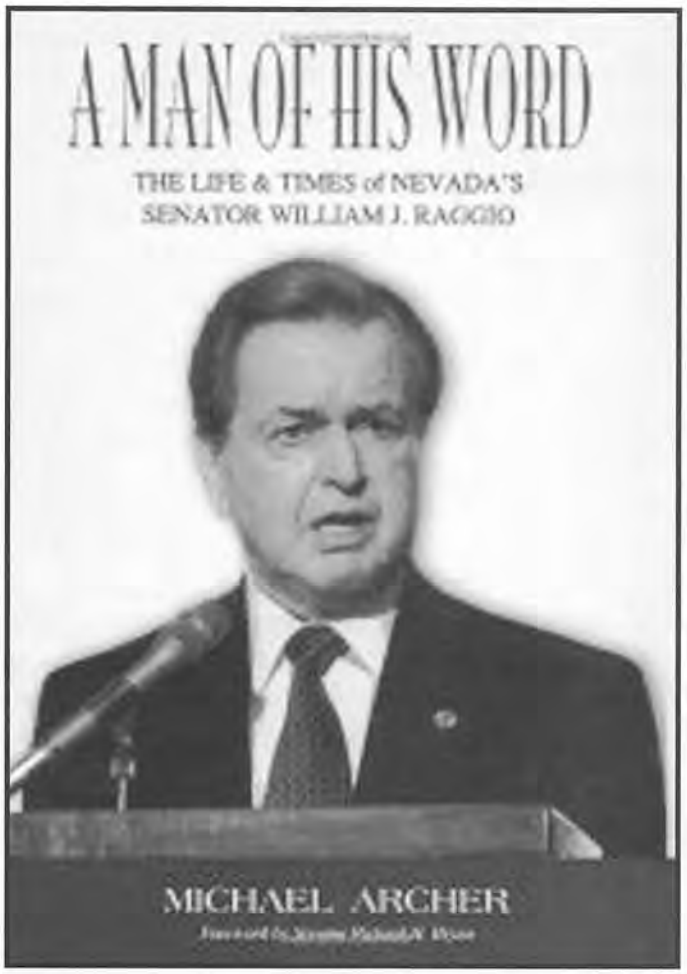
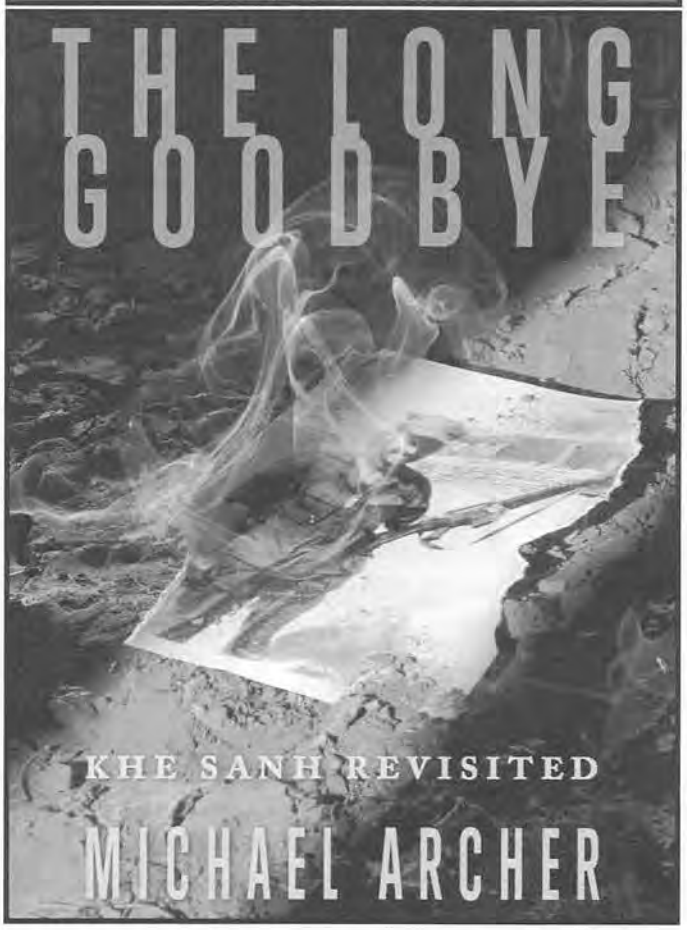
Michael has spoken at numerous universities, colleges and other venues across the country. In addition to his writing, Michael is currently a staff member with the Senate Committee on Finance of the Nevada State Legislature and lives in Reno.

And now I'll now get back to work on the final editing of my new book "The Gunpowder Prince: How Marine Captain Mirza Munir Baig Saved Khe Sanh" which is scheduled for release in early 2018. Cheers!







OBIT

MICHAEL BRADBURY, USMC KILO CO 3/26 3RD PLT, KHE SANH VETERAN

Michael D. Bradbury "Mike", 69, passed away on Thursday, Nov. 9, 2017, at his home, following an illness.

A memorial service, with military honors, was held at 11:00 a.m., on Thursday, Nov. 16, 2017, at Rost Funeral Home, McMurtrey Chapel.

Mike was born on March 22, 1948, to Benjamin Elmer Bradbury and Arva Edria Pichler in San Francisco. He graduated January 1966 from William C Overfelt in San Jose.

He joined the US Marine Corps on Feb. 14, 1966 and served in Vietnam from October 1967 to November 1968, including Khe Sanh during Tet Offensive and the Battle of Khe Sanh. He earned a Purple Heart and a Presidential Citation.

He returned to the states and in July 1969 and reenlisted into the US Air Force in September 1971. Mike retired from the Air Force, as an F-111 Crew Chief, in August of 1988.

He worked for BLM after retirement until 1997, then Marsh Aviation in Mesa, Arizona until a 2002 cancer diagnosis. He returned afterward to the place he loved, Mountain Home.

In 1972, he married Judith Annis and their son Dennis Michael Bradbury was born. In 1976 he married Susan Cutrer, and Daniel Joseph and Donna Marie were born. In 2005, he married Donna Helmandollar.

In 2006 Mike began treatment for Non-Hodgkin Lymphoma. He remained in remission until February of 2017. Mike enjoyed shooting and hunting, classic cars, old movies, playing the guitar, boxing and model cars and trains. Mike is survived by his friend and wife Donna Bradbury, son Dan Bradbury, daughter Donna Ryan, step daughters Pam Edington, and Kristina Aubert, brother Daven Bradbury, sister Robin Cassidy, and eight grandchildren. He was preceded in death by his parents, and his son Dennis.

Donations in Mike's memory can be made to the American Cancer Society, 2676 So. Vista, Boise, ID 83705.

SADOWSKI WILL FINALLY HEAR SOUNDS OF THE GAME HE LOVES

M.F. Piraino Contributing writer

Alexander Sadowski is surrounded by loud noises when he bowls in the Sackett Tract League on Thursdays at Pastimes Athletic Club.

The thud of bowling balls hitting the lanes. The sharp crash of pins scattering for strikes. The noisy chatter of bowlers waiting to bowl. But for the last 48 years, Sadowski hasn't been able to hear a pin drop.

The 67-year-old Sadowski, a Marine veteran, has been deaf since 1969, a personal price he paid while serving his country in Vietnam. He's never heard his grand children laugh . He can't talk on the phone. Family conversations at the dinner table took place without his voice.

"I've missed out on a lot," said Sadowski, who earned the Purple Heart after he was discharged. But Sadowski's silent world is changing. Earlier this year, Sadowski was approved to receive cochlear implants in both ears through the Veteran's Administration Hospital. The medical devices were surgically implanted during a five-hour procedure Nov. 7

Alexander Sadowski has bowled in the Sackett Tract League for over 30 years. Sadowski, a Marine veteran who has been deaf since 1969, recently received cochlear implants.

"I wasn't able to hear after the surgery for a few weeks while 1 was healing," Sadowski said. "But three weeks later when they were turned on I started hearing a noise. It sounded like a bird chirping."

The cochlear implants create sound for people with severe or profound hearing losses like Sadowski, who suffered permanent damage to his ear drums from constant gun blasts and mortar fire during Vietnam.

The implants bypass the damaged structures in the inner ear and directly stimulate the auditory nerve in the ear by slowing increasing sound levels. "At this stage 1 can hear some but the sound of people's voices sound like Mickey Mouse," Sadowski said. "Every day sounds get clearer. I'm on programs with different hearing levels, starting at level one. I should be able to move up to level five. By that point, I should be able to hear. It takes six months to a year before I'll hear completely."

While he adapted to his hearing loss by reading lips, Sadowski's social isolation impacted his quality of life as a father, husband and employee. Sadowski worked at R.E. Dietz for 19 years then at Carrier for 19 years but he had a hard time interpreting co-worker's words.

Sadowski's wife, Barbara, shouldered the responsibility of helping him communicate. It was a struggle for both, especially when the couple's 18-year-old son, Marc Edward, died in a car accident in 1996.

"He relied on my mom to communicate things to him," Sadowski's daughter, Jennifer Artz, said. "It definitely was difficult. She had to do all the communicating for him because he didn't understand what was being said to him."

"I missed out on a lot that my wife and children had to say throughout the years," Sadowski said. "I missed out on hearing funeral services for my parents, brothers, aunts, uncles and especially my late son.

When I was working, I had a hard time hearing my boss and co-workers."

In the near future, Sadowski will hear the voices of his bowling pals in the Sackett Tract League, a league he's bowled with for over 30 years. League members honored Sadowski for Veteran's Day and to welcome him back after surgery Nov.17

Sadowski, who is known as Harv, a nickname he received because of his affinity for Harvey Wallbanger cocktails, was taken by surprise when league members all wore matching grey T-shirts with his picture on it. Sadowski's teammate Eric Gancarz ordered and handed out to league bowlers the T-shirts with the Marine motto, Semper Fi, a Purple Heart and 'Congratulations Harv' on the front and a photo of Sadowski as a young Marine on the back. Artz and other family members were on hand for the surprise.

"Even though it's been hard to communicate with him, he's got a great personality" and we wanted to do something special for him," said Gancarz, who bowls on Sadowski's team; Harv's Hangers. Barbara Sadowski said it's rewarding to see her husband's face light up when he hears and understands people talking to him.

"This is pretty exciting," said Sadowski's wife of 45 years. "In a quiet room with no outside noise he's starting to hear my voice. He's had a hard life not being able to hear. I've had to advocate for him all the years we've been married."

After years of living in silence, Sadowski's ready to rejoin a world with filled with sound. "I'm looking forward to being able to hear everyone's voice, including my own," he said.

OBIT

DONNA ELLIOTT, SERGEANT, USA, SISTER OF JERRY ELLIOTT, MIA VIETNAM

A plaque hung near the entrance of the door which read, "Only she who attempts the absurd can achieve the impossible." This was how Donna Elaine Elliott, born on April 26, 1951, in Greenville, Mississippi, experienced life until October 22, 2017.

Along with a career in community organizing which resulted in the free school breakfast program being congressionally mandated in all Mississippi schools with below poverty level students, Donna achieved the rank of Sergeant in the U.S. Army Reserves, earned the Army Commendation and Achievement awards, a U.S. Army Forces Command Fourth Estate Award, and three Fifth U.S. Army Minaret awards for excellence in military photo journalism; authored the book. "Keeping the Promise: the story of MIA Jerry Elliott"; and dedicated innumerable hours and trips to Southeast Asia in an effort to account for all U.S. POW/MIA's.

She loved animals and nature, was a talented photographer, liked the feel of warm garden dirt between her fingers, the thrill of reeling in a big fish, canoeing and camping, and was always up for a road trip adventure, but her greatest joy was family and friends. Donna was always just a phone call away if someone had a problem. Her son often told her she should hang out a shingle that read: "1-800-I-Listen."

Daughter of the late William Stafford and Mary Richardson Elliott, she was preceded in death by an older brother, Vietnam MIA SSGT Jerry William Elliott; and a little sister, Cindy Ann Elliott. A resident of Pleasant Grove, Arkansas since 1984, she is survived by her steadfast companion of 24 years, Storm Sterling Minick; a son and best friend, William Jerry Randolph Berry, Pleasant Grove, Arkansas; three beloved grandsons, Thomas Roy Fuller, Taiwan; William Samuel Wayne Berry and William Maxwell Elliott Berry both of Mountain View, Arkansas; several exceptional brothers and sisters by choice and her dog pal, Wilson.

A memorial service celebrating Donna's life was held Saturday, October 28, 2017, 2:00PM at Roller Coffman Chapel in Mountain View, Arkansas with Brother Danny Robbins officiating.

Military honors were provided by the Stone County Honor Guard.

LT COL JAMES BASCOM WILKINSON, USMC, C/O 1/26 KHE SANH VETERAN

Lt Col. James Bascom Wilkinson, (USMC, ret) 87, passed away peacefully at home in Dallas, Texas of complications from Congestive Heart Failure on December 1, 2017.

Born in Vicksburg, Mississippi on July 28, 1930 to Fay and John Wilkinson, he joined the Marine Corps at 18, later graduating from the University of Alabama while in the service. Serving in the Vietnam War as an Infantry Battalion Commander during 1967-68, he survived the deadly Khe Sanh siege and was later featured in the oral history book, "Khe Sanh: Siege in the Clouds", and in David Douglas Duncan's book, "War Without Heroes." He was honored with the Legion of Merit with Combat V for his distinguished services while in combat with the enemy in Khe Sanh.

After retiring at 39 as a Lt. Colonel and moving to Hilton Head Island, he became a Financial Consultant in the Savannah offices of Merrill Lynch. He subsequently held Merrill Lynch management positions in Dallas, Charleston and Memphis where he served on the Memphis Symphony Board, the Theater Board, as President of the Arts Appreciation Council and Junior Warden of the Calvary Episcopal Church. After retiring in 1995, he and his wife Nancy lived first on Hilton Head Island, where he served as a board member and driver for Meals on Wheels, before settling for many years in Cashiers, North Carolina, where he served a term of President of the Sheep Laurel Homeowners Association and was a member of the vestry for the Church of the Good Shepherd.

Preceded in death by his son in-law Chip Thompson. He is survived by his wife Nancy, his daughters Sabra Thompson and Shannon Wilkinson , Catherine McCarthy and husband Chuck, son , Dwight Emanuelson, Jr and wife Claire and 6 grandchildren; James Marion, Ashley Shannon and Sabra Elizabeth Thompson, Hillis Emanuelson and wife Lindsey, James Emanuelson , and Charles K McCarthy Hillis Emanuelson and his wife Lindsey , James Emanuelson, Charles K NcCarthy , Jr , He was an avid reader and writer for The Marine Corp Gazette and The Leatherneck He had a special appreciation for the Marine Corps and remained in close touch with his many Vietnam troops long after the war ended. "My decision to join the Marine Corps was a very wise move by a young Mississippi lad," he once commented, recalling that after going through new recruit training in 1948 his monthly income was approximately $96.00.

GARY MARKWARDT, USMC
KILO CO 3/26
KHE SANH VETERAN

Gary Markwardt was born September 10, 1945, in Cando, North Dakota to William and Clara Markwardt.

He grew up on a farm near Bisbee, North Dakota and graduated from Bisbee High in 1963. Gary was drafted into the U.S. Marine Corps in 1966 where he served 13 months in Vietnam and the battle of Khe Sanh.

Gary was honorably discharged from the Marine Corps as a corporal in 1968. Gary moved to Oxnard, CA where he met Patty Tourtellotte and married in 1969. Gary received his degree in criminal justice from Oxnard College while working full time and helping raise his three children Michael, Lisa and William.

Gary became a Ventura County Sheriff's Deputy in 1974 until 1977 when Gary and Patty moved to Spokane, WA. Gary became a Pend Oreille County Deputy in 1979 until 1985 when he took a position as a resident deputy at Priest Lake, ID for Bonner County. In 1987 Gary accepted a job as a Newport City Police officer and later became the Chief of Police. Gary retired from law enforcement in 1998.

Upon retirement, Gary worked as a custodian for the Newport School District until 2001 when he went to work for the Northern Quest Casino as a security officer until 2010 when he and Patty fully retired together.

Gary enjoyed his family more than anything but especially his grandchildren. Gary and Patty enjoyed the summers in Newport, WA and the winters in Yuma, AZ where they had close friends and family.

Gary passed unexpectedly at his home in Newport, WA on October 3, 2017.

Gary was preceded in death by his father William, mother Clara, sister Ruth and brothers Duane and Gene. He is survived by wife Patty; sons Michael and William; daughter Lisa; sisters Janet, Linda, Carol, Nita and many grandchildren and great-grandchildren.

Services for Gary were held on Tuesday October 10, 2017 at Sherman-Campbell Funeral Home in Newport, WA at 2:00pm with a celebration of life to follow at Kelly's. Military Honors burial were held on Wednesday, October 11, 2017 at Washington State Veterans Cemetery in Medical Lake, WA at 2:15.

2 PERCENT FEDERAL RETIREMENT COLA SET FOR JANUARY

By Eric Yoder
October 13, 2017 at 9:47 AM
Submitted By Larry McCartney

Most federal retirees will see their annuity benefits increase by 2 percent in January, the largest inflation-based increase since 2012 and an amount about in line with what current federal employees stand to receive as a pay raise.

The cost of living adjustment, or COLA, reflects the increase in a consumer price index measure from the third calendar quarter of one year to the next. The calculation was finalized Friday after taking into account inflation in September.

The impact on benefits will differ between the two main federal retirement systems. While more than nine-tenths of current federal employees are under the Federal Employees Retirement System — which generally covers those first hired after 1983 — two-thirds of the 2.1 million federal retirees draw benefits from the older Civil Service Retirement System.

The CSRS program provides for a full COLA adjustment to all retirees regardless of age. The average monthly annuity under that program is about $3,600, meaning that the increase will be worth about $72 monthly on average.

Those retired under CSRS do not receive Social Security benefits due to their federal service, although they may be eligible for Social Security benefits from other employment. However, in most cases, an offset would reduce the Social Security payments.

Under FERS, an inflation adjustment isn't paid until age 62, except for those who retired due to disability or from certain occupations that require earlier retirement. The average monthly civil service benefit under FERS is about $1,400, yielding an average increase, for those eligible, of $28.

Those retired under FERS are eligible for Social Security benefits under standard rules and those receiving that benefit — which generally cannot begin earlier than age 62 — will see that payment boosted by 2 percent as well.

Both of the federal retirement programs increase benefits to survivors regardless of their age; there are about 530,000 of them, with average benefits of about $1,600 a month under CSRS and about $600 a month under FERS.

Federal employee and retiree organizations commonly bench mark the COLA figure against the average increase in premiums for the following year in the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program, which for 2018 will rise by 6.1 percent on average. In the Blue Cross-Blue Shield standard option that is the most popular among retirees, for example, the increases per month will be $15.54 for self-only coverage, $36.92 for self plus one, and $38.39 for family coverage. However, premium rates and annual changes vary substantially among plans, and in an open season starting Nov. 13, retirees and other enrollees may change plans for 2018.

Related: [Federal employee health insurance premiums to rise by 6.1 percent]

The COLA is also commonly compared with the pay raise for current employees, although the two are determined in different ways. While the COLA adjustment for retirees is set automatically by the inflation count, raises for current employees are decided in the annual federal budget process.

So far this year, Congress has been silent regarding a raise, following its practice of recent years of allowing a raise to be paid each January by default, as federal pay law provides if no number is enacted. President Trump has set the default raise at 1.9 percent.

Related: [Q&A for federal workers: 1.9 percent pay raise looking likely]

Part of that raise would be set aside and parceled out in amounts that would vary by locality, resulting in raises that would vary from slightly below 1.9 percent to slightly above. Precise numbers would be set later in the year. However, if any other figure is enacted to law before the end of the year, that figure would prevail.

MASSENA MAN RECALLS 1968 BATTLE OF KHE SANH
JAMES BAKER HQ CO 1/13

WATERTOWN DAILY NEWS

MASSENA — For members of the 26th Marines (Reinforced), 3rd Marine Division (Reinforced), the 1968 battle at Khe Sanh in Vietnam was an intense 77 days of fighting.

But, for Massena veteran James Baker, the years can't erase the memories.
"It was the longest siege in American history, 77 days," he said.

The battle was costly. As they faced an army of 35,000 North Vietnam Regulars, the casualties began to mount.

"We have a list of 2,097 dead," Mr. Baker said, as well as 2,600 wounded.

A directory published by a Khe Sanh veteran's organization keeps updates on the number of men who died. The directory indicates who died, when they died and what unit they were with in Khe Sanh. He said the North Vietnamese Regulars suffered the same fate.

"They lost in excess of 15,000," he said.

The 26th Marines (Reinforced) had been assigned to hold the Khe Sanh Combat Base and positions on Hills 881, 861A, 558 and 950, which dominated strategic enemy approach routed into Northern I Corps. But they found themselves surrounded by a force of 35,000 North Vietnamese Regulars who were determined to destroy the Khe Sanh Combat Base in conjunction with large-scale offensive operations in the two northern provinces of the Republic of Vietnam.

"We lived underground for 77 days. We weren't aware at the time how many there were," Mr. Baker said.

They faced a daily barrage of hundreds of rounds of intensive artillery, mortar and rocket fire, in addition to fierce ground attacks in an area that Mr. Baker said was a mile long and a half-mile wide. They were so close, he said, that they could hear the enemy talking at night and when it was foggy.
But they couldn't shoot them because they couldn't see them, he said.

To support the Marine base, a massive aerial bombardment campaign called Operation Niagara was launched by the United States Air Force. More than 100,000 tons of bombs were dropped by U.S. aircraft and over 158,000 artillery rounds were fired in defense of the base.

"There were holes so big you could set a 10-story building inside some of them," Mr. Baker said.

They may have been outmanned, but the Marines stood their ground and contributed substantially to the failure of the Viet Cong and North Vietnamese Army winter/spring offensive.

In March 1968, an overland relief expedition called Operation Pegasus was launched by a combined Marine–Army/South Vietnamese task force that eventually broke through to the Marines at Khe Sanh. But American commanders ultimately decided to dismantle the base rather than risk similar battles in the future.

In the aftermath, the North Vietnamese proclaimed a victory at Khe Sanh, while U.S. forces claimed that they had withdrawn as the base was no longer required.

"We abandoned the base. That's why they claimed it," said David Jackman, commander of Amvets Post 4.

"We never lost a major battle," said Fred Cockayne, commander of Disabled American Veterans Chapter 171.

By the time the Vietnam War came to a close, more than 58,000 Americans had died. But, Mr. Baker said, they had left their mark.

"I think we really did stop the spread of communism," he said.

Fifty years ago on Christmas Day 1967 the officers of Lima Company Third Battalion Fourth Marines gathered in front of the Lima Company Command Post bunker with battalion commander Lee Bendell near a strong point called The Washout. The Washout connected nearby Con Thien, within sight of the Demilitarized Zone, to combat bases C-2 and C-3 to the south and the east-west Route 9 in Quang Tri Province. The following month, Lima Company engaged main force NVA regulars twice just east of Con Thien and again on Route 9, near Camp Carroll. In savage battles, on 18 January Lt. Hoare was KIA and Capt. Carr wounded and medevaced. Lt. Christy was wounded and medevaced a week later at the battle of Mike's Hill near Camp Carroll. Lt. Joyner was KIA south of Khe Sanh in June 1968.

Lima Company's experience was typical of Marine infantry units near the DMZ in 1967-68, which struggled to fill officer and enlisted leadership billets due to high casualty rates.

OBIT

LT COL MARK F. TIERNEY USMC, M CO 3/7 & HQ 3/7, KHE SANH VETERAN Submitted By Larry McCartney Echo Co 2/26

With the heaviest of hearts I must report that at 11:40 A.M. on February 6, 2005—Super Bowl Sunday—a true American hero, Lieutenant Colonel Mark Freeman Tierney, USMCR (Retired) died in his Lake Ridge, Virginia home as a result of several Agent Orange related cancers. Lieutenant Colonel Tierney, recipient of the Silver Star Medal and the Purple Heart Medal with one (1) Gold Star as well as a host of other combat and service decorations, is one of the finest Marines with whom I ever served during my thirty (30) year Active Duty and Reserve career.

Lieutenant Colonel Tierney joined the Marine Corps Reserve in 1964 and after graduation from Boot Camp as his platoon's Honor Man he was trained as a Communicator, then he reported for duty with a Reserve artillery unit near his home in the Philadelphia, Pennsylvania area.

Upon completing college in 1968 Lieutenant Colonel Tierney, though eligible for promotion to Staff Sergeant, accepted a commission and volunteered to serve in the Republic of Vietnam. After he was trained as an Infantry Officer and Vietnamese linguist, he reported for duty as a Platoon Commander with Mike Company, 3rd Battalion, 7th Marine Regiment, 1st Marine Division. Subsequently Lieutenant Colonel Tierney served as a Civil Affairs Officer for Headquarters, 1st Marine Division and made many trips into Khe Sanh to help the people there.

While I did not have the good fortune to meet Lieutenant Colonel Tierney until 1991 when we were both mobilized for the Gulf War—he was the II Marine Expeditionary Force (II MEF) Staff Counter Intelligence Officer and I was the 2nd Marine Expeditionary Brigade (2nd MEB) Intelligence Chief—I was fortunate to serve under him near continuously from that point until he retired from the Marine Corps in 1995 after more than thirty one (31) years of officer and enlisted service. While he was my senior in the Corps, in life I was extraordinarily fortunate to have him for a mentor and a friend; he is the first person I could ever talk to about the events occurring at and after LZ Margo in September of 1968 and the grief those incidents caused me.

I have long believed that the measure of the man is in how he treats those who can't do anything for him in return and that description epitomizes Lieutenant Colonel Tierney; when I was sick last December he is the one who made sure I got to the hospital and then home when I was released, he was the one who took me to have my stitches put in and later removed, then he went into the hospital. While in the hospital he asked me for some addresses and envelopes since he wanted to make advance tax payments so his wife wouldn't have to and at the same time he made sure he made a donation to our association knowing full well it would be his last one. He died just five (5) weeks later.

I will cherish the mentorship and friendship Lieutenant Colonel Tierney gave me until my dying day. In an era when people have a warped idea of leadership, he was the finest leader I ever worked for; his philosophy was simple, give your Marines a job, make sure they have what they need to do the job, then get the hell out of their way and let them accomplish their mission; he was never surprised at how his Marines always produced.

On February 17, 2005, Lieutenant Colonel Mark Freeman Tierney, USMC (Retired)—October 19, 1942 to February 6, 2005—was buried with full military honors in plot 2733, Section 69 at Arlington National Cemetery.

God Bless and keep you Colonel Tierney. The streets of heaven are well-guarded now that you've reported for duty Sir. SEMPER FIDELIS!!!

THE KIND OF NEWSMAN WE NEED THE HOMEWOOD FLOSSMOOR CHRONICLE

WATCHING HISTORY UNFOLD WHEN TV NEWS WAS ESSENTIAL VIEWING

By Tom Houlihan on December 8, 2017 - 8:21pm

HE'S STILL A NEWSMAN.

When I interviewed Russ Bensley at the start of November, he detailed his years as a senior producer for CBS News during what is generally considered the golden age of broadcast journalism. Bensley, who lives in Flossmoor, was the producer of the "CBS Evening News" when Walter Cronkite was "the most trusted man in America."

He did on-the-street TV interviews in Chicago after President John F. Kennedy's assassination in 1963. When Richard Nixon resigned during the Watergate scandal, Bensley produced the story. He was on the scene during at least one early NASA launch from Cape Canaveral. And he was severely wounded while covering a story during the Vietnam War.

Toward the end of our discussion, though, he had a question for me.

"Why are there so many traffic arrests for revoked licenses in Homewood?" he asked. "I think that would be a good story for the Chronicle."

LIKE I SAID STILL A NEWSMAN

Bensley said he has seen the Homewood police blotter in another newspaper and has never understood why there are so many citations for revoked licenses.

I had to admit that I had no answer to his question and agreed that it sounded like a good story. I meant what I said, too. When you are talking to someone who has had a legendary journalism career, it's best to tell the truth

Google "Russ Bensley CBS News" and you find scores of internet items about his career. The first one I found was his video analysis of a news story about lethal nails used in a helicopter weapons system during the Vietnam conflict. It was originally used at the Columbia University School of Journalism and shows Bensley describing all the elements that go into a TV news story

The clip, about 20 minutes long, provides a thorough analysis of what would have been state-of-the-art broadcast journalism in the early 1970s. More than 40 years later, it is still a valuable primer on how to tell an effective, meaningful story.

Bensley began his career at CBS in Chicago as a radio news writer. It was 1951 and he was a journalism student at Northwestern University. He'd grown up in Chicago's Hyde Park neighborhood and wanted to work for a newspaper.

"I'd been the editor of both my grade school and high school newspaper," he said.

WBBM came to Northwestern looking for a news writer and Bensley was picked for the job. He worked three hours a day at the WBBM studio at the Wrigley Building. After graduation, he took a full-time job and later entered the brave new world of television news when WBBM-TV was launched in 1953. At the young TV station, he worked with people who would become famous in Chicago journalism — Fahey Flynn, Lee Phillip and Irv Kupcinet. He was mostly a writer but occasionally appeared on air, most notably on a late night news show.

In 1960, Bensley was hired by CBS News and moved to New York. Historic events were rapidly unfolding as television turned to technology that made it possible to show them as they happened — the Cold War, the Space Race, the Civil Rights Movement and the Vietnam-era protests.

I asked Bensley what he was proudest of during his years at CBS News.

"I was always proud when we got the story done on time," he said.

Then he told me about one of his personal attributes that added to his success.

"You know my major talent was that I could type real fast," he said. "We'd get raw film of someone talking and I'd sit there at a big Royal typewriter, type up a rough transcript of the interview. If I saw something that was important, I'd circle it in the transcript so that the film editor would get it into the story."

Bensley was recently interviewed by Decades, a cable television channel, for a documentary, "Eye on the World: The Rise of Walter Cronkite and the Evening News."

He told me that he generally got along with Cronkite, the longtime anchorman on the "CBS Evening News" who had a reputation as an "800 pound gorilla."

He could be tough," Bensley said of Cronkite. "If he wanted something, he'd insist on it."

Every day, Bensley said, producers and writers of Cronkite's news program would work to come up with an acceptable "magic number" of how long the iconic anchorman would be on camera during each broadcast.

During the 1968 Tet Offensive, which is often regarded as a turning point in the Vietnam War, Bensley traveled to Khe Sanh, a Marine outpost under siege by North Vietnamese Army units. Before his trip, he'd been in Tokyo reviewing raw film from Vietnam before it was sent to the U.S.

On the day after his arrival in Khe Sanh, Bensley was with a group of Marines when a mortar shell exploded in their midst. He was not badly hurt but was taken to the base hospital. The next day, the hospital was hit by a round from a 122-mm howitzer and Bensley was badly hurt. His spleen was removed at a military hospital and he was evacuated to Toyko for recuperation.

"I asked the doctor about losing the spleen and he said I'd probably be OK as long as I stayed away from countries where malaria was a problem," he said.

Bensley was with CBS Evening News between 1963 and 1972, serving as senior and executive producer. After that, he worked as a special projects producer until his retirement from CBS in 1985. After that, he and his wife and family moved to Niles, Mich., where they ran a horse farm. His wife, Pat Bannon — she had also worked for CBS — grew up in Homewood, and they moved back to the village in 2003. Bensley moved to Flossmoor three years ago and now lives with his daughter, Vicki Burke Stevenson, and her family.

I was honored to meet him. He made me want to be better at this journalism business, and I just may start by looking for an answer about those traffic arrests.

A NICE PLACE FOR A VISIT

OUTSIDE CHARLESTON, THREE ACRES OF VIETNAM LIVE IN SOUTH CAROLINA'S LOW COUNTRY

BY JOHN BORDSEN

In the light Low country rain and high heat of late-summer South Carolina, bamboo was growing just outside the fenced perimeter of a three-acre addition to Patriots Point Naval & Maritime Museum near Charleston.

Large relics from the Vietnam War, including various helicopters, are on view throughout Vietnam Experience near Charleston, S.C. (John Bordsen/For The Washington Post)

Above a mix of military equipment and drab-painted plywood buildings surrounding the compound, mounted speakers punched out the screeches of jungle birds and the droning chirps of crickets — along with the muffled booms of far-off artillery shells and the whoomp-whoomp-whoomp of helicopter blades.

None of it was foreign to Ray Tanner, a wiry 74-year-old who had recently moved back home to Cades, a hamlet about an hour north in the Palmetto State. To him, the clamor of incoming Hueys was the best sound he had ever heard.

"I looked for it," he said, his shirt bearing the crest of the Army's 1st Battalion, 7th Cavalry Regiment. "It meant they were getting us out of here."

"Here" was wartime Vietnam. And a half-century later, he was walking through a re-creation of it, a permanent exhibit called Vietnam Experience.

Tanner was a radio operator who did 11 months in Vietnam. He was a forward observer whose battalion spent 2½ days in the Ia Drang Valley in late 1965. Ia Drang, in the Central Highlands, was one of the first battles in Vietnam that featured large American units. It was the subject of "We Were Soldiers Once ... and Young," a 1992 bestseller and a 2002 movie.

"There were 64 killed," Tanner said of his battalion, "but nobody was left behind."

A FOCUS ON PEOPLE

Patriots Point is a major Charleston attraction operated through a state agency of the same name. Its centerpiece is the USS Yorktown, the famed World War II aircraft carrier decommissioned in 1970 and relocated to Mount Pleasant five years later.

Linked to Charleston by the stunning Arthur Ravenel Jr. Bridge and directly across the Cooper River from tourist-choked downtown landmarks, shops and restaurants, the complex is a draw for veterans, their families and school groups. A submarine and a destroyer are also permanently moored at Patriots Point.

Vietnam Experience, which opened in 2014 on formerly undeveloped land behind the warships, is included in Patriots Point's admission price. Many cities and states have Vietnam memorials; the Vietnam Veterans Memorial in Washington has spawned permanent and touring Wall replicas. But the walk-through Vietnam Experience — portraying a Mekong Delta naval support base and a Marine artillery base set in Khe Sanh — is a tourism outlier. Still, Dick West, 72, who runs the volunteer program at Patriots Point, says that 2017 attendance at Patriots Point is expected to top 300,000. Like Charleston, it attracts visitors from across North America, Europe and Asia.

At the exhibit's entrance, a wall holds military chains identifying the 896 South Carolinians who died in Vietnam. (John Bordsen/For The Washington Post)

A mock-up of the Mekong Delta naval support base features a shallow-bottom "brown water" patrol boat. (John Bordsen/For The Washington Post)

Overseas conflicts great and small are hard to physically project beyond museum dioramas. Factor in the enduring home-front division over the Vietnam War, and Vietnam Experience could seem a marketing land mine.

But the exhibit steers clear of controversy: The timelines avoid politics and strategic second-guessing, and instead focus on what American grunts went through.

You don't hear brass-band patriotic tunes emanating from the replica barracks. It's "Born to Be Wild," "Green Tambourine" and other hits that were audio touchstones to home from a distant and dangerous jungle.

Large relics include a shallow-bottom "brown water" patrol boat, choppers (including two Cobra gunships), field artillery and a Viet Cong dugout. A Quonset hut displays M-1s and other rifles, maps and other paraphernalia. The Quonset and a building toward the back hold small theaters that loop footage about Americans in Vietnam. Roughly 2.7 million of them served there; about 58,000 were killed in action.

etnam Experience. There is a strong sense on the grounds — via signage wording and spectator comments — that this is a belated welcome home for those who returned from the fog of war to find no parade. "Thank you for your service" is a frequent call-out to seniors whose caps or clothes mark them as vets.

So, the best way to see Vietnam Experience is with someone who was on the ground in Southeast Asia.

TWO SOLDIERS

Tanner strolled the grounds with the soft-spoken West. Their hitches in Vietnam were quite different. A country boy who could hunt, Tanner was prime enlistment bait. West was in Army ROTC while studying engineering at the University of Florida. Tanner was in trenches, facing incoming fire. West served in 1969 as a first lieutenant in an engineering group, the U.S. Army Engineer Construction Agency, often heading to military construction sites in a low-flying, twin-engine Beechcraft — an easy target.

Tanner slept in pup tents, then larger tents; West's crews built plywood-and-sheet-metal barracks that came after the war's escalation brought more manpower and money.

Tanner climbed the wooden observation tower in the exhibit's Delta area and handled the .50-caliber Browning mounted there. If you pull the trigger, you'll hear a recording of machine-gun fire. From the tower platform, the top of the nearby USS Yorktown can't be seen; only the peak of the distant bridge rises above the dense tree line.

West and Tanner found common ground on their walk. The choppers and equipment were familiar, as was the back acreage set up as a Marine fire base at Khe Sanh, the remote outpost that was a scene of fierce fighting in early 1968, just before and during the Tet Offensive.

[In a limited engagement, fireflies blink in sync in Great Smoky Mountains]

Aside from a tipped-over tank, the fire base mock-up is set before that event. The vets discussed the different ways that barbed-wire perimeters were built; they smiled at the counter in the primitive PX and its limited supply of 1960s chewing gum, soft drinks and Playboy magazines. They appreciated the outpost's raised plank walkways, which were easy to build and kept you above the ever-present mud. They agreed that the latrine was an accurate reproduction, and that the worst duty you could pull was having to top a filled metal barrel with diesel fuel, light it and wait until the contents were reduced to ash.

One plywood building holds a small cinema where the hologram of a Marine sergeant warns of increased enemy activity around Khe Sanh. The image fades and a screen erupts with a montage of close-up archival battle footage and big-volume sound. It is terrifying.

Tanner and West waited outside; they had seen it before. This show is not for everybody: Signs warn that even veterans may not be able to handle it. Patriots Point, sensitive to the hazards of post-traumatic stress disorder, has similar advisory signs posted throughout Vietnam Experience.

In the interest of healing, Patriots Point provides the Ralph A. Johnson Veterans Affairs Medical Center in Charleston with no-cost tickets, and the exhibit is used by the hospital for repeat-exposure therapy. Patients arrive and leave as they wish, melting into the crowd.

"When we incorporate Patriots Point into therapy, it is often a challenging and potentially very healing experience for those with combat PTSD," psychologist Ashley Hatton said.

After his service, Tanner returned to his native South Carolina and worked for 28 years in Charleston as a transportation manager for a utility. His first visit to Vietnam Experience was shortly after it opened, when he was organizing a reunion for vets. "I had no apprehension at all," Tanner said. "When I'm there with vets, I'm there with some of our own. We talk about that — now. [Before,] nobody ever asked me about Ia Drang, and most of us put it behind us. Now, I'm at an age when I don't mind talking about it. I look at it differently now."

Tanner has been involved in organizing veterans reunions for 25 years. "We don't sit around and tell war stories; we're like family," he said. "The people I knew over there were cohesive. We always liked one another."

A walk-through always triggers one emotion, Tanner said: "I feel pride in the recognition that we were really good soldiers. That's something 'We Were Soldiers Once' helped start to make clear."

West and Tanner were still comparing notes as they headed back to the Patriots Point gate. They agreed that uniforms were always wet in semitropical Vietnam, and one of the easiest ways to dry them was to hold them up to the exhaust pipe of a chopper.

"The uniforms were unique to the jungle," West said. "They were built to last a year. When yours began to fall apart, you knew your time there was almost through."

HELL ON A HILL AT KHE SANH HILL 861A, BY BARRY FIXLER, ECHO CO 2/26

For nearly 80 days, Marines on the hills surrounding Khe Sanh endured one of the war's fiercest fights.

The top of what became known as Hill 861-A was just virgin land covered with elephant grass and bamboo when I first saw it. My company, Echo 2/26, had to claw through the dense vegetation and up the steep slopes of what would soon be transformed into a bomb-scarred hilltop with trenches reminiscent of World War I.

All we knew in mid-January 1968 was that we were leaving Phu Bai for a place called Khe Sanh and were loaded down with war gear, all that we could carry. I only knew of it as a company operation, and how it affected me, Lance Cpl. Barry Fixler. I was unaware that we were part of a huge, regiment-size operation. None of us had a clue.

As our company piled onto C-130 transport planes, it seemed that this operation might be a little bigger than most. We were going to an area closer to the Demilitarized Zone (DMZ) than Phu Bai, so it probably would be worse, but I was a seasoned Marine with six months of combat, so I was unworried, confident.

The DMZ was anything but demilitarized. It was intended to exist as a zone free from any military presence by either North or South for a limited period until national unification elections took place. But history didn't follow the diplomats' script. The zone and the areas around it saw some of the greatest destruction and carnage of the war.

After landing at the Khe Sanh combat base and getting ourselves organized, we humped outside the lines and into the fields. We dug in on a small hill the first couple of nights. There was no outpost. We were the only Marines there, and we still did not know our objective or what was actually happening. There was an eerie feeling about the place. Whatever we were doing, it wasn't routine. We knew that we were in a bad spot; we just didn't know how bad. We finally ended up at the base of a steep hill, a mountain almost, about 2,500 feet high. There was only one overgrown trail, so the 150 or so of us started up it in a single column. It took hours to climb in the oppressive heat.

I carried a rocket launcher that looked like a huge bazooka, my M-16 rifle and ammunition, all my grenades, my gas mask and a minimum of two rockets. The heavy load required both of my hands, so I couldn't use them to help myself up the trail, and we still had to be alert for an ambush. We were spread too thin and were very vulnerable. The North Vietnamese troops must have been able to see us. I still think we were lucky to reach the top without being slaughtered.

We were the first Marines on Hill 861-A. Not a soul was there, just wild grass, bamboo and other vegetation all over the place. We had obscured lines of sight, which would make it difficult to find targets if someone started shooting at us. The enemy could have sneaked up to within 10 feet of us and we would not have been able to see him. So the first thing we did was to start digging in.

Darkness was falling on us fast, and we were totally out of water. The only moisture we found was on bamboo shoots that were covered with mites. Desperate, we snapped the bamboo rods and put our tongues to them to catch the drops of water as they trickled out.

For the next two or three days, we continued to entrench ourselves and clear lines of fire. Someone erected an American flag. We didn't get the barbed wire and concertina razor wire emplaced around our position for about a week. Fortunately, the North Vietnamese didn't zero in on us quickly.

Nearby Hill 861 was already getting pounded and had been overrun once, and within three days we were catching mortars and rockets on 861-A. As each day grew more intense, we got the feeling that we might be there for awhile; we had no idea that it would turn into 77 days of hell.

The North Vietnamese Army (NVA) became increasingly better at aiming their weapons at us. They would rain mortars up and down the lines. Ba-boom! Ba-boom! Ba-boom! We were even hit by our own artillery a few times. Things like that just happened, and we felt helpless against it.

The first week of February, the North Vietnamese really turned it on. Rockets and mortars were almost constant. On February 4, a helicopter came in to evacuate the wounded and bring in some replacements and supplies. As the new guys ran off the chopper, I ran onboard to offload supplies.

Heavy rockets and mortars showered the landing zone, and as the chopper lifted off, I leaped into a trench and ended up next to one of the new guys. He had been in Vietnam for a day or two, and on the hill for all of one minute. He was clearly shaken by the intensity of the situation.

"How long you been in-country?" he asked.
"Six months," I told him.

"How could you live that long? How's that possible?" he wanted to know.

I remember the conversation because the new Marine's name reminded me of the actor Humphrey Bogart. I also remember he was killed the next day, when we were totally overrun.

Too many Marines were killed on Hill 861-A that day, February 5, 1968. The North Vietnamese swarmed in from all directions and were all over the hill. Three or four Marines were right there when the first NVA popped up, and they just got overrun. The shooting was intense, and waves of enemy soldiers just kept coming, coming, coming.

Everything went down at once: artillery, rockets, mortars, small arms, bayonets, even tear gas. It took us the entire night to kill all the North Vietnamese who had gotten into our lines.

I heard more of the fighting than I saw that night. The enemy was swarming over and through our trenches, and there was a serious risk of shooting one of our own guys. Another Marine and I instinctively ended up with our backs to each other, holding our position in the trench line. It was total chaos, pitch black, and the constant explosions from rockets, artillery and grenades created a strobe light effect.

We used gas grenades on the NVA. Tear gas is heavier than air, and it blew back on us and filled our trenches, forcing us to wear our gas masks. This limited our vision even more. But even looking through the mask eyepieces, one of the first things you could see was that a lot of the guys were dead or seriously wounded. Our ears rang from the constant explosions, and each flash of light from the blasts briefly illuminated a portrait of death.

It felt like I had been blindfolded and spun around 50 times. Then they take off the blindfold, flip the lights on and off, and blast your ears with noise loud enough to make your nose bleed. And, at the same time you have to try to identify and shoot the enemy—all night long. We lost a lot of Marines that day. They can't simulate that experience in boot camp.

You don't have time in a situation like that to note individual acts of heroism, but I found out later that my mentor, Corporal Tom Eichler, was a hero that night. Hill 861-A could well have fallen if he hadn't done what he did. His actions were emblematic of what made Khe Sanh a part of Marine Corps lore: perseverance against overwhelming odds.

When three of our men manning a machine gun were wounded as they were overrun during the initial assault, Eichler dodged enemy fire three times to carry each of the Marines to safety.

Corporal Eichler killed three North Vietnamese soldiers in hand-to-hand combat, stopping them from firing a rocket into a trench that was filled with Marines. When the enemy managed to establish a machine gun position inside our perimeter, Eichler wiped it out with grenades and sprayed cover fire that allowed our own machine gunners to move into a position to defend us.

He stood above the trenches to throw grenades down on the advancing North Vietnamese troops, and the entire time he made sure that the Marines were kept supplied with ammunition. Although Eichler was seriously wounded early on in the assault, his injuries never slowed him down. He was later awarded a Silver Star for his actions that night.
When dawn came, we counted 109 North Vietnamese bodies sliced and diced all over the hill, spread over maybe two acres. We had seven Marines killed, and at least 30 seriously wounded—guys missing limbs, or so damaged that they probably died within a few days. At best, they lived but never fought again.

We waded through the trenches and gathered the wounded and dead. After a corpsman would get a wounded Marine stabilized, we'd wrap him in a poncho and carry him to a staging area near the landing zone to be evacuated to a field hospital. We just kept lining them up, and the helicopters kept coming to take them away.

One of the guys I helped had suffered multiple severe injuries, and I kept talking to him to try to keep him from going into shock. He asked me to find his hand.

"I need my hand," he said. "Can you look for my hand?"
I asked where his fighting hole was and told him I'd look for it. I meant it, too. But when I got to his area and started looking around, reality set in. Debris and body parts were everywhere.

"It's hopeless," I thought. "Even if I find a whole hand, there's no way to know if it's his."

We needed immediate reinforcements, and when they came from other units, they all had looks in their eyes that said: "Oh my God, I'm fucked! I am fucked!"

We didn't put their minds at ease.

"They're definitely gonna attack us again tonight," I told the green Marines. "Be ready because they're coming back. Those mothers are coming back tonight!"

All the new guys were wide-eyed and solemn, and you could tell that they were thinking, "Ah shit, I'm gonna die tonight!"

Those of us who had been on the hill since the beginning didn't think that way anymore. I looked at myself and couldn't see the green Marine who had landed in the country only six months earlier. And, in no way could I show fear to the new guys. I had to raise my confidence to a new level. Those guys picked up on that real fast, and pretty soon, the ones who survived, they talked the same shit. They needed to see the example to have that confidence, and then they fed off of it.

Getting overrun rattled us but it didn't scare us. I was just hell bent to kill the enemy. It was more like, "C'mon, you gave us your best shot yesterday, and now give us your best shot today!"

And they did. The NVA continued to bring it. They never overran our position again, but they laid siege to us for another two months, throwing everything they could at us: artillery, rockets, mortars and grenades.

Long after the siege, when my ears had quit ringing, I still thought sometimes that I could smell the gas. Anyone who has ever been gassed will tell you that things can't get much more fucked up. Unless you've experienced it and found the discipline within yourself to apply your training and overcome it, you can't control yourself. You can have the best rifle in the world, but it's worthless against gas.

The night the NVA overran us, I was moving from off watch to on when the skies lit up. We scrambled to organize and fight back, and then I smelled the gas. The odor is distinct and unforgettable.

I didn't know that we were using the gas. I assumed it was the NVA gassing us, or that a Marine had been blown up and his gas grenades had exploded with him.

I was seasoned then and thought I was cool, and I'd let my hair grow nice and long. I didn't panic, but as I held my breath and put on my gas mask, the band of it got tangled in my hair, and the only thing that I could do was start yanking my hair out by the roots. It was like pulling clumps of grass out of an overgrown lawn.

During boot camp, the last time I had donned my gas mask, my head had been shaved, but doing it with long hair while under enemy fire was a whole different matter. I cleared the tangled spot, fit the mask on and blew to clear the gas from inside and was ready to fight. But I was pissed at myself for not getting a haircut.

I was promoted to a squad leader early on at Khe Sanh, and it wasn't long before I began asking myself how long I could last. Second lieutenants and squad leaders passed through a revolving door of death at Khe Sanh.

Second lieutenants had to be where the bad stuff was happening at every moment, and so they were vulnerable. The position of squad leader among the enlisted men was based on who had been in the squad longest when rotations came, and on who still was alive and able to fight.

Becoming a squad leader meant the world to me, but I suddenly had responsibility for anywhere from seven to 12 guys. Every morning, squad leaders from my platoon had to report to the command post (CP). The order would get passed down the trench line, "Squad leaders up!"

That meant that I had to run as low as possible through trenches to get to the CP, where Captain Earle Breeding waited. I usually was ducking from mortars and rockets. The command post was a short little sandbag hut—a taller structure would have been a big target— in which six to 10 guys could fit, sitting down.

Captain Breeding barked out orders, telling us our jobs for the day, what our plan was: "OK, 1st Platoon, you're doing good. Mortars. Where's mortars? Where's machine guns?"

Maybe Captain Breeding would want an extra listening post. That was the worst of the worst. They sent two men out at night past the edge of our perimeter, the other side of the razor wire, to listen for the enemy and notify us if they heard anything. It was like throwing them to the dogs. They were cannon fodder.

Or Captain Breeding could order a squad to go out and clean up C ration cans that were carelessly thrown out past the perimeter: "1st Platoon? Send a squad out to police the area south of your line. We have animals out there scavenging your C rats and we're gonna get complacent. Next time the enemy probes the line, we'll think it's rats!"

Or sometimes the captain would order a working party to repair the concertina wire: "Third Platoon, send a working party out there and throw more wire."

There was always something to do. We never sat around. We survived by staying busy, and if we weren't assigned to a working party, we had to dig deeper, and pile sandbags higher.

Captain Breeding gave us these orders every morning, and as I got used to being a squad leader, I began to notice: "Whoa, another new face! Oh my God, another new face!" I saw the same faces for a few days, and then one would be gone and replaced by someone new. Sometimes guys just got rotated back to the States, but most of the time they were wounded or killed. I'd wonder, "Who's going to replace me when I get it?"

Years later I saw the movie Spartacus with Kirk Douglas, and for some reason one of the scenes reminded me of our morning meetings with Captain Breeding. Before they called Spartacus and his opponent into the ring in which one of them would die, the two warriors sat in a little room and stared at each other, knowing that one of them was doomed. That's the feeling I had when I sat in the squad leaders' meeting. It was just like the two gladiators in Spartacus. I would look at the faces and think: "Who's the next one to die? Am I next?" It's strange, but a person can get used to being bombed every day. It's survival of the fittest. It got to a point when we were being mortared that we didn't ask, "Did anybody get hit?" but rather, "Who got hit?" We took casualties at all hours and from all directions. Sometimes the helicopters would drop in reinforcements, but they were never enough. One day in mid-February, during a rare break in the incoming, Mike Lucas called to me from two foxholes over. Lucas was one of my best friends.

"Hey Fix! Fix! Fix!" he said. "I got something cool!" "What the hell could he have that's cool?" I thought. Nothing had changed for weeks. "I have cupcakes!" he said. "How the hell could you have cupcakes?" I asked. We were under siege, living in trenches, men dying. How could he have damn cupcakes?

We would get these tins of compressed pound cake, and every so often our C rations would also include miniature Hershey candy bars. So Lucas got creative.

We always had C4, an explosive that's a little like Play-Dough. During the day, but never at night, we could use little pinches of it to heat our food. Without a detonator, it wouldn't explode, but it would burn. We would light the C4, place an empty can upside down over it, then put the can with our food in it on top of that. It was like a little burner, and it made the food a little easier to get down.

Lucas must have formed the pound cake into three little cupcakes, and then melted his Hershey bars and dripped the chocolate over the pound cake. He presented it to me and another Marine, Lance Cpl. James Anthony Wood, really nicely on a piece of cardboard, like he was a chef or something.

Like a jerk, I didn't catch on right away. "Where did you get those cupcakes?" I asked. It didn't dawn on me that he had just made the cupcakes.
"Some helicopter guy just flew them in for us," he said.

It really didn't matter. Lucas, Wood and I probably spent 10 minutes just admiring those little cupcakes, and then we only ate them in nibbles, nice and slow. There we were, three tough Marines giggling like school kids and eating cute Khe Sanh cupcakes.
That was James Wood's last treat.

By February 25, 1968, the NVA had zeroed in on one area on the hill so well that it seemed like it was almost certain death to be there. Around sunset that day, one of the corporals came up to me. "Fixler," he told me, "we lost three Marines; no one has their hole. Give up one of the men from your squad. Someone has to be in that hole."

The position was totally vacant. We had lost so many Marines in that foxhole that I just knew whoever I put in that hole was a dead man.

Mike Lucas and I met back in July 1967 in Phu Bai. We were both from NewYork, and we hit it off right away. With similar personalities, we were buddies from then on and stayed on the same operations and in the same platoon.

Then James Wood was attached to our squad, and he and Lucas became extremely close. They shared the same foxhole and always were hanging out and laughing. I was 19 years old, and I got a little jealous. "Jesus Christ!" I thought, "I'm losing my best friend."

So when the corporal told me I had to give up a man to replace the ones who had been blown out of that doomed foxhole, I had to make a decision real quick. It was almost a certain death sentence.

I made a call—Wood. Lucas immediately volunteered to go with him. "We're going in together," he said.

Wood was killed within hours of my decision—his foxhole took a direct hit from a mortar after dark.
"Minutes before, we were talking about home, watching through binoculars," Lucas told me years later, "and the mortars started coming in and he was completely disintegrated, no head at all."

Somehow Lucas survived it, and when daylight came, he looked down at his flak jacket and saw part of James Wood's face. There were pieces of flesh, and the stubble from Wood's beard was impaled in the protective jacket, little hairs just standing erect.

It was a heavy blow to Lucas, and I could tell it shook him up. Lucas was a tough Marine, a great Marine. And so was James Anthony Wood.

But as hard as it hit him, Lucas had to shake it off, like we all had to. We were fighting a war, in a pitched battle, and we were taking losses daily. There was no time to reflect on our situation.

We simply endured what had to be endured.

50 YEARS LATER, STRESS OF VIETNAM STILL PRESENT FOR NEMO MAN

By Forrest Gossett
Salt River Journal Editor

WAYNE DAFFRON, USMC C BTRY 1/13 KHE SANH VETERAN

By January of 1968, Wayne Daffron said there had been a sense that something was changing in the routine at Khe Sanh. The easy duty days were giving way to around-the-clock fire missions.

Wayne Daffron recalls being amazed at the natural beauty of the surrounding terrain when he arrived for an assignment at the United States Marine Corps outpost at Khe Sanh, South Vietnam, in August 1967.

"It was a really nice place. It was the prettiest little place you have ever seen... and it was fairly easy duty," he said of the base, where he staffed a 105mm Howitzer as an artillery specialist.

But what happened at Khe Sanh in the early morning hours of Jan. 21, 1968, would change Daffron and his fellow Marines and South Vietnamese troops for the rest of their lives as a 77-day battle ensued with the People's Army of North Vietnam for control of the highlands near the demilitarized zone between North and South Vietnam and the border with Laos. The battle is a story of perseverance and courage in one of the longest and bloodiest battles of the War in Vietnam.

And it is a story of coping nearly 50 years later for both Daffron and his wife, Gayln, and for thousands of other war veterans, from World War II to Vietnam and the Global War on Terror, who deal daily with the memories and trauma of war in the form of Post-Traumatic Stress Syndrome. But more on that later.

Khe Sanh is a distant memory for many Americans of a certain age — while a total unknown for younger people, as is the Vietnam War. The battle created headlines in the states, but was soon forgotten — except for the Marines and handful of soldiers who defended the outpost for 77 long days.

By January of 1968, Daffron said there had been a sense that something was changing in the routine at Khe Sanh. The easy duty days were giving way to around-the-clock fire missions.

"We had couple of patrols that were sent out but didn't return," he said of the days leading up to the siege.

Then, on the night of Jan. 20, 1968, officers told their men of intelligence reports that suggested the North Vietnamese Army may be hitting the base in the next 24 hours. As most intelligence reports in a war zone during Vietnam, Daffron took the news nonchalantly. In the days before the attack, one of his friends wrote a letter to his wife and asked that it be mailed it he died in combat. Daffron agreed, never expecting to mail the letter.

"They told us we would get hit the next day," Daffron said. "I learned most of what I know about Khe Sanh after I left Vietnam. Now what I learned later was that a North Vietnamese officer had surrendered at the wire and he had all the plans for the battle. He told us exactly what they were going to do."

At around 5 a.m. on Jan. 21, 1968, the Marines of Khe Sanh learned that intelligence was correct this time. A barrage of Vietnamese artillery signaled an all-out attack on the base..

"A guy said that they were hitting the other side of the base," Daffron said. "Then, rounds started landing near us and I said, 'Other side of the base, hell.'"

During the first long day, the battle was intense with both sides conducting intense artillery and mortar attacks on each other, and riflemen and machine gunners repelling attacking troops.

After the first day of battle, Daffron made his way to the headquarters bunker where he learned his friend had been killed.

In Vietnam, most battles lasted a few hours or even a few days. Not Khe Sanh. A determined North Vietnamese Army wanted control of the highlands around the base, and the Marines were just as determined, said Daffron.

Khe Sanh had been a strategic breakpoint for the U.S military since it was first staked out in 1962. That's when Army Special Forces built a small camp near the village, located some 14 miles south of the demilitarized zone, and about six miles from Laos. Marines built a garrison adjacent to the Army camp in 1966. In the fall of 1967, the People's Army of North Vietnam began to build up its strength in the region, and U.S. officials began to suspect that Khe Sanh would be the target of an attack.

As the battle progressed — hours turning into days, days in weeks and weeks into months — Daffron said a routine set in with the expectations of shelling during the day and attempts by the North Vietnamese to penetrate the wire at night.

The Marines were cut off from the south, dependent on daily supply runs by C-130 Hercules aircraft to bringing in ammunition, water and food — mainly in the form of C-rations. Then, the North Vietnamese destroyed the air strip. Daily supplies had to be air dropped in dangerous missions that placed both air crews and Marines on the ground in danger. The Marines were aided by B-52 bombers, which dropped close to 100,000 explosives on the hills surrounding Khe Sanh over the course of the battle. During the battle, life was austere – and intense.

"We lived underground. Literally underground," Daffron. "We lived in a bunker – two of us. I would go in the bunker and my head would be about ground level...but there were times when it was a nice place to be located."

Finally, after 77 days, the battle waned, and Army units arrived to relieve the Marines.

"They said they were there to save us, but the battle was over," Daffron said.

That was the end of Khe Sanh, chapter one for Daffron. The next chapter came when he was reassigned in Vietnam. To this day, he has no memory of his last six months in country.

"I can't remember a thing," he said.

He came back to the states in August 1968, and was assigned to Camp Lejeune, N.C., and while on leave visiting in St. Louis, he met the woman who would become the love of his life, Gayln. They met on a blind date, and she was not impressed.

"He not good looking.... skinny and droopy...but I went out with him," she said.

After a long-distance courtship, he proposed, and they were married in April 1969.

They settled into life. Gayln was a hairdresser and Wayne became a bricklayer, eventually rising to a construction superintendent, supervising more than 100 people. They raised three daughters.

His struggles with Vietnam surfaced in small ways — snapping here, ignoring there. Then one day when they were living in O'Fallon, Daffron suffered a blackout that he cannot explain to this day.

Gayln, who operated a beauty salon out of their home, sent Wayne to the bank with a deposit. He did not return home for hours.

"I only knew that it was raining, and this Vietnamese guy was hitchhiking. I picked him up and gave him a ride. I do not remember dropping him off, I do not remember anything," Daffron said with his voice trailing off.

Gayln picks up the story: "Somehow, he made it home. His mother at the time was a live-in nanny and she had weekends off. She spent Saturdays with us, because I had work. When he got home, he went straight the table, sat down and I noticed that he had a cigarette with a huge line of ashes...I got an ashtray and put it on the floor. The I asked if he wanted a drink of water. He said, "No, we can't drink water expect when we really need it. We do not have much water.'"

He was experiencing a flashback to Vietnam. He did not know his wife, his children it his surroundings.
"A few minutes later, his mom had given the children something to do, and the moment Wayne heard her voice, he snapped out of it," she said. "He did not know me before Vietnam, but he knew her."
An ambulance crew was called their house, but found him in good physical shape and told Gayln there had no idea what caused the behavior.

A few years later, Daffron had another blackout.
Meanwhile, over the years, he rose in his career, but he was always dealing with the stress, often stopping off for a few drinks on his way home.

"He would never drink around the children, saving that for the bar," Gayln said. "I do not think he was an alcoholic, but he had a problem."

They moved to Troy in 1998, and started going to church. Daffron quit drinking, but the stress caused by Vietnam was ever-present.

The current chapter started in 2007, when Wayne retired, and they moved to Monroe County, about eight miles from Paris, near Mark Twain Lake. They purchased a doublewide, placed it over a foundation that Wayne built himself and moved to celebrate retirement. Wayne finished the basement with a nice entertainment area, and even built a hair salon for Gayln. But still, Vietnam was on his mind. He would to the basement for hours and sit alone.

"When we first finished the basement, he would go down there for hours listening to his oldies with all the lights off," she said.

Meanwhile, Wayne was a patient at the Veterans Administration clinic in Mexico. One day, as he was preparing for an appointment, Gayln said that in addition to checking on his physical health to please talk to someone about mental health.
It was a day that changed their lives.

He had an appointment with a counselor who asked a series of questions.

"He then said to me, 'You have PTSD,'" Wayne said.

Since the diagnosis, he receives therapy and takes medication to deal with the chemical imbalance caused by stress. to this day, Wayne deals with the effects of combat. The day he was being interviewed, there was a sonic boom, likely from a B-2 bomber flying from Whiteman Air Force base near Kansas City. He briefly flinched and stopped talking while swallowing hard.

"We get those several times a week... this one was not that bad," Gayln said.

And the stress over years has impacted Galyn. "It was worse when the kids were younger," she said. "I would get mad and take a walk."

But through all the tough times of dealing with PTSD, Gayln said she never once considered leaving the marriage.

"I made a covenant and it said for better or worse," she said as she tapped her index finger on a table. Said Wayne: "She's the best thing that ever happened to me, and I'll tell anyone that. She put up with more than anyone should."

They both credit faith in helping them deal with Wayne's PTSD. They attend the First Baptist Church of Paris, where Wayne sings in the choir and serves as a deacon.

Dealing with PTSD is a daily struggle but now that he has reached out for help from the VA, he has better control although he still experiences moments of despair.

"I don't how to explain it, but a lot of times you have triggers and a lot of times you don't have triggers," he said. "I will be sitting here watching TV and I have to get up. Got to get up. Do something. Stay at home and not see anyone. Then, I have to get out, have to see someone. Your body just gets tight."

Nearly 50 years after the first artillery rounds that signaled the siege of Khe Sanh, Wayne Daffron and his family are living the effects of that intense 77 days. But they are coping and making progress.

Wayne urges fellow veterans to seek help.

"If my story helps one person, then it is worth it," he said.And Galyn says to loved ones of troubled veterans, do not give up.

"If I had not made it through rough times, then I would not appreciate what I have now," she said.

WISCONSIN LUTHERAN TO FEATURE LOCAL VIETNAM WAR VET IN ANNUAL VETERANS DAY PROGRAM CHAPLAIN RAY W. STUBBE SELECTED FOR LECTURE

WAUWATOSA - Wisconsin Lutheran High School is featuring a local Vietnam War veteran as part of its annual Veterans Day program that will honor nearly 400 veterans from all branches of the military who served in World War II through the most recent wars in Afghanistan and Iraq.

Chaplain Ray W. Stubbe gave a speech Thursday, Nov. 9, about his experiences as a Navy chaplain during the Vietnam War, including his survival of the Siege at Khe Sanh. To protect his fellow soldiers, he went into the trenches himself, leading over 20 or 30 prayer services each day. Stubbe also discussed the challenges he and other Vietnam War veterans faced when they returned home from war, according to a news release.

FROM AN AUSTRALIAN NEWSPAPER

To the North Vietnamese Army, the village of Khe Sanh was the gateway to the south.

The now infamous siege in 1968 was the largest battle in the 30-year-long war and what broke the will of the American government to continue fighting a war they no longer believed they could win.

Though Australian involvement in the 77-day siege was minimal, the battle has been forever immortalized in this country in the lyrics of Cold Chisels 1978 song.

It was 45 years after the battle at Khe Sanh that Robyn Milbus found a zippo lighter belonging to someone who had been there just a couple of years earlier.

Mrs. Milbus and her husband Darryl were travelling to Cooktown from their home at Coomera when they stopped at Calliope River to camp for the night.

"Darryl did a bit of fishing and I went for a walk and found the zippo lighter in the sand," she said.
"I thought it would be nice to reunite it with the owner, but of course in the ensuing years I forgot all about it."

Mr. Milbus passed away the following year it was when she was going through his belongings that she found the zippo lighter again.

Zippo lighters are distinctly American so it may have belonged to an American ex-serviceman travelling in Australia, or it may have been given to an Australian while in Vietnam.

It is marked with the words "Vietnam, Khe Sanh 65 -66".

For now, it's origin is a mystery. Last year, Mrs. Milbus was at the Gympie Muster and was reminded again of the lighter when she was talking to a member of the RSL.

"I told him I'd love to find the owner, but then I put it aside and forgot about it again," she said.
"I don't smoke, so it's no good to me."

If anyone has any ideas about who may own the lighter, call The Observer on 4970 3044.

OUR FOUNDER, RAY W. STUBBE's RESPONSE TO THE VFW ARTICLE THE TURNING POINT, WHICH WAS FULL OF INACCURACIES, AND GREATLY UNDERESTIMATED THE AMOUNT OF CASUALTIES SUFFERED AT THE KHE SANH COMBAT BASE..

Thursday, 04 January 2018

Editor, VFW Magazine
406 West 34th St. STE 523
Kansas City MO 64111

Dear Sir or Madam:

Concerning your excellent article, "'The Turning Point'," (VFW 105:4 (Jan 2018», a couple of minor errors should be noted lest they continue to be perpetuated.

While an "official" 205 KIA had been continually repeated for the past five decades, based on the 26th Marine Regiment After Action Report and Congressional testimony (1971), the totals reported in the Command Chronologies and After Action Reports for the subordinate battalions (1/26, 2/26, 3/26, 1/9, 1/13) for the period 21 Jan - 31 Mar bring the total to 274. If one then adds KIA from the various support units at Khe Sanh (recon, shore party, engineers, helicopters, etc.) , another 70 KIA must be added. This is just for 20 Jan - 31 March. For those of us who were at Khe Sanh, an artificial "ending" with the conclusion of Operation SCOTLAND (31 March) does not reflect the end of the "siege!" For those of us who were there, the siege battle lasted as long as we fought at Khe Sanh.

Thus, for the period 20 Jan-31 Mar, there were 407 KIA, 01-15 Apr (Operation PEGASUS), 165 KIA, and for the one day when 1/9 fought on Hill 689, 43 KIA, and for 17 Apr - 11 Jul, 396 KIA (the day Americans abandoned Khe Sanh and also the date of the ending of Phase IV of the NVA battle plan). This gives a total of 1101 KIA for the Khe Sanh siege.

In addition, the article. erroneously indicates 852 WIA. COR Brown, the CO of 3rd Medical Battalion, who frequently was at Khe Sanh during the siege to supervise his doc- tors and corpsmen of 2nd Platoon, Co "C"-{"C Med"), reported in a professional journal that the records of C Med recorded 2,249 patients seen and treated, of which 2,037 were WIA and 490 NBC. 2,249 patients were evacuated of which 292 were returned to duty. ["Dateline Vietnam," Pennsylvania Medicine, August, 1968, pp. 45-53].

There has been a tendency to minimize what we, who were there, endured. Even the official NVA histories of the Ho Chi Minh Trail (classified Secret), indicate the amount of materiel supplied to B5 - T8 (their secret designation of the Khe Sanh battlefield) was more than twice that for the rest of I Corps (e.g., Hue) and 24.5 times that provided to southern South Vietnam. The number of troops committed to H2 (their designation of the specific Khe Sanh battlefield, Hi being the eastern, i.e., Hue) was 28,000 in February and 29,000 in March 1968 .. [I can provide you with the exact references if you desire].

With such a concentration of men, the casualty figures are understandable when one notes that there were more tons of bombs dropped during the first half of the Khe Sanh siege (22 Jan - 29 Feb 68) than in all of the Pacific in WW II (WWII: 32,735 tons; Khe Sanh: 53,380 tons). In addition, the local Montagnard tribesmen, who had, for example, safely guided our Marine recon teams caught outside the base when the siege began and were always friendly to us, were forbidden to evacuate. Their census just prior to the siege was 21,000, and only 6,000 made it to the Cam Lo Refugee Center following the siege, making about 16,000 KIA. NVA losses were estimated using statistical models of MACV's MACEVAL to be an estimated 15,760 NVA KIA. Thus, Khe Sanh is certainly the bloodiest battle of Vietnam, not Hue (as has been recently asserted), and is the main battle of Tet, if not the entire Vietnam War.

The list of Navy Crosses should include PC Jonathan Nathaniel Spicer (DOW 14 March 1968). Spicer reported at Khe Sanh Monday, 22 Jan 1968, the day after the siege began. He claimed to be a Conscientious Objector, and a talk with the chaplain (me) disclosed that he had mentioned this to his recruiter (who said he could become a dog handler), in boot camp and various commands and was told to wait until his final command Well, here he was at Khe Sanh the day after the base was shelled, destroying all hardbacks and severely damaging all above-ground structures. It was chaos as 1200 civilians from Khe Sanh village were gathered to be evacuated on C-130s which had brought ammunition since our ammo dump had exploded destroying $3,298,862.97 worth of ammo (according to CG, III MAF 141216Z/Feb68, LOGSUM #2-68)-{>ver three million dollars!).

PFC Spicer mentioned he had never been in a fight, never participated in sports, his father was a minister, and he didn't care what happened to him; he just didn't want to hurt anyone else. Everyone knew we were surrounded by thousands of NVA and the adrenalin freely flowed! The paperwork on Spicer started. A few days later, Spicer's First Sergeant came to the chaplain (me) saying, "You have to do something! The men are beating up Spicer." I replied that I deserved a chaplain's clerk and didn't have one. I said I really didn't need one due to the situation-no need for a driver, but that since I was in the medical area, he could be a stretcher bearer. For two months, Spicer carried litters to MEDEVAC choppers which naturally attracted much incoming. He always remained with the casualty, either lying beside him or even on top to protect him. One day he took shrapnel in his heart. The doctors of C Med, although not qualified for open heart surgery, did so, saved him, he was evacuated to Tokyo, and then died of an infection. Col. Lownds recommended him for a Navy Cross which was granted to this Conscientious Objector.

Hopefully, what we who were at Khe Sanh won't continue to be belittled!

{I can provide you (or your historians and writers) with specific notations of archival sources for the details mentioned, if desired. I was the Protestant chaplain at Khe Sanh, Jul1967 - March 1968, and organized Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., about 3,000-strong and has annual reunions and publishes a first class magazine, Red Clay. I have appeared on about half a dozen nationally televised programs relating to the Vietnam War and Khe Sanh specifically].

--Since the date of 9/11 is approaching, Chaplain Bill Will sent me a story that I'll reprint. Perhaps you've read it before. Even if you have, the story is a stark reminder of the mission, dangers, and dedication of our Marines and Sailors (and their families) in the service of our nation, and our important role in providing ministry to them, their loved ones, and ourselves.

Did you know this about 9-11? After Flight 77 hit the Pentagon, a chaplain who happened to be assigned to the Pentagon, told of an incident that happened right after the plane hit the building.

A daycare facility inside the Pentagon had many children, including infants who were in heavy cribs. The daycare supervisor, looking at all the children they needed to evacuate, was in a panic over what they could do.

There were many children, mostly toddlers, as well as the infants that would need to be taken out with the cribs. There was no time to try to bundle them into carriers and strollers.

Just then a young Marine came running into the center and asked what they needed. After hearing what the center director was trying to do, he ran back out into the hallway and disappeared. The director thought, "Well, here we are, on our own."

About 2 minutes later, that Marine returned with 40 other Marines in tow. Each of them grabbed a crib with a child and the rest started gathering up the toddlers. The director and her staff then helped them take all the children out of the center and down toward the park near the Potomac.

Once they got about 3/4 of a mile outside the building, the Marines stopped in the park, and then did a fabulous thing - they formed a circle with the cribs, which were quite sturdy and heavy, like the covered wagons in the Old West. Inside this circle of cribs, they put the toddlers to keep them from wandering off. Outside this circle were the 40 Marines, forming a perimeter around the children and waiting for instructions. There they remained until the parents could be notified and come get their children.

The chaplain then said, "I don't think any of us saw nor heard of this on any of the news stories of the day. It was an incredible story of our men there. There wasn't a dry eye in the room."

The thought of those Marines and what they did and how fast they reacted; could we expect any less from them? It was one of the most touching stories from the Pentagon.

As I read this story, I'm reminded again of how privileged we've been as Navy chaplains to have served the men and women of the Sea Services, and their loved ones.
Peace!

I GET MAIL

Tom, I wanted to take a moment to thank you and the Board of Directors for all you good work for the Khe Sanh Veterans organization. Due to your efforts over the years, the Battle for Khe Sanh will live forever in the legacy of our Corps. The heroic fighting by the Marines and supporting organizations will always be an example of courage and sacrifice.

The organization is one of the premier veterans organizations in the county and has earned the respect of veterans and the American citizen.

This does not come easy and requires hard work. I am sure that there are many hours spent to maintain the organization, the Red Clay and the annual reunions. I thank all the countless volunteers who donate their time to the success of the organza ion.

NICE STORY, SUBMITTED BY DOCTOR BARRY BOOTH, MEMBER KHE SANH VETERANS

Major Mordecai Arnold, who received his final promotion Monday night, made his last personal appearance in December at Family Wreath Day at the Alabama State Veterans Memorial Cemetery at Spanish Fort. As many of you have responded with the impact he had on your lives as a college professor...he continued in his sunset years to do the same with our young people in our area...his kindness and soft words reached the hearts of hundreds of kids ...yes kids of all ages...his refusal of a wheel chair ...he walked when he couldn't walk...and his determination to stand was an example for all of us ...he is standing to left in the photograph below...during the pledge and national anthem he was given extra strength to stand and salute...his back was straighter and his aged eyes brighter...Thank you Mawk for your service....and the lasting impression on our hearts ...and the hearts of those who will serve in your place now...

Major Mordecai Arnold USMC(RET) was promoted tonight. He served our country with honor...WWII…

Korea...Vietnam...a true American Hero. This photo was taken Saturday...he and Dr.Barry Booth were making plans....always ready to serve. Special thoughts and prayers are extended to his family. Thank you for your service Mawk...you will be truly missed.

OBIT

COLONEL FRED V. CHERRY USAF, VIETNAM & KOREAN WAR

Fred V. Cherry, an Air Force fighter pilot, was downed by enemy fire over North Vietnam in 1965, and he spent more than seven years as a prisoner of war.

He had grown up in the Jim Crow South, and his captors made it clear that he could mitigate the harshness of his incarceration, including routine torture, and improve his living conditions by speaking out against the racial injustice and discrimination he had faced as an African American in the United States.

When beatings failed to bring him around, his jailers tried another tactic. They assigned a self-described "Southern white boy" as his cellmate, hoping that racial antipathy between the two men would weaken his resolve and produce a propaganda triumph for North Vietnam.
The plan failed.

Instead, the two men, Col. Cherry and a Navy fighter pilot, then-Ensign Porter Halyburton, became fast and lifelong friends. Each would credit the other with having saved his life.

Col. Cherry died Feb. 16 2018, at a hospital in Washington. He was 87. The cause was heart ailments, said his companion of 24 years, Deborah Thompson. He was a major and had more than 100 combat missions in Korea and Vietnam behind him on the day — Oct. 22, 1965 — that his F-105 Thunderchief fighter-bomber was hit by enemy antiaircraft fire.

"The plane exploded and I ejected at about 400 feet at over 600 miles an hour," Col. Cherry wrote in a 1999 collection of war stories by POWs and Medal of Honor recipients. "In the process of ejection, I broke my left ankle, my left wrist, and crushed my left shoulder. I was captured immediately upon landing by Vietnamese militia and civilians."

"I spent 702 days in solitary confinement," he added, with the longest period lasting 53 weeks. "At one time I was either tortured or in punishment for 93 straight days."

Early in his captivity, Col. Cherry was matched with Halyburton, a North Carolinian who had been shot down Oct. 17, 1965. For eight months, they would live together. But whatever mutual animosity their captors may have hoped for never materialized.

"I guess they thought if they had a Southern white boy taking care of a black man, it would be the worst place for both of us," Halyburton said in a telephone conversation from North Carolina. "It turned out to be the best thing that ever happened to me."

For eight months, Halyburton changed the dressings on his cellmate's infected wounds, fed him, bathed him and watched over him. "He said I saved his life, and he saved my life. . . . Taking care of my friend gave my life some meaning that it had not had before."

The two men lived in a succession of fetid 10-by-10 -foot cells, sleeping on straw mats, benches or the floor.

"I was so inspired by Fred's toughness," Halyburton said. "He had grown up in the racial South [and] undergone a lot of discrimination and hardship. But he was such an ardent patriot. He loved this country. It inspired me, and it inspired a lot of others."

For 2,671 days, Col. Cherry was held in captivity before his release on Feb. 12, 1973, with the first group of U.S. prisoners of war to come home.

Fred Vann Cherry Sr. was born in Suffolk, Va., on March 24, 1928. His parents were farmers. He attended racially segregated public schools and graduated in 1951 from Virginia Union University, a historically black college in Richmond.

He then joined the Air Force and, during the Korean War, flew more than 50 combat missions over North Korea.

In the summer of 1966, after eight months of sharing a cell, Col. Cherry and Halyburton were separated. Halyburton remembers it as "one of the saddest days of my life." They did not see each other again until 1973, when they met at a military hospital at Clark Air Base in the Philippines after their release from captivity.

Col. Cherry, who later attended the National War College and the Defense Intelligence School in Washington, retired from the Air Force in 1981 as a joint staff officer assigned to the Defense Intelligence Agency. He was a resident of Silver Spring, Md.

His medals included the Air Force Cross, awarded, according to the citation, for "extraordinary heroism in military operations against an opposing armed force as a Prisoner of War ... extremely strong personal fortitude and maximum persistence in the face of severe enemy harassment and torture, suffering critical injuries and wounds."

But Col. Cherry's homecoming was painful. His wife, the former Shirley Brown, reportedly deserted him soon after he was declared missing, cleaned out his life savings and had a child with another man. The officer endured years of legal proceedings and negotiations with the military over issues involving back salary, child-support payments and allowances.

Survivors include his companion, of Silver Spring; four children from his marriage, Deborah Cherry-Jones and Donald Cherry, both of Norfolk, Va., Cynthia Cherry-Leon of Woodbridge, Va., and Fred V. Cherry Jr. of Springdale, Md.; a son from another relationship, Frederick Stein of Los Angeles; 14 grandchildren; and six great-grandchildren.

Col. Cherry and Halyburton, who retired from the Navy at the rank of commander, gave joint talks at military institutions and colleges. In 2004, they toured to promote a book about their story, "Two Souls Indivisible: The Friendship That Saved Two POWs in Vietnam," by James S. Hirsch.

Col. Cherry also was featured in a public television documentary narrated by Tom Hanks, "Return With Honor," about Vietnam fighter pilots held as POWs. "I know that the faith in God, love and respect for my fellow man that my parents and family instilled in me during my youth carried me through some very difficult years as prisoner-of-war in Vietnam," Col. Cherry wrote in the 1999 collection of POW war stories.

"I was always taught to love and respect others and forgive those who mistreat, scorn or persecute me. . . . [This] allowed me overcome the damages of discrimination, Jim Crow, and the social and economic barriers associated with growing up a poor dirt farmer. . . . My standard for making decisions is based on doing what is right."

LOCAL CHAPLAIN TRIES TO LOCATE KHE SANH VETERANS IN OAKLAND COUNTY RONALD RAYNER, USMC
A CO 1/26, KHE SANH VETERAN

Chaplain Ron Rayner, KSV, 71, a resident of Oakland County, says that he believes there are local Khe Sanh veterans who have never been to a reunion or know of the existence of the organization Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc.

He wants to let veterans know that, this year, the Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. will commemorate the 50th anniversary of the Jan. 21, to April 7, 1968 siege of Khe Sanh during the Vietnam War by hosting a reunion in Washington D.C. during the week of Aug. 12. A memorial service will be given to remember the 2,097 Americans killed in the Khe Sanh area from 1964 to 1973, and the Khe Sanh veterans will wash the Vietnam Veteran's Memorial Wall."

"I am humbled that we have been given the honor of being allowed to wash the Vietnam Veterans Memorial Wall. It is my prayer this will attract many non-member Khe Sanh vets," said Rayner.

"There have been over one million men and women (VA estimate 2003) who have sacrificed their lives serving in the Armed Forces of the United States. ... What the rest of us owe these individuals is to live a happy, healthy and purposeful life so that they have not died in vain."

50 YEARS AGO: VETERANS OF KHE SANH BATTLE TO MEET ON SUNDAY
21 JANUARY 2018

Oroville: In the early morning hours of Jan. 21, 1968 the first explosions of artillery fire rang out through the dense jungle of the Quang Tri Province,

South Vietnam, marking the beginning of what came to be known as the Battle of Khe Sanh.

Veterans of that 77-day siege, in which 6,000 primarily U.S. Marines defended the small combat base against 10-times that many People's Army of North Vietnam troops, will be marking the 50th anniversary together at the annual Northern California Khe Sanh Veterans' Luncheon on Sunday.

This year's event will begin at 10 a.m. at Table Mountain Golf Course, 2700 Oro Dam Blvd. The tri-tip luncheon is open to all U.S. veterans and their families who wish to honor those who fought at Khe Sanh. A $20 donation is requested.

"They say it was the Marines who fought there but just about every branch of the service was there. There are not many battles in history where guys from different branches fought shoulder to shoulder, but Khe Sanh was one of them," said Tom Horchler of Oroville, event organizer.

A lance corporal with the 1st Battalion 13th Marines Headquarters Battery Motor Transport Section, Horchler spent his entire tour of duty in Khe Sanh, driving a truck hauling "bodies, bullets, bandages and beans."

At 71, Horchler said he sometimes forgets things that happened yesterday but his memory is clear when it comes to what happened 12 miles south of the North Vietnamese border 50 years ago.

"You never forget. Never. You can't forget. Ever. I remember every wounded man I hauled. I remember every dead body I hauled. I remember every round fired. I remember every second of every day," said Horchler, a 1965 Chico High School graduate.

Creative catering featuring Personal Preference Dining®

Horchler and fellow Khe Sanh veteran Craig Tourte of Rocklin organized the first Northern California Khe Sanh veterans' lunch. Ninety-eight veterans attended, many with their spouses, children and grandchildren.

As the years have passed Khe Sanh veterans from Oregon and Idaho have also begun attending, but overall, veteran attendance has dwindled to about 50.

"We're getting old now and we're dying, many of us from complications due to Agent Orange exposure and there's not one of us who has not lived and struggled with PTSD," said Horchler.

The troops fighting at Khe Sanh were young, many in their late teens. Horchler, who had "celebrated" his 21st birthday a month before the battle started, was one of the "older guys."

For 77 days and nights, these young men were under a constant bombardment of shells, rockets and mortars. At night, troops called the "Ghost Patrol" ventured into the surrounding foothills engaging in hand-to-hand combat with the enemy.

"These guys, they kept the North Vietnamese from getting on the hills around us. If they hadn't, we would have been right in the bullseye and none of us would have made it out. I get chills every time I've met one of them," said Horchler.

There remains some controversy about how many U.S. troops died in Khe Sanh. Initial government reports said slightly more than 200, but later that number was increased to less than 500. Many Khe Sanh veterans, including Horchler, believe it was closer to 2,000.

"Everything that happened in Vietnam was a lie from the beginning right through Nixon's 'peace with honor.' Everything was a lie including how many died at Khe Sanh. If you didn't die in that square box of land that was the combat base, if you died fighting in the hills around the base or in a plane shot down over the base or days after you were injured and evacuated to a medical base, you weren't officially counted as having died at Khe Sanh," said Horchler.

When the veterans of that Tet Offensive battle get together they do so to remember all of their "brothers" who didn't make it home. Sometimes they tell "war stories," but mostly they come together just to be with others who shared an experience that those who haven't fought battles will never understand.

"It's almost a spiritual thing. I know when I walk into a room full of vets just like me, it gives you a calming sense. You are surrounded by true brothers. Men who would, men who did step up and take a bullet for you. It's a special place to be when you're together. When you have fought, bled and seen the death we saw, it creates a bond that undeniable," said Horchler.

2018 KHE SANH LUNCHEON ADDRESS 21 JANUARY 1968

BY CRAIG W. TOURTE, USMC
HQ BTRY 1/13, KHE SANH VETERAN

We gather here today to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the Siege and battles that occurred at and around the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh beginning January 21st and ending around July 11, 1968, resulting in the death by several accounts of numbers exceeding 1011 American Marines, Soldiers, Sailors and Airmen. Of those, 274 were actually killed on the base between January 21st and March 31st. During this time, in addition to several infantry assaults, the Combat Base and the hilltop outposts were subject to constant artillery, mortar and rocket attacks. At times, those rounds fired at the base alone, exceeded 1,500 rounds a day. Over 100,000 tons of bombs were dropped by US aircraft and over 158,000 artillery rounds were fired in defense of the base.

Those of us here today set aside this date and this hour to remember and mourn those we lost. We survivors of that horrific battle will never forget the ones we stood shoulder-to shoulder with in the trench lines, those who faced incredible hardships on the surrounding hills, those who flew above in a desperate attempt to extract our wounded and dead and supply us with the critical material necessary for us to persevere. And we will not forget those who flew the thousands of sorties by attack aircraft and B-52's high above, suppressing the intentions of over 20,000 surrounding enemy soldiers who were preparing to assault the base and dislodge the defenders from their shallow hand dug defenses.

From a newspaper article a couple of years ago, I want to read a quote from my friend Tom Horchler. This interview was particular poignant with words clearly descriptive of the events of which those just reading the article could only imagine, no one could describe Toms experience better. "I remember the lush green beauty of the Khe Sanh jungle and mountains, and the clear blue sky when I first arrived. It was a landscape that despite the heat, humidity, bugs and rain, I appreciated. I remember too the horror of watching that landscape transform into a moonscape as the barrage of bombs, artillery and Agent Orange assaulted the area. It went from a living place to a place with nothing but death and the dying, dead plants, dead trees and dead and dying people. It was an unbelievable transformation. The killings, the dying, the mutilation of young bodies, the plane crashes, the rats, the wounded, the dysentery and exhaustion, along with the gore and fear. It was an impossible situation." But Tom went on to say, he found solace in these gatherings, the coming together of other Khe Sanh Veterans and our friends who often join us.

Brigadier General Lowell English complained that the defense of the isolated outpost of Khe Sanh was ludicrous. "When you're at Khe Sanh, you're not really anywhere. You could lose it and you really haven't lost a damn thing."

President Lyndon Johnson disagreed. As LBJ personally sent off Marine reinforcements to I Corps from El Toro Marine Air Station, California on February 17, 1968, he told them. "This is a decisive time in Vietnam. The eyes of the nation and the eyes of the entire world, the eyes of all of history itself, are on that little brave band of defenders who hold the base at Khe Sanh..."

The Siege of the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh was an historic event. The mention of Khe Sanh along with the great battles of Concord, Gettysburg and Normandy in President Obama's first inaugural address, forever confirms to our nation and the world that the Battle of Khe Sanh will forever hold a significant place in American History.

We will never forget the fallen, how they sacrificed for us and for our wonderful country. For the rest of our lives we will never forget where they served or who they are. The fallen heroes of Khe Sanh will continue to be a part of who we are. We also take this moment to honor those who to this day carry the wounds and memory of the Vietnam War, in their hearts, minds and bodies.

Today we remember not only those who fought at Khe Sanh but also those who fought other battles and continue to fight this day for the freedom of all Americans. On behalf of Khe Sanh Veterans, thank you all for coming and may God Bless America.

Dave Tonick (right), a Khe Sanh veteran, A CO 1/26 shares stories with other veterans on the 50th anniversary of the Siege of Khe Sanh at a gathering in Oroville on Sunday. Leila Rodriguez — Enterprise-Record

Oroville "I just turned 20 and then got shot right in the leg," said Dave Tonick, a Khe Sanh Vietnam veteran.

He proudly showed off a photo of his wounded young self, smiling and holding a bottle of champagne he received from his father as a gift in a care package. His battle scars were earned from a rocket blast that knocked him off his feet. Trapped under debris, Tonick's chest and head were unharmed from the blast, but his leg didn't make it unscathed. "I remember it clear as a bell," Tonick said.

His experience and sacrifice were one of many stories shared during the Khe Sanh luncheon held Sunday afternoon at Table Mountain Golf Course that commemorated the 50th anniversary of the 77-day siege that occurred at Khe Sanh, just 12 miles south of the Vietnamese border.

The luncheon was put on by Khe Sanh veterans Craig Tourte and Tom Horchler. Many of these gatherings have reunited other Vietnam and Khe Sanh veterans. It's a shared camaraderie that seems to root deeper each year.

"Even if you've never met a guy before, you start talking, and it's like you've known him forever," Tourte said.

A booming bagpipe rendition of the "Marine Corps Hymn" kicked off the casual festivities. Many were accompanied by family members and loved ones, and those flying solo to the event were happy to reconnect with old friends. While many in attendance were local, others traveled from Sacramento, Rocklin and the Bay Area to join their brothers.

Though Sunday's reflections brought up tough memories of loss and talk of handling post-traumatic stress disorder, not all tales were sad.

From table to table, one could easily catch snippets of war stories that mirrored something from a movie, mixed with the chatter of buddies catching up and inside jokes that would resonate only with a Marine were shared between each gentleman.

Will Caput of Chico, one of the younger Marines in the room, joined the annual Khe Sanh luncheon for the first time Sunday. Caput often meets with a Chico chapter of Marine veterans but said he wanted to reach out and pay his respects to this generation and take their stories into account.

"I think a lot of our generation doesn't understand sacrifice for people who go through war," Caput said. "I know some Iraq veterans, but veterans of Vietnam came onto a different perception compared to veterans today. Back then they weren't respected or honored for their sacrifices."

For 77 days and nights, the combat base and hilltop posts were subject to constant artillery. The soldiers, many in their late teens, spent tireless days evading bombs, mortars, rockets, and bullets — embedded images that still haunt them today.

Tourte said just living at Khe Sanh with the rats and the rain was like digging yourself a hole and calling it comfortable, but for them, it was their duty.

"You were 19 and bulletproof, you didn't think about getting killed," said Dan Ferguson, a fellow Vietnam veteran at the gathering.

Amongst the jokes and reality of what war can do to one's soul, it was clear from those in attendance that the men who fought at Khe Sanh 50 years ago Sunday will always be remembered.

"We will never forget the fallen," Tourte said, "how they sacrificed for us and our wonderful country. Today we remember not only those who fought at

Khe Sanh but also those who fought other battles and continue to fight this day for the freedom of all Americans

THE ENDURING DEBATE OVER KHE SANH

BY

Gregg Jones VIETNAM '67 JAN. 19, 2018

In early 1968, the siege of the remote Marine combat base at Khe Sanh dominated American news coverage of the war in Vietnam. Gen. William Westmoreland, America's supreme commander in Saigon, billed the North Vietnamese Army's move against Khe Sanh as "the main event" of a Communist offensive.

News accounts ominously compared the siege to Dine Bien Phu, the remote French garrison surrounded and forced to surrender to Vietnamese Communist forces in 1954. On Feb. 18, even with the so-called Tet offensive raging across the country, The New York Times called the unfolding showdown at Khe Sanh "the major battle of the Vietnam War."

The drama played out over 77 days, with nerve-jangling highlights on nightly news broadcasts. Four weeks into the siege, Americans learned that President Lyndon Johnson and his commanders were contemplating the use of tactical nuclear weapons to save Khe Sanh.

The defenders endured artillery barrages, sniper fire, probes and ground assaults. Ultimately, though, Khe Sanh didn't live up to its early hype of an Alamo-style disaster in the making.

Over time, the events that unfolded at Khe Sanh in 1968 were eclipsed by the interpretation of what had occurred. A revisionist historical narrative hardened in the 1980s, and Khe Sanh became a metaphor for General Westmoreland's mismanagement of the war. More recently, the siege has been written off as a brilliant North Vietnamese ruse that concealed the impending Communist attacks on urban centers — the Tet offensive. This judgment infuses books of contemporary vintage and the recent Ken Burns-Lynn Novick documentary film on Vietnam. In reality, the evidence on North Vietnamese intentions at Khe Sanh is inconclusive, and the case is far from closed.

As 1968 began, the United States and North Vietnam aspired to victory in the year ahead. Khe Sanh figured prominently in the plans of both. The anchor of the American stronghold at Khe Sanh was a Marine combat base perched on a plateau between an old French road, Route 9, and the Rao Quan River, about seven miles east of the border with Laos and 15 miles south of the demilitarized zone dividing North Vietnam from South. A fan-shaped array of outposts, including an American Army Special Forces camp, guarded approaches to the base from the north and west.

In January 1968, two North Vietnamese Army divisions — some 20,000 men — converged on Khe Sanh from the west. Another division moved to a position northeast of Khe Sanh.

The first phase of the North Vietnamese plan, "General Offensive and General Uprising," called for Communist troops to provoke a series of interior battles to lure American forces from the populous coast. One of those battles was to occur at Khe Sanh.

But the ruling Politburo in Hanoi had split over the next phase. A faction led by the ascendant Le Duan, the general secretary of the Central Committee, called for urban attacks aimed at igniting a popular uprising. In opposition to that risky approach were North Vietnam's aging revolutionary leader, Ho Chi Minh, and his military chief, Gen. Vo Nguyen Giap, architect of the victory over the French at Dien Bien Phu in 1954. Ultimately, Le Duan outflanked his opponents and the urban offensive was incorporated into the plan. The attacks on southern cities were to unfold as Vietnam celebrated the lunar new year — Tet — in late January 1968.

In Saigon, General Westmoreland welcomed the Communist move against Khe Sanh. He laid plans for an unprecedented artillery and air response to cripple his North Vietnamese adversaries in a rare conventional confrontation.

The drama at Khe Sanh got underway with a flurry of N.V.A. attacks in the early hours of Sunday, Jan. 21. An enemy ground assault penetrated a Marine outpost on Hill 861 before failing. Communist artillery bombarded Khe Sanh Combat Base, detonating the main ammunition dump. Other North Vietnamese troops attacked the district headquarters compound in nearby Khe Sanh village. Over the next two weeks, the base and its outposts endured daily barrages and sniper fire. At night, N.V.A. soldiers probed Khe Sanh's defenses.

Concerns of a massive ground assault on Khe Sanh increased after the Communist urban attacks began on Jan. 31. The following day, President Johnson's chairman of the Joint Chiefs, Gen. Earle Wheeler, asked General Westmoreland whether tactical nuclear weapons might be required to save Khe Sanh. Westmoreland hedged his bets. In a worst-case scenario, he said in a secret cable, "I visualize that either tactical nuclear weapons or chemical agents would be active candidates for employment."

On Feb. 5, as fighting continued in Saigon, Hue and other cities, the North Vietnamese attacked a key Khe Sanh outpost on Hill 861 Alpha. Communist forces pierced the Marine perimeter, but the attack was finally broken by a massive artillery barrage aided by electronic sensors and punctuated with a ground counterattack. The following night, the Army Special Forces camp southwest of the base was overrun in a ground assault supported by 11 Russian -made PT-76 light tanks. On Feb. 8, N.V.A. soldiers attacked a small Marine outpost barely a mile southwest of the base.

Communist forces set to work encircling the base with trenches and concealed gun positions, imperiling the stronghold's aerial supply lifeline. In Washington, retired Gen. Maxwell Taylor, a respected World War II veteran and former ambassador to South Vietnam, advised President Johnson to abandon Khe Sanh. Food and water were rationed in the outposts, and wounded men sometimes died awaiting helicopter evacuation flights. The sense of crisis deepened on Feb. 10 when a Marine C-130 transport was hit by enemy fire and forced to crash-land at Khe Sanh, killing eight Americans.

That same week, unknown to General Westmoreland and the Marines, Communist commanders shifted a third of their siege force from Khe Sanh to the battle for Hue, 50 miles to the southeast. Years after the war, Westmoreland's intelligence chief, Lt. Gen. Phillip B. Davidson Jr., remained baffled by the decision. The North Vietnamese "kept too many troops at Khe Sanh just to threaten it, and too few to overrun it." It is one of many unsolved mysteries that still shroud the battle for Khe Sanh.

The siege reached its climax in the last week of February 1968, although this, too, became evident only much later.

On Feb. 24, American forces launched Operation Sierra, colloquially known as the Super Gaggle, for the large number of aircraft involved. It involved inundating enemy gun positions around Khe Sanh with tear gas, smoke, high explosives and napalm, allowing big Sea Knight helicopters to swoop in to the hilltop outposts and drop external nets packed with supplies. The resupply crisis eased.

The following day, fear of an imminent assault on the base peaked after the decimation of a Marine patrol and discovery of new Communist trenches extending to within a few yards of the southeastern perimeter wire. On the night of Feb. 29, N.V.A. forces undertook three waves of attacks on the eastern perimeter of Khe Sanh Combat Base. The Americans activated an elaborate plan to trap and slaughter Communist forces with coordinated B-52 strikes and other air and artillery missions. A few N.V.A. soldiers reached the perimeter wire before the final attack failed.

North Vietnamese pressure on Khe Sanh eased in March as improved weather resulted in even heavier American air and artillery attacks. With the arrival of a joint Army-Marine relief force, American com manders declared an end to the siege on April 8.

Army forces departed and fresh Marine battalions arrived, encountering even bloodier combat than during the siege. But by then the reporters had moved on, and General Westmoreland was on his way out, replaced by Gen. Creighton Abrams. In early July, Khe Sanh Combat Base was dismantled, and, in a scene that foreshadowed the events of April 1975, the last Americans left hurriedly by helicopter. North Vietnamese radio proclaimed victory at Khe Sanh.

Nearly 1,000 Americans died in the 1968 fighting around Khe Sanh (far more than the discredited official toll). Estimates of Communist losses ranged from 2,500 to 15,000 killed.

The full intentions of the North Vietnamese at Khe Sanh remain unclear. For decades, the Hanoi party line has held that Khe Sanh was solely a ruse to mask the urban attacks — a self-serving claim by ideologues who view history as a tool of the revolution rather than a search for objective truth. That claim has been amplified by respected Vietnam War correspondents such as Neil Sheehan and the late Stanley Karnow. Largely ignored is a competing analysis that contends the North Vietnamese intended to cap their 1968 offensive with the coup de grâce inflicted on the Americans at Khe Sanh. Until the Vietnamese government opens its wartime archives, we won't know for sure what Khe Sanh was about.

JANUARY 20

On today's date, fifty years ago and the day before the Siege of Khe Sanh erupted, I woke my fire team before first light to go on a work detail.

One of the men in my team slept hard and didn't like to wake up. This happened a lot. I finally told him if he didn't get out of the rack and eat some chow, I'd kick his ass.

That was a mistake. We didn't really think much of each other. He jumped up and wrapped me in a bear hug. A strong kid from Detroit, he squeezed and made mention about my heritage and my mother. I thought he'd crush my chest.

Somehow I struggled and freed my arms and with my left hand found a metal bucket on a shelf in the bunker. Using both my hands, I clutched it and drove it down on the top of his skull.

He dropped me as blood shot into his brown hair, down the sides of his head and over his forehead into his eyebrows.

My stomach churned at the sight of all that blood and I figured there would be hell to pay. I sent him to see the corpsman while we ate chow. Word came back that he went to the battalion aid station to get his head stitched up.

We went off and built a concertina wire barrier somewhere behind the main trench lines. All day I worried about the private, his split open head and the ramifications with which I would have to deal. While we pounded posts into the ground and strung concertina wire, a Huey flew over with a man hanging below. It looked like his hands were tied to a cable. The helicopter had no markings that would identify it as an American chopper.

We all watched as the Huey flew above a line of ragged trees that grew along the south side of the base and dragged the dangling man through the tree tops. I still imagine the sounds I imagined at the time—snapped bones, ripped flesh, the wash of guts and other organs impaled on the remains of broken branches.

For years, I didn't remember the incident of the chopper dragging that man but I did remember splitting the private's head open. Not until the mid 1990s did I recall the Huey and the dangling man and it wasn't until 2010 that I was sure I'd seen what I saw. I was worried that I had taken someone else's memory and made it mine. One of the men who we interviewed for BRAVO! asked me, while we were filming him, if I remembered seeing the Huey and the man hanging below.

Fifty years ago, when we arrived back at our fire team area the private with the busted head waited. He seemed quite pleased with a head full of stitches and that he didn't have to help string concertina.

As I stood there peering at the top of his head, someone down the line set off a claymore mine by accident. When I looked that direction I saw Marines charging into their fighting positions and for the first time, an inkling of what was to come at the Siege of Khe Sanh snuck into my consciousness.

Later that night, I took first watch. A heavy mist hung over the combat base. I walked up and down the trench, thinking, I suspect, about the bloody skull and the man who'd been hanging from the bottom of that Huey. I know I thought about that claymore mine and the echoes of its explosion that bounded along our lines.

I heard a soft, low moan and shivered. A waving line of red tracer fire sketched out of the sky and out to the front of our position. We called that moaning weapon, an airplane, Puff the Magic Dragon but it was more commonly known in Vietnam as Spooky.

And spooky it was as the red tracers etched a curved crimson line into the misty night and the low, sad moan of its sound followed and made me think of lamentations from spirits of the dead.

As I got ready to go off watch, I stood at the back of my hooch and stared into the night.
It was spooky.

FIFTY YEARS AGO
20 JAN68 INTO 21 JAN68
BY DENNIS MANNION

have been reflecting upon this 24 hour period since I got up this morning in CT. While the 21st of January in any year always sets me on edge, I have been totally consumed with the fact that it's been exactly fifty years since the NVA came through the wire on the northwest corner of 861. In fact, as I type this on the evening of Jan 20th, it's already the morning of the 21st over there, and five decades ago right now, Kilo 3/26 and W 1/13 were picking up the pieces, counting the dead and wounded, and planning for the next 24 hours. Were we shell-shocked and dazed? For sure, and our greatest wonder & fear was thinking about the tenacious NVA and whether they'd be back in force when the sun went down on the 21st. Uneasy times.

While the old combat base is totally unrecognizable as it once was, the same cannot be said for the hilltops that the Marines held. As physical landmarks, the hills at Khe Sanh are same as they were fifty years ago. I always think of Gettysburg National Park when I think of Khe Sanh's hills.

I have been to Gettysburg three times. Standing at the high water mark of Pickett's Charge -- the Angle -- where the two stone walls meet (the high point of the Confederacy, it's called), it's easy to imagine what happened there in July 1863. However, no matter your thoughts as you conjure up what took

Travel a few miles south from Pickett's Charge, and you can visit Little and Big Round Tops. Those hills exist today as they once did and the big boulders present 155 years ago are there today! That is true as well for the Khe Sanh hills: the geological imprints remain the same five decades later, and while the vegetation has grown back, the terrain up there is unchanged. (Photo Evidence included.)

This is not to minimize what people at the base endured (and had to take day after day), and my heart aches for all of you who were down there for those days, weeks, and months. 861 was never hit with any big arty or rockets the likes of which plagued the base, and I feel fortunate about that....and guilty too.

So, here is to all us all who were there, endured, suffered, wept and cursed. We were part of history then and we always will be. God bless and Peace. S/F Dennis

"DO YOU STILL THINK ABOUT VIETNAM?

This story came to me anonymously via e-mail, the author, a fellow Vietnam Veteran. After reading his story, I felt compelled to share this with you. If you didn't participate in the Vietnam War, this will give you some insight into how our minds work. He writes: A couple of years ago someone asked me if I still thought about Vietnam. I nearly laughed in their face. How do you stop thinking about it? Every day for the past forty (NOW 50) years, I wake up with it- I go to bed with it. This was my response:

"Yeah, I think about it. I can't stop thinking about it. I never will. But, I've also learned to live with it. I'm comfortable with the memories. I've learned to stop trying to forget and learned to embrace it. It just doesn't scare me anymore."

A lot of my "brothers" haven't been so lucky. For them the memories are too painful, their sense of loss too great. My sister told me of a friend she has whose husband was in the Nam. She asks this guy when he was there.

Here's what he said, "Just last night." It took my sister a while to figure out what he was talking about. Just Last Night. Yeah, I was in the Nam. When? Just last night, before I went to sleep, on my way to work this morning, and over my lunch hour. Yeah, I was there

My sister says I'm not the same brother who went to Vietnam. My wife says I won't let people get close to me, not even her. They are probably both right. Ask a vet about making friends in Nam. It was risky. Why? Because we were in the business of death, and death was with us all the time. It wasn't the death of, "If I die before I wake." This was the real thing. The kind boys scream for their mothers. The kind that lingers in your mind and becomes more real each time you cheat it. You don't want to make a lot of friends when the possibility of dying is that real, that close. When you do, friends become a liability.

A guy named Bob Flannigan was my friend. Bob Flannigan is dead. I put him in a body bag one sunny day, April 29, 1969. We'd been talking, only a few minutes before he was shot, about what we were going to do when we got back to the world. Now, this was a guy who had come in country the same time as me. A guy who was loveable and generous. He had blue eyes and sandy blond hair.

When he talked, it was with a soft drawl. I loved this guy like the brother I never had. But, I screwed up. I got too close to him. I broke one of the unwritten rules of war. DON"T GET CLOSE TO PEOPLE WHO ARE GOING TO DIE. You hear vets use the term "buddy" when they refer to a guy they spent the war with. "Me and this buddy of mine."

Friend sounds too intimate, doesn't it? "Friend" calls up images of being close. If he's a friend, then you are going to be hurt if he dies, and war hurts enough without adding to the pain. Get close; get hurt. It's as simple as that. In war you learn to keep people at that distance my wife talks about. You become good at it, that forty years after the war, you still do it without thinking. You won't allow yourself to be vulnerable again.

My wife knows two people who can get into the soft spots inside me----my daughters. I know it bothers her that they can do this. It's not that I don't love my wife. I do. She's put up with a lot from me. She'll tell you that when she signed for better or worse, she had no idea there was going to be so much of the latter. But with my daughters it's different. My girls are mine. They'll always be my kids. Not marriage, not distance, not even death can change that. They are something on this earth that can never be taken away from me. I belong to them. Nothing can change that. I can have an ex-wife; but my girls can never have an ex-father. There's the difference. I can still see the faces, though they all seem to have the same eyes. When I think of us, I always see a line of "dirty grunts" sitting on a paddy dike. We're caught in the first gray silver between darkness and light. That first moment when we know we've survived another night, and the business of staying alive for one more day is about to begin. There was so much hope in that brief space of time. It's what we used to pray for. "One more day, God. One more day."

And I can hear our conversations as if they'd only just been spoken I still hear the way we sounded. The hard cynical jokes, our morbid senses of humor. We were scared to death of dying, and tried our best not to show it.

I recall the smells, too. Like the way cordite hangs on the air after a fire-fight. Or the pungent odor of rice paddy mud. So different from the black dirt of Iowa. The mud of Nam smells ancient, somehow. Like it's always been there. And I'll never forget the way blood smells, sticky and drying on my hands. I spent a long night that way once. The memory isn't going anywhere.

I remember how the night jungle appears almost dreamlike as pilot of a Cessna buzzes overhead, dropping parachute flares until morning. That artificial sun would flicker and make shadows run through the jungle. It was worse than not being able to see what was out there sometimes. I remember once looking at the man next to me as a flare floated overhead. The shadows around his eyes were so deep that it looked like his eyes were gone. I reached over and touched him on the arm; without looking at me he touched my hand. "I know man. I know." That's what he said. It was a human moment. Two guys a long way from home and scared to death.

God, I loved those guys. I hurt every time one of them died. We all did. Despite our posturing. Despite our desire to stay disconnected, we couldn't help ourselves. I know why Tim O' Brien writes his stories. I know what gives Bruce Weigle the words to create poems so honest I cry at their horrible beauty. It's love. Love for those guys we shared the experience with.

We did our jobs like good soldiers, and we tried our best not to become as hard as our surroundings. You want to know what is frightening. It's a nineteen-year-old-boy who's had a sip of that power over life and death that war gives you. It's a boy who, despite all the things he's been taught, knows that he likes it. It's a nineteen-year-old who's just lost a friend, and is angry and scared and, determined that, "some*@#*s gonna pay". To this day, the thought of that boy can wake me from a sound sleep and leave me staring at the ceiling.

As I write this, I have a picture in front of me. It's of two young men. On their laps are tablets. One is smoking a cigarette. Both stare without expression at the camera. They're writing letters. Staying in touch with places they rather be. Places and people they hope to see again. The picture shares space in a frame with one of my wife.. She doesn't mind. She knows she's been included in special company. She knows I'll always love those guys who shared that part of my life, a part she never can. And she understands how I feel about the ones I know are out there yet. The ones who still answer the question, "When were you in Vietnam?"

"Hey, man. I was there just last night."

So was I. How about the rest of you vets....Hits home doesn't it! Share this article with others so they understand why many of today's veterans behave the way they do be it Vietnam or other conflicts, this is a common thread shared by all."

POETRY

DEATH DREAM

by Sam Messer

In a helicopter flying over rice paddies, then over jungle to a spot brown and red,
tents and a lonely strip.

I run from the chopper looking for a hole.
No weapon, scared as hell.

This base is so small,
and the enemy,
they are every where I look.

I see bodies everywhere.
A rifle from one I take,
It's bad luck but I'm so scared.

Ammo, I've got none.
back to the bodies,
stealing from the dead.

I must survive,
they're gone, I must live.

Clips, clips, none to be found.
Back to the dead,
Stealing again, from the dead.

With shaking hands, I load the clips.
God I'm so scared, surrounded, they're closing in,
I'm all alone and going to die.

Back in a helicopter,
The dream starts again.
Each time I know I'm going to die,
I'm going to Khe Sanh !!

A REPLY TO A RED CLAY ARTICLE BY TOM KEN SOERENSEN A BTRY 1/13

I Just finished your letter to the Congressman in the latest issue of Red Clay and thought I would write you.

In late '66 I came to Gun 2 in DaNang along with about 5 other FNG's. Didn't make much sense to put us all together on the same gun at the same time, but who can dispute Marine Corp logic. We later learned that most of the Battery had formed in the US and came over together as a unit. Rick Stewart, Randy Worthley, Leroy Swinehart and myself, Bob Sullivan. I don't remember the others except maybe Sgt Stemmel who became our section chief. You were also on the gun when you were not in the field as an FO. We were in awe of the Corporal who spent most of the time in the "bush" while the rest of us were in the relative safety within the wire.

In January of '68 my tour was up and some of us left as the siege began. However, as I'm sure you know, in June of '67, we were mortared and Gun 2 took the most causalities. Stewart and "Bill" Travis were killed and most of the rest of us were wounded. Several years ago I got in touch with Sgt. Stemmel who had moved to Florida after retiring as a Master Sgt. He was sent to Japan and later returned to different unit upon release from the hospital. I was sent to a Navy hospital in Guam for 10 weeks before coming back to A-I-13.

After Vietnam I tried to forget about the war of helplessly watching two guys die, of accidently shooting a fellow Marine, and of experiences while in the hospital. Like you I tried to drown my memories with alcohol. Drugs such as "speed" enabled me to drink even more and stay sober longer so I didn't smash as many cars as before. Finally my wife had enough and threatened to leave if I didn't stop drinking. She put up with a lot and I eventually went to a vet center in Lowell, Mass. in the late '90's. They sent me to the PTSD clinic in Boston for a dozen sessions in as many weeks. At the V AMC in Bedford I started in counseling and have been attending groups ever since. I initially received 50% for PTSD along with what I had from my shrapnel wounds. The labor union that had saved my job from being fired for so many times had made me decide to retire after which my appeal increased my disability to 70% and un employability raised it to 100%.

Almost 20 years ago I called Randy Worthley up in Maine and talked with him awhile. We were supposed to go to the reunion in DC in 1998 but he cancelled out at the last minute. I went myself and made some new friends but didn't meet anyone I knew. Most were from 26th Marines and you would have probably known some. It was a good time but I never went again. I'm sure you knew Bill Dubois who became a Sgt and took over his own gun. He lives about 5 miles from me but we never got together until several years ago. We went up to Maine for a memorial service for Randy Worthley who fell or jumped off of a bridge near Augusta. He was an officer with the VFW for many years and had his own disability claims with PTSD. Dubois was a Dracut cop. I heard about Tommy Antrim after I returned to Camp Lejeune along with Pizarro and others who were KIA.

I hope you are successful in pursuit of your claims with the VA and that the congressman will help you receive what is rightfully yours. Don't give up like many other veterans have done in the past. An old adage of the claim system of the VA is to "Delay, Deny, and hope that they Die. Don't let them win.

ANOTHER CEREMONY REMEMBERING THE SIEGE

50 YEARS LATER: HONORING VETS WHO FOUGHT IN ONE OF VIETNAM'S BIGGEST BATTLES

Fifty years ago was one of the Vietnam War's biggest battles commenced. In Massena Sunday, they honored those who stood firm at Khe Sanh.

Six wreaths were brought to Veterans Memorial Park to honor those who served. The Battle of Khe Sanh began on Jan. 21, 1968, and went on for 77 days. It was the longest siege ever withstood by the U.S. military.

Massena area veterans posts laid wreaths and rendered salutes. James Baker was there as a U.S. Marine. Despite the passage of time, there's a special bond when Khe Sanh vets meet.

"Oh you can't shut up. You finally got someone that was there and knows what you went through. And you can tell them things that you never told anybody before," Baker said.

Sunday's ceremonies at Amvets Post 4 featured readings of presidential and village proclamations. Similar events took place across the U.S. and in August a reunion of Khe Sanh vets is planned for Washington D.C.

A POEM BY SAM MESSER

NO TITLE 1/3/93

I fell asleep for a minute or two.
When out of the night came sounds,
Bombs dropping close somewhere

Wide awake, still the sounds were there.
I feel a rush,
AGAIN! I am back there.

The sounds I hear are a band, next door.
But the rush of blood pumping,
and my heart thumping.
Take me back to "TET 68"
again I am there.

Oh I'm so high,
sleep is denied.
My senses are again alive!

Memories flood my mind.

Oh thank god I'm alive!

Holes in the bulldozer,
the truck caught a mortar,
The fork lift is no more, Dear,
The seat I sat in,
is shredded like paper.
Shrapnel in my Jacket,
no I'm not hurt Dear.

The chow hall now vacant.
A couple of rockets it has taken.
For K.P. I was five minutes late, was it fate?

Back to my bunker,
five hours later!
Cry, crawl and pray,
I hugged that RED CLAY!
Rounds dropping around me,
from the dump that day.
Could I survive? - NO Way!

Safe in my bunker,
I let out feverous laughter.
I light up a cigarette,
my arm is on fire!

Phosphorus!
burning a hole in my arm.
With a k-bar,
he digs out the burning ember.

The roof by c-med we redo,
it was such a mess.
Damm I didn't know Vietnam had bees.
Little holes at our feet,
Damm guys, it's a sniper.

A hole in the strip,
as large as a dozer.
Please! send me somewhere safer.

Helicopters coming in,
take cover, in coming.

THIS BRAVE EX-CHAPLAIN IS STILL HAUNTED BY THE VIETNAM WAR'S MOST DESPERATE SIEGE WASHINGTON POST

By MICHAEL RUANE

WAUWATOSA, Wis. — Retired Navy chaplain Ray W. Stubbe leaned over his diary and ran his finger to the entry for Feb. 23, 1968, the 34th day of the Vietnam War's siege of Khe Sanh and the day the bunker was hit.

The small, sandbag fortress was on the perimeter. He had spent the night there three weeks before, as a half-dozen nervous young Marines sat under a single lightbulb, making coffee in a ration tin and playing a recording of "I Heard It Through the Grapevine" over and over.

Now the bunker had been smashed with some of those Marines inside, and Stubbe, then 29, a bespectacled Lutheran minister, rushed from a nearby medical shelter to help.

What he found would haunt him for years. The Marines inside were in pieces. One was headless. Stubbe carried what was left of another to a military ambulance. "A hand, an arm, a stringy piece of flesh intertwined with cloth and caked with mud," he recorded.

"I knew them all," he wrote. They were barely out of their teens. One had been an altar boy. Another had a death wish since he had accidentally killed several buddies in a friendly fire incident during an earlier tour of Vietnam.

"I took this very hard," Stubbe wrote.

Sunday marked the 50th anniversary of the start of the war's most famous siege, a 77-day struggle for a rain-swept plateau in central Vietnam that riveted the U.S. in 1968, and opened a year of often-bloody social upheaval that resonates today.

[A young photographer took this harrowing image of the Vietnam War. He didn't live to see it published.]

The siege was front-page news for almost three months. President Lyndon B. Johnson pored over a scale model of Khe Sanh in the White House. He vowed that the base would never become another Dien Bien Phu, where a besieged French garrison surrendered to the North Vietnamese communists in 1954.

In 1968, Khe Sanh heralded the start of the enemy's sweeping Tet offensive, in which Vietnamese forces launched a barrage of deadly attacks across South Vietnam, stunning American officials. Tet wound up souring much of the American public on the war and set the stage for the gradual withdrawal of the U.S. troops.

It also opened the bloodiest year of the war, and for many of the 6,000 Marines and others besieged there by 40,000 North Vietnamese, it left physical injuries and disturbing images that would last a lifetime.

Hundreds of Marines were killed and thousands were wounded at Khe Sanh, as the enemy rained as many as 1,300 shells, rockets and mortars on the base a day. The Americans burrowed into the reddish earth, and shared a muddy, subterranean world with the well-fed local rats.

[Traitors or patriots? Eight Vietnam POWs were charged with collaborating with the enemy.]

The prospect of death was ever present, and oblivion could come to anyone in a flash. (A Catholic chaplain, Father Robert R. Brett, was killed in a rocket attack the day before the bunker was hit.)
Stubbe developed a fast, 10-minute service focused on the Bible story of Jesus calming the stormy sea. He once conducted 13 services around the sprawling base in one day.

In his diary entry, probably penned that night, he listed the dead and their faiths.

"PFC CHISHOLM, James," 20, Baptist, of Savannah, Ga.
"LCPL MCKEEVER, Michael Edward," 20, Roman Catholic, of Duluth, Minn.
"CPL THORPE, Gary Wilford," 20, Mormon, of Bear River City, Utah.

He noted that amid the carnage the big recoilless rifle outside the bunker was unscathed, and the missing head was never found.

A 'foreshortened future'

Ray Stubbe sat down at the kitchen table in his brick home in this Milwaukee suburb one gray day earlier this month and began his story.

He wore blue jeans, a denim shirt and black sneakers. A vase of white flowers sat in the middle of the table. A Tiffany-style lamp hung from the ceiling.
He is 79 and lives alone. He never married, has no close family, doesn't use the Internet and doesn't like to travel out of the area — a legacy, he believes, of Khe Sanh. He said psychologists call this a "sense of foreshortened future."

Stubbe reflects on his days during the siege of Khe Sanh, and how it affected his life. (Gary Porter for The Washington Post)

"Part of it was the siege," he said. He and others developed the mentality that every day might be their last. "We could never count on another day."
He was affected by other things at Khe Sanh, and suffered so much from PTSD after the war that he had to be hospitalized twice.

He had nightmares and crying jags, and relived scenes like that in the bunker over and over, as if on a record with a skip in it, he said.

He was troubled by an incident where he was caught in the bottom of a shallow trench during a ferocious barrage. The ground shook, and when he tried to pray, all he could do was babble.

[Fifty years after Vietnam, veterans gather for what could be a final reunion]

And he was distraught when, on Feb. 25, a patrol of 45 Marines was ambushed outside the base and only half of them returned. Again, Stubbe knew many of those who were lost.

He said he often had a dream where he was in a bunker under attack and was the only one left.

For a time, Khe Sanh colored everything in his life, like dye in a clear liquid, he said. "It was all that there was."

Now it's "become increasingly set in its place," he said. "It doesn't overshadow. It doesn't preempt. It doesn't monopolize."

He gradually realized that his recovery from the trauma of Khe Sanh would be helped if he chronicled the details of the siege. As an historian of the battle, he could step outside his experiences, he said.

He was already a beloved Khe Sanh figure: "A couple of the Marines swore they once saw him walk across a puddle of water and not get his feet wet," veteran Steven A. Johnson wrote in a memoir.

"He was the real deal," said retired Marine officer Kenneth W. Pipes, who was a company commander at Khe Sanh. "He did an awful lot of good for an awful lot of people. . . . Pretty much fearless. . . . [Stubbe] turned up at the key places at the right time for the right reasons."

In an oral history for the Wisconsin Veterans Museum, Stubbe recalled that he once recited Psalm 91 while holding the hand of a wounded Marine — Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night; nor for the arrow that flieth by day. Another time, he wrote, he fed cookies to a Marine with burned hands, as if the snacks were Communion wafers.

After he got home, he immediately transcribed his diary. "I just had to get this out of me," he said. He retired from the Navy in 1985 and established a ministry in a Milwaukee church visiting shut-ins.

All the while he researched Khe Sanh, exchanged letters with veterans and their families, and gathered memorabilia and artifacts.

He wrote books, essays, and sermons, and his work is often cited by historians. He founded the group, Khe Sanh Veterans Inc., in 1983.

When Stubbe donated much of his material to the Wisconsin veterans museum in 2005, he said it took two trucks to carry it all away. And still, an upstairs room is filled with mementos, photographs, maps, plaques, news clippings and boxes.

One famous photograph, which appeared in Life magazine, shows Stubbe conducting a service at Khe Sanh. He stands with head bowed, hands clasping a piece of paper, as a group of Marines sit around him in prayer. Rugged mountains and mist where the enemy lurked appear in the background.

Stubbe said he realized later that nobody was wearing a helmet, a potentially catastrophic mistake at Khe Sanh.

An unlikely warrior

Behold, the Lord maketh the earth empty and maketh it waste. And turneth it upside down and scattereth abroad the inhabitants thereof . . .

The opening bombardment of the base began before dawn on a Sunday morning, Stubbe recalled in an autobiographical essay several years ago.

he darkness was illuminated by explosions. A supply depot nearby caught fire. And the air was filled with the odor of burning sandbags, and gasoline that had ignited in a petroleum dump.

As the barrage died down, he emerged to survey the damage, and thought of the prophet, Isaiah: the earth is crumbled in pieces . . . (and) reels . . . like a drunken man.

Stubbe was perhaps the most unlikely participant at Khe Sanh. A Navy lieutenant, he had a degree in philosophy from St. Olaf College and had started a PhD program in ethics and society at the University of Chicago. He had translated scripture into Greek, and carried a Greek New Testament in his uniform pocket.

He said he only carried a rifle once. He was going out with a patrol and the Marines told him that if he didn't carry a rifle the enemy would think he was an officer and gun for him.

Stubbe had grown up in Milwaukee, the only child of a draftsman and homemaker. He joined the Navy Reserve in high school. In college he decided to attend the seminary. While there, he said in his essay, he joined the Navy's Reserve Chaplain Company, became an ensign and attended the Navy Chaplains School.

He was ordained in 1965, started a church in a Milwaukee suburb, and began his PhD program in 1966.

But by 1967, the war had heated up, and, feeling a call, he volunteered for active duty. "I was deeply interested . . . in the interface of religion and war," he said in his oral history. "Can a Christian be a soldier — or a Marine?"

He reached Khe Sanh on July 17, 1967, and left Feb. 29, 1968, although he went back once a week or so through April.

Khe Sanh was relieved by American ground forces that April, and the base was destroyed and abandoned in July, according to historians.

Throughout his ordeal there, Stubbe said, he never had a crisis of faith.

"I always knew that God was with us," he said, as he sat in his kitchen. "I saw many of the good parts of people. . . . Especially there. It was very apparent to me how good people were to each other."

Marines shared food, water, letters from home, and gave their lives for each other.

"These are mainly 19-year-olds … happy, friendly, frolicking kind of people playing practical jokes," he said. "But also just had that genuine sense of caring for each other."

Those seeking to destroy them were largely distant and unseen, he said.

"I've really been enriched," he said. "I think we're enriched by the difficulties we pass through, as long as they don't crumble us."

Even a half-century later, Khe Sanh still is instructive.

"For those of us that were there, it isn't 50 years ago," he said. "It was, like, last night."

MICHAEL ARCHER

It was 50 years ago today, January 22, 1968, that I made it out of the district headquarters compound in Khe Sanh village, unscathed after two days of fighting against a numerically superior force of North Vietnamese Army attackers. It took our overloaded helicopter, an old CH-34, two tries to make it out of the landing zone.

My relief was short-lived though; because after about a five-minute chopper ride I beheld Khe Sanh Combat Base under thick pall of smoke. It appeared to me that the east end of the base was completely destroyed, the victim, I would later learn, of a horrendous ammunition dump explosion caused by North Vietnamese rockets. When I had left 12 days before, the base was intact and most of my buddies were living above ground. Now, I would join them underground and, for the next 76 days, weathering near constant incoming artillery and their repeated attempts to capture the combat base.

Lieutenant Stamper and I crawled up on that corrugated metal roof later that night with a radio to direct Spooky, who was hosing down an area to the south. With NVA snipers all around the compound, every little creak and pop of that metal, as we slithered up and down it, was a real heart stopper. Good times.

I've attached are two photographs: one is of the little communications bunker in the district headquarters compound where I radio-operated during the fighting. The other is of Khe Sanh village along "Highway" 9 and a stream that meandered through

Some of you were wondering what you're looking at in that photo of the old comm bunker in Khe Sanh village (my previous post). Not exactly state-of-the-art technology! The sides were covered with discarded World War II Marston runway matting brought down from the Khe Sanh airfield. That trench to the left leads into the bunker. The opening you see is a rifle port. As I mentioned in A Patch of Ground, once I called in those artillery airbursts in the initial moments of the attack, I was busy jamming everything I could find into that hole to keep the shrapnel out.

VIETNAM VETS HONORED AT LONG WHARF YALE DAILY NEWS DENNIS MANNION K CO 3/26 F/O

Veterans trekked in full military uniform along the Long Wharf Drive on Sunday in remembrance of those who died in the Vietnam War.

Roughly 40 veterans and community members commemorated the sacrifice of United States veterans on Sunday morning — the 50th anniversary of the start Battle of Khe Sanh, a months long battle that culminated in the start of the Tet Offensive during the Vietnam War. The event was organized by the New Haven Veterans of Foreign Wars Post 12150.
"It is important to support the events [of the Veterans of Foreign Wars] so people have awareness that we still have troops that are still out there fighting," said Stanley Borusiewicz Jr., a member of the New Haven Veterans of Foreign Wars Post 12150. "We have a lot of people who have served and they need to be recognized because we wouldn't have the freedoms we have today if it wasn't for those people."

After a six-mile hike on the New Haven Harbor, the march culminated in a brief ceremony at the V statue, which is engraved with the names of community members who died in the Vietnam War, at the Vietnam Veterans Memorial Park on Long Wharf Drive. Dennis Mannion, a veteran of the Khe Sanh battle and former sergeant of the Marine Corps, gave brief remarks about his experience in Vietnam and on the importance of holding events to honor veterans.

Mannion said that he was fortunate to have survived the Khe Sanh battle after being wounded twice on duty. Still, he recounted the difficulties he faced after returning from the war — including during his flight home on a civilian airplane from Vietnam in which a passenger requested to move to a seat away from Mannion after the passenger learned he was a Vietnam veteran.

Mannion touched on the isolation of veterans during and after the war, noting the lack of discussion about the topic from veterans during that period. At the event, he pointed out a name on the V statue of his former late classmate from Notre Dame High School in West Haven. He said he did not find out about his friend's death until several years after the war.

He said he is glad that popular perceptions toward veterans have changed, and that it is important to host events honoring men and women who serve.

"To see younger people out here, the uniforms you're wearing, I understand it and it's gratifying to see that," Mannion said, addressing the veterans at the service. "You serve our country, you do a great thing that most people don't do."

In 2000, Mannion said he visited Vietnam to give a proper goodbye to 28 of his friends who died during the war.

The New Haven Veterans of Foreign Wars Post 12150, an organization of mostly younger veterans, puts on several events each year. James Namnoun, the chaplain of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, said the organization was started by post-9/11 veterans at Southern Connecticut State University. Namnoun said the organization makes an effort to be active in the community, noting that the Veterans of Foreign Wars participates in the annual New Haven St. Patrick's Day Parade.

"Veterans tend to isolate themselves when they get out of active service," Namnoun said. "You want to always have engaging things … it's about being active and letting [veterans] know they're not alone."
Many of the city's Veterans of Foreign Wars members are also part of the Marine Corps Detachment 40 of Glastonbury.

I GET MAIL

Having served nineteen months as an artillery FO and slated for return to CONUS on December 17, 1967 from Khe Sanh, I approached my battery CO, Captain Pardee of A-I -13, with the request for one more field mission.

This mission entailed collecting funds from Marines at Khe Sanh, getting on a rare flight returning to Da Nang air base, where I would reacquaint myself with Air Force MSgt Kearsage, senior NCO, in charge of scheduling in-country flights for resupply missions throughout Vietnam. Planes for these flights consisted of C-130 (Hercules), C-123 Provider), and C-7 (Caribou) flown by Air America. MSgt Kearsage had helped me secure a flight back in March to Saigon in order to make my connecting flight to Australia. Upon my return to Nam, he got me space on a flight to Khe Sanh and we had become good friends during those previous meetings. He also had given me some specialty items which I shared with the officers of B-I-26 on Hill 881 South.

I landed at Da Nang the evening of November 7, 1967 and made my way to the Air Force Staff/Officers quarters and there located MSgt Kearsage. After greeting him and getting some chow, I told him of my plan to bring back some adult beverages to the Marines at Khe Sanh for the upcoming Marine Corps Birthday.

MSgt Kearsage made some calls that evening and then met with other Air Force personnel the following day, and helped me secure the purchase of a pallet (88 cases) of Carling Black Label beer. Some other officers and staff, at the procurement location, showed their respect and gratitude to the Khe Sanh Marines by presenting me with a case of Jim Beam Black Label, for the officers and staff NCOs at Khe Sanh, for the Marine Corps birthday celebration.

As this time of year was not ideal time for flying, the monsoon rains were in full force and flights heading north were few and far between. I was full of wonder and deep gratitude towards all the members of the Air Force who made it possible for me to sit with these supplies on the flight line while awaiting a flight back to Khe Sanh.

The eighth and ninth of November were spent mostly pulling guard duty on my precious cargo. After chow the rains let up somewhat and I set up a cot in the transit building. with my supplies, hoping for a flight to materialize soon and tried for some shut-eye.

I awoke later that evening with someone calling out my name in an anxious voice. It was MSgt Kearsage leaning over my face, telling me I needed to get up and to grab my side arms and cartridge belt, that he needed my help.

He informed me that Dong Ha had received heavy NVA artillery and rocket fire that evening and suffered quite a few casualties.. There were eighteen Marines awaiting transportation to Danang's 3rd Marine Division Graves Registration.

A Marine C-130 was sitting on the flight line awaiting a Marine escort to accompany the returning Marines and carry their SRBs (Service Record Book) back to Da Nang.

I boarded the plane introducing myself to the crew and we were airborne in just a few minutes. As we approached Dong Ha's airstrip, I could make out existing fires on the base and exploded debris littering the airstrip. We touched down quickly, taxied to an area where ground personnel signaled us to approach. The plane's ramp dropped, the Crew Chief and I deplaned and approached an area where we observed body bags next to some building from which more body bags were being carried.

An officer gave me eighteen SRBs from which we verified each Marine's name and service number with the I.D. tag on the body bags. I also assisted with the loading of our dead Marine brothers and shortly the plane's ramp was raised by the Crew Chief. We sat down amongst these silent Marines, as the roar of the four turbo-props increased in intensity and the plane rushed down the runway with its precious cargo. Sitting there amid those body bags, holding those SRBs, silently communicating with each and every one of those Marines, and acknowledging the deep sense of loss which I felt. The red shadows of the planes combat lights allowed my tears to flow unabated and sobs to be unheard beneath the sound of the turbo-props. I vaguely remember rising up and approaching the pilots cabin and thanking both of the pilots for having performed this dangerous special flight.

Back in Danang, I bade farewell to the flight crew, monitored the unloading of those eighteen Marines, once again cross checking names from body bags and SRB's, then turned those SRBs over to 3rd Marine Division Graves Registration officials.

It was around 2300 hrs. as I made my way back to the transit building totally exhausted and in a somewhat state of shock of this great loss. I was experiencing the visions of a few months back, of my former Scout Sgt. Phillip Van Duesen and Radio Operator Gale Gotti, both of whom I had lost in a NVA ambush while on patrol southwest of Hill 881S, Khe Sanh.

I slept on the airstrip next to my supplies, at the transit building, not really in tune with all of which was going down then. I awoke before dawn feeling and hearing the rains coming down. Now I worried about not making it back to Khe Sanh with my supplies before the Marine Corps Birthday observation, and all those Marines covered in red mud from the clay which made up the Khe Sanh Valley.

It was around 0930 hrs., while I was enjoying a pecan nut roll, along with some A.F. coffee, when MSgt Kearsage approached me and stated we might have space on a Air America Caribou flight bound for Khe Sanh.1t was carrying some Special Forces personnel, some Bru tribe members, some supplies and a couple of caged pigs which were slated for Lang Vei, Quang Tri Province, the Special Forces camp just outside of Khe Sanh.

Half an hour later I was indeed boarding the strange, fragile looking plane, with its unusual cargo and passengers.

Coming into Khe Sanh airspace we encountered low clouds and poor visibility. Seat belts tight, the caged pigs shrieking and crapping, we made a sudden descent through the clouds ending up with a waterfall on the northwestern side of the plane's fuselage appearing outside my cabin window. It seemed like a straight drop down to the airstrip matting, before the pilot could stop the aft section of the plane gyrating in that turbulence. I sure had my doubts about survival, landing, and my continued existence or me getting back to the "world." The tiger claw hanging from my neck was being squeezed frantically by my fingers when we were rolled to reality by the back thrust of the planes twin engines.

All's well, which ends well!! Mission accomplished. First Sergeant Noll, Captain Pardee, and the representatives of the 26th Marine Regiment were given possession of these birthday supplies, minus one bottle of Jim Beam which I brought up to Hill 881S and presented to 1 st Lt Guy Pete, Commander, First Platoon, B-I-26. A great Marine.

Happy Birthday Marines

THE BATTLE OF KHE SANH AND ITS RETELLINGS

What one Vietnam War battle, celebrated by the press and the military as a turning point towards an inevitable American victory, says about certainty and authoritativeness.
Conor Frieder THE ATLANTIC

The Battle of Khe Sanh began 50 years ago this week when roughly 20,000 North Vietnamese troops surrounded an isolated combat base held by roughly 5,500 Marines. The marines could not be reinforced or resupplied except by air, and the enemy had attacked during monsoon season, when the weather would limit flights. General William Westmoreland, commander of U.S. forces in Vietnam, ordered them to fight to hold the base rather than evacuate.

The North Vietnamese hoped to repeat the sort of victory won years earlier at Dien Bien Phu, when similarly besieged French forces were overrun and slaughtered.

President Johnson followed the 77-day ordeal with a scale model of the battlefield in the Oval Office. The public read about the besieged marines in newspapers as the fighting unfolded: the American servicemen bombarded by artillery and reliant on resupply from aircrafts that came under heavy fire on approach and departure.

The United States ultimately held the base at a cost of 2,500 Americans killed. 2,500 Americans were wounded. And thousands of Vietnamese fighters were killed.

Today, we know that the Americans ordered to risk their lives at Khe Sanh did so under a commander-in-chief who already believed that victory in Vietnam was unlikely. We know that the brave men who fought impressively to save the base would be ordered to abandon it utterly almost as soon as the enemy's forces had withdrawn. And we know that the United States later withdrew from Vietnam in defeat, abandoned its allies, and watched the country fall to communism (then suffer the repression, want, and starvation so often caused by that economic system).

What followed Khe Sanh doesn't diminish the courage or sacrifice displayed by U.S. forces there, but does remind us of our obligation as citizens to urge against dumb wars and to spare young Americans from being asked to die for a politician's mistake.

With that in mind, one artifact of Khe Sanh that I gravitated towards while marking this anniversary was an official U.S. military account of the battle printed and declassified in 1969. At the time, the war raged under Richard Nixon, a corrupt commander-in-chief who sabotaged peace talks while running for president and spoke privately as if getting reelected was a major factor in prolonging the war. The report was authored by Captain Moyers S. Shore II, with a prologue by Commandant of the Marine Corps L.F. Chapman Jr. and a Foreword by Westmoreland.

Put another way, it was produced by men and institutions who wanted to keep prosecuting the war in Vietnam, and who hoped anti-war protesters would not prevail.

"As a history, this work is not intended to prove any point, but rather to record objectively the series of events which came to be called the Battle of Khe Sanh," the report's preface stated, suggesting the ethos of a straightforward accounting of facts.

But that same preface declared that the battle "not only denied the North Vietnamese Army a much needed victory but reaffirmed to the world the intention of the United States to hold the line in Southeast Asia," adding, "in addition to having been a contest of men and machines, this was the test of a nation's will." Finally, it stated, the battle showed Hanoi "the futility of its war of aggression."

In fact, America lacked the will to stay in Vietnam, though it did have the will to hold Khe Sanh. And Hanoi did not conclude from the battle that its war making was futile.

The body of the report makes a better attempt at straightforwardness, but is nevertheless interesting in the ways that it departs from that ethos and leads readers astray.

It is too much to expect the Department of Defense to describe war in the manner of Paul Fussell. But anyone who has delved into accounts of what it is like to be under artillery shelling, or spoken to veterans recalling the experience years later, can grasp the disservice done to returning vets by romanticized passages like this one:

"Attention to Colors."
The order having been given, Captain Wiliam H. Dabney, a product of the Virginia Military Institute, snapped to attention, faced the jerry-rigged flagpole, and saluted, as did every other man in Company I, 3d Battalion, 26th Marines. The ceremony might well have been at any one of a hundred military installations around the world except for a few glaring irregularities.

The parade ground was a battle-scarred hilltop to the west of Khe Sanh and the men in formation stood half-submerged in trenches or foxholes. Instead of crisply starched utilities, razor sharp creases, and gleaming brass, these Marines sported scraggly beards, ragged trousers, and rotted helmet liner straps. The only man in the company who could play a bugle, Second Lieutenant Owen S. Mathews, lifted the pock-marked instrument to his lips and spat out a choppy version of "To the Colors" while two enlisted men raced to the RC-292 radio antenna which served as the flag-pole and gingerly attached the Stars and Stripes. As the mast with its shredded banner came upright,the Marines could hear the ominous "thunk," "thunk," "thunk," to the southwest of their position which meant that North Vietnamese 120 mortar rounds had left their tubes. They also knew that in 21 seconds those "thunks" would be replaced by much louder, closer sounds, but no one budged until Old Glory waved high over the hill.

When Lieutenant Matthews sharply cut of the last note of his piece, Company I disappeared; men dropped into trenches, dived headlong into foxholes, or scrambled into bunkers. The area which moments before had been bristling with humanity was suddenly a ghost town. Seconds later explosions walked across the hilltop spewing black smoke, dirt, and debris into the air. Rocks, splinters, and spent shell fragments rained on the flattened Marines but, as usual, no one was hurt. As quickly as the attack came, it was over. While the smoke lazily drifted away, a much smaller banner rose from the Marines' positions. A pole adorned with a pair of red, silk panties—Maggie's Drawers—was waved back and forth above one trench line to inform the enemy that he had missed again. A few men stood up and jeered or cursed at the distant gunners; others simply saluted with an appropriate obscene gesture. The daily flag-raising ceremony on Hill 881 South was over.

The episode was just one obscure incident which coupled with hundreds of others made up the battle for Khe Sanh .

Little wonder too few Americans grasped the trauma of returning Vets when the Defense Department was at times portraying battles like Khe Sanh as hundreds of semi-jocular moments. Some survivors who served there are still haunted by the shelling.

The rest of the report includes much that is of value to historians trying to understand the battle, but also passages that frustrate in hindsight. Here is one of the latter:

The six men were dressed like Marines and, while no friendly patrols were reported in the area, he challenged the strangers in clear English to be sure. There was no reply. A second challenge was issued and, this time, the lieutenant saw one of the men make a motion as if going for a hand grenade. The Marines opened fire and quickly cut down five of the six intruders. One enemy soldier died with his finger inserted in the pin of a grenade. The awesome hitting power of the M-l6 rifle was quite evident since all five men were apparently dead by the time they hit the ground.

In fact, the glaring flaws of the M-16 rifle were scandalous, deadly to Americans, and already long since known to military brass in 1969. Still other passages proved prescient, as when the authors posited that the enemy gained through the Tet Offensive a tremendous psychological change in the mindset of the American public.

The final words in the report quote an editorial published in the Washington Star after the 77-day battle was over:

To be sure, Khe Sanh will be a subject of controversy for a long time, but this much about it is indisputable: It has won a large place in the history of the Vietnam war as an inspiring example of American and Allied valor. One day, in fact, the victory over the siege may be judged a decisive turning point that finally convinced he enemy he could not win.

Of course, the victory over the siege will never be so judged.

To highlight all the ways that editorialists and military officials of 1969 were wrong about Khe Sanh, or misleading in how they portrayed it, is not to denigrate them. Some believed every word they wrote; others misled with the best of intentions.

Yet returning to their flawed reports (and analogous historical artifacts) is useful in that it allows us to study the words of men who spoke and wrote with an air of authoritativeness—who struck many contemporaries as authoritative—yet were wrong in consequential ways. Poring over the flaws in their logic and the rhetorical techniques that led bygone observers astray helps remind us to probe the biases of those who mean to inform or persuade; to be on guard against romanticized accounts of war; to bear in mind that its fog can blind even those military officials best positioned to see what is before their eyes; and to otherwise be more clear-eyed.

Indeed, that project honors the men who fought there by making it less likely that others won't be asked to do so needlessly. To give them the rest of their due 50 years later, I'll end by quoting the Presidential citation that honored them as a collective:

For extraordinary heroism in action against North Vietnamese Army forces during the battle for Khe Sanh in the Republic of Vietnam from 20 January to 1 April 1968...

The 26th Marines was opposed by numerically superior forces--two North Vietnamese Army divisions, strongly reinforced with artillery, tank, anti-aircraft artillery and rocket units. The enemy, deployed to take advantage of short lines of communications, rugged mountainous terrain, jungle, and adverse weather conditions, was determined to destroy the Khe Sanh Combat Base in conjunction with large scale offensive operations in the two northern provinces of the Republic of Vietnam.

The 26th Marines, occupying a small but critical area, was daily subjected to hundreds of rounds of intensive artillery, mortar and rocket fire. In addition, fierce ground attacks were conducted by the enemy in an effort to penetrate the friendly positions. Despite overwhelming odds, the 26th Marines remained resolute and determined, maintaining the integrity of its positions and inflicting heavy losses on the enemy. When monsoon weather greatly reduced air support and compounded the problems of aerial resupply, the men of the 26th Marines stood defiantly firm, sustained by their own professional esprit and high sense of duty. Through their indomitable will, staunch endurance, and resolute courage, the 26th Marines and supporting units held the Khe Sanh Combat Base. The actions of the 26th Marines contributed substantially to the failure of the Viet Cong and North Vietnamese Army winter/spring offensive. The enemy forces were denied the military and psychological victory they so desperately sought.

By their gallant fighting spirit and their countless individual acts of heroism, the men of the 26th Marines (Reinforced) established a record of illustrious courage and determination in keeping with the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and the United States Naval Service.

THE SIEGE OF KHE SANH BEGINS

BETH CRUMLEY MCA&F

This Friday I took a few minutes out of my day to wish my friend Glenn Prentice a very happy birthday. Now I will be the very first to admit that I am TERRIBLE at remembering birthdays, but his always sticks in my mind....On 20 January 1968, he was serving with the India Company, 3d Battalion, 26th Marines on Hill 881S.

He celebrated his 19th birthday while on a reconnaissance-in-force up Hill 881N. Said Prentice, "44 years ago we went up Hill 881N engaged the NVA---what a day! The start of Tet---I turned 19--thought I would never see my 20th Birthday---it was that bad..."

I have spoken several times on the siege of Khe Sanh Combat Base and the hill outposts. One of the questions I am most frequently asked is, "How did it all begin?"

The village of Khe Sanh was composed of nine separate hamlets that sat astride Route 9 in the northwest corner of South Vietnam. This was the nexus of movement from Laos into northern Quang Tri Province. Marines had initially carried out two battalion-sized operations near Khe Sanh in 1966.

By February 1967, elements of the 9th Marines moved into the area around Khe Sanh, to protect a detachment of Seabees whose mission was to extend and improve the airfield. Increased contact led to reinforcement of Khe Sanh with a second company. By April, the Marines had encounter strong North Vietnamese Army forces in fortified positions. Two battalions of the 3d Marines were committed to the area. In some of the bloodiest fighting of the war, which came to be known as "the Hill Fights," the Marines gained control of the commanding terrain overlooking the combat base.

By October, the North Vietnamese 325C Division had once again moved into the area. Operation Scotland, the mission of defending Khe Sanh Combat Base, and using it as a base for offensive operations against NVA forces, became the responsibility of the 26th Marines. Said Col David E. Lownds, commanding the 26th Marines, "All indications are that we are going to get hit. How bad, I can't say."

In early December 1967, the 3d Battalion, 26th Marines moved to Khe Sanh and were briefed that the NVA was building up forces in the area. Ordered to sweep the area south and west of the base, the battalion moved from Lang Vei north and west to within 2 kilometers of the Laotian border. The Marines then swept northward, finally arriving back at Khe Sanh shortly before Christmas 1967. They made no contact with the NVA nor did they find any evidence of recent enemy presence in that area.
At this time, India Company, 3/26 was under the command of Captain Bill Dabney, a Canadian-born mustang who happened to be the son-in-law of Chesty Puller. Given the mission of occupying and defending 881S, Dabney's Marines made an overland march from Khe Sanh to the hill. From 27 December through 17 January, India Company patrolled the area aggressively, sometimes to the limit of the range of the attached 81mm mortars (about 4000 meters n addition to these company-sized patrols in the area, recon teams were also patrolling. On 18 January, the Commanding officer of 3/26 informed India that recon team Dockleaf had been ambushed and had too many casualties to break contact and move to an LZ. India was ordered to send a force up 881N to locate Dockleaf and guide in the helos. India's 3d platoon, led by 2dLt Thomas Brindley, was patrolling in the area so the mission was his. It was already mid-afternoon and Dockleaf had to be located before nightfall. Brindley and his men left flaks jackets and packs behind and made a forced march, almost a run, in an effort to find team the embattled recon team. The platoon was successful. Dockleaf was evacuated and Brindley's platoon returned to 881S.

That night, however, India was informed that the recon team, while under very heavy enemy fire and subsequent evacuation, had lost a radio and some

India Company's position on Hill 881S, during the siege. To the right of center is Hill 881N, where NVA rocket, mortar and anti-aircraft sites were encoding sheets during the ambush. India was ordered to send another force north to recover them.

At first light on the morning of 19 January, 1st Platoon, commanded by 2dLt Harry Fromme, left 881S, headed northward. About halfway to the crest of 881N, Fromme's platoon made contact with a large NVA force moving south. Two Marines were wounded and another, machine gunner PFC Leonard Newton, was killed in the ensuing firefight. 2dLt Chuck Schneider later wrote to his parents and described the events. In this letter, although written almost a month later, the details of the action are riveting.

"We made point-to-point contact with an NVA patrol. Our patrol was moving in column (the thick vegetation made it the best for travel), the elephant grass was head high and therefore, since they were on the higher ground, they were able to see us before we saw them There was a sudden burst of automatic fire and two of our men fell wounded. We returned fire as best we could, but the rear of the column could not fire because of our own men in front. For the minute the enemy had fire superiority and while they had us pinned down, they began to move people off to our left flank. One of our machine gunners ran to the front to try and cover a withdrawal. The grass was so tall you couldn't see to fire unless you stood up, so he got to his feet and began to fire his M60 from the shoulder. The enemy fire slackened and we began to pull back, dragging the wounded. Again the fire picked up and again he stood and fired from the shoulder. The fifth time he did this, a sniper shot him through the right eye. It was just about then that we started receiving heavy fire from our left flank. We were in a bad spot because they could see us from above, but the heavy grass prevented us from seeing them. The crossfire grew intense, but miraculously no one else was injured. Then my rounds arrived, 105mm artillery from Khe Sanh. I began to pound the enemy to our north. Grabbing another radio, I called an 81mm mortar mission to our left. We still couldn't move since the rounds were falling so close that fragments from our own artillery and mortars were zinging over our heads."

The platoon was not strong enough to continue the mission alone and was ordered to return to base. Throughout the night, artillery and mortars were fired, to prevent the enemy force from continuing south toward India's position

Said, Captain Dabney, "I requested from battalion, permission to have a reconnaissance-in-force to 881N with India Company....I asked them to send up a platoon from Mike Company, 3/26, which was then at the Khe Sanh Combat base perimeter, to help man the 881S line while we were gone." As the mission was being planned India received word that the regiment wanted to insert recon Team Barkood onto 881N.

The plan was simple. The Marines were to move out north toward 881N in two mutually supporting columns. India Company's 1st and 2d platoons were positioned on the left, 3d platoon was on the right augmented by Team Barkwood. Captain Dabney thought contact with the enemy was likely....The plan was simple; the reality of combat is much more chaotic.

The Marines jumped off the following morning, 20 January 1968 at 0500. Corpsman Mike Ray said, "We moved silently down the hill. We slipped down through the waist high elephant grass... through the fog cover. As we went deeper, the bright sun turned into a faint glow. The fog must have been several hundred feet thick."

As the fog lifted, Brindley's 3d Platoon, operating to the right on the eastern ridge, was poised to take a small hill. As the Marines move forward they were hit by RPG and automatic weapons fire. Three Marines were seriously wounded. Captain Dabney ordered Brindley to break off the attack and evacuate the wounded. Brindley reported to India Company's XO, Lt Richard Foley that he was confident he could take the hill. He was ordered to do so after heavy preparatory fire from mortars and artillery. Cpl Charles Bryan realized that 3d Platoon was understrength and volunteered Team Barkwood as an additional assault element. My dear friend PJ Pagano, then a corporal, was a member of Team Barkwood. He later said,

"It was decided that we would get on line with the infantry and assault the immediate objective. We were on the right and the infantry was on the left. The lieutenant said 'fix bayonets!' and we all looked at him at the same time. Recon guys usually don't have bayonets...but the real reason we looked is because, at least for me, I thought this is it; the real thing! Recon guys usually don't do walking assaults!"

Corporal PJ Pagano (Photograph courtesy of Bill Messer)

Concurrently, Captain Dabney decided to advance with 1st and 2d Platoons on the western ridge. If they could seize their objective, a small hill, they could provide covering fire for 3d Platoon. Said one Marine, "We moved out on line and began to climb the hill. About 3/4 of the way up, the enemy waited. When we were 50 meters from them, they pulled out the stopper. We were hit by .50 caliber machine gun fire, AK-47s and RPGs. They were well dug in with two men to a hole. One would fire while the other reloaded and intermittently tossed grenades. We took 15 casualties in the first ten seconds. We kept on moving but then were hit from the right rear by 2 .50 caliber machine guns. We couldn't move any further and had to fall back. I watched one corpsman dash out 7 times under heavy fire to pull wounded to safety."

All but two men were wounded. Fromme consolidated his position and directed mortar fire to the front but did not have sufficient strength to hold the position and evacuate the wounded. 2d Platoon, under 2dLt Mike Thomas, set up a landing zone. The NVA were everywhere. A CH-46 helicopter from HMM-262 attempted to land, was shot down, crashed to the west of the LZ, rolled and burst into flames. Marines from both platoons, led by Lt. Mike Thomas, rushed to the crash site and rescued the crew, all of them wounded, some severely.

(According to HMM-262's command chronology, "while resupplying Hill 881 near Khe Sanh, Capt Ropelewski took a 50 cal hit through the main fuel line. Capt Ropelewski crash landed the burning CH-46 in a nearby zone." I spoke with the squadron historian, Kreig Loftin, who stated, "Beth - I remember this incident. Curtis Larson was the crew chief. As the burning aircraft approached the crash zone, he and his gunner had to jump out while the aircraft was still 30-40 feet in the air. They both suffered broken ankles, legs and such. Larson showed me his flak jacket afterward. The back panel was completely melted.")

In the midst of the chaos on the western ridge, Captain Dabney ordered 3d Platoon to renew the attack on the right. The chaos grew. The Marines of 3d Platoon surged up the 30 degree slope behind Brindley. The NVA brought everything they had to bear on the advancing platoon. Wrote Lt Schneider,

"Tom Brindley, the 3d platoon commander, drew his .45 pistol from his holster and, like something out of the movies, began to move his people on the line and move up the hill. It was nothing short of magnificent. They just kept moving- men falling as they went, but everyone else just kept walking shooting from the hip and tossing grenades as they came over the top. By that time, a platoon sergeant and all three squad leaders were casualties. As they stepped over the crest of the hill a sniper shot Tom through the heart."

Brindley's last words were "Keep low, keep going, stay on line." Captain Dabney later said that Tom Brindley led his men over the crest of that hill by the sheer force of his example. He added, "the platoon found itself holding the piece of high ground with depleted ammunition stocks and...a lance corporal in command."

The recon team was in no better position than 3d Platoon. Pagano recalled, "Almost as soon as we started out a hole opened between us and the infantry on the left. I shouted to Cpl Bryan that I was moving forward to plug the hole. The terrain and elephant grass soon caused us to lose contact with the infantry and each other. We all continued up the hill. We stopped for a moment and an 81mm mortar landed right in front of us. I was hit a second later and (another recon Marine) Lionel Guerra was hit a second after that. We were taking fire from the Marines at the bottom of the hill as well as from the NVA whom we were amongst. I was hit by a Marine bullet. I got on the air without much ceremony and said "Check fire, Check fire. You're cutting us to pieces up here." A second later Cpl Bryan called to me to stop the mortar and rifle fire from the friendlies. I told him I had done so and that I was hit...He crawled over and while I was on the radio (now working choppers) he got up on his elbows to rip open a battle dressing for my wound. An NVA no further than six feet away cranked a round at us that passed my left ear, over my chest, and into Bryan's armpit. I stopped transmitting after a while because my hands and face fell asleep and I became very tired. I had tied a tourniquet but I'd lost a great deal of blood and was still losing some.

Corporal Charles Bryan

2d Platoon, which by now had succeeded in evacuating 1st Platoon's wounded on the western ridge was ordered to the right flank of 3d Platoon to reinforce and to repel counterattacks, to evacuate 3d Platoon's casualties and to locate the missing recon team. Said Pagano, "Some new choppers came on station and I heard them talking about Team Barkwood in the past tense. I realized that because I had been off the air for a while they thought I had died. Using the weight of my head to key the set I transmitted, "All stations this net be advised. This station is still up."

(In the confusion of battle Team Barkwood had lost physical contact with 3d Platoon and actually found themselves -8 Marines- assaulting an NVA company.) 2d Platoon's Lt Mike Thomas did not survive the afternoon. Thomas had located 5 of the missing Marines. One at a time he hoisted them onto his back and carried them to safety. He found a 6th missing Marines and while carrying him was wounded in the face. He refused medical attention. Aware of the fact that there are still two Marines missing he made an attempt to reach them and was fatally shot.

Brindley, Bryan and Thomas were all awarded Navy Crosses posthumously. Steve Thomas, brother of Mike later said,

"Mike was one of those few people who walked through this world and left large footprints. He touched so many people in his few years. He joined the Marine Corps on this own accord, because there was a job to be done. He told our father, that someone had to do it, so it might as well be him. MIKE HAD PURPOSE IN HIS LIFE!"

India Company now held both ridgelines but with very high casualties. There were 42 casualties including 7 killed in action. Captain Dabney asked for reinforcements but the request was denied. At the time, Captain Dabney was unaware of an extraordinary event that was occurred a world away from India Company. In the early afternoon of 20 January, a white flag appeared at the eastern edge of the airstrip at Khe Sanh Combat Base. La Thanh Tonc, a lieutenant in the North Vietnamese Army surrendered. Immediately interrogated, the disgruntled Tonc reported that all outlying positions around the base would be attacked that night. India was ordered to return to 881S.

Gunnery Sergeant Max Friedlander, who was part of the interrogation-translation team recorded the following:

"Hill 881N is presently surrounded. There is a company of sappers deployed in the general area of 881N. This sapper company will be the company used against Hill 861. Once Hill 861 has fallen, the general attack against the Khe Sanh Combat Base will begin."

That night the enemy hit Khe Sanh and all the outlying outposts EXCEPT 881S. It's likely the reconnaissance in force mauled the NVA so badly they couldn't attack that night. Chuck Schneider wrote,

"It's my opinion, and that of most of the officers here, that our attack that day made them rush their plans for an attack on Hill 861 and Khe Sanh. That next morning at 0430 Khe Sanh took 300 rounds of incoming mortar, rockets and artillery. Hill 861 was assaulted by several hundred NVA. We fired 1400 rounds of 81mm mortar ammo and nearly a thousand rounds of 105mm artillery in their defense…. When the sun rose that morning the hillside was strewn with bodies….All day long I shot artillery at enemy rocket, mortar and anti-aircraft guns in our area. The order of business ever since the 21st has been to keep your head down to keep it from getting shot away."

Glenn Prentice was right. He was very lucky to see his 20th birthday.

The Marines at Khe Sanh and on the outlying hills were forced to dig in and endure a siege that lasted from 21 January until 17 April. Forty two Marines and corpsmen died on or near the hill, and another 200 were wounded. (Those numbers do not include aviation casualties.) Those who survived endured a 77-day siege that tested them to the limit of their endurance. Said Colonel William Dabney, "By enduring, they triumphed. They were magnificent!"

PROPAGANDISTS MASQUERADING AS HISTORIANS

by Terry Garlock
Scheduled for publication Wed, Jan 31 in The Citizen, a local Fayette County, GA newspaper

I was only one of many Vietnam veterans who wrote opinion columns criticizing the Vietnam War film by Ken Burns and Lynn Novick, opining their work seemed more like propaganda than history. In doing so I occasionally used "Burns" as shorthand for the pair, to which Ms. Novick emailed me her objection. She is correct, I should consistently include her name as co-producer because she is equally culpable in the hit piece they brazenly call a documentary.

So, Ms. Novick and Mr. Burns, this is for you. My back-handed compliment is that your wholly inaccurate film is a slick rationalization for aging Americans who, decades ago, loudly encouraged our enemy while we were killing each other in combat. For those harboring doubts about actively opposing us in their youth while we served our country in a war, your film may have supplied just the soothing salve they need.

You bent the truth in your film too far, too consistently, too repetitively, and omitted too much to leave any room for me to believe those errors, omissions, distortions, half-truths and complete falsehoods were remotely accidental.

Like a house of distorted mirrors, you portrayed the murderous and avowed Stalinist Ho Chi Minh as a nationalist driven by reunification of North and South Vietnam rather than his real commitment to Communist conquest of free South Vietnam. Your film repeatedly depicted the war as unwinnable, the North Vietnamese cause as just, war crimes between the two sides as morally equivalent, American troops as victims, South Vietnamese as mere bit players, all that and much more of your content completely opposite of the truth. You selected for dominant interviews from the tiny percentage of American combat veterans with a grievance who joined the protestors when they returned home.

I cannot know the motivation in your hearts, but I have the stark impression that your plan from the very beginning was to delegitimize America's role in the war and justify the anti-war left by very selectively emphasizing negatives and minimizing positives to shape the film's message to your liking.

There is a tragic irony in protests by the anti-war left and your justification for them. The noble cause of the Vietnam War was trying to stop the spread of Communism in Southeast Asia, especially important given the hegemony of China in the region. Even so, while we answered our country's call and honorably performed our difficult duty, leadership in the White House and Pentagon created a patchwork of micromanagement and idiotic war-fighting limitations, obstacles that got thousands of us killed while preventing victory. Those egregious and very real failures alone would have been worthy of protest, but your buddies on the left either didn't notice or felt compelled to manufacture their own demons, like John Kerry's fantastic lie that we were raping, murdering and rampaging in Vietnam like Genghis Khan.

The outrage is our enemy's daily atrocities against their own people, juxtaposed against how we Americans defended and helped those civilians in a hundred ways, both ignored by the news media while American troops were maligned.

Ms. Novick, you were just eleven years old when America withdrew from Vietnam in 1973, so you might have missed personally knowing the effects of false stereotypes about Vietnam and its veterans.

Like so many others, I came away from that experience with my eyes opened, having learned bywatching young Americans the true meaning of honor, courage and trust. Those men and women were then and still are the finest people of character I have ever known.

I saw my fellow helicopter pilots fly into enemy fire routinely, taking mortal risks to protect civilians and their brothers, and I saw grunts do the same crazy things for each other. I flew gun cover for Dustoff crews braving enemy fire to pick up wounded, and I flew gun cover for LRPs sneaking in enemy turf, the bravest men I have ever seen; if you have an open mind, read Six Silent Men by Gary Linderer to understand how bold our Rangers were.

I saw doctors, nurses and orderlies drive themselves to physical and emotional exhaustion every day as they struggled to send us home alive, and still we found time to send medical help to poor villages where medicine had never been seen. There was much to admire, and when I finally wrote a book my title tells my sentiments: Strength and Honor: America's Best in Vietnam.

Anti-war voices were overwhelming, and America never knew what a fine job their youth had done in Vietnam, despite impediments imposed by our own government, despite collaboration with the enemy by our own fellow citizens.

When we came home, the country seemed to us to have turned principles upside down. Wearing the American uniform invited hostility while refusing to serve was somehow a virtue. These remarkable troops, young enough to be called boys but now battle-hardened men, never lost a single significant battle against a very tough enemy, but they didn't know how or want to engage in political argument. And so many like me kept their head down and went on with life. Nobody wanted to hear about our experience anyway, for two reasons.

First, everybody already knew all the answers about Vietnam, they had seen it on TV. Second, in those days the Vietnam War was a shunned topic, something dirty not discussed in polite company.

Even some family members skirted the subject, wary of the rumors they heard about rampant war crimes, drug addiction and vets prone to snap into violence. During his first visit home, Tony Foster's mother asked him what kind of drugs he was on.

False stereotypes took root from repetition in a media leaning hard against the war. Movies reinforced the lies with absurd stories and unreal characters that indulged Hollywood's ridiculous fantasies of the war.

Period fiction followed suit, and TV dramas occasionally created a Vietnam vet when they needed an unbalanced, unpredictable and dangerous character.

Spreading these attitudes has consequences. Not everyone thought the worst of us, but enough did to change the national mood.

Even small slights left lasting impressions. Jay Standish escorted his date to their seats near the front of an off-Broadway theater, proudly wearing his Marine Corps dress blues, prompting boos from many in the audience. A Sgt. named Chip went to see a Priest for pre-marital counseling wearing his Army dress greens, and the Priest told him to come back when he was wearing decent clothing.

Vietnam vets learned to leave the war off their resume to avoid rejection in the first cull of job applicants. They soon knew to keep quiet in college classes since anti-war professors used their grading pen as a weapon.

ROTC membership plummeted and some professors wouldn't accept members as students. Military recruiters were ejected from campus. The uniform was not popular, as R.J. DelVecchio learned by hostility to his Marine Corps uniform at the University of Maryland and was advised not to wear it again on campus. Wearing a uniform made some feel invisible waiting to be served in a restaurant.

Drew Johnson, who ferried Navy aircraft to Vietnam over an extended period, returned through California airports at least two dozen times and saw the escalation of vitriol aimed at our returning troops by anti-war protestors who, by my measure, were unfit to shine a veteran's shoes. Officials and most in the public merely looked the other way while protestors yelled "babykiller" and worse at returning vets, threw nasty splatter packets at them and frequently used their own spit.

In 1971, my commanding officer told me to remind my men not to wear their uniform off-base, for their own personal safety.

Some anti-war tactics were despicable. An F-105 fighter pilot I will leave nameless bet his life every time he flew into North Vietnam through the toughest air defenses in the world. When he was shot down, even before his wife received official notification, anti-war activists called to say her husband was a baby-killing ahole and deserved what he got.

There were many thousands of these uncouth episodes incited by fabrications from the anti-war left, and they were made worse that they were aimed at Americans who served honorably and sacrificed much. And yet every Vietnam vet I know is proud of their service, fiercely patriotic and doesn't want even a shred of sympathy.

They do want one thing. They want the truth told about them, their enemy, their war.

Now, after forty something years, Ms. Novick and Mr. Burns, along comes the misrepresentation you call a documentary, very pretty but with only fleeting intersections with the truth and reviving conflict long ago buried. It seems, to me at least, that you pre-planned your strategy to build up to your conclusion in support of your friends on the left, "The Vietnam War was a tragedy, immeasurable and irredeemable."

Even with 10 episodes over 18 hours, you left out vital pieces of the story. In 1974, in the aftermath of Watergate, Democrats were elected in a landslide and the new Congress violated America's promise by cutting off funding for South Vietnam's self-defense. Then when the Communists attacked South Vietnam in massive force, Congress refused to honor America's pledge to come to their aid. The left's view seems to be North Vietnam's conquest had the happy result of reunification. Senator J.

William Fulbright, who provided the forum for that spectacular liar John Kerry, said about the fall of Saigon that he was ". . . no more depressed than I would be about Arkansas losing a football game to Texas."

Trivializing the human cost of Communist victory, you didn't mention tens of thousands of executions, the million or so sent to brutal re-education camps, the panicked populace fleeing in rickety over packed boats and dying by the tens of thousands. You neglected North Vietnam's obscene practice of bulldozing South Vietnamese graves, and the influx of North Vietnamese to take over the best farms, businesses, homes and jobs in South Vietnam. And you swept under the rug America's shame, the betrayal of our ally, never mind the genocide by Communists as they murdered two million in Cambodia next door.

All in all, Ms. Novick and Mr. Burns, kudos on the slick appearance mixing photos, film clips, tilted narration and sad music to set the mood for your biased content. I think you have succeeded in making your semi-factual slop believable to a naïve public, and students in schools you send it to will likely lap it up because they don't know better.

That means we will need to redouble our efforts to tell the story true.

As I tell students when I speak to them about the Vietnam War, "Why does this ancient history matter to you? Because you need to know how a false history takes root, and you need to be smart enough to beware propaganda when you turn on TV news." Or watch a film labeled a "documentary."

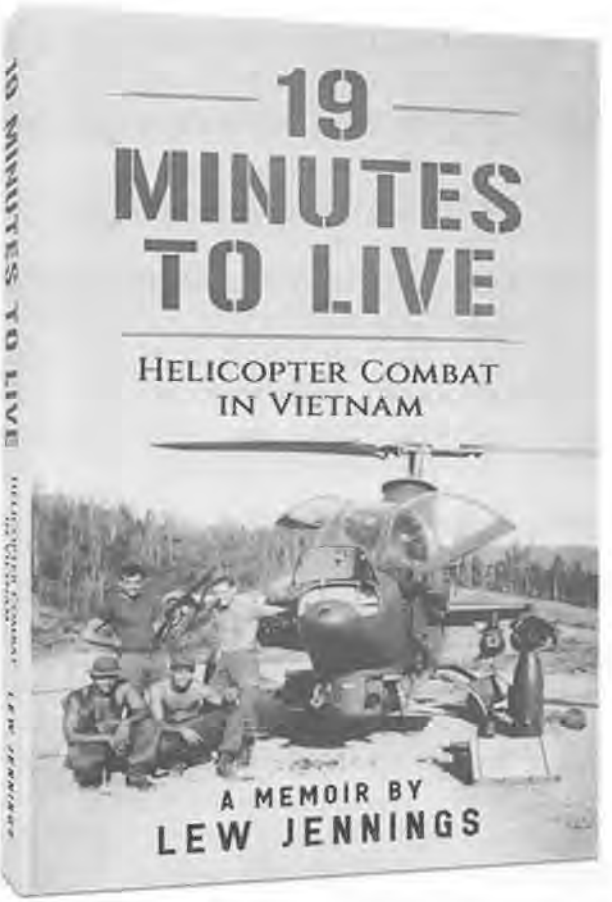
BOOK REVIEW

"19 Minutes to Live" has nearly 400 pages and over 80 pictures that vividly describe the incredible courage and determination of helicopter pilots and crews supporting their heroes that carried a rucksack and a rifle in Vietnam. Over 12,000 helicopters were used in the Vietnam War and nearly half, 5,086, were lost. Helicopter pilots and crews accounted for nearly 10 percent of all the US casualties with nearly 5,000 killed and an untold number of wounded.



ABOUT THE AUTHOR

"Lew Jennings is a retired Army officer, former airline pilot and business executive who flew over 700 Air Cavalry Cobra Gunship Helicopter missions and received Three Distinguished Flying Crosses for Valor.

This Vietnam war memoir describes first-hand the harrowing experiences of pilots and crews in helicopter combat operations, from the far South to the DMZ, including the infamous A Shau Valley, Hamburger Hill, LZ Airborne and others.

LOCAL VIETNAM VETERANS RECALL CARNAGE OF TET OFFENSIVE, LAUNCHED THIS DAY 50 YEARS AGO

By Kip Hill kiph@spokesman.com

JOSEPH "HANK" MELANSON, USMC F& E CO 2/26 KHE SANH VETERAN

Hank Melanson remembers his friend's face on that January day a half century ago, outside Khe Sanh in what was then part of South Vietnam.

Three bullets had just ripped through the throat and heart of Ed Heifner, an 18-year-old Marine like Melanson, as the two young men pushed up a hill near the site of a 77-day siege by communist forces. "He had no expression on his face. Just blue-eyed, football player. Young guy. Just no expression on his face at all," Melanson, now 68, said from his home in north central Spokane last week.

The battle that day in the hills near the border with North Vietnam was just the second time Melanson, who had arrived in the southeast Asian country just a few weeks earlier, had been under enemy fire. Before the end of the attacks, which lasted nearly six months, hundreds of American servicemen lost their lives. The battle for Khe Sanh served as a precursor to what came to be known as the Tet Offensive. Named for the lunar new year observed in the country, the North Vietnamese attacked on all fronts in an attempt to demoralize American and South Vietnam forces.

The push became a crucial turning point in the war that helped topple an American presidency and divided public sentiment in the Inland Northwest and throughout the country.

For Melanson, an 18-year-old Marine Corps private from Massachusetts by way of Canada, the larger geopolitical implications of the attack were lost in the daily struggle to stay alive as mortar shells rained without pause. He was a member of the 2nd Battalion of the 26th Marines, which was moved to Khe Sanh in the middle of January. "It was day and night. The whole first three months I didn't sleep. You were just too damned afraid," he said.

Melanson has accumulated books, maps and photographs of the war in his home, and he recently signed a South Vietnamese flag owned by a fellow Marine, Larry Lutz, that has the autograph of servicemen who fought near Khe Sanh. Among Melanson's mementos is a black-and-white printout of Heifner, in his Parma, Ohio, high school football uniform.

An album full of color photographs, some taken during the rare moments of down time during the war's tumultuous turn in 1968, are also among Melanson's mementos. In one, a grinning, shirtless young Melanson smiles broadly into the camera, his sandaled-feet touching each other cross-legged on a beach. In another, he stares down the sights of an M79 grenade launcher.

Holding the combat base near the village of Khe Sanh became an obsession for the American military brass, even as thousands of North Vietnamese regular soldiers and the Viet Cong, armed Communist sympathizers from the south, sought to overrun major cities such as Saigon, Hue and Da Nang. Six thousand Marines, including Melanson, took up positions at Khe Sanh against enemy forces that outnumbered them nearly 7-to-1.

After nine days of fighting at Khe Sanh, the North Vietnamese launched the offensive on Jan. 30. They first attacked the coastal city of Nha Trang, a military headquarters for the U.S. forces. Battles in the cities of Saigon, Hue and dozens of district capitals quickly followed. Violent images of the Tet Offensive's aftermath in South Vietnam were broadcast into homes throughout the United States, slowly turning what had been perceived up until that time as a successful military campaign into growing discord, said Robert Dean, an associate history professor at Eastern Washington University.

"What happened after Tet, was a lot of the people who had been fairly committed supporters of the war in Vietnam simply decided that, under the conditions that existed, the war could not be won," said Dean, who has examined the causes of American escalation in the Vietnam War.

President Lyndon Johnson began an escalation of ground troops in Vietnam in 1965. A Gallup poll taken in September of that year showed 24 percent of Americans believed committing troops was a mistake. By the time of the Tet Offensive, that number had nearly doubled to 46 percent. By the end of 1969, it was near 60 percent.

The cultural upheaval seen across the United States also was felt in the Inland Northwest. In 1965, hundreds of Washington State University students rallied not against the war, but to collect blood donations for American service members overseas, according to an Oct. 19 issue of The Spokesman-Review.

David Rose, then a senior at the university, told the newspaper the drive was inspired by student protests around the country, which he said were "not representative of most college students."

But just three years later, in April 1968, hundreds of students again assembled, this time to call for peace. In October 1969, Gonzaga University canceled classes to observe a national day calling for a moratorium to the conflict.

Peace protesters in Spokane were twice pelted by eggs and tomatoes during demonstrations held in 1967. An April march prompted an unnamed woman to fling the items at marchers and accuse them of "giving aid and comfort to the enemy by their propaganda," according to an account in the April 15 edition of the Spokane Chronicle.

Then, in October, a 17-year-old Montana woman was arrested for heaving eggs and tomatoes at peace marchers outside of the downtown Spokane federal courthouse. Sheila D. McIntyre told police her act of disorderly conduct was fueled by her husband's service overseas. David Carlson was a 19-year-old Navy storekeeper when he returned to his hometown of Spokane in August 1967 during a 30-day leave from his post at Camp Tien Sha, an outpost just southwest of Da Nang. Carlson, now 70, recalled a coldness in the eyes of some people when they realized he was serving in the war.

"There were lots of people against it," Carlson said. "I didn't see any protests, because I was trying to get my 30 days in and get the most out of it."

Carlson returned to Da Nang after his brief visit home. That city, too, became a target of the Viet Cong in the offensive. For Carlson, a member of the Navy's combat engineers known as the Seabees, the ramp up of the war was seen only in the additional bustle at the city's airport and volume of classified mail that needed to be delivered.

"I think it was all building up, you know?" said Carlson, who was part of the first graduating class at Ferris High School.

Carlson's tour ended in March of 1968, just as the first push of the Tet Offensive was ending. But before leaving the country, his routine trip into town to pick up the mail included a brief and stark reminder of the escalating violence that had begun to shock the folks back home, including his mother.

A pile of the dead had been stacked near a bridge into town. A photograph of the grisly scene wound up in Time magazine, Carlson said, which his mother saw and asked him about when he returned. "You learn, pretty quickly and no matter what your age, if there's a lot of bad stuff going on and you see it, you don't want to tell anyone about it at home," he said.

SAM MESSER,
SEABEE KHE SANH 67-68
CBMU-301 DET –B

I submit this photo out of the deepest respect for my Brother Marines that endured Khe Sanh full time. Flying in and out with HMM-363 as a L/Cpl Crew chief I could not understand how they hung in for so long with so little. I often tell friends that Khe Sanh was my turning point. After observing the Marines at Khe Sanh and the surrounding hills, I knew I was a LIFER, I understood what the title MARINE was really all about. This is a photo of my friend Sam Messar ,Seabee, Sam was there from the early start in 67 until he was badly wounded in 68. Sam was not a Marine, but like our Navy Corpsman, to we few that were there he is OUR BROTHER. Sam is a Life Member of the Khe Sanh Veterans Association , an organization I am proud to be a member of

TET OFFENSIVE 50 YEARS AGO SHATTERED AMERICANS' CONFIDENCE IN VIETNAM WAR

By Carlo Muñoz - The Washington Times - Monday, January 29, 2018

WILLIAM RIDER, USMC, C CO 1/9
KHE SANH VETERAN

Bill Rider considered himself a grizzled veteran of the Vietnam War that late January night in 1968 when the first waves of North Vietnamese soldiers and their Viet Cong allies attacked U.S. and South Vietnamese lines in the besieged central city of Khe Sanh, where he was stationed.

After all, the 19-year-old native of New London, Ohio, had been in the theater for a whole three months and had seen intense action dating back to his second day in Vietnam in October.

But the scope of the battle, and the determination of the enemy forces he faced, quickly convinced him that this attack was different.

"We knew that if anyone screwed up, you could get killed," Mr. Rider said. "My advice to the new guys was, 'Do what I tell you, and you might survive this.' "

Mr. Rider, now 75, recalls many harrowing days and close calls during his 13-month tour, but no time was more nerve-wracking than that January exactly 50 years ago Tuesday. We knew that if anyone screwed up, you could get killed," Mr. Rider said. "My advice to the new guys was, 'Do what I tell you, and you might survive this.' "

Mr. Rider, now 75, recalls many harrowing days and close calls during his 13-month tour, but no time was more nerve-wracking than that January exactly 50 years ago Tuesday.

The wide-ranging assault was timed to the day marking the Vietnamese lunar year, a celebration known locally as Tet. here some fighting had begun more than a week before Tet, became a grueling 77-day conflict before the Marines were finally withdrawn.

The Johnson administration and the Pentagon had been offering relatively rosy assessments of the fighting in the months prior to the attack, suggesting Hanoi's ability to carry the fight to the South was weakening.

But on that day, the Viet Cong and North Vietnamese army launched a series of calculated, coordinated attacks against every major American military position from the demilitarized zone in central Vietnam right into the heart of Saigon.

Waves of North Vietnamese fighters had been building up weapons and supplies in anticipation of the surprise attack via the Ho Chi Minh Trail — a complex network of jungle footpaths through seemingly impassible terrain that was the materiel lifeline for the Vietnamese communists.

Thousands of Viet Cong and whole regiments of North Vietnamese army troops stormed U.S. outposts and major firebases across the country during the offensive, catching the South Vietnamese government and the Pentagon by surprise.

In Saigon, Viet Cong fighters and Marines assigned to secure the U.S. Embassy engaged in bloody street warfare as the Americans fought off waves of attackers attempting to overrun the diplomatic outpost.

A half-century later, the attack and its aftermath can still spark bitter divisions while providing an object lesson in the power of perception in the prosecution of modern warfare.

Militarily, even the North Vietnamese would later concede, the Tet Offensive was a staggering defeat for the communists, who lost over 50,000 fighters during the offensive while gaining little valuable territory.

Against Hanoi's expectations, South Vietnamese soldiers did not abandon their posts, the South Vietnamese "puppet" government did not buckle and ordinary citizens did not welcome their "liberators" from the north.

Two weeks after the offensive started, the Defense Department estimated that the North and its allies had lost more than 33,000 soldiers, compared with 2,000 South Vietnamese soldiers and 1,000 Americans. A total of 12,000 were wounded.

The Viet Cong's "regular units were decimated and would never completely recover, and its political infrastructure suffered crippling losses," Vietnam War historian George Herring wrote of Tet's impact.

But the boldness and sophistication of the coordinated attacks was a massive blow to public confidence in the U.S. about the course of the war and the Pentagon's plan to win it. An enemy that some U.S. generals argued was on the ropes had managed a coordinated assault that struck 36 provincial capitals, the six largest cities in South Vietnam and even the U.S. Embassy in the heart of Saigon.

Convulsive political events on the home front marked 1968, which would become the bloodiest year for U.S. forces from the entire Vietnam operation, with 16,592 killed.

Less than a month after the first Tet assaults on Jan. 30, 1968, Secretary of Defense Robert S. McNamara resigned. By June, a beleaguered President Johnson removed Gen. William Westmoreland from his command of the war as well.

CBS newsman Walter Cronkite famously proclaimed that, after Tet, an outright U.S. victory in the war was no longer feasible and a negotiated peace was the only way to avoid a military stalemate with the regime in Hanoi.

INTENSE FIGHTING

While much of the North Vietnamese were thrown back from much of the territory they seized in the first days of fighting, the Tet Offensive sparked more extended fighting in many places. The brutal battle for Hue, for example, lasted a month and destroyed much of the onetime imperial capital before the North Vietnamese and their allies were thrown back.

Nowhere was the fighting more intense than in Khe Sanh. While most of the fighting from the Tet Offensive subsided weeks after the initial thrust by enemy forces, the battle for Khe Sanh lasted for 77 days.

The battle for the city, less than several miles from the demilitarized zone separating North and South Vietnam, remains perhaps the signature conflict of the Tet Offensive and the scene for some of the most intense fighting of the war.

Mr. Rider and the other Marines from Charlie Company found themselves on the front lines at Khe Sanh during Tet. The Marines had been flown into the besieged city along with troops from the 1st, 2nd and 3rd Battalions from 26th Marines to hold the line against enemy forces, which had been laying siege to the city for more than a week.

Mr. Rider recalled that his Marine platoon was digging bunkers and fortifying its positions at Marine Corps base "Rock Quarry" on what was known as Hill 64 in Khe Sanh when the first wave of the North Vietnamese army and Viet Cong fighters hit the perimeter on the night of Jan. 30.

"Normally during Tet, there were always some attacks," he said. But after hearing reports about concurrent attacks on Saigon, Hue, Da Nang and elsewhere, platoon members knew they were facing an assault unlike any other to date in the war.

"What the information was that there were 40,000 hard-core NVA" waiting to pour into Khe Sanh," he said. "And at best we had 3,500 to 4,000 Marines. And we thought they are coming for us."

The first full day of Tet was harrowing for the Marines, who were hit with 1,400 heavy artillery, Mr. Rider recalled. "It was incredible. Mortars, artillery, rockets, everything ," he said. "There wasn't one day where there was not severely wounded [Marines]."

PICKING OFF SAPPERS

For days on end, the Marines battled back waves of North Vietnamese attackers, picking off specialized combat engineers known as sappers who were planting explosives and other devices to crack the U.S. fortifications in the city. There was little time to rest, much less sleep, during the onslaught.

"Alpha Company ended up getting overrun" during the early days of Tet, Mr. Rider recalled.
Sleep became an even dicier proposition as American B-52 bombers pounded North Vietnamese positions in and around Khe Sanh as part of Operation Arc Light. "We would be sitting in our bunkers and feel the vibrations from Arc Light" as the massive bombers decimated the countryside around the besieged city.

"We would sit there and think, 'My God, what are those guys going through?'" he said of the North Vietnamese units on the receiving end of the bombardment. "But they were committed. They just would not leave."

The fighting in Khe Sanh got so bad that Marine Corps helicopters would not fly in supplies to the Marines. Instead, they dropped massive pallets of food, water and ammunition to the forces below, Mr. Rider recalled. During one drop, one Marine was partially crushed by a falling pallet of supplies, he said.

In April, when the fighting from Tet subsided, the Marines at Khe Sanh went on the offensive. The Marines from the 26th Battalion began pushing the enemy out of the embattled city and moved into the highlands surrounding Khe Sanh to hunt down the remnants of the North Vietnamese units that were regrouping.

Mr. Rider and what was left of 1/9 Marines took out an entire North Vietnamese battalion. Days later, almost all of Mr. Rider's battalion was wiped out by communist forces on nearby Hill 64. In the end, 1/6 Marines and those from 26th Marines were pulled out of Khe Sanh and moved back to the rear in Bang Hao.

By the end of the war, Charlie Company and the rest of 1/9 Marines would compile the highest American combat casualty rate of all Marine Corps units in Vietnam, earning them the nickname "The Walking Dead."

In his 13 months in Vietnam with Charlie Company, Mr. Rider and the men of 1/9 Marines were pulled off the front line three times. Suffering from malnutrition, Mr. Rider was evacuated to Bethesda Naval Hospital in 1968. While he was recovering in Maryland, Marine Corps recruiters attempted to persuade the 20-year-old to sign up for another tour in Vietnam.

"They said they needed guys with combat experience," he recalled. "I was bulletproof there, but I did not know if I wanted to tempt fate. I decided to go to Ohio State instead."

Looking back, Mr. Rider said what got him though those difficult days in central Vietnam were the bonds he forged with his fellow Marines.

"The Marines who died [in Khe Sanh] gave their lives for their brothers," he said. "Nobody died for their country. They died for the ones who they fought next to."

FOLEY NAMED PURPLE HEART COMMUNITY

By Jessica Vaughn / jessica@gulfcoastmedia.com

FOLEY – During the Feb. 19 Foley council, Mayor John Koniar proclaimed the city to be a Purple Heart Community. "Many citizens of our community have earned the Purple Heart Medal as a result of being wounded while engaged in combat with an enemy force, construed as a singularly meritorious

Mayor John Koniar designated the City of Foley a Purple Heart Community and presented the proclamation to a group of local Purple Heart recipients who were honored by the city during the act of essential service," said Koniar. "I hereby proclaim the City of Foley as a Purple Heart City honoring the services and sacrifice of our nation's men and women in uniform wounded or killed by enemy forces while serving to protect the freedoms enjoyed by all Americans."

The honor was brought forth to the city after local dentist and Vietnam veteran Barry Booth learned of Purple Heart Communities while visiting a friend.

"We both had served at Khe Sanh; he had been wounded," said Booth. "While out driving around his town, he pointed out the very distinctive Purple Heart signs located at the city hall complex and around his town. I thought what a great idea this would be for the communities of Baldwin County and South Alabama."

Booth reached out to Ed Evans of the local Military Order of the Purple Heart, telling him about the Purple Heart Communities and beginning the movement to declare Baldwin County municipalities as Purple Heart towns and cities.

"The Military Order of the Purple Heart is a congressionally chartered veterans' organization whose members have received the Purple Heart Medal, given in the name of the president of the United States, to any member of our armed forces who have been wounded or lost under combat conditions," said Booth. "While clearly this is an individual decoration, the Purple Heart differs from all other military awards. An individual is not recommended for a Purple Heart, they are entitled to it upon meeting certain criteria."

While Booth stated he was not a recipient, he supports the distinguished order that delivers programs that include: suicide prevention, assistance for veterans with brain injuries, counseling for post-traumatic stress, and assistance for women's health issues. These services are offered to aide all veterans and their families and continue to make many significant contributions to our communities.

To be designated as a Purple Heart City is to raise awareness and to honor those who are recipients of the Purple Heart, and Foley took the step during the council to do just that. "I hope that each of you at some time can take a moment to speak to a Purple Heart recipient," said Booth. "Their experience is nothing like you can imagine, or read, or see in movies. These men and women have put themselves in harm's way and have offered up their life in service to the rest of us and our nation. Our gratitude to each of them is inseparable."

The City of Foley has received Purple Heart signs to designate the city as a Purple Heart Community, which will be going up around the city soon.

KHE SANH VETERANS, INC. SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION

GOVERNING RULES FOR OPERATIONS OF THE KHE SANH VETERANS, INC. SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION:

1. The purpose of the Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. Scholarship Foundation (KSVSF) is to provide financial aid to high school graduates who plan to attend an accredited institution as a full time student OR who are currently enrolled full time in an accredited post-secondary curriculum.

2. Scholarships will be awarded to applicant students who have at least one parent, legal guardian, or grandparent who is a paid member in good standing of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., a 501(c)(19) charitable organization.

3. IT IS THE RESPONSIBILITY OF THE STUDENT TO SEE THAT THE SCHOLARSHIP APPLICATION REQUIREMENTS ARE FULLY COMPLETED AND SENT DIRECTLY TO THE SCHOLARSHIP CHAIR BEFORE 5/1/2018 AT THE ADDRESS BELOW;

Mr. Dan Fisher
KSVSF Committee Chairman 52ND
6050 52ND St. North
Oakdale, MN 55128-1317

CRITERIA FOR SELECTION

Applicants must be the legal child or grandchild of a paid up member of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. (See member definition in the KSV Association bylaws.) This includes deceased, life members of KSV and those Khe Sanh Veterans listed as KIA/MIA in Vietnam if family members are paid up, associate members of KSV, Inc. Children or grandchildren of KSV associate members are not eligible.

Information provided by each candidate on the attached application forms will focus on the following qualities considered for selection to KSVSF financial aid: good grades, character, citizenship, leadership experience and personal essay. A point selection system is included in the application forms. Examples of these above mentioned qualities could be in the classroom, in extracurricular activities or in service to the community, church or nation

A Scholarship Foundation Review Committee will serve the President of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., and will accept, review and grade each correctly completed application. This committee will provide a scholarship financial report and short summaries of the selected candidates at the annual KSV reunion for publication in the Red Clay" Newsletter.

SCHOLARSHIP AWARDS

The amount of financial award per applicant will be determined by the Review Committee's scoring results. The awards will be granted for a maximum of 4 years per student. A new application will be required for each continuous year applied

Achievement Award Levels are:

The Col. David E. Lownds Award - for top achievement in Application Review (one award or tie)
The Sgt. Major James T. Gaynor Award - for high achievement in Application Review (5 awards)
The Col. William H. Dabney Award - for honorable achievement in Application Review (6 awards)

The KSV Scholarship money will be awarded upon presentation of proof of registration for the appropriate term. Proof of registration should be sent to the chairman's address on page one of this application.

Scholarship Guidelines and Purpose

1. The financial award is to be used to help defray costs of tuition, fees and books at an accredited Institution of the applicant's choice as a full time student.

2. If a recipient of the KSVSF scholarship does not enter a post high school institution during the next school year, the award for his/her benefit shall be cancelled and the money awarded to an alternate applicant. An alternate of each scholarship award is to be chosen at the time of selection of recipients.

3. The KSVSF Committee Chair and the Treasurer of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., will send a check for the full years' award amount to the selected students upon final approval by the KSV President.

4. The recipient of a scholarship shall be notified no later than the end of the month of August of the coming school year.

5. Scholarship Applications must be received by the Committee Chair on or before MAY 1 of the school year applied for.  (This is an important, NEW change to previous years)

6. KSV. Inc. Scholarship recipients must agree to maintain a standard of personal performance both in and out of school that conforms to the moral standards set down by Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., members.

7. Criteria: Point Selection System !Maximum of 110 regular points or 125 with bonus points

a. Scholastic achievement / grade point average. Max = 40 points max. (Please attach last school GPA transcript) example below:

A GPA of 4.0 x 10 = 40 points or a GPA of 3.0 x 10 = 30 points

b. Extracurricular activities. Max = 30 points total

Description of personal experience in the following type of activities (Be specific!);

Extra Curricular = 10 points max.
Volunteer services = 10 points max.
Leadership positions = 10 points max.
Employment = 10 points max

C. KSV SCHOLARHIP ESSAY (250 words min. to 400 words max) on educational goals, career goals = 30 points max. Please type, single spaced lines on ONE sheet only

Essay suggestions;

Over decades countless adjectives have tried to describe Khe Sanh Veterans and their historic accomplishments. Please review the six suggested adjectives below, select one or more that might relate to you in some manner to explain how this is evident in your life's experiences and will help you in meeting your educational and career goals.

COLONEL THOMAS L. JOHNSON, USAF KHE SANH VETERAN, FLEW B-52 MISSIONS AT KHE SANH

Tom was born on March 26, 1933 in Seattle, Washington. He attended the University of Washington and graduated with a B.S. in business administration in 1956.

He served in the U.S. Air Force for 27 years, including four tours in Vietnam. Tom was a radar navigator on B-52 combat missions over Vietnam, including the battle of Khe Sanh. He was a special guest and keynote speaker at the November, 2014 Khe Sanh reunion. By the time of his retirement from the military, Tom achieved the rank of full colonel.

Tom received his doctor of arts in computer science from Nova University in 1988 and taught for 16 years as a college professor at the University of Maryland and University of Mobile.

He and his wife Judy enjoyed traveling to many exotic destinations throughout the world. Early this year Tom published his first book, "Skid Row Kid," an autobiography and in-depth look at the life of a young boy trying to survive on the streets of Seattle during the World War II era.

Tom will be laid to rest in Arlington Cemetery.

KHE SANH VETERAN BILL BALZANO RECIEVES LONG OVERDUE BRONZE STAR W/V FOR ACTION ON HILL 950 06 JUNE 1967

SENATOR WHITEHOUSE BESTOWS BRONZE STAR ON VIETNAM HERO CHARLESTOWN RESIDENT RECEIVES LONG OVERDUE HONOR FOR REMARKABLE BRAVERY DURING MARINE CORPS SERVICE

Washington, DC, Senator Sheldon Whitehouse conferred a Bronze Star Medal with Combat "V" device upon William Balzano of Charlestown for his actions in Vietnam as a member of the United States Marine Corps. The ceremony took place in the Ballroom at the Providence G before dozens of Balzano's family, friends, and fellow service members.

"I am honored to bestow this long-overdue honor on Lance Corporal Balzano," said Whitehouse. "His actions in Vietnam are a study in bravery and selflessness, and for far too long those actions went unrecognized. Today, with his family by his side, we observe his exemplary service and solemn commitment to Corps and country."

CITATION:

For conspicuous gallantry and courageous action against the enemy as a Machine Gunner with the Security Platoon, Sub-Unit One, Headquarters Company, Twenty-Sixth Marines (forward), Ninth Marine Amphibious Brigade in connection with operations against the enemy in the Republic of Vietnam. In the early morning hours of June 6 1967, Lance Corporal BALZANO, along with seventeen men, was defending a vital radio relay position on Hill 950 near Khe Sanh, which came under intense enemy small arms, automatic weapons, mortar and rocket fire fire, , followed by an assault of ninety North Vietnamese Regulars.

Almost immediately, six Marines were killed and four were seriously wounded. Unhesitatingly Lance Corporal BALZANO was forced to relocate his M-60 machine gun to the back of his foxhole, since the breach was from the opposite side of the perimeter. This causing him to be exposed himself to heavy enemy fire. Lance Corporal BALZANO began firing his M-60 which was now deployed in the open and facing the charging enemy. Lance Corporal BALZANO returned fire stopping the forward aggression of the enemy. He saw enemy soldiers on top of the communication bunker and fired on them killing them.

Lance Corporal Balzano continuously suppressed the enemy from his fighting position, all under a barrage of enemy fire and explosive projectiles directed at destroying the last M-60 machine gun protecting Hill 950. While repelling the enemy from overtaking a strategic communication tower, Lance Corporal BALZANO suffered a head wound from a round delivered by an enemy machine gunner and encountered numerous weapon malfunctions from the amount of shells he was forced to put through his gun.

BALZANO changed barrels which were glowing red and would use his M-16 to continue the suppression of the enemy. In the face of all this adversity, he maintained continuous fire with his machine gun, rifle, and grenades to protect the vital communication encampment.

BALZANO only hearing enemy fire thought his was the only position left on the hill. BALZANO knew that he would fight to the end, having enemy grenades thrown at his position and one lading in his foxhole. He knew if he left the foxhole he would certainly perish from the enemy machine gun firing at him.

Lance Corporal BALZANO realized that he was not the only Marine left alive on the hill. BALZANO attempted to kill the enemy machine gunner that had the few remaining Marines pinned by firing an M-79 at the tree behind the enemy gunner to no avail. When daylight came he and two other Marines decided to assault the enemy machine gunner by throwing the few hand grenades left and continual gun firing at him until the enemy gunner was seriously wounded. The enemy gunner was crawling away but immediately captured. Immediately after the battle, Lance Corporal BALZANO provided first aid and attendance to the wounded and assisted in capturing the last known fighting position of the invading enemy force. Undoubtedly, his exhaustive efforts and vigilance kept a key strategic fighting position in the hands of the United States Marine Corp and saved the lives of numerous Marines. Through his bold initiative, undaunted courage, and complete dedication to duty, Lance Corporal BALZANO reflected great credit upon himself and upheld the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and the United States Naval Service.

BILL & LT. CAMPBELL LOOKING AT HIS NOTEBOOK FROM VIETNAM

LIEUTENANT CAMPBELL'S PRESENTATION

On behalf of the President of the United States, United States Marine Corps and Commandant of the Marine Corps, it is my honor to be able to present this Bronze Star Medal with a Combat V to Sgt. William Balzano for heroism while serving Hill 950, Quang Tri Provence, Khe Sanh, Vietnam, on June 6, 1967. Thank you Senator Whitehouse and especially Andrew, his aide.

Why is the Bronze Star being presented 51 years later? An explanation - Bill was in my platoon providing security to a radio relay station and observation post atop a peak on a mountain in N.W. Vietnam called Hill 950.

If you looked west, miles and miles, you overlooked the small Khe Sanh airbase runway and beyond at Laos. If you looked North, you looked right up the Ashua Valley into North Vietnam and East was the DMZ, border of North and South Vietnam and beyond the South China Sea.

Security was necessary because this relay station took radio messages from outposts operating in N. Vietnam, Laos and Khe Sanh and offshore ships. This was before emails, cell phones, satellite communications. When Bill and the 18 men of HQ platoon came under attack one night from the NVA (100 it was later found out), immediately six Marines died and four were seriously wounded. I wasn't there but down at the Khe Sanh base, We all listened through the night to the radio transmissions that our men were over run, the NVA soldiers had gotten through our defenses and were attempting to knock out the critical communications. They managed to get a few feet from our men. Bill was a machine gunner who fired back at the NY A throughout the night. Our Marines did survive but not all. For Bill Balzano's actions and heroism that night we commemorate with this Bronze Star.

I wrote up the men for awards for what they did that night. Sgt. Baskin got the Navy Cross. But I was transferred a few weeks later before the paperwork and medals went up the line and were processed, to another unit 2/3. 48 years later, as the result of my name appearing in the Khe Sanh Veterans book, Bill Balzano called me one day and said, "is this Lieutenant Campbell?" - Now very few people on earth call me "Lieutenant". We got together and I learned for the first time that Bill didn't get the Silver Star he deserved. So the men on the Hill still surviving, Green and Costello, wrote to the Commandant. The Marine Corps said "we don't forget", and as you know, the request went up through the Commandant and he said Bill deserves the Bronze Star.

First, let me just say a few words about Bill and these young men, Marines 18 & 19 years old, not just who were in Country Vietnam, but were in actual combat with the NVA. We lost, in Vietnam, 58,220 men and women in Vietnam who left behind mothers, fathers, wives, children, loved ones, and over 500,000 wounded - (13,000 Marines were killed and 52,000 wounded). Not everyone in Bill's generation in 1967 went to Vietnam or went in the service, only a small percentage, as there were protests and marches against the Vietnam War. They were mostly lead by those who didn't want to get drafted into the military, no matter what and many did everything just to avoid the draft and get deferments.

But what made these Bill Balzano's, young boys volunteer to be Marines and not seek deferments. What did they volunteer for? Was it the title? - a Marine, the nice uniform those fantasies ended in boot camp. What was it? Did the Marines make these young boys or did they just already have it within their characters, as volunteers, and the Marines just brought the best that was already within them - Good Question.

I've said to people over the years - I could have spent each and every day doing nothing else but writing up citations for those young boys in Vietnam. What was it that was most heroic? - staying awake at night on watch, freezing, shivering - on 2nd watch, 3rd watch, hour after hour, keeping each other from falling asleep. Or seeing them carrying out their buddies, heads covered up or just wounded going out by chopper. When I was in Da Nang, on the bed across from me was a very young Marine, no legs, one arm and another Marine was speaking to him in Spanish, he laid across his stomach crying and the wounded Marine in the elevated bed patted his head saying in English, it's ok, it's ok.

These men, these Marines heroically put out, day after day, night after night. Going out on a listening post, walking point trying to avoid booby traps, food (living off c rations -no wonder we were so skinny), hot showers - no such thing; sleeping in a bed or rack -you've got to be kidding, not even tents on Hill 950. Never once did I ever hear anyone ever say, "I can't do this anymore". One example, a brand new young medic came up to me once and said, "Lt., all the men have colds and are sick from the constant rain; they can't go on". I just looked at him and mumbled something to the effect. "this is what we do".

So, it's our great honor to be with Bill today and even know Bill and other Veterans. I know myself and others may look like funny old men in our military caps, obviously not able to run forever like we once could. Just a few years ago, up here on Cape Cod, a young lady saw my hat and said to me in passing, "thank your service". I had never heard that before and actually I was speechless. I just couldn't process it mentally, emotionally. What? Did she really say "thank you"? But she did and now I hear people say it more often!

We Veterans who have heard the both sides, we should have stayed in Vietnam, Afghanistan, Iraq or that we should have never gotten involved and wasted so many young men. It's hard for us Veterans to figure it all out and get your arms around it.

Bill and all Veterans like him don't have to figure it perfectly out. That is why we are here today, all of us - thank you for coming, to say to Bill and all Veterans, thank you - thank you for serving - thank you, Bill, for volunteering to give your life for someone else. No one has greater love than this, to offer his life for his brother or sister. It's the relationship of the Corps - of guys who would give their life for you, who got your back. Bill, thank God you made it.

And this awarding of this Bronze Star 51 years later is the country's and the Marine of saying, thank you for your service. For all of us, it is a very nice thing to say - thank you - thank you for your service - It does mean a lot to us Veterans, more than you will ever know.

Bill, everybody might not know, has been just recently diagnosed with aggressive prostate cancer, all 12 biopsies positive, probably from Agent Orange exposure.

Bill, us Marines say to each other, Semper Fi, always faithful To those of you who don't know, it doesn't refer to the fact Marines never forget, we sometimes do, or that we never leave our wounded behind, that we never do, but it does refer to Him who never forgets. Remember Bill, He will never forget you-and dinn't, not even after 51 years. So come up here and get your Bronze Star medal

MARINE AWARDED SILVER STAR FOR VIETNAM HEROICS A HALF CENTURY LATER

A Marine was awarded the Silver Star for his ac tions during the Vietnam War more than half a century after his heroic deeds.

Kelley refused to allow his position to be captured by the enemy, "and ignoring his own wounds, murderously engaged the enemy until they broke contact," the citation states.

The Silver Star award was approved in August 2017, but Kelley and fellow Marines waited until the anniversary of the firefight, museum officials told Marine Corps Times.
Kelley's Silver Star is the second this year to be awarded to a Marine who fought in the Vietnam War. First Lt. Philip H. Sauer was posthumously awarded the Silver Star for holding off an enemy attack with his .45-caliber pistol while on a recon patrol of Hill 861 in Vietnam.

FORMER MARINE TO BE HONORED IN DC FOR SERVICE TO FELLOW VETERANS

SAN DIEGO -- It's an understatement to say San Diegan William "Sarge" Rider is a survivor.

The Vietnam veteran lived through 13 months of one of the bloodiest battles in history. The Battle of Khe Sanh began on Jan. 21, 1968, when forces from the North Vietnamese Army bombed the U.S. Marine garrison located in South Vietnam.

Rider suffered three combat wounds in the ensuing battle -- he was part of the 1/9 Marine battalion that became known as the "Walking Dead," because for every 100 men who deployed with the 1/9, only a handful survived.

Rider is one of them.

His harrowing experiences -- and the pain of losing so many of his fellow Marines -- left him with depression and extreme survivor's guilt when he returned from the war.

"Heads exploding like a watermelon. Your best friends. How do you rectify that? How do you put that back together?" Rider reflected Wednesday. "And then as a human being, how can you accept the fact that you killed human beings, regardless of your situation?"

But today, Rider uses his experiences to help other war veterans deal with the mental anguish that often accompanies their return home.

Rider is a co-founder of American Combat Veterans of War, an organization that facilitates outreach and safe sharing groups for veterans, and the Director of Veteran Affairs for the City of San Diego.

Now, after more than a decade of providing services for fellow vets, he's being recognized nationally for his work. On Thursday, Rider will travel to Washington D.C., where he'll visit the Vietnam Memorial before being honored at the annual PBS National Memorial Day Concert this weekend.

FAMILIES PAY RESPECT TO LOVED ONES AT FORT SAM HOUSTON CEMETERY ON MEMORIAL DAY WEEKEND

By Sarah Acosta

SAN ANTONIO - The Fort Sam Houston Cemetery was filled with people Memorial Day weekend. Guests paid their respects to loved ones who once served or lost their lives in combat.

One couple, Arthur and Elvia Cavazos, visited five of their relatives buried at Fort Sam Houston.

One of Elvia Cavazos' brothers, Marine Pvt. 1st

Class Richard Stephen Hernandez, died at the age of 21 while fighting at Khe Sanh during the Vietnam War. The battle is considered one of the bloodiest battles fought by Marines.

Arthur Cavazos said it pains him to know how much his wife still hurts from her brother's death. Arthur Cavazos said that while he and his wife have to walk past several hundred graves to get to all of their family members, it's worth it. He said he enjoys seeing the various traditions people observe when paying respects to their loved ones.

"It's a day of remembrance for these people that paid the ultimate sacrifice to protect our way of life," Arthur Cavazos said. "It's a battle that continues today."

LIVING MEMORIAL SCULPTURE GARDEN IN WEED FROM CRAIG TOURTE

Yesterday at the Living Memorial Sculpture Garden in Weed Calif. . I write a story about this wonderful yearly event.

At the foot of the majestic and mystical Mount Shasta, the hallowed ground of the "Living Memorial Sculpture Garden" called once again to honor all veterans who have served our country. The informational pamphlet available to all visitors provides the Garden was "...founded in 1988 by a group of Siskiyou County veterans and is sponsored and maintained by the Weed/Lake Shastina Kiwanis Club. A Memorial Wall celebrates the honorable discharged veterans of our nation's conflicts from the Revolutionary War to the present."

Of the nine incredible haunting sculptures currently displayed, the original sculpture located in the center of the garden is titled "The Why Group." "This was the inaugural sculpture and remains the centerpiece of the Living Memorial Sculpture Garden array. On the ground a man rushes to help a falling comrade. High above on a pedestal the central figure arches his back, rears his head and stretches his arms to the sky."

The artist of these magnificent and inspiring sculptures is Dennis Smith. I asked Dennis his interpretation of the "The Why Group" sculpture. As he gazed up at the heavens, he responded that it posed the question often asked by each one of us who have experience conflict, "Why war, why me." The pamphlet reads in part, "Dennis Smith, a Vietnam War Marine Corps Sergeant and veteran of the Khe Sanh Siege, is the metal sculpture whose works grace the Sculpture Garden" The pamphlet quotes Dennis as saying, "Each sculpture has personal meaning for me in terms of life experiences and personal incidents. Through the arts we have the means to peacefully consider violence and to ask questions as well as to offer possible solutions." The pamphlet continues, "His work is specific yet symbolic, monumental yet intimate, patriotic yet cautionary." Dennis adds, "I don't think the purpose of art is to entertain, but to uplift, edify and educate."

Although the Living Memorial Sculpture Garden is somewhat remote in it's location, this Memorial Day, several hundred attended the wonderful and solemn ceremony honoring our Veterans. The Keynote Speaker was Major General Clyde L. Vermilyea (Retired). Khe Sanh Veteran Robert Singleton (A/3rd SP) and his Marine Corps League Siskiyou Detachment 936 formed the Color Guard & Gun Salute. In addition, Khe Sanh Veterans David Tonick (A/1/26), Thomas Horchler (H.Q. 1/13) as well as Dennis Smith (B/1/26) honored our Veterans. Sadly, there were more missing this year from our usual attending Khe Sanh Veterans group. Khe Sanh Board of Directors Member Kenneth Martin (B/3rd Recon) was not there, nor was former Khe Sanh Veterans Assoc. Sergeant at Arms Lloyd Scudder (B/1/26) present. Paul Turnbull and Bruce Kates (H.Q. 1/13) were also absent. Regrettable, those mentioned have passed away, but their spirits were with us this day and we honored their contribution and sacrifice for our country, we will remember them always and they will not be forgotten.

As I once again walked around the Memorial Garden, each sculpture telling a silent and personal story inspired by Dennis, I recalled a similar walk I took around these same grounds accompanied by Bruce Kates a few years before. I had met Bruce at Khe Sanh and had spoken to him shortly after he had arrived. Tragically he was terribly wounded a short time later and I never thought I would see him again. Bruce came to one of our Khe Sanh Northern California January 21st remembrances, although still suffering from the horrific wounds he had received at Khe Sanh, I immediately recognized him. Bruce attended the Khe Sanh Reunion in San Diego and several more of our January 21st events. During this walk Bruce turned to me and said, "It seems that you want to whisper when you're here." A couple of years later Bruce became seriously ill and sadly passed away. I thought of Bruce during this walk, and of Lloyd and Ken and Paul, and of so many others that are no longer with us, but I knew they were here in spirit this day, walking with me in this hallowed garden. The notation on the pamphlet for "The Peaceful Warrior" reads, "...there must be those who loving peace, will fight against aggression to preserve that peace. There is no contradiction in this. As long as such warriors are needed, The Peaceful Warrior honors those who step forward when asked to do so."

Once you visit the Living Memorial Sculpture Garden it seems to become part of your soul, much like the Vietnam Memorial, there is a moving spirit about this place, you sense you are not alone and one longs for the time when you can once again return here to this hallowed ground to join the healing spirit of lost warriors at the foot of the magnificent and inspiring Mount Shasta.

OBIT

LIEUTENANT COLONEL
KENNETH W. PIPES USMC (RET)
KHE SANH VETERAN,
COMMANDING OFFICER BRAVO CO 1/26
RESERVE CAPTAIN, SAN DIEGO COUNTY SHERIFF (RET)
October 19, 1937-April 26 2018

Ken Pipes, Lt. Colonel, USMC Retired; The Skipper"The Skipper" was 29 when he arrived at Khe Sanh at the end of August 1967, and turned 30 on October 19, 1967. Born in Bakersfield, California and raised in Tulare and Clovis, California, he attended grammar and high school at Clovis, then Junior College in Fresno, and graduated from Fresno State majoring in US History.

At Khe Sanh, Ken Pipes commanded H & S Company from September through November, then Bravo Company from December 1967 through April 1968. He was the Assistant Operations Officer from May until "I got back to Sharon and the boys in late Sept.1968. Dan was 18 months when I left and Tim was just 6 weeks old."

Since retiring from the Marine Corps and Southern California Edison, Ken has spent 20-plus years as a Reserve Peace Officer Volunteer.

The Skipper was revered by the men who served with him. His courage, honor and respect for the men he led is the mark of a true leader.

Said the Skipper, "Last week I spoke to our Grandson, Connor's Second Grade Class. He introduced me as follows: My Grandpa joined the Marines, got married, had two sons and got old. I guess that sums up a man's life very succinctly. He hit it right on the money."

For more than 50 years, Ken Pipes wore a uniform — first as a long-time Marine officer who earned a Silver Star in Vietnam, then later as a reserve sheriff's deputy in North County, a role he held for 26 years.

That second job, he did for free. He didn't want the pay. He just wanted to contribute.

After five decades of public service, the Fallbrook man has finally called it quits, retiring in January as a reserve captain with administrative responsibility for all reserve deputies in North County.

With his 80th birthday approaching, said Pipes, it was time to "hang up my spurs."

"I think we all reach a point where you hate to leave something you enjoy and the relationships you have made, but there is a little clock inside all of us that says 'it's time to go,'" said the retired Marine Corps lieutenant colonel.

Service is important in his family — Sharon Pipes, his college sweetheart and wife of 56 years, has volunteered with the sheriff's department's senior patrol unit for the last 20 years. She has also volunteered with the Friends of the Fallbrook Library for many years.

Between the two of them, Ken Pipes figures, they may have done as much 30,000 hours of unpaid work.

Aside from his "honest desire to help protect our community," the reserves job fulfilled another need. "It gave me an opportunity to continue to serve alongside Marines," he said, noting that many former Marines move into law enforcement.

Growing up in Central California, Pipes wasn't thinking of going into public service. He wanted to play football. He credits the influence of his college coaches in Fresno for his decision to enlist in 1957. They were former Marines, and he wanted to be like them.

Pipes would spend 25 years in the service — the first three as a reservist, the next 22 on active duty and as a part of history.

In 1962, during the Cuban Missile Crisis, Pipes was a young officer aboard a ship headed toward the island nation.

Five years later, then-Capt. Pipes found himself in Vietnam, with two sons still in diapers back home. From late August 1967 until April 1968, he commanded two companies operating out of the Khe Sanh Combat Base.

That nine-month stretch included the Tet Offensive in 1968 and the 77-day siege of Khe Sanh. At the time, Pipes commanded Bravo company, which he said was responsible for defending a sector of the main base perimeter during the protracted and bloody battle. More than 60 men in his company died.

During the days and nights of fighting, he was nearly shot in the head. His helmet stopped the bullet. Sometimes at night, he'd walk the trenches, slipping a shot of whiskey to weary men.

His memories of Khe Sanh are included the feature-length documentary "Bravo! Common Men, Uncommon Valor."

His many awards and decorations from his time at Khe Sanh include the Silver Star — the nation's third highest honor for gallantry in combat — the Bronze Star, and the Purple Heart.

According to his Silver Star citation, on March 30, 1968, Pipes' company launched an attack but came under heavy fire from automatic weapons, mortars and rockets.

According to the citation, Pipes "fearlessly maneuvered across the fire-swept terrain, deploying his men and adjusting supporting arms fire on the enemy." Although he suffered a serious wound, he ignored the painful injury and continued to lead his men. He "repeatedly exposed himself to the intense fire as he supervised the destruction of numerous bunkers and ensured that all wounded were treated and evacuated."

And when ordered to leave, he "unhesitatingly remained with the rear element of his command and directed an orderly withdrawal from the hazardous area."

In 1982, when Pipes retired as a lieutenant colonel, he stayed in San Diego County and began working in the security office at San Onofre Nuclear Generating Station.

He was still doing that job a few years later when he started reading headlines about a San Diego police officer who had been fatally shot. He groused to his wife about it.

"Sharon finally said quit complaining and do something about it," Pipes said. "That's when I enrolled in the police officers reserves academy."

He was 52 when he enrolled. While taking the six months of classes, he remained working full time at the nuclear power plant, driving to Carlsbad after work for five hours of law enforcement training every Tuesday and Thursday evening, as well as all day on Saturdays.

He left the power plant job about five years later, in 1995, and focused on his work in the sheriff's reserves.

Sheriff's Capt. Chuck Cinnamo, who runs the Vista sheriff's station, has known Pipes for about seven years and calls him "truly a lifelong public servant." "He is definitely dedicated to the cause of doing the right thing," Cinnamo said Friday. "That is what he is all about."

Over the years, Pipes also volunteered with a program called Veterans Moving Forward, where he counseled veterans in jail in hopes of getting them help and cutting recidivism rates.

Pipes, a Marine to his core, said that what he found most rewarding during his time in the reserves was the people that he worked alongside, particularly former Marines. He wants to see more of them step forward for the reserves job.

"When you are protecting and serving the public," Pipes said, "that is a noble calling."

POEM BY KEN

TEAR IN THE FABRIC
By Ken Pipes

Shadows flicker, fire reflecting off the pines at the midnight hour-another time-or place-or both-another brief shadow-just at the corner of the eye-thinking-seen-imagined-
50 years is a long half-century away/ago-then just perhaps a brief shadow-that draws the string to a tight close at the top of the bag that holds all the secrets in a holder that holds it all:
the secrets-memories-
most good, some not so good?
Names, pictures, times, dates-a minor tear in the fabric and the past-even the future-could be revealed.
And the time-time moves with a speed all its own-the tune sometimes out of synch!
then the beat settles in and the march begins again-sometimes at the slow-but increased step of the Kepi Blanc of the Legion etrangere moving out the gates of Forts on the edge of some far flung and isolate outpost-with flickering fire shadows and movement out of the corner of the eye-looked briefly like Don, Hank, Ken-Mac no-
it is but the tricks of the midnight hour or the light fading from the glow that was once yesterday.

POEM BY TIM PIPES KEN'S SON

The Siege What is it? What was it?
How, 0 Lord can I comprehend?

by Timothy Pipes Bravo 1/26

I wasn't there, but I was literally dying, six month old, at the beginning; desperate, cold and hungry just the same!
But, why 0 Lord can't I comprehend?
I have listened and I have read; I hove seen the "thousand yard stare!"
Why can't I comprehend?

I wish I knew, but I don't, in a way you Khe Sanh Veterans couldn't comprehend! Why? Because I wasn't there and neither were you all here; here in my shoes and my shoes are heavy!
Heavy with the burden of trying to understand!
Oh, why can't I comprehend?

I wish I could maybe it wasn't meant for my eyes and my heart But, why can't I comprehend; I wish I could!
Lord, I was lying near lifeless while you had my Dad at the land of Khe Sanh--
But, I don't understand why my Dad was in a lifeless land!
What you all went through I pray I never can comprehend

AGENT ORANGE EFFECTS BEING SEEN IN GRANDCHILDREN OF VIETNAM WAR VETERANS

By: WFLA

HOLIDAY, Fla. (WFLA) - Birth defects and heart problems are showing up not only in the children, but the grandchildren of veterans who served in America's military during the Vietnam War.

The question is whether Agent Orange, a powerful poison sprayed by the military to wipe out vegetation, is a contributing factor.

Emma Ackerson, 9, of Holiday, looked like any other little girl playing her with dog.

But this list of Emma's medical problems keeps growing:

- Connective tissue disorder, which is EDS (Ehlers Danlos syndrome)
- Hypermobility

Vision problems

- Muscle weakness
- Sleep apnea
- Epilepsy (benign occipital epilepsy)
- Orthostatic hypotension
- Dysautonomia
- Long QT syndrome
- Joint pain
- GI problems
- Migraines

Acid reflux

- Arrhythmias
- Balance problems

Emma suffers headaches and stomach pain, as well as heart problems.

"All of a sudden she gets pale. She gets dark circles under her eyes and you either have to lay her down on the floor, you have top pick her up, because she'll pass out," explained Emma's mother, Keri Ackerson.

According to her mom, Emma's problems stem from a birth defect called Chiari malformation, a neural tube defect.

"It's a structural defect in the brain where part of the brain is going down in to the spinal column," said Keri.

Chiari malformation is also a condition associated with Agent Orange.

The military sprayed more than 20 million gallons of the powerful defoliant in Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia to deny the enemy food sources and cover.

Tens of thousands of American military personnel handled, sprayed or were sprayed by this herbicide.

The chemicals in Agent Orange are known to cause a variety of illnesses including several types of cancers, among other diseases.

This list of illnesses tied to Agent Orange is posted on the Department of Veterans Affairs web site:

- AL Amyloidosis
- Chronic B-cell Leukemias
- Chloracne (or similar acneform disease)

Diabetes Mellitus Type 2

- Hodgkin's Disease
- Ischemic Heart Disease
- Multiple Myeloma
- Non-Hodgkin's Lymphoma
- Parkinson's Disease
- Peripheral Neuropathy, Early-Onset
- Porphyria Cutanea Tarda
  Prostate Cancer
- Respiratory Cancers (includes lung cancer)
- Cancers of the lung, larynx, trachea, and bronchus.
- Soft Tissue Sarcomas (other than osteosarcoma, chondrosarcoma, Kaposi's sarcoma, or mesothelioma)

- A group of different types of cancers in body tissues such as muscle, fat, blood and lymph vessels, and connective tissues.

It took decades for the Department of Veterans Affairs to admit that the powerful herbicide poisoned thousands of U.S. service members.

It took even longer for the government to acknowledge the children of those contaminated could also be affected.

Emma Ackerson's grandfather, Navy veteran Lonnie Kilpatrick, was exposed to the toxic herbicide while on Guam in the 70s.

The effects destroyed his heart.

After an eight-year struggle, 8 On Your Side assisted Lonnie in obtaining Agent Orange benefits from the VA.

Lonnie died weeks later from cancer that the VA missed.

Sheila Kilpatrick, Emma's grandmother, also lived on Guam, in an apartment complex near a jungle that was also sprayed.

"All my kids, they all have something, heart problems," explained Sheila. "We've pulled up all this information to link to Agent Orange."

Keri Ackerson, Sheila and Lonnie's daughter, was diagnosed with heart trouble at age 20.

"I black out probably 20 times a day, every time I stand up my vision goes black," stated Keri. "I wake up in the middle of the night feeling like I'm going to die."

Keri was also born with Chiari malformation.

Many of Emma's and Keri's medical issues show up on lists of illnesses associated with Agent Orange. The VA dismisses most as not Agent Orange connected.

Its current policy is that children born with Spina Bifida, who are the biological children of men who served in Vietnam and the Korean Demilitarized Zone, are eligible for VA benefits.

According to the VA, covered birth defects for children born to women who served in Vietnam and the Korean Demilitarized Zone include:

- Achondroplasia
- Cleft lip and cleft palate
- Congenital heart disease
- Congenital talipes equinovarus (clubfoot)
- Esophageal and intestinal atresia
- Hallerman-Streiff syndrome
- Hip dysplasia
- Hirschprung's disease (congenital megacolon)
- Hydrocephalus due to aqueductal stenosis
- Hypospadias
- Imperforate anus
- Neural tube defects
- Poland syndrome
- Pyloric stenosis
- Syndactyly (fused digits)
- Tracheoesophageal fistula
- Undescended testicle
  Williams syndrome

Leroy Foster of Lakeland claims he sprayed hundreds of thousands of gallons of Agent Orange while stationed on Guam.

Master Sgt. Foster suffers from 28 auto-immune diseases and terminal cancer.

His granddaughter was born with 24 fingers and toes.

"I carry terrible guilt. There's all these children I've hurt," explained Foster. "And all the unborn children that died and didn't have a chance to live."
Betty Medkeci, executive director of Birth Defect Research for Children Inc., is gathering data on children of veterans who served in Vietnam.

"I am absolutely convinced by the data that there's something significant going on in the children of Vietnam veterans," stated Medkeci."We have found impressive increases in learning, attention, immune, endocrine and skin disorders."

Medkeci points out Agent Orange isn't the cause of every birth defect to every child whose parent fought in Vietnam. In fact, some veterans were not affected by Agent Orange at all.

Others, whose systems had a deficiency in the ability to break down toxins, were more likely to have a child with Spina Bifida.

"The higher level of dioxin in the veteran who had this deficiency, the more like they had a child with a neural tube defect," added Medkeci.

She claims studies to date are insufficient and she chides the VA for dragging its feet on research mandated by Congress.

"I know that industry doesn't want these connections made, but if it's happening. It's happening. It isn't going to go away because you don't like the answer," said Medkeci.

Medkeci believes not enough research exists to confirm Agent Orange exposure to veterans caused birth defects in their grandchildren.

"We need to solve questions about the effects on the first generation before we jump to grandchildren," she said.

At age 6, Emma Ackerson underwent corrective brain surgery. Her symptoms returned within weeks.

"She asks, you know, why is she being punished. And I try to explain 'you're not being punished.' You know, we just have to find a cure,'" said Keri.
At night, it's worse.

"When I get into bed, after a few minutes, I just start feeling hot and sweaty," explained Emma.
Emma wears a cooling vest and ice packs to help cool her body temperature.

Then there's the pain. "When you have to lay in bed every night and watch your child suffer and there's nothing you can do, I feel like I apologize to her all the time, but I can't help her," said Keri.

CROSSROADS BROTHERS REMEMBER HORRORS OF VIETNAM WAR

By Jon Wilcox | jwilcox@vicad.com

Despite the passing of almost five decades, some memories still burn brightly and painfully for three Crossroads brothers who served during the Vietnam War.

"They don't go away," said Leonard Sternadel, 68.
On a warm mid-May afternoon, Sternadel, of El Campo, with his two Ganado brothers, Frank, 77, and Kenneth Sternadel, 71, visited the Warrior's Weekend Field of Honor in Victoria, which hosts more than 2,500 American flags, each honoring a veteran.

Meandering through the rows of flags, the Sternadels enjoyed laughter and playful, brotherly teasing. They also shared difficult memories of the war as they visited each of their three flags.

The field of flags they visited was more than a beautiful patriotic display.

It also was an opportunity for healing and a sign that their community recognized and honored their sacrifices and service.

"When we came back, that was a tough time for our country," Leonard Sternadel said. "It's very satisfying that maybe after all these years and the things that we did and we went through, … people can at least acknowledge (our service)."

FRANK STERNADEL

When Frank Sternadel entered the Army in 1963, he was prepared to go to Vietnam. Instead, he was assigned to an "8-to-5" office job issuing security clearances at Fort Bragg in North Carolina.

Like his brothers, he grew up on his parents' farm in Ganado, taking his fair share of hard work in a large family that ultimately raised six other siblings.

"I'm the older, wiser of the three of us," he said, chuckling wryly.

Frank Sternadel poses soon after joining the U.S. Army in 1963.

He and his brothers recalled with laughter partaking in cow-patty and corn-cob fights. Although the brothers didn't always get along during their formative years, they have since grown close, they agreed. "My life was very boring in the service compared to these two," the eldest brother said.

KENNETH STERNADEL

Unlike his older brother, Kenneth Sternadel saw plenty of Vietnam.

"You didn't miss anything," Kenneth Sternadel said, reassuring his older brother with quiet emphasis.

Kenneth Sternadel joined the Marines at age 18 in 1965 after cotton ginning season ended in Ganado. After completing Marine boot camp at Camp Pendleton, he learned helicopter mechanics in Memphis, Tenn., before going on a four-month "Caribbean cruise" aboard a helicopter carrier.

When he got back in 1967, he had orders to go to Vietnam. At the time, he didn't consider the dangers.

During that year, 11,363 Americans were killed in Vietnam, according to the National Archives.

"I never thought about it really. It was just a place I had to be," he said.

Stationed near the demilitarized zone, the border adjoining North and South Vietnam, the middle Sternadel brother flew daily aboard a Sikorsky H-34 helicopter as a door gunner and mechanic.

The job allowed him to see much of Vietnam as the crew resupplied troops, chauffeured VIPs and removed wounded soldiers to safety.

"The worst," Sternadel said, was making night rescue trips into jungles filled with darkness and enemy soldiers.

"You couldn't see," he said, his voice cracking with emotion.

Sometimes, as they searched for the strobe lights used by American troops to guide helicopters to safe landings, several other lights would be sighted in the jungles.
Enemy Vietnamese soldiers hoped to confuse pilots with those lights and kill the helicopter crews who mistakenly landed near them.

"They were trying to kill us," he said. "And we were trying to kill them."

During his 14 months in Vietnam, Kenneth Sternadel experienced many terrifying times. He was there during the infamous Tet Offensive. He landed three times amid falling rocket artillery during the siege of Khe Sanh. But he said his absolute worst day was July 4, 1968, when his helicopter was attempting to rescue wounded near the demilitarized zone.

While making a second pass at a landing zone after overshooting it the first time, the pilot and corpsman on board were shot. Their helicopter crashed.

Sternadel said afterward at least 50 bullet holes were counted on the helicopter.

"You don't think about stuff like that. You put it out of your mind," he said.

LEONARD STERNADEL

Leonard Sternadel, who jokingly described himself as "mama's favorite" and "the best-looking one," joined the Army in 1969 because he assumed he would be drafted.
That year marked the most American deaths during the war with 16,899 killed, according to the National Archives.

Sooner than he expected, he found himself making reconnaissance patrols in the jungles to the north of South Vietnam's capital, Saigon.

For nine months, he hiked through jungles, setting booby traps and laying ambushes along trails.

Once, one of those booby traps exploded, killing a dear friend as it was being set. Another time, he and a small group of Americans became the target of an ambush themselves, causing them to run for their lives as the enemy pursued them. That same day, a helicopter was shot down while attempting to remove wounded Americans. The experience was terrifying, he said.

"Initially, you are bulletproof, but that doesn't last long," he said.

During those nine months, Leonard Sternadel said he rarely thought about the grim, deadly business in which he was involved.

"You really try to put it out of your mind," he said, adding, "You either kill them, or they kill you."
Lasting effects

Although Leonard Sternadel survived those trying months, they have left an indelible mark in his mind, he said. While remembering some of those times at the Field of Honor, Sternadel was gripped with emotion almost 50 years later.

Talking with a Veterans Affairs counselor helps, he said, and so does socializing with other veterans. Sternadel is president and co-founder of Chapter 1069 of the Vietnam Veterans of America.

But perhaps most of all, it's the support and recognition of his community that has helped him live with those memories, he said.

"I feel like I am a patriot. I feel proud for my service to my country," he said.

AFTER THE WAR

Frank Sternadel and his wife of 53 years had two sons living in Victoria and Longview. They are both married. Sternadel's wife died last year. He worked for Alcoa in Port Lavaca for 36 years. He lives in Victoria.

Kenneth Sternadel has been married for 48 years and has two married children, who live in San Antonio and Seadrift, and four grandchildren. Sternadel worked for Key Energy for 41 years. He lives in Ganado.

After giving 26 years to the U.S. Army, Sternadel retired in 1995. He has also worked as community service director for the City of El Campo, where he lives, and served two terms on the city council there. He is the president and cofounder of Vietnam Veterans of America Chapter No. 1069.

PLANNING , OBTAINING FUNDS AND TRANSPORTING MEMORIAL STONEWORK FOR VIETNAM MEMORIAL ARRIVES AT CAMP PENDLETON

Sitting 4 ½ years ago in the shadows of the 5th Marine Regiment's memorial garden, Steve Colwell dreamed that someday he'd return to see a granite monument rising from the dust to remember his long ago war in Vietnam.

On Thursday morning — National Vietnam War Veterans Day — three semitrailer flatbed trucks hauling 50 tons of black granite cut into six large slabs pulled into a parking lot inside Camp Pendleton. The stonework displays the names of 2,706 Marines and sailors killed in Vietnam while fighting for the three battalions that comprised the 5th Marine Regiment, plus the dead from 2nd Battalion, Fourth Marines.

And Colwell was there to greet it, along with hundreds of Marines who lined San Mateo Drive at a rigid position of attention in solemn honor of the memorial.

"Back then, I was one person sitting out here and now we have 2,706 Marines and sailors who died in Vietnam. It's been a long journey," said Colwell, a Carlsbad real estate developer who was seriously wounded near Hoi An while serving with D Company, 1st Battalion, Fifth Marines in 1967. "And no matter how much work it's been, I have to remind myself that it's an honor to be able to do this."

After a brief ceremony, workers began jostling the heavy granite hewn by Vermont's Rock of Ages quarry off the trucks. Escorted by chapters of The Patriot Guard Riders along the 3,000-mile route, the stonework started out from New England covered in snow but arrived on a sunny Thursday at Camp Pendleton.

Along with a spire rising from the center of the monument, it's slated to be fully installed by Me-

On Monday, May 28 the 1/5 Vietnam Veterans Association dedicated the 5th Marines Vietnam War Memorial with a ceremony from 11:00 a.m. to 12:30 p.m. at Camp San Mateo 5th Marine Regiment Memorial Garden, located on Cristianitos Road in San Clemente, CA. The Memorial will honor the 2,706 Marines and Sailors who died in Vietnam while serving with the 5th Regiment.

The Memorial Monument was designed entirely with granite by monument builder Rock of Ages. The layout includes a total of six name panels arranged in a "U" shape around the center piece. Both sides of the name panels list the KIAs for a total of twelve name panels. The Battalions and porcelain emblems are listed at the top of the panels for each unit.

The panels list the rank, first name, middle initial and last name of the 2,706 KIAs in the 5th Marines during the Vietnam War. Twelve granite benches accommodate visitors to the Camp San Mateo Memorial Park with great close-up views of the Memorial Monument.

This project holds special meaning for both Rock of Ages and the veterans organizations involved. David Fournier, Large Projects Specialist at Rock of Ages, said, "Early on in the project, Steve Colwell of the 1/5 Vietnam Veterans Association payed us a visit and it was quite an experience listening to him talk about his Vietnam tour with D Company, 1st Battalion Fifth Marines. This Memorial means so much to him, and we are truly honored to be a part of it."

Those involved with raising funds for the project include the 1/5 Vietnam Veterans Association, the 1st Marine Division Association, the Dana Point 5th Marines Support Group, and the 5th Marine Regiment Command Group. Funds are still being raised for the Memorial. Donations are being accepted through the campaign

Stephen B. Colwell of the 1/5 Vietnam Veterans Association will be on site during the ceremony for interviews. He can be reached at 760-522-6091 and stephenbcolwell@aol.com.

ABOUT THE 1/5 VIETNAM VETERANS ASSOCIATION

The 1/5 Vietnam Veterans Unit Chapter of the 1st Marine Division Association is a 501 (C) (19) not-for-profit corporation chartered in the state of North Carolina. The organization's missions include supporting the 1st Marine Division Association and its Scholarship Programs; preserving incidents and memories of the Marines and Sailors who served with 1/5/1 during the Vietnam War; and fostering, encouraging, and perpetuating the memory and the spirit and comradeship in arms of the 1/5/1 Vietnam Veterans. For more information, visit 1-5vietnamveterans.org.

Vietnam veterans have been waiting for the memorial for 50 years. The class of '67 was one that fought with distinction but also suffered the devastation of some of the toughest fighting the war in Vietnam would ever see.

The cold granite walls represent 2,706 Marines and sailors and their once-2nd Lt. Steve Colwell oversaw the years long process of raising the money and designing the memorial.

"In the 60s, they raised their hand and they answered the call of duty when 16 million of their peers stepped sideways or backwards," Colwell said. "They put on a pack and went 10,000 miles away from home. They fought in rice paddies and jungles and monsoons and terrible conditions and they gave all they had and all they would ever have."

Jimmie Edwards III says the dates etched into the memorials are scarred into the minds of all the members of the 5th Marine Regiment.

"On August 19, 1969, all those names are the men I was with that were killed when I was wounded," Edwards said.

Members of the Fighting 5th say finally all the brothers that have been scattered in cemeteries across the nation are now brought together one last time.

morial Day. It will join a memorial garden already ringed by monuments to the regiment's fight to take Vietnam's Go Nai Island during Operation Allen Brook in 1968; the 14 Marines from I Company, 3rd Battalion, Fifth Marines lost in the crash of an MV-22 Osprey tiltrotor aircraft in 2000; and the many Marines killed in Iraq and Afghanistan since 2003.

"We've been building it out for 10 years now," said Terry Rifkin, the president of the Dana Point 5th Marine Regiment Support Group, a charity that spearheaded much of the funding for the monuments. "It's a special place."
The nonprofit joined the 1/5 Vietnam Veterans Association and the 1st Marine Division Association to collect more than $350,000 to fund the Vietnam memorial, but they're seeking about $50,000 more from the public.

That should be enough to pay the cost of of the foundation, finish the landscaping and fly out several impoverished Gold Star families so that they can see the names of their loved ones on the memorial, too.

Anything left over will be donated to charities designed to aid service members, Colwell said.

Colwell predicted that the memorial and its tranquil garden will become a mecca for Vietnam veterans to visit, sitting quietly in the shade as he once did while they reflected on the war they fought a half-century ago.

Men like John Chang, 72, who made the trip from Surprise, Ariz. to welcome the memorial to Camp Pendleton.

"Every night, in my dreams I see the faces of the Marines and corpsmen who are on this monument. Brave, brave men. And now they're home, again, at the 5th Marine Regiment," said Chang, a corpsman with C Company, 1st Battalion, 5th Marines in Vietnam.

Lt. Col. John Gianopoulos, the executive officer of 5th Marine Regiment, will be glad to see them. Throughout the morning, he encouraged Marines lining the roadway for the monument's arrival to seek out Vietnam vets and shake their hands, welcoming them back home.

"It's about establishing a connection," said Gianopoulos, a former commander of Weapons Company, 2nd Battalion, 5th Marines, in Iraq. "Today, you get so much, 'Thank you for your service.' I believe in that. I love that connection the American military has today with civil society, but it's no secret that it hasn't always been that way.

"If you'd asked about that 40 years ago — did you get a lot of thanks for your service? — I'd venture to say that the answer would be 'no.'" he said.

He noted the "amazing" relationship America had with its veterans immediately after World War II.
"Part of what America is built upon is that relationship between civil society and our military, but we went to a low point in the 1970s and 1980s and these veterans standing out here today helped to overcome that," he said. "They stood with broad shoulders, endured that and built that so that today I can't walk down the street without somebody stopping me and thanking me for my service."

MARINE RECONNAISSANCE FOUNDATION

On 02 June 1969 Recon Team "Flight Time" from D Company, 3rd Reconnaissance Battalion, was inserted on Hill 471 about a kilometer south of Khe Sanh in the Quảng Trị Province, Vietnam, On the night of 03/04 June 1969 the team was attacked by an enemy force and requested both emergency extraction and immediate reinforcement. Communications with the team were lost at 0320. When the reactionary force arrived a little after 0400 they were too late ... the six members of "Flight Time" were dead. Five members of the team were in a small trench; the sixth, Cpl Buck, was approximately 10 meters further down the hillside. It was apparent from the state of the battle area that "Flight Time" had been overwhelmed in fierce Hand to hand combat.

FALLEN MARINE CORPS MAJOR KILLED IN VIETNAM WAR, HONORED AS HERO, REMEMBERED AS DAD

By: Paul Wagner

WASHINGTON - Fifty years after a Marine Corp Major lost his life in Vietnam, his daughter is paying her respects at the Vietnam Veterans Memorial Wall.

Anastasia Kurilich was 7-years-old when her father was shot down Southeast of Khe Sanh Airfield. He lost his life with the helicopter pilot, Ralph Hunt, and Marine Captain Richard Corcoran.

Anastasia Kurilich learned what happened in a talk with her mom. That's a memory that never fades.

"And she just sat us down in our room and just said 'Remember when we had the talk that Daddy may not come back from the war?' And then it just hits." While Anastasia visited the wall for the third time on Saturday, she was overcome by emotion while in the company of other Vietnam vets. Something she had not done before.

"Saturday with the Vietnam Veterans, Run For The Wall and I just let it go. It was the right people to come with." Major Robert Kurilich may have looked at himself as one tough Marine, but Anastasia says he was one big softy.

"I have seven years of body contact that is warm, golden, honey-colored love just pouring through us. He was everybody's favorite because he was just this big teddy bear love. Even though he was a Marine -- he was a marshmallow heart Marine."

Anastasia's older sister has never been to the wall. But her mother and younger sister have. She describes it as hallowed ground.

She says of her Dad's sacrifice, "as a child you just want your Daddy and you know people say he is a hero because he served his country and did this and that. I say he is a hero because he was loving and kind and patient and funny and that is why he is my hero."

Marine Corps Major Robert Kurilich was 30-years-old years old and a 10-year veteran when he was killed. His memory will live on, with his name engraved on panel 59 west.

Thank you for your service Major Kurilich.

SGTMAJ BERNARD G. GODDARD, USMC
KHE SANH VETERAN,
KILO CO 3/26 HILL 861
1927-2018

Sgt. Maj. Bernard G. Goddard, USMC (Ret.) passed away May 29th, 2018. Bernard was born December 8th, 1927 in Dudley, MA., the second child to Joel and Rose Goddard. Bernard attended Cole Trade School of Southbridge, MA. 1943-1945, After which he began his 34-year career in the United States Marine Corps by enlisting in July 1945.

After recruit training at Parris Island, SC., he was deployed to Tientsin, China for occupation duty until the end of WWII. Bernard served in Korea from 1953-1955, and later, when the Cuban Missile Crisis erupted, he was deployed to Guantanamo Bay, Cuba in October 1962. With the escalation of the war in Vietnam, he deployed as First Sergeant of Kilo Company, 3rd Battalion, 26th Marines. During 1966-1967 he saw action in the I Corps area of South Vietnam along the DMZ where he received four Purple Hearts and was awarded the Vietnamese Cross of Gallantry. Bernard's actions in Vietnam have also been cited in two publications: "LIMA-6" by Colonel R.D. Camp with Eric Hammel and "The Battle for Khe Sanh" by Captain Moyers S. Shore II.

After his retirement from the U.S. Marine Corps on September 1st, 1979, Bernard settled his family in Poway, Ca. where he began his second career helping anyone and everyone. He was always available to his friends, neighbors and strangers alike for whatever they needed. He was often seen driving the streets of Poway in "Old Betsey", his beloved military green pickup truck with Marine Corp. emblems waiving to fellow patriots who honked their horn thanking him for his service.

Bernard is survived by his wife Yasuko, daughter Linda and granddaughter Victoria.

In lieu of flowers, please make a donation in Bernard's name to any Veterans assistance organization or to his granddaughter's college fund at the following website:

COMMENTS:

Breakfast with my marine brothers and wives; inspired at the love and dedication we share for Our Kilo Co First Sgt. As difficult it is to say goodbye we are all sharing different specific interactions we had in Vietnam. Thankful to having had the opportunity to have known this great Marine! Semper Fi!

CHICK-FIL-A HONORS FALLEN SOLDIERS WITH SPECIAL EMPTY TABLE

By Michelle Gant | Fox News

Chick-fil-A celebrated fallen soldiers on Memorial Day by setting an empty table in remembrance of them.

At several locations across the country, the chicken chain set a special place as a reminder of those who've lost their lives serving our country.

"It's a tradition in military services when you have a formal celebration to have a table for those who didn't make it back," retired Navy Commander Marinus Storm, who runs a Chick-fil-A in Jacksonville, Fla. said in a statement.

The Missing Man Tables, also referred to as Remembrance or Fallen Soldier Tables, were set with a white tablecloth "for the purity of the service members' motives in serving their nation" and an "empty chair that will never be filled."

On top sat a red rose, an American flag, a Bible and a framed message about the meaning of the display. "People have always been touched by it, especially veterans and the generation that has children in the armed forces now," Storm said. "There's no doubt this is an opportunity to teach people, specifically those who don't have any connection to the military, about the sacrifices our service members make and that hose losses last."

OBJECTS ON THE TABLE

The white tablecloth draped over the table represents the purity of their response to our country's call to arms.

The empty chair depicts an unknown face, representing no specific Soldier, Sailor, Airman, or Marine, but all who are not here with us.

The table itself is round to show that our concern for them is never ending.

The Bible represents faith in a higher power and the pledge to our country, founded as one nation under God.

The black napkin stands for the emptiness these warriors have left in the hearts of their families and friends. A Purple Heart medal can be pinned to the napkin.

The single red rose reminds us of their families and loved ones. The red ribbon represents the love of our country, which inspired them to answer the nation's call.

The yellow candle and its yellow ribbon symbolize the everlasting hope for a joyous reunion with those yet accounted for.

The slices of lemon on the bread plate remind us of their bitter fate.

The salt upon the bread plate represent the tears of their families.

The wine glass, turned upside down, reminds us that our distinguished comrades cannot be with us to drink a toast or join in the festivities of the evening.

FEDERAL JUDGE DELAYS MONGOLS TRIAL BUT WARNS THE GANG ABOUT MANNERS

R. Scott Moxley

Inside a stately Orange County federal courtroom on June 4, U.S. District Court Judge David O. Carter silently eyed a wild looking bunch of at least 25 Mongols Motorcycle Club members dominating the public seating section.

Several of the club's crew looked bar-room ready to rumble with anyone who held their probing gazes, but Carter, a heroic U.S. Marine survivor of a brutal 1968 military battle in the Vietnam War at Khe Sanh as well as one of the nation's most colorful judges, wanted the motley crew to know who is in charge and not to be challenged: him.

"What a great impression you make," the federal judge sarcastically said to the Mongols during the pre-trial hearing.

He told the group–which has a history of murder, robbery and extortion in Southern California–they are welcome to attend proceedings, but if he sees any of them "looking cross-eyed" at witnesses during an upcoming trial there will be hell to pay. "I had a whole row of about 50 cops do that," he said about an Anaheim police excessive force case.

To press his point, Carter asked the Mongols in attendance, folks who spent an inordinate amount of time mad-dogging an undercover federal law enforcement agent working the case, if they "got it." "Yes, sir," most of them quickly responded.

The Mongols are involuntarily in Carter's ninth-floor Santa Ana courtroom because the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) is trying to use the federal Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act to rob the club of two of its iconic trademark logos in a ground-breaking forfeiture claim.

It's not clear what the government would do if it grabs the rights to the logos, but Carter dismissed DOJ's first attempt at the move as "legally deficient" in 2015.

Two years later, a three-judge panel at the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit reversed his ruling without determining if prosecutors can legally take the trademarks.

In late May, DOJ officials filed an amended complaint against the Mongols, adding new murder, attempted murder and narcotics trafficking charges in their effort.

The expected six to eight-week trial at Orange County's Ronald Reagan Federal Courthouse was scheduled to begin June 26, but the parties asked Carter to delay the case until October 23.

An assistant United States attorney told the judge he will use the testimony of undercover agents who infiltrated the Mongols organization to establish it remains a lethal criminal enterprise subject to federal forfeiture laws.

Carter expressed renewed concerns about the government's theory given First Amendment protections, noting that self-identified Nazis freely rallied in Skokie, Illinois in the 1970s and "idiots" at the Westboro Baptist Church in Kansas have openly prayed "for the death of marines" because the nation enacted gay rights.

Joseph A. Yanny, the raspy-voiced Los Angeles-based attorney for the Mongols, argued DOJ is "trying to hang the club on the [criminal] actions of rogue individuals," who have been booted from the organization which is now home to "law abiders."

"Well, that's your claim," responded Carter, who has experience presiding over cases involving dangerous criminal street gangs like the Aryan Brotherhood and Mexican Mafia. "I'll have to hear testimony."

Among DOJ's new counts against the Mongols is the alleged sale of a tiny amount of narcotics, a charge the judge said made him "scratch my head in amazement." He asked, "Does anyone really care about 34 grams of drugs?"

The Mongols chuckled.

But a federal prosecutor responded, "I do."

Ironic that of all days I was not only at Navy drill but that I had the honor of meeting a Vietnam Marine Corps veteran - Sgt. Lee Rimkus.

This man was attending a building rededication named for HM3 "Doc" James Raab. Doc was killed by a NVA sniper after he "went forward" over a cemetery wall to aid a Marine who had been shot. A second Marine also went over the wall to try a get Doc Raab and he too was shot. Doc Raab was awarded the Silver Star, the Bronze Star with "Valor" insignia along with the Purple Heart.

Doc Raab's son was 2 months old. The Raab family were NJ natives. Mrs. Raab, also present today, never remarried, and raised her children in NJ. The son, he went on to graduate high school in Toms River and entered the United States Naval Academy. He continued his Navy career, retiring today after 32 years of service, including his Academy time.

Sergeant Lee Rimkus, was the Radio man that called in the medevac for Doc Raab. At the time of Doc Raab's demise, the platoon/battalion had been engaged in a 5-day, near continuous, battle with the NVA. This battle hardened Marine cried today for 'his' Corpsman, all these years later.

Panel 57W 003 is Raab's inscribed Vietnam Memorial location.

Sgt. Rimkus related that the previous 3 Corpsmen assigned to the battalion and 2 Radiomen were all killed in action. He was an infantry rifleman who was ordered to do radio operator duty.

He opined openly that he did not know why he survived … except perhaps to "be here today to honor a man who gave his all for his Marines". He spoke of the Marines' 3 field rules;

1."Don't mess with our chow, it was only C Rations, but they were our C-Rations."
2. "Don't mess with the mail, it was the only thing they looked forward to."
3. And … Don't ever mess with our/my Corpsman … just don't. He's ours!

This was a humble man, a man who had lived more than a lifetime by his 20th year of life. 13 months of Vietnam field duty. Marines came and went, some went home injured, some went home dead, some went home alive, most, if not all, were anonymous but he always knew and remembered his Corpsmen. "They were us, and we were them."

He reported his greatest fear was meeting Mrs. Raab, "I don't know why but …" as his voice trailed off. A man who had hip replacement surgery a month ago, "and I got 'better' so I could be here today." He limped with a cane. He came from Bozeman, Montana to "honor an American hero".

At the end of the ceremony, I approached him again, he asked me if he did okay … seemingly concerned that he didn't do justice to his Corpsman.

I reached for my shirt and removed my FMF Warfare pin, shook his hand with pin in mine, giving my pin to him. He opened his hand asking "what's this?". I told him it was my FMF pin, and it was now his. His tears flowed … trying to hand it back to me, and I told him "No, that's yours for taking care of our Corpsman". His hug was as ready as his tears, unreserved and honest as he said "thank you, thank you Doc, thank you brother!"

That's summed it all up "Doc" and "brother" in the same sentence.

Semper Fidelis Marine Sgt. Rimkus. Semper Fi.

Rest In Peace HM3 James Doc Raab. Semper Fi Doc.

REFLECTIONS OF VIETNAM

On Monday, May 21 at 2:00 pm the Senior Center of South Plainfield hosted a special photo presentation narrated by South Plainfield High School alumni, Joe Belardo and Paul Fusco. The two men, who were friends in high school, spent time together in Vietnam in 1967-68, and have created a program entitled "Reflections of Vietnam," which they have presented more than 200 times. "Reflections of Vietnam" covers Belardo and Fusco's combat experience and one-on-one exposure to the Vietnam

In the 35 years that Belardo and Fusco have been doing their presentation, audience reactions have been emotional. Person photographs depict scenes in Southern Vietnam, the Central Highlands, and the Demilitarized Zone. The 1968 TET Offensive and battles in the mountainous highlands are shown as well. The program's climax is the famous battle of Khe Sanh Combat Base.

"Reflections of Vietnam" covers the soldiers' conditions, life in the combat zone, the devastating loss of combat comrades, and the emotional journey home. The harsh realities of Vietnam, such as the impact of Agent Orange on soldiers and civilians, as well as the suffering of those with PTSD, are included to show the harsh realities of combat.

Also on display during the presentation are military memorabilia and artifacts from the Vietnam conflict.

Free of charge, members of the Senior Center as well as residents of South Plainfield, were invited to the program on May 21st. The Senior Center is located at 90 Maple Avenue. As Memorial Day approaches, this program is a fitting tribute to the men and women who have served in the US military. For further information call 908-754-1047.

HIS VALOR FORGOTTEN FOR HALF CENTURY, MARINE KIA TO RECEIVE BATTLEFIELD AWARD

The President of the United States of America takes pride in presenting the Silver Star (Posthumously) to First Lieutenant Philip Howard Sauer (MCSN: 0-93419), United States Marine Corps, for conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity in action against the enemy while serving with 1st Battalion, Ninth Marines, 3d Marine Division (Reinforced), FMF, in the Republic of Vietnam on 24 April 1967. While on a reconnaissance patrol of Hill 861, First Lieutenant Sauer's five-man squad was suddenly ambushed by murderous enemy fire from well-placed enemy bunkers and trenches, immediately killing the point man. Realizing his squad was engaged with a superior enemy force, First Lieutenant Sauer ordered his squad to withdraw while he provided covering fire with only his personal sidearm. He was last seen holding his position in the face of overwhelming enemy fire. First Lieutenant Sauer's bold action, courage under fire, and complete devotion to duty, reflected great credit upon him and were in keeping with the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and the United States Naval Service.

REMEMBERING MY 1/26 BROTHERS LOST 48 YEARS AGO
RIP JUNE 7, 1968

On 07 June 1968 the 1st Bn, 26th Marines were conducting a sweep along the Bon Song River. Alpha 1/26 was providing a screening force along the river while Delta 1/26 was moving through the hills along the river. Charlie 1/26 was in echelon behind Delta, with the Command Group and H&S Company bringing up the rear.

As Delta 1/26 crested a ridgeline they took fire from a trenchline. The company established a base of fire, flanked the trenchline, and forced the NVA to withdraw - but they didn't withdraw far; a second set of fortifications lay only 50 yards behind the first. Charlie 1/26 sent help and Delta buckled down to assaulting the second trench line - and once again forced the NVA from their lines.

This action, though costly, was only a prelude. The NVA troops engaged by Delta 1/26 were a covering force for the NVA main body, which withdrew into the Alpha 1/26 position - and were engaged by the Alpha 1/26 Marines in a bloody fight. By the time the NVA escaped through the gap between Alpha's flank and the oncoming Delta Marines, 20 Marines and 2 sailors were dead:

The 1/26 Marines meets an NVA battalion at My Loc (2), three miles northeast of An Hoa. Alpha Company was on the right, Delta Company on the left, and Charlie Company in the middle, about 200 yards back. The hot weather continued and was exhausting at 100 degrees and 90% humidity. During fighting on 7 June, both Alpha and Delta Companies are hit hard.

The Delta Company advance had the 2nd Platoon on the left flank, 3rd Platoon advancing up a small ridge line and 1st Platoon was sweeping a village on the right. The company command post was behind 3rd platoon.

About 10 AM that morning the NVA opened up on the 3rd Platoon's lead squad which had gotten inside the enemy's camouflaged positions. The enemy opened up with automatic weapons at close range from a trench line. Elements of 3rd Platoon counter attacked the enemy killing all five NVA in the trench. Delta Company sustained casualties including two Marines KIA.

The following Marines were killed during this fight:
2nd Lt. Samuel Hannah, 6/7/68 -- Killed by gunshot wound near My Loc 2
LCpl. David Auen, 6/7/68 -- Killed by gunshot wound near My Loc 2

The fighting became widespread. Alpha Company was to the right and ahead of Delta and they took fire when they entered a tree line and became heavily engaged. All of Delta Company platoons came under fire. 2nd Platoon assaulted through the tree line and relieved the pressure on third platoon.

The Company regrouped while casualties were medevaced. Charlie Company had moved up to support Delta sent one platoons by helicopter over to help Alpha Company in its actions. Charlie Company was ordered to secure around the LZ.
About noon as Delta Company got ready to move out again, snipers opened up from the direction away from the tree line. The company held its position and a fire mission was called. Then, the NVA opened up on the company with heavy automatic weapons fire from positions in the tree line. Third Platoon was hit hard again and the attack resulted in many Marine casualties.

Delta Company with attached units engaged the NVA and the enemy was forced to pull back as sustained artillery and air strikes were called in. That evening the 1st Platoon was pulled up on the ridge with 2nd and 3rd Platoons.

The following Marines were killed during this fight:
Cpl. Normand Deschaine, 6/7/68 - Died of wounds suffered during fighting near My Loc
Cpl. Johnnie Espy, 6/7/68 - Killed by gunshot wound near My Loc
LCpl. John Scarpinato, 6/7/68 - Killed by gunshot wound near My Loc
HN Ronald Rockefeller, 6/7/68 - Killed by gunshot wound near My Loc

Elements of Alpha and Charlie Companies were attached to Delta Company during this fight. The following Marines were killed:

Pfc. Alton Staples III, 6/7/68 - A/1/26 Marine
Cpl. David Dixon, 6/7/58 - C/1/26 Marine
2nd Lt. Samuel Hannah was awarded the Silver Star (Posthumously) for his actions and valor on June 7, 1968.
Sgt. Clark Henson (KIA-6/16/68) was awarded the Silver Star (Posthumously) for his actions and valor on June 7, 1968.
The My Loc (2) fight was costly with many Delta and Alpha Company casualties reported. Delta Company casualties were 8 KIA and 22 WIA. Alpha Company had 14 KIA and 18 WIA.

Enemy casualties were heavy and his objective of gaining close approach to Da Nang was once again denied.

CRAIG TOURTE WRITES REUNION OF MARCO SOTO & DAVID TONICK

In 2008 the Khe Sanh Reunion was held in Reno, Nevada. As I read this post about that battle which occurred fifty years ago today when both Marco Soto and David Soto were wounded, I thought of that reunion and the first meeting since that battle of the meeting between Marco and David. I thought some would find it interesting and indicative of the often-surprising events that occur at our reunions, here is a portion of the story of that meeting.

".... Marco and his wife sat a couple of tables away from ours. I introduced myself to Marco's wife and thanked them both for coming. Marco told me that when he signed his name on the reunion sign up board he noted the name of David Tonick, and asked if I knew who he was, as both David and he had served in the same company in Vietnam and he had not seen David for over forty years. Marco took out his wallet and showed me an old color photograph of David taken during the war. At that point my heart skipped a few beats and I had to take a couple of breaths. I'm just assuming here, but I had to believe that Marco and David had been rather close in Vietnam. My understanding is that the last time Marco saw David was when he and David were severely wounded, and Marco was told to grab another other wounded and get on the chopper. David was removed from the field of battle with a rather large wound in his back and neck. In June of 1968 Alpha and Charlie Companies were attached to Delta Company, all with the Twenty-Sixth Marine Regiment, when they assaulted up a small hill containing spider holes, towards an enemy-held trench line. Marco sustained a wound to the back of his neck and had his M-16 jam during the assault. Many who survived the Siege of Khe Sanh were killed and wounded.

I took four steps to my left, less than ten feet. As I stood in front of the next table. I told David that there was someone at the next table who he should meet. David stood up and followed me the few feet to where Marco was sitting. I noticed that David had a photograph of himself taken in Vietnam attached to his reunion name tag. The exact same photograph that Marco had shown me just seconds before. It was a private moment and I left them alone to get reacquainted."

DAVID DOUGLAS DUNCAN, 102, WHO PHOTOGRAPHED THE REALITY OF WAR, DIES

THE NEW YORK TIMES

June 7, 2018

Under the helmets, the faces are young and tormented, stubbled and dirty, taut with the strain of battle. They sob over dead friends. They stare exhausted into the fog and rain. They crouch in a muddy foxhole. This goddamn cigarette could be the last.

There are no heroes in David Douglas Duncan's images of war.

Dark and brooding, mostly black and white, they are the stills of a legendary combat photographer, an artist with a camera, who brought home to America the poignant lives of infantrymen and fleeing civilians caught up in World War II, the Korean conflict and the war in Vietnam.

"I felt no sense of mission as a combat photographer," Mr. Duncan, who was wounded several times, told The New York Times in 2003. "I just felt maybe the guys out there deserved being photographed just the way they are, whether they are running scared, or showing courage, or diving into a hole, or talking and laughing. And I think I did bring a sense of dignity to the battlefield."

Mr. Duncan, who had lived since 1962 in Castelleras, France, died on Thursday at a hospital in Grasse, in the South of France, his wife, Sheila Macauley,said. He was 102.

He was among the most influential photographers of the 20th century, a Life magazine peer of Alfred Eisenstaedt, Margaret Bourke-White and Carl Mydans. In addition to his war work, Mr. Duncan spent years with Pablo Picasso, creating a pictorial record of the artist's life, and roamed the world making photographic essays on the Kremlin, the city of Paris and the panorama of peoples in Asia, Africa and the Middle East.

A globe-trotting adventurer sometimes likened to Hemingway, he climbed mountains, crossed jungles and was a deep-sea diver, a marine zoologist, a fisherman, an aerial and undersea photographer, an archaeologist in Mexico and Central America and a connoisseur of Japanese art and culture.

His work filled more than 25 books, including eight on Picasso. "This Is War!" (1951), about Korea, was his best-known combat work and brought worldwide acclaim. The renowned photographer Edward Steichen called it "the greatest book of war photographs ever published."

Mr. Duncan was a Marine officer and combat photographer in World War II, covering the American invasions of the Solomon Islands and Okinawa. He was aboard the battleship Missouri in Tokyo Bay in 1945 photographing the formal Japanese surrender under the stern gaze of Gen. Douglas MacArthur.

He joined Life after the war, and his assignments took him to conflicts in Palestine, Greece and Turkey and to India, Egypt, Morocco and Afghanistan. He was in Japan in 1950 when North Korean troops crossed the 38th parallel, igniting a United Nations police action that would leave 36,500 Americans dead.

Mr. Duncan was soon on the front lines, exposed to the same dangers as the allied troops and civilian refugees. He also flew on bombing missions, taking pictures from jets swooping over targets. He wrote the text for "This Is War!," as he did for his other books, but critics said it was his pictures that captured the essence of war.

"My objective always is to stay as close as possible and shoot the pictures as if through the eyes of the infantryman, the Marine or the pilot," he told an interviewer in 1951. "I wanted to give the reader something of the visual perspective and feeling of the guy under fire, his apprehensions and sufferings, his tensions and releases, his behavior in the presence of threatening death."

In Vietnam, where he worked for Life and ABC News, Mr. Duncan again focused on the vulnerability of soldiers and civilians, often against backgrounds of lush jungles and burning villages. His most powerful images were made in the 1968 siege of Khe Sanh. But in contrast to the objectivity he showed in earlier wars, he was critical of the United States' role in Vietnam, which he denounced in his book "I Protest!" (1968).

Mr. Duncan's friendship with Picasso began in 1956, when, at the suggestion of a colleague, the war photographer Robert Capa, he went uninvited to Picasso's home, the Villa La Californie, in the South of France. Admitted by Picasso's wife at the time, Jacqueline Roque, he found his subject taking a bath. Mr. Duncan stayed for months, and they were simpatico for 17 years, until Picasso's death in 1973.

Exploring the artist's daily life and extraordinary creativity, Mr. Duncan's pictures were collected in "The Private World of Pablo Picasso" (1958), "Picasso's Picasso" (1961), "Goodbye Picasso" (1974), "The Silent Studio" (1976), "Viva Picasso" (1980) and other volumes.

"You cannot imagine how simple it was," Mr. Duncan told Le Monde in 2012. "I was there, like someone belonging to the family, and I took pictures."

David Douglas Duncan was born to Kenneth and Florence (Watson) Duncan on Jan. 23, 1916, in Kansas City, Mo., where he and three brothers and a sister grew up. He was fascinated with photography from an early age.

He studied archaeology at the University of Arizona in 1934, but dropped out to join expeditions to Mexico and Central America. He then majored in zoology and Spanish at the University of Miami, graduating in 1938.

Resolved to freelance, he began deep-sea fishing, diving and photographing aquatic life. On a schooner from Key West, Fla., to the Cayman Islands, he took pictures of giant sea turtles. In Mexico, he photographed Indians, Gila monsters and jaguars, and shot Mayan ruins in the Yucatan. Off Peru and Chile, he caught and photographed swordfish and marlin. His pictures ran in National Geographic magazine and many newspapers.

After World War II, he went to Palestine for Life and covered fighting between Arabs and Jews in 1946, before the creation of the State of Israel.

His marriage to Leila Khanki, in 1947, ended in divorce. He married Ms. Macauley in 1962. She is his only immediate survivor.

Mr. Duncan covered the Republican and Democratic National Conventions for NBC News in 1968. He was just back from Vietnam, and what might have been a hiatus from combat turned violent in Chicago, where National Guardsmen with rifles and police officers with nightsticks and tear gas clashed with antiwar demonstrators outside the convention hall where Democrats were meeting. His photographs showed helmeted troops on Michigan Avenue, protesters with gashed and bleeding heads, and a sobbing girl who pleaded with him, "Please, tell it like it was." The grim scenes were published in his 1969 book, "Self-Portrait: U.S.A."

Mr. Duncan's archives — including thousands of combat photographs, works on Picasso and others for "The Kremlin" (1960), "Sunflowers for Van Gogh" (1986) and other books — were acquired in 1996 by the Harry Ransom Humanities Research Center at the University of Texas in Austin.

He went to war with only essential equipment: helmet, poncho, spoon, toothbrush, compass, soap and backpack containing two canteens, an exposure meter, film and two cameras. He used a Rolleiflex in World War II, but preferred a 35-millimeter. He took two Leica IIIc cameras into Korea, and said they stood up well in the rain and mud. He often used 50-millimeter f/2 and 135-millimeter f/3.5 Nikkor lenses.

A 1972 exhibit of his war photos at the Whitney Museum of American Art in New York was hailed in The New York Times. "Again and again," the photography columnist Gene Thornton said of Mr. Duncan, "he approaches and crosses the line that divides the journalist's interest in the here and now from the artist's concern with the timeless and universal."

Triple D RIP

EDITOR NOTE:

MY MEMORY OF TRIPLE D
(That is how he signed his signature)

On 05 February 1968, I was the weapons Platoon sergeant for Echo Co 2/26, Stationed on Hill 861A at the Khe Sanh Combat Base. In the early morning hours a large NVA force attacked and over ran , the 1st Platoons positions.

After a long battle, we defeated their attack with the loss of 11 Marines and many wounded. Within hours David Duncan appeared and began photographing the aftermath of the battle.

I accompanied him around the Hill as he took many pictures which later appeared in his book "I PROTEST" and in Life Magazine.

MICHAEL ARCHERS MEMORIES OF DAVID DUNCAN

I was saddened to learn that photojournalist David Douglas Duncan passed away yesterday, June 7, 2018, at the age of 102. He had lived life with such gusto, as only one who takes the risks he took can do, in the thick of combat covering wars for over thirty years, on almost every continent. No photo-journalist, before or since, has consistently captured the grimness and despair of battle like David did. Between these wars, he showed us the great joy and beauty in life. His opus, Photo Nomad, is a stunning photographic chronicle of the twentieth century.

In early June 2004, as I was preparing my first book, A Patch of Ground, for publication, I wanted permission to use a photograph that he had taken of Captain Baig, and the other "brain trust" officers, together in the Khe Sanh command bunker during the 1968 siege. I initially contacted a person at his publisher, HarperCollins-NYC, who advised me that Duncan still owned the rights to all his photos and provided me with his address in France. I wrote to him immediately, and eleven days later he called. When I picked up the phone, the first thing I heard was David's ninety-year-old, curmudgeonly tone that sounded like a question, but was actually a statement of fact: "Mike, so you didn't get your ass shot off at Khe Sanh, huh." I have included in The Gunpowder Prince part of our conversation with regard to Captain Baig, and so will not replicate it here. David then asked me what Baig had done after Khe Sanh, and whether he was still alive. I filled him in on that tragic scenario and later that day mailed him a copy of Ray Stubbe's monograph on Baig, The Mongol Prince (I had no idea at the time that I would be writing Baig's story twelve years later).

David, a Marine officer in World War II, who had covered American troops fighting in that war, and the war in Korea, ended his thirty-year career as a combat photographer at Khe Sanh. That decision was not based entirely on his now being in his fifties and the grueling physical strain of battle that was beginning to take its toll on him. The fact was that, while David had seen countless dead and wounded American soldiers in his decades of reporting, his sobering, iconic February 1968 photo of body bags lined up beside the fog-shrouded Khe Sanh runway waiting for evacuation to some distant morgue, seemed to have been the last straw in reining in his anger and disappointment at what America was doing in Indochina. Soon after leaving Khe Sanh, David would produce two books, War Without Heroes and I Protest!, condemning the Johnson administration for, what David said was, their having changed the criteria for going war from the traditional, unfortunate, last-resort decision to preserve national security, to a lucrative business practice.
Fifteen years earlier in 1953, nine months before the French defeat at the hands of the Viet Minh Army at Dien Bien Phu, David produced a prophetic piece for Life magazine, titled "Indochina All But Lost." As such, he was enormously frustrated to still be photographing war in that land, so many years later at Khe Sanh. Yet, he was unflinching in his admiration for the troops who served, as many a Khe Sanh vet who benefited from his kindness over the years can attest.

While David's reputation would have permitted him into the inner circles of world power, he preferred being out among common people, among common soldiers and artists like himself. What saddens me the most is not just that the world has lost such a rare talent, but a person who possessed the honesty and intellectual courage to state the truths he'd learned from his vast experience, irrespective of the bleating of more fearful, insulated and devious souls. Because of that, later in his life more doors closed for him, than opened.

David thanked me for requesting permission to use his photos, because, he said, many people used them without extending him that courtesy. I then heard his wife call him for dinner. He said they were "having a chicken and rice dish with a very good sauce on the chicken" (considering he lived another twelve years, to age 102, this recipe might be the elixir of life□).

Before we said our goodbyes, David said, "I suppose you would like something [about the permission] in writing?" I said I would appreciate that. I'm attaching below a link("Duncan Reply") to that wonderful message, handwritten boldly on the second page of my original request letter. As you can imagine, it has warmed my heart each time I've come across it in my files over the years (NOTE: To clarify two things in the text of my letter, the working title of my book at the time was "Murmurs," which was promptly rejected by my publisher a few weeks later as being too "artsy-fartsy" [a decision for which I am eternally indebted to him]. Also, I subsequently learned how to properly spell Lieutenant Colonel Hennelly's last name).

One last item, actually a confession that I need to make; one I did not tell David about, though I'm sure he'd have found it amusing:

Earlier on a February 1968 evening, just before David shot the photograph I was requesting to use, he had been standing outside at the entrance to the command bunker chatting with Gunnery Sergeant Leon Risch, a salty Korean War veteran, about David's age. Coincidentally, I was just then reporting for my radio shift and before I left my own bunker I had too-hurriedly put on my web gear, including my utility belt, which held sundry items like bayonet scabbard, ammo magazines, bandages, etc. The belt was buckled in the front by inserting a metal hook into an eyelet. In my haste, I had not secured the hook all the way in, and, as I arrived at the edge of the cement steps that descended into the command bunker entrance, the belt suddenly unlatched and all the gear attached to it slid down to my ankles causing me to trip and tumble head-first down the stairs. I landed at the feet of Duncan and Gunny Risch, and, as gunnies are traditionally known to do, he immediately unleashed a torrent of profanity chastising me for my clumsiness. The commanding presence of the famous David Douglas Duncan loomed above me in silence; but his eyes eloquent in the unmistakable squint of "Old Corps" disdain I'm relieved to finally get that one off my chest.

BOOK REVIEW

Post-publication Reflections on The Gunpowder Prince: How Marine Corps Captain Mirza Munir Baig Saved Khe Sanh.

For all sad words of tongue and pen,
The saddest are these, 'It might have been'.
- John Greenleaf Whittier

I have gone over in my mind countless times the thought of what Captain Mirza Munir "Harry" Baig might have accomplished had he survived all his dangerous counterintelligence missions in Southeast Asia, and the tragic circumstances of his death in 1971 at age thirty-nine. Harry's short life and career included him honing his remarkable intellect while obtaining a law degree from Trinity College in Cambridge, England, and an MBA from McGill University in Montréal, Canada, before entering the U.S. Marine Corps in 1958—as a lowly private. Given the rapid and lofty trajectory of his accomplishments, there is a good chance Baig would have risen to positions of great responsibly within the U.S. intelligence community

His mother, Juliette Jamil, was a member of a well-connected Anatolian family and had studied at the American University in Beirut under special patronage of King Faud of Egypt. Her brother, Selim Jamil, had gained notoriety for his assistance to the American army during the First World War, and later conducted highly sensitive missions working with the U.S. State Department and Office of Strategic Services (forerunner of the CIA) during the Second World War. Harry's father, General Osman Baig, was the son of British colonial knight Sir Abbas Ali Baig, who was a personal friend of King George V. Osman had commanded an Indian Colonial Army division guarding the strategic Khyber Pass during the Second World War, and later became a versatile and highly respected Pakistani diplomat. Osman's brother (Harry's uncle), Mirza Rashid Ali Baig, was an Indian soldier, scholar and diplomat, who had, among his many later duties, served as India's ambassador to The Philippines and Iran. Rashid authored several influential books under the name M. R. A. Baig, including The Muslim Dilemma in India, Viking House, 1974.

Harry's father-in-law, Count Nicholas de Rochefort, appears to have recruited him into the intelligence business. As a member of one of France's oldest families, with ancestor Guy de Rochefort earning fame during the First Crusade in 1095, Nicholas served as a captain in the French Army during the Second World War. He was captured by German forces and later escaped and rejoined Allied forces. After the war, de Rochefort, who spoke five languages, edited a periodical in Morocco before beginning a lecture tour in the United States in 1949. Five years later, he renounced his French citizenship and title and became a U.S. citizen. Now, an expert on psychological warfare, Nicholas served on the faculty of the American University, and as a research analyst at the Library of Congress for the Agency for International Development (USAID) which maintained a close working relationship with the CIA. Harry's brother, Taimur, would graduate from Harvard and become an executive with the World Bank.

In addition to these several unique, widespread and highly placed connections, by the early 1970's, Harry had developed a stellar reputation within the world of counterintelligence, as well as a close connection to the then-Deputy Director of the CIA, General Robert Cushman. Combined, it is easy to conjecture how effective a player Harry might have been in helping detangle the religious, cultural and political mechanisms causing widespread volatility in the Middle East and South Asia during the latter half of the twentieth century.

More similar to John le Carré's fictional character, the eccentric George Smiley, than he was to Ian Fleming's macho James Bond; Mirza Munir Baig would have, as he had in South Vietnam, particularly at Khe Sanh in 1968, continued to employ his matchless genius, cunning and self-discipline in the world's most dangerous locales to protect his adopted country from harm until the day his luck ran out—which, as Fate would have it, was far too soon.

Fifteen minutes into the siege, an NVA large caliber round landed in the bases ammunition dump (ammo supply point No. 1) which held 1,100 tons of ammunition for the 155mm, 105mm 106mm 81mm, 60mm, and 4.2 inch mortars. This was the main dump for the base situated between Alpha Company's position and Bravo Company's position. The initial explosion caused not only secondary explosions but sent numerous 105mm and 106 recoilless rounds flying out everywhere. The discarded munitions were rendered incredibly unstable yet Marines Edward Pendergast and others ran out, stripped off their shirts, draped them over the glowing red hot rounds, picking them up on either end and tossed them out of the trench line where they landed. This went on for hours as secondary explosions from the ammo dump continued to arbitrarily detonate sending more rounds out. The concussion was so violent at times that structure still above ground were blown over. My own father who was at the opposite end of the base in Lima Company 3rd Bn 26th Marine's position that morning recalled the blast concussion from some of those secondary explosions hit us like a blast of wind and made your ears ring.

He recalled the 122mm rockets coming in and one slamming into the tent that was 3rd Battalion's make-shift mess hall tossing crates and stuff everywhere. Some of us even went out to salvage a few edible items that we figured we could use later. That morning an estimated 100 rounds of 82mm mortars and sixty 122mm rockets slammed into the combat base between 0500 and 0530, a small amount by later standards for example February 23, 1968 1,307 rounds hit the combat base during the day, the most intense barrage during the entire siege.

From that morning in January for the next 77 days, the combat base at Khe Sanh and the surrounding hill top positions, one of which would be virtually overrun Outpost Alpha 1 on Hill 64 where Alpha Company 1st Bn 9th Marines were located. On February 8, 1968 in the foggy pre-dawn hours an NVA regiment overran Alpha Company's position killing 24 Marines and wounding 27. There was no actual Hill 64, the position was called that due to the fact there were 64 Marines & Corpsman at the position.

The siege necessitating vital resupply, a task made much more difficult due to the fact that route 9, the only road to the base, was cut off. The siege made helo supply difficult and the airstrip was really the only hope. C-130's had to resort by late January to LAPES resupply (Low Altitude Parachute Extraction Supply). Getting the needed supplies of food, ammo, water and mail from home then fell to the Logistics Supply Unit attached to the 26th Marines. Sergeant Carl Ornelas was the chief ammo tech. During the siege as ammo came in by plane Sgt. Ornelas and his ammo techs would often have to operate a fork lift to get the ammo off the air strip ASAFP. Surely this attracted the attention of NVA guns who would not desire a better target than a large pallet of 105mm rounds. Reading through his journal and records that he kept during the siege, it evident that the final weeks of the young 19 year old sergeant's life were obviously full of terror but utterly exhausting trying to keep the guns around the base supplied with ammo.

He and his ASP personnel had no choice, at times when incoming was heavy and others had the opportunity to seek cover, but to get out to the open airstrip and get ammo out of the open and or deliver it where needed. What a true hero he was. On February 5, 1968 at some point during the afternoon, had been taking the open road between Logistics Support Unit, Charlie Med (3rd Medical Battalion) and Recon's position. His fellow Marines had cautioned him not to use that open road as there was really no immediate cover and it was the road running parallel to the airstrip, seemingly the main target of the NVA guns. He was advised to use the adjacent trench system which took longer to maneuver through. According to an interview with Philip Wright as it appears in "Battalion of Kings," by Ray Stubbe a navy chaplain at the combat base, Ornelas was determined to use the road

Ornelas was quoted as saying "lightening doesn't strike twice in the same spot," and didn't cotton to the idea of using a trench to move to the LSU. "He just stepped out of his hootch and was walking up to the main road," according to Wright. "The shell damn-near landed on his bootlaces and split him wide open and gutted him all at one time. There was a very surprised look on his face; his face didn't get hurt. His eyes were as big as saucers," recalled Wright in 1995. It was a 152mm artillery round that instantly killed the tireless 19-year old ammo tech who time and time again risked his life to ensure that desperately needed ammunition reached his fellow Marines in order to hold that red-clayed patch of unforgiving ground.

According to his casualty file, "Died 5 Feb 68 Quang Tri Province (01) Republic of Vietnam 'result shrapnel wounds to the head and body from hostile rocket fire when the bulk fuel farm came under attack.

Sgt. Carl Ornelas remains were sent home to his family in Kansas City, Missouri and he was interred at Ft. Leavenworth National Cemetery. May he rest in peace and forever be remembered and honored for his tremendous sacrifice.
Semper Fi, Kevin

The second book where he scratched notes and instructions regarding handling of ammo and storing it. The eerie aspect to this second book is that you can tell he had it with him on his person at Khe Sanh. If you talk to anyone who was at Khe Sanh, the one indelible aspect that they will tell you they recall regarding the physical landscape is the near maroon red clay that permeated everything from skin to clothing. If you look at the pages especially the one below, you can see that distinct red clay on these pages. (NO COLOR PAGE)

MEMORIES

Started by devildog 34 , Feb 04 2012 05:07 PM

As with my previous posting about a Khe Sanh Marine who gave his life, I know that this particular group has been the subject of a previous post. Thank you again to the same member who was willing to negotiate a deal with me, I have the honor to be the guardian of the items belonging to Sergeant Carl J. Ornelas. It is my honor to remember him on this the 44th anniversary of his sacrifice. Carl John Ornelas was born May 21 1948 in Concord, NH. At a young age he moved with his family to Witchita, KS. He enlisted in the Marine Corps May 24, 1965, 3 days after he turned 17. He went through boot camp at MCRD San Diego, CA.

After going through additional infantry school training at ITR (infantry Training Regiment) Camp Pendleton, he was assigned to H&S Company 3rd Bn 5th Marines as a rifleman on November 20, 1965. For reasons not explained he was sent transferred to Bulk Fuel Company Supply Battalion 1st FSR Camp Pendleton on January 5, 1966. From the end of January 1966 to May 1966 he was receiving OJT as a Bulk Fuel Specialist 1391. His MOS changed to 1391. In October he was shipped out to Okinawa and was assigned to 7th Separate Bulk Fuel Company 5th Division Reinforced.

In January 2, 1967 Ornelas joined FLSU (Force Logistics Support Unit) as a 2311 which is the MOS for an ammo tech, an MOS that according to his records he had never been trained for prior to this assignment. While in Vietnam, Ornelas was at Phu Bai, which was headquarters for the 3rd Marine Division to which he was assigned. On January 20, 1967 he suffered shrapnel wounds from mortar fire which penetrated the right side of his chest with hemopneumothorax which happens with blood enters the chest cavity that separates the muscle and the rib cage. When fluid enters into it, it acts very much like water separating two sheets of glass. He was treated at NSA DaNang and released.

Upon release from the hospital he was then assigned to Supply Company FLSG (Force Logistics Support Group) "A" 3rd Service Battalion FLC at Camp Hansen Okinawa where he completed training in April of '67 as an ammo tech, the same job he had in Vietnam. He was sent back to Vietnam for a second time on November 20, 1967 with FLSG Co. A 3rd Service Battalion FLC as an ammo tech. A Sergeant by this point, Ornelas was assigned to the Marine base at Khe Sanh January 17, 1968, only a few days before the fireworks began.

Khe Sanh remained under watchful eye, yet relatively quiet in the closing months of 1967 and well into early January 1968. In the pre-dawn hours of January 21, 1968 following a night-long assault on hill 861, a position held by Kilo Company 3rd Bn 26th Marines, the NVA guns dug in across the border or Laos in a mountain known as Co Roc and NVA positions around the combat base unleashed a hail of artillery and mortar fire on the combat base, initiating what would turn out to be a 77 day siege.

At approximately 0530, the distant report of rockets and mortar tubes echoed throughout the valley as a cluster of 82mm mortars crashed into the center of the combat base around eastern end of the base occupied by Bravo Company 1st Bn 26th Marines and element of Alpha Company 1st Battalion 26th Marines.

David Leverton, a corpsman with Alpha Company recalled, "I swear like in slow motion I must have raised three feet laying flat on my back and screamed 'Incoming' out of a sound sleep. Why, I don't know, but less than thirty seconds later the first rocket hit. Nobody in that tent was still sleeping." Captain Kenneth Pipes, commanding Bravo Company 1st Bn 26th Marines exclaimed, "That sounds like incoming!" The company gunny from Georgia would have none of it. He woke up from his sleep and shouted back, "Hell no captain, that ain't incoming!" Shortly after the Gunny's assessment, the first cluster of mortar rounds exploded outside the captain's bunker. A nearby tent holding some of Bravo Company's corpsman, supply specialists and radio operators emptied quickly as the men came pouring out in search of cover. One man, Lance Corporal Steven Hellwig, turned back to the tent as he forgot something. During his momentary pause, a large shell landed next to him and literally cut the 19-year old in half.

KHE SANH

Dear Christine,

I truly am sorry in my delay in writing to you. But ever since I returned off of leave, I have been rather busy.

As always I hope my letter finds you in the very best of health. Myself I feel just great. Couldn't feel any better.

I'm no longer in Phu Bai. At this time I'm up at Khe Sanh. It's only five miles from the DMZ, and only 3 miles from Laos. Yes, I'm pretty far north.

I've always wanted to see a little action over here. By the looks of things I just might get my chance up here at Khe Sanh. We early this morning that Khe Sanh is surrounded. Within the next 3 days, the NVA are going to try to take Khe Sanh - How true that is I have no idea - Earlier today an officer of the NVA (North Vietnam Army) gave himself up - And he did a lot of talking. We're on alert at this time just waiting - Myself I doubt that anything is going to happen. But I'll be ready for almost anything.

So what's new with you? I'm sorry I couldn't stop into see you - maybe the next time - When I stopped in San Francisco to report in I found out that my flight was leaving in little over 3 hours. So I really didn't have any time -

I'll close for now - And Please take care of yourself. Write Sooner than I did anyway. Bye -

Always, Jack.

P.S. - HERE'S MY NEW ADDRESS!

Kansas City, Mo.

Dear Mrs. Ornelas,

On 23 December, 1968, we dedicated a Memorial Garden at Camp Books, Force Logistic Command, to honor those members of the command who have given their lives in service here in the Republic of Vietnam. As you can see from the enclosed photos it is a simple memorial, built by volunteers under the direction of our Force Chaplains, but it naturally has deep meaning for us. I thought you might like to have the enclosures as remembrances of the occasion of the dedication, and as assurance that we are keenly mindful here of the trust we inherit from those of our comrades who have made the ultimate sacrifice.

Sincerely,

D. A. Feeley, Jr.

When struggling and courage in mortal combat, always there are those who must pay the dearest price of all - their life. The goal toward which such combat strives becomes more dear with each life lost.

We briefly pause today to honor to these friends - strong men brave and true.

And then press on to achieve that prize which they sought to win.

We care not so much that we be safe, as that we be loyal; not so much that we survive, as that freedom survives; not so much that we be remembered, as that these honored dead be not forgotten.

REMEMBERANCES

The Marine in the picture is a Mike 3/4 member. The words of Del Candelaria are chilling as he tells the loss of Jeff Thibault and Rich Murphy.

On this day lost, but never forgotten. Jeffrey Allen Thibault was born on July 15, 1949. His home of record is Pitman, NJ. Jeffrey attended Pitman High School. Thibault entered the U.S. Marine Corps where he attained the rank of Private First Class (PFC/E2).On June 15, 1968, Thibault was killed in action in Quang Tri Provence of South Vietnam. He was 21 years old.

Jeff
July 15, 1949 - June 15, 1968 PFC, Marines Pitman, NJ

Jeff Thibault left Pitman High School as a junior in 1967, and entered the Marine Corps in November under the "buddy system" with David Dresh, who still lives in Pitman, NJ. He had excelled at football and basketball, following a long family tradition in athletics. Both his father and uncle were local stars of the thirties and forties. He became the third of five Pitman young men to give their lives in the Vietnam War.

David and Jeff were good friends before they joined the Corps. The Marines had an enlistment option that allowed individuals to stay together through boot camp and advanced training. The two thought it was a good idea. Over the next several months, they became much closer.

"Together, we experienced the enlightenment of boot camp, the pride of the Corps, the shortness of leave and the reality of going to Vietnam," Dresh recalls.

Jim Pensabene, also of Pitman, and a Vietnam veteran, remembers Jeff as being popular with the girls and fond of cars. "We were friends from the seventh grade through high school," he says. "He was handsome and he loved cars, like most other high school kids. Although I don't remember him being particularly fond of school."

Dresh recalls the Pitman of the sixties. "It was a small town where everyone knew each other," he says. "Although we weren't joined at the hip, Jeff and I had the same circle of friends and shared many interests. We liked hanging out, nice clothes, sports, dance clubs, cruising, and of course, girls. I think we were typical teenagers and we had a few adventures, both good and bad."

"Jeff had a very understanding grandfather who appreciated Jeff's free-spiritedness," Dresh continues. "He would allow Jeff to borrow his 1965 Sport Fury, with the simple request that the car be returned clean and in one piece. Jeff was not seventeen yet, so one of the guys or myself would drive. We would all put in a dollar or two for gas, and at thirty-two cents a gallon, we could cruise all night."

"I think Jeff knew Vietnam was on the horizon," Pensabene adds. "Once I got there, I just wanted to come home. I am not so sure he could perceive the horror of it all. None of us could."

Especially Barry Weatherby, now living in Mount Ephraim, NJ. He knew Jeff as well as he knew the others from the Pitman and Mantua area who served

In Vietnam. "We all hung out together at Alcyon Lake," he says. "There were many a good time had in the woods around there. The whole group was a bunch of fun loving, All-American guys. Of course, not many of them ever wanted to come over to my house."

Barry's father, Russell, owned the Weatherby Funeral Home in Pitman for twenty-five years. Barry and his brothers helped with the business as they grew up. When Barry was drafted into the Army in August of 1967, he almost immediately found himself being trained as a "Memorial Activities Specialist".

"Also known as Graves Registration," he adds. "Once Uncle Sam saw that my father operated a funeral home, it was 'Wham, bam, thank you, Ma'am'."

After basic training at Fort Dix, and more mortuary training at Fort Lee, Virginia, Barry was sent to Vietnam in April of 1968, where he worked with civilian morticians at Da Nang Air Base. The experience in his father's business could not have prepared him for Vietnam.

"I can't know what the guys in the field went through," he says. "But I know there were many times I wished I wasn't where I was. You can't imagine how bad it was and what I had to get used to. Suffice it to say it was not a pleasant job."

Jeff Thibault's enthusiasm for the Marines and his eagerness to serve his country took him, with Dave Dresh, first to Parris Island, SC, and then to Camp Le Jejune, NC and Camp Pendleton, CA. And finally, in late April of 1968, they were sent to Vietnam.

"We went through everything together from boot camp until we were 'in-country'," Dresh says. "They split us up there. I went to the 1st Battalion, 9th Marines and Jeff went to 3rd Battalion, 4th Marines. Our units operated in about the same area, but I never saw him again after that first day in Vietnam."

Del Candelaria, of Phoenix, Arizona, was an "old timer" when Jeff Thibault joined Mike Company, 3rd Battalion, 4th Marines. The unit had defended Khe Sanh during the Tet Offensive, and was now on its own offensive named "Operation Robin South". Candelaria was a squad leader with ten months experience.

"I had to look at the diary I kept," he says. "On May 1, 1968, I have an entry indicating a new squad member had joined us and I see that I couldn't spell his last name. It looks more like 'Thisbough' than anything else. I must confess, I do not recall what he looked like. I want to say he was pretty short and stocky, but I may be confusing him with one of the others. It's been thirty years."

The unit had defended Khe Sanh during the Tet Offensive, and was now on its own offensive named "Operation Robin South". Candelaria was a squad leader with ten months experience.

It looks more like 'Thisbough' than anything else. I must confess, I do not recall what he looked like. I want to say he was pretty short and stocky, but I may be confusing him with one of the others. It's been thirty years."

Jeff was assigned to a fire team of the first platoon of Mike Company. His team leader was Richard Murphy, from Norwood, Massachusetts, a six-month veteran who took Jeff under his wing.

Del Candelaria recalls from his memory, and diary, a very tragic time in June of 1968. "On June 11th, we left Khe Sanh for an operation on a hill where many North Vietnamese had been spotted. The area we landed on was filled with tall elephant grass that was above our heads. The next day, after spotting some NVA, we came under fire and Kilo Company took most of the casualties. While this was going on, our jets were napalming a hill miles away. The plan was to burn the grass and then land us there to stop a large NVA force that was heading towards Laos. Later in the day, we were choppered to that area. The next three days were fairly uneventful."

"On the 14th of June, we spent the day on patrol climbing hills...we came back quite exhausted. That night was worrisome as the NVA kept probing our lines. I had been in Vietnam for 12 months and I remember telling the men in my team that I had a bad feeling... something was going to happen."

"At about 5:45 AM, our area was hit with rockets, mortars and machine gun fire. Our company was in the most vulnerable position as three companies of NVA regulars hit us. By the time our gunships, artillery and jets responded, we had sustained a lot of wounded and killed. Our platoon, with rifle fire and grenades, was able to re-take the lines that were overrun in the initial assault."

The fierce fighting lessened as the artillery and air support took its toll on the enemy. The attack had been repelled and the enemy was on the run. Yet, many wounded Marines laid out in the open at the bottom of the hill. The Marine Corps takes great pride in never leaving a wounded or dead comrade on the battlefield.

"Later that morning," Candelaria continues. "One of my team members and I crawled down an open slope to retrieve a wounded Marine. I yelled for a corpsman who crawled down to meet us. About fifty or so yards away, Murphy and Thibault were going down the same slope to see if another Marine was alive or dead. I could not see either of them because a large hedge separated our views. Except for the sporadic and distant small arms fire and the cries of the wounded, it was fairly quiet."

"I then heard a sniper's rifle fire about five hundred yards in front of us. I heard Thibault yell, 'Oh, God. Murphy's been hit!' Then a second shot and Thibault yelled something like 'My arm, my arm!' At this time, the corpsman who was helping us said he was going to leave to go help Thibault and Murphy. He had to go back up the hill to get around the hedge. A third shot rang out and Thibault was no longer crying. As our corpsman got to the top of the hill, a fourth shot killed him. And a fifth shot killed another corpsman who showed up at about the same time. The sixth shot killed our radioman. I carried the wounded Marine back up the hill just as twenty or more 105mm howitzer rounds were fired in the area of the sniper. After that, we did not receive any more sniper fire."

Candelaria continued to carry the wounded to an evacuation area until he was called to help interview some prisoners. A horrible day was about to get worse. He had already lost half of his ten-man squad. During a break in the interrogation, he learned that another very close friend died earlier in the day.

"When I heard he had been killed, I ran up the hill to see if it were true," he says. "While I was crying and hugging his body, I saw some Marines lay two more body bags at the end of a long row...one was Murphy and the other, Thibault. It was a very sad day for me. We lost twenty Marines that day and then twenty-three more two days later."

Barry Weatherby continues his story. "I used to have friends stop in and see me when they came in from the field," he says. "I got ready for work one day and Sergeant Sinotti, from New Jersey, comes up to me and says, 'You're from Pitman, right?' And I said 'Yes, why?' He said, 'Do you know a guy named Thibault?' I said, 'Sure!' He said, 'He's here.' So I went outside and looked high and low for him. I couldn't find him so I figured he had to get back to his unit. I went back to work."

Barry pauses, his eyes glaze over and he takes a deep breath. "Jeff's name was on the first body bag I looked at. I sort of lost it. I went straight to the NCO club and got totally wasted."

He also got into some trouble. "I guess I got out of hand," he says. "They were going to charge me with dereliction of duty and insubordination until orders came through for me to escort Jeff's body home. They didn't believe I knew him."

Jeff's body had already been shipped home by the time Barry was able to leave Vietnam. He spent seventeen hours waiting for a flight, and finally met the casket at Dover Air Base in Delaware. He rode in the hearse from Dover to Weatherby Funeral Home.

At the graveside service at Hillcrest Cemetery in Hurffville, NJ, the Marine Corps Guard handed the folded American flag first to Barry, who in turn, gave it to Jeff's parents.

"It was the hardest thing I ever had to do in my life," he recalls. "First, Steve Sickler was killed, then Bruce Sharp and Johnny Jervis. And now, I'm delivering Jeff's body and handing the flag over to his folks."

Barry has not visited any of the local gravesites. He does his healing at the Vietnam Veterans Memorial in Washington. He spends time reflecting on each name he knows; each life he shared. But then he steps back and takes in an even more personal perspective.

"I wonder, 'How many of these guys did I work on?' And they all seem like they're right there. It's a tough thing to describe."

Jim Pensabene wants Jeff Thibault to be remembered not only as a young man who served his country. "We are all in his debt for that," he says. "But, also as a man who joined the Marines, knowing that this branch of service was renowned for being in the midst of the action."

It has taken some years and a good bit of faith to heal Del Candelaria. He would like to visit Vietnam some day and bring back some dirt to sprinkle on the ground at the Wall. He also feels a strong presence as he places his hand on the names. There is a spiritual bond to both the living and dead that all Vietnam veterans share and cherish. He also has a vision.

"I believe that Jeff and the others are in heaven," he says. "I believe that when I die, these guys will be waiting at the gate for me and that Jeff will tell me, 'I want to introduce someone to you.' And he will introduce me to the sniper who also died that day. And we will all say to each other, 'We're so sorry. It was such a terrible time for all of us.'"

David Dresh, Vietnam veteran, Marine Corp buddy and friend, has a heavenly vision of his own.

"Jeff will always be a part of my history," he says. "I celebrate his memory by remembering our friendship before and during our enlistment in the Marines."

"When I visit Jeff's grave site, I do so because he is my friend and a guy I liked spending time with. Should I say Jeff was a good kid and a nice guy? Yes, he was. Do I miss him? Absolutely." "I know Jeff is in heaven and when we next meet, I hope he has the keys to that Sport Fury so we can cruise to Mr. Abba's Diner. I'll let him drive. There, we will tell each other stories while we chow down on cheese steaks, fries, coconut custard pie, and cherry Cokes. Semper Fi, Jeffrey. Semper Fi."

JUST TWO OF THE MANY LETTERS THE COMMITTEE RECEIVES SCHOLARSHIP SUMMARY FOR 2018, POSTED ON PAGE 82

Dear Chairman Fisher,
I would like to take a moment to thank you and all those involved in the Khe Sanh Veterans Scholarship Foundation for taking the time to read through all of the received scholarship applications. It means a lot to us that you all would do this for us. Furthermore, thank you for selecting me as a recipient for the Sergeant Major James T. Gaynor Award. It's an honor that my family and I are very proud of. I look forward to utilizing this scholarship for the pursuit of the best education I can have. In other news, as soon as my 2017-18 transcript is available, I will promptly send it your way. Again, thank you for all your hard work.
Semper Fidelis,
Hunter Freedom Lane
(4) Year Award Winner

Khe Sanh Veterans Scholarship Foundation,

My name is Gwendolyn Sieman, and I was a recipient of the Sergeant Major James T. Gaynor Award. I wanted to thank you so much for the scholarship. With school around the corner, it is such a blessing to help with tuition. I truly appreciate the award. Even more so, thank you to the committee of veterans, who served our great country. Thank you for my freedom, and giving me the ability to be able to go to college in America, home of the free and land of the brave! Thank you again. My family and I deeply appreciate it!
I don't know where I would be today without my grandfather or the veteran foundation.
Thank you, again! God Bless! Best,
Gwendolyn Sieman, Ohio State 2020

FROM THE KSV WEBSITE

I haven't seen my Sergeant - Micheal Secli - since I left Khe Sanh but have had a number of email and telephone conversation with him this past year. He sent this story to me today, though gut wrenching it is well written and descriptive of what many have gone through. I don't know when it was written or came out, but shows the emotional turmoil many of us continue to deal with, even after all of these years.

BURIAL AT SEA BY LT/ COL. GEORGE GOODSON, USMC (RET)

In my 76th year, the events of my life appear to me, from time to time, as a series of vignettes. Some were significant; most were trivial.

War is the seminal event in the life of everyone that has endured it. Though I fought in Korea and the Dominican Republic and was wounded there, Vietnam was my war.

Now 42 years have passed and, thankfully, I rarely think of those days in Cambodia , Laos , and the panhandle of North Vietnam where small teams of Americans and Montangards fought much larger elements of the North Vietnamese Army. Instead I see vignettes: some exotic, some mundane:

- The smell of Nuc Mam.
- The heat, dust, and humidity.
- The blue exhaust of cycles clogging the streets.
- Elephants moving silently through the tall grass.
- Hard eyes behind the servile smiles of the villagers.
- Standing on a mountain in Laos and hearing a tiger roar.
- A young girl squeezing my hand as my medic delivered her baby.
- The flowing Ao Dais of the young women biking down Tran Hung Dao.
- My two years as Casualty Notification Officer in North Carolina, Virginia, and Maryland .

It was late 1967. I had just returned after 18 months in Vietnam. Casualties were increasing. I moved my family from Indianapolis to Norfolk, rented a house, enrolled my children in their fifth or sixth new school, and bought a second car.

A week later, I put on my uniform and drove 10 miles to Little Creek, Virginia. I hesitated before entering my new office. Appearance is important to career Marines. I was no longer, if ever, a poster Marine. I had returned from my third tour in Vietnam only 30 days before. At 5'9", I now weighed 128 pounds - 37 pounds below my normal weight. My uniforms fit ludicrously, my skin was yellow from malaria medication, and I think I had a twitch or two.

I straightened my shoulders, walked into the office, looked at the nameplate on a Staff Sergeant's desk and said, "Sergeant Jolly, I'm Lieutenant Colonel Goodson. Here are my orders and my Qualification Jacket."

Sergeant Jolly stood, looked carefully at me, took my orders, stuck out his hand; we shook and he asked, "How long were you there, Colonel?" I replied "18 months this time." Jolly breathed, "You must be a slow learner, Colonel." I smiled.

Jolly said, "Colonel, I'll show you to your office and bring in the Sergeant Major. I said, "No, let's just go straight to his office." Jolly nodded, hesitated, and lowered his voice, "Colonel, the Sergeant Major. He's been in this job two years. He's packed pretty tight. I'm worried about him." I nodded.

Jolly escorted me into the Sergeant Major's office. "Sergeant Major, this is Colonel Goodson, the new Commanding Officer." The Sergeant Major stood, extended his hand and said, "Good to see you again, Colonel." I responded, "Hello Walt, how are you?" Jolly looked at me, raised an eyebrow, walked out, and closed the door.

I sat down with the Sergeant Major. We had the obligatory cup of coffee and talked about mutual acquaintances. Walt's stress was palpable. Finally, I said, "Walt, what the hell's wrong?" He turned his chair, looked out the window and said, "George, you're going to wish you were back in Nam before you leave here. I've been in the Marine Corps since 1939. I was in the Pacific 36 months, Korea for 14 months, and Vietnam for 12 months. Now I come here to bury these kids. I'm putting my letter in. I can't take it anymore." I said, "OK Walt. If that's what you want, I'll endorse your request for retirement and do what I can to push it through Headquarters Marine Corps."

Sergeant Major Walt Xxxxx retired 12 weeks later. He had been a good Marine for 28 years, but he had seen too much death and too much suffering. He was used up.

Over the next 16 months, I made 28 death notifications, conducted 28 military funerals, and made 30 notifications to the families of Marines that were severely wounded or missing in action. Most of the details of those casualty notifications have now, thankfully, faded from memory. Four, however, remain.

MY FIRST NOTIFICATION My third or fourth day in Norfolk, I was notified of the death of a 19 year old Marine. This notification came by telephone from Headquarters Marine Corps. The information detailed:
*Name, rank, and serial number.
*Name, address, and phone number of next of kin.
*Date of and limited details about the Marine's death.
*Approximate date the body would arrive at the Norfolk Naval Air Station.
*A strong recommendation on whether the casket should be opened or closed.

The boy's family lived over the border in North Carolina, about 60 miles away. I drove there in a Marine Corps staff car. Crossing the state line into North Carolina, I stopped at a small country store/ service station/Post Office. I went in to ask directions. Three people were in the store. A man and woman approached the small Post Office window. The man held a package. The store owner walked up and addressed them by name, "Hello John. Good morning Mrs. Cooper."

I was stunned. My casualty's next-of-kin's name was John Cooper!

I hesitated, then stepped forward and said, "I beg your pardon. Are you Mr. and Mrs. John Cooper of (address)?

The father looked at me - I was in uniform - and then, shaking, bent at the waist, he vomited. His wife looked horrified at him and then at me. Understanding came into her eyes and she collapsed in slow motion. I think I caught her before she hit the floor.

The owner took a bottle of whiskey out of a drawer and handed it to Mr. Cooper who drank. I answered their questions for a few minutes. Then I drove them home in my staff car. The store owner locked the store and followed in their truck. We stayed an hour or so until the family began arriving.

I returned the store owner to his business. He thanked me and said, "Mister, I wouldn't have your job for a million dollars." I shook his hand and said; "Neither would I."

I vaguely remember the drive back to Norfolk. Violating about five Marine Corps regulations, I drove the staff car straight to my house. I sat with my family while they ate dinner, went into the den, closed the door, and sat there all night, alone.

My Marines steered clear of me for days. I had made my first death notification.

THE FUNERALS Weeks passed with more notifications and more funerals. I borrowed Marines from the local Marine Corps Reserve and taught them to conduct a military funeral: how to carry a casket, how to fire the volleys and how to fold the flag.

When I presented the flag to the mother, wife, or father, I always said, "All Marines share in your grief." I had been instructed to say, "On behalf of a grateful nation...." I didn't think the nation was grateful, so I didn't say that.

Sometimes, my emotions got the best of me and I couldn't speak. When that happened, I just handed them the flag and touched a shoulder. They would look at me and nod. Once a mother said to me, "I'm so sorry you have this terrible job." My eyes filled with tears and I leaned over and kissed her.

ANOTHER NOTIFICATION Six weeks after my first notification, I had another. This was a young PFC. I drove to his mother's house. As always, I was in uniform and driving a Marine Corps staff car. I parked in front of the house, took a deep breath, and walked towards the house. Suddenly the door flew open, a middle-aged woman rushed out. She looked at me and ran across the yard, screaming "NO! NO! NO! NO!"

I hesitated. Neighbors came out. I ran to her, grabbed her, and whispered stupid things to reassure her. She collapsed. I picked her up and carried her into the house

Eight or nine neighbors followed. Ten or fifteen minutes later, the father came in followed by ambulance personnel. I have no recollection of leaving.

The funeral took place about two weeks later. We went through the drill. The mother never looked at me. The father looked at me once and shook his head sadly.

ANOTHER NOTIFICATION One morning, as I walked in the office, the phone was ringing. Sergeant Jolly held the phone up and said, "You've got another one, Colonel." I nodded, walked into my office, picked up the phone, took notes, thanked the officer making the call, I have no idea why, and hung up. Jolly, who had listened, came in with a special Telephone Directory that translates telephone numbers into the person's address and place of employment.

The father of this casualty was a Longshoreman. He lived a mile from my office. I called the Longshoreman's Union Office and asked for the Business Manager. He answered the phone, I told him who I was, and asked for the father's schedule.

The Business Manager asked, "Is it his son?" I said nothing. After a moment, he said, in a low voice, "Tom is at home today." I said, "Don't call him. I'll take care of that." The Business Manager said, "Aye, Aye Sir," and then explained, "Tom and I were Marines in WWII."

I got in my staff car and drove to the house. I was in uniform. I knocked and a woman in her early forties answered the door. I saw instantly that she was clueless. I asked, "Is Mr. Smith home?" She smiled pleasantly and responded, "Yes, but he's eating breakfast now. Can you come back later?" I said, "I'm sorry. It's important. I need to see him now."

She nodded, stepped back into the beach house and said, "Tom, it's for you."

A moment later, a ruddy man in his late forties, appeared at the door. He looked at me, turned absolutely pale, steadied himself, and said, "Jesus Christ man, he's only been there three weeks!"

Months passed. More notifications and more funerals. Then one day while I was running, Sergeant Jolly stepped outside the building and gave a loud whistle, two fingers in his mouth..... I never could do that..... and held an imaginary phone to his ear.

Another call from Headquarters Marine Corps. I took notes, said, "Got it." and hung up. I had stopped saying "Thank You" long ago

Jolly, "Where?"

Me, "Eastern Shore of Maryland. The father is a retired Chief Petty Officer. His brother will accompany the body back from Vietnam ...."

Jolly shook his head slowly, straightened, and then said, "This time of day, it'll take three hours to get there and back. I'll call the Naval Air Station and borrow a helicopter. And I'll have Captain Tolliver get one of his men to meet you and drive you to the Chief's home."

He did, and 40 minutes later, I was knocking on the father's door. He opened the door, looked at me, then looked at the Marine standing at parade rest beside the car, and asked, "Which one of my boys was it, Colonel?"

I stayed a couple of hours, gave him all the information, my office and home phone number and told him to call me, anytime.

He called me that evening about 2300 ."I've gone through my boy's papers and found his will. He asked to be buried at sea. Can you make that happen?" I said, "Yes I can, Chief. I can and I will."

My wife who had been listening said, "Can you do that?" I told her, "I have no idea. But I'm going to break my ass trying."

I called Lieutenant General Alpha Bowser, Commanding General, Fleet Marine Force Atlantic, at home about 2330, explained the situation, and asked, "General, can you get me a quick appointment with the Admiral at Atlantic Fleet Headquarters?" General Bowser said, "George, you be there tomorrow at 0900. He will see you."

I was and the Admiral did. He said coldly, "How can the Navy help the Marine Corps, Colonel." I told him the story. He turned to his Chief of Staff and said, "Which is the sharpest destroyer in port?" The Chief of Staff responded with a name.

The Admiral called the ship, "Captain, you're going to do a burial at sea. You'll report to a Marine Lieutenant Colonel Goodson until this mission is completed..."

He hung up, looked at me, and said, "The next time you need a ship, Colonel, call me. You don't have to sic Al Bowser on my ass." I responded, "Aye Aye, Sir" and got the hell out of his office.

I went to the ship and met with the Captain, Executive Officer, and the Senior Chief. Sergeant Jolly and I trained the ship's crew for four days. Then Jolly raised a question none of us had thought of. He said, "These government caskets are air tight. How do we keep it from floating?"

All the high priced help including me sat there looking dumb. Then the Senior Chief stood and said, "Come on Jolly. I know a bar where the retired guys from World War II hang out."

They returned a couple of hours later, slightly the worse for wear, and said, "It's simple; we cut four 12" holes in the outer shell of the casket on each side and insert 300 lbs of lead in the foot end of the casket. We can handle that, no sweat."

The day arrived. The ship and the sailors looked razor sharp. General Bowser, the Admiral, a US Senator, and a Navy Band were on board. The sealed casket was brought aboard and taken below for modification. The ship got underway to the 12-fathom depth.

The sun was hot. The ocean flat. The casket was brought aft and placed on a catafalque. The Chaplain spoke. The volleys were fired. The flag was removed, folded, and I gave it to the father. The band played "Eternal Father Strong to Save." The casket was raised slightly at the head and it slid into the sea.

The heavy casket plunged straight down about six feet. The incoming water collided with the air pockets in the outer shell. The casket stopped abruptly, rose straight out of the water about three feet, stopped, and slowly slipped back into the sea. The air bubbles rising from the sinking casket sparkled in the sunlight as the casket disappeared from sight forever....

The next morning I called a personal friend, Lieutenant General Oscar Peatross, at Headquarters Marine Corps and said, "General, get me out of here. I can't take this anymore." I was transferred two weeks later.

I was a good Marine but, after 17 years, I had seen too much death and too much suffering. I was used up.

Vacating the house, my family and I drove to the office in a two-car convoy. I said my goodbyes. Sergeant Jolly walked out with me. He waved at my family, looked at me with tears in his eyes, came to attention, saluted, and said, "Well Done, Colonel. Well Done."

I felt as if I had received the Medal of Honor!

HOSPITALMAN, HN, E3, UNITED STATES NAVY. KHE SANH VETERAN H&S CO, 2ND BN, 26TH MARINES, 3RD MAR DIV, III MAF.

Delaplane's Home of record was Camden, Carroll county, Indiana. Born in Seattle Washington, son of Charles Kenneth and Margaret Ban Geystel Delaplane. Brother of Robert and Dennis Delaplane. He was a 1966 graduate of Carroll county High-school. He was never Married and had no children.

Quang Tri Provence, South Vietnam at 1645 hrs, in vicinity of hill 558 near Khe Sahn, durning operation Pegasus, HN Delaplane was killed by 122mm rocket fragments to his head and chest while engaging in action against hostile forces. His company received 7 incoming rocket rounds resulting in 2 friendly KIA & 15 WIA (14 Medevaced, 1 Minor). H&S Company, 2/26th Marines, lost three Navy Corpsmen as a result of this enemy action. Two Corpsman died that day and one the following day from wounds received during the attack.

HN Delaplane was 20 Years of age at the time of his death. James is buried at Rock Creek Cemetery, Logansport, Deer Creek, Carroll county, Indiana. He is remembered on the Vietnam veterans memorial wall, Panel 50E, Line 27. No other information could be found. Thank you for your service and commitment brother, RIP.

A CO 1/26

Just passed midnight @0035, Khe Sanh Combat Base received more than 50 rounds of 82 mm mortars killing 4 and wounding 76 and killing one Vietnamese ARVN Liaison Officer. The mortars were walked up and down the tent areas of A Battery, 1/13, killing 2 and wounding 30, including the Fire Direction Officer and CO of the battery, Capt., Brennan.

At 0525 hrs., the base was again hit with approximately 50 rounds of 122 mm rockets. Newly arrived Marines of 3/26, sleeping in tents, were hit, especially the 3/26 Battalion Aide Station. A USAF AO spotted mortar positions near Hill 689 just west of the Khe Sanh Air Strip at day break and a patrol from CAC "O" was dispatched to investigate. The patrol became pinned down in an ambush and took 3 friendlies killed in the initial burst. An artillery mission enabled the patrol to withdraw, causing one wounded Marine who shortly thereafter died. Two Marines returned to the hill. Searching for the wounded and friendly dead. Two Marines had been left on the hill, one returned the other was missing.

Cpt., Bynum, CO of I/3/26, was shot by an NVA sniper as he neared the top of Hill 689, wounds which eventually prove fatal. Soon there after Hill 689 was seized by the Marines and the CAC "O" KIA were recovered. 2/Lt., Larry Bolger was killed when Capt., Norm Centers, CO, put the Alpha Company 1/26 behind the artillery battery and laid them out in the grass without digging in, and those Marines got butchered by that mortar attack. I am a survivor of this attack! But only by the grace of God almighty,

I Sgt Jim "Ollie" Collins was spared from the bee's nest of rockets and shrapnel, but still haunted by the screams of those wounded and the smell of lingering sulfur from the many detonated mortar and rocket rounds that rained down on us! Just prior to the NVA rocket attack, Sgt Paul Kincaid and I were having conversation about what he might do when he returned to the states. He was a "short timer" and was ordered to stay beyond his rotation date. His tour of duty was complete and was about to leave the Company when we returned from the current combat mission. "IT WAS NOT TO BE." I will always remember and will never forget his heroism and sacrifice. Knowing many of these warriors on this day in history, they would agree that their story and fate should be told for the sacrifice they made for freedom, democracy and a better life for all. To this day, I am still currently in contact with Sgt., Paul Kincaid's family.

May they continue to "Rest In Peace"

"BOOTS"

BY ROBERT "SKIP" W. UNANGST
USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN,
I CO 3/26 3RD PLT

If there was something I looked forward about Vietnam, it was knowing that I would be issued a genuine pair of Jungle Boots. That was unquestionably the imprimatur of a combat veteran. No more of that all leather black boot camp type footwear that was apparently made for state side pogues and other noncombatants to endlessly polish for endless inspections.

No, these were the real deal, with green cloth sides designed to deal with life in the jungle; deep treaded soles to deal with mud; ventilation ports at the arches to deal with rain, swamps, and rice patties and a thin metal foot plate to minimize land mine blast.

After arriving in Da Nang, my group was sent north to Phu Bai for a few days and from there to Khe Sanh. At Khe Sanh, five of us or so were sent to India Company as replacements. From there we were assigned to our respective platoons. Along this route we were issued gear that included rifles, magazines, knap sacks, shelter haves, helmets, helmet liners, and you name it. Everything you would expect a TO infantry man to have, except Jungle Boots.

Now I knew jungle boots were cool, and I suspected that everybody along the supply chain wanted to own at least one pair; but we were the ones at the end of the supply chain, theoretically the ones the supply chain was built for. We were the "grunts" that would be humping the damp, slippery, and muddy hills and valleys along the DMZ.

It wasn't long after arriving at Khe Sanh that we began company size patrols that lasted from several days to a week or so. It didn't take long for those damp rocky slippery slopes to take a toll on our state side boots. Within two weeks one could tell the new guys from the "salts." The salts wore these cool, worn ,leather jungle boots; and the new guys wore boots held together with duct tape. I think the new guys would have fitted in better at that winter at Valley Forge.

After a lengthy patrol, the company returned to the Battalion rear at Khe Sanh . Here we got hot chow and a chance to relax in our shelter halves for a couple of days as we took up our perimeter positions until the next patrol.

In this down time, two friends (also from India Company) John Heinrick and Gary Travatello and I went to visit a mutual friend of John's. He was a battalion cook and we went to visit him in the cooks' tent. Their quarters were plush. First of all, they were in a tent; a real tent. Not two shelter halves tied together. And all of this was up on a wooden platform, not the ground. Each resident of the tent had an actual cot to sleep on. But there on the wooden floor beneath a cot I saw a sight I will never forget. All in a row were three pairs of Jungle Boots.

While on the last patrol I slipped on a wet rock while moving down a steep jungle trail. My right shin slammed into another sharp rock. At the next "take five" break I examined my leg to find a half inch horizontal cut at the midpoint of my shin. I didn't think much of it, and we then "saddled up" and kept going. At the next rest I again examined my shin only to find a four inch black leach on the cut.

Four or so days later (back at Khe Sanh) my lower right leg began to ache and to swell. Consequently, I went to the med station where I was given penicillin, a set of crutches, and a diagnosis of " cellulitis."

A day or so later, (around September 5, 1967} 3rd battalion, 26th Marines, were helicoptered east to Camp Carrol. A day or so later the battalion moved out to the north to begin a sweep between Con Thien and the DMZ. Here they would walk into "Ambush Valley" and two divisions of Communists. The battalion would takeover 80 per cent killed and wounded. I remained behind with my cellulitis. Camp Carrol was on a bit of a plateau and from there one could look to the north and see that something big was happening. I remember seeing smoke and F4 Phantoms bringing supporting air strikes. My other memories of Camp Carrol were that the times for chow had to be random because any regularity produced "incoming." I also remember seeing another Marine in a chow line that I hadn't seen since boot camp. He was shaking like a leaf and couldn't stop stammering about incoming. He was done.

After seeing the fire fight from the distance of Camp Carrol, I got in a vehicle and went down to Charlie Med in Dong Ha. This is the aid station to which the casualties from the fire fight were being medevaced. I was there looking for medical clearance, but one look at my lower leg got me on the first helicopter to the hospital in the rear at Phu Bai. That part of my leg was now scarlet and swollen to look like a piece of meat hanging in a butcher store display.

While at Charlie Med I saw several doctors working intensely on a marine who had been shot several times. His name was O'Neill. He was in severe pain and they were direct in handling him with anything but "kid gloves." I remember them yelling his name and screaming at him to hold still. This was triage medicine.

Shortly after this, several of us were loaded on a UH-34. O'Neill, me, a NVA soldier with his foot blown off, and I think others.

A few minutes into the flight, the wind from the open door was pulling at the sheet O'Neill was rapped in. He began to moan. The crewman on the chopper went to O'Neill to secure the sheet. Just before he did, he gave me his 45 and, looking at the communist, said, "If he moves, blow his f- - -ing head off."

Almost on 0, the communist moaned, sat up, and looked straight at me. I chambered a round and put the gun six inches from his forehead. His eyes got big and he immediately laid back down and did not move or make a sound for the rest of the flight.

At Phu Bai, we were taken into the initial treatment area. There I saw something I will never forget. At this time casualties from the "Ambush Valley" fire fight were pouring in. O'Neil was a priority; I was not. A senior Navy doctor walked past the communist and said to a corpsman, I don't even want to look at him."

Several minutes later, the doctor returned to the communist and examined his wound. Knowing surgery would be required he asked the corpsman what his blood type was. The corpsman answered B-Negative and there was only one unit left. The tormented doctor answered, "Break it out." Perhaps he had seen too much of this before at other places like Iwo Jima or Inchon.

I have often wondered over the years how many Marines in that horrific fire fight had that blood type. I also wonder now how many of us had any idea of the hostile protest we would receive by the country that sent us to that war and by those cowards who protested us because we served where they were terrified to appear. I wonder how many of those sheltered, self serving phonies could have learned something real about, "Come on people now, smile on your brother, learn to love one another right now" if they had been in that treatment room that day. *

PTSD wasn't because of Vietnam. Vietnam was only the precursor; "Coming Home" was the injury. After four days in the hospital and after, as another Marine put it, "getting four times as much penicillin as a man with 'The Clap'."

I was released from the hospital and sent north to rejoin my decimated unit. But first I was sent to supply to be issued new gear, new jungle utilities, and yes, new boots- Jungle Boots. Supply was low on inventory so I had to take the size closest to my ten and a half feet. There they were a pair of brand new Jungle Boots, twelve triple EEE. I was now a bona fide Marine infantryman in The Nam.

Our new battalion rear would be about fifty miles south of the DMZ off of highway 1 at Camp Evans. From here we would run several operations over a two month period that would provide the time for replacements to arrive and bring the unit back to T/O strength and numbers. The balance of this article is about one such patrol.

We were running a platoon size patrol in a remote area to the west of Highway 1. The route of the patrol brought us to a river with an abandoned village on the other side. I believe the abandonment of the village was part of the strategy to relocate populations. The river was about 150 feet wide. It had a moderate current, and at the point of crossing was at most waste deep. A fairly steep and muddy bank rose from the other side. The path up the bank was about twenty feet in length. The bank gave way to a flat twenty or so feet wide strip that ran up and down the river. At the side of the path opposite the river was a six foot high concrete wall that was the boarder of the village. As the village was abandoned, overgrowth covered much of the wall. I vaguely recall structures on the other side of the wall: The wall might have run for a couple of hundred feet. The day was wet and overcast.

As the lead elements of the patrol were crossing the river several shots from behind the wall erupted. Two Marines were hit, neither fatally. One Marine, Vinny Trentacosta from Brooklyn, New York, was shot in the upper leg. He with the other Marine, would be medevaced and return to the unit in three weeks or so. As I was also from New York, Vinnie and I were friends. He was rugged and I knew he would be all right. In fact Vinnie was the kid living on Wycoff Avenue whose mother could be heard yelling at him from an open window, "Vincent, put that car down!"

The first squad, well spread out, was able to continue across the river and secure the area immediately on the other side. Now the rest of us just had to move across to the other side, spread out and face outboard. The sniper (s) were no longer a threat but in this environment the danger of bobby traps was very real. We were still in the general area of what Bernard Fall had described as "The Street Without Joy."

The Marine behind me, in the order of march, was an engineer attached to the platoon. He was there because the probability of bobby traps was high. His expertise was in dealing with such things. He was just about my height and build, six feet and maybe 200 pounds with gear.

As we ascended the muddy river bank, we were told to place your foot where the person in front of you placed his. The assumption was that if he hadn't triggered a mine, you wouldn't either. By the time I got to the river bank, the foot positions in the mud had been well defined and well worn. Upon rising from the bank, I moved out about twenty meters, knelt down, and faced outboard.

The explosion was bone shaking! With the noise, I reflexively turned in its direction to see the engineer returning to earth. The sequence was one I had seen before. Silence, the cry "Corpsman", the insinuation of shock. As I was closest to him, I ran to him to see him laying on his back with his head to the wall. His left foot was virtually blown off and twisted at an angle so the sole of his boot was facing him. His right foot was also at an odd angle but not as severe. His legs formed aU, and his crotch appeared riddled with shrapnel. I can't remember what I said to him, if anything. The corpsman and others immediately appeared, and I went back to my position. He was quickly medevaced and I never saw him again.

As he was right behind me, I have often wondered why his foot and not mine on that well trodden piece of mud detonated that mine. All the previous footsteps had brought that mine to the threshold of detonation. There have been many quiet times over the years in which I have just stared at my feet and thought about what they almost looked like. If the engineer survived, I wonder if he does the same.

After returning to "The World" a time would come when I would teach high school physics for thirty years. A fundamental concept of physics is that Pressure=Force/Area. Pressure, like the Pressure that detonated that mine, is greater if the Force, the weight of gravity, is greater of if the Area is smaller. Pressure is less if the Force is less or the Area is greater. The engineer and I were almost identical in weight- Force. The Area of our footprints were not the same. I wore 12 EEE boots.

From here we continued the patrol. My squad leader was Rudell Lee. He was a replacement and he happened to be from Oklahoma. Rudell informed me that our squad would now be walking point. As I was the fire team leader for first fire team, he wanted my fire team to walk point. He also said I had more experience. I couldn't argue with him on this point for as I was one of the few to return after Ambush Valley". I had much more experience than any of these replacements.

I couldn't see letting a new Marine walk point for the fire team so I did. We headed up river and out of the village for maybe a mile or two. We walked slowly along a narrow path. I came across one or two pungi pits, but weather had eroded enough of them so careful observation revealed them. Fortunately the rest of the day was uneventful.

WHEN IT REALLY MATTERED, PATRIOTISM HAS REIGNED IN THE UNITED STATES.

Lubbock's Barry McCool reflects on service in Vietnam, patriotism

By Ray Westbrook A-J Media

It's a given about how the founders and their Minutemen of 1776 conducted themselves in the original fight for freedom. But now, three living generations of the Barry McCool family have served the nation in the military with much the same mindset. McCool, who resides in Lubbock as a 22-year Marine and Navy veteran, had been living in Pennsylvania when he joined the Marine Corps in 1965 as an 18-year-old. He was in time for two full tours, plus a bit more, in Vietnam.

They trained him extensively to be a track vehicle repairman, but he preferred to be a rifleman.

"I was a terrible mechanic, so I volunteered for all of the ambushes and patrols that they needed to send out. I was really a grunt, a rifleman," he said. "Even though I was attached to an artillery unit as a repairman, I was always out in the field. I couldn't believe they wasted all that time sending me to repair school, when I was a really, really good rifle shot."

He has memories of Vietnam, some that he doesn't speak about in detail.

"We were often outnumbered. There were ambushes and firefights where we were outnumbered four or five to one," he said. "I lost a lot of friends. Like at Con Thien, that was way up north right by the DMZ, and basically a fire base that was easily cut off — there was only one road in. We took a lot of hits there, lost a lot of people."

McCool said, "We were out there on a limb, and the thought process was that technology — aircraft — would make up the difference in being out there basically on our own."

He also recalls Khe Sanh:

"Khe Sanh was a fixed-place battle where the only way out was to be medevaced out on a truck, or you were there basically for the length of the siege.

"The North Vietnamese had the whole combat base zeroed in, and they were firing really big guns and rockets from the DMZ into the combat base ... we lived mostly underground the whole time."

He remembers that chances of survival were not good: "We were outnumbered like 20 or 25 to one. But except for the weather, we had on call 24 hours a day fighter and bomber support."

When he survived Vietnam, he went to college for a degree, and the Navy recruited him as a flyer.

I flew as a naval flight officer for 16 years, and retired off of Gen. (Norman) Schwarzkopf's staff as his manpower branch chief," he said. "I did the prepositioning of forces, setting up replenishment, R&R courts and things like that in Mozambique, Nairobi, Bahrain, and Jeddah in Saudi Arabia. I did the prepositioning of forces and contracts prior to the start of Desert Shield and Desert Storm."

McCool's service has provided a perspective on what proved to be the loss of Vietnam:

"There was no set, fixed plan that went into effect for victory. It was nothing like Korea, where we pushed the commies all the way back to the 38th parallel."

He remembers, "We would go out and capture the same hill five or six times, and after we captured the hill, a week later we would move off, and they would move back in."

He said the cost to America didn't stop communism in Vietnam.

"They understood what the war was all about better than the American politicians. They knew it would be a war of attrition from the start. They kept feeding — and wasting troops, basically — just to keep contact, because they knew that sooner or later the Americans would pull out because of the number of casualties. They were willing to lose people over the long term for their end goal," he said.

"Obviously, that worked."

Even the draft tended to work against the war, according to McCool.

"Up until 1968 there was an all-volunteer service for the Marines. In 1968, we saw a major change. With the draft, the quality of the Marines that were coming to Vietnam deteriorated very rapidly. We were receiving replacements that had been involved in things like the Black Panthers and the hippie movement and things like that," he said.

"They didn't want to be there, they hadn't volunteered, so we had a lot of incidents with disharmony among the crews, is the way I would put it."

The mainstream media gets a part of the blame, he believes: "The media really supported Khe Sanh. They looked at it as another victory preventing another Dien Bien Phu, which is what the North Vietnamese had wanted. They had wanted a pitched battle where they would win just like they did over the French. That didn't happen. We beat them back bloodily.

"But right after that, all of this black power movement and the hippie movement and the Kent State incidents — all that kind of stuff hit the media, and the media really, really puffed all that up."

McCool isn't more optimistic about North Korea.

"It's a country that shouldn't have nuclear weapons, No. 1; and No. 2, they shouldn't have ballistic missiles that could reach the USA," he siad.

Does he think North Korea will get rid of its nuclear weapons?

"Not a chance."

McCool's family has served the nation:

- Son Shawn McCool, is an Army captain. "He was a Black Hawk chopper pilot in Afghanistan and Iraq."
- The service to the nation of son Willie McCool is nationally known -- he was a NASA astronaut who piloted the Space Shuttle Columbia that exploded over the South Plains in 2003.

Grandson Hunter Chadwick, who graduated last year from West Point as a second lieutenant, serves in the Army at Fort Sill, Oklahoma.

McCool said, "The average American — male and female — when the need arises, they stand up. They are the first to volunteer. When America is threatened, Americans traditionally rise to the occasion. It matters not what your color is, what your religion is, or anything else — we have a country of patriots. "I'm proud to be an American."

SEMPER FI VIRGINA !!!

DABNEY, VIRGINIA MCCANDLISH PULLER, OF LYNCHBURG, DIED JUNE 29, 2018, AT WESTMINSTER CANTERBURY, LYNCHBURG AT THE AGE OF 78.

Virginia was born in Shanghai, China, May 27, 1940, the daughter of the late Lieutenant General Lewis Burwell "Chesty" Puller and Virginia Evans Puller. Growing up the daughter of a career Marine, she lived in China, Hawaii, San Diego, New Orleans, and Camp LeJeune, but always came back to her beloved Virginia.

Virginia spent her last two years of high school living with her aunt in Richmond, attending The Collegiate School, graduating in 1957. To the great dismay of her mother, she went north to Smith College, which was not in keeping with her mother's plan for her to meet a good southern boy. Yet, as fate would have it, her mother was at a party and met Virginia's future husband, Bill Dabney, VMI '60 who was, in order of importance, a Marine, southern and tall.

Virginia and Bill were married in September 1961 and enjoyed 50 wonderful years of marriage. She held her family together and worked tirelessly as a mother, military wife, teacher and community volunteer. She was a voice of calm and reason through her father's extended illness, her infant daughter's death, her husband's two tours in Vietnam, the first with two small children and the second with three, her brother's grievous wounding in Vietnam and her eldest son's death, never wavering in her faith and the importance of service and family, nor uttering a word of woe or pity. Virginia loved raising her children and was proud, but not surprised, when both her sons became military officers and her daughter followed in her footsteps and became a teacher. She was incredibly supportive of her husband's career, enduring countless moves, pieces of broken furniture, last minute school registrations and the trials of establishing a new community and friendships.

After her husband's retirement from the Marine Corps, she and Bill enjoyed 22 years in Lexington, Va., living in their beloved Mackey's Tavern, welcoming family and friends at every opportunity. Among her many favorite causes were the Folger Shakespeare Library, the Navy-Marine Corps Relief Society, the Stonewall Jackson House, the Garden Club of Virginia, Boys Home in Covington, Va. and every Episcopal church parish, of which she was a member throughout her life.

She always had a fondness for and offered a place at her dining room table to the many VMI Cadets and countless Marines who visited her home over the years. In addition to her parents, she was preceded in death by her husband, Colonel William Howard Dabney, U.S.M.C. (retired); a son, William Howard Dabney Jr.; an infant daughter, Anne Christian Dabney; and a brother, Lewis Burwell Puller Jr. She is survived by her sister, Martha Puller Downs (Michael) of Alexandria; a daughter-in-law, Andrea Shilt Dabney of Greenwich, Conn.; a son, Lewis Puller Dabney (Kristin) of Lynchburg; daughter, Virginia Keane Dabney Kauders (Eric) of Richmond; and six grandchildren: Page Dabney, Caroline Dabney, Virginia Kauders, Ellie Dabney, Anna Kate Dabney and Andrew Kauders. A funeral service was held at St. John's Episcopal Church.

VFW UNVEIL STATUE HONORING TOM GREEN ON JULY 4, 2018

A Ceremony was held at the VFW Post 5146 in Athens for Tom Green, who served as a Marine and as the McMinn County Service Officer, prior to his death in 2017. Shown here is the bust of Green revealed during the ceremony.

The memory and contributions of a McMinn Countian who spent his life helping his fellow veterans will be honored on his birthday: The Fourth of July. VFW Post 5146 will host a brief service to dedicate a statue at the post in honor of the late Tom Green, who passed away on Oct. 28, 2017, after a long life dedicated to serving his country as a Marine and his fellow soldiers and sailors as McMinn County Veterans Service Officer for more than 20 years.

A decorated Marine Corps veteran, Green served his country during two tours of duty in Vietnam, including fighting in the Battle of Khe Sanh. He spent his life after the service serving veterans, both individually and as part of such veterans' service organizations as VFW Post 5146, AMVETS Post 106, American Legion Post 68, Disabled American Veterans No. 93, Vietnam Veterans of America, the Marine Corps Heritage Foundation, the Third Marine Division Association, and Khe Sanh Veterans.

"That guy would do anything, he would meet you anywhere, any time, any day, and do whatever he could to help a veteran. I can't imagine how many thousands of veterans owe Tom," said VFW Post 5146 Commander Jim Haney during the 2017 Veterans Day Ceremony following Green's passing. "I would like to use Tom as an example we can all emulate. He took his job as Veterans Services Officer to the highest level and worked tirelessly to help everyone he could. I would compare his work not to a job, but to a calling."

WHERE BOMBS ONCE FELL, KHE SANH GROWS

Over 50 years after the war, the devastated battlefield of Khe Sanh has become an economic hub of the poor central province of Quang Tri, with average annual income per capita of US $1,400.
According to the People's Committee of Khe Sanh Town, the town's living standards have transformed completely since the post-war era.

A farmer harvests coffee at a plantation in Khe Sanh. Greenery has returned to the former battlefield thanks to the efforts of local veteran soldiers.

"The town is growing into a developed urban zone and we hope to reach annual income per capita of $1,900 in 2020, thanks to the focus on the development of trade and tourism," says Hoàng Văn Quynh, the committee's chairman.

A report by the committee said the local residents' education has increased year after year, while the health care system works effectively, with a doctor present in every commune in the town.

Greenery covers all land areas and vestiges of wartime bombing are rarely seen in the town. The return of the green trees, along with the mild weather and the plenty of red basalt soil in the town, have sparked hopes that it could become a tourism destination and clean agriculture.

Hoang Huu Cam, a local who runs a hotel business in the town, says a tourism boom seems in the cards, thanks to the town's location on the East West Economic Corridor, which runs through five Southeast Asian countries of Myanmar, Thailand, Cambodia, Laos and Việt Nam.

"Khe Sanh is the ideal stop for visitors from the countries who go through the nearby Lao Bao and La Lay border checkpoints," Cam says. The border gates sit between the town and Savannakhet Province of Laos. They also facilitate trade to and from the town.

Ho Xuan Hieu, a businessman who owns a cassava starch brand, says the fertile soil in the town yields a pure flour. Cassava grown in the town produces 70 tons of starch each year, which is supplied to Japan and South Korea.

The return of greenery to the town cost the blood and tears of local soldiers who fought in the battle of Khe Sanh for five months from January 14 to July 9, 1968.

Ho Mo left his soldier's life to return the town in 1980, when the remnants of the war were everywhere and the town was in disarray. Mo started to clear a valley five kilo meters from the center to take soil for cultivation.

Thanks to his efforts, rice began to grow well in the soil within a month. By 2005, Mơ became one of the top farmers in the town. He had rice paddies, a plantation of rubber trees and a big herd of cows and water buffalos.

Since 2005, Mơ has earned around US$13,000 a year. Besides cultivating his seven hectares of farm land and his husbandry work feeding 50 cows and buffalos, the 80-year-old man has volunteered to protect 53 hectares of community forest from illegal hunters and loggers.

"At my 18, I joined the North Vietnam military volunteer and worked as a porter carrying necessities and weapons to assist the battles in Lang Vay and Ta Con airport," says Mo.

Ho Ta Che, another veteran, says joining the liberation force in the past and working for the greenery of the town today are all part of his responsibility to his hometown.

Younger than Mơ, Chê worked as a liaison boy for the troops and later dug secret tunnels that led army tanks into Làng Vây battlefield.

Chê lost his right hand in 1967 after a bombardment by American Air Force. However, losing one hand did not mean losing all his power. After the war, Chê fertilized the soil for rice cultivation and became one of the biggest rice producers in the town.

The veterans have determined that once their hometown grows to be a tourism hub of the province, they will be the best tour guides for itineraries related to the famed Battle of Khe Sanh, where over 100,000 tons of bombs were dropped by US aircraft and over 158,000 artillery rounds were fired in defense of the base.

BOOK REVIEW

BIRD WITHOUT A SONG
By JAMES KELLY

I served in Marine medevacs, HMM-163 (the Evil Eyes) in the early sixties and promised my friends who died I'd write about them someday. I've finally finished the novel after over fifty years, Bird without a Song. This is the most important part of the book.

During the seventh month of my first Vietnam tour, in the languid hours after a medevac, I began to see them. At first they were only shadows, movements in the dark corners of my tent, but as days dissolved into weeks and body counts soared during the first battle for Hill 881, some of their faces became familiar.

Those few I knew, Corporal Terwilliger, Major Ayres, Corpsman Cooper, but there were others, too, wounded and dead faces I remembered when flares and tracers were tracking through the night. I loved them all without knowing their names because they were my brothers. They were small, like toys, and full of life.

One day, while sweeping blood from our chopper, I stopped and turned to the crew chief. "I wonder if this is what heaven is like. You see people you knew in life but they're tiny." Recognizing the stare of concern, I laughed and pretended to be joking. I didn't mention the little Marines again but they were real to me and, in time, they started talking. Major Ayres was the first to speak. "Tell my girlfriend I loved her, Sergeant Carmody.""Did they send my Air Medal to my mom?" Corporal Terwilliger asked next. He loved his mother and wrote to her every day. I couldn't tell him he hadn't flown enough missions to earn his Air Medal. He died in a burning chopper, calling out for his mom and did receive two Purple Hearts. But only fools wanted one of those. Corpsman Cooper stood beside Terwilliger with his arm around his shoulders. He was comforting even in death.

A Marine wearing dress blues, who I didn't remember, stepped close to me and saluted. "You don't know me, sergeant, but thanks for bringing my body out of the jungle. "suspecting he was one of the many we picked up in body bags, I slowly saluted him back then turned to the major again. "Why are they here, sir?" He looked at me with his normal kindness. "You gave them comfort in their last hours, sergeant."

For the remainder of my tour, they went with me everywhere, Dong Ha, Phu Bai, Marble Mountain, to the top of the Rock Pile and out to the hospital ship, Repose. During the eerie half-darkness of mortar attacks while we huddled against sandbags, they were with me.

When my time came to leave, I collected the few things I cared about and turned to say goodbye. "We're coming with you," they shouted in chorus. "I can't take you back to the States. Someone would notice."

"They won't see us," Major Ayres argued. "We will all fit nicely in your sea bag. We want to be there when you tell people about us, when you let our families know we're still here and we still love them. You must help keep us alive." "But you're dead, sir, you all are." "Not if you write about us," a nameless one said.

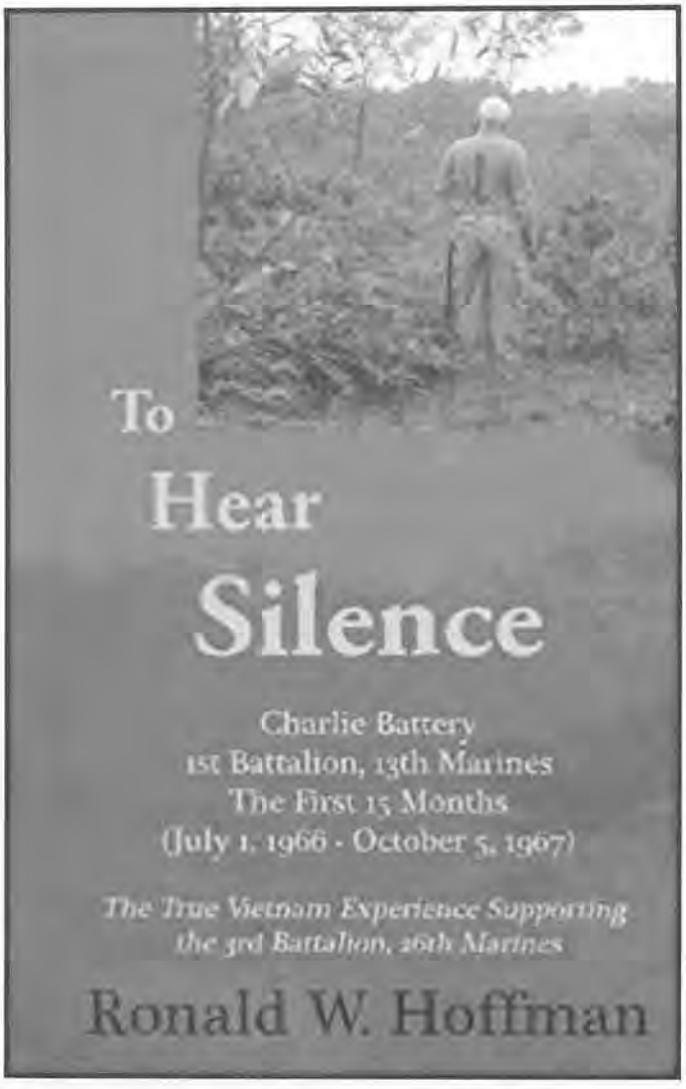
TO HEAR SILENCE: CHARLIE BATTERY 1ST BATTALION 13TH MARINES: THE FIRST 15 MONTHS
BY RONALD W. HOFFMAN (2014-05-03)



Ron Hoffman's book recounts the 10 months he spent on the front lines, and he hopes his book inspires other Vietnam veterans to share their stories.

Hoffman headed for Vietnam in 1966. He was 20 years old.

"I tried to join the Marines a couple years earlier, and they wouldn't take me. They said my eyes were bad. And then they had the Gulf of Tonkin incident, and suddenly they said, hey, if you're breathing, we could use you," Hoffman says with a laugh.

In the country for close to a year, Hoffman served as a radio operator.

"I guess they felt that with my eyesight I ought to be up front where I could see something," he says, again laughing, "so when the infantry would get hit then it was my job to radio back to the artillery battery and call in the coordinates and tell them where to drop the artillery rounds."

As a member of Charlie Battery, 1st Battalion, 13th Marines, Hoffman had a lot of close calls and lost a lot of good friends.

But after returning home, he never talked much about his experience -- until a return trip to Vietnam with his wife in 2010.

"While we were over there, I mentioned to our tour guide, I said, you know we had a little piece of history here, we accomplished something. The year before, they couldn't clean out this area, and we spent all these months on this operation cleaning this out and then we ended up at Khe Sanh, and so he said, 'Why don't you write a book about it?'"

Using a diary he kept during the war and a mountain of research he compiled, Hoffman wrote his book "To Hear Silence. "There's that silence just before an ambush breaks out," he explains, "and you can hear your heart pounding and swear that anybody close by is going to hear you breathing, and so it's dead, dead silence, then everything erupts."

Dedicated to the men he served with, Hoffman hopes his book inspires those still living to share their stories.

"For me it helped to get rid of some of the demons. Once you get it in black and white you can forget about it."

He says time is running out and the lasting effects of that war continuing taking a toll.

"Since we've been home unfortunately out of the 120 of us that were in the battery, it's getting very close to half that have died since then, thanks to good old Agent Orange and other things."

KHE SANH CORPSMAN TO PHYSICIAN WALTER F. SCHLECH III, M.D.

By: Craig W. Tourte

It was just a short notation on the "View Our Guest Book" section of the public web site, "Khe Sanh Veterans Home Page." Nothing special really, one of many posted every day by various visitors, including Veterans of the Vietnam conflict, those who had served at the combat base, students, family members of Veterans and little memorandums from the public who wanted to make a comment relating to Khe Sanh or the Vietnam War.

The writer identified himself as Wally Schlech, MD, Nova Scotia, Canada. Under comments was the notation: HQ Btry (1/13) Jan-Aug 1968. Since I had served with the same unit at the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh from July 1967 to April 1968, I was naturally curious about Doctor Schlech and contacted him.

Wally Schlech told me he had served as a Hospital Corpsman at Khe Sanh. During the ensuing years he had contacted several he had served with including Corpsman (Doc) William Ballew, and was aware that Lieutenant Hal Lasker, the now deceased battalion surgeon, had become a psychiatrist in New York. I was familiar with Doc Ballew and Doctor Lasker as they treated me for a rather serious medical condition at Khe Sanh. I have since spoken to Doc Ballew and thanked him for taking such good care of me. Mr. Schlech continued that he has also spoken to Gunny Klidonas (Sergeant Major James Klidonas) whose shoulder he treated before taking the Gunny to the air field for medical evacuation.

Wally Schlech said he left a small New England college and joined the United States Navy where he served his military tour as a Navy Corpsman at Khe Sanh. When he returned home he monitored the events of the Vietnam War through the Navy Times. He noted that Lance Corporal William Robert Yaskanich was killed in action on February 23, 1969; a Marine Mr. Schlech had served with at Khe Sanh. Mr. Schlech said that Yaskanich had received a Navy Commendation with V for running communications lines at Khe Sanh during the Siege.

Wally Schlech returned home and went back to college in 1969. While attending a social event he inadvertently became engaged in conversation with Jim Munroe who had just returned from Vietnam. It was during that conversation Mr. Schlech learned that Jim Munroe had also served with Headquarters Battery of the First Battalion, Thirteenth Marine Regiment. Munroe told Wally Schlech that he had joined the Thirteenth Marines in Da Nang after the Siege and had in fact served with Corporal Yaskanich who had been killed in action. Jim Munroe discussed the events leading to the death of Lance Corporal William Yaskanich, describing how the unit had been overrun, how he and Yaskanich had jumped into a hole together when a Chicom grenade was thrown in and exploded killing Yaskanich. The injuries to Munroe ended his combat tour in Vietnam, which was why he was attending college and subsequently the event that evening. Mr. Schlech told me Jim Munroe is now the Very Reverend James Munroe, Dean of Christ Church Cathedral, Springfield, MA-a long way from a foxhole in Vietnam.

Wally Schlech told me that he lives in Halifax and describes it as a small community. He recalls the day he happened to meet Dick Murtha an attorney from New York who had moved to Halifax. During their conversation Dick Murtha revealed that he had been an infantryman with the Third Battalion, Twenty-Sixth Marine Regiment and had also served at Khe Sanh. Mr. Schlech believes he and Mr. Murtha may be the only Khe Sanh Veterans currently residing in Canada.

This issue has been discussed by many who served at Khe Sanh, I thought it was interesting that Doctor Schlech mentioned it to me and I certainly understand how that event would leave an impression on his memory. One of the things that bothered Wally Schlech was that since Headquarters Battery was the Regimental Headquarters, those going to various Thirteenth Marine Regimental units had to fly into Khe Sanh as transients, and then report to units elsewhere. He recalls a billeting tent near Headquarters which took a direct hit from a 152mm artillery shell. Corpsman Schleck was called to treat the wounded and tend to the dead and remembers how tragic it was, as so many had just arrived in country and were waiting orders to go elsewhere.
I noted that Donald Saunders was killed in action at Khe Sanh, was a member of our small detachment and recalled that incident to Doctor Schlech. He remembered that Donald's body was brought to him on a small cart, that an 82mm round impacted near Saunders who took shrapnel up under this armpit where his flak jacket didn't cover. The Corpsmen tried to insert a chest tube but tragically Donald Saunders died quickly. I told Mr. Schlech that I had spoken to Saunders just minutes before he was killed and that I packed up Donald's few personal belonging in preparation for them being sent home to his family.

(Corpsman Wally Doc Schlech) Walter F. Schlech III. Medical Doctor is currently an internist and infectious disease specialist and a full-time faculty member at a medical college in Canada and now a member of the Khe Sanh Veterans Association. Welcome home and to your Khe Sanh Veterans Association Doc Schlech.

"POSTCRIPT"
This article was written some years ago, subsequently Corpsman William Ballew has passed away. I had corresponded and spoken with Bill on the telephone numerous times trading photos and recalling our experiences, he sent me a DVD of the sounds of incoming, I noted a voice yelling "Run baby run," sent chills down my back. Bill saved my life when I became ill and he is missed and not forgotten. Doctor Schlech mentioned the death of Marine William Yaskanich. I later learned that Marine Fred L. Thomas Jr. was also killed in the same battle and date (February 23, 1969). Fred was an outstanding Marine who I served with all through the Siege of Khe Sanh. Fred's close friend and bunker partner was Donald Saunders (KIA 3/4/1968). I was shocked to learn he had extended his tour after experiences that horrific battle. Dr. Schlech mentioned Dick Murtha, I met Mr. Murtha at one of our Khe Sanh Reunion, I haven't seen him since but I'm hoping he'll attend our reunion in Washington. As to Dr. Schlech his email address in outdated and I have been unable to contact him.

FIFTY YEARS AGO, AMERICAN TROOPS ABANDONED KHE SANH. HERE'S HOW THE U.S. GOT OVER 'VIETNAM SYNDROME.'

by Jonathan M. DiCicco and Benjamin O. Fordham
Washington Post

Fifty years ago today, the United States began to abandon a combat base at Khe Sanh, South Vietnam, just months after the Marines successfully defended the base against a grueling 77-day siege by the North Vietnamese Army. More than 200 Americans had died, as had thousands of Vietnamese. Khe Sanh's abandonment left many Americans questioning whether that prolonged battle had a purpose — and fueled skepticism about the U.S. war in Vietnam.

For years after, many American policymakers were left with a general aversion to using U.S. military power overseas. The hawks who remained criticized this "Vietnam syndrome" for weakening U.S. power in the world — because afflicted decision-makers would hesitate to use force even when situations called for it.

So was there a "Vietnam syndrome"?

That's what we examined, a half-century after the U.S. war effort peaked. Our new research on the attitudes of U.S. foreign-policy elites — individuals poised to become policymakers and opinion leaders in foreign affairs — reveals a kernel of truth in the idea of a Vietnam syndrome. Many such "elites" did turn against the war in Vietnam and remained skeptical about U.S. interventionism for years.

However, U.S. elites were not uniformly "dovish" after Vietnam. Predictable divisions grew out of the positions that individuals took during the war. When compared with those who supported the war until its end, those who had turned against the war remained considerably more skeptical of U.S. policies that would use or threaten military action abroad.

In other words, elite attitudes on foreign policy after the war mirrored the elite's attitudes toward the Vietnam War. But while the "syndrome" was chronic, it was not permanent — and it quickly subsided after the Cold War ended.

How we did our research

In a study published in International Studies Quarterly, we present a fresh analysis of survey data collected by scholars Ole Holsti and James Rosenau. Every four years, from 1976 through 1996, their Foreign Policy Leadership Project (FPLP) surveyed public officials, military officers, academics, and other potential decision-makers and opinion leaders. Among other things, Holsti and Rosenau asked these "elite" respondents whether they supported the Vietnam War early on, and if they changed their minds later. This is important because the overwhelming majority of elites surveyed, like the rest of the American public, initially supported the war. [The U.S. isn't being very neighborly. Here's what that means for Canada's foreign policy.]

We found that those who had turned against the Vietnam War — "converted critics" — remained significantly more dovish than consistent supporters of the war on possible military intervention or demonstrations of resolve against foreign adversaries. Converted critics were predictably dovish toward prospective interventions arguably reminiscent of Vietnam, such as Ronald Reagan's covert war in Nicaragua and his intervention in the civil war in El Salvador. But they were also dovish on very different issues, such as arms control with the Soviet Union and protecting oil tankers in the Persian Gulf during the war between Iran and Iraq that raged from 1980 to 1988.

We found a significant difference in attitudes between converted critics and consistent supporters from 1976 through 1988. Was it just that liberal Democratic converted critics were more dovish than conservative Republican consistent supporters? No. Even after controlling for party and ideology, elites' positions on the Vietnam War significantly influenced their subsequent foreign policy views — until the Iron Curtain fell.

Vietnam syndrome ended with the Cold War

Once the Berlin Wall came down and the Soviet Union dissolved, so did this nearly uniform pattern — which was much weaker by 1992 and entirely gone by 1996. By then, "consistent supporters" and "converted critics" were all over the map. Elites still disagreed about U.S. foreign policy, but positions on the Vietnam War were no longer a good predictor of where they stood on such questions as whether to intervene in the ethnic conflict in Bosnia, in the civil war in Somalia or whether to expand NATO to include former Soviet client states.

Why did Vietnam syndrome disappear? Our results suggest that the world looked different to U.S. elites after the rivalry with the Soviet Union ended. Many who had become dovish after the Vietnam War were far less dovish after the Cold War. Others who took hawkish positions during and after the Vietnam War became less inclined to do so once the Soviet Union collapsed.

[There are signs North Korea is still working on its nuclear program. Here's why 'denuclearization' is so problematic.]

The lessons of "the lessons of Vietnam"

The "Vietnam syndrome" in elite opinion, it turns out, was not about avoiding military entanglements generally; rather, it was about the role of force in Cold War foreign policy. For nearly 15 years after Vietnam, the same divisions arose on issues as distinct as arms control treaties that would restrict the two rivals' nuclear weapons and whether to deploy intermediate-range nuclear forces in Europe. But these divisions disappeared after the Cold War — suggesting that even dovish U.S. elites had not given up on U.S. military power entirely; they just disagreed with their hawkish counterparts about its usefulness in the U.S.-Soviet rivalry.

Unconstrained by that rivalry, some who had opposed interventionism during and after the Vietnam War changed their minds. Other events influenced their viewpoints, like the international community's failures to prevent genocide and ethnic cleansing in Rwanda in 1994 and Bosnia between 1992 and 1995. Some, such as former secretary of state Hillary Clinton, concluded that a more aggressive U.S. military posture could prevent such humanitarian disasters. Conversely, some — such as Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) — who had thought the United States needed to look tough during the Cold War were more skeptical about the use of force once this struggle was over.

In 1991, after driving Iraq's army back from its invasion of Kuwait, President George H.W. Bush jubilantly declared an end to Vietnam Syndrome. He was right, but for the wrong reason. The cure was not victory in the Gulf War; it was the dramatic change in strategic context that reshuffled elite attitudes.

As a result, "Vietnam syndrome" had disappeared by the time of the 9/11 attacks, opening the door for the George W. Bush administration's invasions of Afghanistan and Iraq — which ironically forced elites to relearn lessons about the limits of U.S. power that Vietnam might have taught us 50 years ago.

Correction: An earlier version of this post incorrectly stated that U.S. troops were fighting the Viet Cong at Khe Sanh. It was the North Vietnamese Army. We regret the error.

2018 is the 10th year that Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. has supported a scholarship program for the children and grandchildren of KHE SANH VETERANS. Since 2009 some 155 applicants have been awarded scholarships totaling $95,100! These funds were all raised due to the tremendous generosity of KHE SANH VETERANS, their families and admiring friends of KHE SANH VETERANS.

The reunion silent auction proceeds have also significantly contributed to the scholarship fund. 2018 was the largest pool of applications to date for the Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. Scholarship Fund. Twenty-eight new and returning undergraduates applied and met the criteria to receive financial support. The applications reflect the high degree of academic skill achieved and a strong ambition to succeed in their chosen fields of study. Five of this year's applicants will have completed their four years of eligibility and will go on to promising careers or post graduate study.
2018-19 top awards went to:

Noah Bissonnette - Colonel David E. Lownds Award (Bruce E. Jones)
Melia R. Ortiz - Sgt. Maj. James T. Gaynor Award (John Ortiz)
Gwendolyn R. Siemon - Sgt. Major James T. Gaynor Award (Morley Sweet IV)

The Scholarship Committee wants to thank the KSV membership for their financial and moral support over these past ten years making this program a huge success!

3 years ago today, the traveling wall came to Rainier, Oregon. My sister & I paid our respects to our cousin, Cpl James Trimble and all the others who made the ultimate sacrifice. He's still on that hill. He and 10 other Marines died in Quang Tri Province on April 6, 1968; all but Jim and PFC Anthony Pepper were recovered. After an unsuccessful search for Jim and Tony, they were declared "Killed in Action/Body Not Recovered". A joint American/ Vietnamese team went out in 1993 to search the battle area, but determined "the remains of each individual are unrecoverable." When they made the banner for the Education Center, they used Jim's picture.

FOR VIETNAM VETERANS, A 'THANK YOU' LONG OVERDUE -- MARCH 29TH, VIETNAM WAR VETERANS DAY
BY: ARMY MAJ. GEN. JIM JACKSON (RET.)

The Veterans Affairs Department estimates we are losing more than 500 veterans per day who served during the Vietnam War years. We must act now to do what should have been done 50 years ago.

Across the nation, Americans are uniting to thank and honor these veterans and their families for their service and sacrifice. Spearheading this effort is the United States of America Vietnam War Commemoration office.

Of special significance, President Trump last year signed into law the Vietnam War Veterans Recognition Act of 2017, establishing National Vietnam War Veterans Day that will, henceforth, be celebrated every March 29. This March 29 will be the first anniversary of the new law.

The Vietnam Veterans Memorial in Washington — "the Wall" — will play a significant role in our nation's honoring of our Vietnam veterans on that special day. The Wall is an arresting reminder to its more than 5 million annual visitors of the service and sacrifice of the more than 58,000 Americans whose names are on that black granite memorial. There is something haunting and yet cleansing about that special place.

Army Gen. Barry McCaffrey, a Vietnam combat vet, was honored with the commemorative pin on Thursday.

Senior members of the Defense Department and VA will participate in a wreath-laying ceremony on that day at that hallowed site.

The commemoration office is also coordinating with governors of all U.S. states, commonwealths and territories, and the mayor of the District of Columbia, to host similar events on or around this day; as of March 19, 47 states had committed to do so.

The commemoration was authorized by Congress, under DoD auspices, and launched at the Wall in 2012. Our goal is to thank and honor America's 6.6 million living veterans of the 9 million who served on active duty in the U.S. armed forces from Nov. 1, 1955, to May 15, 1975 — regardless of location — and the families of all who served.

Nearly 3 million served "in country" and another 6 million served elsewhere. All were called to serve. None could self-determine where they were stationed, and each deserves our thanks.

Those who served in country experienced unique hardships that only come with service in a combat zone, which every veteran understands and honors. While we recognize all, those who served in country deserve our special appreciation.

Inspired by thousands of local, state and national organizations that have partnered with the commemoration, Americans have already publicly and individually thanked and honored nearly 2 million of these veterans and their families in hometowns across the nation.

Those who have joined us in the hometown-centric Commemorative Partner Program (more than 11,000 organizations) have committed to conducting two events per year, in their local communities, that recognize and honor our veterans and their families. These partners have held more than 12,000 events to date.

There are no costs associated with becoming a commemorative partner, and we heartily invite organizations to join the mix of dedicated local and national businesses, corporations, veterans and military organizations, associations, educational institutions, community groups, towns, cities, states and many others that have committed to assist the nation in this noble effort.

The commemoration is providing Vietnam Veteran lapel pins to commemorative partners for dignified public presentations, during commemorative events, to living U.S. veterans who served during the Vietnam War period. Each veteran who served during the dates above is eligible to receive one lapel pin.

Vietnam veterans can locate upcoming commemorative events here; zoom in to locate your state and city or town, and click a blue pin to reveal details of an upcoming event, including contact information.

If there are no blue pins in your area, check back frequently as new events are added every week. Veterans who need help finding a commemorative event can email the commission.

The certificates are available through the same Defense Department-backed group that offers lapel pins to Vietnam War-period veterans.

Now is the time for all Americans to fully embrace the brave men and women who returned home from Vietnam and other locations around the world, often to shame and disgrace — or served in uniform during that period and failed to get the respect due them — by publicly thanking them with honor and dignity, as well as recognizing the sacrifices of their families.

Please visit www.vietnamwar50th.com or email us at whs.pentagon.wso.mbx.vnwar50th-cpp@mail.mil for more information about the Commemoration and the Commemorative Partner Program, respectively. Join the nation ... thank a Vietnam veteran! Retired Army Maj. Gen. Jim Jackson is the director of the United States of America Vietnam War Commemoration.

MESSAGE FROM A PROUD SON OF A MARINE POSTED ON FACEBOOK RUBEN GARCIA

Im here on behalf of my dad who was a 19 year old US Marine in Vietnam...I guess I'm just looking for info to see if maybe he can possibly reunite with some of his old pals...He was in the 3rd Marine Division326 Marine Kilo Company1967-March '69 He was in Khe Sanh thru '68 on Hill 861 His name is Salvador "Sal" Garcia Hoping some of you may have been there with him...Urrraaaahhhh !!!!

Michael Fishbaugh:
Found his name in my database...26-3-H&S
GARCIA, Salvador E1 0311 2410186 March 1968

Ruben Garcia:
Is that good ??
I've never done any searches for him before

Michael Fishbaugh:
A lot of Marines were listed as H&S but actually done their time with the other gun teams, flames, etc.

Kevin Seldon
Semper Fi, my dad was with Lima Co. 3/26 at the combat base. My dad's best buddy who he enlisted with was KIA on hill 861 on January 24, 1968. I wonder if your dad knew him? His name was Kenneth V. Goodman from Stewart, Minnesota.

Rueen Garcia
I'll ask him

Michael Fishbaugh
Sal" was only listed on the March 68 database, so I am guessing that's when he arrived or assigned to 3/26. I may be wrong.

Kelvin Seldon

Ruben Garcia
I'll have my mother Lidia Garcia show this to my dad

Kevin Seldon
Curious if may have also known PFC. Paul Bellamy who was KIA the night the NVA attacked on Jan. 21st. God bless your dad give him my best.

Thomas Buono
Sorry can't say I knew him but proud of another brother from Khe Sanh

James Shirley
3/26 Marines have a web site and we have reunions every two years.

Chuck Wellens
Didn't know your Dad personally , but I'm sure we crossed paths more than once. I was in weapons platoon Kilo Co on hill 861 same time as your Dad . It was one hell of a time . Proud to have served with him .
Sember Fi Sal

Rick Zunnio
I didn't know your Dad, but I was on Hill 861 only with A 1/26, 2nd platoon...I was a Corpsman, and I know another Corpsmen that was with Kilo 3/26 at the same time on 861....he might know your Dad. His name is Larry LeClaire....Doc LeClaire

Tony Flores
My God almighty. This post brought chills to my head and heart. When I saw the name of Salvador Garcia, I turned cold. You see, I was a Corpsman who was assigned right out of Field Med Service School to H&S Co HQ26 Marines in April 66 while the Rgt was reconstituting at Pendleton before our phased deployment in May, July and Oct 66 respectively. I deployed in July with HQ & 2/26 via ship convoy from San Diego, thru Pearl Harbor, Camp

Schwab Okinawa and then in country through Da Nang.

I was later chopped over to BLT 1/3/3 and met a fellow El Pasoan(TX), Marine, PFC Salvador Borrego Garcia...not the one in this string. We became best friends. We discussed and shared everything in our young lives in between operations since our folks homes were less than three miles apart.

Sal was an 0331 with B Co. I again served in country, this time with 1/3 from March - my end of tour, Aug 67. Sal and I got together virtually every time we were back on the USS Okinawa...our mother assault platform during those months. My time was up in late Aug. We said our goodbyes after he asked me to convey his love for his young wife Margie and his mom. I quipped that he'd be home before he knew it.

It never occurred. He was KIA 5 Mar 68 at Dai Do. Attending both his funeral and much later the funeral of a B Co 1/26 0311, PFC Arnold Rivera (KIA 25 Feb 68...his father and mine were old friends) still weighs heavily...esp since I was back in civ-ville and in college, foot loose, fancy free, but never quite leaving my units, my buddies and myself "back there."

You guys who've "been there, done that" know the rest of the story in putting it behind...it frankly never happens.

Though a squid, I was a Greenside Corpsman whose held our grunts in the highest esteem.

HE DIED SAVING FELLOW MARINES IN VIETNAM. 50 YEARS LATER, MEDAL GIVEN FOR HIS BRAVERY

By Carmen George
The Fresno Bee
cgeorge@fresnobee.com

The Marines were under heavy enemy fire on June 8, 1968 in Vietnam when Cpl. Stephen Austin broke away from his squad and charged toward a machine gunner concealed in a bunker.

The men had been ambushed. A lieutenant wanted to pull them back, but there was concern that many more would die if they retreated and waited for an airstrike.

So Austin, "disregarding his own safety," stepped into the open and "in full view and under full fire of the enemy in an attempt to get close enough to throw a grenade into the bunker," recalled a fellow Marine who was there that day, Al Joyner.
Before Joyner died later in life, he wrote about Austin's heroism.

"He was wounded repeatedly by enemy fire but continued to advance on the bunker," Joyner said of Austin, who grew up in Porterville, "as he was falling to the ground, he was able to throw his grenade up to the bunker slit to silence the enemy and assure a safe withdrawal of his squad and his platoon. A combination of rifle fire and the explosion of his own grenade resulted in Stephen's death."

An account of what he did that day was included in an application requesting that Austin be posthumously awarded a Silver Star for his heroic actions. It was instead upgraded to a Navy Cross, just below the military's highest honor, the Medal of Honor.

It will be presented to Austin's daughter, Neily Esposito, on July 21 by Marine Corps Commandant General Robert Neller at a 50th anniversary reunion banquet for the 1/27 Marines in Alexandria, Virginia.

Cpl. Stephen Austin in Vietnam, March 1968, three months before he was killed.

Joyner led a first effort to get Austin a military citation. After his application didn't result in a medal, another Vietnam War veteran who knew Austin, Grady Birdsong, took up the cause and tried again. To make it happen, it took several years of tracking down fellow Marines and assembling testimonies, including that of Lt. Col. Ronald Gruenberg and Sgt. Don Sell.
Birdsong called it cathartic.

He also wrote about Austin and other veterans in his battalion.

"All of us have survivor's guilt. … I got to live and I got to come home," Birdsong said. "It was my duty to tell their story, and I was honored to be able to do that. That was the least I was able to do for these men, especially the ones we lost like Stephen."

Austin died without knowing he had a daughter, who was born a few months before he was killed. Esposito's adopted father was also killed in combat during the Vietnam War. She was 2 years old.

Austin's last letter, dated June 7, 1968, was pulled from his pocket and mailed to his parents covered in blood stains. They received it two days after learning he had been killed.

"My mother literally fell to the floor," recalled Austin's youngest brother, Allen. "My dad, a World War II and Korean War veteran, held it in. We were forever changed. As we now know, freedom isn't free, and our family paid a high cost."

Austin wrote home about Operation Allen Brook south of Da Nang, which claimed his life. Part of that letter:

We took 28 wounded and six dead. So our company is hurting for some new men. On my birthday things didn't go too good. One of my best friends who I met in Hawaii was shot twice in the stomach and he died the following afternoon. His name was Art Sinksen. I am going to write his parents a letter as soon as I go in to Battalion area.

I am so sick of fighting I've seen and helped too many boys my age or younger that was wounded or dead. I thank the Lord each morning I get up. Well I should be going on R&R any time. That's about it over here. So say hi to everyone and take care of yourselves. Bye For Now

Austin enlisted at age 17. The infantryman was killed seven days after his 21st birthday during his second tour in Vietnam. He returned to Vietnam in early 1968 after recovering from a combat injury in November 1965. He is buried in Lindsay.

Allen Austin said the Navy Cross citation verifies the kind of man his brother was. He made a website, stephenaustin.org, to remember and honor his brother and other veterans.

The website enabled Birdsong to reconnect with other veterans. It also led him to Austin's mother. He visited her several times before she died. Birdsong said she never recovered from the pain of losing her eldest son. His push to get Austin a citation was, in part, for her. He wishes she was still alive to see Austin receive the Navy Cross.

"I know she's looking down smiling," Birdsong said.

Birdsong understands how it took 50 years to get Austin a medal.

"Through no fault of anyone," he said, "you got to understand that because we were a maneuver battalion, record keeping was by paper and pencil, not pen. We were on the move all the time and to be real honest with you, we weren't concerned about awards. We were just concerned about staying alive and being able to come home. ... A lot of men deserved awards for valor that didn't receive them."

Austin is honored in Porterville, where his name is the first one listed on a memorial plaque for local Vietnam War veterans.

It's also inscribed alongside more than 58,000 names on the Vietnam Veterans Memorial in Washington, D.C., which Allen Austin and Esposito will visit for the first time next week.

Esposito is looking forward to learning more about her dad from his comrades.

She hopes to get a better understanding of who she is. She thinks her dad has something to do with it, even though he "wasn't physically here to teach me those qualities."

Said Birdsong of Austin: "I just want everyone to be proud of him. He's one of the true warriors ... He answered the call, God bless him. I'm humbled to have been with him. He was a true leader."

My father Sam Rutledge passed away last year 3/4/2017. He was a Marine cannoner in Khe Sanh. Here's a post of his to Khe Sanh Vets:

"I been tryin to get in here for long time, I just have trouble sometimes. Does anybody have a roster of "W"Btry. 1st Bn 13th Mar. from 10/67 to 12/67? Also I was involved in the rescue of survivors of bombing at Lang Vei Village 3/2/67 I have amnesia about it sure would like to close that nightmare. I was a gun driver an cannoner with "India" Btry. 3rd Bn 12 th Marines at Khe Sanh then. I was transfered to "W" 1/13 in Sept. If anybody can help thanks so much,

Sam"
Does anyone here know him?

He was a brave Marine who served three tours in Vietnam. God Bless you all and thank you for your service.

Colonel Lownds " I called up division and said: I need a B52 strike NOW; any later than two hours from now forget it, he will have closed with me." Because of his intelligence Lownds had concluded that there was at least a Regiment approaching the combat base. The Arc Light (B52 strike) struck the approaching juggernaut and " this was the only time the kids on the line told me they could actually see bodies being thrown into the air. I sincerely believe those strikes caught at least 2 Battalions ."

The remnants of the main attack did close with the 37th ARVN Bn in front of Bravo Co area. Morning would find 71 dead NVA who failed to breach the wire.

The NVA record states "Our forces clung to the enemy's barb wire. The cadre and troops who were involved in the encirclement were determined to sacrifice themselves and to accept the ferociousness of the fighting."

31 additional personal lost their lives during this two day period bringing the total KIA to 172.

Another bunch of great Marines from Bravo Co. L-R Tom Steinhardt, Ron Exum (now deceased), Grant "Little John" Kniedler, and Steve Wiese.

In early September of 1967 Third Battalion 26th Marines left the Khe Sanh combat base for Camp Carroll. On September 7th the battalion left Camp Carroll to begin a sweep between the Con Thien fire base and the DMZ. This operation quickly transformed into a three day and night fire fight with two divisions of the North Vietnamese Army. The engagement is well documented and saw the battalion take killed and wounded casualties that reduced it's numbers from near 800 to a little over 130.

As the battalion was well below T/O strength, it was sent south to Camp Evans where it would regroup and rebuild. Once regrouped in December, it would be sent back north to Khe Sanh. While at Camp Evans, typical assignments might be sweeping Highway 1 and it's flanks for booby traps, occupying hill 51 and running patrols from it, setting night ambushes, and going on assorted two to four day patrols in the Co Bi Thanh Tan Valley between Highway 1 and the mountains rising west of the coastal plain. In particular, the area along highway 1 is what French correspondent Bernard Fall earlier referred to as "La Rue Sans Joie"(i.e., The Street Without Joy). This article is about one such patrol.

On or about the 27th of September 1967 my platoon, third platoon, of India Company 3/26, left Camp Evans on trucks and headed North on Highway 1 for several miles. We debarked from the trucks and moved out to the East across flat wet land until we came to a village near My Chanh still in Thua Thien province. The village was on the western bank of a river, probably the Song O Lau. The river was about two hundred feet across, slow moving, and apparently deep. The village was what one would expect in a simple rural setting. We were told our mission was to dig in along the river bank and act as a blocking force for the South Vietnamese Army that was sweeping towards us on the other side of the river. The sweep was apparently fairly large and would take some time as we were told that we would be in our positions for several days.

As we settled in, we began to casually dig our fox holes and other fighting positions on the river bank with our e-tools. We were in close proximity to the villagers and their dwellings. They went about their daily business, and in this bucolic setting we felt no sense of urgency or danger as we continued to dig the holes that would be our dwellings for several days and nights. This tranquility lasted well into the afternoon then the stillness was shattered by the sound of semiautomatic small arms fire from the other side of the river. We were sitting ducks. The casual digging of our fox holes became frantic. There was nothing between the shooter and us but an occasional bush or small tree. The small arms fire quickly stopped, but the digging accelerated. After completing my fox hole, looked at my right hand and saw that every knuckle on the palm side of my hand was abraded and bleeding.

The instinct to survive demanded that we return fire, but the Platoon Commander, Lt. Richard Foley, said we were forbidden to do this as there might be a village on the other side of the river. The only thing I or anyone else was able to see on the other side of the river was dense foliage that went down to and into the river. There were no paths, no huts, no open. Areas, not the slightest evidence of a village.

For the next hour or so It was quiet. Our fighting positions had been dug. It was going into evening, and most of us were starting to eat our C-rations. At this time the small arms fire from across the river again erupted, but this time a Marine had been hit. two positions down from mine, Lance Corporal Richard Harvel a twenty year old from Bedford, New Hampshire was sitting in or on his foxhole eating his chow when a bullet either straight on, or ricocheting off the ground in front of him, hit him in the back of his head.

The enemy fire lasted but a short while, maybe eight or ten semi-automatic rounds, and then quiet. Again we were forbidden o return fire. Now the quiet was broken by the high pitched almost siren-like sound of a head wound.

The platoon commander, Second Lieutenant Foley, called in the H-34 medivac chopper. It took a while to arrive and now it had become dark, very dark. I remember several of us carrying Harvel to the make shift LZ which may have been forty five meters away from the river. I remember trying to keep the combat bandage on the back of his head. This was a bit of a balancing act as we were trying to stay low, but also trying to keep the back of his head out of the mud. In a Kafkaesque, way I recall stopping within inches of a farmer's wooden fence to take a breather. I looked to be sure Havel's head was still bandaged. Just as I did this, I saw and heard inches away on the other side of the fence the huge snorting head of a water buffalo. I was relieved that the fence was there. We got Richard to the arriving helicopter, and that was the last we saw of him.

The next day we manned our positions and did little else as we were the "Blocking Force." About 100 feet from my position I noticed a concrete slab going down and into the river. Back in "The World" one might have called this a boat ramp. On this concrete slab I noticed several Vietnamese women from the village washing clothes.

Before going to Vietnam, I and my fellow Marines had a full year of training most of which was in preparation for Vietnam. Somewhere along the line we were taught that the communists would not endanger the local population. From my experience that instruction could not have been more wrong. They didn't just endanger the local population,- they terrorized it.

Vietnam had already taught me how minor cuts and scrapes would rapidly bloom into infections i.e., "jungle rot". This was especially true for those of us who were living in dirt. Foolishly feeling safe among these village women, I squatted on the slab at the water's edge with a piece of soap to wash and clean the abrasions I sustained from the day before. Normally I would also have take advantage of such situations to wash my face. For whatever reason, I chose not to wash my face that morning.

I began walking back to my position when semi-automatic fire erupted. I dropped to the ground facing the fire and found myself behind nothing more than the lone sprig of a tree. The only analogy I can think of is walking naked into a dark room when a group of people turn on the lights and yell surprise. The difference- the Vietnam experience had an immediate lethal potential.

The women ran screaming. On the river bank behind the slab and behind the women, two Marines were sitting on a makeshift bunker. Apparently they received the same bad information about the communists not endangering civilians. The corpsman told us one Marine was hit in the elbow and the other was hit in the spine. To this day I wonder how the outcome would have been different If I had stayed to wash my face. I would have been an easy squatting target at that range. Was my squatting presence motivation for the shooter to get his gun? Again, we were forbidden to return fire.

Some time Later in that day we again received semi -automatic fire from the dense vegetation on the other side of the river, but this time the response would be different. This time, a young lance corporal whom we nicknamed "Gunny", took a few steps toward the river and opened up with his M16. I think everyone else thought what I was thinking. This situation is crazy; "Gunny" is right! We all opened up our weapons for about ten seconds. Survival is a powerful motivator. We were there for the rest of that day and well into the next day. In that time not so much as a single shot was fired at us. Of course that was too late for Harvel, another now paraplegic Marine, and another now armless Marine.

Sometimes I would wonder if this time at Thua Thien was primer for the 130mm Soviet artillery that would pound us at Khe Sanh from the enemy's sanctuaries in Laos' Co Roc mountain and the DMZ. Was this village a microcosm of the much larger strategy of "Containment." After all, we were not there to win but rather to contain.

I know some people say that we didn't remember these events. But rather that we "remember the telling" of these events. What these people have profoundly told me is that they were never there. I also strongly suspect that many of these people, at the time of these events, made every effort to be sure they were very far from Vietnam. Along this line I can say I don't remember much else from that operation. I do remember the Lieutenant had a radio man named Rinn. He was built like Tarzan but was shy. The village had an elder leader that we called "the Honcho." He told the Lieutenant that he wanted Rinn to mate with one of his daughters. When he got the drift of the conversation, Rinn turned red. It did not happen.

Years later at a Khe Sanh reunion, Lt. Foley told me this was one of his first operations in the Nam. After arriving in country, he made a personal vow that as a platoon commander he would not lose a single man. I am sure he was far from the only Second Lieutenant to do this. Richard Harvel's death quickly put an end to that, not to mention the unimaginable carnage that returning o Khe Sanh would bring.

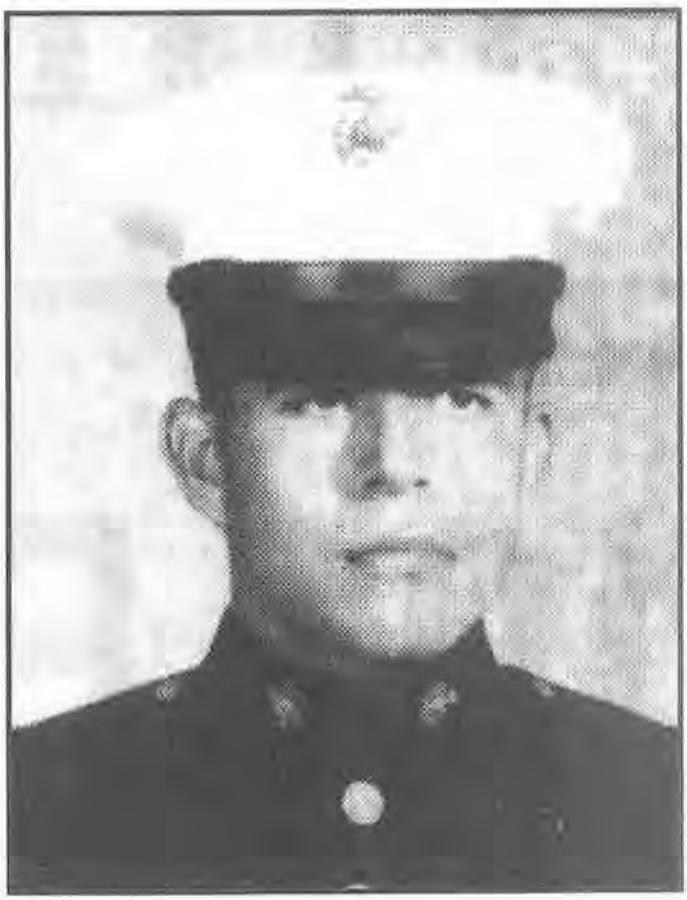
Nine months later I would return to "the world." I spoke with Richard Harvel's mother twice. His father had passed. Years later I sent her a copy of Dick Camp's "Lima -6" which gives his accounting of those days and nights from September 7-11, 1967. Those were days and nights of Hell between Con Thien and the DMZ. In that engagement, which I was not a part of because of a cellulitis infection in my leg, Richard was the M-79 man for our squad leader, Sergeant Bruce Krage. Sergeant Krage was part of the original 3rd Bn 26th Marines that landed in Viet am a year earlier. For my first seven weeks in Viet Nam I was glad that Sergeant Krage was my squad leader. He was everything you wanted in an infantry squad leader, smart, instinctive, thoughtful, well spoken, experienced, and squared away. He was the six foot one All-American kid from Minnesota. Unfortunately, Sergeant Krage was killed by a shot to the head during the heavy action on September 7, 1967, near the DMZ.

Richard Harvel described to me how the round that hit Craig was a tracer and how he saw it burn around inside his head. Ironically, it was a similar shot to the head of Richard Sometimes I reflect on the round that hit Richard. I think of the combat bandage I kept holding on the back of his head; I think of the mud I tried to keep his head out of; I think of the darkness; I think of the water buffalo. The corpsman told us that because Harvel's wound was in the back of his head he could still have higher functioning abilities. Later the next day our platoon sergeant, Sergeant Hoapili, in his Hawaiian accent told each of us, "Bruder, Harvel didn't make it." In our conversations I was never able to mention any of this to his mother. She told me she was a nurse in World War II. I mentioned that my father was the medical officer on a destroyer, USS Higbee, in the Pacific. The Higbee was the only ship in the Navy named after a woman, a WWI nurse. I still felt paralyzed when it came to mentioning any of the details of her son's death.

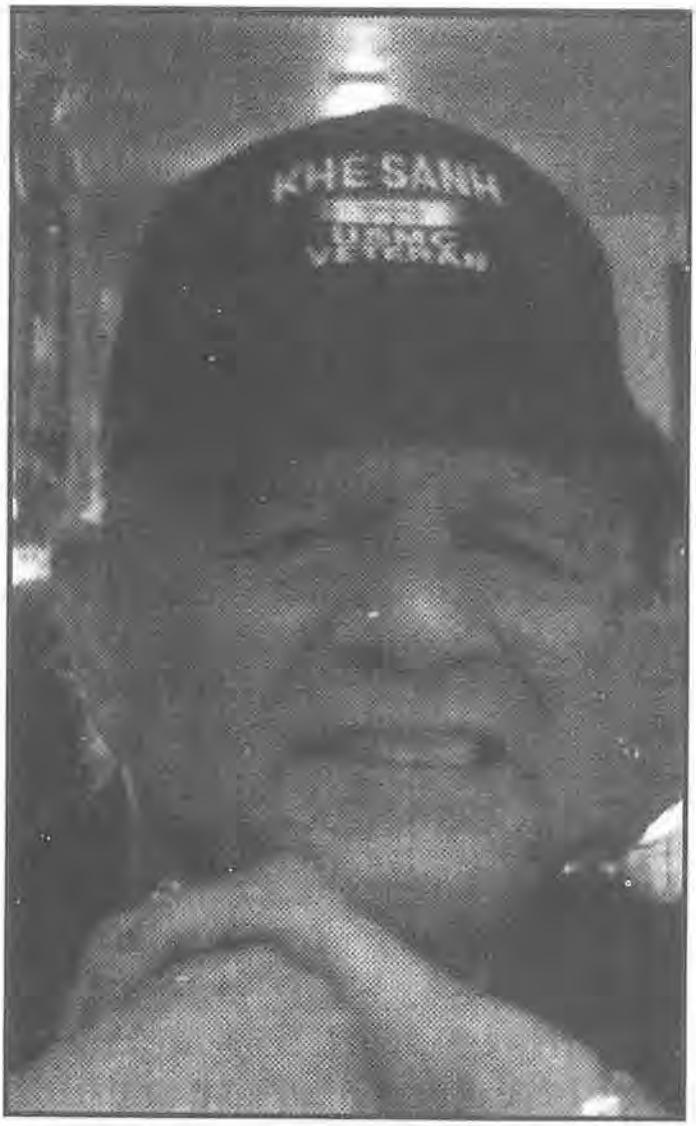
Right now I reflect on how it took only six disjointed hours to write this but how it took fifty years to exhale it. I also reflect on my first week home, being back in lithe world." I remember going to a young person's gathering place in Saint James, New York. It was called The Gold Coast." I well remember the owner with his hand gun in a holster and a bouncer goon at his side telling me that as a Viet Nam veteran I was not allowed inside. In retrospect, this should not have surprised me as the establishment was a meeting place for students from Stony Brook University and Suffolk Community College.

The Gold Coast is gone, but we remain, what they and the communists could not kill.

OBIT
ROBERT E. GREENWOOD USMC KHE SANH VETERAN, CO 1/9 WPNS PLT



Robert E. Greenwood Fought the good fight in his short battle with liver cancer and on Saturday, June 9, 2018, he began his journey to his heavenly home. He leaves behind his wife, Joyce Buffalo Head Greenwood, of Oklahoma City; one son Brent Greenwood, of Edmond; two daughters, Shane and Shaula, of Oklahoma City; two granddaughters, Anevea, of Edmond and Mekai, of Oklahoma City and nine grandsons, Isaiah and Miwese, of Edmond and Josiah, David, Adrian, Julian, Andrew, Elijah and Jacobi, all of Oklahoma City; one sister, Jackie Sue Harrison, of Choctaw and many nieces, nephews, Chickasaw relatives and friends.



He is preceded in death by his parents, Cecil Greenwood and Louise Tyubby-Greenwood; a sister, Patricia Rough face-Greenwood; a nephew, Tommy Jr. Roughface; maternal grandparents, Lila Mclish-Hawkins and Richmond Tyub by and paternal grandparents, Susie Chummuttie Greenwood.

Robert was an enrolled member of the Chickasaw Nation. He embraced his Chickasaw language and culture. He was honored to accept the invitation to have his portrait painted by Mike Larsen, a renowned Chickasaw artist. Robert is one of 18 Chickasaw elders whose paintings are displayed in the Chickasaw Cultural museum in Sulphur. Just recently, he was asked to participate with other Chickasaw elders in a documentary entitled, "Elders Speak".

Robert was born In Lawton, on March 13, 1949, to the proud parents Louise and Cecil Greenwood. The family resided in Oklahoma City and later moved to Midwest City where he attended school his elementary and high school years. Upon graduation in 1967 he, along with his best high school friend Shelby Nelson, enlisted with the Marines.

Robert was stationed at Camp Pendleton for his basic training and was later deployed to fight in the Vietnam War. He was assigned with the 1st battalion 9th Marines. It was during the Khe Sanh battle that Robert would receive two purple hearts, a National Defense Service Medal, Vietnam Service Medal, Vietnam Campaign Medal, Presidential Unit Citation, Combat Action Ribbon, two Meritorious Citations and a Good Conduct Medal for his bravery and heroic efforts in one of the deadliest battles in the Vietnam War. He was seriously injured during this time of battle and was transported by medevac to Corpus Christi Texas where he was hospitalized for his injuries and later assigned to Camp Pendleton for further training.

1969 he returned home to Midwest City. He was employed at Western Electric Company in 1970 and later was employed by the U.S. Postal Service where he retired in 2006. In June of 1970, he attended the Methodist annual conference at Hog Creek in Anadarko. It was there he met his wife, Joyce and they were married in January of 1971. They established their home in Oklahoma City, where many memories were made with their three children and 11 grandchildren. He was a member of the Mary Lee Clark Church in Del City.

Robert was an avid fan of the Oklahoma State Cowboys. There were many happy days spent with his family in the Stillwater and Ponca City area during football and basketball seasons. He enjoyed camping at Chickasaw National Recreation Park in Sulphur with his family and grandchildren. Every year for the past 26 years, he looked forward to camping in August at the annual Ponca Celebration. He was very supportive of his wife's desires to carry on the Ponca ways and traditions for her family.

Robert was a loving husband, father, grandfather, uncle, friend and there are no words to express the void that will be left with his family and friends. He left a legacy of unconditional love, discipline and respect for his children and grandchildren to carry through their words and actions.
Burial was in Ponca Indian Cemetery.

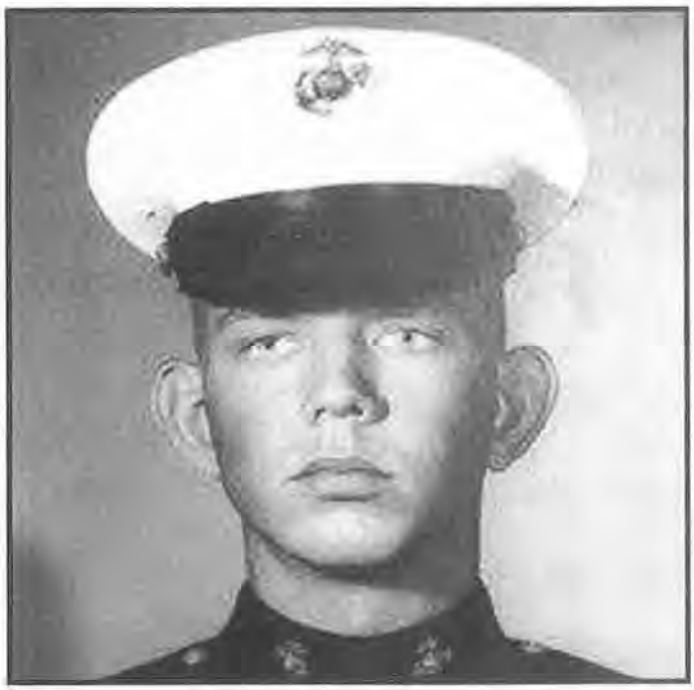
RAYMOND WORDEN, USMC
KHE SANH VETERAN
ALPHA CO 1/26



Raymond Marcus Worden, "Modoc", was born November 25, 1947 in Muncie, IN to the late Raymond and Wanda (Cooper) Worden. Mark 'Modoc' Worden ,70, passed away unexpectedly at his home in Hagerstown on the morning of September 7th. 'Modoc' was a 1966 graduate of Union High School in Modoc, IN.

He served his country with honor in Vietnam and abroad as an enlisted volunteer in the United States Marine Corp. He was a Khe Sanh veteran seeing action in the hills and mountains surrounding the base. In 2007 'Modoc' retired from General Motors Corp. after 30 years of service. After retirement 'Modoc' went on to work at Autocar before being diagnosed with a serious form of cancer for which he was successfully treated. At the time of his passing he was employed as a groundskeeper at Hartley Hills Country Club.

Modoc' was an avid golfer and up until recently a devoted Harley Davidson rider. He enjoyed spending time with friends at the golf course, American Legion Post 333, and AmVets Post 38.

'Modoc' was a devoted husband, beloved father, grandfather, and brother. Survivors include his wife of 34 years Cynthia L. (Kerney) Worden, three children Amanda J. Worden (Brad Thomas) of Hagerstown, Bryan A. Worden of Muncie, and Justus T. (Kimberly) Kerney of Economy. His surviving brother and sisters include Teddy (Jim) Holwager of Mathews, NC, Cathy Flatter of Winchester, IN, Joy Woolf of Farmland, IN, Gilbert Worden (Toni Pardue) of Tulsa, OK, and Claudia (Rodney) Spurlock of New Castle, IN. His grandchildren include Cameron Worden, Kelsey Dodd, Shelby Dodd, Bryce Worden along with a great granddaughter, Emma Worden and step-grandchildren and great grandson: Allyson (Gruell) (Brett) Crawford, Patrick Gruell, and Paxton Crawford. Numerous nieces and nephews and other close relatives will also miss 'Modoc' dearly.

Although very active he greatly loved his family and always made time to spend with them. He was very well known throughout the community having countless friends and acquaintances. 'Modoc' will be fondly remembered as a very kind, genuine man with a great sense of humor and authentic character. As his nickname can attest, he was fond of his personal slogan: "Bottle of pop, big banana, I'm from MODOC INDIANA!" We will miss you and are grateful we had you.

A memorial service was held on Thursday Sept. 13th at 2:00pm at Culberson Funeral Home in Hagerstown, IN. Visitation will begin at 1:00pm. In lieu of flowers the family requests donations be made to a veteran's organization of your choice.

Raymond Worden was my radio operator twice, first in the 3rd Platoon, Alpha Company, 1/26 and later in the reconstituted 2nd Platoon, during the Spring and Summer of 1967. As a Marine he was as good as they get, especially in close combat. The former members of the 3rd Platoon had been looking for him since 1988. We were so glad to see him at the reunion. He decided to come based on the encouragement of his friend Charles Pittman (Whiskey Battery, 1/13). He was as surprised as we were to meet up again. Thank you Charles. We will miss him.

KSV 2018 REUNION:

THE POILANE PAPERS BY COL NICHOLAS ROMANETZ USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN CHARLIE CO 1/26 2ND PLT

I arrived at Khe Sanh in early October 1967 as a new Second Lieutenant and was assigned to Charlie Company on Hill 861. In early November the company was rotated down to the combat base and assumed the responsibility for base security/ reaction force. We ran a variety of squad, platoon and company patrols from the combat base which lasted as long as one to five days. Sometime in early December, I believe, we were returning from a five-day company size patrol from the vicinity of the blown bridge on Route 9, east of the KSCB. We passed a Bru village of huts and soon arrived at the access road from Route 9 to KSCB. As we made the right turn towards the base, I noticed in the distance a yellow, two story house. I was not aware of what the structure was or who it belonged to as I can't recall ever seeing it before.

About 50 yards from the house, I noticed a young Caucasian girl sitting on the front steps. I took a picture of her with my high tech, expensive Instamatic and when I was about fifteen feet from the girl I took a second picture. A little over a month later, the siege began. I had kept those pictures in a scrapbook for many years (at least 30) and always wondered what happened to the girl. I had found out that she was the daughter of a French couple that owned the home and a coffee plantation very near the base.

I instinctively reached out to Ray Stubbe and he told me the Poi lane Family were the people that lived there and that the mother and two children were alive and well, living in France. Ray then provided me Madame Poilane's address in France. In my readings about Khe Sanh I learned that Felix, the husband of Madeleine, was killed in a plane crash at Khe Sanh in April 1968 when he was returning to check on his house and plantation (I knew that the house was destroyed early in the siege and this was recently confirmed in Mike Archer's recent publication, "The Gunpowder Prince". The house was being used by NVA artillery spotters positioned on the second floor who were seen by Marine spotters on the base. A flight of fixed wing aircraft quickly destroyed the building).

In early 2002 I was working in a public high school and I enlisted the services of a French teacher to translate my initial letter to Madame Poilane in French. I identified myself and included copies of the two color photos of her daughter I had taken some 30 years earlier. Within two weeks I heard from Madame Poilane. A letter, written in French, thanked me for contacting her and providing the photos. She basically said she had "lost everything" from her time in Viet Nam and the pictures were the first and only physical items she had that covered her life at Khe Sanh. For the next few months we exchanged letters with the French teacher doing all of the translation from French to English for my benefit and English to French for Madame's benefit. I soon received a 25+ page "manuscript" typed in French and titled "Memories of Vietnam 1957-1968" from Madame. I called the manuscript "The Poilane Papers." My French teacher friend was more than happy to have one of her Advanced Placement French classes assume the responsibility of translating the document to English. Within a few weeks I had a wonderful manuscript to read and found it fascinating.

About this time Ernie Spencer was responsible for publishing and distributing Red Clay. I sent him the pictures and manuscript and he published it in its entirety. Fast forward to a few years ago when Dennis Mannion took an interest in the Poilane children and their story and life in VN. I provided him a copy of the original manuscript, in both French and English, and he contacted the children, Francoise and Jean- Marie. Issue 89 of Red Clay (winter/ spring 2016) republished Madam Poilane's entire manuscript as well as stories which were the result of Dennis communicating with the Poi lane children and others.

For me, upon learning the Poilane children would attend our recent DC reunion, I felt it was a great opportunity to bring this episode full circle and close this chapter of my Khe Sanh experiences. I met the Poilane's for breakfast on Thursday of the reunion. I introduced myself as the guy who took the pictures of Franscoise and the guy that corresponded with their Mom allowing her "manuscript" to be published in Red Clay. That morning I returned to the children all of the correspondence I had with Madame (English and French copies) as well as the original manuscript typed in French. This manuscript and accompanying correspondence had been stored in a filing cabinet for over 30 years. Had I died, there is no doubt these documents would have ended up in the trash. I also provided each of the children with the two pictures in a frame (photo of presentation enclosed). I truly hope that them having the documents I provided add some value and meaning to their family history.

LAWRENCE "LARRY" BALLARD USMC KHE SANH VETERAN H&S CO 2/26

Laurence A. "Larry" Ballard, 70, entered into eternal peace on Wednesday, August 22, 2018 at his home in Silver Spring, MD. Larry was born in Washington, DC on March 1, 1948 to Caleb H. and Alise J. Ballard.

Larry graduated from Spingarn High School, Washington, DC in 1966 and joined the U.S. Marine Corps, serving from 1966 to 1971. He served in the Vietnam War, including stints at Phu Bai, Con Thien, Camp Carroll, and Dong Ha. He also served in the war's most famous siege, the Battle of Khe Sanh, from January through April 1968

After returning from Vietnam, Larry served as a sergeant at one of the premier posts of the Corps, Marine Barracks at 8th and I Streets in Washington, DC, for two and a half years. He earned many awards during his military service including National Defense Service Medal, Vietnam Service Medal, Vietnam Campaign Medal, Presidential Unit Citation, Combat Action Ribbon, and Vietnamese Cross of Gallantry.

Larry attended the University of the District of Columbia, graduating in 1975 with a Bachelor of Arts Degree in Bio-environmental Science and Engineering. He began his career in law enforcement, joining the Montgomery County Maryland Police Department in 1977. The career in law enforcement was a good fit for him as he always had a moral code consisting of a strong commitment to fairness and justice.

Larry was a humanitarian and community leader. He was active in politics in Washington, DC as a young man, served as president of the Spring Oaks Community Association for many years, and sponsored several children through the Children International Organization over a period of more than 25 years. His sponsorship provided support to children in impoverished countries, ensuring they had access to medical care and educational opportunities.

Larry was a member of several organizations including the Khe Sanh Veterans Association, the Fraternal Order of Police, the Montgomery County Police Alumni Association, Veterans of Foreign Wars, and a lifetime member of the NAACP. Larry will be lovingly remembered by his devoted wife of 38 years, Carolyn N. Edwards; sister, Mena Young-Harris (Joseph); two nephews, Michael A. Young Jr. and Johnathon L. Key; father and mother-in-law, Joe Wise and Christine Edwards; and special friends, Marsha Gilchrist, James Gilchrist, and Otis Pitts Jr., along with other beloved family and friends.

. THE GUNS AT KHE SANH, 1968

Dwight Jon Zimmerman
ARGUNNERS MAGAZINE

"The 66-day battle of Khe Sanh, which began in January 1968, became a classic defensive operation for U.S. forces. It tested American concepts of defense and demonstrated that good fire support could effectively neutralize a superior force.*" — Major General David Ewing Ott, USA (US Army Vietnam Studies: Field Artillery 1954-1973)

The North Vietnamese 1968 Tet Offensive was designed to be the knockout blow that would defeat South Vietnamese military forces, inspire a popular uprising against the South Vietnamese government, and force the Allied troops under the command of U.S. Army General William Westmoreland, Military Assistance Command Vietnam (MACV) to evacuate the country. A prelude to the communist campaign was the conquest of the remote base camp in the U.S. Marine I Corps Tactical Zone, Khe Sanh.

Khe Sanh was located in the northernmost South Vietnamese province of Quang Tri, about six miles east of the Laotian border and fourteen miles south of the Demilitarized Zone. Established in 1962 and initially occupied by Special Operations Forces, it was designed for surveillance, not interdiction, of enemy traffic down the Ho Chi Minh Trail. In 1966 General Westmoreland, over Marine objections, ordered it expanded to a battalion-sized base camp complete with airstrip. In 1967 it was expanded and reinforced to regimental strength.

In late 1967, Marine patrols observed stepped up North Vietnamese activity in the region, with evidence that large numbers of communist troops were remaining instead of typically transiting south. On 2 January 1968, about three weeks before the Vietnamese Tet holiday and truce were to begin, a Marine reconnaissance patrol attacked a six-man North Vietnamese Army patrol just outside the Khe Sanh defensive perimeter, killing five. Among the dead were an NVA regimental commander and his operations officer. The official Marine history concluded, "The fact that the North Vietnamese could commit such key men to a highly dangerous, personal reconnaissance indicated that Khe Sanh was at the top of the communists' priority list." Westmoreland interpreted the incident to mean that thousands of enemy troops were in the area and that Khe Sanh held the opportunity for finally bringing about the decisive engagement against communists that he had long desired. The entire 26th Marine Regiment under the command of Colonel David Lownds was tasked with the defense of Khe Sanh. It was the first time since Iwo Jima that all three battalions of the regiment were together for a combat operation. Westmoreland planned to use the Marines as "bait" to lure the NVA into battle where they would be destroyed by superior American firepower. Anticipating that the Marines would be cut off, Westmoreland planned to use superior American air power to resupply and augment the defenses of the base. In the days leading up to Tet, additional men, including the South Vietnamese 37th ARVN Ranger Battalion, and supplies were air lifted to Khe Sanh. Approximately 3,000 troops were located in the base camp with 3,000 more split among positions on the nearby hills 950, 881, 861, and 558, so named for their height. Each garrison was supported by artillery. For the siege, the NVA had assembled two regiments of the 325C Division, veterans of Dien Bien Phu, and two regiments of the 320th Division. They would be supported by the 304th Division, an armored regiment, and two artillery regiments. All told, the NVA had committed from 20,000 to 30,000 troops for the operation.

The siege began on 20 January when a patrol between hills 881 North, held by the NVA, and 881 South, held by the Marines, led by Captain William Dabney made contact with elements of the NVA. The following day, the enemy launched an assault of hills 881S and 861. Enemy artillery damaged the airstrip and scored a major success when rocket and shellfire hit the main ammunition dump, leaving the Marines desperately short of shells. Despite incoming barrages and anti-aircraft fire, six C-130 cargo transports successfully landed later that day on the still-damaged air strip and discharged 24 tons of cargo, mostly artillery shells. For his troops to successfully hold out, Colonel Lownds estimated that he would need 160 tons of supplies per day.

The vital role that air power and artillery performed in the successful Marine defense of Khe Sanh cannot be overstated. During the siege there were times when approximately half of all air assets in the theater were tasked with the support of the Marines at Khe Sanh. There is no question of the value and importance of the many air strikes on enemy positions. But even more important was the Air Force's ability to conduct aerial resupply operations. Westmoreland later wrote, "The resupply of Khe Sanh stands as the premier air logistical feat of the war. At no time during the siege did the defenders experience a serious supply shortage."

Regarding artillery fire during the battle, 158,981 rounds of various calibers were fired on enemy positions and attack points. A total of 46 artillery pieces were used including five batteries of Marine artillery composed of three batteries of 105 mm howitzers, one battery of 4.2 inch mortars, and one battery of 155 howitzers. The Marines were supported by four batteries of Army 175 mm guns, all from the 2d Battalion, 94th Field Artillery. One battery was at a base codenamed "Rockpile" located about nine miles north-northwest of Khe Sanh, and the other three were based at Camp Carroll about thirteen miles northeast. All supporting arms fire was coordinated from Khe Sanh itself by the fire support coordination center (FSCC) operated by the 1st Battalion, 13th Marines (Artillery) and the direct air support center (DASC).

The complexity of the FSCC operations during the siege is indicated by the description of an average night's pattern of preplanned fires by a target intelligence/information officer: "Combined TOTs (time on targets) from nine batteries totaled 4 -6; separate battalion TOTs, Army 4-6 and Marine 10-15; battery multiple volley individual missions, 40-50; battery H&Is (harassment and interdiction) 20-30. Normal one-gun, one-round H&Is were not used; this type of fire was of little value. Marine and Army artillery were employed in target areas and at ranges to reduce to a minimum check fires caused by the arrival of MPQ (radar guided) and reconnaissance aircraft. Later, as we learned finesse, air was given the targets south of the base and west of the maximum range of the 175 mm guns; 1/13 was given any targets whose range required a maximum ordinate of 14,000 feet (altitude of an MPQ controlled air strike), and the 175 mm guns were assigned to targets to the north, northwest, and east of the base."

FSCC's ability to provide timely and accurate fire on numerous targets simultaneously was made possible by the Field Artillery Digital Automatic Computer (FADAC). First Lieutenant Carlton B. Crenshaw of Company C, 1/13, would receive the Bronze Star with "V" device and his second Purple Heart while stationed on Hill 881S during the siege. A few days after the siege had begun, Crenshaw, on night watch duty in the Charlie Battery command bunker had an opportunity to see the FADAC in action. In a letter home he wrote, "At about 10:00 our battalion fire control center called and needed support for another Marine recon unit that was surrounded. We had a new computer called FADAC that was able to do many things simultaneously. It gave us four simultaneous missions to be supported by eight artillery guns from my battery. In essence they provided a box of artillery protection for our Marines. The fire mission went on for hours as the box moved to cover the movement of the Marines back to the combat base."

Easy clearance procedures for fire missions meant artillery could swiftly respond to changing tactical situations regardless of weather. Unless friendly aircraft were above the target area, artillery rounds could be striking enemy positions within forty seconds after the call for fire was made.

Support fire was organized into four responses, three-sided artillery box, mini Arc Light, micro Arc Light, and direct fire against targets of opportunity. North Vietnamese Army doctrine called for battalion attacks in column formation. Lt. Crenshaw described one use of the artillery box. In general the fire support coordination center used three batteries of the 1/13 to execute the three sides of the box around second echelon troops designed to support the enemy's lead battalion during the attack, hemming the reserves. The fourth, open, side faced friendly lines. A fourth battery from 1/13 closed this fourth side with a rolling barrage that moved up and down the box like a piston in a cylinder. Simultaneously, the center placed a secondary box around surrounding enemy backup units. Four Army 175 mm batteries were responsible for two sides, about 500 meters outside the primary box. If weather conditions permitted, air strike missions, sometimes including B-52 Arc Light missions, supported the barrages. The combination of back and forth piston and side to side accordion salvo action proved devastating. Lead assault units would come under organic 81 mm mortar and 106 mm recoilless rifle fire when they came within range. When NVA commanders of the lead assault units attempted to call in support or reinforcements for an effective schwerpunkt, they discovered that their reserves were already under heavy combined arms attack.

Mini Arc Light missions were used against area targets and were the responsibility of the assistant fire support coordinator. Similar to a regular B-52 Arc Light mission, the value of a mini Arc Light mission was that it could be organized and employed more rapidly, generally within forty-five minutes. Once a target, such as an enemy troop staging area, was identified, the assistant fire support coordinator plotted a 500 x 1,000 meter block in the suspected area or across the anticipated march route. Two Intruder tactical aircraft, each armed with twenty-eight 500-lb. bombs, were then called in for a radar-guided bomb run. As the same time, batteries at Khe Sanh, the Rockpile, and Camp Carroll were alerted. Thirty seconds before the Intruders were about to drop their bombs, Army 175 mm batteries fired a sixty-round salvo concentrated on half the block. As the Intruders dropped their bombs down the middle of the block, Marine batteries directed fire on the second half of the block. Flight and trajectory times of all ordnance were computed so that all would strike simultaneously, saturating the block.

More rapid still was the micro Arc Light, which could be put into effect within ten minutes. Conducted essentially the same way, the micro Arc Light used less ordnance and over a smaller, 500 x 500 meter, area.

The direct fire against targets of opportunity was used by Marine artillery on Khe Sanh. The effectiveness of this method was demonstrated by Marine howitzers located on Hill 881S northwest of Khe Sanh. At one point during the siege, an alert machine gunner on Hill 881S saw a twenty-man NVA column, with troops carrying mortar tubes, climbing the slope of Hill 758, south of the Marines' position. An initial salvo, from 1,200 meters, successfully hit a number of the enemy. When the survivors gathered around their fallen comrades, the Marines shoved aside their defensive parapets, depressed their gun tubes for a downhill shot, and fired off about a dozen rounds, killing all the enemy troops.

The B-52 Stratofortress was not generally regarded as a close air support asset. But, with a 27-ton payload of 500- and 750-pound bombs, they proved enormously effective in that role during the siege. Even a near miss by an Arc Light mission was devastating. In a study of the effectiveness of combined artillery and airpower at Khe Sanh, Captain John A. Hamilton, Jr., USA, wrote, "The concussion from a B-52 attack was so violent that fatal casualties were produced from concussion effects alone." Applying the rule of thumb of one meter distance per each pound of TNT in a bomb, a 500-pound bomb could be dropped as close as 500 meters from a friendly position. This capability prevented the NVA from massing large numbers of troops close to Marine lines, particularly at night. Often after an Arc Light mission, 1/13 batteries would wait a maximum of twenty minutes before saturating the bombed area with artillery fire, inflicting additional casualties on the dazed enemy troops.

NVA used a number of types of artillery including tube and rocket. Soviet-built 122 mm rockets were launched mostly from positions on Hill 881N. Tube artillery in the form of 130 mm and 152 mm batteries were located on Co Roc Mountain in Laos. Marine positions on Hill 881S were ranged by NVA 120 mm mortars. In a tactic used fourteen years earlier at Dien Bien Phu, it's believed that the NVA emplaced the 120 mm mortars at precise angles in tunnels in order to repeatedly hit one specific target. It is one explanation for why only Hill 881S received 120 mm mortar fire and why the communist mortars were never found and knocked out of action.

Communist shelling was often intense. One day alone, 1,370 shells landed on Khe Sanh. Lt. Crenshaw wrote that by the eight day of the siege, "Our hill reminds me of pictures that I have seen of trenches used by French, English, and German troops during World War I. Within a few days nothing will be left above the ground level." Marines continued to dig foxholes and bunkers. But even deep bunkers with reinforced roofs proved little protection against NVA 120 mm mortar fire. In a letter home, Crenshaw noted, "The bunker next to mine took a direct hit with a 120 mm mortar yesterday which went about three feet of overhead protection and wounded two Marines in there."

Enemy artillery fire was immediately answered by either counterbattery fire or air strikes or a combination of both. The Marine official history of the siege noted the extraordinary dedication of the Marine artillery officers in returning fire. In one example, the executive officer of the 1/13 "ignored the heavy barrage and raced from one shell hole to another analyzing the craters and collecting fragments so that he could determine the caliber of the enemy weapons as well as the direction from which they were being fired. Much of the counterbattery fire was a direct result of his efforts."

The NVA made its greatest attempt to capture Khe Sanh the night of 29 February-1 March. Intelligence determined that the enemy had massed a significant force, later believed to be a battalion from the 304th NVA Division, and it was moving toward the eastern side of the Marine perimeter which was defended by the 37th ARVN Ranger Battalion. The FSCC quickly called in saturation fire missions on the projected enemy routes of march east and south of the perimeter. Within minutes tactical air, and mini and micro Arc Light missions added their destruction. Two and a half hours later, bomb payloads of the first full-scale Arc Light mission were dropped on the enemy troops. The NVA resolutely attempted three assaults on the ARVN line. The intensity of the combined ground, air and artillery fire was so great that at no time were the enemy troops able to reach, let alone breach, the outermost defensive line of barbed wire.

Montagnard tribesmen later reported that they discovered 200 to 500 enemy bodies stacked along the leading to Khe Sanh. Intelligence estimates concluded that an NVA regiment was virtually wiped out that night. The official Marine history of the siege concluded, "It was obvious that [the NVA troops]had been caught on the march and mangled by air raids and piston-like artillery concentrations.

While many of the defenders of Khe Sanh never fired a shot, what was believed to be the long-awaited enemy onslaught came and passed with a whimper instead of a roar." Though attacks against the base continued, the NVA never again staged a major attack on the base.

Two weeks later, intelligence determined that the enemy was pulling units away from the area. On 31 March, the Army's 1st Cavalry Division arrived at Khe Sanh, relieved the Marine force, and commenced Operation Pegasus, the fifteen-day air assault operation that ended the battle of Khe Sanh. A final assessment by intelligence estimated that two crack NVA regular divisions were effectively destroyed and that their destruction was primarily caused by American combined artillery and air attacks.

During the siege, Bravo Battery, 1/13, an oversize battery composed of six 105 mm howitzers and three additional howitzers from Charlie Battery, had fired more than 1,250 rounds in support of the Marines at Khe Sanh. 1st Lieutenant Fred McGrath remembered that near the end of February,

"Colonel Lownds personally came to our position and thanked every Marine in the position for the superb fire support his regiment had received." Lownds would later receive the Navy Cross for his role in the defense of Khe Sanh and accept for the 26th Marines the Presidential Unit Citation.

North Vietnamese Defense Minister and commander in chief of the North Vietnamese Army General Vo Nguyen Giap had gambled that he could overwhelm the Marine and ARVN forces at Khe Sanh the same way he had the French at Dien Bien Phu. He failed. The resolution of the infantry defenders, coupled with the enormous power of American artillery and aircraft demonstrated that even an isolated and encircled position could hold out against a superior enemy force.

In comparing the two sides' operations, Captain Harry Baig, 26th Marines Target Information Officer at Khe Sanh, later said, "Colonel Lownds employed traditional Marine tactics and doctrine of the twentieth century against an enemy who chose to put his faith and fortune in usages of the eighteenth."

A TRIBUTE TO THE VETERANS OF THE VIETNAM WAR

By Sue Staton
Winchester Sun

Since I had written several times about War II veterans, I have decided to write two columns about some of the soldiers from the Vietnam War era.

Many of these men who served in the Vietnam war are now in their 70s and I feel the need to honor them.

While this war is very close to my heart since it claimed the lives of many young men who were my own age at the time of the war, I have felt compelled to honor these military men who served.

As I have mentioned previously, Willie Aldridge and Linn Planck graduated the same year I did and both lost their lives in the Vietnam War soon after graduating from high school. Clark County lost another young man, Bobby Gentry, to the war.

To these three and all others ho never made it home from the war, I want to dedicate this column to them.

For the many veterans who did make it home alive, no one truly knows what toll this war has taken on their lives. Most of them have never been able to speak of it until recently and for some not at all.

What they experienced happened, in some cases, more than 50 years ago, but that experience is as real today as it was back then for them.

I asked Kim Wedgworth last week if he would be willing to share a little about his Vietnam experience and learned he is just now willing to talk about being in the Marines during the war. He served in the Infantry with the 3rd Battalion 9th Marine. His marine career began when he was 19 on Dec. 28, 1966.

He drew a low lottery number which meant he would be drafted soon. This was during a time when every young man who turned 18 was sent a draft notice for military service. The higher the lottery number, the less likely you would be drafted. He knew he was going to be called up soon so he and a buddy went ahead and signed up for the Marine Corp.

His military journey began with a rigorous 13-week training at Parris Island, South Carolina. From there he was sent for 17 weeks for more rigorous training at Camp Lejeune, North Carolina, and then one week to Camp Pendleton in California before being sent to the middle of the war zone of Vietnam in a place called Khe Sanh.

He told me he was thankful for the rigorous training he received before he arrived because, "it was an absolute must for survival in the war:'

I mentioned to him I had read the temperatures would soar to 100 degrees and he said, "110." He told me they had to carry a backpack that weighed around 70 pound. I shuddered inside at the thought of it.

Luckily, for a lot of guys, their homes were not equipped with air conditioners while growing up. Even so, I am sure many a soldier collapsed from heat exhaustion.

These guys may have been boys when they left home but they became tough men in just a few weeks.

Kim said it takes eight people to support one guy in the field. One of the things they were told during training before they left for Vietnam was one of them would get killed, two would be wounded and one would make it out with no visible signs of trauma.

From what I have learned all would share some type of inner turmoil from what they saw in combat and being in Vietnam. Seeing what they saw just on the internet gave me flashbacks for several days after viewing the pictures.

I asked Kim if he got to stay with the same group of people he did his training with and he said they were separated but he did see some of them when they got rotated.

He was put in the jungle of the De Militarized Zone in Khe Sanh where he endured a lot. He told me they would go on an operation where "recon" confirmed the enemy was there. The choppers would come in. It was during those times Kim realized he had to go into survival mode.

I asked Kim if he had buddies who got killed and he responded, "Yes, killed, mangled, blown up". Kim was also injured. He was shot and hit in the back side of his legs. He had shrapnel in five places. He was given a Purple Heart but when I called him a hero he made me very aware he did not want to be called a hero.

He emphatically told me, "Do not say I was a hero:' He told me the ones who didn't come back and gave their all were the true heroes of the war. He often has had survivor's remorse. He told me he often wonders why he lived and his buddies and others did not.

Kim said it was about five years before he felt any sort of normalcy after returning from the war. He still has nightmares from time to time. He also said he feels he must stay vigilant at all times since he returned from the war. He agreed it did leave its mark on him.

No matter what Kim thinks, I consider him a hero.
A guy who grew up at Kiddville and one I saw nearly every day of my life while s is the next story.

There were many guys who went to Vietnam who had never ventured very far from the community in which they lived. Such was the case of Billy Joe Trusty. His wife, Margaret, gave me permission to include him in this series.

Bill left for the Army in August 1966. He returned from Vietnam in January 1968. When he first went into the Army, he was stationed at Fort Knox, where he received his basic training. After basic training, he guarded the AWOL guys and guarded the transport of gold at Ft. Knox. He was sent from there to Ft. Polk, Louisiana. He told a story from his time there that was used for conversation many times at his home.

He and a guy had gone into town on the weekend leave and were ordering breakfast. When the waitress asked his friend how he liked his eggs, he replied, "Oh, I like them:' He was not aware she was asking him how he wanted the eggs cooked. Like I said, many young men had never left their confines of their communities.

Bill told Margaret one of his most lonely nights was laying in a top bunk overlooking the city lights in the state of Washington the night before he was flown out to Vietnam. Unlike what Kim spoke of with the Marines, he said you became friends quickly in the Army since they were the group you would be with as long as you were able to survive.
Bill also had nightmares of his time in the war.

The soldiers were told spraying Agent Orange was to kill the mosquitoes but they soon learned it was to kill the trees and vegetation there so the enemy would be in view. He told how they stayed in fox holes and the rice filled swamps where leeches would often attach to your body. He said they took their cigarettes and burned the leeches until they would drop off.

Once he got stung by a tarantula and had to be taken out of the field. He told her it was the worst headache he ever experienced He also broke his finger while loading a machine gun.

A few months before his death he told how he made money to buy his cigarettes. He purchased a hair trimmer She could hardly believe her ears when he told her this. She never ever saw him even trim a stray hair when he at one time had been so particular about himself for so many years. She got to thinking about it and realized all the haircuts were mostly burrs anyway so she thought how smart he had been.

He had always been an industrious person and worked since he was around 12 years old to make extra money. He worked for Bush Turkey farm, William Columbia, Paul Hisle and Floyd Pace farms at Kiddville.

Another of his ideas in the Army was to purchase an automatic Polaroid camera and take pictures of his Army buddies so they could send pictures of their group back home to their families. He sold those pictures for $1 each.

She displayed those pictures at his funeral and several of the guys who had been in Vietnam mentioned to her they would like to see those pictures again. Some never got any pictures at all while they were there. Bill told her normally a soldier was taken out of the field two weeks prior to their departure. However, he never got to do that since there was such a large battle going on at the time. He said he did not think he would make it home since he only had a few days before he was to leave.

He did make it home safely. He returned to the workforce and retired from Rockwell International. He no longer had to work for others and he became the owner his own farm. Billy Joe Trusty was born June 1947 and left this earth in May 2018. His wife wanted me to include that there is never enough gratitude and respect shown for the men who spent time in Vietnam and as she was writing down some notes for me, tears fell from her eyes.

The same holds true for me. Thank you guys for your service. It will not be forgotten. You are heroes in my heart. I want to end with this poem given to me by a friend. The author is unknown to me but it so sums up my personal feelings.

"What Is a Veteran? A Veteran, whether active duty, discharged, retired or reserve, is someone who, at one point in his life, wrote a blank check made payable to 'The United States of America' for an amount of 'up to, and including his life:"
That is honor. And there are way too many people in this country today who no longer understand that.

Sue Staton is a Clark County native who grew up in the Kiddville area. She is a wife, mother and grandmother who is active in her church, First United Methodist Church, and her homemakers group, Towne and Country Homemakers.

I GET MAIL

Dan,

I am a former USMC Captain that was assigned by CG 3RD Mar Div, Major General Bruno Hochmuth, to go to Khe Sanh (April-November 1967). My Job was to infiltrate 6 different overt & covert intel operations, (4 other countries, 2 in the village to get current intel so Hochmuth could better defend that base. It was quite a challenge. The only one I could not trade info was an Army CIA/ SOG with Chinese Nungs out of Saigon.

North Vietnam was their TAOR. The other 5 Lang Vei SF camps with their own TAOR in Laos, did not get to operate with, but the Montagnard Army/ CIA SOG, and USAF Air Force/CIA. I did 43 night missions Laos North Vietnam TAOR with night missions written up for DFC by Lt Col Detachment Command... It was lowered to an Air Medal w/ Special Citation. The other two were with CIA American Couple, inverted in 1958 who wrote the Bru lanquage & teaching 20 Bru how to read and write their own language. Carol was a Bru Midwife, and John was a half Assed Padre who preached on Sunday when we could talk alone. The other 2 Army lent to CIA (counter parts) were in the Ville listening to chat from Bru people for NVA activity and Bru spies.

We actually acted on his intel as we intercepted Lang Vei's CO, Frank Willobys body guard .who ran out and opened the gate for non present NVA during a fake mortar attack. The way we got intel from the traitor was another interesting story. So I did all that for 7 months was sent home in early November, 1967, shortly before MajGen Hocmuth was KIA. Hocmuth was a Mustang and was one of the finest Marines I ever met. I reported directly to him directly in those 7 months, even bypassing G-2. Prior to that 7 months I was CO of Lima & India companies 3RD Battalion 26TH Marines. whom I formed up with at Pendelton after I went to SFOC at Fort Bragg in NC.and jump school at Fort Benning GA. What Great tours I had in USMC previous 7 years.

The reason I am writing and sending a check for the KSV Scholarship Fund is (1) It's a great program as Chapter 757 did the same thing for our 3 high schools in Curry Colorado, for years.

(2) To ask you to provide me with Tom Eichler's address & phone number so I can write and or call him to congratulate him for a job well done for the organization, the Red Clay and Scholarship Program.

I do not have a computer by design, so I need phone numbers if you please. I am a Life Member of KSVA for many years but have yet to attend a reunion. My friend and fellow member of 757, Bulldog Smith tells me they are great. I have been a Board or Officer member of VVA, Chapter 757 "The Front" since 1998. I currently serve as president and into my 4th term. We are the largest combined VVA in the State of Oregon, with 260 members. National Chapter of the year 2000 Chapter 670, Regional Chapter of the year 2017 and we will run for National Chapter of the year in 2018. There is a 15 year wait to run again.

NICE ARTICLE: KHE SANH VETERAN THE WINCHESTER STAR

VALLEY PIKE: 'THE MOST HAPPY FELLA'

Sept 19, 2018

ALONG THE ROAD TO WASHINGTON, D.C. — Back in the 1950s, during the Golden Age of Broadway, there was a musical titled "The Most Happy Fella." I don't know much, if anything, about the play, except the title. Or how it may apply to a "fella" I just met, name of Bill Crawford

Bill was my seatmate on the bus two Saturdays ago when I accompanied 53 veterans on their trip to Washington, D.C., as special guests of Honor Flight Top of Virginia. And what makes him so happy? A congenital disposition to be so, I suspect, which at age 70 makes him marvel at his life.

Especially after surviving the 77-day siege of Khe Sanh (January to April 1968) during the Vietnam War's Tet Offensive. A lance corporal in the 2nd Battalion, 26th Marine Regiment, 5th Marine Division (Reinforced), Bill was the only machine gunner in his outfit — Don Schroder of Indianapolis and Jimmy Wells of Georgia were the others — to survive the siege. That's reason enough to feel fortunate, blessed, and, yes, happy. Another is that his two brothers — one a fellow Marine; the other, his twin, a Seabee — also came home.

A native of Cleveland, Bill now resides in Strasburg — which he calls a "nice little town" — with his wife of 34 years, Judith. A career Marine who served 24 years with the Corps, he later worked with the VFW as a veterans claims advocate and then with the Veterans Affairs Office-Tennessee in Nashville. Now contentedly retired, he sleeps in when he feels like it, plays golf at links throughout the Northern Valley (including the little executive course at Appleland), and smiles, laughs, and jokes ... a lot.

But all this is getting ahead of the story a bit. What about Khe Sanh?

Well, for starters, he and another Marine — Charlie Plummer of Washington, D.C. — lived in a hole, a five-foot-wide foxhole, during the siege. "Home was a hole," he says with a laugh, "and you were at home in it." Providing, of course, you didn't "open up" your machine gun except when necessary because that would allow the North Vietnamese, only 200 yards away, to zero in on you. Every day was a patrol for the men of the 2nd Battalion, ambushes were set up at night, and at all times they watched their hole and the territory, their assigned fire lanes, around it.

Luckily," says Bill, "they (the North Vietnamese) never came after us, but we lost a lot of men on Hill 881," which was about 1.000 meters away.
We got used to it . . . but what an experience for an 19-year-old," he adds.

That "experience" began a year-and-change earlier, coincidentally 52 years to the day — Sept. 8, 1966 — of the Honor Flight trip to Washington. He chose the Marines, he says, after seeing a photo in the Cleveland Plain-Dealer of a lance corporal brandishing his weapon.

Plus, he deadpans, "I was used to taking orders. I was taught by nuns. But those DIs (Marine drill instructors) scared you to death."

Those memories and those feelings live on, as no one who served in the Corps is an ex-Marine. On this particular Honor Flight, one of Bill's goals was to visit The Wall and find the names of three comrades — his fellow machine-gunners and Chaplain Robert Brett. This he accomplished through the raindrops.

On the way home, Bill talked about his family — he and his wife each have daughters from earlier marriages — and how he and Judy had a grandchild back in March. And then Bill Crawford, "The Most Happy Fella," turned philosophical.

We all wanted in (back in the '60s), to follow patriotism," he says. "Pearl Harbor, if you remember, was only 25 years out. That's just what you did."

THE SHERIDAN PRESS

DESPITE HALF CENTURY SINCE VIETNAM WAR, VETERANS REMAIN CONNECTED

By Doug Sanders|Aug. 24, 2018

SHERIDAN — John Marschall yearned for a cigarette.

The young Vietnam War soldier from Texas had been fighting for several hours in the Battle of Khe Sanh and needed a quick break.

"I crawled over to a big tree, put my back up against it and lit the cigarette," Marschall said. "There was smoke rolling out behind the tree and two guys crawled over, 'Man, give me a drag!' I could hear the bullets hitting the tree, (but) I'm going to get this cigarette."

Small luxuries were hard to come by in Vietnam for Marschall and the rest of his platoon in the 1st Air Cavalry Division, 2nd Battalion, 7th Cavalry, which faced the constant possibility of death at all turns.

Most of the platoon members survived the brutal conflicts at Khe Sanh and the fighting during the Tet Offensive, and in honor of their 50th anniversary of returning home from the war, seven veterans gathered in Sheridan for a week. They came from all over the country — Texas, Florida, California, Iowa and Illinois — to talk, laugh, argue and cry.

Local resident Richard Legocki hosted the gathering, which also included five veterans receiving Quilts of Valor Tuesday evening. Legocki put on a similar reunion in 1988 that brought 10 platoon members together.

"It's been quite a ride," Legocki said. "You're probably closer to these guys than anything. It's a brotherhood."

Most of the veterans spent two years enlisted in the army after being drafted — all when they were between the ages of 18 and 21 — and one year fighting in Vietnam for different portions of 1967 and '68.

They were part of about 10 percent of Vietnam veterans who saw armed conflict at the front lines of battle.

"That's the difference, as far as I'm concerned, between soldiers," Legocki said. "I don't think they're all created equal ... To me, it was different."

Marschall said no preparation was adequate for the environment in Southeast Asia.

"All the training in the world could not prepare you for what you actually get into," Marschall said. "I was prepared to do my job, but I was not prepared for the emotion that came with the job."

Buck Jones agreed.

"When I stepped off that airplane, it was like walking into a brick wall," Jones said. "Basically everything is dangerous. If it wasn't the other guys trying to shoot you, you had leeches, dangerous snakes and unfortunately sometimes South Vietnamese artillery."

Jones, who joined the platoon a few months after most of the other guys, was injured from shrapnel in his shoulder, leg and head but did not have any drastic physical wounds.

"I'm one of the lucky ones," Jones said. "I came home pretty much in one piece."

One piece, physically, at least. Upon returning, Jones didn't talk about his experience for 30 years. Like many veterans, he tried to forget the atrocities he had seen.

"Most guys that made the 12 months came home and hid somewhere and didn't talk about it," Jones said. "It was a bad time for the country."

Greg Molesworth also recounted the poor reception he and many other veterans received upon coming home.

"It was not the World War II homecoming I had imagined," Molesworth said.

Jones has gone to therapy for the last six years and said he's doing better, but it still isn't easy. He said Veteran's Day and Memorial Day are especially tough because he thinks about his comrades who didn't come back.

"We suffered a lot, faced a lot of casualties," Jones said. "As they say in war, good men will die. (But) good men will survive (too), and they're here.

Legocki said the intense stresses of war made him almost immune to death after a few months.

"You just filed it away forever, until you get somewhere and start thinking about it," Legocki said. "The longer you had been there, you didn't really want to know anything about the (new soldiers). You didn't want to get attached, I guess ... When they got killed, it was like, 'Eh, big deal.'"

Barry Plesser often walked in the front of the group as the point man on missions and wanted to keep everyone else safe.

"You weren't afraid for yourself," Plesser said. "You were afraid you'd miss something and get the guys hurt behind you."

The veterans said when they fought they weren't thinking of their country but were doing their best to keep each other alive.

"You weren't there for the United States of America," Plesser said. "We were there for each other ... When you're 21 years old and you got a bunch of guys looking at you who say, 'Sarge, we want to go home,' then we're going home. By the grace of God here we are today."
Legocki concurred.

"It wasn't like in the movies and, 'Oh gee, we're fighting for the flag and the United States,'" Legocki said. "It was, 'We're trying to keep everybody here alive and go home.'"

Marschall was injured in the hip and upper thigh areas by a mortar round. As his one year of service approached, Marschall wanted to go home but didn't want to leave the guys in his platoon.

"It would kind of leave a little hole in your heart, because of the friendship," Marschall said.

Spero Argyris was one of the platoon's medics.

"Whatever he says he did, times 10," Marschall said of Argyris.

Argyris was with the platoon for about six months before being wounded in August 1968, and said he was blessed to fight alongside an excellent group of men.

Steve Harris was a self-proclaimed tunnel rat, burrowing into holes and looking for weapons or opposing guerilla soldiers.

Along with Harris, Molesworth was one of two veterans who came to Sheridan this year and in 1988. Molesworth was the platoon lieutenant and called it the most rewarding job of his life to bring his men back alive.

"(Their) wives and children on more than one occasion have thanked me, and I can't be any more proud than that," Molesworth said.

Plesser hosted a reunion last year at The Villages, near Orlando, Florida, where Molesworth was married and 11 veterans served as best men.

"There was a lot of crying and a lot of beer," Plesser said. "You never really left the guys."

Marschall, though, hadn't seen some of his fellow veterans in 50 years but said they picked up conversations right away.

"You hold emotions in for so long and then, around these guys, you're not trying to hide anything," Marschall. "They all got the same st you got."

Future reunion plans aren't set in stone, but the veterans hope gather again soon to relish past memories and cherish the present camaraderie.

WHAT IS A WARRIOR

The final step in the long road home for the veteran is completing this initiation as a warrior. A veteran does not become a warrior merely for having gone to war. A veteran becomes a warrior when he learns to carry his war skills and his vision in mature ways. He becomes a warrior when he has been set right with life again. A warrior's first priority is to protect life rather than destroy it. He serves his nation in peace as well as war making and dissuades his people from suffering the scourges of war unless absolutely necessary. He uses the fearlessness he has developed to help keep sanity, generosity, and order alive in his culture.

A warrior disciplines the violence within himself. Internally and externally, he stares violence in the face and makes it back down. A warrior serves spiritual and moral principles, which he places higher than himself. The role of a warrior has a high, noble, and honorable status. From chapter 15, Initiation as a Warrior, of War and the Soul, by Edward Tick, Ph.D.

COMBAT VETERANS MAY HAVE THE ANTIDOTE TO WHAT AILS US

Excerpt from Huffington Post article By Peter Yeomans

We "overlook the depth of character and clarity of values that can emerge from life altering experiences. Veterans of war have much to offer us. Psychologist Ed Tick writes, 'civilization needs the sensitivity and valuing of life that only one who knows its fragility can develop.' Soldiers and Marines return with insights that can guide us and deepen the meaning in our own lives. We must seek to understand what they know. If we can stop long enough to listen closely and without judgment to what they may only have the nerve to whisper, we might heal some of the wounds and dysfunction of our own society."

GOD'S LOVE AND HOW HE SAVED US AT THE SIEGE BY KHE SANH VETERANS CHAPLAIN RON RAYNER

Jesus said in John 15:12-13 (NLT) "I command you to love to each other in the same way that I love you. And here is how to measure it---the greatest love is shown when people lay down their lives for their friends."

Many memorial services start with quotes from the 15th chapter of John. The Khe Sanh Veteran's founder, Reverend Ray W. Stubbe had advised me that showing God's love could be defined as, "Serving others with no expectation of compensation."

At this year's reunion memorial service, I used a quote found in KSV Larkin Spivey's book Stories of Faith and Courage from the Vietnam War on page 32.

St. Teresa of Avila (1515-1582)
"Christ has no body but yours,
No hands, no feet but yours.
Yours are the eyes with which he looks
Compassion on this world,
Yours are the feet with which he walks to do good, Yours are the hands, with which he blesses all the world." I add this last line "Yours is the smile that brightens the world around you."

The people who come to the KSV reunions reflect the above quote. In my review of the Cleveland reunion last year I quoted Patricia Scudder, wife of Lloyd "Short Round" Scudder who had said in 1995, "Two days here at this Khe Sanh Veteran's reunion had helped Lloyd more than twenty years of VA therapy." The positive attitudes and smiles that had helped "Short Round" were in abundance at the 2018 reunion.

I also talked at this year's memorial service about PFC Johnathan Nathaniel Spicer whose story can be found on the Virtual Wall. Jonathan, a conscious objector who ended up at Khe Sanh, would not kill anyone or carry a rifle but risked his life carrying causalities to the medivac planes and helicopters. He lost his life helping others and earned a Navy Cross. I also mentioned Lt. Colonel Ken Pipes and his wife Sharon who together contributed more than 30,000 hours to community service beyond Ken's Marine service. Ken, who had been awarded a Silver Star for actions at Khe Sanh once said, "Its never been about the awards or the recognition. Its always been about wanting to serve."

I am thankful Rev. Ray Stubbe represented God at the "Siege" and the years since. The Khe Sanh Veteran's, Inc. which he founded, provides the Khe Sanh Vets with a wonderful yearly get together that is so positive that four widows of Khe Sanh Vets attended this year to be with friends from past reunions. A fifth widow sent a bottle of whiskey saying her husband was with us in "spirit".

I sum up the Washington DC reunion by saying the reunion committee did a tremendous job in providing a great time for those who attended.

The Khe Sanh Veterans have been blessed by having many excellent authors among our members. I spent most of the siege on the north side of the east end of the runway in a reaction force that had replaced ARVN Rangers. I rarely saw and mostly just heard the noise when something was happening. I have only learned about the big picture at Khe Sanh by reading books by Ray Stubbe, Michael Archer, Robert (Doc) Topmiller and Larkin Spivey.

One of our Khe Sanh authors, Michael Archer had his new book, The Gunpowder Prince, in the KSV PX. Captain Mirza Munir Baig, who the book is about, was crucial in defeating the NVA during the siege. I could not put the book down. I believe it was a miracle of God that such a talented Pakistani immigrant joined the Marine Corps as a private and helped to defeat the NVA as a Marine Captain analyzing NVA troop movements. I was immediately reminded of Larkin Spivey's two books, God In The Trenches and Miracles Of The American Revolution, in which Spivey writes of the miracles that won the American Revolution and other conflicts in United States history.

It is my advice to read all four of these authors and learn just how much we needed God's help in at the siege. Michael Archer gave Chaplain Ray Stubbe credit for the tremendous amount of research he has provided in establishing a credible history of the battles around Khe Sanh.

The Reverend Ray recently sent me a letter reflecting his thoughts on turning eighty. This quote which was in the letter and is attributed to both Socrates and Abraham Lincoln, pretty much sums up my thoughts: "It's not the years in our life, but the life in our years." Enjoy each day that the Lord has given us.

Numbers 6:24-26 (NLT): "May the Lord bless you and protect you. May the Lord smile on you and be gracious to you. May the Lord show you his favor and give you his peace."

KHE SANH MEMBER GUEST SPEAKER AT MARINE CORPS GRADUATION CEREMONY 18020

BY JAMES M. "OLLIE" COLLINS,USMC KHE SANH VETERAN A CO 1/26

"Remarks"

U.S. Naval Station, "Marine Corps Detachment" Newport, Rhode Island

ALTIS - Aviation Logistics Tactical Information Systems "Specialist Course", Graduation Ceremony for Class 18020

Good Morning;

Colonel, Seigh, Commanding Officer
Major; Bueno; Executive Officer
1stSgt; Biato; Detachment First Sergeant
MSG; Shawn Lee: Academy, SNCOIC
GYSGT; Kean Jr; Academy Class 18020 NCOIC
Sgt; Rosario; Assistant Class NCOIC
Academy Instructors
Chaplin; Hodges, Naval Base Chaplin, Newport R.I.

Distinguished guests, and most importantly the family and friends who have also sacrificed and forfeited their own time to encourage, inspire and support the graduates during their time at the academy.

First, I would like to personally address the graduates!

It is my honor and privilege to congratulate each...

graduate on their completion of the 2018 ALTIS Specialist Course, Class 18020. I would like to remind the graduates that this is just another stage of your military educational requirements, and I might add, has been successfully achieved. Although! as you look to the future, as you evolve I urge you to continue pursuing your military opportunities... ultimately... this will produce... limitless dividends down the road. "YOU SHOULD BE VERY PROUD OF YOURSELVES."

"A JOB WELL DONE"! CONGRATULATIONS AGAIN, MARINES!!

I was invited here today and asked to share in some experiences "both personal and militarily," that date back over 5 decades.

I live it "literally" every single day! I'll try not to bore you! I'll attempt to take you on a very short journey... this fine morning, sharing awareness of things that were factual and contrary to certain beliefs about my Vietnam War experience and the War itself, in addition to several other significant events.

But before I do that ...I would offer some personal insight about myself. My adolescent years! I was extremely out of control... I was a very unhappy little tyke, with virtually no path to success. Family life was non, existent, lacking mentorship, guidance and much more. The path to delinquency was easier for me, rather than a successful and happier life to pursue. My yearning and desire for education while attending a Jr High school was nothing more than unpleasant and just consuming my time, while living a life of hopelessness and deprivation. "Trouble was my middle name."

Then came the incident at school.....I was involved "fist fighting" in the corridor of the school during classes.. again! My parents were notified. I was expelled from school. My mother by this time, certainly had enough of me. The very next day.... a Truant Officer, (Mr. Noone), a fair, respected, admired individual and well known in the neighborhood, was at our door, leaving a document, stating that a parent and I were to appear before a Juvenile Judge Magistrate to answer for my repeated disruptions during school hours. Either way, Mr. Noone, probably saved my life one way or the other. I remember Mr., Noone, and his stern warnings to me, from time to time "If I didn't shape up, trouble would eventually follow." I now, was certainly "front and center" of his caution with little or no options left."

To complement a twist to this story, in 1976, I would graduate from the Worcester Police Academy "Shoulder to Shoulder" alongside Mr., Noone's son, Paul Noone, as we received our Graduation Diploma and Official Police Badge together with forty nine other "Recruit Police Officers."

Who, possibly could have imagined that. Unbelievable scenario, to say the least!!!!

At the scheduled closed-door meeting with a probation officer I was given two alternatives;

1. Enlist in the military service or.....
2. If another incident like this is repeated, it could lead to a reform school placement decision.

I thought to myself, I was 16 years old, I cannot enlist in any branch of military service?
My mother and I walked out into a waiting room area and was approached by two Marine Recruiters.

To this day, I believe that they were there, intentionally or on purpose! Long story short after having conversation with the Marine recruiters, we were informed that, even though 16 years old, I could take advantage of a new enlistment program called 90-day delayed entry. In a "nut shell" If I passed the entrance exam requirements, then, 90 days before my seventeenth birthday I could sign a contract, to enlist in the United States Marine Corps, and leave for Paris Island, South Carolina on my 17th birthday. I said to myself, enlist for 4 years active duty and I would be discharged 3 months earlier....

What did I know...sounded good...and it sounded even better to my mother. My parents signed the enlistment contract. I took the test, passed and enlisted in the US Marine Corps on April 22, 1965. What a wakeup call!!Paris Island literally changed my life forever. I was a different person after graduation. I felt an overwhelming accomplishment and achievement even in the face of all that adversity, misfortune and years of hardship by way of my youth. I now had the ability to shape my life... and be who I desired to be!! And pursue my education with purpose, determination and excitement.

After graduating from Paris Island, Boot Camp and successfully completing the Advanced Infantry Training Regiment, ITR training program at Camp Geiger, a satellite facility of Camp Lejeune, North Carolina, I received my official military assignment orders. I was to be transferred to the 1st Battalion 8th Marines. While a member of 1/8, I made a 6-month Mediterranean Cruise, traveling all over Europe and visiting many "ports-of-call." What an eye opener! There was truly a wonderful world out there.

In 1966, the Vietnam war was escalating. I received orders for Vietnam in September of 1966. I would be deployed and transferred to Alpha Company 1st Battalion 26th Marine Regiment, vicinity Hill 55, Danang to include Death Valley and Liberty bridge, the TAOR "Tactical area of Responsibility".

The 26th Marine Regiment had a three-fold mission, of occupying and defending key terrain, seeking out and destroying the enemy (the Viet Cong) while attempting to engage in an intensive pacification program.

Hill 55, Danang, in 1965 & 1966 was identified as a TAOR with the most densely mined Hill, in I Corps. No other hill or area that would be cleared for a combat base; came anywhere close, regarding encountering the number of emplaced mines, when clearing, as was the case at Hill 55. The enemy, over-mined Hill 55, trying to keep the Marines away for as long as possible from this most strategic elevation. The enemy fully understood that Hill 55 was most instrumental to the Marines in hindering a major communist attack against the vital Da Nang, Airstrip.

Well hidden, yet undetected, emplaced mines from 1965, would detonate, maim, kill and/or be found periodically at Hill 55. Already completing 6 months of my units occupation and many wounded and KIA's from booby traps and other explosive mines, then word came down from the chain of command to get ready to move out in a few hours. Prior to moving to another location, Viet Cong infiltrators were probing the perimeter of Hill 55 when a Marine tripped a booby trap and all hell broke loose. Two Marines from the platoon were wounded to include myself.

(Our company) A/1/26 was extracted by helicopter and inserted in a place called "Phu Bai" on another operation. After defending Phu Bai's perimeter for several days, the unit suddenly received a message to saddle-up! Destination, a place called Khe Sanh, Demilitarized Zone, I Corps "Tactical Area of Responsibility" a place, none of us ever heard of. The following account is cited by my Platoon Commander, Lt., John M. Kaheny, 3rd Platoon Commander A/1/26. I was the "Platoon Guide" at the time.

Lt Kaheny: When we arrived on C-130's at the KSCB "Khe Sanh Combat Base" it was a very eerie experience and terrifying experience. As the ramp of the aircraft came down we looked out onto the airstrip winding down this long dirt road towards the mountains was all the walking wounded from the hill fights. There were probably five to six hundred Marines standing in line, all bandaged up one way or the other, covered with blood and mud.
I had to take my platoon off the airplane and march them down this long road to an assembly point, Hardly anyone was saying a word. It was terrifying. We set out to defend 881 South against a possible counterattack and that's when we found all the Broken M16 rifles that hadn't worked, scores of helmets with the crown of the helmet shot out with AK -47 rounds, and literally scores of dead NVA bodies. It was a real graveyard.

We had been fighting the Viet Cong along the coastline. And we hadn't seen anything like that at all. It was a gorgeous place, beautiful at a distance when we went on patrol from day to day we would just continue to find more and more dead NVA bodies. And of course, the stench was ungodly. It was also difficult for the young Marines because when we found those broken M16 rifles, it kind of gave us a hint that the new M16,s that we'd gotten weren't working all that well. And we found that to be true a couple of weeks later when my platoon and then all of bravo company got into it with the NVA west of 881 South. When my platoon got hit about 20% of our rifles jammed after the first shot. Some of them were cleared some of them were totally useless. We were very lucky.

When bravo company went out about two weeks later, they got caught in a churning movement and got badly chewed up. About 10 percent of their M16's went down. They replaced the M16's eventually with other models and that situation eventually resolved itself.

We then were assigned our defensive positions. Marines from A/1/26 began daily Long Range (rotating) combat patrols around the Hills and "Khe Sanh Combat Base" with periodic contact with North Vietnamese forces and NVA snipers.

21 May 1967:

Lt Kaheny, 3rd Plt Leader, led his 43-man patrol from A-3 into a Valley just west of Hill 881-South to examine a heavy trail reported by an AO "Air Observer." The patrol moved into grid coordinates XD 756 454 and was suddenly attacked by a large volume of fire from four different locations. Two young Marines, each 18 years old, PFC Thomas Hendershott and L/Cpl Roger Hurd, stood up stood fast, and fired into a charging NVA force, taking the full force and dying so the rest of the patrol could escape and live.

Epitaph; by Lt John Kaheny; "A Marine Remembers On Memorial Day" Suddenly, the Cat of death leaps from a tree line on the exposed flank of the platoon. Two young rifleman, each but 18 years old, shun available cover, stand up, stand fast and fire into the charging horde. Taking the full force of the enemy's assault, they purchase with their blood a precious gift of reaction time for their fellow Marines and Corpsman. Helmets fade slowly away into chest high grass and soon disappear from view.

Eventually forty-one make it back to safety, some bleeding, none broken, but the two go on home, to rest forever beneath marble crosses. Their names, Private First Class Thomas Edward Hendershott and Lance Corporal Roger Michael Hurd, are now etched in stone on that wall beneath Lincoln's watchful eye. The years have passed but every day I see their sacrifice reflected in the smiling faces on my children. For had not those two brave Marines, held their ground with everything they had, Coleen, Meghan and John Peter simply would not be, because one of those they saved that day was me!

Over a month later:

27 June 1967; Just past midnight, @ 0035, Khe Sanh Combat Base received more than 50 rounds of 82mm mortars, killing 4 and wounding 76, and killing one Vietnamese ARVN Liaison Officer. The mortars were walked up and down the tent areas of A Battery, 1/13, killing 2 and wounding 30, including the Fire Direction Officer and CO of the battery. Capt., Brennan.

At 0525, the base was again hit, with approximately 50 rounds of 122mm rockets. Newly-arrived Marines of 3/26, sleeping in tents, were hit, especially the 3/26 Battalion Aide Station. a USAF AO spotted mortar positions near hill 689 just west of the Khe Sanh air strip, at day break, and a patrol from CAC "O" was dispatched to investigate. The patrol became pinned down in an ambush and took 3 friendlies killed, in the initial burst. An artillery mission enabled the patrol to withdraw, causing one wounded Marine who shortly thereafter died. 2 Marines returned to the hill. Searching for the wounded and friendly dead. 2 Marines had been left on the hill, one returned, the other was missing.

Cpt Bynum, CO of I/3/26, was shot by an NVA sniper as he neared the top of 689, wounds which eventually prove fatal. Soon there after hill 689 was seized by the Marines and the 2 CAC O KIA were recovered.

2/Lt., Larry Bolger was killed when Capt., Norm Centers, Company Commander, put the Alpha Company 1/26 behind the artillery battery and laid them out in the grass without digging in, and those Marines got butchered by that mortar attack.

I stand before you today as a survivor of these multiple catastrophic events. But only by the grace of God almighty, I Sgt "Collins" was spared from the bees' nest of rockets, shrapnel and bullets. But still haunted by the screams of those wounded and the smell of lingering sulfur from the many detonated mortar and rocket rounds that poured down on us.

Just prior to the NVA rocket attack both Sgt Paul Kincaid and I we're having conversation about what he might do when he returned to the states. He was a "short timer" and was ordered to stay beyond his rotation date. His tour was over and was about to leave the Company when we returned from our combat mission. It was not to be. I will always remember and will never forget his heroism and sacrifice. Knowing most of these warriors...they would agree that their story and fate should be told for the sacrifice they made for freedom, democracy and a better way of life for others. To this day, I am still in contact with Sgt Kincaid's immediate family.

I now will "Memorialize" those Marines who gave the ultimate sacrifice June 27, 1967! by citing their names, here, at U.S. Naval Base, Marine Corps Detachment, Newport, Rhode Island, 14 June, 2018.

May these " Warriors" continue to Rest In Peace!

November/1967;

After spending 6 months at Khe Sanh, I departed Khe Sanh Combat Base on a C-130. Looking down from the rear end of the Air Craft, was chilling. First, wondering if we were going to be targeted by the NVA and shot out of the sky. My emotions took over, my eyes swelled with tears, then I began feeling guilt-ridden, distressed by the thought of leaving our brother Marines behind and knowing that the worst was yet to come.....the Siege of "Khe Sanh."

We Landed in Danang, Air Base. After several days of out-Processing, we were in the air again, destination, Kadena Air Force Base, Okinawa. Upon arrival we were told by S-1 Administration Officer, that there were no flights going to CONUS "Continental United States" at least for a week or so. This was bad and unfortunate news. A Marine 1Sgt addressed the group and provided some advice.

Recommendation; get to the Officers Club, ask anyone there, if they could get us on a flight to the states. It happened!! Two pilots approached us....and stated "we can take you to the states, but it has to be by C-130 and buckled to the interior of the air craft for the flight duration. The 14 Marines took the offer.

Next morning 0600hrs we were loaded and in the air, destination; Santiago International Air Port. We landed at the airport in the early evening. Still on the tarmac, suddenly, one of the pilots addressed us. Hear this! We cannot disembark, we have violent Anti-Vietnam demonstrations all over the airport. Not safe. What a disappointment.

In the air again!

Destination; Adak, Alaska, Naval Air Facility/ in the Aleutians Islands. We spent several days at the Naval Facility! Back in the air! Destination, Dover Air Force base, Dover, Delaware. finally, back in the states. We were supplied transportation to the Bus station. One of the Marines grabbed a newspaper and was somewhat visibly upset. Front page, "another serviceman struck by hit & run driver." We were in our tropical uniform! That was enough said, we grabbed our "duffle bags" headed for the bathroom at the bus station .

As we took turns changing from our tropical uniforms to our civilian clothes ... all the while thinking....we were going to be targeted, because we represented the military service. We threw the sea bags in the belly of the bus and we were on our way home. Although, staying vigilant and cautious. We felt that we were outcasts ..frightening was a light term!

Sadly, there were no "ticker tape or confetti" parades or welcome home acknowledgments for the returning "Vietnam Veterans." We were cast as baby killers, war mongers , spit upon, eggs and garbage thrown on them and simply rebuked. At the very least, returning servicemen if not vilified, were certainly not well received.

Most tried to slip quietly into a normal pattern and tried to hide the fact they served in Vietnam, to avoid the anger and disdain of many. I believe to this day that those who demonstrated against the Vietnam War....are still out there! I often wonder? have they ever changed there "intellectual mindset"??

In closing; undeniably, without question, influencing the entire Marine Corps concept, is a thing called "Values" We, perpetuate them.. we protect them and we promote them. I urge and encourage you.... to continue promoting your Marine Corps "Values" for "It matters not how a Marine Dies"!

But it does matter, how they Live" All the things we call values prepare us as Marines for the very choices that will ultimately define our character. What a Marine is, is more important then what a Marine has....and our bottom line...our true worth is what we are! Thank You for this honor... to have had the opportunity to share some of my most guarded personal chronicles and accounts of 51 years past... which I have never done in a venue such as this. God Bless America!!!!! & the United States Marine Corps!

LOCAL MAN TO BE INDUCTED INTO OKLAHOMA MILITARY HALL OF FAME

By Kenton Brooks /
kcbrooks@muskogeephoenix.com
Nov 2, 2018

Mark Downing knows exactly what he's going to be doing Saturday at the 19th annual Oklahoma Military Hall of Fame induction ceremony in Norman.
"I'll probably be crying," he said, trying to hold back tears. "I'm so happy for him. He died so I wouldn't have to go, because I'm the only surviving son. I tried to enlist, but they wouldn't let me. I want Kelly to get everything he deserves."

Mark Downing shows two of his brother's medals he received in the Marine Corps. The Purple Heart is on the left, and the Silver Star is on the right.

Downing's older brother William Kelly Downing will be one of the 10 inductees in the 2018 class to be recognized. Kelly, the older Downing by four years, was a corporal in the U.S. Marine Corps. He was killed in a battle on a hill near Khe Sanh, South Vietnam, on May 3, 1967.

Kelly Downing was one of two fighters to receive the Silver Star from that battle. He later received the Purple Heart. His brother Mark proudly displays those and other medals his brother received in a memorial in a room at his home.

Mark's wife Johnna tells the story about her brother -in-law because she knows how it affects her husband.

"They were about to be taken over, and a bunch of them were wounded," she said. "They brought in a helicopter and Kelly told them to take all of the wounded first. When they came back to get him, he was dead. He had six Vietnamese dead around him before they killed him."

Mark has never forgotten that day when he and his family got the word his brother had been killed.

"I was a junior in high school, and these two Marines drove up in a car," he said. "I didn't know what was going on. The Marines told my mom it was a bad deal. It was two weeks before they brought him home."
Mark also doesn't hesitate to say that his brother was his hero.

"I would shag fly balls for him at almost all of his games," he said. "He played baseball constantly. If it was raining, he would be out in the rain. Kelly was an awesome catcher, and I would go watch him play and there would be scouts all around him. He would carry baseballs in his pocket."

There are 188 inductees in the Hall of Fame, located in Edmond. Downing isn't the only area soldier who is in the Hall of Fame. The others include Pfc. John N. Reese Jr. of Muskogee and Lt. Col. Orville Munson of Tahlequah of the US Army.

The Okay High School baseball field and a portion of Oklahoma 251A that goes through the town are named for Downing.

"I just want people to know that he was a very good guy," Mark said.

VALOR IN COMBAT
BY KELLY BLACK
BITTERSWEET

ROBERT MOXLEY, USMC
KHE SANH VETERAN
DELTA CO 1/9

The Bronze Star, the Navy Commendation, two Purple Hearts: the medals are bittersweet to Bob Moxley. In six months of intensive fighting in the jungles of Vietnam, Moxley earned numerous medals for valor in combat. "I look at all those medals and all I see is death and pain," said Moxley. Christmas morning 1968 eighteen year old Moxley landed near the demilitarized zone in Vietnam. He was assigned to the 1st Battalion 9th Marines, nicknamed, "The Walking Dead."

A man leaving said to him, "You're a dead man. Nobody makes it out of there."

The Walking Dead had a 72 percent casualty rate. "I was just a kid," said Moxley.

A recent graduate of Tigard High School in Portland, Ore. Moxley had planned to enroll in Oregon State University's forestry program. Instead he was conscripted for boot camp in San Diego and after just eight weeks of training sent to Da Nang, Vietnam.

"They called us shake and bake, because they had to have warm bodies in Vietnam," said Moxley.

Moxley was sent up into the highlands to fight the North Vietnamese Army where the triple canopy was so thick the squad had to hack through it with machetes. In the heat and humidity Moxley treked mountainsides with over 100 pounds on his back: six canteens of water, a M-16 rifle, 20 magazines, 200 extra rounds of ammunition, 100 rounds of ammunition for the machine gun, one mortar round, C-4 explosives for the engineers, a Claymore mine, a LAWS rocket, six hand grenades, a five day supply of sea rations in cans, a flak jacket with fiberglass panels for body armor, a body bag that served as a poncho and a heavy helmet.

He was shot for the first time two days after his 19th birthday.

In February 1969, Operation Dewey Canyon in A Shau Valley on the Lao Ocean border saw thousands of NVA troops heavily fortified with tanks, mortar teams and artillery rockets. Helicopters were coming in with five guys hanging from a rope. The squad leader said to Moxley, "Those are dead bodies coming in from A Shau Valley and we're going there tomorrow."

On February 26, 1969 the fighting started at 9:00 a.m. A machine gun bunker part way up the hill had the whole platoon pinned down. Lieutenant Simms said to Moxley, "Take your team and take the hill." To avoid being easy targets for enemy machine guns, the men would stagger running. When the squad leader called a man's name; he would get up, run forward and drop down.

Lieutenant Simms and two others were killed right off. A rocket-propelled grenade came at Moxley who dove in a log deck. A bullet round blew out his eardrum and another caught him in the head and blew him backwards. Dazed Moxley tried to wipe the sweat from his eyes and got blood. His helmet had a gapping hole.

"I've been shot in the head," Moxley realized.

Moxley thought he was dying and decided to charge the NVA machine gun bunker with his M-16.

The NVA also thought Moxley was dead. He caught them by surprise, rushed the hill and before they could reposition the machine gun at him, threw a grenade into the bunker. The bunker was part way up Hill 1044.

Hill 1044 is known as one of the largest supply depots of weapons and ammunitions captured during the war.

"I was the first one on it," said Moxley. He got to the other side of the bunker and lay down, bleeding profusely.

Moxley was awarded a Bronze Star with combat V for taking out the NVA machine gun bunker and saving numerous American lives. His commander told him, "We counted 34 dead and you got most of them."

Later while Moxley was waiting for a medevac chopper, Captain Riley asked the group of wounded if anyone could fight one more night. Numbers were very low due to casualties. Moxley knew the NVA would try to take back the hill. Concerned that his comrades would be overrun, he volunteered to stay. Riley put his arm around Moxley and said, "Damn, you are one hell of a marine. I love you."

Moxley was good at making decisions during combat. He was quickly put in charge of first a team of three and then a squad of 15 men.

"I accepted I would never make it home," said Moxley. "I would take a bullet for any of them. They knew that."

Moxley remembers being out in the jungle with no food, no supplies and no bullets. They would dig roots from the ground to eat and squeeze water from banana tree bark. At night bugs veraciously attacked but they could not slap them for fear of alerting the nearby NVA.

In April, Moxley was sent back to Hill 1044 for Operation Apache Snow. On May 6, 1969 Moxley lost a very good friend and displayed valor in combat that earned him the Navy Commendation.

Under heavy fire, Moxley's good friend Bill Prose had thrown his helmet over a grenade lobbed into his foxhole. When the grenade detonated it blew Prose's face, shoulder and leg off. Another man, Private Turner, lost his foot. Their team leader froze.

Moxley heard his friend screaming for help, as did the enemy. Moxley tried to get to the foxhole. Flares lit up the night sky, Moxley saw three NVA soldiers staring down at him. He dove and rolled; one of their bullets took three of his fingernails off. At the foxhole Moxley started shooting enemy fighters up in the trees. He got tourniquets on the legs of Turner and Prose. He carried Prose to the medic only to be told, "You brought me a dead man."

Later Captain Riley told Moxley he would recommend him for a medal for his courage under fire and credit him with 17 confirmed kills. Moxley did not care. He was tired of war. The enemy was close by but he took off his helmet and flak jacket, and sat on a log where Prose died.

He told Lieutenant Gene Smith, "I'm tired of war. I don't want to kill anybody else. I don't want to see my buddy's die anymore."

Years later Moxley finally accepted the Navy Commendation with valor in combat for taking control of the foxhole and rescuing Prose and Turner.

In fact, Moxley refused the medals for many years before allowing his sons Robert and Jason, then 14 and 12 years old, to pin them on him at the Marine Corp base in Portland, Ore. in 1988. 200 marines stood at attention.

"There is no glory in war," said Moxley. "Nobody wins in a war. Everybody loses tremendously."

Moxley feels angry that as an eighteen year old his country would not allow him to drink a beer or vote but deemed him mature enough to fight a war and kill people. Most troubling to Moxley are his memories of the wounded NVA soldiers reaching out for help.

"They were just like us," said Moxley. "They just wanted to go home as bad as we did."

Moxley had to shoot them in the head. If they were left alive they might get a weapon and sneak up behind.

"I can still feel their hands grabbing hold of me to help them," said Moxley. It gives him nightmares. "I portray myself as a tough marine," said Moxley, "but I tell you I have a heart as big as the world and it hurts knowing what I did over there."

Moxley does not understand why smart, educated people choose war.

"There has got to be a better way to do it instead of bloodshed," said Moxley.

Moxley lost his whole squad on June 12, 1969 during Operation Utah Mesa at Khe Sanh, one year after the big siege. At 9:00 p.m. Moxley and seven of his men were out of ammunition and on patrol. Hundreds of the NVA were close by.

The enemy was setting booby traps—an artillery round in the fork of a tree detonated with a trip wire. When the squad tripped the wire two men, including his best friend David Palmeri, were killed instantly. It was an ambush. The enemy started shooting at them and throwing grenades. Moxley's left leg was badly hit and he was shot in the right arm and shoulder. He used one bootlace to tourniquet his arm and the other his leg. His men were either dead or severely wounded.

"I can still hear my men crying for help," said Moxley.

The enemy swarmed over them. Moxley was bayoneted and shot several times in the groin. He thought to himself, "Hell Mox, the war is over. They got me."

Finally the rest of the platoon pushed off the ambush. The first helicopter took out the wounded. The second, called the dead chopper, took the dead out in body bags.

Moxley remembers the corpsman looked at him and said, "He's dead."

Lieutenant Smith said, "Bag him and tag him." He was crying. In a body bag on the dead chopper, the gunner who protects the helicopter must have sat on Moxley who squealed. The gunner ripped the body bag open and screamed to the pilot, "We got a warm one."

Moxley spent over one year in the hospital system getting put back together. He had malaria and dysentery. He nearly lost both his arm and leg. He left leg is partially paralyzed and parts of his knee are artificial.

From six months of intensive action Moxley would earn numerous medals including the Bronze Star, the Navy Commendation and two purple hearts.Moxley returned to a political climate in America where veterans were stereotyped as warmongers and killers. He felt the scorn. He would tell people his leg injury was from a car accident.

In 1999 Moxley traveled to Vietnam for one month with Colonel Bulldog Smith and two other Special Forces veterans. They took 5,000 pounds of medical supplies to distribute to clinics in small villages where there had been battles during the war in the northern part of South Vietnam.

"I thought there would be so much animosity," said Moxley.

Instead Moxley met a beautiful and proud people who night after night insisted on buying him dinner and beer.

"I was dumbfounded," said Moxley.

Moxley had dinner at the home of a Colonel from the North Vietnamese army who fought in a battle against Moxley. The Colonel spoke pretty good English and asked Moxley, "Why? Why did we have to kill each other?"

"I have no answers," said Moxley.

He got down on his knees and kissed Moxley's hands.

"There is not an hour that goes by that I don't think about that war and the friends I lost," said Moxley. Moxley wants his gravestone to read: The war is finally over.

OBIT

JOSEPH "HANK" MELANSON, USMC KHE SANH VETERAN F& E CO 2/26

Sadly my brother Hank Passed away this past Saturday morning in Spokane Washington. A great Brother and Friend who I will miss very much. I will miss our long talks about life and the universe, I will miss being able to call him and tell him that I love him and hoped he could visit soon. I will miss exchanging jokes in emails and mostly I will miss being able to just call him anytime to just talk. He is a Marine and a Vietnam Vet, he worked hard his whole life and was always helping with things like Toys for Tots, going down to south America to help build schools in third world countries, he was a Mason and a Shriner and a dedicated Father and to his mate Kirsten for over 18 years. After he left the military, he worked for a local company named Raytheon for many years maintaining aircraft and then went on into the management aspects of aircraft maintenance operations. A guy from Fitchburg who would run ultra marathons (100) miles and make it, his goal was not to be in first place, but just to be able to finish it. So all I guess I can say now is until we meet again. Love you always Hank Melanson a great brother and a great friend...

OBIT

ROBERT H. ROGERS, USMC
KHE SANH VETERAN HQ BTRY 1/13

Robert H. Rogers of East Marion died July 22 in New York. He was 71.

The son of Henry and Kathryn Kane Rogers, he was born Nov. 23, 1945, in New York.

He earned a master's degree and served in the U.S. Marine Corps, was a Vietnam Veteran and a member of the American Legion Post in Southold.

Family members said he loved boating and fishing, and achieved his dream of living near the water after moving with his wife, Maureen, to East Marion in 2014. He was also an avid gardener and horticulturist. In addition, he was a linguist, whose favorite phrase was "Illegitmi Non Carborundum," Latin for "Don't let the bastards grind you down."

Mr. Rogers is survived by his wife, Maureen, of East Marion; daughters Christine Rogers Saenz of Centereach and Allison Rogers Chimienti of Glen Cove; his son, Robert, of Miller Place and nine grandchildren. Interment at Calverton National Cemetery.

Memorial donations may be made to the American Legion, 51655 Route 25, Southold, NY 11971.

OBIT

RICHARD F. DWORSKY, CAPTAIN, USMC KHE SANH VETERAN INDIA CO 3/26 HILL 881S

Dr. Dickie, Captain USMC from Steamboat and Anchorage, died November 5th returning from a pheasant-hunting trip taken with friends he'd known for over 55 years. Richard was born in Lebanon, Missouri, August 13, 1942 where his parents Leonard and Diana Dworsky were stationed at Ft. Leonard Wood during WWII. He attended Lincoln High School in Portland Oregon, graduated from the University of Michigan in 1965 (Forestry), playing football and developing unreserved affection for the Wolverines. He received his Master's degree in Natural Resources from Colorado State University in 1972, and his Ph.D. in Forestry from the University of Massachusetts 1986.

Over his career, Richard spent 37 years in Alaska, 15 with the Bureau of Land Management working to effectively manage and preserve the lands of the western US and Alaska. He met his wife Sally while living in Waitsfield, Vermont, directing projects for the New England River Basin Commission, and skiing at Mad River Glen. Before that, he was the Director of Forestry for the Department of Natural Resources San Juan, Puerto Rico, the Maryland Land Use Specialist for the Interstate Commission of the Potomac River, and Natural Resources Planner for the Genesee Finger Lakes Regional Planning Board in Rochester New York.

Richard was proud to have served as an officer in the United States Marine Corps, Basic School 5-67, serving in Vietnam from 1967-1970, 3rd Battalion, 26th Marines as Rifle Platoon and Company Commander. He was a reserve officer from 1970 to 1977. A decorated combat hero with numerous personal citations, his actions with India Company on Hill 881S during the siege of Khe Sanh earned him the Bronze Star, the Navy Commendation Medal, and the Vietnamese Cross of Gallantry. Additional citations include the Combat Action Ribbon, Presidential Unit Citation Ribbon, the National Defense Medal, and 3 Purple Hearts. He maintained important friendships with his brothers-in-arms throughout his entire life, and recently wrote in a newspaper article, "I didn't pick the men I fought with but I have an attachment to them that cannot be described – and I have the same attachment to those who carry on today. Never have I given anyone the trust I gave these men."

Richard's entire professional and intellectual career reflected his deep respect for the natural world. Like his father and his brothers, he focused on the planning and management of water and land resources, balancing the needs of people and nature. He authored numerous professional papers, and was a member of the American Water Resources Association, as well as Rotary International in Anchorage East, the Michigan Alumni Association, Trout International and the Rocky Mountain Angling Club.

He was an excellent charismatic friend and raconteur; a skier, an avid hunter, an expert marksman, an adventurous traveller, and an accomplished fly fisherman. Pursuing trout, bonefish and salmon worldwide with his fly rod was his passion. In Alaska, he volunteered at Alpenglow Ski Area skiing with veterans and individuals with special needs. He was a genuine scholar and a voracious reader of history of all kinds focusing on military, American, and natural history. Richard carried on his family's legacy: public service to his country, care for the world around him, steadfast affection for colleagues and friends, and an unwavering devotion to his family.

KHE SANH VETERANS IN THE NEWS

WILLIAM 'BILL' FULTINEER OF LEWIS COUNTY, WV, PUTS MILITARY SACRIFICES ABOVE HIS OWN

by Jonathan Weaver STAFF WRITER
Nov 13, 2018

JACKSON'S MILL — The details about his military service during the Vietnam War aren't important to William "Bill" Fultineer. He recognizes the service and sacrifice of all of his fellow Marines and soldiers.

A lance corporal in the U.S. Marine Corps, Fultineer specifically fought at the combat base in Khe Sanh.

"When the Tet Offensive happened, we were real busy," Fultineer said

The North Vietnamese People's Army and Viet Cong soldiers attacked dozens of South Vietnamese cities in January and February 1968, including Khe Sanh

"Out of my platoon, seven of us made it home," Fultineer said. He estimated the platoon was comprised of about 35 Marines, with most of the casualties coming during the Tet Offensive.

Fultineer received his first Purple Heart for wounds inflicted by hand grenades and gunfire while he was patrolling Hill 950 in July 1967. Hill 950 was located at Khe Sanh, near the North Vietnam border.

He received a second Purple Heart for rescuing a fellow Marine. Fultineer was shot by a North Vietnamese sniper during his rescue.

Fultineer's third Purple Heart was received for his actions during the Tet Offensive. During intense gunfire and mortar fire, he evacuated 30 children from Khe Sanh. He was wounded by shrapnel in the process

He received other medals and commendations but refused to specify.

"There are a lot of guys that are worse off than me. ... When our country needed us and called us, we went willingly," he said.

His medals are displayed in the Mountaineer Military Museum along Center Avenue in Weston. Fultineer knows several other veterans memorialized in the museum, and said it is no longer difficult to view their photographs.

People in that museum will never grow old. They'll always be young."

Fultineer doesn't talk about his service with his wife of 49 years, Dixie, 48-year-old son or his 43-year-old daughter.

"If they asked a question, I would answer it," Fultineer said. "I didn't decide to keep them away from it, but it was just something we didn't talk about. My fellow Purple Hearters and I will talk about it, but that's about it.

"I didn't sacrifice anything more than anybody else did there"

Dixie said she is proud of her husband's service.

"It makes me appreciate the fact that people were willing to endanger their lives to keep this country free," she said.

Fultineer, who turned 72, will occasionally talk with youth about his service, but doesn't talk in detail.

After graduating from Weston High School in 1964, Fultineer went to Glenville State College before enlisting in the Marine Corps in 1966. Along with being a football and baseball athlete, he finished his English and physical education degree in January 1971 after his service.

"The Marine Corps had a 13-month hitch that we had to serve in Vietnam. I came back home after that 13 months and I was back on duty for about two months before letting me out early to go back to college. I came home with nothing but the clothes on my back," Fultineer said. "Glenville State College had a lot of veterans there at that time. I knew them all."

Bill and Dixie met while both enrolled at Glenville State. She graduated in 1969, and they were married that July.

He taught language arts for five years, three years at Weston Junior High (which was formerly located in the spot of the current CVS Pharmacy on High Street) and two at Harrisville High School in Ritchie County before becoming a self-employed insurance agent in Martinsville.

Fultineer retired in 1997 after 20 years. He became a member of VFW Post 1976 a dozen years ago.

MUSICK HAULED AMMO DURING SERVICE IN VIETNAM

ABINGDON, Va. — Roger Musick was in a convoy hauling ammunition down the Ho Chi Minh Trail in Vietnam toward a gun position near Khe Sanh.

Although it hadn't rained for days, Musick spotted a mud puddle in the middle of the road. He realized the puddle concealed a landmine, and he jumped out of the truck before being hit.

We buried ourselves on each side of the road while the shrapnel went over the top of us," he said. "We didn't get a scratch. There was mud on each side of the road, and we came out really muddy."

Musick, 73, began his service in the Army by volunteering in September 1965 when he was 20 years old. He served for two years and achieved the rank of private. He left for Vietnam in September 1966. He served in that war with the First Battalion 40th Field Artillery on the Vietnamese Demilitarized Zone. His job during the war was running ammunition to Marines.

Sometimes, his unit was under fire while trying to deliver ammunition. During one incident, they were hauling ammo in a C123 cargo plane to a base in Khe Sanh. We rolled the ammo out of the cargo plane without the plane coming to a stop," he said. "We had to have the ammo out and the tailgate shut while we had enough runway left to get airborne again. We had to avoid being hit by incoming artillery fire is why we had to do it without stopping."

Musick served in the Vietnam War for one year, leaving the battlefield in September 1967. He was assigned to Fort Wainwright in Fairbanks, Alaska. He left the service in 1968 and traveled back to Abingdon in his 1959 F100, which he bought and repaired himself. He has worked on automobiles as a hobby ever since.

He retired as a building contractor. Musick still lives in Abingdon and is the proud grandfather of six.

A few years ago, he made a trip to Washington, D.C., to visit the Vietnam War Memorial. It was something he wanted to do for a long time. His son, Michael, was living and working in D.C. at the time and went with his father.

He spent a long time there," Michael Musick said. "He read through the names and looked at the memorial. He was real quiet. You could tell it was affecting him by just how quiet and somber he was."

NICE STORY HOW MARINES FEEL ABOUT OUR BROTHER CORPSMAN

VETERANS' FAMILIES SHARE BOND AT THE WALL THAT HEALS

PADUCAH — A woman from Massachusetts traveled to The Wall That Heals at Carson Park to honor her brother and the Paducah veteran who tried to save him.

JAMES CRUISE & RICHARD MURPHY

Maureen Murphy-Payne says her brother, Richard "Dick" Murphy, of Norwood, Massachusetts, was killed by a sniper in Vietnam on June 15, 1968. The same sniper also killed two Navy hospital corpsmen who tried to provide aid to Richard — William Mercer, of Los Angeles, and James Dale Cruse, of Paducah. James posthumously received a Navy Cross for his valor.

JAMES CRUISE POSTUMOUSLY RECEIVED THE NAVY CROSS FOR HIS VALOR

James' brother, Fred Cruse, still lives in Paducah. Over the weekend, he and Maureen were able to talk and catch up while they were both volunteering at The Wall That Heals. Maureen says her family and the Cruse family have formed a strong bond after learning of James trying to save Richard. "The courage that they displayed, you know, we're all so appreciative of what they gave up, just to think what their lives would have been, you know? So we're so appreciative because we all live every day with our freedoms, and it's always said but there's a huge cost to it," said Maureen. Maureen says she was just 13 years old when she learned about her brother's death from her father.

"One of my older brothers came in, and we all tried to console the three younger boys. I mean, we were in pain as well, obviously. But we were caring for our siblings," Maureen recalled.

And even 50 years later, Maureen still fondly remembers her brother's personality.

"He was very fun-loving. He was a good boy, never got into any trouble, and as I mentioned to you, he was a protector," said Maureen. "It's very sad when I think of everything that our family has missed not having Dickie here in our lives."

On Saturday, Maureen placed tributes at the panel with her brother's name. Just a few lines above Murphy's name is Cruse's.

"I know they're together in heaven and they're looking down on us, and they would want us to do what we're doing here — speaking their names so that they live on forever," said Maureen.
Maureen says her family first learned about their connection with the Cruse family during a police convention, when one of her brothers talked with James Cruse's nephew. The two families have been in touch ever since.

FROM THE WEB THUNDERING THIRD 3/4
John Alan Hudson Corporal USMC

Lima held the right, highest part of the hill while Kilo mostly held the lower, left portion of the hill.

3/4 CP and the LZ, 81s and S4 was on the flat between the two ends. I was there from 23 April to 10 June when we flew to Khe Sanh to start Operation Robin South. Lima arrived two days before I did (returning from my 30 day leave when I extended) and Colonel Bendell and I believe Kilo a day before that to relieve 1/9.

My research shows that the time 3/4 was in the Hill

689 TAOR to be the bloodiest period in 3/4's history! From 15 May onward combat was almost constant as the NVA moved fresh troops in from Laos to over run KSCB and all of the surrounding Marine hill positions. An example of the action, I was Right Guide 4 times, had two different rifle squads and was Platoon Sergeant twice and Platoon Commander during the Hill 758 fight on 15 May. Those of us that survived that period were blessed indeed. To this day I wonder how I survived when so many better Marines all around me did not.

KSV IN NTHE NEWS CONTINUES: CITY HOSTS NUMEROUS TRIBUTES

THE WARWICK BEACON

Schools and organizations throughout Warwick will pay homage to our nation's veterans with programs and ceremonies this week and next honoring those who have served and still serve. Veterans' Day, which is Sunday, Nov. 11, is being observed on Monday, Nov. 12.

Warwick Neck Elementary School students in grades 3-5 will once again visit the Warwick Neck Lighthouse this Wednesday at 10 a.m. to honor veterans from the community. Sponsored by the Warwick Neck Improvement Association and the U.S. Coast Guard, the event normally attracts a large crowd of veterans, parents and city officials alike.

Also on Wednesday, Bishop Hendricken High School will host keynote speaker Michael A. Montigny, a Vietnam veteran of the U.S. Marine Corps and author of "A Few Good Angels," a book which details his deployment and how "a few good angels saved his life numerous times while he served there." Montigny served as a machine gunner at the Battle of Khe Sanh in 1967, a battle that turned into a five-month siege, according to an email from Joe Cichon, who organized the event.

As part of the event, the school will honor the memory of Army Sergeant Mikeal Miller, who was mortally wounded during a deployment in Afghanistan in 2006. Miller was only 22 years old when he died, "only four years older than some of our present students," said Cichon in his email. A Gold Star family, Don and Karen McKenzie, brother and sister-in-law of Richard McKenzie, BHHS '63, who died in Vietnam, will also be present.

On Thursday, veterans will meet with students at St. Rose of Lima School starting at 9 a.m. Also on Thursday, Holliman Elementary School will conduct their annual Veterans Day appreciation event, which normally draws members of the state's General Assembly to speak.

On Friday, Pilgrim High School will host its fourth annual "Patriots Honoring Patriots" event from 9:15 to 10:30 a.m. A formal ceremony will take place, and the annual "Jeans for Troops" campaign, sponsored by the GiGo Fund, will be working to help members of the armed forces get funding for housing, healthcare, education and employment. Those looking to support the cause are encouraged to wear blue jeans and a patriotic shirt to show their support for the cause.

Also on Friday, the All American Assisted Living facility on Tollgate Farm Road will be hosting an event for veterans with refreshments served from 2-4 p.m. Those interested are asked to RSVP by calling 889-5905.

On Monday, Hendricken will host a pancake breakfast for veterans from across the state starting at 7:30 a.m. There is no RSVP required for veterans, and the pancakes will be plentiful. Dunkin Donuts and Dave's Marketplace have agreed to sponsor the event, which is being organized by Bill Johnson, a Hendricken coach and teacher.

A laying of a wreath will be conducted at Warwick Veterans Middle School on Monday by the Warwick Veterans Council.

ED NOTE:

At the Khe Sanh Veterans reunion honoring the 50th Anniversary of the Siege of Khe Sanh, held in Washington DC, on August 12-19 2018,the Khe Sanh Veterans invited five members of the Poilane family from the country of France as our honored guest.

The Poilane family members included Jean-Marie Poilane & his sister Francoise Poilane–Bisiaux, the children of Felix Poilane the owner of the Coffee Plantation located near the KSV Combat Base. Felix was murdered by the North Vietnamese. Jean Marie was accompanied by his wife Christele Poilane, his sister Francoise Poilane Bisiaux by her husnad Alain Bisiaux and their daughter Marianne Bicorne Bisiaux

Jean-Marine Poilane and his sister Francqoise used to sit outside of their home at the plantation near the KSCB and greet American troops as they patrolled near the plantation. (See Photos)

NOTE: Here is a letter of thanks written ny Jean-Marie to Reverend Ray W. Stubbe thanking him for honoring he and his family.

Dear Reverend Stubbe,

I wanted to write you to thank you very much. Our presence at the 50th anniversary of Khe Sanh's siege in Washington is mainly because of you!

You founded the Khe Sanh veterans association and also made translations of my mother's written memories about her life in Vietnam. This helped Dennis Mannion a lot to retrieve us.

I thought of you very often during this week in Washington.

You may know that I did a short speech at the banquet in order to thank all of you.

When I prepared this speech, I wanted to mention you and talk more about my parents but when I practiced in my hotel room I could not finish as I started to cry.

Therefore, I did not cite you but I regret.

I want you to know that my thoughts were with you. We missed you!!

During this week we had a lot emotions and feelings, but we really start to realize after-returning in France. This was so amazing and incredible this journey in Washington meeting all these people.

I said to myself: These men were so brave and most of them are so humble, we were amid heroes.

Washing the wall on Saturday early morning was also a very impressive experience for us. So symbolic but powerful. We could speak with some veterans who knew our house or our parents.

During the banquet on Saturday night, one veteran came to see us and gave us a photo of the plane where my father died and that he took (plane had problem at landing and we see it with some flames).

This was very emotional for us.

More touching, still during the banquet, after my short speech, another veteran came to see me, and he told me "I was there when your father went to heaven. He was a good man". And he gave me his tie after having said that. Then he left us very simply. Of course, tears went immediately in my eyes. I keep the tie pre-ciously then.

US Marines mechanics repaired my father's tractor and at the reunion there was one photo showing that. The marine who took this photo went to see us and said:

"Your father was very happy for the reparation and invited us in his house after. There he offered us some Pernod (a French aperitif) and proposed some magazines ».

The marine told us that at this moment he thought « What's happening, we are in the middle of nowhere - in the heart of the jungle - and a gentleman offers us Pernod and proposes us magazines, unbelievable

It remained a great souvenir for the marines!!!

Meeting Dennis Mannion and his family was an honor for us. Dennis is a real gentleman in the most pure and noble meaning of the word.

Glenn Prentice is also a very generous man and when he saw us, he cried because he remembered that he saw my sister and I 50 years before as little children.

And Ted Showalter who knew well my parents and took this magical photo (in color!!) in 1964 where my parents, my sister and I are all together!

Meeting Carrie Pepper on the last day (Sunday) where she talked about her brother (MIA) and gave us her book (with a written dedication in French!) was also touching.

And all other people, Nick Romanetz, Larry Leclaire, Ron Shouse etc ...

All this will remain unforgotten in our memories.

RAY STUBBE'S RESPONSE:

Dear Crtstele and Jean-Marie:

Very unfortunately, my French is abysmal and I need to communicate in English. Please excuse my deficiency! There is an old joke: "What do you call a person who speaks several languages? Multilingual. What do you call a person who speaks two languages? Bilingual. What do you call a person who speaks only one language? American."

Your very thoughtful letter of 18 September, including the photographs of the Poilane family members brought me many blessings. After the experience of the devastation at Khe Sanh, which included not only many Marines I personally knew, but also the horrible im-pact on the local Bru tribespeople and even the land itself, to see photographs of the Poilane family was a statement of the survival of life itself. There were many times during those early weeks of 1968 when I assumed we were all going to die

Reading through your mother's (Madeleine) account of the family's movement from Khe Sanh and especially the situation in Hue after arrival there and your father's death, made me aware of the very difficult situation she, you, and your sister faced. She contacted me in an attempt to obtain war reparations for the use and the destruction of your home at Khe Sanh. Although I sent letters to a Senator as well as military officials, the response was always that nothing could be done. I'm sure that the financial burdens she faced were tremendous.

Thus to see the family now, emerging from those horrible devastations, reminded me of Spring following Winter, or Easter following Good Friday, and I saw the hand of our Lord working in this matter, who only wishes to give us life in its fullness.

Thank you also for your very kind words about me! I am now 80 and having various medical conditions which kept me from attending the reunion. I'm confident that your very presence blessed many of those who were there.

May our gracious Lord continue to bless you.

FRED SIX RECALLS HIS TIME UNDER FIRE IN VIETNAM

By Carter Giegerich carterg@themountaineer.com

"There were many times that a little bit of fear struck me. But that first time, I learned a lot from that."
Fred Six
Marine Corps Veteran

Fred Six was only 19 years old when he first came face-to-face with the horrors of the Vietnam War.

It was late at night in a foxhole in the Quang Tri province in central Vietnam.

" I'll never forget it — it was the first action I saw over there. We had a little high rise outside a village over there, a small hill, and we dug in for the night with our whole platoon," Six said. "We camped in for the night, not expecting anything. I was still brand new, not even a month in. It was 10 minutes until one in the morning, it was foggy, and we started hearing explosions all around us."

Maggie Valley resident Fred Six entered the Vietnam War in his late teens, surviving numerous live combat scenarios.

Six was awake, taking his shift on watch in a foxhole with two other Marines in his platoon as they tried to sleep, when satchel charges started raining down around them from the bottom of the hill. Almost immediately, the Viet Cong soldiers attacking their position landed an explosive in another foxhole, critically wounding one of the men in his platoon.

" You could hear this one Marine, I had played poker with him the night before, who had both his legs blown off because a satchel charge had a direct hit on him," Six said. "The guy who threw it got lucky, and blew off both of his legs. The whole time all these explosions are going on all around us, he's screaming 'God, let me die.' That was how I broke into Vietnam."

Although the attack lasted about an hour, with the Viet Cong scattering when a medivac helicopter came to retrieve the wounded men, Six said the entire platoon stayed up through the night on alert in case they returned.

Firefights and ambushes were fairly commonplace in the parts of Vietnam Six toured during his service in 1967 and 1968. He spent much of his time patrolling areas near the DMZ, hunting for enemy supply caches and signs of either the Viet Cong or the North Vietnamese Army.

" All we did was stay out on patrol, going through these villages looking for supplies for the enemy," he said. "We'd go through their huts, looking for things. Sometimes they'd have little spider holes they would bury stuff in, and we'd look for food caches, or ammo caches or even gun caches. If you found it then you'd burn it — it was pretty common."

ON THE MOVE

Before long, Six's platoon left Quang Tri and made their way first to Con Thien and then to Khe Sanh, a Marine base that had been under heavy siege until his unit arrived with a wave of relief troops.

" Our entire outfit went in to relieve them, and then after some time they decided to shut the base down," Six said. "The whole time we were there we were taking artillery fire, which gave us some sense of what the siege was like."

The base had been essentially cut off by the prolonged fighting, with no running water coming in for the Marines the entire time he was there.

" We never had a bath that whole time — the only thing we could use water for was drinking, because the pump that came in from below was cut off by the siege," he said. "The only water coming in had to be parachuted in."

While he was in Khe Sanh, his platoon started to do more patrol missions in the surrounding area despite the heightened risk of attack. The hills surrounding the base had been bombed so completely, he said it looked like the surface of the moon.

" We spent a couple nights up on this hill, and we didn't have any water for more than a night," Six said. "Whoever had camped before us left a skull by this fox hole full of water, but we drank from that sucker because we were so thirsty. We just used our iodine tablets and drank it anyway."

Meanwhile, Six said, his fellow servicemen in the Army were living in relative luxury not too far from where they were camped

" You could clearly see the Army from that hill, and they had choppers coming in, they had hot showers. We didn't have anything," he said with a laugh. "We always felt like we were behind the Army, I don't know why."

TOOLS OF WAR

It was also in Khe Sanh that Six saw his first encounter with the brutal force of napalm being dropped by friendly air support on dug-in enemy positions

" Another platoon got ambushed and we came back to support them. The NVA left when those Phantom jets came in and dropped the napalm — that was the first time I'd ever seen that," he said. "You felt a whoosh from it, the force from it, and there's nothing like it. That stops everything. Whoever was shooting at you isn't even there anymore

Six described incoming artillery fire as a fairly commonplace hazard of his tour of duty, including on a major operation in Khe Sanh that resulted in the worst loss of life he saw in his entire time in the warzone.

During a major operation out of the base, Six's platoon was dropped at a landing zone that had been heavily bombed prior to their landing to eradicate any ground resistance they might encounter as they left the helicopter. As his platoon set up a defensive perimeter, though, the second helicopter to land was completely destroyed by a direct hit from a mortar shell.

" The chopper went down and everybody onboard was dead," he said. "Our platoon was lucky — we came in first, but that could have been us."

As more helicopters landed, the artillery fire continued and Six was knocked unconscious by the concussive force of one of the rounds. A fellow Marine carried him to safety, most likely saving his life.

" I don't know if I stayed there whether I would have gotten a mortar shell or not," he said.

As the military prepared to shut down the base at Khe Sanh, Six's platoon remained at the base and assisted with sealing up all of the military installations to prevent the enemy troops from using them to their advantage.

" Imagine this — you have all these bunkers, all these trenches and you have to seal them all up," he said. "A lot of it was done with bulldozers and stuff, but as the trench lines and the bunkers are disappearing the artillery fire is still coming. So we're just laying out in the open, hoping to get through until it's done."

SQUAD LEADER

Once Khe Sanh was finally sealed up, Six's group moved to a place called Qua Viet. While Khe Sanh had been a fairly well-developed base, Six said Qua Viet was closer to the small villages he'd started out in when he first came to Vietnam.
They continued to do seek and destroy missions, hunting enemy supply caches and dodging ambushes along the way, until two men in his battalion were killed in a land mine explosion as they attempted to deliver food to Six's platoon using an amphibious troop transport vehicle.

" These were both guys that had just re-upped for another tour, so these guys had been there a while, and I looked up to both of them," Six said. "They were riding in an Amtrac, carrying food out to us, and hit a land mine. Both of them burned up and died as a result of that land mine."

Only a few days later, Six's platoon struck back at the Viet Cong soldiers in the area. Six, who had just been promoted to be the leader of his squad, led a group of Marines through the forest adjacent to a nearby rice paddy in the dead of night, hoping to reach a nearby village under cover of darkness. They set up in the trees nearby, waiting for a sign of the enemy until early in the afternoon the next day. Then, after hours spent on alert, a group of five Viet Cong soldiers walked into view with their weapons slung over their shoulders.

" If they're carrying a weapon, you shoot. If they aren't carrying a weapon you don't, you just try to question them," Six said. "As soon as they walked past, the guy on the end fired. Once the guy on the far end hears him fire, he fires too. They went down so fast — we took them all out and collected their weapons. It was almost like a revenge thing, for the guys we lost a couple days earlier."

COMING HOME

Not long after that, Six's unit was moved to Danang for a period of time before returning home briefly, then serving on a tour of the Mediterranean. At that point, he said, the Marine Corps was at its peak involvement in the war and he was asked to re-enlist for another tour.

" I got back from the Med cruise, I was on leave and I'd just gotten married," he said. "I didn't re-up, and my options were either to re-up or leave the Marine Corps. So I was in just short of three years, instead of the four I'd signed up for."

He left the military and immediately started seeking employment, quickly finding work with a number of film labs for about 15 years before going to work for Raytheon in Virginia, where he retired in 2004.

Although he said his time in Vietnam didn't have much impact on what he pursued as a career when he returned home, there's no doubt he learned a great deal about himself and others during his time under fire near the DMZ. From that first combat experience in Quang Tri on, he said, he learned important lessons at every step of the way.

"It was adrenaline, it was fear, it was both," he said. "There were many times that a little bit of fear struck me. But that first time, I learned a lot from that."

NICE STORY FROM THE WEB

I have never let my time in Vietnam define me or who I am. When I came home in July of 71 my uniform was put away and I never saw it again. I don't even remember what happened to my DD214. I got a job working for an oil field service company and in the 40 years that I worked for them, the subject of my service in Vietnam never really came up with my fellow employees. I just didn't think about it. Example: I wanted an international position with the company so filled out and submitted an application. About a month later I was called in to the HR director for an interview. As he looked thru my resume he asked me if I had ever been overseas before and I replied "no". He flipped a page and said "Well, it says here that you went to Vietnam ". I said "Oh, yes, I forgot about that". I got the job and ended up spending 20 years outside the US in various countries.

I first met my British born wife in Dubai in 1976, and we've been married now for 40 years. Her first husband had been a serious bad ass in the British special forces during the Aden Emergency (1963-1967), so she had no interest in hearing anything more to do with war. I can't say I blame her. My Vietnam service was never discussed as we raised our two daughters. In our list of life priorities, it was low on the list.

Other interesting things were happening anyway. I was arrested in Dubai during the hijacking of Lufthansa flight 181, and I was present in Iran when the Shah was overthrown in 1979. I was in Dubai and Saudi during the Iraq-Iran war from 80 to 83, met the current Syrian dictator in a private meeting at the Syrian Oil Ministry in the 80s and was in the Beirut airport when Israel invaded Lebanon in 1982. I managed to be back in Dubai in time for Desert Storm and participated in the capping of Kuwaiti oil wells that had been blown up by the Iraqis.

So, back to my reconnecting with Vietnam. While working in Saudi Arabia in 2011, I decided to retire. I purchased a new car using the internet and decided that I wanted a Vietnam veteran license plate. A requirement was presenting your DD214 which would show your Vietnam service. Since I had no idea what happened to my original, I applied for a duplicate, using my sister's US address. A couple of months later I called her from Saudi to see if she had received it. She said she had, along with the medals that I had earned while in Vietnam. After 40 years, the government finally decided to send them to me. All this time I thought that if I wanted them, I was supposed to buy them myself. I was surprised to see that there were two Air Medals, both with "V" device, and the Army Commendation Medal.

You see, I was a Crew Chief on a UH-1C Charlie model gunship with the 48th AHC. My Aircraft Commander and I participated in Lam Son 719 while operating out of Dong Ha. I lost good friends during that operation, including Cpt. Ed Bilbrey, who's wife and parents I visited with on my way back home, and Bob Acalotto, my door gunner, who was KIA a couple of weeks after this photo of us was taken at Khe Sanh. He is the one on the right. I heard later that my AC spent 6 months in a VA hospital suffering from PTSD, wearing nothing but a diaper. So yes, I finally received the medals (which I am proud of), as well as the license plates, but I refuse to let that experience play a major role in who I am. Yes, I am one of the lucky ones. I define my life by my family and accomplishments since that terrible time.

BROTHERS IN WAR AND IN PEACE: A STORY OF VIETNAM

BY STEVEN LANSFORD

On May 31, 1968, I was serving as a squad leader with the Third Platoon, "Mike Company," 3rd Battalion, 1st Marine Regiment, 1st Marine Division. We were conducting a company-size combat operation against a large force of North Vietnamese Army (NVA) and Hard Corps Viet Cong Army troops in Quang Tri Province, Northern I Corps. We were on Hill 512, north of Highway 9, which ran east-west from the Ca Lu Combat Base to Khe Sahn. My platoon moved away from the company command post on top of the hill, down the hillside through the bush. We reached the bottom and climbed a low draw. At the top of the draw, the bush ended and the area before us was entirely devoid of vegetation. It was obvious that a firefight had occurred here, because there were bits and pieces of equipment, armament, clothing, etc., strewn across the area. We traveled across this open area, where we encountered another draw and the jungle started again. The bush was so thick on the other side that we couldn't see anything. However, to my right we observed a pair of green sneakers and a pith helmet. Not a good sign — the NVA! There was something on the other side of the draw and it wasn't us. Regardless of the evidence of an enemy presence, the platoon commander gave the word to move into the draw. Cpl. Frank Lautner's squad moved forward.

I left the platoon commander and started back to my squad. I hadn't gone far when the claymore mines "popped" and the screaming started. I was in the open by myself, with no cover at all! Immediately after the mines detonated, the mortars started coming in and the small arms fire began. A mortar round discharged in my face and shrapnel went through my right eye. I was shot and hit with more shrapnel. However, it was the head trauma that knocked me senseless. Not only could I not see out of my right eye, but I was stunned to the point of not being able to move. I wanted to take cover, but my brain and body would, or could not coordinate. I remember seeing what appeared to be another squad of Marines, from the Second Platoon as it turned out, move out of the draw to my left. They were running to where the body of my Third Platoon had taken cover. However, one Marine came toward me, across the open, through the intense mortar and small arms fire. He was a black Marine, who was so skinny that his steel pot wobbled on his head. Even though I was out of it, I can see his face as clearly today as if it happened yesterday. He put my rifle back in my hands, grabbed me and said "Don't worry, Sarge, I got you, we're going to be OK." Somehow, he managed to avoid us getting killed and back to where the rest of my platoon had taken cover.

That Marine stayed with me the rest of the day and that night. He never left my side. I remember that he was very quiet and watched over me like a hawk. That was a very long night. The next morning, other Marines joined us and I recall seeing Staff Sgt. Barnes from another platoon — I have no idea of his first name — bringing bodies out of the draw. My Marine brother — the man who saved me — helped me as we started the long walk back to the command post June 1.

We carried our dead, our wounded and our body parts, weapons and equipment back across the open area. We were in the draw, starting back up the hill, going back to the command post, when the North Vietnamese ambushed us with artillery. My Marine brother and I dived to the ground. Several rounds landed, and most of the Marines who had not been killed or wounded the day before were killed or wounded that morning. The platoon commander almost lost his leg. My Marine brother and I took some shrapnel, but were able to continue. We made it back to the command post and found that it had been pounded by heavy mortars and artillery. This resulted in most of Mike Company being killed or wounded. Everyone in Cpl. Lautner's squad was killed. We survivors subsequently evacuated via helicopter to the Valley Forge, and ultimately sent to military hospitals in Japan.

I have been ashamed for almost 44 years, because I never asked my Marine brother what his name was. I've thought about him every day, and I have told everyone who will listen the story of this brave Marine who risked his life to pull me from harms way. He was a real Marine who epitomized "Semper Fidelis." I don't deserve to tie his boots, and I didn't even know his name. Parenthetically, I gave a framed copy of the Charles Russell painting of the Negro York, who accompanied Lewis and Clark on their expedition to the Pacific Ocean in 1804, to the Palm Coast African American Society, in my Marine brother's honor. That man helped me to be a better person.

In 2009, a young "3/1" Marine from the Iraq War, Felix Garcia, introduced me to the website for the 3rd Battalion, 1st Marine Regiment. In September 2011, we had a reunion in Beaufort, South Carolina. Low and behold, Sgt. John Potts, Second Platoon, stepped out of the darkness and back into my life. I had the presence of mind to give him the much abbreviated version of this story, including a detailed description of my Marine brother, and asked if he knew who he might be. John would not commit at that time, but made inquiries after we returned home.

In a subsequent email John said that based on contact with some of his Second Platoon brothers they were sure that my Marine brother could only be Otis Felix, who was from the U.S. Virgin Islands. Later, John and I were talking on the phone and he informed me that he had a photo of his squad, which included Otis Felix. I begged him to send it to me. I told him that I had my Marine brother's face burned into my brain and I was sure I could recognize him. I received an email from John, with an attached photo of his squad, including Otis Felix. I recognized his face the minute I looked at the photo. One of my Mike 3/1 Marines gave me the last known address for Otis. He was residing in St. Thomas, U.S. Virgin Islands. I composed a heartfelt, two-page letter, and sent it to that address. I was skeptical that it would reach him and did a lot of praying that it would. Every day when I visited the Palm Coast Post Office I hoped that I'd hear from him. Ironically, Otis had not lived at that address for 15 years. However, as luck would have it, he works for the U.S. Postal Service. The letter carrier recognized Otis' name, realized he had not resided at that address for years and delivered the letter to him at the post office.

On May 7, 2012, I was contacted by Otis' daughter, Orise, who lives and works in Atlanta. She said her father had received the letter and was moved to tears. Otis and his wife Patricia pressed Orise into service to find me. We talked for a long time. I contacted Otis and we talked and I reiterated everything I wrote in the letter and assured him it was from my heart. We talked for a long time. He told me his granddaughter was scheduled to graduate from high school in Atlanta on May 23. Coincidentally, I was going to be on my way to Rolling Thunder in Washington, D.C., on the motorcycle, that same day. On May 24, 2012, almost 44 years to the day, Otis and I reunited in Atlanta. Needless to say, it was one of the best days of my life.

I subsequently learned from John Potts that he had listed Otis as missing in action. They were concerned that he had been killed. John subsequently was informed that Otis was alive with the Third Platoon, had been wounded, and was being "medevaced." John had commented "what's Otis doing with the Third Platoon?" Well, he was busy saving my life! By the way, Otis hadn't gained one dang pound! Lunsford lives in Palm Coast.

THE KHE SANH VETERANS GENERAL MEMBERSHIP MEETING

While serving with B Co 1/26 at the KSCB, Ken Korkow, made a personal vow that he would kiss the ass of anyone from the USAF, for their efforts which were the direct reason so many of us survived the battle of Khe Sanh. Ken thought the 50th anniversary of the Siege reunion would be the perfect place to fulfil his vow.

He solicited Colonel "Toby" Rushforth, 20th TASS to aid him with his mission. The both of them, during the general membership meeting surprised everyone as shown in the below photos.

Our Beautiful Khe Sanh Veterans ladies held their luncheon while the membership attended the General Membership meeting. These wonderful ladies, besides getting to know each other , held their own silent auction which raised thousands of dollars for the KSV Scholarship Fund

CRAIG TOURTE FROM THE WEB

There is something about Christmas; perhaps it is just the commercialization of this otherwise religious holiday recognition that disturbs me. It is certainly a wonderful time for so many, the celebration of the birth of our religious and cultural foundation no matter one's religious preference, a time to remember family, children, friends and those who have passed. I know it is a difficult time for our troops who are away from home. I think most remember where they were at Christmas and what they were doing, perhaps participating in a religious ceremony of some sort, maybe even an exchange of gifts and it is certainly a time for great meals and for a few, even a libation or two amongst friends. I wish I had some fond memories of the 1967 Christmas at Khe Sanh, I mean the Siege had not yet started, but it was cold, wet and foggy and just plain downright miserable.

few days ago I was sitting around with 3 other men my age, all veterans of the Vietnam War. Two had been in the Army and one in the Navy. The subject of Christmas and USO shows came up and the question was asked if anyone had seen Bob Hope. There were some funny stories; one guy said it was strongly suggested that he attend the Bob Hope Christmas show although he just wanted to sleep. Another mentioned a USO show he saw and how much he enjoyed it. My vague recall now is that a small contingent of the Marine Corps Band showed up on the Khe Sanh base and a couple of them found there way over to the South West corner where we were located. I'm thinking it must have been around Christmas, for I can't imagine why they would have been there if it was not for that reason. I think that was around the time we were all offered one coke or one beer (both warm of course) but I can't be sure, I was pretty excited about receiving that beer.

For the past several years I have offered my "Christmas at Khe Sanh" story, kind of a little parody on the Bob Hope and Ann Margaret USO Vietnam Christmas Shows. I enjoyed writing the story, a ridiculously impossible event that some actually believed occurred and a few wondered why they did not attend or just could not remember the event. Surprisingly, no one said they had actually seen the show. I'll remember Christmas again this year, not for the commercialization, unneeded gifts or unwanted guests. Not for the un USO show that did not occur at Khe Sanh in 1967. Not for my disappointment of never having seen Bob or Ann, but rather for the memory of those who did not return with us, for those who have passed and those of us who have reached the shadow of our years and are now ill or otherwise confined, lonely, in pain or are just plain miserable along with those who are in good spirits and health. God bless us all for our perseverance, our pride, courage, and patriotism.

TOUGH GUYS (A REUNION STORY)

BY CRAIG TOURTE
HQ BTRY 1/13

I met a lot of tough guys at the reunion. Men who I had only met on two occasions (reunions), but who I have known for 38 years. I was kind of a tough guy too. I had a long career dealing with people who had problems and tragedy in their lives. I often had to be the cool, calm and collected one to make sure certain events turned out successfully. I comforted victims of assault and violence. I have had guns and knives pointed at me, cut down the suicide victim from the rafters of their garage while their families stood and watched, removed the gun from the hand of the dead after they had shot themselves. I have dealt with a wide range of troubled individuals in our society. I tried to show compassion certainly, but that compassion was not necessarily coupled with emotion. As the years progressed, I found it a little more difficult to express emotion, even when dealing with my own family issues. The word coldness comes to mind, and there were times when I wondered if I even had the ability to feel any emotion at all, an issue I'll admit, that concerned me.

There were a lot of tough guys at the reunion, perhaps not so much in the body anymore, but certainly in spirit and character. Combat Marines, veterans of brutal fights and various battles. Men whose toughness was honed by years of hard living and conflict. Men who could easily describe the brutality of war and the witnessing of sometimes-indescribable death of their friends and comrades. Men who had committed the necessary acts of war on other individuals and to coin a phrase didn't blink an eye. Men who had gone through several marriages, because they were now unable to express emotion to another human being. Men whose families and friends still cannot understand their coldness. Yep, there certainly were a lot of tough guys at the reunion.

I have made an observation about myself at these reunions and it is that it usually takes me about twelve hours or twenty minutes talking with Neil before this tough guy is reduced to pretty much a blubbering, sobbing idiot. Of course I'm overstating this, but certainly, I get overwhelmed with emotion, the tears uncontrollably run down my cheeks, and I certainly feel like a blubbering idiot. I have tried to be circumspect about this unusual occurrence in me, this uncontrolled emotional feeling. It is not depression, sadness, nor is its sensitivity to anything that is said or discussed. I think it is just a feeling of humanity and humility and respect for those I am around. I think of these men who 38 years ago shared the most personal and intimate moments of their lives together and although it was a long time ago, it seems like yesterday. I think of my friend Chuck, who was one of the few who survived the rocket attack on the CP (in fact he survived two attacks) and Bruce, who was the one who pulled him out. Chuck credits Bruce with saving his life 38 years ago. Chuck said, "I hope Bruce is here, I would like to meet." I was not present when Chuck and Bruce got together that evening at the reunion, but just the thought of that moment chokes me up.

There were a lot of tough guys at the reunion, you could tell who they were, they were the ones hugging each other with tears running down their faces. I didn't want the reunion to end, I didn't want to leave, and I wanted this moment to always be. I didn't want to leave these fine men who I had met twice before, but who I had known for 38 years. I was humbled to be in their presents and even though I was a REFM, I was so proud to be accepted by them.

If you're a tough guy and a Khe Sanh Veteran and you have never been to a reunion, you should think about going, there will be a lot of tough guys there, and you'll never be the same.

\KHE SANH VETERANS, INC. SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION

GOVERNING RULES FOR OPERATIONS OF THE KHE SANH VETERANS, INC. SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION:

1. The purpose of the Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. Scholarship Foundation (KSVSF) is to provide financial aid to high school graduates who plan to attend an accredited institution as a full time student OR who are currently enrolled full time in an accredited post-secondary curriculum.

2. Scholarships will be awarded to applicant students who have at least one parent, legal guardian, or grandparent who is a paid member in good standing of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., a 501(c)(19) charitable organization.

3. IT IS THE RESPONSIBILITY OF THE STUDENT TO SEE THAT THE SCHOLARSHIP APPLICATION REQUIREMENTS ARE FULLY COMPLETED AND SENT DIRECTLY TO THE SCHOLARSHIP CHAIR BEFORE 5/1/2019 AT THE ADDRESS BELOW;

Mr. Dan Fisher
KSVSF Committee Chairman 52ND
6050 52ND St. North
Oakdale, MN 55128-1317

CRITERIA FOR SELECTION

Applicants must be the legal child or grandchild of a paid up member of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. (See member definition in the KSV Association bylaws.) This includes deceased, life members of KSV and those Khe Sanh Veterans listed as KIA/MIA in Vietnam if family members are paid up, associate members of KSV, Inc. Children or grandchildren of KSV associate members are not eligible.

Information provided by each candidate on the attached application forms will focus on the following qualities considered for selection to KSVSF financial aid: good grades, character, citizenship, leadership experience and personal essay. A point selection system is included in the application forms. Examples of these above mentioned qualities could be in the classroom, in extracurricular activities or in service to the community, church or nation.

A Scholarship Foundation Review Committee will serve the President of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., and will accept, review and grade each correctly completed application. This committee will provide a scholarship financial report and short summaries of the selected candidates at the annual KSV reunion for publication in the Red Clay" Newsletter.

SCHOLARSHIP AWARDS

The amount of financial award per applicant will be determined by the Review Committee's scoring results. The awards will be granted for a maximum of 4 years per student. A new application will be required for each continuous year applied

SPRING 2020

THIS ISSUE FEATURES "THE RANCH" THIS RANCH IS OWNED AND OPERATED BY KEN KORKOW. BRAVO CO 1/26. IT IS A CHRISTIAN MINISTRY AIMED TO HELP OUR WOUNDED WARRIORS. THE ARTICLE APPEARS ON PAGES 51 TO 54, WITH PHOTOS ON INSIDE OF FRONT COVER AND INSIDE OF AND ON BACK COVER.

THE RANCH IS A VENUE FOR SPIRITUAL AWAKENING, GROWTH, AND HEALING. HUNDREDS OF MEN AND WOMEN STRUGGLING WITH PTSD, BOTH YOUNG AND OLD, HAVE FOUND REFUGE AND HELP AT THE RANCH. THE RANCH SITS ON 540 ACRES OF SOUTH DAKOTA PRAIRIE, ABOUT 20 MILES SOUTHEAST OF PIERRE, SD, RIGHT IN THE HEART OF PHEASANT HUNTING COUNTRY. IN FACT, OUR LOCATION IS SITUATED IN AN AREA KNOWN AS THE BEST IN THE WORLD FOR PHEASANT HUNTING. OUR MINISTRY USES PHEASANT HUNTING AS A KEYSTONE FOR HELPING VETERANS. DURING THE PHEASANT SEASON, WE HOST PHEASANT HUNTS FOR VETERANS, INCLUDING THOSE WHO ARE WHEELCHAIR-BOUND OR HAVE SUFFERED OTHER SEVERE PHYSICAL AND MENTAL INJURY.

BUT OUR MINISTRIES INVOLVE MORE THAN HUNTING. THE RANCH RELIES ON A VARIETY OF OUTDOOR ACTIVITIES THAT VETERANS AND OTHERS ENJOY. OUR MINISTRIES ALSO FOCUS ON WORSHIP, PRAYER, FELLOWSHIP, AND MEDITATING ON GOD'S WORD. ALL THESE THINGS WORK TO BRING HEALING THROUGH CHRIST CLOSER FOR EACH VISITOR.

WHERE BOMBS ONCE FELL, KHE SANH GROWS

50 years after the war, the devastated battlefield of Khe Sanh has become an economic hub of the poor central province of Quảng Trị, with average annual income per capita of US $1,400.

According to the People's Committee of Khe Sanh Town, the town's living standards have transformed completely since the post-war era.

"The town is growing into a developed urban zone and we hope to reach annual income per capita of $1,900 in 2020, thanks to the focus on the development of trade and tourism," says Hoàng Văn Quynh, the committee's chairman.

A report by the committee said the local residents' education has increased year after year, while the health care system works effectively, with a doctor present in every commune in the town.

Greenery covers all land areas and vestiges of wartime bombing are rarely seen in the town. The return of the green trees, along with the mild weather and the plenty of red basalt soil in the town, have sparked hopes that it could become a tourism destination and clean agriculture.

Hoàng Hữu Cảm, a local who runs a hotel business in the town, says a tourism boom seems in the cards, thanks to the town's location on the East West Economic Corridor, which runs through five Southeast Asian countries of Myanmar, Thailand, Cambodia, Laos and Việt Nam.

"Khe Sanh is the ideal stop for visitors from the countries who go through the nearby Lao Bảo and La Lay border checkpoints," Cảm says. The border gates sit between the town and Savannakhet Province of Laos. They also facilitate trade to and from the town.

Hồ Xuân Hiếu, a businessman who owns a cassava starch brand, says the fertile soil in the town yields a pure flour. Cassava grown in the town produces 70 tons of starch each year, which is supplied to Japan and South Korea.

The return of greenery to the town cost the blood and tears of local soldiers who fought in the battle of Khe Sanh for five months from January 14 to July 9, 1968.

Hồ Mơ left his soldier's life to return the town in 1980, when the remnants of the war were everywhere and the town was in disarray. Mơ started to clear a valley five kilometres from the centre to take soil for cultivation.

Thanks to his efforts, rice began to grow well in the soil within a month. By 2005, Mơ became one of the top farmers in the town. He had rice paddies, a plantation of rubber trees and a big herd of cows and water buffalos.

Since 2005, Mơ has earned around US $13,000 a year. Besides cultivating his seven hectares of farm land and his husbandry work feeding 50 cows and buffalos, the 80-year-old man has volunteered to protect 53 hectares of community forest from illegal hunters and loggers.

"At my 18, I joined the North Việt Nam military volunteer and worked as a porter carrying necessities and weapons to assist the battles in Làng Vây and Tà Cơn airport," says Mơ.

Hồ Ta Chê, another veteran, says joining the liberation force in the past and working for the greenery of the town today are all part of his responsibility to his hometown.

Younger than Mơ, Chê worked as a liaison boy for the troops and later dug secret tunnels that led army tanks into Làng Vây battlefield.

Chê lost his right hand in 1967 after a bombardment by American airforce. However, losing one hand did not mean losing all his power. After the war, Chê fertilized the soil for rice cultivation and became one of the biggest rice producers in the town.

The veterans have determined that once their hometown grows to be a tourism hub of the province, they will be the best tour guides for itineraries related to the famed Battle of Khe Sanh, where over 100,000 tons of bombs were dropped by US aircraft and over 158,000 artillery rounds were fired in defence of the base.

OBIT

Daniel P. Sullivan, 71, a longtime resident of Brockton, died peacefully at home on Wednesday, September 11, 2019 surrounded by his loving family. He was the husband of Katharine M. (Shea) Sullivan for 49 years. Son of the late Paul and Florence (McAfee) Sullivan, he was born in Boston and raised in Dorchester. Danny was a graduate of Dorchester High School. He was a Lance Corporal with the U.S. Marine Corps and a Veteran of the Vietnam War, earning both a Bronze Star and Purple Heart. He was a resident of Brockton for the past 45 years. Danny was a communications technician at Verizon in Boston for 30 years before retiring in 2002. He was a member of the Marine Corps League of Easton. He published a novel, Teen Marine, about his experiences in the Vietnam War.

In addition to his wife, Danny was the father of Christine M. Russo and her husband Dean of Stoughton and the late Kathaleen Spann. He was the grandfather of Marina, Greg, Brad, Bryce, D.J., Joey, Donald and Scott. He was the brother of the late Billy Morgan and is also survived by many nieces and nephews.

Funeral Prayers were offered from the Farley Funeral Home, 358 Park St., (Rte. 27) Stoughton on Sunday, September 15 at 4 PM. Visiting Hours prior from 2-4 PM. Interment was private. In lieu of flowers, donations in Danny's memory may be made to the VA Boston Healthcare System, Brockton VAMC Campus, Attn: Voluntary Service (135), 940 Belmont St., Brockton, MA 023

RAY PALMER & TRADITIONAL APACHE SUNRISE CEREMONY

By Craig W. Tourte

Ray Palmer (D/1/26) invited me to attend the "Traditional Apache Sunrise Ceremony' in honor of his granddaughter Kieran Grace Palmer, to be held on the "Fort Apache Indian Reservation, White Mountain Apache Tribe" Fort Apache/Big Springs, Arizona. I was stunned at the invitation and knew it was both an honor and privilege to have been invited. There was nothing that was going to keep me from attending this most memorable event. I had few expectations other than knowing it was going to be a once in a lifetime experience.

Information regarding the "The Sunrise Ceremony" also known as a "Coming of Age Ceremony" within the Apache culture, is available online. Ray was kind enough to provide the following, "The ceremony is a three-day event. There are stages leading to the final day. The first day... is the dressing of the young lady, my granddaughter. This is where the ceremonial outerwear is blessed by the Medicine Man and the God Mother attaches the Eagle feathers and other ceremonial items to her outfit. The second-day ceremony starts at dawn, at noon there is a rest period. As the sun goes down there is the start of the evening ceremony. The Crown Dancers and the young lady are highlighted, this ends at about 10 PM. Sunday is the last and final day which starts at first light and concludes at noon."

From the Web, "For over 70 years...the Sunrise Ceremony was not permitted to be practiced as it was banned by the US government...as were most of the native spiritual practices and rituals...With the American Indian Religious Freedom Act of 1978, the Sunrise Ceremony would openly be practiced on reservations again."

Besides my wife Jeanne and I, Ray invited former Delta Company brothers (and wives) which included, amongst others, Daniel Fisher, Colonel (Ret) Ross Brown, Henry Pope, and Tom Howard. At the "Camp" on the first day, attended by members of his family - including Rays son who had served in the U.S.M.C. as a Captain - and other tribal members, Ray introduced each Delta member individual and was kind enough to include me in his introduction. He spoke of how each was an important part of his life, how they were all his brothers and that he had fought alongside them and knew each would have unselfishly sacrificed their lives for him and that he would have given his life for them, that they were the reason he survived the war and was standing with us today. The Medicine Man spoke of the importance of the tribe and tradition, the goodness of the individual, the remembrance of ancestors, having a good and loving character and forgiving heart, working together for the betterment and benefit of all, and the importance of treating others with respect. He then explained the tradition of the Sunrise Ceremony, the God Mother's responsibilities and the significance of each individual item placed on the garment worn by the girl.

The ceremony involves months of preparation and teaching beforehand. The ceremony itself is physically arduous for the young girl and takes strength, endurance and above all commitment. During the ceremony which includes much running and dancing, chanting and praying, the girl is guided by the Medicine Man and God Mother. All done to "mold her" into "Changing Woman" or "White Painted Woman," an Apache tradition explaining the origin of the ceremony.

It was a fabulous and unforgettable ceremony. Ray's granddaughter Kieran was absolutely stunning in her handmade Native Apache Dress. More than 300 members of the White Mountain Apache Tribe attended which was held deep in the forest of the Reservation. This was not a ceremony to be viewed by tourists or outsiders for their entertainment. "It is a ceremony of giving and receiving for both the girl and the community. It brings people, families and tribal members together, providing a sense of unity." It was profoundly religious with many spiritual rituals, blessings and the girl experiencing for the first time, her own capacity to heal.

I was spiritually moved and profoundly grateful and appreciative for the opportunity to attend this wonderful ceremony.

RED CLAY ISSUE 97, SUMMER 2019

By Craig W. Tourte

My Red Clay magazine was waiting for me upon my return from a month-long journey to Europe. Another fantastic job by our President Tom Eichler. I just don't know where he finds the creative inspiration and energy to produce and mail out the magazine. It's unfortunate there are so many obituaries, but it is a reminder to us all that our time is short, tomorrow may never come (Garth Brooks), and we should make the most of what little time we have left. A few years ago, I had a new roof put on my house. The roofer asked if I wanted the lifetime roof, I responded, "how about something that will last five to ten years." I'm not sure he understood the sarcasm. I read all the stories and still find the individual heroics and memories fascinating. What fine men we had the honor to serve with during those difficult years. On page 89 there is a page noting "Those Remembered" and "Remembered By." I read the name of "PFC Donald Saunders USMC HQ Btry 1/13, KIA 04 March 1968" I knew Don and served with him at Khe Sanh, I clearly remember the day he was killed, a reoccurring haunting memory. Don is remembered on this page by "James Baker HQ Btry 13th Marines." I don't know if I ever had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Baker and don't know if he even knew Don Saunders, but just the same, it was a thoughtful remembrance on his part.

Leafing through the magazine several more times I came across page 29 with the title "Obit" and "James A. Baker, USMC, Khe Sanh Veteran, HQ Btry 1/13." The article provides he passed away on March 19, 2019. I think there is a lesson here, Mr. Baker may not have known at the time he made the remembrance of Donald Saunders that his never tomorrow would come so soon. I'll honor and remember Mr. Baker in the next edition of Red Clay while I still can, because I don't know when my tomorrow will never come.

NATIONAL SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF AMERICAN REVOLUTION HONORS KHE SANH VETERAN SGT VINCENT RIOS ALPHA CO 1/1 FOR HIS MERITORIOUS SERVICE

VINCENT HAS WORKED TIRELESSLY IN SERVICE TO HIS FELLOW VETERANS

He was appointed in 1969 as the Assistant Regional Administrator, Department of Labor's Employment and training Service, Regions 1X and X, till his retirement in July 2001. In his capacity he helped track regional veterans programs and how Federal monies are spent by the states for veterans programs. He then was recruited by the Association for Service Disabled Veterans to serve as the Director of Development, and the Western Regions Representative for the Washington based POW Disabled Veterans owned Business advocacy group.

On February 6, 1969, six days before the end of his second tour in Vietnam, Acting Platoon Commander, Marine SGT Vince Rios, was on patrol over a mile-long rice paddy. He was to advance his company's position in an area he knew was heavily mined due to previous experiences. SGT Rios stopped the platoon and advanced to speak with his point man.

He set off an enemy explosive device which immediately vaporized both his legs, left his right arm dangling from his shoulder, and partially amputated his left index and ring fingers.

Vincent spent ten months in military hospitals recovering from his injuries. His treatment was three-pronged, consisting of physical therapy, surgeries to close and later graft wounds, and occupational therapy. Interestingly Vincent was told by the military doctors that he would never walk again because of the grievous nature of his injuries.

He did not accept that he would never walk again and, using his considerable initiative and tremendous persistence, he devised a new concept for his prosthetic right arm and crutch that allowed him to stand and walk within ten months of the loss of both his legs and right arm. He daily utilizes his self-designed prostheses and crutch to stand from his wheelchair and walk.

In the effort to rebuild his life Vincent dedicated himself to obtain an education and work to serve veterans. He earned four college degrees. He has an

A.A. degree in Behavioral Sciences, a B.A. in Psychology, a M.A. in interdisciplinary Social Science, and a M.A.in Public Administration.

Sgt. Vince Rios has received the following awards for his service:

Bronze Star with "V" and star devices
(two awards)
Purple Heart with star devices
(three awards)
Presidential Unit Citation with star device
(two awards)
Meritorious Unit Commendations with star device
(two awards)
Navy Unit Commendation
National Defense Service Medal
Combat Action Ribbon
Good Conduct Medal
Vietnam Cross of Gallantry with Palm
Vietnam Service Ribbon with star devices
(four awards)

Vince Rios and his wife Cheryl. Vince and his wife Cheryl met at Diamond Hill Junior High School in Fort Worth, Texas. Years later they connected again and were married in 1993. They have 5 children and six grandchildren between them. Vince and Cheryl make their home in Haslet , Texas

April 1969 at Oak Knoll Naval Hospital Sgt Vincent Rios receiving his 2nd Bronze Star W/V and 3rd Purple Heart.

DREAM FINALLY UNDERSTOOD

Have long had several bad dreams I could not understand (perhaps did not want to) but thanks to Red Clay I finally made sense of one of them. "I am running with no where to go and mortar rounds are hitting all over the place throwing rocks in the air. The whole place is nothing but rock." Thanks to the article on LZ Margo, found out I was there with Echo, 2/26. Does not help the dreams, but at least I now know why I was running in my dream with no where to go. The articles help my wife understand why I sometimes act the way I do, since I do not talk with her about almost all of it.

OBIT

BRADLEY J. BORRELL, USMC , KHE SANH VETERAN, H&S CO 2/1

Borrell, Bradley James, age 69, of Prior Lake, lost his brief but mighty battle with "Cancer of Unknown Primary" at the VA Hospital in Minneapolis on May 22, 2018.

Brad was born January 16, 1949 in Minneapolis and graduated high school in Watertown, MN, where he continued many great friendships through his life.

Brad was a proud United States Marine and was awarded the Purple Heart for his service in Khe Sanh, Vietnam where he lost his right leg to mortar fire. He went on to work as a ready-mix truck driver for Model Stone. (later Aggregate Industries) for over 20 years, and even after retiring would continue to show up in the mornings to bring his former co-workers donuts and shoot the breeze. Brad was also proud to be a private pilot and loved flying many adventures out of Winsted. After a devastating accident where an airplane wheel exploded while he was working on it, he experienced an extremely serious head injury, losing his right eye and requiring multiple surgeries to reconstruct his skull and face. Most mortals would not have survived, but Brad came through and fought to regain medical approval to fly again; he was probably one of the safest pilots in the sky. He also enjoyed target shooting with his buddies, garage sale shopping and good food. He was a very generous, caring and faithful friend to many, and the best brother anyone could hope for.

Brad was preceded in death by his parents, Bob & June Borrell and his "brothers from other mothers", Tom Burns and David Steffenson. He is survived and deeply missed by his siblings, Robert Barry and Becky, nephew Nicolas and great-nephew Wesley Borrell, along with many very close friends, including Jan Taylor.

Memorial Mass of Christian Burial was held at 11 :00 AM on Friday, June 29, 2018 at the Immaculate Conception Church in Watertown with visitation from 9:30-10:50 AM prior to the Mass at the church. Brief military honors and luncheon following the service. Casual attire including Hawaiian shirts-in Brad's memory were encouraged.

Inurnment at Ft. Snelling Cemetery with full military honors were held Monday July 2 at]0:15 a.m.

Many thanks to Dr. Thomas Downs and the dedicated staff of the palliative care unit of the VA Medical Center.

MEMORIAL CARD FROM HIS SERVICE AND THIS EXCERPT FROM THE EULOGY OF THE SERVICE

EULOGY

"We had two squads of seven guys each; everyone was interchangeable in our 81milimeter mortar squads. I was a squad leader. One day we were asked for one volunteer from each unit to retract some dead Marines left on a mountain top after heavy combat. Marines never leave their dead. Brad said "I will go! It s what marines do". He never returned to our unit. You know the rest of the story from there.

Brad Borrell was a mountain of a Marine. He never complained or questioned a command. He would be the first to go.

I understood that while on the mountain they suffered heavy artillery incoming and that is what took his foot. Semper Fidelis Brad! God is your new Commander - OORAH!"

MAX JORDAN, USMC
KHE SANH VETERAN

Max was born on February 28, 1949, in Manchester IA. The son of Robert D. and Donna J (McGuire) Jordan. He attended Center Point Schools in Center Point, IA; and after high school he joined the US Marine corps in 1967. He served proudly during the Vietnam war, most notably at the battle of Khe Sanh. In 1968 while on military leave, he married Martha Gregory with whom he had two children. He later moved to Lynchburg, Virginia to attend Liberty Baptist college. Upon graduating in 1976 he made his home in Little Rock, AR. Max lived many places across the United States throughout his life, finally making his permanent home in Iowa during 2010.

Max enjoyed playing video games, socializing with other Veterans on Facebook, and fishing. He spent many years helping family members and friends raise many children throughout his life.

He is survived by two children; Gregory (Blayne) Jordan, Independence, IA, and Jessica (Albert) Jordan Meyer, Oelwein, IA, a step daughter; Layla Clark, in Oklahoma, two grandchildren, a sister; Kimberly Jordan, Little Rock, AR, three brothers; John Jordan, Davenport, IA, Dale Jordan, Jesup, IA, and Rick (Kathy) Jordan, Jefferson City, MO, and several nieces and nephews.

KHE SANH VETERAN IN THE NEWS MICHAEL ARCHER AWARD WINNING AUTHOR

I'm pleased to announce that I'll be travelling next month to the United States Military Academy, West Point, New York to receive the Military Order of St. Louis medal for the Khe Sanh trilogy (A Patch of Ground: Khe Sanh Remembered, The Long Goodbye: Khe Sanh Revisited and The Gunpowder Prince: How Marine Corps Captain Mirza Munir Baig Saved Khe Sanh) "in recognition of its important contribution to military literature" from the Knights Templar Hudson Valley Priory of Saint Patrick.

Past recipients include bestselling writers Thomas Fleming, James Bradley (Flags of Our Fathers) and Philip Caputo (A Rumor of War). This year's candidates included several best-selling writers and historians and a Pulitzer prize-winning journalist. As such, I am deeply honored by the selection and looking forward to the award dinner at the West Point Club on October 17, 2019.

The event is not open to the walk-in public; however, if you wish to attend as my guest, preregistration is required. For information about cost of the dinner, attire, time and directions, etc., please contact LtCol (Ret) Robert Black at RBlack.RBC@Carroll.com. Those of you who have read A Patch of Ground and/or The Long Goodbye may recall then-Captain Black was Tom Mahoney's company commander with the First Battalion, First Marines during those final harrowing days of Khe Sanh. Signed copies of The Gunpowder Prince will be available via preorder through LtCol Black.

I will also be speaking about the battle of Khe Sanh on October 16, 2019, 2-4 pm, at American Legion #25 hall, 4 JFK Drive, Milltown, NJ (near the Rutgers University campus). Signed copies of all my Khe Sanh books will be available. This event is open to the public.

Between this Military Order of St. Louis and The Gunpowder Prince having been recipient, last April, of the Marine Corps Heritage Foundation's 2019 Colonel Joseph Alexander Award for distinguished biography, it's been a very good year for recognition of the gravity of what Americans and their adversaries on the Khe Sanh battlefield endured, accomplished, lost and now continue to live with, over fifty years after that longest and costliest pitched battle of the Vietnam War.

In addition to the book award dinner at West Point on October 17, 2019 (described in my previous blog of September 14, 2019), I will have two other speaking engagements. Attached is a flyer provided by my host for these events, the John Basilone Detachment #190, Marine Corps League--New Jersey.

While the West Point event is not open to the walk-in public, but requires preregistration (please co ntact LtCol (Ret) Robert Black for information about cost of the dinner, attire, time and directions, etc.), these two New Jersey events are open to the public.

If you know anyone in the area who might be interested, please pass this along. THANKS!

RECON TEAM KANSAS- KHE SANH 7 AUGUST 1971
THE LAST STAND OF RECON TEAM KANSAS: OUTNUMBERED WORSE THAN THE ALAMO DEFENDERS, HERE'S THE STORY OF A SOG TEAM'S DESPERATE LAST STAND.

By Maj. John L. Plaster, USAR (Ret.)

The once bustling Khe Sanh Marine Base in South Vietnam's extreme northwest had been a ghost town more than three years by the summer of 1971. Though used briefly that February to support the South Vietnamese Army's invasion of Laos, after that bloody debacle the South Vietnamese abandoned not just Khe Sanh but the entire region, yielding immense areas to the NVA, who almost overnight began extending their Ho Chi Minh Trail highways into South Vietnam.

In late July 1971, U.S. intelligence began tracking a large enemy force shifting across the DMZ a dozen miles east of Khe Sanh, threatening the coastal cities of Hue, Danang and Phu Bai where the last sizeable American ground units were based.

It was essential to learn what was happening near Khe Sanh, a mission assigned to a shadowy organization called "SOG." Created to conduct covert missions deep behind enemy lines in Laos, Cambodia and North Vietnam, the top secret Studies and Observations Group had shifted most of its operations in-country by 1971 to cover the continuing U.S. withdrawal.

From among its clandestine assembly of Army Green Berets, Navy SEALs and USAF Air Commandos, the Khe Sanh mission eventually became a prisoner snatch assigned to Recon Team Kansas, an 11-man, Special Forces-led element, which included eight Montagnard tribesmen.

But how do you grab a prisoner in the midst of 10,000 or more NVA?

Headed by an easygoing, lanky Midwesterner, First Lieutenant Loren Hagen, along with Sergeants Tony Andersen and Bruce Berg, the RT Kansas men had brainstormed through several scenarios until settling upon the best option: They would land conspicuously on an abandoned firebase -- which obviously would draw some sort of NVA reaction -- put up a short fight, then extract by helicopter. Except half of Hagen's men would stay hidden on the hill.

When the NVA sent a squad up to see if the Americans had left behind sensors or bombing beacons -- as SOG teams often did -- the hidden men would ambush the NVA, seize a prisoner and come out.

In case a serious fight developed, Lt. Hagen reinforced his team with three more Green Beret volunteers, Staff Sergeant Oran Bingham and Sergeants Bill Queen and William Rimondi, for eight Montagnard tribesmen and six U.S. Special Forces, a total of 14 men.

Landing at last light on 6 August 1971, Lt. Hagen surveyed the scrub brush and bomb craters below them and split his defense into three elements to cover the hilltop's three slopes. Immediately they went to work restoring the old firebase's two dilapidated bunkers and shallow trenches. The enemy must have seen them land, and Hagen reckoned to be ready.

A FOREBODING NIGHT

It was well after dark when the SOG men noticed campfires on two facing ridgelines, unusual because the NVA normally masked itself. By midnight enemy probers were at the base of the hill, firing provocatively from the north, south, east and west.

At 1 a.m. a USAF AC-130 Spectre gunship arrived, walking 40mm and 20mm fire around the hill nearly all night. Never once did the team fire their weapons, staying blanketed in darkness. Then at 3 a.m. the SOG men heard trucks and tailgates dropping. This was odd, very odd.

Beneath the hill, dismounting NVA soldiers formed up into platoons and companies, which their leaders marched through the darkness to their assigned attack positions, to wait for dawn.

Just before sunrise it became forebodingly quiet. Then Lt. Hagen heard more trucks arriving.

Fifty miles away at a coastal airbase, a USAF Forward Air Controller (FAC) and a flight of helicopters was lifting away for the false extraction; they would be above RT Kansas in 30 minutes.

As darkness gave way to light, Lt. Hagen detected glimpses of NVA on one slope; then on another slope pithe helmets appeared, bobbing in the fog. When his men reported NVA on the third slope, too, Hagen realized the hill was completely encircled by NVA -- but that would require a whole regiment, at least a thousand men!

"The NVA were laying a Soviet-made tactical fuel pipeline, like this one, near RT Kansas' hilltop, the first ever extended into South Vietnam. It would be of strategic value a few months later during the Easter 1972 Offensive." (Def. Intell. Agency) The NVA regimental commander understood he had to dispatch the Americans quickly. They'd inadvertently landed almost within sight of the Hanoi High Command's most critical new venture, the first six-inch fuel pipeline laid across the DMZ, absolutely essential in a few months when entire tank battalions rolled through here for the war's largest offensive.

Already the 304th NVA Division was massing here, plus a regiment of the 308th Division, preparing for the 1972 Easter Offensive.

A fourth battalion moved into place; then, concealed in the ground fog, a fifth battalion arrived. Later, SOG's commander, Colonel John Sadler, would learn an entire regiment had stormed the hill, supported by a second regiment, a mass assault by approximately 2000 enemy infantry.

A HUMAN WAVE

As the clearing ground fog disclosed that terrible truth, Lt. Hagen had no time for inspiring words, just serious soldier work; in those final moments he repositioned weapons while his men readied grenades and stacked magazines. The Catholic Montagnards made the Sign of the Cross. Then they came. A well-aimed RPG rocket smashed into Bruce Berg's bunker, collapsing it and signaling the attack -- fire went from nothing to ten thousand rounds per second! Andersen could see dozens of NVA rushing in lines up his slope, meeting them with his M-60 machinegun. Hagen hollered that he was going to check Berg, and ran directly into a ferocious maelstrom, with bullets ricocheting and slamming the earth in front of, behind, and beneath his dashing feet. He made it a dozen yards when fire from the other slope cut him down, killing him.

Then Klaus Bingham left a bunker to reposition a claymore and a bullet struck him in the head, apparently killing him. One Montagnard in a trench below Tony Andersen fired several bursts then jumped up to pull back and fell into Andersen's lap, dead. Four men had died in less than four minutes. It was up to Andersen now, the senior man.

THE LAST STAND

Small arms fire rattled closer on all sides and grenades lobbed up from below the hillcrest where waves of NVA were scurrying behind small rises and rolling from bomb crater to bomb crater. Andersen dashed over the hill to look for Hagen but couldn't see him anywhere just 100 khaki-clad NVA almost at the top! He fired one M-60 belt at NVA advancing up his own slope, then sped to the other approach and ran belt after belt on the 100 assaulting enemy. By then grenades started coming from behind him as NVA closed in from his rear. Just a dozen yards away, beyond the curvature of the hill, enemy heads popped up, cracked a few shots, then dropped back down.

Still a dozen minutes away, the approaching Cobra gunships went to full throttle, leaving the slower Hueys behind.

Meanwhile RT Kansas had just run out of hand grenades when a North Vietnamese grenade exploded beside Andersen's M-60, rendering it useless; he spun his CAR-15 off his back and kept shooting, then he tossed back another grenade but it went off in front of him, nearly blinding him, yet he kept shooting. More shrapnel tore into him, then an AK round slammed through his webgear and lodged in his elbow, knocking him down. He stumbled back to his knees and kept firing.

The perimeter was pinched almost in half when Andersen grabbed his last two living Montagnards, circled below the nearest NVA and somehow managed to reach the survivors on the opposite side. He found Bingham, started to lift him, and saw he, too, was dead from a head wound. All around him he heard, "zzzsss, zzssss, zzssss," as bullets flashed past his ears.

"To save your world you asked this man to die;
Would this man, could he see you now, ask why?"
Wystan H. Auden, Epitaph for an unknown soldier

He dragged Bingham back to where Bill Queen lay, wounded. Only Rimondi wasn't yet hit and still fired furiously. Andersen put them in a back-to-back circle just off the hilltop where they would make their last stand. AK bullets had destroyed their team radio, another slug had shot Andersen's little survival radio out of his hand so Rimondi tossed him another survival radio, their last.

Now the NVA were streaming, rolling over the crest like a tidal wave, their rattling AKs blending together into one never-ending burst.

Andersen's men were firing not at NVA but at hands wielding AKs over parapets and around bunkers. There was no place left to fall back. Andersen was shooting NVA little further than the length of his CAR-15 muzzle, and the time it took to speed-change a magazine meant life or death.

From the air it looked like an ant mound, with moving figures everywhere. Cobra lead rolled in and sparkled 20mm cannon shells around the surviving SOG men, and at last fighters arrived, adding napalm and Vulcan cannons to the melee. Then at last the assault ebbed, turned, and the NVA fled for cover, just as the Hueys arrived.

Though wounded repeatedly, Andersen crawled out to fire his CAR-15 to cover the landing Hueys. With Rimondi's help, Andersen dragged as many teammates' bodies as he could to the first Huey, then helped the wounded Queen and others aboard the second. "3 months before RT Kansas fought the most one-sided fight in American history, the USAF already had plotted three enemy pipelines running out of North Vietnam but these extended into Laos. The most critical pipeline was secretly being laid across the DMZ into South Vietnam." (USAF)

"Lt. Loren Hagen (right, rear) and Bruce Berg pose with five indigenous teammates. Both Hagen and Berg would die on the small hilltop, along with six of their Montagnard soldiers." (Photo by Tony Andersen) A Terrible Toll In one hellacious half-hour, nine of Recon Team Kansas' fourteen men had been lost.

Lt. Hagen had died, along with Bingham, Berg was presumed dead, six Montagnards had died, Rimondi and Queen both suffered multiple frag wounds, Andersen had been struck by both small arms fire and shrapnel, and their other two Montagnards, too, all had been wounded "It's amazing that any of us came through it with the amount of incoming that we were getting," Tony Andersen says today, 25 years later. He attributes their survival to his deceased team leader, Lt. Loren Hagen. "He epitomized what a Special Forces officer should be -- attentive to detail, a lot of rehearsals, followed through on things," he explains.

"We were ready. I think that was probably the only thing that kept us from being totally overrun. Everybody was alert and knew what was happening and was waiting."

As for Hagen's bravery, dashing into a wall of AK fire to try to save Bruce Berg, that didn't surprise Andersen, either. "Lt. Hagen was that kind of officer. He was a good man."

Against the lost of most of his teammates, Andersen learned, the USAF counted 185 NVA dead on that hill. Little RT Kansas had killed half a battalion and probably wounded twice that many NVA, but that gives Andersen sparse satisfaction compared to the loss of most of his team.

Perhaps Andersen's most difficult duty was carrying the bodies of his six Montagnard teammates -- his "family" he called them -- to their home village. "As soon as they saw us driving up in the truck, they knew. Wailing and moaning started, and all the grieving." The villagers gathered in a circle around the headman's stilted longhouse.

"Through one of the interpreters I tried to explain how proud we were of them, what good fighters they were, that they had died for a good cause."

That would be borne out a few months later when the intelligence generated by RT Kansas' spirited defense helped U.S. analysts read enemy intentions, enabling American airpower to counter the NVA's Easter Offensive.

And though details of this incredible fight would remain classified for decades, enough was disclosed that First Lieutenant Loren Hagen's family was presented the U.S. Army's final Vietnam War Medal of Honor; Tony Andersen, who held together what remained of RT Kansas through those final mass assaults, received the Distinguished Service Cross, while Queen, Rimondi, Berg and Bingham were awarded Silver Stars.

And now, today, with full disclosure, we can appreciate the significance of their fight:

At the Alamo, 188 Americans had stood against 3000 Mexicans, a ratio of 16-to-1; at Custer's Last Stand, 211 cavalrymen succumbed to 3,500 Sioux warriors, or 16.5-to-1; at the 1877 Battle of Rorke's Drift, the most heralded action in British military history resulting in -- 11 Victoria Crosses -- 140 British troops withstood assaults by 4000 Zulus, or 28-to-1.

warriors, or 16.5-to-1; at the 1877 Battle of Rorke's Drift, the most heralded action in British military history resulting in -- 11 Victoria Crosses -- 140 British troops withstood assaults by 4000 Zulus, or 28-to-1.

Lt. Hagen's 14 men had held on despite being outnumbered 107-to-one, four times as disadvantagious as Rorke's Drift and seven times worse than the Alamo, one of the most remarkable feats of arms in American history

OBIT

CHARLES S. CATRON, USMC KHE SANH VETERAN, DELTA CO 1/26 WEAPONS PLATOON SERGEANT

Let the memory of Charles be with us forever.

77 years old Born on June 17, 1942 in Belfry, Kentucky, United States. Passed away on October 2, 2019 in Norfolk, Virginia, United State

This memorial website was created in memory of our loved one, Charles Catron 77 years old , born on June 17, 1942 and passed away on October 2, 2019. We will remember him forever.

Charles was born in Belfry, Kentucky to Thomas Lee Catron and Ardith Taylor on June 17,1942. He is the beloved Father of April Marie Haines, Grandfather of Nicholas James Radford, and brother of George Thomas Catron, Robert McKinley Catron, and William "Red" Catron.

He joined the United States Marine Corps in November 1961 until September 1971 when he was honorably discharged after two tours of duty in Vietnam. He received the Purple Heart Medal along with a Navy Commendation Medal and earned numerous other awards while serving in the Marines. One of his proudest moments was when he was promoted to Gunnery Sgt.

After being at the Naval Hospital in Philadelphia he chose to make Delaware County his permanent residence and was a skilled bricklayer and eventually went on to work for Gulf Oil, Chevron, and retired from Sunoco Refinery in Philadelphia in 2004. My father was amazing in every way and I am so thankful to have had him in my life for so long and am proud to have had such a strong man guide me through my life. I will always remember his boisterous personality and laugh, his mischievous sense of humor and his way of always making people feel at ease. My dad would talk to anyone and I'm proud to have inherited that from him as well. He was truly my best friend and will be deeply missed.

His last wishes were not to have a viewing or a service, but to have a memorial online created and then be cremated and I will keep him here with me in Virginia. I invite anyone who knew Dad to please leave any kind of comment or fond memory of him on this page and also feel free to make a donation in his name to the Marine Corps Association Fund or to The Wounded Warrior Project if you so wish to do so.

THE MARINE'S PRAYER

Almighty Father, whose command is over all and whose love never fails, make me aware of Thy presence and obedient to Thy will. Keep me true to my best self, guarding me against dishonesty in purpose and deed and helping me to live so that I can face my fellow Marines, my loved ones and Thee without shame or fear. Protect my family. Give me the will to do the work of a Marine and to accept my share of responsibilities with vigor and enthusiasm. Grant me the courage to be proficient in my daily performance. Keep me loyal and faithful to my superiors and to the duties my country and the Marine Corps have entrusted to me. Make me considerate of those committed to my leadership. Help me to wear my uniform with dignity, and let it remind me daily of the traditions which I must uphold. If I am inclined to doubt, steady my faith; if I am tempted, make me strong to resist; if I should miss the mark, give me courage to try again. Guide me with the light of truth and grant me wisdom by which I may understand the answer to my prayer.

I love you my sweet Daddy and you will forever be in my heart and greatly missed

A DECADE OF MEMORIES WHITESIDE COUNTY HONOR FLIGHT VETERANS GATHER FOR PICNIC

MORRISON – Healing was on Ray Torres' mind when he put together the keynote speech for Sunday's Whiteside County Honor Flight Picnic at Morrison-Rockwood State Park.

This type of healing was more mental than physical. The Vietnam Marine was only a few months into duty when he was seriously injured during the Siege of Khe Sanh. He made it back home, but several of those he knew were not as fortunate.

Given the opportunity to visit the Vietnam Veteran's Memorial Wall in Washington, D.C. during an Honor Flight on April 21, 2016, he carried with him a list of names: corpsmen from corps school, field medical school, Marines from his Echo Company, and a high school classmate.

"For many years I had a difficult time dealing with the fact that 58,320 names of men and women whose names were on the wall through their acts of heroism, courage and valor, made the ultimate sacrifice for their country," Torres said. "Our country could not give these mostly young men and women the honor and respect that they should have truly deserved."

Torres began his speech by explaining how the phrase "welcome home" was a rare sound when Vietnam veterans returned from overseas. Nearly 50 years later, he and his fellow solders were given a much more positive and gratifying reaction when they came to Washington to visit several monuments, including the Wall.

"We were met by school children and boy scouts who lined the terminal the entire way," he said. "It was so unexpected and very emotional for me.

Just some of the good works my good friend Ken Korkow has dedicated his life too. He was a hero on the battlefield and a hero remains a hero among men.

My squad was facing the arrows coming up the hill. No NVA there all day until about 6:00 pm. That is when we were nearly all out of ammunition and I requested an air strike with napalm. The NVA were so thick that all you could see were helmets and flak jacket. We would be in hand to hand in less than 10 minutes. Some of the men fixed bayonets. The jets came in from the North east. We had orange placards out in front of our holes. Everyone got down in there holes as instructed. I asked that one bomb be used to hit the hole in the mountain to our south. They dropped their ordinance and a direct hit on the NVA big gun placement. Within minutes after the jets we were on the radio requesting evac. VCB refused our request stating Charlie Co was already evacuated.

I said everyone from the other hill. We are on a different hill and we are first platoon Charlie Co. The radio operator then asked that I identify myself. I told him that was not proper procedure. He stated they would not send choppers out without Identification. I told him to hide because when I get to VCB I was going to beat him to within an inch of his life. He signed off and I switch numbers on the radio until LZ Cameo answered from Khe Sanh. Told them we had 28 men and needed two 46s for immediate evacuation as we had just dropped napalm on over 200 NVA. We were mostly out of ammo. Within 10 minutes the birds came in. One loaded mostly mortars and gun teams and some of our guys. The second bird was loading with Sgt Jenkins being the first one on board as well as willie then I directed the rest of the guys on.

We had one KIA we could not get off the hill as a WIA. Lived for 3 hrs with a chest wound. Corpsman was killed right in front of me while I tended to him when someone on the other side of the hill hollered commander up. Anyway we were just getting ready to lift off when the first chopper went down. I asked the crew chief to wait a few second to see if anyone came out. One guy did and made it to our chopper. We lifted off and went to Khe Sanh. Three days later we found out the skipper and some more of our guys were alive at VCB. I wish someone would call me. 231-742-1106. I could explain better I think.

A FEW QUESTIONS ANSWERED IN REGARD TO NEW RULES GOVERNING SHOPPING AT MILITARY FACILITIES

More questions answered as installations get ready for the potential 3 million extra shoppers

An extra 3 million people will be eligible to shop at commissaries and exchanges, and have certain MWR benefits. (Defense Commissary)

A little more than two months before a new shopping benefit takes effect for about 3 million newly eligible shoppers, defense officials have tested and rolled out the system that will allow these shoppers through the gates. The technology is in place at the installations' gate scanning systems at all Air Force, Navy and Marine Corps installations, and at about 40 Army installations, according to Defense Department spokeswoman Jessica Maxwell. Starting Jan. 1, all Department of Veterans Affairs service-connected disabled veterans, Purple Heart recipients, former prisoners of war and primary veteran caregivers will be eligible to shop at commissaries and exchanges on base, and to use certain morale, welfare and recreation facilities. All veterans with VA service-connected disability ratings of 0 to 90 percent are newly eligible.

Service-connected disabled and other veterans who are newly eligible will use their veterans health ID card, or VHIC to gain access to the installation, and to shop.

Defense officials have added the capability of scanning the VHIC card at most installations' front gate scanning systems. The balance of the Army installations will have the capability by the end of September, 2020, Maxwell said, but most of the remaining installations don't have facilities that offer the benefits, she said, such as commissaries and exchanges.

The fiscal 2019 National Defense Authorization Act expanded the pool of eligible shoppers. The expansion also applies to Coast Guard facilities. The law also included Medal of Honor recipients, but they already had shopping privileges. Previously, veterans with 100 percent service-connected disabilities were able to shop; now all with service-connected disabilities can shop.

The benefit extends to MWR programs that are "revenue-generating facilities," according to the law. One example is golf courses.

This is the largest expansion of eligible customers in more than 60 years, and officials at the departments of defense, Veterans Affairs and Homeland Security have been planning for the rollout for more than nine months.

DON'T HAVE A VHIC CARD, BUT YOU'RE ELIGIBLE?

Officials have also come up with a system that will allow access for about 37,000 veterans who qualify for the new benefits, but aren't eligible for the VHIC. The only eligible veterans who aren't currently eligible for a VHIC are those veterans with a zero percent service-connected disability rating whose income exceeds the Housing and Urban Development indices, Maxwell said.

The VA will provide a letter to these disabled veterans indicating they are eligible for these privileges, even if not eligible for the VHIC," she said.

That letter, along with a driver's license, passport or other authorized form of ID, will allow these newly eligible shoppers access to the installation, and allow them to use the privilege at commissaries, exchanges and designated MWR facilities.

CAN MY SPOUSE SHOP, TOO?

Theoretically, no. However, your spouse and family members can come into the stores with you, but they just can't buy anything.

That said, it might take longer to get on base if they're with you.

The procedures for access to the installation require people without a DoD-issued credential to stop at the visitor control center to undergo a check for criminal history and terrorism indicators, Maxwell said. If the check is successful; if the person's credential presented can be enrolled; and the installation has installation access control system enrollment capabilities, guests may be able to enroll for recurring access for later visits with their sponsor.

DOES THIS NEW BENEFIT APPLY TO ME IF I LIVE OVERSEAS?

It does, unless you are living in an area where international agreements or host-nation laws limit access to commissaries and exchanges.

WHEN YOU CAN'T BE A WARRIOR ANYMORE...IS THERE A REASON TO GO ON?

Russ Kinion

Every day there are Veteran suicides and may are due to their PTSD but many also commit suicide because they feel they no longer have a purpose in life.

It's that hollow numbness, the sense that you are already dead, the complete lack of desire to go on, the craving to be gone, to be done here. The feeling that you are nothing more than an empty husk blown about by gusts of wind. There's nothing left of you.

You're not who you used to be. You look in the mirror and don't even recognize the vacant soul staring back at you. Nothing — and everything — gets to you.

Your body is here; but you're not here.

You lost the one thing that meant everything. The ability to be who you are. Because being a warrior who misses it like your heart has been torn from you, being that person wasn't just a job. It was — it is — who you are.

And to not be able to be who you really can be so extremely hard.

It can actually be soul crushing.

It's the reason death feels like a viable option.

Why were you put on this earth to find the one thing that makes you feel like your truest self, your deepest purpose, your reason for being here....and have that taken away from you?

That's what your life is now, right?

There's a reason warriors prefer to die in battle.

Because of this. The "what comes after" service ends. When your body gives out and you're not allowed to be who you know you were born to be. That void feels like you've already died.

No one talks about this part of it. We mourn those who take their lives, we cry out against their decision, we bleed inside at their loss.....and, we envy them.

Hard words. But true. There's a part of you that feels it every time a brother goes home early. You just can't tell anyone that.

The reality is part of you has died

A warrior's life after military service ends isn't like civilian retirement. When what you do is who you are — and anyone called into a service field, who is "born" to be what they do knows this — the end of it feels like death.

It is a type of death. The you that you knew yourself to be dies. The pain of it and the silence that shrouds it keeps it hidden.

Warriors who can't go back to war sometimes die inside. Quiet, aching, pervasive deaths. The longer you go on without a renewed purpose, the more of you dies. The emptiness, the sense that your soul has been cut out of you....it's real. You're not alone.

And you're not messed up for feeling it.

Civilians are elated when your service ends because it means you're out of harms' way. It means you survived. It means they can exhale. Finally. They expect you to find something else now to fill your time. Some of the perceptive ones will understand that this isn't about finding a new job – this is about mourning the loss of your identity and... finding a new one. (A new job doesn't give you a new identity — this is why it can be so hard to stick with a job after you get out.)

A warrior's purpose is to serve the life-death-life cycle

Identity comes from purpose. It comes from your sense of who you are and why you are here — in the bigger picture of lifetimes on earth.

A soul is born into a lifetime with a purpose. Being a warrior feels like it was your purpose. But being a warrior is the package for your purpose. The purpose lies deeper inside.

What was your purpose?

To defend? To protect? To destroy evil? To rescue? To save? To keep your brothers safe? To liberate?
Service itself?

You feel empty because you've lost your known purpose and meaning. It was all very clear for you before and now it's not.

The question is: can you take who you are and do something new with it? Can you identity what your soul purpose is and hold onto THAT, and find a way to live that now?

I can tell you this: a warrior will ONLY re-find purpose by finding a way to continue to be of service to life on earth. You're not made to be self-only-serving. It's not in your soul DNA to be on this earth without carrying out a mission that matters to humanity, to history.

You were born into this world to make a difference, to take risks, to change the status quo, to expose and eradicate evil, to uproot and open life to new possibilities, new change.

Yes, war destroys; absolutely. But it also creates. With the destruction of what was, comes the opportunity for newness. We follow a life-death-life cycle. It's natural law.

Being of service to this life-death-life cycle is who you are and you need to honor that.

It's true that you're never going to stop missing being a warrior. You're never going to feel as whole as you felt you were then. Some things cannot be replaced or replicated. You know that in your soul.

But you survived combat. God didn't take you.

You were saved and your purpose on this earth is NOT done.

I know this is hard. I know this tears at your heart. I know you are so close to choosing death because you can't feel anything right now. But that's an illusion. Feelings can be changed.

Make the hardest choice you will ever make
You are still here.

Your soul is still on this earth. So is your body. Ending your life now may seem like the only option, but is it?

You were called to service. Service is still your purpose.

Who can you serve? Who can you impact today? How can you take the strength that has been built into you and help someone else find theirs?
Can you lead someone to find their own courage?
Can you see that if you help one, it's the same as helping a thousand?

No, it's not combat. But you survived combat so you would have the wisdom you need to serve in a new way. What if THIS time in your life is what it was all for??

You are a warrior. You have to fight this one. You have to choose life. We need you.

It's the hardest choice you're going to make. Only you can make it.

Your heart was made to expand into newness. You were created to be able to adapt and overcome. Emptiness can be filled. Numbness can thaw. Pain can ease. Sadness can soften. Purpose can be rediscovered. What seems impossible to you right now, is possible.

You are needed here. By those in your life now, and by those destined to meet you.

Be here to show up for them.

Choose life. For me, for the rest of your brothers, for that one soul out there who is going to interact with you and because of your wisdom, your insight, your encouragement, your example of courage is going to change their story.....history takes a different turn when someone changes their story.
Change yours, Brother.

SOLDIERS WITHOUT A COUNTRY: WE'RE FINALLY HONORING SOUTH VIETNAMESE WHO FOUGHT WITH US

Jim Webb*, Opinion contributor Sept. 13, 2019

These unknown soldiers were shot down in a U.S. military C-123 during the Vietnam War. We should never forget those who stand beside us in hard times.

How do we as a society remember our dead, including those who lost their lives alongside us in our nation's wars? William Gladstone, a British prime minister during the 19th century, offered a timeless formula: "Show me the manner in which a nation or community cares for its dead, and I will measure with mathematical exactness the tender sympathies of its people, their respect for the law of the land and their loyalty to high ideals."

On Friday, a U.S. Air Force aircraft will carry the commingled remains of 81 airborne soldiers of the former South Vietnamese Army from Hawaii, where they have been stored in a military facility for more than 33 years, to California. On Oct. 26, there will be a full military ceremony honoring their service in Westminster, often known as Little Saigon, where tens of thousands of Vietnamese Americans now live.

This will be a unique occurrence because their names might never be known and because they were soldiers of an allied army. Following the ceremony, these forgotten soldiers will be laid to rest under a commemorative marker in the largest Vietnamese-American cemetery in our country.

This final resting place will mark a complicated, 54-year journey that began on a long-forgotten battlefield during a vicious war that tore apart our country and resulted in the deaths of 58,000 Americans and millions of Vietnamese.

In late 1965 an American C-123 was shot down, killing all four American crew members and 81 South Vietnamese Airborne soldiers. The crash site was located in a contested area and was not visited until 1974. Bone fragments and some personal paraphernalia were gathered, but all of the recovered remains were commingled and could fit into one large casket. The remains were shipped to Bangkok. The American crew members were later identified through DNA testing and were given a proper interment. But there was no flight manifest for the South Vietnamese soldiers. In 1986, their remains were sent to the U.S. military's POW/MIA lab in Hawaii, which is responsible for identifying those lost or missing from our nation's wars.

And there the remains of the South Vietnamese soldiers have been sitting for the past 33years. Because there was no flight manifest for such a combat mission, we will probably never know the names of those who were lost. They are identified only as members of an elite airborne battalion of the Army of the Republic of Vietnam.

The Hanoi government twice declined to accept them for a proper burial in Vietnam. And because these were not American citizens or soldiers, there was no clear way for them to be buried and properly honored in the United States. They are unknown soldiers, and have indeed become "Men Without a Country," after having given their lives on behalf of a country that no longer exists.

LAYING TO REST THE 81 IN FREEDOM PARK

I learned about this situation two years ago. For me, Gladstone's timeless message was a guidepost. If we are who we say we are as a nation and as a people, we should care not only for our own dead but also for those who served alongside us under great peril. These lost soldiers deserved to be remembered with honor and dignity.

After many months of intricate negotiations on both the diplomatic and legal front, this is now going to happen. On Oct. 26, after the memorial service in Westminster's Freedom Park, the soldiers will be interred near a memorial that remembers the courage and contributions of the hundreds of thousands of Vietnamese refugees who took to the sea during perilous times, risking everything to come to our country.

The ceremony will do far more than merely remembering the sacrifices and the five decades odyssey of those young soldiers who so long ago lost their lives for the ideals of democracy on behalf of a country that no longer exists. It will also serve as a reminder of the hundreds of thousands of other soldiers who lost their lives and the thousands of others whose remains might never be found.

The sad but epic journey of these lost soldiers from the battlefields of Vietnam to the largest Vietnamese-American cemetery in our country will provide closure for many others who paid their own price and made their way to America. It will allow our nation to remember and appreciate the contributions of the 2 million Americans of Vietnamese descent who have helped make us a stronger and more vibrant society.

And it will help us to remember who we are as Americans, and who we should always aspire to be: a people who treasure human life, and who will never forget those who stood beside us during extraordinarily difficult times.

After I arrived in Nam I asked my parents to send me a Delaware flag. After 8 months I transferred over to Dustoff and flew with them as a medic for 15 months, mostly in III Corps area out of Lai Khe. I carried the flag in my chopper. On the evening of October 31st, 1968, FSB Rita, next to the Cambodian border, came under sustained NVA attacks and we carried out many of the wounded over the course of the night. Around 4 AM the NVA were inside the wire and within the compound. On one landing we were told we had landed "in enemy held territory" within the camp, so we moved closer to the CP. By dawn the NVA were in full retreat. That night my flag got a bullet hole and was stained with blood (the whole chopper floor was covered with blood). Over the past 51 years I have had many Dustoff crews sign my flag, and last year at a 1st Infantry Div. "RITA" reunion it was signed by some of the guys there, including one of my patients I had dusted off. Two of the people who signed the flag have the MOH. The 1ID Museum has asked that I donate the flag to their FSB Rita collection. I probably will.

KSV IN THE NEWS

CLINTON — By any measure, Ray Gustafson served the military with valor. As a Marine in Vietnam from 1966 to 1968, he flew a helicopter carrier in the Tet Offensive and in the bloody Battle of Khe Sanh. Hit by a piece of bomb, he was told there was a 50-50 chance he would walk again. He taught himself to walk.

But Gustafson, who was among the 11 veterans honored at a Quilts of Valor ceremony last Saturday at the American Legion Post 66 in Clinton, now suffers from Parkinson's disease, Type 2 diabetes, and chloracne, a debilitating skin rash, all of which are directly linked to exposure to Agent Orange, the herbicide used as a defoliant in Southeast Asia during the war.

In meeting the Quilts of Valor Foundation mission to recognize "those service members and veterans touched by war," as its website states, the presentation was marked at once by a celebratory spirit, as well as an air of solemn gratitude — both for those who never came home and those still feeling its effects.

Before blessing the quilts, Rev. Ellen Kennedy asked the packed room to pause for a moment of silence in memory of Raymond Guarino, who was killed by sniper fire in Vietnam in 1966.

"He's the reason I'm here," said Ronald Manware, a veteran in the Army National Guard, who grew up with Guarino in West Haven, and was among those honored.

Sanford Sears, who served the Coast Guard stateside and in South Korea from 1973 to 2000, accepted his quilt on behalf of his late father, a Pearl Harbor survivor.

And Stephen McGuirk — one of six Marine Corps veterans being recognized — thanked the quilters for carrying on a long tradition.

"During our American Civil War," he said, "our government didn't supply very much for our soldiers. It was the women who made quilts and blankets that kept them warm."

In a powerful testimonial, Marine Corps veteran John Callahan, who served in Vietnam from 1965 to 1967, remembered "a hero who fell on a hand grenade, survived the blast, and gave aid to his wounded comrades before he died" and another who "flew his helicopter carrying wounded with enemy all around, tried to fly away, and was shot to the ground."

Then there was Gustafson, who was accompanied by his friend Gerry Wright, an Army veteran who served two tours of duty as a combat engineer in Vietnam from 1968 to 1971, and who's also afflicted with the effects of exposure to Agent Orange, including ischemic heart disease (hardening of the arteries), atrial fibrillation, a skin rash and neuropathy in his feet.

He's disqualified from disability benefits for the skin rash and the neuropathy because of a rule requiring soldiers to have reported symptoms within a year of being exposed.

"I didn't recognize the symptoms until it was too late," he said. "And I'm not alone. There are literally millions of us suffering from the effects. And we're dying at a rate of 390 a year."

Last year, Wright motorcycled more than 10,000 miles through 32 states, towing a trailer painted "sprayed and betrayed," and collecting more than 6,000 signatures in support of the Agent Orange Exposure Fairness Act to remove the one-year requirement.

"Why weren't we given protective gear?" Wright asked. "How could we request treatment when we didn't hear about Agent Orange until 1978, when most of us had been discharged? How can the government put an end date on all illness?"

It's not just his generation that's impacted, according to Gustafson, who's written a book titled "The Silent Enemy: The Insidious Legacy of Agent Orange," a reference to dioxin, a noxious element in Agent Orange, which resides in the fatty tissue and, studies have shown, can be passed on to multiple generations.

Gustafson's older son was born with a latent abnormality in his brain that manifested in his 30s. His younger son was born with a cleft palate. And his granddaughter has left ventricle hypoplasia and pulmonary stenosis.

"None of these are in our DNA," he said.

On Saturday, Gustafson, his quilt wrapped around his shoulders, struggled to accept congratulations, the result of lingering wounds from his heroic service almost five decades earlier.

"It's like the words I have stenciled on my trailer," Wright said, standing beside his friend. "I was killed in Vietnam but I just haven't died yet."

If you know a veteran you'd like to honor, visit www.qovf.org, find the "take action" tab, and click "request a quilt," or email jane.dougherty@qovf.org.

TOWN OF SPRAGUE UNVEILS FIRST STATUE HONORING FEMALE MILITARY MEMBERS IN THE STATE

SPRAGUE, Conn. (WTNH)– Underneath a red, white, and blue blanket with an image of an American Eagle on it, a statue waited to be unveiled.

"The detail of her uniform is amazing," said State Senator Cathy Osten, (D) Sprague who is a veteran herself.

Dozens gathered at the Town of Sprague War Memorial Park for the unveiling of a statue which is believed to be the first in the state.

"Women have been in combat all the way back to the revolutionary war," said Sen. Osten. "They just haven't been identified. Some of them pretended to be men."

It was in the 1990s that more job classes were opened up to women.

"The fastest growing demographic of veterans in America are women," said Rep. Joe Courtney, (D) Connecticut.

The statue which honors women in the military was seven years in the making. American Legion Post 85 in Baltic raised $50,000 to make this day a reality. "We are proud to be the first to recognize women in the military. Let's give yourself another round of applause," Sen. Osten told the crowd.

The bronze statue depicts a female soldier paying homage to a fallen comrade. Her helmet and weapon are by her side.

"It's really nice to see the women being acknowledged," said veteran Lois Cole of Hebron who fought back tears.

"To finally see women are being recognized in my state in a tangible way that I can come visit and look at and see myself represented in that young lady is powerful," said veteran Carlita Cotton of Mansfield. Cotton who served in the Air Force for twenty years as a Russian Linguist says all too often she was mistaken for the spouse or dependent of a serviceman.

"Sometimes the first question is why are you parking there? That's the veterans parking," said Cotton.

"I'm the veteran."

Surrounding the adjacent Fallen Soldier monument are the names of Sprague residents who were either were killed in action or died while prisoners of war.

"There are Civil War, from WWI, WWII, Korea," said Tom Coletti, Adjutant of American Legion Post 85.

The Fallen Soldier monument was installed a few years ago and is joined now by the first female soldier monument.

"We are hoping that this will start a trend," said Sen. Osten.

NEIGHBORS, FRIENDS RALLY AROUND LARGO VETERAN WHO RECEIVED QUILT OF VALOR

LARGO, Fla. — A Largo veteran and widower was in for a special surprise on Thursday.

Neighbors gave Bruce Bird a very special gift. He served in Vietnam in the late 60s. Bird was also a purple heart recipient along with many other awards and honors.

On Thursday, Bird received a Quilt of Valor. It's given to wounded service members and veterans all over the nations. "Just so honored to have it presented to me," Bird said.

Bird's family up north nominated him for the quilt, but they could not be there for the event. "I'm very proud of him and I had at one point four brothers in service, so I know what it would mean to them," Sharp said Bird said it meant the world to have his friends and neighbors there to support those who served and continue to serve .Glad that people appreciate other service men that served their country to give you something like this," Bird said.

ESSEX COUNTY FREEHOLDERS HONOR SOUTH ORANGE RESIDENT ON VETERANS DAY

NEWARK, NJ — The Essex County Board of Chosen Freeholders recently honored a South Orange Village Trustee among other veterans at its 2019 Veterans Celebration at the Hall of Records; while honoring the patriotism and sacrifice of the men and women who have served our country, the board recognized specific veterans of Essex County for their service. The Freeholders presented the honorees with framed commendations, plaques, and service medals.

Freeholder President Brendan Gill began the program with welcoming remarks, celebrating each of the Board's honorees for their bravery and selflessness. Freeholders Robert Mercado, Carlos Pomares, and Patricia Sebold also participated in the event by offering greetings to the guests in attendance, and summarizing the highlights of the honorees prior to presenting them with their medals and commendations. This year's honorees were West Orange Police Lieutenant Charles E. Bryant of the United States Navy, Victor M. Mandio, Jr. of the United States Army, the Honorable Edwin R. Matthews of the United States Marine Corps, Jorge E. Ortiz of the United States Navy, and the Honorable Juan M. Rivera, Jr. of the United States Marine Corps.

EDWIN R. MATTHEWS

The Honorable Edwin R. Matthews is a lifelong resident of South Orange and has served his community in many capacities including: Municipal Court Judge, Municipal Attorney, member of the Village Council, as well as a member of the Juvenile Conference Committee and a number of other committees for the Village of South Orange. After graduating from the College of Holy Cross, he served in the United States Marine Corps where he attained the rank of Captain. His service included a thirteen-month tour of duty in Vietnam with the Second Battalion 26th Marine Regiment, including eight months as an Infantry Platoon Leader. He was awarded the Bronze Star Medal, a Navy Commendation Medal, two Purple Heart medals, and the Vietnam Service Medal, with two stars. His unit was twice awarded the Presidential Unit Citation, including one for the defense of Khe Sanh. After active duty, he attended Seton Hall Law School and became an Assistant United States Attorney, where the Attorney General twice recognized him for Sustained Superior Performance. He is now in private practice and his office focuses on litigation and municipal law.

OBIT

DONALD J. GILLESPIE USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN, C CO 1/26

Donald James Gillespie passed away on February 1, 2020, surrounded by family and friends. He was a beloved husband, father, grandfather and friend.
Don grew up in Olney and attended St. Helena grade school and Cardinal Dougherty high school. Upon graduation from high school in 1967, Don entered the US Marine Corps — in what would become a defining moment in his life.

Don arrived in Vietnam in February 1968 near the start of the epic Battle of Khe Sanh. Two regiments of marines were badly outnumbered by soldiers from the North Vietnamese People's Army of Vietnam. The Marines, with the help of America's air support, maintained the base at Khe Sanh for 5 months. Over 1,500 Americans perished in the siege and another 7,600 were injured.

Don was wounded during the battle and spent many months recovering in the hospital. He returned to danger in Vietnam upon completion of his initial 12 -month deployment to rejoin his Marine comrades there. He was the recipient of two Purple Hearts and remained a proud Marine his entire life.

After returning from the war, Don spent his career in law enforcement. He joined the Philadelphia Police Department in 1974. He worked for the Philadelphia Police Department for 25 years, initially in West Philadelphia's 16th District and then in police transit. He was a K-9 officer and also worked in plainclothes. Later, he became a detective and worked in the sex crimes unit. He was a dedicated champion for abused women and children and received many awards and commendations.

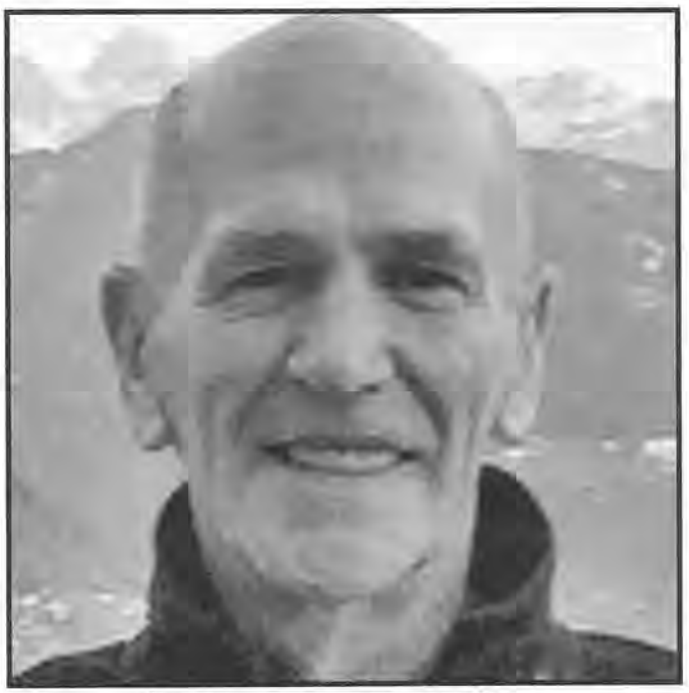
After retiring from the Philadelphia Police Department, Don went to work for the state of Pennsylvania where he continued his detective work investigating sex offenders. He was the first detective hired by the state to enforce Megan's Law. He retired in May 2015 after 16 years with the state.

Don had a lifelong love of baseball and coached for over 20 years for the Chestnut Hill Fathers Club. He enjoyed traveling and riding his Harley once the weather warmed up.

Don was a strong man with a kind, gentle spirit. He was known for his generosity and quick wit. He adored his grandchildren. He will continue to be cherished by those who loved him.

He is survived by his loving wife Judy Feighery, his four children Donald Gillespie (Lori), Jennifer Vogel (Adam), Matthew Gillespie and Benjamin Gillespie, five grandchildren and five step children. He is also survived by his brother George Gillespie and sister Patricia Gillespie.

Services were held at St. Genevieve Catholic Church, 1225 Bethlehem Pike in Flourtown, Pa., on Saturday, February 8, 2020.



OBIT

PUEBLO — Richard Allen (Rick) Campbell passed away Oct. 17, 2019 in Pueblo, CO after a lengthy illness. He was born Nov. 27, 1942 in Tulsa, Oklahoma. He graduated high school there and enlisted in the Navy, where he became a corpsman and served eight years.

Richard was a veteran of the Vietnam conflict, serving with honor and distinction with the 1st Battalion, Fourth Marines, Third Marine Division, Charlie Company, as part of Operation Robin near Khe Sanh in Quan Tri Province. Rick was wounded there on June 6, 1968. He received the Good Conduct Medal, National Defense Service Medal, Vietnam Service Medal, Purple Heart and Bronze Star Medal. The discipline and patriotism he earned in the Navy and Marines never left him, as friends and family will attest

After recovering from his injuries, he attended Oklahoma University for a time, then Oklahoma Baptist University graduating in 1978 with a Health Sciences degree. He worked at several hospitals in Oklahoma before becoming Administrator of Frederick Memorial Hospital Nursing Center, Director of Radiology, Lab, and Risk Management until retiring from there in June 2004. He then moved to Del Norte, Colorado and spent four years working in radiology at Rio Grande Hospital until 2008. Rick loved riding his Harley Davidson trike, he loved camping and hiking in the mountains, he loved his cats and dog, he loved watching OU football, and he loved all his family very much. He lived a full and amazing life and will be greatly missed.

Rick is survived by his loving wife Angelia, his sons Robert Allen (Deann) Campbell, Eric Lee (Ninet) Campbell, stepchildren Nick (Sara) Treadwell and Lauren Treadwell, his brother Earl Lee (Paula) Webb, sisters Wanda May Lewallen, Billie Joyce (Ron) Dodson, and Marilou (Mike) Myrick, grandchildren Kayla Campbell and Eric Nathaniel Campbell, numerous nephews and nieces and countless family and friends.

ONLY THE DEAD HAVE SEEN THE END OF THE WAR

ARTICLE FROM "MICHAEL'S BLOG"

COLONEL JOHN HENNELLY, USMC
JANUARY 27, 2020
MICHAEL ARCHER

The attached link is to a brief January 17, 2020, New York Times article describing a minor, but interesting, connection between the siege of Khe Sanh and Operation Desert Storm; and brought to my mind some fine memories of Lieutenant Colonel John Hennelly, commanding officer of the 1st Battalion, 13th Marines, our main artillery unit at Khe Sanh during the siege. Hennelly is the unnamed officer mentioned in this article, who was ordered directly by the Pentagon to use highly secretive COFRAM artillery shells (dispersing anti-personnel cluster bomblets) in defense of the U.S. Army Special Forces camp at Lang Vei during the night of February 6-7 1968, which was being overrun by hundreds of NVA infantry troops supported by Soviet-made tanks.

A seasoned artillery officer, and a man of great character, Hennelly "doubted very much their effectiveness" against what was transpiring at Lang Vei that night, with many U.S. Army and indigenous allies still desperately fighting within the camp, and so countermanded his instructions from higher-ups and returned to using regular high-explosive shells—all the while keeping some Pentagon egos unbent by leading them to believe he was still firing COFRAM. There were some career officers then in Vietnam who might not have risked advancement opportunities by potentially alienating superiors at the Pentagon. Lieutenant Colonel Hennelly was not one of them. He knew the right thing to do, and he did it.

I had been in a similar situation two weeks earlier, a couple miles up Highway 9 from Lang Vei, when the Combined Action Platoon I was with in Khe Sanh village was assaulted by hundreds of NVA (but luckily no tanks). There, we quickly employed the prearranged defensive artillery fire that Hennelly had devised for us in anticipation of such an attack. He had correctly predicted the directions from which the enemy would approach, and his variable-timed (VT) artillery airbursts decimated them—saving my life (Unfortunately, Lang Vei was unable to withstand the armored vehicle assault---and fell). After leaving the village, I returned to the tiny, underground regimental Fire Support Control Center (FSCC), where I had the opportunity to work alongside Hennelly each night for the next ten weeks, as he sat with quiet confidence on a stool by a map in the corner, expertly directing his batteries in successfully keeping our thousands of nearby attackers at bay.

I recently came across some emails I'd exchanged with his son, Tom, a dozen years ago. Regrettably, I had overlooked these messages at the time I was writing The Gunpowder Prince, and so missed an opportunity to include a little more information about the subject of that book, the enigmatic Captain Mirza Munir "Harry" Baig.

Tom was too young to remember that period, but had consulted his older brother, Tim, for his recollections. Tim recalled that his parents had been very upset upon learning of Baig's unusual death in 1971. As a lieutenant in the early 1960's, Baig had been assigned to Hennelly's artillery unit at Camp Lejeune, North Carolina and was invited to dinner at the Hennelly's home on several occasions.

Mrs. Hennelly later spoke about how fond she was of him, and the clandestine nature of his time in the Corps, saying "he [Baig] was involved in some very secret things." She said that her husband was one of the very few friends that Baig had in the Marine Corps because, "he apparently was looked upon with some suspicion by his fellow officers." She did not elaborate, so we don't know whether it was due to the secretive nature of his work; or because he was a recently naturalized U.S. citizen who had immigrated from South Asia; or his eccentricities and occasional haughtiness; or perhaps some of each.

According to Mrs. Hennelly, as the siege began at Khe Sanh, her husband, who now knew first-hand of Baig's intellectual gifts and dual expertise in both artillery and counterintelligence, specifically requested that the captain be assigned to work with him in the FSCC. Together, with Baig's uncanny ability to locate the hidden enemy, and Hennelly's talent for destroying them with his guns, the base was spared, and many thousands of American lives were saved. Baig was effusive in his praise for Hennelly's actions during the siege, later writing the Marine Corps Historical Branch:

Lieutenant Colonel Hennelly kept us all together and judiciously prevented us from running amok in the FSCC with outrageous propositions. In emergencies his intellect enabled to him to maintain control of nine batteries firing continuously on shifting targets and one radar-controlled air strike every ten minutes. No one else in the FSCC could have done so."

After the war, Hennelly served as the liaison between the House Armed Services Committee and the Pentagon. As a child, Tom recalled their home contained much memorabilia that Congress had presented to his dad, but almost nothing from the war, a subject the colonel spoke little about. Colonel Hennelly soon became frustrated with the political climate in the period following U.S. military involvement in Vietnam, especially how it was negatively affecting his beloved Corps, and decided to retire and take a job as the senior military instructor at the all-boys, Catholic High School in Little Rock, Arkansas. It was a job, Tom later said, that gave his father the most satisfaction of any in his life, and he spent the next twenty-three years positively influencing the lives of thousands of young men.

I could see that side of him even as a 19-year-old at Khe Sanh. Hennelly was a true gentleman who treated everyone, from the lowliest PFC (like me) through his subordinate officer ranks, with the same level of dignity. He had a fine sense of humor and never had to raise his voice or threaten, yet fully commanded everyone's respect. In April 1968, as the siege of Khe Sanh finally lifted, Hennelly left Vietnam. Many months later, he was back as part of an Inspector General contingent from Okinawa. My regiment was then positioned just northwest of Da Nang, and one day he visited. Upon spotting me at my radio, he called out my name, strode over and shook my hand while slapping me several times on the back. We talked about the bad old days at Khe Sanh and updated each other with info on others we had worked with there. To this day, I don't think I've ever had a greater feeling of personal gratification than on that afternoon, to be remembered so kindly by someone who I respected immensely and whose role in my continuing existence on this planet cannot be overstated.

Colonel Hennelly died in 1995. Over two thousand mourners attended his funeral—a graphic example of the constructive impact he had on so many lives, over so many years. How fortunate I have been to be associated with extraordinary men like this, who were at their very best in the very worst of circumstances.

MARINE CORPORAL ROBERT R. SPURGEON PASSED AWAY FROM LUNG AND BRAIN CANCER , NOVEMBER 13, 2019. HE WAS IN A/1/26 AT KHE SANH 1967-68 IN 1LT WILLIAMS' PLATOON.

Rick, was a wonderful and gracious individual. We attended several Khe Sanh reunions together! he was a class act!! A great and unimaginable loss. A gentleman for sure. A prolific Leatherneck without a doubt. A man with unquestionable loyalty. A courageous individual. He will be missed by many, to include his Brother Marines affiliated with the "Khe Sanh Veterans Association." With deepest sympathy, may Ricks family, friends and those who have had the privilege to know him, be comforted by all the great memories he leaves behind. May he "Rest In Peace."

Single Bullet Passes Through 2 Helmets

By GySgt. John Conick

VANDEGRIFT COMBAT BASE — Two infantrymen from "D" Co., 1st Bn., 9th Marines, consider themselves to be the luckiest Marines alive.

A single enemy bullet penetrated, then bounced off, both their helmets during an assault on enemy positions during Operation Dewey Canyon. Neither Marine was hurt.

First striking the helmet of Pfc. Robert M. Moxley (11065 S.W. 79th St., Tigard, Ore.), the bullet ricocheted through the helmet of the second Leatherneck, Pfc. Ronnie J. Tucker (1903 Ridge Ave., Rockford, Ill.).

Moxley suffered a slight scratch on the head, while Tucker received no wounds, only a punctured helmet.

"I guess the good Lord was looking after us," said Moxley.

Moxley had lettered earlier on his helmet, "Put Your Trust in God," and "The Lord Be With Us."

A FEW EXCERPTS FROM REVEREND RAY W. STUBBE'S DIARIES ON HIS TWO CHRISTMAS VISITS IN VIETNAM, AT KHE SANH & DANANG.

MONDAY 25 DECEMBER 1967 CHRISTMAS DAY

I walked back to the combat base early to ensure I'd be able to get to the hills. It was a beautiful day. At 0800, the battalion One Four called saying resupply was beginning. I immediately walked to the LSA, arriving about 0910. The choppers were indeed flying, but didn't stop at the LSA. Minutes ticked away

At 1000, I departed the LSA since I couldn't get to a hill, wait while the people gathered, lead worship, and then return by 1100 to hold services on the base. Just as I walked away, the choppers began resupply! I walked to the regimental One Four and battalion One Four to inform them I wouldn't be able to go to the three hills until 1140.

When I stopped by H&S Co, I discovered we just received a new group of men. I asked if they could have off in order to attend worship, but LT Fitzgerald the S-1 said they wouldn't be available until 1500 after checking in; they couldn't have off the hour to attend services on Christmas Day.

The day started off badly, but the remainder of the day was glorious. I feared there'd be no one coming to the 1100 service, but we had 31 in attendance. I grabbed a piece of fruit cake at my hooch and proceded by foot to the 3/26 CP just outside the main gate. A few men gathered here and there. The Father was still saying Mass in the large tent; over 100 communed. He departed and the Protestant group entered.

By the time they all sat down, it was fortunate the walls were lashed up, for the men were overflowing outside the tent, seated all over the ground. I asked one of the men in the rear to take a count. He counted 168! This is the largest worship service I've had in the Nam. I then had the driver take me to the LSA.

They were still resupplying, just finishing Hill 950. It is always hazardous going up there since the clouds start coming in at any time and there are, of course, fewer there than on 861 or 881. Also, the unit on the hill had just rotated about half an hour earlier. I still wanted to get up there. All was confusion as the men were getting their gear stowed. There was also a special hot chow which had arrived and there was the small size of the hill. I was anxious to get started so I could go to the other hills; also the clouds were beginning to roll in, and from past experience, I could very well be stuck up there a whole week or more! So we held our service, attended by 11 out of the platoon-almost all available men.

I had to wait about half an hour to depart. A thick cloud had engulfed the hill, but miraculously passed by. Returned to the LSA, resupply had terminated, and they weren't going to 881 or 861. I walked to the regimental One Four. Learned there were no Huey's or anything else going up. Walked back, just in time to meet the pilots. I was somewhat distressed over it all. If necessary, I would remain over night) on a hill. They said, "Do you want to go to one of the hills? Well, we'll take you up." What could I say? All my anger dissipated-and the pilots were Roman Catholic. They did it for the Protestant chaplain!

(The Father today kept to the same regular Sunday schedule, visiting the same places on the base and at the same times as he had yesterday). So we had a superb supper at regiment-sliced turkey, cranberries, and even ice cream! and then went to the 34s and I got a flight to 881. I could only remain there 50 minutes, so I held services as soon as I could. There wasn't much time to get the people gathered, but we did get 40 from the general area of the LZ. Christmas was celebrated in the most remote U.S. base in Vietnam this year, and I could say to the men, "Unto YQ.Y is born this day a Savior!"

Captain PIPES, the new CO of "B" Co, remarked they would be leaving the hill tomorrow with a unit of 3/26 temporarily taking it over. Hill 861 would also be relieved, and 1/26 is going into the field on Wednesday. Although 3/26 made no contact with the enemy during their five-day operation.

I returned and counted all the offerings. The offering from the 3/26 service alone was $62.30! I unpacked all the goodie Christmas packages. Some of the unexpected items received today and recently included: a revolving Swiss music-box small Christmas tree from the Sandeens in North St. Paul [parents of the wife of one of my very good seminary student friends, Bob Wurtz], various items including a fruit cake from Orphanellas (Peter Orphanella was a student who attended my home church and invited by my parents to their home for supper and relaxation], two boxes of candies and nuts from Mr.& Mrs. Ed. Anderson. (Ed Anderson was our parish secretary), a large box of nuts from the Bohnsacks ("Bud" and Lazette Bohnsack were very good friends of my parents for over 50 years], a package of goodies from the Blessingtons (Dorothy Blessington was a good friend of my mom). I received a huge, expensive-looking card from LT Inskeep of VAW-13 at Alameda, California, the only pilot from that good group of men I had known from the summer last year. A collapsible aluminum Christmas tree which I received from mom and dad was given to the Top to give to the line companies. I saw it on top of Hill 950 when I visited.

This Christmas away from home has been very hard. With Glenn gone (NOTE; Glenn WALLER was my enlisted clerk who rotated home), I felt even more alone. When emerging from the 1100 service, an Air Force plane hovered overhead, blaring out "Joy to the World." I almost cried, gulped so fast so my Adam's apple seemed hard and sore, but I held in my emotions.

I saw LTCOL Wilkinson and asked if I couldn't go along on the battalion operation. He said OK. Took down a large carton of some of the goodies I'd personally received as Christmas packages to the men; they truly need it more than I!

Colonel Lownds, upon suggestion of a PFC volunteer, went into Khe Sanh village today. The PC dressed up as Santa Claus and distributed candy. Colonel Lownds later told me, "It makes me sick when I see all the protest and here is a young man risking his life for bringing life to others."

From today, 25 December, to 31 March, battalion 3/26 was disposed as follows: Company "I" on 881-South; company "K" on 861; Company "L" manning the RED (western) sector of the combat base perimeter; Company "M" (minus) on the western finger of 881S; the remainder of Company "M" as the regimental reactionary force, in the RED Sector.

WEDNESDAY 25 DECEMBER 1968

Went to Camp Carter early, arriving 0745 in order to be there in time for the vehicle to arrive 0800 to take me to the Marble Mt. Security Force service scheduled for 0830.

There had been a near riot situation caused by a couple of Black Army Soldiers who were UA from their unit, who began beating up on another black who was sitting with a group of whites. The message of peace on earth "to men with whom He is pleased" seemed very revealing.

Had they been at Christmas Eve services to focus on Christ and not on themselves and their situation, this sort of thing would not have occurred. One could well say to the Command, "Well, what did you expect when you promote drinking and give absolutely no support to the religious, moral program of the Command?" (LCDR Graff was also disturbed at the 10 or so officers at Carter, none of whom were sober). The argument that they have it so bad is hardly applicable! They have it too good!

It got to be 0830, but no vehicle. I telephoned. It's on its way, I was told. 0800, still no vehicle. At this point, I had to leave since my next service was at 1000 at the White Elephant. I couldn't get down there, hold a 15-minute service, and return, in time. It especially caused me some degree of anguish (1) because had I not depended on the vehicle, I would have walked there as I did yesterday, and (2) I know there were men there who wanted the Christmas services.

(Example of the demonic - seeds snatched before germinating!)

I was, by now, filled with so much disappointment and discouragement, but not really anger, that any possible feelings of nostalgia, homesickness, or depression for being over here at this season, was not possible!

It was a beautiful day. Sunday had been rain from afternoon on. Monday was rain in morning and threatening in afternoon. Tuesday was cloudy in morning and sunny in the afternoon. Today was sunny all day.

The White Elephant service numbered only twelve-that number including Axtel from Carter, that had been there last night; Straubel, and Kibbey, 1/Lt Heller, the Air Force man at Camp Horn (III MAF) DASC who attends my Lutheran services at the Old Air Force chapel, and four who don't normally come. Captain Childs, Commanders Rose & Hayes, none of these were present.

Kibbey felt this was so small. I normally would have also, except I was overjoyed to at least have one service! Dropped Axtel at Carter and went to Tien Sha; grabbed a few chocolate chip cookies for "lunch" and then picked up the PH1, Rus Elder, a LDS man, the photo journalist.

He wasn't too happy about this assignment and was talking on a phone while I was anxious to get going since we had a very tight schedule to meet. But we finally got going.

Our first stop was the POW camp adjacent to Fifth Special Forces. A platoon (Second) from G/2/1 is here to augment the ARVN security. A small group was off playing a guitar to entertain the Chieu Hoi while others were inside the barracks. We all assembled outside the barracks, all inside a barbed wire enclosure and my back was to a sandbagged bunker. On top was an upside-down helmet on which I had placed the cross-the same one I had used at Khe Sanh during the siege where I went from bunker to bunker and trench to trench.

All the men present attended. I know there were some Roman Catholics there. One man said, "I'm Catholic." Another man said, "So am I, but let's go anyway." When we said the Lord's Prayer, only a few continued with "For Thine is the Kingdom .. " The hymns were sung loudly I couldn't hear myself sing! There were 25 men present at that service! As I left, I removed the cross. put it back in the metal ammo box, and told Straubel, "That's how we hold services with Marines," referring to the informality or altar, etc., the calling together, the enthusiasm, and the many thanks for remembering them which the men expressed.

We went next to the CAP compound. The Christmas tree I had given them was on a stake in the center held fast by engineering stakes. The Sergeant was standing naked in the compound shower. "I thought you were coming yesterday," he said. Evidently the COC of 3rd LVTs told everyone I was coming that very day.

We got Everybody together, gathering around the tree; two sand bags formed my altar. The men all sat down, including a visiting Captain. The beautiful Marble Mountains were in the background. The worship was again spirited. I could really preach God's glory as a glory involving His concern for all men, announcing to the small band of shepherds the angel's message:

(1) Like these shepherds, these men were ordinary, simple, uneducated, dirty, and a small group, and not in the temple at worship, and God came to them.

(2) Like the shepherds braving the dangerous say to Jerusalem to worship, I could feel I was braving the booby-trapped ways of uncertain country to worship God by serving them. (In a sense Christ was present me as the brother in need).

(3) Like the shepherds had to go back to their daily tasks, so also do these men-right away, in fact, sin work is 7 days a week.

The LTCOL in charge of CACS sent small bottles of whisky as a Christmas gift to all the men, attached; label reading: "This is one 'shot' you won't have to duck!"

Talking of gifts, at all these worship services, I passed out the new Testament in Today's English Version given by the American Bible Society, to each man present and practically every man took one. Their Christmas present was the Word! They really like those pocket-sized New Testaments that are easily understandable.

We then left for CROW'S NEST. We drove all the way into NUl KIM SON village. A Gunny in the new camouflaged utility uniform stopped us, cautioning us not to proceed any further since there have been four vehicles lost in the past week in this village from booby-traps and mines. When he discovered we were going to climb the hill, he was surprised and overjoyed that we would climb the hill for these men. He said he himself has on occasion gone up there and slept overnight.

Straubel returned with File since File had a watch. Elder and I walked toward the hill. We heard loud rifle fire ahead of us and didn't know if we should go up. Elder was very apprehensive and I recalled the Sergeant of 3rd LVTs yesterday saying there were two suspected VC-NVA companies in these hills. But I was sure the shots weren't hostile file, so we continued. These men were practice firing into an old abandoned pagoda on the hill just south of Crow's nest. Elder, looking up the hill, said, "You've got to be kidding; it's all a bad dream, isn't it?"

We started up, while shots of rifles and pistols reverberated loudly between the two hills. It is a very dangerous climb. ELDER had two cameras dangling in front of him, but we finally got up. Breathless, panting, and very, very thirsty, we made it to the top. (Here, again, they thought I was coming yesterday). On this hill are about 18 men, not all, however were on the hill right now. Included are some Army personnel, Marines, and naval Gunfire liaison people

I had forgotten my cross, but had brought the New Testaments and Christmas bulletins with some booklets (from the Salvation Army) stuffed in my trouser pockets. We all assembled around the 106mm recoilless rifle. Didn't stay around too long as the sun was beginning to set. God had visited his people-me, too, of course, in all this experience. I had had 100% attendance at the POW camp, CAP unit 2-5-1, A-6, Hospital, and Crow's Nest. Perhaps I felt no fear during all of these visits because I was so absolutely assured of the Lord's Presence with me. It was palpable. The Marines offered me sodas at the CAP unit and A-6 and offered me water on Crow's Nest. When we care for each other, the Lord's Presence, which is always present, is somehow activated and we are all blessed.

CHAPLAIN RAY CLIMBING CROW'S NEST
(With a Little Help)

We parked at the sentry gate and walked over sand dunes, through cans and debris, up a long and sandy trail, past a clump of beautiful flowers, towards Hill

ALFA SIX, watching for booby-traps all the way. It was very exhausting and I was beginning to have great doubts about being good enough shape to scale CROW'S NEST Hill!

ON CROW'S NEST
CHRISTMAS DAY 1968

A Marine met us up at the hill. Several Vietnamese boys were there in helmets and flak vests that went down to their knees, a very "different" sight! The Marines said there really was not such a great danger of booby-traps.

One man recognized me from the picture that had been in Stars and Stripes. Everyone who was on that hill was present. (Weishun, the Lutheran who had been on this position was no longer there.) This place also had expected me yesterday.

Following the service, I walked about the different peaks of ALFA-SIX and took a few pictures here and there.

We then went to the NSA Station Hospital. Chris Young was conducting an Episcopalian service. Ted Clark, the yeoman, went about getting the names of all the Lutherans. There was a patient in the chaplain's office with a shaved skull resembling a friar! Upon closer observation, however, a long cut with stich marks on either side was visible on top of his head. He was on AFP duty, going through the skivvy house and got knocked on the head by an engineering stake. He recalled me from Khe Sanh; he was there 10 Oct 67 - 20 March 1968: John B. Mahar, 454 Main Street, Hingham, Massachusetts.

A Jewish man at the chaplain's office told me that his mezuzah had stopped a piece of shrapnel-a small thing like that! (like stories of how a small pocket Bible in a flak vest stopped a bullet)

Walked through the wards to talk with Lutheran patients. One ward had hundreds of large paper snow flakes suspended from the ceiling. One man said "It sure isn't like being at home." One ward had half a dozen children with deformed faces. A serviceman was lying on his back on a bed holding one, sitting on his chest.

All the Lutheran patients who I contacted came, including File, the Seabee from Camp Carter, who had come last night. (Straubel picked him up after we left A-6). It was dark in the chapel. A small manger scene was next to the altar in place of the lectern.

Chaplain Bohula had told Ted Clark I could use the golden chasuble the DaNang archbishop had lent, if I wanted, but I didn't use any vestments.

I felt no fear during all of these visits because I was so absolutely assured of the Lord's Presence with me. It was palpable. The Marines offered me sodas at the CAP unit and A-6 and offered me water on Crow's Nest. When we care for each other, the Lord's Presence, which is always present, is somehow activated and we are all blessed.

I was sitting around my favorite watering hole a few years ago after playing a game of golf, shooting the stuff with a few old guys my age. The discussion got around to serving in Vietnam and "where were you and what did you do." One of the guys talked about his time in the Air Force and how he saw the world and the various bases and countries he had been in. Another talked about his time in the Navy and the food on the ships and how his bunk was right under the flight deck and the noise it made. Another said that he was in the Corps but never made it to Vietnam but had spent time at Twenty-Nine Palms and Okinawa. Then one of the guys smiled and asked me where I was, while I was in the Marine Corps. Of course, everyone knew I have served during the Siege at the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh. I didn't want to disappoint anyone. I tried not to make my story into a whine, but I knew what they all wanted to hear. I started out with "I Never…"

I figure I spent ten months on the Khe Sanh Combat Base. The other times in Quang Tri after the Siege, guarding something way off away from everything. Anyway, my story started off, "I never sat on a flush toilet, I never spoke to a Vietnamese, I never was in a town or large village, I never went into a bar, I never took a bath or shower from a forced water pipe, I never walked on cement or asphalt, I never saw an American women, I never slept in a bed, I never had a pillow, I never slept in sheets, I never saw a television, I never listened to a radio, I never sat in a chair, I never wore any under clothing, I never had my cloths washed except when I washed them in a bucket, I never ate a hamburger or had french-fries, I never had any shaving crème, I never walked on a rug, I never had more than one pair of boots, I never stood near a heater, I never had more than one pair of socks, except for two occasions of warm beer I never had an adult beverage, I never went to a USO show, I never went anywhere without a weapon, I never had nor wore civilian clothes, I never saw nor did I talk to any civilians, I never rode in a car…"

I think I stopped at that and looked around, I was kind of shocked to see the look on all of their faces, mouths were open and eyes were wide and strangest of all, no one said anything. I said, "I think it's time for me to go home" and I stood up and walked out. When I got home, I thought a great deal about what I had said and oddly the list got longer. I looked around my house and the list of "I never" just seemed to continue on forever. I hate the "my time was tougher than your time" because each has their own individual crosses to bear and after all, I knew that my deprivation was much less than many and certainly less than those up in the hills of Khe Sanh.

But for bar speak, it turned out to be a rather interesting topic, not a boast, perhaps more of a whine.

THIS IS MAJOR BILL WHITE (RETIRED), THE OLDEST LIVING MARINE AT 104 YEARS OLD.

HERE'S A LITTLE MORE ABOUT THE MAJOR:

In 1934, enlisted with the Marine Corps and crossed the equator on board the USS Colorado in 1936 as a "shellback." He was stationed at Pearl Harbor from 1936 to 1937 before being transferred to the 4th Marine Regiment in Shanghai.

When WWII started in 1942, Bill was assigned to Parachute School and was transferred to the 4th Parachute Battalion in Bougainville. When the paratroopers were recalled from the Pacific in 1943, he went to the Parker Ranch in Hawaii to prep for the invasion of Iwo Jima. Something big happened to Bill at the time while the invasion occurred.

Bill arrived at Iwo Jima on February 19, 1945. On the morning of February 28th, he was heading to the front lines. He was told to relieve another Marine in a foxhole. Tapping him on the shoulder, Bill said, "I'm here to relieve you." When the man turned around, Bill realized that the Marine was his brother -in-law, the only brother of his wife. They only had the opportunity to say hello and then goodbye as they switched positions.

On March 3rd, Bill led his men to the direction of the Japanese front line. Under a salvo of rocket fire and grenades, he made his way closer to the line. After throwing two grenades, one of the Japanese grenades hit close to Bill, picking him up and slamming him against the wall. After staggering back to the First Aid Station and getting patched up, they listed him as a GSW or Gun Shot Wound. Nothing Bill could say changed their minds, and he was sent back to the U.S.

WHAT A WONDERFUL MARINE FAMILY

ARTICLE SUBMITTED BY LEWIS "SAM" MESSER, USN SEABEES CBMU-301 DET-B KHE SANH VIETNAM

Time frame late Feb early March, 1968, Khe Sanh Combat Base, During the "Siege", the Runway a 3900 ft of aluminum MA l planks was the daily target of the NVA's Artillery, Rocket and Mortar Gunners. The Seabees of Construction Battalion Maintenance Unit 301 Detachment Bravo, or CBMU 301, Det. B. maintained that Runway every day for the entire "Siege'

The runway was the lifeline for supplies, medical evacuation and when possible replacements The men of 301 would muster sometimes 3 teams to repair the damage, this was a daily task, On this one day our Team leader, P.O. Leblanc or Frenchy, Jim Post and myself (Raymond Cruz) are given order to investigate a sighting of a large crater on the eastern end of the runway. Now this runway was 3900 feet long but, a little less then 1/4 of the eastern end was in no mans land, that is outside of the perimeter

Frenchy had already scoped out the area, and requested we take the Pettibone a "cherry picker" or Silent hoist and one of our Deuce and 1/2, the one with no brakes. Most of our equipment was in pretty bad shape from all of the shrapnel hits, being that our yard was next to the runway.

Now am sure that somewhere, there exist a manual written by a MIT graduate on how to safely stop a 2 1/2 ton dump truck on a aluminum surface with bald tires and no brakes. A quickie on how its done, you time your speed & distance so as you approach the desired location, you accelerate, turn, actually yank the steering in one direction as you start your 360 (donut) pull on the emergency brake, those of us that had enough hours using this method could got real close and we don't count the more then a 360 revolution as errors as long as we stopped.

I drove the Pettibone with Jim as shotgun, Frenchy was a performer with that 2-1/2, he was there waiting for us at the end of the runway. We approach this crater and I mean real crater and deep. I begin to understand why the Pettibone was requisitioned.

This hole is over 6' feet wide closer to 8, and about 25' or better deep. We are looking around for the cause, no burn marks shrapnel or evidence existed. The decision was made to send Jim on the end of the cable to investigate, I should mention that Jim was not thrilled about this, a small debate about why and who would do this resulted in Jim volunteering, what dedication and espirit de corps or something like that

Just as we ready Jim on the cable and hook, we hear the distinct sound of a mortar leaving its tube so we run for the trenches near the side of the runway. Frenchy yells I saw a flash, Further Geographic description of KSCB, the Base is at a elevation of about 4900 ft and quickly descend into a valley, the eastern end of the runway is also the end of this plateau, Standing at the end of the runway, you can see the valley, several thousand feet below. We make love to Mother Earth, that is we grab as much dirt as we can and get real close ,for anything above the horizon of the lowest point and you get nominated for a Purple Heart, Frenchy had one and Jim two.

I never claimed one, having lived a good life and blessed with speed. We wait the mandatory time and get back to work. Again we hear that familiar sound and again the dash for cover, Frenchy is not running but standing there looking into the valley, and yells I KNOW WERE THAT SON OF A B%# IS .. He is on the radio to the Tower. A short time later a small group of Grunts appear, one of them with a Long Rifle and scope, a real sniper. They begin jawing with Frenchy. This one Grunt and Frenchy come over instruct Jim and I to go ahead and start working again. Jim and I are a bit confused, we know what gonna happen and this NVA mortar keeps getting closer. They assure us that its ok, (to be used as Bait) Being good Sea bees and follow orders, I fire up the Pettibone. Here is the kicker, when it would turn over it smoked something awful, which was a turn on for this NVA gunner, again we hear the Mortar as it leaves the tube. Jim and I are on the go again, Jim was never a good match for my speed and agility.

A few minutes pass and this one Grunt and Frenchy are pulling us from the bosom of Mother Earth. Explaining that they have a good fix on this NVA and we should try this again. With dedication in our hearts we accept, this time Jim gets a jump on me, he must have a sixth sense about this one, but we also hear the crack of a rifle shot and a few cheers. The group of Grunts are picking up there gear and walking back to the comfort of their Bunkers. Frenchy came over and described how the Sniper took out the NVA Mortar Gunner on the one shot. Pretty cool but we still had to send Jim down into the Crater. Another debate on the merits of the job.

Jim did go down, not for long as the base begins to take heavy artillery and rockets, big time so we made it back to the Alamo, the biggest and safest Bunker at Khe Sanh, built by who else Seabees of CBMU 301 Det. B.

This event was originally told in the jargon typical for that period for Grunts and Seabees during the "Siege" of Khe Sanh . A moment forever burned into my memory, I laugh and cry, miss those guys.

The CBMU 301 "Beep" coin has been made possible by a donation from the family of a fellow CBMU 301 Veteran, as one of his wishes, upon passing Leslie Cherry CM2, served with CBMU 301, Alpha Co. 1967-1968. He was stationed at the Dong Ha RVN, compound and assisted at other Detachment bases outside of Dong Ha. I actually, remember "Cherry" as one of the more pleasant guys in the Motor Pool area, Leslie Cherry passed away Feb 14,2004 in Dickenson, Tx, his generous donation has made it possible for members of his Seabee family in CBMU 301 to have this coin.

These "BEEP" coins are limited and all known living CBMU 301 Veterans will get one, if you know of any fellow Brothers contact Ray at for those who would like additional coins please contact Bill at the Seabee Museum Store Seabeemusuemstore@live.com. when Bill has received sufficient request he will place a reorder. at what cost is set by the Store, otherwise when these are all distributed that is it

KHE SANH VETERANS FOUNDER RAY W. STUBBE IN THE NEWS

REMARKS AT VETERANS DAY BANQUET: VETERAN OF THE YEAR PLAQUE

11 NOVEMBER 2019

First, please excuse me for not having been as active as the Veteran of the Year as you would have desired.

This year has been a most difficult one for me personally, with complicated eye surgeries in both eyes and 42 radiation treatments which left me completely exhausted. The lesson learned which I pass on to you is to do what is helpful and a blessing to others while you still can, for the day will come when it is not possible.

Circumstances of life change: I'm not going to hump the hills of Vietnam anymore!

Tonight, it may be of some comfort to realize we have one month and ten days before the beginning of winter, December 21st, and it becomes cold and we get Wisconsin snow. [NOTE: We had, by this time, received one snowfall of wet, heavy snow and another one of 3". So the reference evoked some laughter!]

We've have had some early warnings of snow and cold, of course, and I was motivated to do some grocery shopping last Wednesday. While in the check-out lane, a lady behind me noticed my jacket which indicates I'm a Vietnam veteran.[NOTE: Tom, I was wearing the black Khe Sanh jacket with Earle Breeding's Khe Sanh symbol on the back] She said, "Thank you for your service."

I always wonder at the sincerity since it's become so common and so different from when we returned from Vietnam. But I said, "Thank you." Then she said, "Let me pay for your groceries." I said, "That's OK, I have a large amount." She said, "I still want to pay for them." The bill was about $62.00. Her name was Jennifer. Her "thank you for your service" wasn't just words; it was real. It was costly! A deep gratitude filled me. Here was another human being who cared. Suddenly, I remembered being in a trench at Khe Sanh, in Vietnam, one day [Monday, 26 Feb 1968]. We started receiving yet another barrage of incoming artillery and rockets. (We received about 300 a day, every day for some three months, sometimes over a thousand.) I was alone in a rather shallow trench flat on my stomach. Suddenly there was an immense explosion-which I later learned were eight pallets of land mines couple dozen yards from me. I recalled trying to pray and only meaningless sounds came out as I bounced up and down in the trench. I was desperately aware of being alone. The explosion destroyed our battalion's medical aid station's shitter.

During another barrage of incoming, I happened to be with Walt Driscoll, the Catholic chaplain. He desperately hugged me. It was like the hug of God. In the presence of a caring person, we are in the presence of God. Back in the 80s, Mr. Donald Turek, the Director of this War Memorial-we called him "Pops" Turek, frequently said in his public talks, "The nearest we can get to God is to see Him in the face of a friend." He perhaps was referring to the words of Jacob to Esau, "I have seen your face, which is like seeing the face of God" [Gen 33.120].

All of you sitting here this evening have that gift-the gift of being a caring human being to another, sharing and caring, aware of really living as we care for each other, blessing others with life, and experiencing being blessed. When we hug each other, God hugs us both. When doing something good for others. my good friend, Joe Campbell, says, "I enjoy doing what I don't have to do" [Joe Campbell is a very good local Vietnam vet who always pays the bill when a group of us eat out, and refuses to permit anyone else to pay. He says, "I enjoy doing what I don't have to do. n Joe had been owner and President of a local welding supply company].

That, of course, is what freedom is all about-the opportunity to do what is right, what is helpful to others. It is something that comes from deep inside rather than something that is forced or commanded, legislated or required. Freedom is certainly not doing whatever we want to do! Freedom is the difference between having to run (like in boot camp) and enjoying running for the pleasure of running. Maybe in boot camp we learn the pleasure of running-as the Psalm writer says, "rejoicing as a strong man to run a race" [Ps 19.5], and later running comes from a desire deep inside of us rather than some sergeant or officer ordering us. I remember being with a SEAL team when an officer [LT Cadden] asked me one day, "Do you want to run?" I was in combat boots and said, "I don't have my running shoes on." He replied, "You either want to run or you don't." I ran.

In these days of fractured society, you and I have the freedom to bless others with what we've learned. I'm always amazed at meetings of our Wisconsin Vietnam Veterans, Chapter 1: so many with completely different backgrounds, values, and goals, coming together-and in increasing numbers. Apparently, everyone just enjoys being with each other.

The same amazement always came to mind when in Vietnam with a squad of infantry or a recon team or some other unit. Everyone was so different and yet there was such a unity that there wasn't anything one wouldn't do to help another. While on Khe Sanh Combat Base we were surrounded by 40,000 and couldn't move to nearby rivers. When we were down to one canteen cup of water a day and one C-ration a day, I frequently saw men give away their last drop of water, or share a C-ration meal with another Marine. I frequently saw Marines dash out in the middle of incoming to pull a wounded man to safety.

Here again, we experienced the presence of God- although not everyone, of course, regarded it that way. Just because we're unaware of something doesn't mean it isn't there or isn't happening! The Good Book tells us that if we give a cup of water to someone who's thirsty, food to someone who's hungry, and are with the lonely; we are doing it to God. When we are with the needy, poor, hungry, thirsty, lonely and imprisoned- when we are with those hungry for meaning in life, imprisoned. in the fear of walking the streets of the inner city or fear of wondering where life is taking them, when a friend like Joe Campbell or Father Walt Driscoll, the Catholic chaplain, hugs us, we are in the presence of God [Matt 25.34-40]. God draws out our humanity, a humanity we might not even know we had; we become enriched and blessed, blessed with life abundant [John 10.10].

May our Lord continue to bless all of you.

FROM THE WEB
BY BRUCE 'T-BONE" JONES

Today I've been thinking of all of the men we "Khe Sanh Veterans" served with; those who died at Khe Sanh and those who were fortunate to return home. My thoughts return to a bunker that took a direct hit from a 152 NVA round collapsing that frail roof of logs and sand bags then crushing/suffocating the Marines inside.

A hastily built machine gun bunker near the ammo dump with it's roof peeled off from all of our exploding ordnance.

A Marine laying in a trench moaning and cursing at his broken arm caused by a huge clump of dirt that landed on him caused by the explosions from "danger close" B52 bombing run outside our lines

A buddy of mine shot by an NVA sniper and the round entering his right cheek and exiting his left cheek miraculously leaving his jaw and all teeth intact! Dozens more like this will plague my thoughts for the remaining 77 days.

Francine knows these annoying anniversary days too. The "going inside" myself, withdrawal and silence. Over our 52 years she has learned better how to cope and how to give me my space. She too pays for those painful days at Khe Sanh. We survivors also continue to pay for our days in that valley of death. Drug and alcohol addiction; cancers of all sorts; severe depression; psychological shells so hard nothing is allowed inside; incarceration; multiple divorces and estrangement from children; the list is endless!

But I am a survivor, just like my Khe Sanh Brothers. I evolve in my survival finding peace more and more each day. Through a greater power I a m glad to be alive!

AN ARTICLE LONG OVERDUE

"THE RANCH MINISTRIES"

The Ranch is a venue for spiritual awakening, growth, and healing. Hundreds of men and women struggling with PTSD, both young and old, have found refuge and help at The Ranch. The Ranch sits on 540 acres of South Dakota prairie, about 20 miles southeast of Pierre, SD, right in the heart of pheasant hunting country.

In fact, our location is situated in an area known as the best in the world for pheasant hunting. Our ministry uses pheasant hunting as a keystone for helping veterans and for our fundraising. During the pheasant season, we host pheasant hunts for veterans, including those who are wheelchair-bound or have suffered other severe physical and mental injury.

The Ranch's location melds raw prairie with rough-hewn yet comfortable accommodations. Our meeting places and bunk house feature interior design that takes hunting and the West as inspiration. Guests will find art and sculptures made using these motifs, along with real saddles, spread throughout all areas. The Ranch offers nine private bedrooms that can accommodate up to 22 guests. A converted two-story grain bin provides an additional bunking area. Other areas include a great hall for meetings as well as a kitchen. A 25-ft tall steel observation tower features a large hot tub raised above the ground.

But pheasant hunting isn't all that can be enjoyed at The Ranch. Other activities and projects can be done at our facility. The Ranch offers visitors access to well-equipped carpentry and metal shop, plus a motor pool of ATVs, utility vehicles and excavation/construction equipment. Plus, there is a quiet, secluded area among large boulders and trees set aside for prayer, mediation, and group worship services that reinforce the spiritual mission of The Ranch

Marksmanship is another activity that challenges visitors and creates community. Guests can also enjoy a 300-yard sniper range that can accommodate 50-caliber weapons, a 100-yard high-power rifle range, a 50-foot pistol range, and a skeet range offering eight positions with opposing electric clay pigeon throwers. These ranges are especially popular with veterans who are well-trained marksmen and gun owners but who may not have access to a safe, controlled area for shooting. Our facilities are used by firearm and archery safety courses conducted by the South Dakota Department of Conservation and hunter safety instructors.

Guests have their choice of multiple shotguns and long rifles, maintained in our safe. Our gun room also features a gun cleaning bench. A wide range of ammunition is provided for both firearms owned by The Ranch and for guns that guests bring with them. The summer of 2016 saw completion of a challenging cross-country race track for ATVs and large Go Karts that can reach over 40 mph. With it, a mechanical and storage facility complete with a large observation deck is in operation. Further developments include stables and full tack for horseback riding, staying true the heritage of our territory and providing guests with additional experiences.

For more information please go to the internet for "The Ranch Ministries South Dakota" or call Ken on his cell phone: 402-677-7082.

Our schedule of events and activities keep us and our guests involved year-round with both indoor and outdoor programs. Groups, large and small, can enjoy all of The Ranch's offerings, plus meals, for an overnight stay, for a weekend, or over an entire week.

THE FOUNDER

KENNETH KORKOW, BRAVO CO 1/26 , KHE SANH VETERAN

Picture in your mind the farms and ranches near Pierre, South Dakota – a landscape similar to what's shown in the movie "Dances With Wolves" (the film was shot right in this area-using many of the Korkow family horses-which continue to be used in professional rodeos across the country) The entire ranch is 20,000 acres+ with 400+bucking horses and 200+ bucking bulls and cattle-so many of our guest like to spend time watching & learning about rodeo and the "cowboy way of life". This land produces feed corn, wheat, soybeans, and seed grains. It also produces people of the land who've inherited a profound sense of tenacity and pride in a job well done at the end of a day filled with hard work. One of those is Ken Korkow.

Ken found college "boring," and like many of his buddies back home, enlisted in the military. Ken, specifically, entered the Marine Corps. After basic training, Corporal Ken Korkow was transferred directly into combat in Vietnam as a mortar section leader in Company B, 1st Battalion, 3rd Marine Division, at the notorious Khe Sanh Combat Base. This base suffered relentless daily attack by the North Vietnamese Army for 77 days. During this time, Ken received citations for The Navy Cross and the Purple Heart. On March 30, 1968, Ken's men came under intense attack. He single-handedly destroyed the hostile mortar placement, and made repeated trips under fire to carry his wounded men to an aid station. Ken was seriously wounded in this attack, and contributed to the defeat of the numerically superior enemy, while saving the lives of many of his brothers in arms.

After his medical discharge, Ken earned undergraduate and MBA degrees and became a successful land broker. During this time, Ken threw himself into work, becoming a work addict as a way to deal with war-torn memories. But it wasn't keeping away the nightmares, anguish, and "survivor's guilt." He was suffering from Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD) before there was a name for it..

But before Ken succumbed completely, he vowed to do something about – and help others suffering. Ken abandoned his lucrative business and returned to his spiritual roots, becoming the regional director of a Christian business organization helping other workaholics to find new hope. During this time, as he overcame his own PTSD, he developed a successful, spiritual approach that is helping thousands of other service members and veterans find peace in their lives.

As time passed on, Ken inherited his portion of his family's acreage. While he still grows crops on the land, he's repurposed a large portion into the home operations of The Ranch Ministries. The Ranch serves as a retreat center that helps restore minds, marriages, and lives of veterans affected by PTSD. Additionally, The Ranch serves hundreds of men, women, and youth in and around the Pierre, SD community through safety courses in firearms and archery.

Ken has developed The Ranch into a relaxing place for PTSD-troubled minds by building fun and adventurous attractions such as an ATV course, horseback riding, fishing, and of course pheasant hunting. Guests also enjoy several safe and monitored marksman activities. The Ranch offers comfortable (and if guests choose, not so comfortable) sleeping accommodations, dining, and fellowship areas. While at The Ranch visitors have access to spiritual counseling, and they can contact any one of a dozen counselors across North America at any time. The Pierre community and thousands of our nation's servicemen and veterans have been positively influence by The Ranch and by Ken's care and concern.

Today we simply want to share what we have found WORKS. Our motto is 'GOD DOESN'T WASTE PAIN' and now - the things we have experienced / learned - are the insight / credibility we have to share with this next generation of combat vets. Sadly - prior to combat - NOBODY ever told me what it was like to kill your first man / what it was like to hold you buddy as he died and you couldn't do a thing to stop it / what it was like to make that decision to never-again have friends or feelings / what it was like to be filled with hate / what it was like to medicate the pain with isolation and self-destructive actions what it was like to wish you had been killed in combat / what it was like to be mad at God and believe He doesn't care - or doesn't exist.

I'd had 2 years of college / Air Force ROTC before I joined the Corps at 18. Thought combat was a passage into manhood. The Corps had me in Hawaii for a year with a Charlie 1/27 being trained to come off a submarine at night - then they scrapped that mission and sent everyone over as replacements. I was in Vietnamese Language School at the time and not allowed to go as I was now a short-timer - so I called my US Senator who 'made arrangements' contingent on me extending my tour of duty - which I gladly did - and the rest is Khe Sanh history.

I'd met Liz when we were both 15 / engaged before I went to Vietnam / married while I was still at Great Lakes Naval Hospital. She had no clue how much I'd changed. Nor did I. And if anybody would have caused her 1/10th of the pain I caused her - I would have killed them. But you don't know what you don't know- and as the old song goes - "You always hurt the ones you love ... ". I walked away from religion / God for 10 years and medicated my pain in ways that hurt me and everybody close to me. Finally got a belly-full of my junk / surrendered to a personal relationship with Christ / began to make pretty amazing changes in me, our marriage, raising our kids, doing business, stopped using people and began to actually care for others. There was a time when I though combat was the ultimate adventure. Now I know the Life's Highest Adventure is knowing Christ more intimately and living Him more intentionally. Having had my share of this 'world's success and pleasure' - I'm now a 'satisfied customer' of Jesus - and nothing else comes remotely close. Consequently - everything we do through the ranch is free - because Jesus never charged people. He just changed them. And I'm humbled that He is changing a sinner like me.

If you –or any of your combat friends would like to know about the ranch-please contact Ken at 402-677-7082.

COMMENTS:

Just a quick note: Due to the large number of Scholarship applications last year and the 50th Anniversary Reunion in Washington the Khe Sanh Veterans funds fell below the range where we like to keep it. We have never asked the membership directly for donations, but in this case until we catch up we would appreciate any donations that you can afford. Those donations also help with the expense of publishing Red Clay.

Thanks

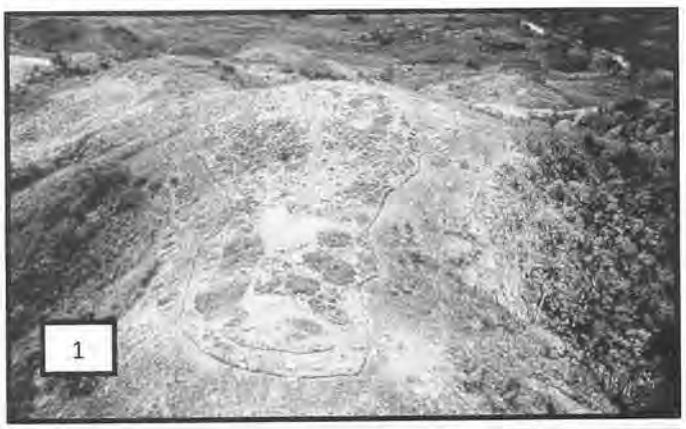
Photo 1) Hill 861 taken by Ray Stubbe in July 1967. The view is looking from south to north and the fairly flat bump of a hill in the nw corner (outside the trench line) is where the NVA came through our lines on that forever-night 52 years ago. It is the only portion of the hill where they attacked from...despite what some authors and even USMC records tell. Not one NVA trooper made it beyond the top of the hill and they certainly were never down around the LZ (visible) on the south end of the hill.

2) My photo of the NW corner of the trench line taken a few days later. If you have good eyesight you can see some Marines (helmets and flak jackets) in the trench line. The NVA chose this section to attack from because it was the flattest terrain around the entire hill and it was also the only place where 105 arty from the base could not directly hit just outside the wire.

3) John Sabo's (HMM-364 Purple Foxes) photo from the side window of a CH-46 on the way into the LZ on 861 during the siege. The western side of the trench line is clearly shown -- flat at the LZ and then climbing rather steeply until it disappears around the top and continues -- unseen here -- towards the northwest corner (pic #2).

Just before midnight my RTO and I were sent to the south end of the hill because of reports of two NVA visible in the fog outside the wire. When Dave Krom and I arrived, the fog had lifted a bit and there was no one to be seen. As we left to head back up the hill to our bunker, a green flare went up in the west and the attack started. We moved up the hill but nearing the top, machine gun & rifle fire, RPG's, were so intense, we knew we could not back to our bunker. Instead, we headed back down to the LZ and began to work our way up the western trench line.

Look at photo #3, and 3/4's of the way up you can see a large bunker built on the outer wall of the trench. This was a machine gun bunker and I knew the gunner pretty well. He told me that the other two assistant gunners had left him (?) and that there was a wounded NVA soldier in the trench line up past his bunker. He said that he thought that the guy had been wounded by one of his own grenades. In the dark I was real concerned because I had no way of knowing how badly he was hurt and we had to get by him. I crawled out of the bunker with Dave's .45 in one hand and felt ahead of me in the dark with the other. When I touched his head, he moved a bit, and I pointed the pistol, removed my hand and fired three times. Dave and I stepped on and over him as we moved to a point about where the trench line is no longer visible in #3 and settled in to call in arty now that we could see out beyond the outer wire.



No Marines or NVA passed us in that western trench line all night. Not heading north or south. We were there till the sun came up and the NVA withdrew (and the base began to get shelled), We retraced our steps back down the trench line to the LZ so we could safely climb up to the top and to our bunker.

When Captain Moyers Shore wrote the official USMC account of the siege entitled The Battle for Khe Sanh (1969), he used lots of sources. One of the Marines who is quoted in the pages about the attack on 861 that night was (then) Major Matt Caulfield who reported NVA attacking the south west corner of the hill, overrunning the LZ, and vicious hand to hand fighting as the Kilo 3/26 Marines counterattacked back down the hill. None of that ever happened, and yet it gets repeated in other publications. He wasn't even on 861 and so for the life of me I have no idea where he got his "facts" from, but that revisionist 861 history keeps getting repeated. It still angers me...especially on 20Jan and 21 Jan every year.

CHAPLAIN'S CORNER SPRING 2020
CHAPLAIN RON RAYNER

It is my prayer that this magazine finds you all preparing to be in Albuquerque, New Mexico the week of July 12. I think of the Khe Sanh wife who stated: "Two days at this Khe Sanh reunion has done more to help my husband than 20 years of seeing VA psychiatrists." The one hundred and some regular attendees will welcome you at the reunion

Memorial Day will be here shortly and it is a day to remember those who have served our country and passed on. It is also a time to pray for those who are serving today. I do pray daily for our troops, everyone in my ministry, and our country but it is not as formal as this prayer.

"Almighty God, with reverence and love we pause to pay tribute to those who have served our nation and now rest from their labor.

We also pay tribute to our honored and valiant United States Armed Forces. Please grant that we may be ever mindful of their service to our nation, and that we may be ever aware of our fellowship with all who have served our nation. Please guard our homes, churches and schools, our entire land and all therein from harm and destruction. Please preserve the integrity of this Nation founded on religious principles by protecting it from all enemies within and without. We beseech You, O God to shield and protect our armed forces, in the air, on and under the sea, and on land. Please bless them with victory. May it be Your will that the dominion of tyranny and cruelty be brought to an end and the kingdom of righteousness be established on earth with liberty and freedom for all mankind. Please grant us the strength, courage, and wisdom to fulfill your wishes. We thank you for the freedom and abundance that we enjoy this day. Amen" (Taken in part from VVA Ritual Book)

It is so easy to get caught up in the busyness of our daily lives and forget the sacrifices of the people that ensure our safety. The United States Military, police officers, and firefighters lead the way by risking their lives in a dangerous world. I believe daily prayer for those who serve is the greatest gift that we can give. It also is good to provide encouragement by saying thank you when the opportunity presents itself. And of course, cards, letters and packages sent overseas are always appreciated.

We have a lady in Oakland County, Michigan that the troops have named the Desert Angel. You can find out her story at thedesertangel.org. She has given me the opportunity to help send boxes of gifts and food to the troops overseas every month. It is a very rewarding ministry. She has been doing this since October, 2001.

I have been in PTSD group and individual counseling since August. The Vet Center in Pontiac, Michigan is providing both. My individual councilor happens to be an enlisted combat veteran, who is now an Army major chaplain in a reserve unit that could be deployed again at any time. I believe he is doing a great job. He uses scripture as well as psychological methods to help me cope with my PTSD. He even answers my questions which the VA psychiatrists that I have seen have refused to do.

The following scripture helps me to focus on my role as a chaplain and family man.

Philippians 3:13-14 (NIV) "...But one thing I do: Forgetting what is behind and straining toward what is ahead, I press on toward the goal to win the prize for which God has called me heavenward in Christ Jesus."

Jeremiah 31:33-34 (NIV) "...I will put my law within them, and I will write it on their hearts; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people... For I will forgive their wickedness and will remember their sins no more."

"War is an ugly thing, but not the ugliest of things: the decayed and degraded state of moral and patriotic feeling which thinks nothing worth a war, is worse...A man who has nothing which he is willing to fight for, nothing which he cares more than he does about his personal safety, is a miserable creature who has no chance of being free, unless made and kept so by the exertions of better men than himself."
John Stuart Mill
19th century philosopher

We live in the greatest country in the history of the world. I am proud to be a part of a group that stood firm when the United States of America called.

Gracious God, you are nearer than hands and feet, closer than breathing. Please sustain with your presence our brothers and sisters of the Khe Sanh Veterans. Please help them now to trust in your goodness and claim your promise of life everlasting. Cleanse them of all sin and remove all burdens. Please grant them the sure joy of your salvation.
Amen

JOHN DI GAETANO RECOVERING FROM WOUNDS RECEIVED ON 30 MAR 68 AT KHE SANH. IN HOSPITAL IN JAPAN

It was such a bunker that Dr Feldman received PFC Mussari who was brought in with a live 81mm shell embedded in his abdomen. Assisted by a medic and an explosives engineer holding a flashlight, Dr. Feldman proceeded to treat the Marine who was still conscious. Touching the bomb with a metal instrument could have caused detonation so Dr. Feldman used his bare hands to move muscle and tissue away from the bomb and lift it out. He handed it to the engineer to be taken away and detonated while he closed the patient up. For this and other actions he performed in Vietnam, Dr. Feldman won a Silver Star and has been nominated for the Congressional Medal of Honor. Patient and doctor would meet again after the war. Dr. Feldman delivered Robert Mussari's first child

SEVEN THINGS EVERY VETERAN SHOULD KNOW ABOUT AGENT ORANGE

1. WHAT AGENT ORANGE IS AND HOW IT WAS USED

Agent Orange is an herbicide that was used by the United States during the Vietnam War. Specifically, Agent Orange is a 50/50 mixture of two kinds of herbicide agents: 2,4-D and 2,4,5-T. As a byproduct of its production, Agent Orange also contained the dioxin contaminant 2,3,7,8-TCDD, which is the most toxic of all the numerous dioxins. Agent Orange is just one of the "rainbow herbicides" that the United States used during the Vietnam War including Agent Blue and Agent White, among others.

Agent Orange and other herbicides were used in the Vietnam War for two main purposes: (1) to destroy the enemy's crops to interrupt their food supply; and (2) to destroy foliage in the jungle and increase visibility to prevent ambush attacks. During the Vietnam War, herbicides including Agent Orange were sprayed mainly in four ways:

- C-123 aircraft were used to spray herbicides over the jungles of Vietnam during Operation Ranch Hand. These C-123 aircraft were modified with tanks to carry the herbicides
- Helicopters were used to spray smaller areas
- Buffalo turbines (i.e. truck-mounted decontamination sprayers) were used to spray roadsides and perimeters

Hand-held sprayers were also used as a method of spraying herbicides

2. VA'S PRESUMPTION OF EXPOSURE TO AGENT ORANGE AND WHO QUALIFIES FOR IT

The Agent Orange Act of 1991 required VA to create a presumption of exposure in which VA will presume that veterans who served in specific locations during defined timeframes were exposed to Agent Orange. A presumption of exposure replaces the element of service connection that requires veterans to provide proof of an in-service event or symptoms that caused their current disability. In these instances, VA presumes veterans were exposed to herbicides during service, and this counts as the in-service event. VA presumes that veterans who served in the following locations during the specified timeframes were exposed to Agent Orange:

- Boots-on-the-ground in Vietnam, veterans with service aboard a ship that operated in the inland waterways of Vietnam (i.e. Brown Water veterans), or veterans with service aboard a ship in Vietnam's territorial seas (i.e. Blue Water Navy veterans) between January 9, 1962 and May 7, 1975
- On or near the Korean demilitarized zone (DMZ) between April 1, 1968 and August 31, 1971

Active duty and reservist personnel who had regular contact with C-123 aircraft between 1969 and 1986

3. VA'S LIST OF PRESUMPTIVE CONDITIONS ASSOCIATED WITH AGENT ORANGE EXPOSURE

In addition to the presumption of exposure to herbicide agents, VA affords a presumption of service connection for certain conditions it associates with Agent Orange exposure. The presumption of service connection removes the element of service connection that requires veterans to provide a medical nexus linking their condition to their military service. Instead, if a veteran served in a qualifying time period and location and has one of the following conditions, VA will presume service connection:

- AL Amyloidosis
- Chronic B-Cell Leukemia

Chloracne (if it presents within one year of exposure to a degree of 10 percent disabling)
Diabetes Mellitus Type 2

- Hodgkin's Disease
- Ischemic Heart Disease (including Coronary Artery Disease, stable and unstable angina, myocardial infarction, and sudden cardiac death)
- Multiple Myeloma
- Non-Hodgkin's Lymphoma

- Parkinson's Disease
- Peripheral Neuropathy, Early Onset (if it presents within one year of exposure to a degree of 10 percent disabling)
- Porphyria Cutanea Tarda (if it presents within one year of exposure to a degree of 10 percent disabling)

Prostate Cancer

- Respiratory Cancers, including Lung Cancer
- Soft Tissue Sarcomas (other than osteosarcoma, chondrosarcoma, Kaposi's sarcoma, and mesothelioma)

It is important to note that if additional disabilities develop as a result of one of the above-mentioned presumptive conditions, veterans can file a service connection claim for the additional disability, as secondary to the herbicide-related disability.

4. DEPENDENTS' BENEFITS FOR EFFECTS OF AGENT ORANGE EXPOSURE

The effects of Agent Orange have been shown to cause a variety of serious health conditions, and have also been associated with certain birth defects in the children of veterans who were exposed. Children with birth defects acknowledged by VA as associated with herbicide exposure may be eligible for compensation, healthcare benefits, and vocational training. The child must be a biological child of a veteran who served in Vietnam or the Korean DMZ during the presumptive time period, and conceived after the dates during which the veteran served. VA presumes that when male veterans have children with spina bifida (except spina bifida occulta), the condition is due to the veteran's exposure to herbicides during service. VA presumes certain other birth defects (below) are connected to a veteran's military service, but only if the veteran is the biological mother who served in Vietnam and the birth defect resulted in permanent physical or mental disability:

- Achondroplasia
- Cleft lip and cleft palate
- Congenital heart disease
- Congenital talipes equinovarus (i.e. clubfoot)
- Esophageal and intestinal atresia
- Hallerman-Streiff syndrome
- Hip dysplasia
- Hirschprung's disease
- Hydrocephalus due to aqueductal stenosis
- Hypospadias
- Imperforate anus
- Neural tube defects
- Poland syndrome
- Pyloric stenosis
- Syndactyl (i.e. fused digits)
- Tracheaesophageal fistula
- Undescended testicle

Williams syndrome

5. AGENT ORANGE IN THAILAND

Veterans who served in Thailand during the Vietnam War are not included in VA's presumption of exposure. However, VA recognizes that herbicides were used along the perimeter of certain Royal Thai Air Force Bases to increase visibility and prevent guerilla attacks between February 28, 1961 and May 7, 1975. These bases include U-Tapao, Udorn, Ubon, NKP, and Takhli among others. VA contends that only those who worked on or near the perimeter may have been exposed to herbicides. If a veteran's military occupational specialty was a security guard or patrol dog handler, VA will concede that they were on the perimeter of the base and exposed to herbicides. VA also says that it will concede exposure if veterans can show that they were on or near the perimeter through other credible evidence (e.g. official records or lay evidence). Ultimately, to receive service-connected compensation, veterans must show on a factual basis that they were exposed to herbicides during their service as indicated above, and have a current diagnosis of a presumptive condition associated with herbicide exposure.

6. NEHMER CLASS MEMBERS

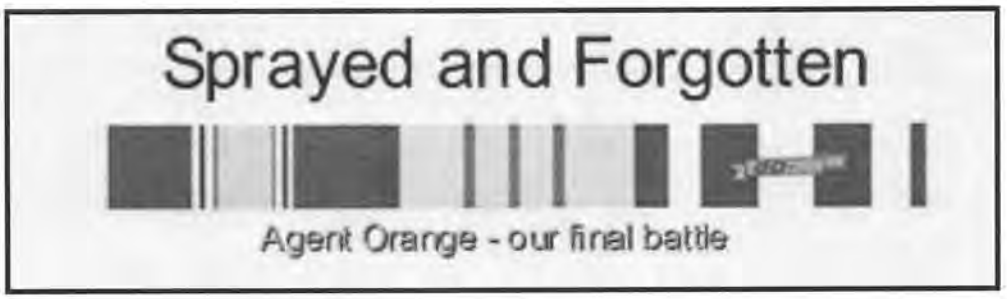
Nehmer v. U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs is a 1986 class action lawsuit brought against VA by the National Veterans Legal Services Program. As a result of this case, VA must take certain actions when it recognizes a new condition as scientifically linked to Agent Orange exposure. Specifically, when VA adds a new condition to the presumptive list, it must:

- Identify all claims for the recognized condition that were previously filed and/or denied
- Pay retroactive disability and death benefits to the veterans or their survivors back to the date of the veteran's initial claim

Importantly, these claims must have been filed or denied between September 25, 1985 and August 31, 2010.

7. BLUE WATER NAVY VETERANS ADDED TO PRESUMPTION OF EXPOSURE TO AGENT ORANGE

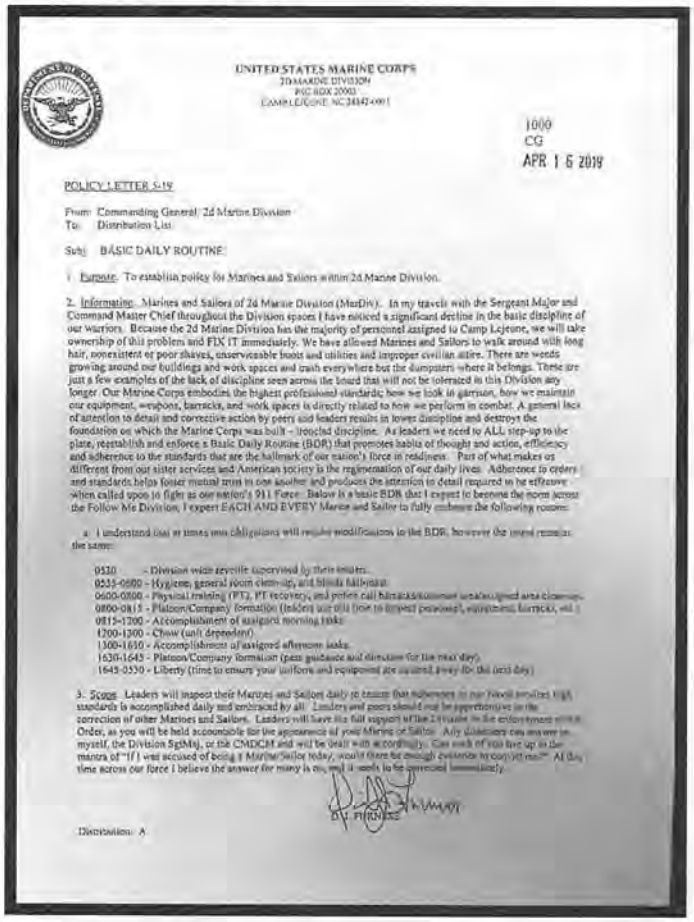
Blue Water Navy veterans are those who served aboard ships in the open waters off the coast of Vietnam during the Vietnam War. Blue Water Navy veterans include those who did not set foot on the landmass of Vietnam or who never went into the inland waterways of Vietnam, often referred to as "Brown Water" veterans. Historically, VA has excluded Blue Water Navy veterans from its presumption of herbicide agent exposure based on a decision issued in the case Haas v. Peake. However, on January 29, 2019, the Federal Circuit issued a decision in Procopio v. Wilkie, overruling Haas to include Blue Water Navy veterans under the presumption of exposure. Specifically, the Federal Circuit found that "Republic of Vietnam" includes both the country's landmass and its territorial seas in which Blue Water Navy veterans served. This decision impacts thousands of Blue Water Navy veterans who will now be afforded the same presumption of exposure to herbicides as veterans who served boots-on-the-ground in Vietnam.



TROUBLE IN THE CORPS?

CRACKDOWN AT LEJEUNE: INSIDE THE 2ND MARINE DIVISION COMMANDER'S CONTROVERSIAL CALL FOR DISCIPLINE

When the commanding general of the 2nd Marine Division sent out a letter to his Marines citing the "significant decline in the basic discipline of our warriors," opinions flew.



UNITED STATES MARINE CORPS
2D MARINE DIVISION
PSC BOX 20003
CAMP LEJEUNE NC 28542-0003

1000
CG
APR 16 2019

POLICY LETTER 5-19

From: Commanding General, 2d Marine Division
To: Distribution List

Subj: BASIC DAILY ROUTINE

1. Purpose. To establish policy for Marines and Sailors within 2d Marine Division.

2. Information. Marines and Sailors of 2d Marine Division (MarDiv). In my travels with the Sergeant Major and Command Master Chief throughout the Division spaces I have noticed a significant decline in the basic discipline of our warriors. Because the 2d Marine Division has the majority of personnel assigned to Camp Lejeune, we will take ownership of this problem and FIX IT immediately. We have allowed Marines and Sailors to walk around with long hair, nonexistent or poor shaves, unserviceable boots and utilities and improper civilian attire. There are weeds growing around our buildings and work spaces and trash everywhere but the dumpsters where it belongs. These are just a few examples of the lack of discipline seen across the board that will not be tolerated in this Division any longer. Our Marine Corps embodies the highest professional standards; how we look in garrison, how we maintain our equipment, weapons, barracks, and work spaces is directly related to how we perform in combat. A general lack of attention to detail and corrective action by peers and leaders results in lower discipline and destroys the foundation on which the Marine Corps was built – ironclad discipline. As leaders we need to ALL step-up to the plate, reestablish and enforce a Basic Daily Routine (BDR) that promotes habits of thought and action, efficiency and adherence to the standards that are the hallmark of our nation's force in readiness. Part of what makes us different from our sister services and American society is the regimentation of our daily lives. Adherence to orders and standards helps foster mutual trust in one another and produces the attention to detail required to be effective when called upon to fight as our nation's 911 Force. Below is a basic BDR that I expect to become the norm across the Follow Me Division. I expect EACH AND EVERY Marine and Sailor to fully embrace the following routine:

a. I understand that at times our obligations will require modifications to the BDR, however the intent remains the same:

0520 – Division wide reveille (supervised by their leaders).
0535-0600 - Hygiene, general room clean-up, and blinds fully open.
0600-0800 - Physical training (PT), PT recovery, and police call barracks/common areas/assigned area cleanup.
0800-0815 - Platoon/Company formation (leaders use this time to inspect personnel, equipment, barracks, etc.)
0815-1200 - Accomplishment of assigned morning tasks.
1200-1300 - Chow (unit dependent).
1300-1630 - Accomplishment of assigned afternoon tasks.
1630-1645 - Platoon/Company formation (pass guidance and direction for the next day).
1645-0330 - Liberty (time to ensure your uniform and equipment are squared away for the next day).

3. Scope. Leaders will inspect their Marines and Sailors daily to ensure that adherence to our Naval smallest high standards is accomplished daily and embraced by all. Leaders and peers should not be apprehensive in the correction of other Marines and Sailors. Leaders will have the full support of the Division in the enforcement of this Order, as you will be held accountable for the appearance of your Marine or Sailor. Any discovery can and will be on myself, the Division SgtMaj, or the CMDCM and will be dealt with accordingly. Can each of you live up to the mantra of "if I was accused of being a Marine/Sailor today, would there be enough evidence to convict me?" At this time across our force I believe the answer for many is no, and it needs to be corrected immediately.

D.J. FURNESS

Distribution: A

It did happen in a Camp Lejeune chow hall a few weeks ago that the commandant of the Marine Corps ran into a division Marine who was "in pajamas."

But it wasn't that one unfortunate instance that caused the commanding general of 2nd Marine Division to put in motion plans to refocus the division, as insisted on by the excitable rumor. There are "a hundred different" examples he could share, Maj. Gen. David Furness told Marine Corps Times in an exclusive interview.

But it wasn't that one unfortunate instance that caused the commanding general of 2nd Marine Division to put in motion plans to refocus the division, as insisted on by the excitable rumor. There are "a hundred different" examples he could share, Maj. Gen. David Furness told Marine Corps Times in an exclusive interview.

But for Furness, who had been traveling at the time of the chow hall blunder, receiving a letter from the commandant's office about the incident didn't help. Neither did the time the major general, who started his career as a rifle platoon commander and 81mm mortar platoon commander in the 2nd Marine Division, approached his two-star parking space with two lance corporals sitting on a bench in front of it. The general walked by them, he recounted. And when the junior Marines didn't acknowledge him, he greeted them.

One Marine totally blew him off — didn't get up or acknowledge him, he said.

"The other one looks up, and, while sitting, salutes with an iPhone in his ear."

The general asked them: Were you ever taught to do that in boot camp?
"No sir."

"Why did you try to do it?"
"I was on the phone."
"Why are you on the phone here?"

"I don't know."

Spot correcting was his first tactic when he took over the division in August, Furness says. But it hasn't been effective.

And the correction shouldn't be coming just from him, but from all his Marine leaders. Which is not something he says he has always been seeing.

On April 16, Furness fired off a policy letter to the entire 2nd Marine Division detailing a new "basic daily routine" for North Carolina division Marines.

"We have allowed Marines and Sailors to walk around with long hair, nonexistent or poor shaves, unserviceable boots and utilities and improper civilian attire," the letter reads. "There are weeds growing around our building and work spaces and trash everywhere but the dumpsters where it belongs."

"A general lack of attention to detail and corrective action by peers and leaders results in lower discipline and destroys the foundation on which the Marine Corps was built — ironclad discipline."

The letter, and its accompanying "basic daily routine" hourly schedule, went viral among Marines.

The "old Corps" came forward, asking what happened to their beloved Marine Corps and lamenting that "ironclad discipline" they remember.

Many other Marines responded the opposite way, sending accusations of micromanagement at the highest levels: angrily alleging that this is an antithesis to the Marine Corps motto of "centralized command, decentralized control," and asking why should killers really care about haircuts?

Fingers came back to point at Furness.

As one retired gunner said on Facebook: It was a "vitriolic social media dog-pile."

Furness says he regrets how the initial rollout went. The Luddite commanding general who doesn't use social media sheepishly said he didn't realize the letter would get out of the unit.
He wouldn't do it like that again, he says, but he's not backing down.

From June 3–7 there will be an entire division stand down. It's more of an educational stand down, he says, to teach Marines what the right way looks like and show how to best and most effectively enforce Marine Corps standards.
Basically, to teach what they already learned in boot camp.

It's not coming from just him. In September 2018 he formed a "sergeants council" of about 12 Marines pulled from across the division to bring to the table issues they see on the ground.

Right now the council, which meets monthly, is focusing on planning the June stand down. After that, there will be quarterly division stand downs.

The commanding general says it's a time to pause and get it right — a luxury the Marine Corps hasn't had until recently due to a high deployment tempo.

"I will tell you I went to a chow hall today and from the car to the door I picked up a straw, five cigarette butts, a top of some drink beverage and some indescribable piece of trash," Furness told Marine Corps Times April 26, comparing the distance to the short hallway leaving his Camp Lejeune office.

"Now, in the Marine Corps I grew up with people would be asking why is a CG picking up trash?"
"Well, I'm part of the team, No. 1 — I want to set the example."

But he also wants Marines to "have pride" in their surroundings. And pay attention to detail.

It's about more than just haircuts, Furness says. He believes lack of discipline in garrison will carry over to training and eventually combat.

It's already being seen in training, he says. The after-action reviews he has been receiving from California service-level exercises at 29 Palms and the Mountain Warfare Training Center in Bridgeport are uniformly marking Marine performance as "woefully inadequate," Furness said.

But it is still pretty unique for a commanding general to take such hold from up high. And, it begs the question: What is going on in 2nd Marine Division?
The CG didn't say exactly what happened to the pajamaed Marine in the chow hall: But he knows that Marine got a call from the sergeant major of the Corps.

Furness' big regret is that he didn't get a letter and contingency plan out sooner.

"I'm upset with myself for not doing this quicker, giving more specific guidance to my junior leaders and my leaders sooner so that they could have gone after this."

"But, again, this is a Marine Corps problem, not just a 2nd Marine Division problem, but we're the 'follow me' division, and I'm stepping out."

BOOT BANDS DON'T MAKE KILLERS

The issues in 2nd Marine Division right now are not unique to East Coast Marines, Furness says.

He insists that he and his peers have been lamenting about a lack of discipline crawling across the Corps for the past 10-15 years.

And it is at the small unit leader level that he's looking to the most.

"I absolutely believe it's incumbent on the leadership of those units to make them adhere to the Marine Corps standards, because part of the pride of being a Marine is being better than everybody else," he said. "I'm not asking anyone to do anything that's not Marine Corps order ... or part of the Marine Corps culture."

Several responses to the letter have been angry, calling Furness' tactic an out-of-line takeover.

A recent anonymous opinion article reportedly from an active-duty Marine in combat arms on the military website Task & Purpose was titled, "The 'micromanaging' Marine general should focus on strategy, not mustaches."

That junior Marine officer started the letter by telling Furness, "Your latest policy letter ... violates the core tenants of Marine Corps doctrine. You ought to repeal it immediately."

Proper shaves and poorly maintained facilities are noteworthy, "but these things are not essential," the Marine wrote. "You can kill enemies with long hair. You can win battles without boot bands or rolled sleeves. At the end of the day, grooming standards have only tangential relevance to victory in war."
"This petty stuff higher ups worry about is the - reason why good, effective Marines get out," a five-year enlisted Marine who got out of the Corps in the past year told Marine Corps Times.

FROM AN INITIAL READ, FURNESS' LETTER DOES LOOK LIKE A MANDATED SCHEDULE."

"I expect EACH AND EVERY Marine and Sailor to fully embrace the following routine," it stated.
But the general backtracked on that wording of his letter, telling Marine Corps Times there is no micromanaged schedule, it's a traditional schedule for small unit leaders to base their unit schedules off of.
"That plan is not a division-wide schedule," he said. "It's a schedule. So if they want to adopt it, you know, verbatim, that's their decision."

"It's not a mandated, by the hour schedule."

Several Marines at Camp Lejeune said they thought the division's response to the letter seems to be pretty split, maybe even 50/50.

A couple Marines mentioned there is now more traffic getting on base in the early morning hours. Earlier start times and mandatory PT each morning the cause.

Other 2nd Division Marines say "literally nothing" has changed in their units.

According to 1st Lt. Nathaniel Thompson, with Charlie -Company, 2d Combat Engineer Battalion, there had been notice of some units coming in late or -leaving early, or taking long lunches.

But, for a well-disciplined unit, there hasn't been much change, especially on the side of a daily schedule.

"The good units are already doing this, and they will continue to do this," Thompson said.
So why the fierce push-back?

Max Uriarte, the creator of Terminal Lance, was the first to post Furness' letter publicly, on his outlet's Facebook page.

"I think the fundamental problem that junior Marines have with things like this is that 99 percent of them are doing the right thing, but are being punished because of the 1 percent that are not," he said.
Punishing an entire division is odd, Uriarte said, noting that he personally never had seen that before.
"Had it not blown up on social media, it probably would have just been a few weeks of butt-hurt SNCOs passing down punishment and would have faded off eventually."

"Mass punishment events like this spring up all the time, and serve as a regular reminder to look forward to your DD-214," Uriarte said.

Though the Commandant of the Marine Corps Gen. Robert Neller did not respond to requests to comment on the chow hall incident, Furness did hear from him after his letter went out.

Neller had been Furness' division commander in combat: The commandant was calling to ask if the division commander was alright.

"He said he supported what I was doing and just wanted to make sure I was doing OK. He was just checking on one of his Marines."

Which is what Furness insists he is doing here: - leading from the front and coaching a team of - Marines to success.

When Furness was a child, he wanted to be an - outside linebacker for the Minnesota Vikings, he said.

"It just didn't work out that way."

But the father of four compares leadership a lot to coaching a sports team.

The consequences in the Marine Corps are a lot greater.

"I hate it when I hear analogies of the NFL or something, 'It's like war out there,'" he said. "No, it's not. Nobody out there is going to get their head blown off this morning."

But, like being a part of the New England Patriots, he said, or any other professional football team, there is a culture. And there are parts of thulture that help lead to being champions.

The Marine Corps is no different, he said.

"When you do that and you give of yourself and you embrace that culture and become a full member of it, there's a certain pride associated with that," he said.

"And then the biggest championship you can win is going to combat, accomplishing the mission and bringing everybody home."

2020 BLUE WATER NAVY AGENT ORANGE UPDATE

January 13, 2020 | in Agent Orange, Blue Water | by Shannon Brewer, Senior Attorney

n the past year, a lot has changed for U.S. Navy veterans who served during the Vietnam War era and did not go ashore in Vietnam or into the inland waterways / rivers (brown waters) of Vietnam. These sailors, known as Blue Water sailors have been denied VA benefits due to Agent Orange exposure for many years by the Department of Veterans Affairs, but now the law has recognized that anyone who served within 12 nautical miles in the territorial sea of the Republic of Vietnam was likely exposed to Agent Orange and is, then, entitled to service connection for those diseases known to be caused by that exposure. This change in the law by Congress will lead to grants of service connection for many veterans, but it's important to know how to get those disability benefits. The Blue Water Navy Vietnam Veterans Act says:

BLUE WATER NAVY VIETNAM VETERANS MUST HAVE SERVED WITHIN 12 NAUTICAL MILES

Start this process by figuring out where you served. It's been many years, and not everyone remembers exactly where their Navy ship was if they even knew at the time. A little internet research, however, can tell you when your ship was in or near the waters of Vietnam. Unfortunately, the VA has not made a ship list available to the public. We reached out to Blue Water Navy expert Ed Ball, Director of Research of MVA & BWNA, who has and continues to work on compiling over 1,700 Blue Water ship deck logs since 2016 and he had an important observation " The Navy and Coast Guard Ships Associated with Service in Vietnam and Exposure to Herbicide Agents, aka 'the ship list,' previously used by all claims processors to concede qualifying service, is now restricted to the Records Research Team and designated legacy appeals personnel". Because of this, our team has been hard at work putting together an interactive map tool using research such as Mr. Ball's. You can request the deck logs for your ship and find out latitudes and longitudes and input them into our interactive map to find out if and when your ship was within the 12-mile limits. If your ship was in the right place while you were aboard, VA will concede that you were exposed to Agent Orange.

BLUE WATER NAVY VETERANS MUST HAVE A CURRENT AGENT ORANGE-RELATED DISABILITY

VA has also conceded that certain diseases are caused by Agent Orange exposure. Exposure alone is not sufficient to qualify for benefits, but if you have been diagnosed with one of the presumptive conditions, such as diabetes mellitus, ischemic heart disease, Parkinson's disease, Prostate cancer, respiratory cancers, or one of a number of cancers, VA will concede that these disabilities were caused by Agent Orange. Of note, VA is currently considering a number of new disabilities to add to the list of presumptive diseases, such as bladder cancer and hypertension. If you have been diagnosed with one of those conditions, go ahead and file now and get in line to preserve your effective dates. In addition, even if a condition is not listed as a presumptive condition, if your physician has told you that your disability is related to your exposure to Agent Orange, it is worth filing a claim. Service connection can be awarded for a condition if a veteran can provide a medical nexus between exposure to Agent Orange and the current disability, even if the condition is not presumptive.

HOW CAN BLUE WATERS GET VA DISABILITY BENEFITS?

Our understanding is that the VA is not going to seek out Vietnam-era Navy veterans and reevaluate their cases for veterans benefits unless a claim has been filed. If you served in the territorial sea and you have an Agent Orange-related disability, and you don't currently have a pending appeal for those conditions, you should file one as soon as possible. If you filed a claim years ago that was denied by VA, you still need to file a claim to reopen that previously-denied claim. Even if you have a pending appeal for one condition, you need to make sure that you have filed a claim for any other Agent Orange-related conditions as soon as possible. Sadly, many veterans who filed claims years ago have since passed away, but spouses may file to reopen these claims as well, so go ahead and file these claims in case you are entitled to any accrued benefits (those to which the veteran would have been entitled) or DIC benefits (if the veteran's Agent Orange-related disability contributed to his cause of death).

WHAT EVIDENCE CAN I USE TO PROVE AGENT ORANGE EXPOSURE?

VA is supposed to be doing their own research into which Navy ships qualify for benefits due to herbicide exposure (Agent Orange) and for what time periods, but if you have already determined this information for yourself, submit evidence along with your claims. This could speed up your claim. In addition, make sure that you provide VA with the best medical records that you can obtain. You want to provide evidence as far back as you can, showing when you were diagnosed with the relevant conditions and, to the best of your ability, how severe your condition was over time. If you received health care at VA facilities, this kind of evidence is usually available. Gathering these records can be much more difficult if you received health care from private doctors who may have destroyed records after 7 years. These records can be the key to maximizing your rating.

CAREFULLY REVIEW ANY BLUE WATER DECISION YOU RECEIVE

Once VA decides your claim, it is important to review carefully to make sure that you have received the earliest effective date possible and the highest rating possible for your disability compensation. Check to see if the effective date matches the date when you first filed your claim or when you first developed the Agent-Orange related disability. If not, you may need to appeal the decision. Similarly, check to see if the rating reflects the severity of your condition across time. For instance, if your Parkinson's disease is rated at a flat 30%, VA probably didn't consider how this condition affects each individual body part. Similarly, if your heart condition is rated 10% for a 20 year period during which you suffered heart attacks or congestive heart failure, or if your cancer is rated less than 100% for a period of time while you were receiving chemotherapy, you may need to appeal that decision. If you don't know what the correct effective date or rating should be, or if you don't know how to prove your case, then consult an expert to help you with your appeal for disability benefits due to Agent Orange herbicide exposure.

IF YOU DON'T KNOW WHAT THE CORRECT EFFECTIVE DATE OR RATING SHOULD BE, OR IF YOU DON'T KNOW HOW TO PROVE YOUR CASE, THEN CONSULT AN EXPERT TO HELP YOU WITH YOUR APPEAL FOR DISABILITY BENEFITS DUE TO AGENT ORANGE HERBICIDE EXPOSURE.

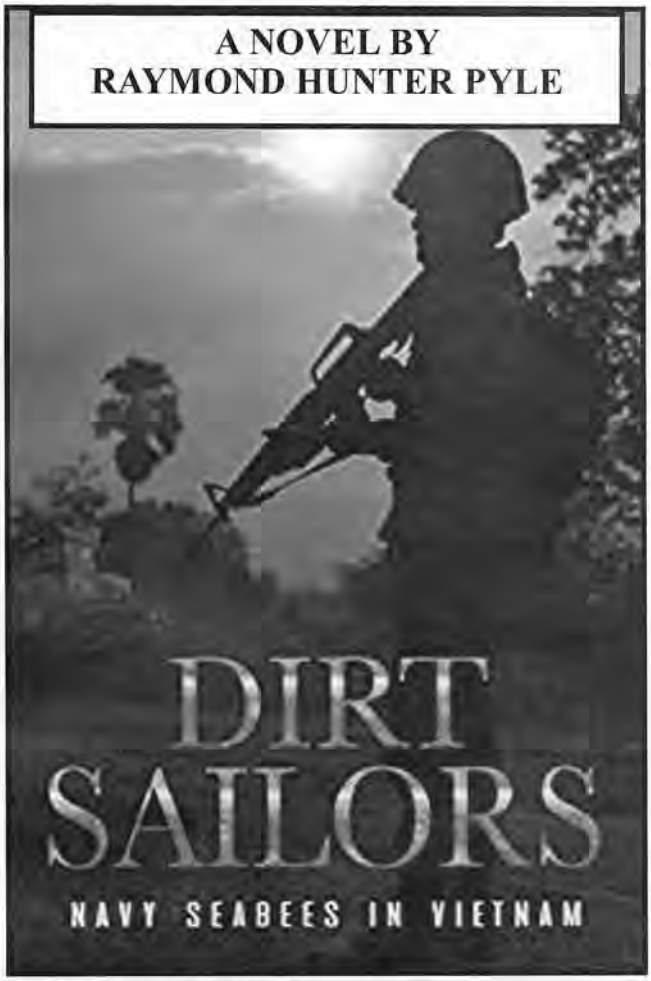
DIRT SAILORS:
NAVY SEABEES IN VIETNAM



In 1965, Hank Tucker and his Brother Toby were out of draft deferments when they discovered an AFL/CIO poster in the union hiring hall advertising a Navy enlistment program offering advanced enlisted paygrades to construction men with extensive experience in the trades and heavy equipment. Just sign up for a thirty month enlistment and they could enter the Navy Seabees as instant petty officers. At that point, joining one of the services was the only way they could avoid getting drafted and joining the Navy sounded like the best deal in town. No guns. No foxholes. No battles. It didn't quite work out that way.

REVIEWS

I was a Chief Builder at Gia Kai Combat Base, plus Tamay fuel tank area. Danang, during the Ammo dump explosion, rebuilding of all damaged metal buildings, plus the construction of all metal arch buildings at Danang Air strip. Many IPO's worked for me during that time. They and the others formed a great force with the Can do spirt did a wonderful job. I was proud to have been their Leading Chief Petty Officer. For all of these past years I have pushed this time in my life to the rear. Trying to forget, it worked but I will say that your story woke me up. I really needed this story to Get in with my life. I am 86 years old this year, and for the past 63 Years I am proud to say I am a Seabee!

I Served 22 years in the Seabees — 11 years in MCB-1. I did two tours on detachments in I Corps but thankfully not along the DMZ. I have read dozens of books about personal experiences of fellow Vietnam Vets but seldom read novels on the subject. However, Dirt Sailors is as factual and realistic as you can get.

I am a Plank owner of CBMU 301 and also one of the 35 that served with Detachment Bravo at Khe Sanh before, during and after the Siege. I am only halfway through this most very surprising book. Understanding that this with fictional characters, but the detail of the location and mechanics of the operations is pretty right on. I give the author Raymond Pyle a Bravo Zulu I as many of the surviving members of Det Bravo, continue to have vivid memories of those days, and so far the book Dirt Sailors is accurate, I look forward to finishing the Book with some hesitation. I will finish I would like to have this in a hard copy for myself and family, friends I have never completely told anyone about Khe Sanh, this would be a good avenue to share. FYI I also was TAD to MCB 11 Security Platoon in Dong Ha for 4 1/2 months Perimeter Security, Patrols , and , I experienced the Ammo Dump explosion and knew the EO who drove in and rescued those Marines, he was awarded a Bronze Star, there were many acts of heroism that day, many not recorded Seabees were tasked with a job in Vietnam, and I believe it was done without much fanfare or recognition. The Siege of Khe Sanh survivability was due to Marines, holding the Hills, Air Force pounding of the NVA, the Seabees of Det Bravo that kept the Runway open,again thank you Ray CBMU 301 Det Bravo MCB 11 Security Platoon

LUNCHEON TO COMMEMORATE THOSE WHO SERVED & THE SIEGE OF KHE SANH

BY CRAIG W. TOURTE
HQ BTRY 1/13

January 21st, 2020, Khe Sanh Veterans of Northern California – Another wonderful turn out of over 50 Veterans and Community Members held at the Table Mountain Golf Course in Oroville, Ca to commemorate the 52ed Anniversary of the Siege of the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh. It was my honor once again to address the Veterans and Community Supporters.

"Thank you for joining us to honor those who fought in the Tet offensive and on and around the Khe Sanh Combat Base. Unfortunately, there are many who are not able to join us. Lee Adams, William Bacon, David Brown and Michael Daley are just a few of the over 2,000 killed and countless wounded and injured in the various battles at and near Khe Sanh. Even today, many still carry the physical and emotional scars of those battles. Donald Saunders couldn't come; he was killed in March 4th of 1968. Tom Horchler lifted his lifeless body up into his arms and gently placed Donald into the bed of his truck and then drove him to Graves Registration. Unfortunately, it was not Toms only sad journey during those horrific 77 days."

"We survivors of the Siege will never forget the ones we stood shoulder-to-shoulder with in the trench lines, those who faced incredible hardships on the surrounding hills, those who flew above in a desperate attempt to extract our wounded and dead and supply us with the critical material necessary for us to persevere. We will never forget the fallen and how they sacrificed their lives for their fellow Marines and for our wonderful country, they will always be part of who we are."

"As Lindon Johnson personally sent off Marine Reinforcements to I Corps from El Toro Marine Air Station, California on February 17, 1968, he told them, this is a decisive time in Vietnam. The eyes of the nation and the eyes of the entire world, the eyes of all of history itself, are on that little brave band of defenders who hold the pass at Khe Sanh. President Obama acknowledge our sacrifices, gallantry and perseverance when he mentioned Khe Sanh along with the great battles of Concord, Gettysburg and Normandy during his first inaugural address."

"Today we remember those who fought during the long and horrific Siege of Khe Sanh that began on January 21, 1968, those who fought during the Hill Fights along with earlier and later battles in that Area of Operation. We also remember those who fought throughout Vietnam during the Tet Offensive. 58,220 brave Americans lost their lives during that war however, we suspect it was many more who later succumbed to their wounds, injuries and the poison of Agent Orange."

"Today we remember, not only those who fought at Khe Sanh and during the Tet Offensive, but also those who continue to sacrifice for the freedom of all Americans."

"We thank you for taking the time today to join us and to honor all of those who answered the call to serve and to honor those who continue to serve around the world. May God Bless America and thank you all for coming."

WHAT HAPPENED AT CAMP LEJEUNE

I grew up drinking and bathing in the toxic waters around a military base in North Carolina. Thirty years later, I went back to investigate.

Lori Lou Freshwater
Aug 21, 2018

In the autumn of 1980, a contractor showed up to grade a parking lot. He had no idea he was about to start digging up the radioactive bodies of dead beagles. But the forked bucket on his bulldozer started pulling up more than soil, and it turned out he was digging in a pit of strontium-90 and dog carcasses that had been buried in an ash-gray tomb: a nest of dead dogs and laboratory waste labeled Radioactive Poison."

The new parking lot was on the site of the former Naval Research Laboratory dump and its associated incinerator in Camp Lejeune, North Carolina—and it was just one of many areas contaminated by an assortment of hazardous waste and chemicals on the base.

About half a mile away from the dump, soon to be known as Site 19, my friends and I were living in our neighborhood, called Paradise Point. We spent our time putting other girls' bras into freezers at slumber parties, playing the Telephone Game, riding our bikes all over the place: to the golf course to steal a cart, to swim at the pool, to play soccer on Saturdays.

During the same autumn the dead beagles were found, I was sitting in front of a fake backdrop of rusty colored leaves, a slight 11-year-old girl with spaces between my teeth and freckles spritzed across my nose and cheeks, to take my school photo.

Under normal circumstances, this entirely unremarkable fifth-grade photo, in a plaid shirt and fragile gold necklace, would have likely ended up where most school photos do, in an old album or a drawer or simply lost to time. Instead, the photo would become a marker in the medical history of my family and my community, a reminder of the crime that was being committed on the day the photo was taken—and also for decades before, and for years after. The place was Camp Lejeune, a United States Marine Corps base wrapped around the New River in Onslow County that served as an amphibious training base where Marines learned to be "the world's best war fighters," picking up skills that would allow them (for example) to make surprise landings on the shores of far away countries. From the 1950s until at least 1985, the drinking water was contaminated with toxic chemicals at levels 240 to 3400 times higher than what is permitted by safety standards.

LORI LOU FRESHWATER

There may never be a true accounting of the suffering caused at Lejeune. As with many other hometown environmental disasters, the Marines and family members poisoned on this military base were not born here, nor did they settle here to make a permanent life and raise their children. Instead, they were often here just for a short time, literally stationed at Lejeune for weeks, months, or, at most, a few years. From the 1950s through at least 1985, an undetermined number of of residents, including infants, children, and civilian workers and personnel, were exposed to trichloroethylene (TCE), tetrachloroethylene (PCE), vinyl chloride, and other contaminants in the drinking water at the Camp Lejeune. These exposures likely increased their risk of cancers, including renal cancer, multiple myeloma, leukemias, and more. It also likely increased their risk of adverse birth outcomes, along with other negative health effects. Now the sick and the dying are all over the world, and an untold number will never be notified about what happened. Instead, we are left to rely on scientific models and data trickling out of public-health agencies and the slow process of adding one story at a time, person-by-person, to the cold data representing an environmental and public-health disaster.

In 1989, the Environmental Protection Agency placed 236 square miles of North Carolina's coastal soil and water on the list of toxic areas known as Superfund sites. The agency cited "contaminated groundwater, sediment, soil and surface water resulting from base operations and waste handling practices" as reasons for including it on the National Priorities List.

Camp Lejeune remains a sprawling Superfund site, and it is also the place where my mom and I spent years drinking a terrible mix of chemicals from our faucet. In the book A Trust Betrayed: The Untold Story of Camp Lejeune, author Mike Magner gives special attention to my mother's story: "A woman with the ironic name of Mary Freshwater may have had the most ghastly experiences at Camp Lejeune." Of course, I share her ironic name, which can still seem like more of a curse. Nearly my entire childhood was consumed by tragedy. The chemical contamination can be linked to the deaths of my two baby brothers, Rusty and Charlie, and to my mom's own difficult final years, when she was dying from two types of acute leukemia. My mother also suffered from mental illness, which was intensified—understandably—by our family's brutal losses. Sometimes it seems that, behind me, there is nothing but inescapable grief.

My middle school was called Tarawa Terrace II, named for the famous World War II Battle of Tarawa. I rode a Marine-green bus every day instead of a yellow one, on a base that had expanded during World War II to claim rivers, creeks, swamps, and mile after mile of Atlantic oceanfront.

Early in the unfolding tragedy, the Army sent a note to Marine leadership about water-testing results. It was sent the same month that my mother wrote on the back of my fifth-grade photo: October, 1980. Army Laboratory Service Chief William Neal scrawled on the bottom of the lab results: "Water is highly contaminated with low molecular weight halogenated hydrocarbons."

It was an early warning about the drinking water on the base. But the Marines didn't take any action that month or the next, and even after several warnings—including another handwritten note that exclaimed merely "Solvents!"—the Marine Corps waited five years to start shutting down contaminated wells. After that first memo, issued only days before the radioactive beagles were found, the poisoned drinking water kept flowing for several more years.

Camp Lejeune has been characterized as a candidate for the worst water contamination case in U.S. history—and I am one of up to a million people who were poisoned. The tragedy, though, is hardly all in the past.

According to the Project on Government Oversight (POGO), the military's failures are continuing today; mistakes are being repeated at our bases overseas, and, in foreign cases, it took a whistleblower to prompt action on contaminated water. A 2013 investigative report produced by the Navy inspector general, obtained through a Freedom of Information Act request, reveals "shortfalls in the oversight and management of drinking water for Navy personnel stationed overseas—even in wealthy, developed countries." The report concludes that "not a single Navy overseas drinking water system meets U.S. compliance standards" or the Navy's own governing standards," according to POGO.

HOW THE WATER BECAME TOXIC

An important part of Marine culture is always being squared away—a code of personal cleanliness and etiquette that requires a pressed and starched uniform and a lot of shoe polishing. One of the dry cleaners that the Marines frequented to service their uniforms was ABC Cleaners, which operated out of a small, red- and white-painted building just across the highway from the base. Word traveled fast that they had the lowest prices, but the business produced more than money. Like any dry-cleaning outfit, it also produced tons of waste from the solvent used to clean the uniforms. According to a court deposition, ABC Cleaners used two to three 55-gallon drums of the solvent a month. That's about three gallons of muck a day.

This dry-cleaning business is across the street from the entrance to my school. The owner used the toxic muck to fill potholes in his parking lot, and threw the rest into the drains.

In other areas on the base, waste was generated and discarded into empty lots, forests, roads, waterways, and makeshift dumps. That toxic waste was then taken by the Carolina rains and summer thunderstorms down toward sea level, into water wells, and into the barracks, houses, trailers, offices, and schools—and finally into the bodies of thousands of Marines and their families: into our cells, into our bones.

In 2014, the Agency for Toxic Substances and Disease Registry, part of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC), issued a position on the water at Camp Lejeune. The ATSDR found that "past exposures from the 1950s through February 1985 to trichloroethylene (TCE), tetrachloroethylene (PCE), vinyl chloride, and other contaminants in the drinking water at the Camp Lejeune likely increased the risk of cancers."

In addition to those toxins, there was also benzene, a clear, colorless, and highly flammable chemical. When you put gas in your car, that smell you notice is benzene—an important petroleum byproduct that is also used in industrial solvents.

In the universe of environmental contamination, language can be complex, murky, and often confusing. When it comes to benzene, though, the language is like the chemical itself, perfectly clear: Benzene is a carcinogen. Benzene is a well-established cause of cancer in humans, and benzene causes acute myeloid leukemia.

The EPA has established a maximum contaminant level goal of zero parts per billion for benzene in public drinking water systems. In 1980, Naval Facilities Engineering Command testing showed that one of the wells at Camp Lejeune measured 380 parts per billion.

In 2010, the Associated Press found that a contractor "dramatically underreported" the level of benzene found in Lejeune's tap water. Per the AP's reporting, in 1992, when ATSDR visited Camp Lejeune to start its public health assessment, they found that a contractor had erroneously documented the 1984 level of benzene in one well was 38 parts per billion—when the actual measurement had been 380 parts per billion. The same contractor's final report, issued in 1994, conveniently omitted the benzene altogether.

"The Marine Corps had been warned nearly a decade earlier about the dangerously high levels of benzene, which was traced to massive leaks from fuel tanks at the base on the North Carolina coast, according to recently disclosed studies," the AP reported.

The chemical stew found at Lejeune is made of volatile organic compounds. They are able to vaporize, and, with ultimate stealth, to enter soil and air as gases, which then become your invisible companions. Finally, they come for the ones you love.

WHEN THE WATER BECOMES VAPOR

A friend of mine describes the humid days in North Carolina as feeling like you are in a dog's mouth. It can be brutal. Take a shower and walk outside and you need another shower. The only thing to do is drink lots of water and search for shade. Our school had an open plan, no enclosed hallways or air-conditioning, so on hot days teachers marched us to the old metal water fountains after recess. Then there were the "black flag days," which meant that it was too hot for recess. In the cafeteria, we lined up for strange-tasting meat patties on plastic trays that were still warm and damp from the wash cycle. I can still smell all that dirty steam coming from the industrial dishwashers. We were breathing it, the toxic vapors, but the cafeteria ladies serving us were right there in a fog of it all day long, wearing hairnets and gloves out of what is, in retrospect, a heartbreaking concern for the students' health and safety.
In homes across the country, vaporized poisons from underground can also be stealth killers. The dry-cleaning business down the road might be accidentally responsible for polluting the air in someone's home. This is because of something called soil vapor intrusion, the process by which chemicals migrate from contaminated soil and groundwater into the air of indoor structures where it then sits, essentially trapped. The EPA issued its first guidance on vapor intrusion in 2002. In 2003, the George W. Bush administration ended that guidance. President Barack Obama then made it a priority—and the EPA released its final Vapor Intrusion Technical Guide in 2015.

Mike Magner, author of A Trust Betrayed, says that he thinks vapor intrusion is "the next big firestorm for the Pentagon, not just at Camp Lejeune but at military bases and former bases around the country."

"There is plenty of evidence that the air is or has been toxic inside some of Lejeune's buildings—there are test results being covered up but that will eventually come out—and there is a good possibility that either legislation or litigation will force the government to address this problem," Magner says. "If the Marines are worried about their liabilities for the water contamination at Camp Lejeune, they ain't seen nothin' yet."

Some years ago, I became a member of the Community Assistance Panel, a group mandated by congress to represent the Lejeune community working with the scientists at the CDC and with bureaucrats at the Veterans Administration. Through this work, I've learned more about the military's cover-up of the water contamination, and how the culture that says "Stay Marine" also ensures that some problems remain entombed in secrecy.

The Community Assistance Panel has obtained more than 22,000 documents from an in-progress vapor intrusion study on the buildings at Camp Lejeune up to the present time. The study documents a clear and ongoing risk of exposure, as the groundwater plumes and utility lines—the pathways of exposure—are still located under the buildings.

This summer, a report to the CDC said that a recent test, at a building used as a barracks, had revealed the "highest recorded on-base indoor air TCE [trichloroethylene] detection due to vapor intrusion" since the EPA issued its guidance. This measurement exceeds both state and federal screening levels, which can cause health problems for those exposed, especially women who are in the first trimester of pregnancy. Which brings me back to my mother.

THE DAMAGE IS DONE

My mother grew up poor on a farm, traumatized (she said) from having to break chicken's necks, and dropped out of high school mid-way through. But Mary Freshwater knew her powers, and they were a force when she conjured them.

In 2007, the National Academy of Sciences convened a panel to talk about the water at Lejeune. It took place at the Jacksonville USO, the oldest USO building in the country, which sits on banks of New River under old Carolina shade trees. My mother was sitting in the audience while experts went on about statistics until it was time to hear from the people affected by the poisoned water at Camp Lejeune. Mom was there to tell them about Rusty and Charlie, the two babies she'd lost: one born with an open spine, the other with no cranium. Behind my mom, the Marines and family members were there to listen and tell their own stories.

Wearing a light pink turtleneck, her hair an uncharacteristic mess, she stepped up to the microphone and placed a small cardboard box on the podium in front of her. In black marker in small letters on the top of the box was the word Baby. This was all my mom had left of Rusty, my brother who had lived a month and died on New Year's Eve in 1978.

As she spoke, she opened the baby box and unpacked it, eventually holding up a dingy bottle with the nipple still on it and liquid still inside, and a blue onesie, with a yellow stain which she would explain was her son's vomit that she had not been able to wash.

"We are not numbers in a study. We are human beings that have had great tragedies," she said.

After my mom died, this same baby box was one of the things I knew I had to find and keep. She had it with her all the time, even as we moved all over the place. It was my family history, but it was also now something public—a part of the country's history too.

My mom's leukemia, and her unwillingness to give up the fight, made her extended illness one of terrible suffering. After her death, my mother's much younger husband fell apart and fell into the bottle again. One night I got a call saying that he hadn't paid the rent and that the landlady was putting all my mom's stuff in the old barn out back. Some cousins had already shown up and taken things. I was living in Rhode Island and had to drive down to rural North Carolina overnight. By the time I could get there the place was a mess.

After a few minutes of walking around the house, I was able to find the baby box.

It was sitting with junk, looking like the next candidate for the trash. I went into the kitchen to get some water; it was hot already and I was thirsty. On the counter there was another box, and this one stood out because it was new and had no name.

I opened it. Inside was a clear bag of ash and small fragments of bone. It was what was left of my mama. It was the first time I had seen someone's ashes like that. It was not what I expected, not elegant ash like the kind the Kennedys would puff into the air from their boat and watch settle into the sea. Instead, it was undeniably the remnants of a human being, heavy with bits of stubborn bone.

I went and got my little brother's box and sat it on the counter too. Right next to her. And then, after packing up as much as I could, I took them both home.

The New River is not one of the most beautiful rivers. The banks are scrappy, with wild bushes crouched and waiting to sting your legs. It starts and finishes in Onslow County. It is our river, and it seems to say it is majestic until it makes believers out of us all. Sometimes it looks like the banks are falling into the water, like a claw came along and took root and dirt, rot and leaves. This kind of thing can look spooky. Maybe because we want to wonder, but never actually know, what is buried. We don't want a storm to come along and dig up the things that have been covered, forgotten.

MARINES KILLED IN ACTION RETURN HOME TO A SOMBER CEREMONY AT ARLINGTON

A very special funeral was held at the Arlington National Cemetery for five Vietnam War Marines who were killed in action together in the same incident. Their bodies were recovered and identified over a span of five years by the Defense Department POW/MIA Accounting Agency (DPAA).

All of these Marines were killed in action while being inserted behind enemy lines in Thien-Hue Province on June 30, 1967.

On that day in June, Capt. John A. House was piloting a Marine Corps, CH-46A Sea Knight helicopter with three crew members on a mission to insert an 8-man Reconnaissance team, from Alpha Co. 3rd Recon Bn, 3rd Marine Division into enemy territory.

They were there to do what they do best, that is, stealthy reconnaissance to seek out enemy movement, positions, and numbers, etc.

When the CH-46 was coming into the landing zone, it suddenly received very heavy fire from the treelines all around the landing site. The helicopter caught on fire and went down quickly. Three of the helicopter crew and four of the recon team from Alpha Co. 3rd Recon survived the crash and were later rescued, but the remains of those who were killed could not be recovered at that time. Those KIAs were subsequently placed on the list of MIAs and remained there until recently.

With the help and full cooperation of the Socialist Republic of Vietnam and local villagers, the DPAA were able to recover the remains of five of the KIA in this incident. They also were able to recover material evidence, life support equipment and helicopter wreckage from the CH-46 helicopter. They were able to identify the remains of LCpl. Merlin R. Allen, of Madison, WI, and Navy Hospital Corpsman, Michael B. Judd, 21, of Cleveland, Ohio, in 2013. The remains of Capt. John A. House, the pilot of the CH-46A helicopter, and Cpl. Glyn L. Reynolds, 21, of Birmingham, AL, and LCpl., John D. Killen, 18, of Davenport, Iowa, were not identified until December 22, 2015.

These Marines were buried together at Arlington National Cemetery with full military honors and with family members present. Since they were all Marines, the Marine Honor Guard and the Marine Body Bearers from the Marine Barracks at 8th and I Streets in Washington, D.C. provided the full color and dignity of a Marine Corps burial to the funeral proceedings.

The Veterans Site sends its condolences to the families of these five Marines killed in action. They are interred together just as they died together. We honor their sacrifice, deeply respect their service to the country, and say to them with all our hearts, "Welcome Home, good Marines!"

Semper Fidelis! We remain your Fratres Aeterni!

SGT. CHARLES TALIANO: THE FACE OF A 'MARINE'S MARINE' MAY 9, 1945-JUNE 4, 2010

JUST HOW DID CHARLES "CHUCK" TALIANO JR. END UP BECOMING THE ONE MARINE CHOSEN FOR A RECRUITING CAMPAIGN THAT WOULD MAKE HIS FACE RECOGNIZABLE WORLDWIDE?
JOSH MITELMAN/STAFF VIDEO

On a warm April day in 1968, a new platoon was organizing in the squad bay at Marine Corps Recruit Depot Parris Island. Sgt. Charles Taliano, a drill instructor charged with molding men into Marines, stood inches from a recruit's face -- snarling. His jaw clenched and jutted forward.

His neck vein bulged and his blue eyes bore into the young man, whom Taliano for some reason had found wanting. Maybe he was "eyeballing the area or needed to stand up straight, something like that," Taliano later said. "I was just having a conversation with him."

A reservist writing a book about boot camp happened to be on the depot that day and snapped a picture of the "conversation."

The Marine Corps chose the photo for its upcoming recruitment campaign. For much of the '70s and '80s, thousands of posters of Taliano's unsmiling mug circulated around the country with the headline, "We don't promise you a rose garden," a reference to a 1970 country/pop chart-topper.

Photo stills from the conversation were incorporated into a 1973 TV commercial promoting the Marines -- an attempt to bolster recruitment amid flagging public support for the Vietnam War.

Suddenly, Sgt. "Chuck" Taliano was one of the most recognizable faces in the Marine Corps, earning him the nickname the Rose Garden D.I.

"People would tell him, 'If it wasn't for that poster, I would not have joined the Marines,'" said Sgt. Major David Robles, a Beaufort resident and friend of Taliano's.

CHARLES TALIANO, FORMER DRILL INSTRUCTOR, HELD A SMALLER VERSION OF THE POSTER THAT MADE HIM THE FACE OF MARINE CORPS RECRUITING IN THIS 2006 PHOTO. TALIANO DIED JUNE 4, 2010

Taliano never profited from the campaign financially. As far as he was concerned, the photo was a fluke -- something that could have happened to any drill instructor in the squad bay that day.
One thing he was never able to do was to locate the recruit at whom he was yelling.

In a 2007 book about drill instructors called "The Few and The Proud" by Larry Smith, Taliano said it might be better not knowing.

"I'm married to that man for life, and I don't want to know that he's dead, wounded or maimed," he said.

Taliano became a drill instructor two years after enlisting in 1964. It was a stressful job for someone barely of college age. Taliano was only 21 years old with recruits older than he was. But he did his job well, turning boys into fighting machines.

Former recruits send him letters, confessing they never would have survived combat if it hadn't been for his training.

"He could be hard core and bark at them, but he still took them into consideration and treated them as human beings," his sister Michaelene Taliano said. She found stacks of letters from recruits in Taliano's home after he died in 2010 from multiple myeloma, a cancer of plasma cells. He was 65.

And Taliano loved the Marines he helped create.

"Being a D.I., other than being a father, was the most rewarding thing in my life," Taliano said in "The Few and The Proud."

After finishing active duty, Taliano worked in book publishing for 30 years, mostly in New York.

When he retired, he returned to Beaufort.

A YOUNG SGT. TALIANO AS MEMORIALIZED ON KEVIN JANDREAU'S 'IN MEMORIAM' FACEBOOK PAGE

Looking for something to do, Taliano was persuaded by his friend David Robles to run the gift shop at Parris Island. He made $10,000 his first day running the shop, Robles said.

Taliano himself was the big draw since the gift shop sold copies of the "Rose Garden" poster that Taliano autographed for anyone who asked. He kept sales strong for years to come.

While his fame may have gotten people in the door, Taliano kept the store so well stocked with Marine tchotchkes that customers usually left with armfuls of other merchandise, too.

Over the years, Taliano traveled to other Marine bases and attended Marine functions. He would inevitably get wrangled into signing posters.

Once, at a Marine Corps Ball in Philadelphia, the event's speaker pointed Taliano out from on stage. Almost instantly, a line formed out the door for his autograph, recalled his son, Michael Taliano.

"He was signing posters until after 11 p.m.," Michael Taliano said.

Autograph seekers were mostly old-school military guys who saw the poster when they were coming up in the '70s and '80s.

But time has taken some of the shine off Taliano's brand.

"It's sad now because a lot of these kids don't know who he was because they haven't seen the poster," Robles said. Even during Taliano's lifetime, some recruits would buy the poster at the gift shop without realizing the man in it was the one counting their change.

Kevin Jandreau of Springfield, Mass. has made it his mission to keep Taliano's memory alive. Jandreau befriended Taliano during years of escorting young Marines to boot camp and making a point to stop in the gift shop.

He created an "In Memoriam" Facebook page for Taliano.

Jandreau also requires the Young Westover Marines, a youth group he works with, to buy the poster whenever they're at Parris Island.

Jandreau has his own autographed poster framed and hanging in his living room.

"Sgt. T", as he was affectionately called, may have looked menacing on the poster, Jandreau said, but "he was a man with a great heart."

Even if you didn't know he was a former drill instructor, it showed, said son Michael, who described his dad as a polite yet strict man who demanded direct eye contact and firm handshakes.

The saying "Once a Marine, always a Marine" was definitely true of Sgt. T, Michael Taliano said. "He was a Marine's Marine."

And in the end, Taliano actually got a rose garden. The wives of 2nd Recruit Training Battalion at Parris Island, the battalion for which Taliano had been a drill instructor, built a brick garden in front of the battalion headquarters and planted yellow roses for him.

The Rose Garden D.I. saw them bloom before he died.

AN AIR CAVALRY UNIT STRUGGLED TO PROTECT A REMOTE LANDING ZONE FROM WAVE AFTER WAVE OF NORTH VIETNAMESE ATTACKS

PICTURES TAKEN BY DOUG MCPHEE AND COMBINED BY BRENT CROSSLEY. FROM CHARLIE BROWN: THATS LAOS IN THE FAR RIGHT. LANG VEI SF CAMP BEYOND THE CENTER DIP IN THE HILL. 1/5 CAV TOC (RIGHT WITH ANTENNA) AND A/1/77 FA ALONG THE RIDGE. MORNING MIST BEFORE WE WERE ATTACKED.

In May 1968, two small American outposts deep in enemy territory were all that remained of a massive force from the 1st Cavalry Division (Airmobile) that had just been in one of the biggest battles of the war. The division arrived during Operation Pegasus in early April to break the North Vietnamese Army's siege of the Khe Sanh Marine base, which had been under attack since Jan. 21. After the relief force reached the Marine base on April 8, most of the 1st Cavalry Division troops moved south to the A Shau Valley. But two battalions and associated artillery units in the division's 2nd Brigade stayed at landing zones Snapper and Peanuts to support Marine regiments that had re-established control of the Khe Sanh base and were going on the offensive against the NVA in the surrounding hills. Before long, wounded and dead from both sides would be scattered around Landing Zone Peanuts in some of the toughest fighting that many of the air cavalry troops would ever see.

In mid-April, troops of the 1st Battalion, 5th Cavalry Regiment, had been helicoptered to a T-shaped hill, LZ Peanuts, to protect the westward approaches to Khe Sanh. To the east of the hill were a few thousand yards of open plain. To the south were Route 9 and the Lang Vei Special Forces camp that had been overrun about 2½ months before. To the west were Laos and the Ho Chi Minh Trail. Communist forces there wanted to attack Khe Sanh again, but they would first have to wipe out LZ Peanuts.

The 1st Battalion, 5th Cavalry, troops constructed defensive positions around the entire perimeter of the landing zone and fortified their widely spaced hootches. They laid coiled barbed wire in some areas of the perimeter and cut down elephant grass around bunkers to provide clear fields of fire.

DAYS BEFORE THE BATTLE, A MARINE CH-46 SEA KNIGHT DELIVERS AMMUNITION TO THE ARTILLERY RIDGE. (MIKE KERN)

Stretching out from the main area of LZ Peanuts was a narrow finger of land dotted with 105 mm howitzers and the bunkers of artillerymen in Battery A, 1st Battalion, 77th Artillery Regiment, 1st Cavalry Division.

Around 4:30 p.m. on May 4, 1968—about two weeks after the troops arrived on LZ Peanuts—three enemy artillery rounds landed in the perimeter.

One shell hit the ammunition dump containing more than 2,000 rounds of howitzer ammo. The explosions sent the Americans scrambling for cover. By the end of the day, LZ Peanuts had been hit with 21 artillery rounds, killing two soldiers and taking 10 others out of the fight, including Battery A's Capt. Ron Weiss. With the battery's commanding officer sidelined and a burning ammo dump still exploding, the diminished ranks of artillerymen left their positions on the narrow ridge and shifted to foxholes on the main hilltop, temporarily abandoning the battery's six 105 mm howitzers.

As night approached, Lt. Col. Zeke Jordan, in the 1st Battalion, 5th Cavalry's operations center on LZ Peanuts, realized that his hill had the full attention of NVA soldiers based 3-1/2 miles southwest in Laos. Worse, Jordan now had no manned howitzers on the hilltop and only one understrength infantry company, Alpha Company, providing perimeter security.

Only about 150 defenders were still manning LZ Peanuts, while 300 or more North Vietnamese from the 304 NVA Division's 66th Regiment—two companies of NVA infantrymen and a company of sappers (an elite commando force)—were spread out and hidden on the sides of the hilltop landing zone and at staging areas in the valley below.

Sometime after midnight on May 5, the sappers began to quietly crawl uphill from multiple sides. Their mission was to blast wide gaps in LZ Peanuts' perimeter so regular NVA troops, running up behind them, could rush through for a close-quarters attack. Wearing only small drab loin cloths and smeared with black soot, the sappers inched through thick elephant grass that sliced at their skin. They hauled satchels filled with explosives and carried folding-stock AK-47 assault rifles. Though some brought medical supplies, most knew their climb would likely be a one-way trip.

Just before 2 a.m., Spcs. David Hosu and Thomas Mullins of Alpha Company's 1st Squad, 1st Platoon, sat in their underground bunker down the hill, about 200 yards outside LZ Peanuts' perimeter, where they were on listening-post duty, along with Pvts. Britton Kaur, Terry Misener, Jackie Lee Riley and Don Collier. Kaur and Misener had been perched atop the hootch as lookouts, and it was time for them to be relieved by Hosu and Mullins. Kaur poked his head in an opening in the sandbagged wall to make sure they were awake. "All right, damn it, I'm up," an aggravated Hosu hissed. Suddenly two trip flares were set off just beyond the perimeter, illuminating Kaur and Misener's figures outside the bunker. Both men immediately grabbed grenades off their flak jackets, pulled the pins and tossed the explosives in the direction of the flares. The blasts were accompanied by the screams of enemy troops. Another blast went off 10 feet in front of Kaur and Misner.

"Who the hell threw that grenade?" Kaur yelled. "What grenade?" replied someone inside the bunker.

Realizing now how close the invaders were, Kaur grabbed the PRC-25 radio in the bunker to contact Capt. George Kish at Alpha Company's hootch, about 350 yards away at the landing zone. "We have definite movement out here," Kaur said. "They're trying to get inside our perimeter."

While Kaur talked into the headset, Hosu picked up an M79 grenade launcher and exited the bunker, followed by Mullins with an M16 rifle. Meanwhile, Riley and Collier, still inside the bunker, began tearing down sections of the walls to create better observation points. For several minutes, the two sides exchanged grenades and satchel charges. Then, as abruptly as it had started, the action subsided at the listening post. But small-arms fire and explosions intensified on the higher ridge behind them—LZ Peanuts was under attack.

Battalion commander Jordan relayed an urgent message to the 2nd Brigade headquarters at LZ Snapper, just across the valley: "LZ Peanuts is sitrep red. I say again, LZ Peanuts is sitrep red," code for Situation Report Red, used to indicate that a base was under direct attack. Jordan said the enemy was inside the wire, attacking with satchel charges and small arms on the east, northeast and southwest perimeters. Over the next few hours, waves of sappers and NVA soldiers continued to assault the perimeter.

Meanwhile, 1st Lt. Mike Maynard, who took over for Weiss and became acting commander of LZ Peanuts' artillery, stood outside his bunker and radioed LZ Snapper. Maynard asked the artillery unit there—Battery A, 1st Battalion, 30th Field Artillery Regiment, 1st Cavalry Division—to shoot illumination flares over the besieged landing zone so the base's defenders could see the attacking enemy.

On the southern perimeter, Pvt. Scott Thompson of Alpha Company's 1st Platoon was in his bunker when the illumination flares fired from LZ Snapper exploded in the sky above Peanuts and lit up NVA locations below. To his left, the sound of gunfire near the howitzers intensified. To his right, Staff Sgt. Carlyle Guenther ordered an M60 machine gun to fire bullets with red tracer tails over the hill.

As Thompson peered out the slit of his bunker into complete blackness, a burst of light from an illumination flare revealed a nearly naked man moving in a crouched run up the hill, bypassing his position. Incredulous, Thompson wondered how the enemy got into his perimeter. He sprawled out of his bunker and aimed his M16 at the passing sapper. Before he could fire, a small sizzling explosive charge landed at his feet.

Instinctively, Thompson leaped head-first into a slit trench filled with human excrement, and the charge's blast blew above him. He rolled over, and another charge landed on his chest. Thompson hurriedly jumped out of the trench and slid face-first across the ground as the second explosive went off, blowing dirt and human waste everywhere. After pressing himself up, he began checking his M16. Then something hard hit him between the shoulders. A third charge had just been thrown at him. Thompson rolled back into the relative safety of the stinking slit trench he had just exited.

Pvt. Michael Huff of Alpha's 3rd Platoon worked his way to the perimeter near Thompson as explosives went off all around. The concussion from one charge temporarily paralyzed Huff and knocked him out. He woke up in a foxhole with a baseball-sized chunk of meat missing from his neck. NVA soldiers were standing and talking over the foxhole, unaware that he was still alive. After the feeling in his extremities returned, Huff grabbed his M79 grenade launcher, leveled it between the shoulder blades of a retreating NVA soldier and squeezed the trigger.

Artillery commander Maynard, holding a 25-pound radio, was making his way toward 1st Sgt. Charles Marshall at LZ Peanut's fire direction center, which had controlled the artillery battery's firing before the ammo dump explosion ended the action there. As Maynard ran, small-arms fire was snapping through the air, and one round struck the radio, nearly forcing the lieutenant to drop it as he reeled backward. "Damn it, there goes the radio!" he thought, not realizing that the hunk of metal he carried had just saved him from a gruesome wound. When Maynard found Marshall, he asked if the sergeant had another radio that could be used to adjust the incoming illumination if necessary. "No, sir," Marshall replied, but added that 1st Lt. Ed Cattron, down the hill, might have one. Maynard decided to make a dash for Cattron's position. Crouching anxiously by the now-defunct fire direction center, Maynard waited for the next illumination round from LZ Snapper. After the flash of light, he sprinted 50 yards to Cattron's bunker, yelling "friendly, friendly." As he slid into the bunker, a winded Maynard could only say, "I hear you have an extra radio."

Instead of answering, Cattron motioned toward Maynard's abandoned howitzer positions. "I think there are [NVA] regulars out there," he blurted. Both officers watched dozens of uniformed NVA soldiers swarming through the empty artillery gun pits. "They don't know we have contracted our perimeter," Cattron said. "Open that box and start rolling those grenades out there."

Up on the hill, Jordan was outside the battalion operations center being treated for a leg wound when 1st Lt. Charles Brown approached him. "Col. Jordan, our perimeter near the battery is breaking apart," Brown said, frantically. "I'm going to grab some men and try to fill in the gap." Receiving a nod of approval, Brown spun around and headed toward the fire direction center.

Rushing down the slope, Brown passed several soldiers, nearly lifting them up with one arm, and threw them in the direction of the encroaching NVA troops. "They're busting through down there," he shouted. "Plug up the hole!" Brown climbed on top of the fire direction center's roof, overlooking the abandoned battery position, and saw the enemy moving quickly up the hill. As he directed his men into firing positions, a piece of jagged metal struck his extended arm. Brown dropped to one knee but quickly grabbed his wound, steadied himself and continued to command his men, sending them to various positions to protect and tighten the base's collapsing perimeter.

All across LZ Peanuts, others were taking similarly frenzied actions to stop the NVA advance. Guenther was coordinating the adjustment of the western perimeter when a bullet ripped through the staff sergeant's chest. He slumped to his knees, lowered his head and died.

Meanwhile, Brown continued to run between the battalion operations center and the perimeter overlooking the abandoned battery. On one of his trips to the perimeter, he collided with an NVA sapper. The two foes wrestled to the ground, scratching and clawing at each other as they rolled downhill. Brown, a former high school wrestler, managed to work his hand up to the sapper's face and plunge his thumb into the man's eye. The sapper screamed in pain and pushed himself loose of the American's grip, escaping into the darkness.

Brown continued on to Cattron's bunker overlooking the battery and asked for a situation report. Cattron said North Vietnamese regulars and sappers were moving freely through the battery, trying to destroy the howitzers. "There are no friendlies between us and them," he added. It was roughly 4 a.m., just one hour before sunrise. Suddenly the already-heavy small-arms fire intensified. "They are making another push" Brown yelled.

Cattron pointed out enemy soldiers hiding behind jeeps about 50 yards away. Realizing the need for immediate action, Brown and Cattron charged the jeeps. Screaming, firing their M16s and throwing grenades, while satchel charges were thrown at them, they covered the 50 yards in a few seconds.

After several minutes of intense close-quarters fighting, Cattron shouted at Brown to pull back to the bunker. "I'm calling in Blue Max support," he said, a reference to the nickname for the rocket-armed helicopters of the 20th Field Artillery Regiment (Aerial Rocket), 1st Cavalry Division.

Cattron grabbed the remaining PRC-25 and radioed LZ Peanuts fire support liaison officer, Capt. Duke Wheeler of the 1st Battalion, 77th Artillery. "I need immediate Blue Max support on this east finger with the battery on it," Cattron said. "As you come in from the north, you will see a line of jeeps and trailers. Use the jeeps as your bearing and hose down the hill to the southeast. Bad guys all over that ridge."

With daylight still 30 minutes away, artillery officer 1st Lt. Jim Harris at LZ Snapper radioed battery commander Maynard on Peanuts with distressing news: "We are running low on illumination rounds. Do you copy?" Around 4:30 a.m., the Snapper crews fired their last illumination round and watched it drift across the valley until fizzling out. Harris exhaled audibly and hung his head in despair. Then he heard the distant hum of aircraft engines.

Over the radio came the call: "Peanuts Control, Peanuts Control, this is Spooky. We are coming on station. Where do you need us?" The twin engine Air Force Douglas AC-47 Spooky arrived overhead. The aircraft could drop powerful MK-24 flares—each able to produce brilliant illumination for up to three minutes—and was equipped with three 7.62 mm miniguns, each capable of firing 6,000 rounds minute.

While the AC-47's flares illuminated the attacking North Vietnamese hordes, the plane's deadly miniguns shredded the invaders. At a 2005 reunion, Harris recalled the dramatic moment Spooky arrived: "No Hollywood script could have been more dramatically written," he said. "At that instant... Spooky lit up the sky! The roar that erupted from LZ Snapper was like Lambeau Field [home of the Green Bay Packers] on a Sunday afternoon in October."

As sunlight reached LZ Peanuts, the sounds of war diminished and curious heads began to pop up from behind blast walls and foxholes to survey the wreckage of war strewn across the hill. The six men on the dangerously exposed listening post outside LZ Peanuts inspected their position and solemnly hiked back up the hill. Seven of their 11 trip flares had been triggered, and only one grenade was left between them.

The rest of Alpha Company began the grisly task of searching dead bodies and gathering weapons. Sleep -deprived and skittish from a night of intense fighting, most of the troops were on edge.

By 7 a.m., they had discovered 30 North Vietnamese bodies in and around the base, many blood trails in all directions and a substantial cache of weapons, including 15 AK-47 rifles, three B-40 rocket launchers, a radio and numerous satchel charges and grenades. It was clear the attack on LZ Peanuts had been a well-coordinated assault that had likely taken weeks to prepare.

As ground troops continued mop-up operations around the perimeter, a stream of medevac helicopters made several flights to evacuate the two dozen wounded. The injuries included burns, burst eardrums, shoulder wounds, broken legs, gunshot wounds and bayonet wounds. Numerous infantrymen with "relatively minor" wounds choose to remain alongside their comrades at the base.

The wounded soldiers were lifted off the hill by 6:30 a.m., and the task of moving the dead followed. As Wheeler, the fire support liaison officer, was helicoptered out, he looked down through the chopper's open doorway and saw a line of 11 poncho-covered American bodies near the helipad. Two hours later, the remaining infantrymen of the 1st Battalion learned that they would be flown off the landing zone, followed by the destroyed howitzers.

On May 6, the Americans destroyed their bunkers and left LZ Peanuts to the jungle. Two days later, most of the grunts in the 2nd Brigade of the 1st Cavalry Division were helicoptered to a location about 30 miles northeast of Peanuts and 5 miles south of the Demilitarized Zone to participate in a joint operation with the Marines. Although the fight for LZ Peanuts had been won, combat for the 1st Cavalry Division continued.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Ken Korkow was raised in a ranching and rodeo family and entered the Marine Corps when he was 18. He lived through the 77-day siege of Khe Sanh which was the longest and most deadly battle of the Vietnam War. When blown up, the two fellow Marines that pulled him out both thought he wouldn't live. Later, a doctor said, You may as well accept this, you're never going to walk or use your hands again!" Ken married Liz while he was still in the military hospital and neither of them knew how much Ken had changed. After his medical discharge from the military the governor of his home state named a day in Ken's honor as the state's most highly decorated Vietnam Veteran. NAVY CROSS & PURPLE HEART

40 YEARS AFTER SNIPER MARK ESSEX, MARINE PILOT IS PROUD HE HELPED STOP THE CARNAGE

MARINE PILOT WHO 'BORROWED' HELICOPTER TO END SNIPER SITUATION HAS DIED

Ramon Antonio Vargas, NOLA.com | The Times-Picayune
Jan 6, 2013

Like most other residents of New Orleans, Marine helicopter pilot Charles H. "Chuck" Pitman watched the television in horror on Jan. 7, 1973, as authorities tried to stop a sniper or snipers who had invaded the Downtown Howard Johnson's Motor Lodge that morning and fatally shot seven people, including three police officers. Shots rang out from various spots in the 17-story hotel, making police think there was more than one gunman, but the cops eventually contained the killer or killers to the roof. Though cornered, whoever was on the hotel roof was out of the NOPD's reach. Disturbed, Pitman -- at the time a 37-year-old lieutenant colonel in charge of a Marine air unit stationed in Belle Chasse -- thought, "We've got to do something. Those people need help out there."

So Pitman did do something. He flew a Marine helicopter to the hotel on Loyola Avenue and helped police officers, some of them on board the chopper, kill 23-year-old Mark Essex, who investigators determined was the sole sniper. In doing so, however, Pitman placed his career with the Marines in jeopardy.

Four decades later, many New Orleanians are still thankful for Pitman's actions on the day Essex terrorized the city. "Without that helicopter and without his piloting, it would've been a lot worse," Moon Landrieu, New Orleans' mayor at the time, said recently. "The city owes him a debt of gratitude."

Antoine Saacks, a former police officer who boarded Pitman's copter that Sunday, said, "I always say the true heroes were Chuck and his crew, undoubtedly. I have a tremendous amount of respect for the man that's unwavering."

On the day he resolved to help the cops end the sniper's grip of terror on the city, Pitman ordered one of his subordinates to contact the New Orleans Police Department and offer the Marine air unit's help. An NOPD sergeant called back about 4 p.m. and accepted, asking for a helicopter with a searchlight.

Pitman, his co-pilot and two crew members immediately prepared to fly to the scene. However, in the rush to get there, Pitman had not gotten the high-level authorization necessary to undertake such a mission.

Though Pitman, along with the Coast Guard, did have standing permission to send helicopters to assist local responders' rescue efforts in case of a high-rise fire, such as the deadly one at the Rault Center on Nov. 29, 1972, six weeks earlier, there were no air rescues required at the hotel. Pitman recalled that on the day of the sniper, the Coast Guard didn't want to dispatch a helicopter to the Howard Johnson's because foggy weather and low visibility made flying dangerous.

So when Pitman flew his helicopter to the hotel with his crew, he exposed himself to a court-martial: He had deployed military personnel and resources to quell a civil matter, and he did not have permission to do so before taking off.

'I CAN'T DUKE IT OUT WITH HEAVY WEAPONS OR ANYTHING'

Entering the fight on that windy, frigid, rainy Sunday did not frighten Pitman. The combat veteran -- who was born in Chicago, grew up in an orphanage, moved to Wisconsin after being adopted and learned to fly by age 14 -- had joined the Marines in 1952.

He flew some 1,200 missions in the Vietnam War. His helicopters were shot down seven times, and he suffered a .50-caliber bullet wound to one of his legs.

"I enjoyed the excitement -- being in dangerous situations," Pitman said when asked why he volunteered to fly to the Howard Johnson's. "I didn't necessarily like killing anybody, but I liked being a part of the action. ... I was used to the sounds of battle, the fog of war."

Because of the poor flying conditions, Pitman could hover only slightly above the ground after departing from Belle Chasse in a CH-46 Sea Knight, a twin rotor transport helicopter. He headed to the Mississippi River, tracked its course to the Crescent City Connection and then turned toward downtown, following the expressway. He landed the helicopter in a parking lot near City Hall and an under-construction stadium now known as the Mercedes-Benz Superdome.

To meet with NOPD Superintendent Clarence Giarrusso and get his instructions, Pitman had to walk into the Howard Johnson's lobby, where the command post had been set up. Pitman, stunned that the command post was in such a dangerous location, said the only reason he walked toward the hotel entrance was that he figured running might draw sniper fire.

Giarrusso asked Pitman if he had brought an armored helicopter. Pitman replied, "I'm not armored. I can't duke it out with heavy weapons or anything." Giarrusso then requested that Pitman use his helicopter to lift a 16,000-pound armored car to the top of the roof. Pitman, whose Sea Knight was unable to carry half that load, said, "I couldn't take that up on the best day of the year."

But Pitman agreed to fly a group of well-armed officers -- including Saacks, 26 at the time -- over the hotel to better see where the sniper was hiding. They would try to force the sniper out of his lair.

CONFRONTING THE SNIPER

During events chronicled by writer Chuck Hustmyre in an essay titled, "Under Attack: The New Orleans Police Department and the Howard Johnson's Hotel Sniper," Pitman approached the motor lodge by navigating between downtown high-rise buildings and sweeping in over the roof. Saacks remembers being impressed by Pitman's piloting skills.

"His maneuvering of that helicopter was unbelievable," Saacks, a former Marine, said almost 40 years later. "When you have someone like Chuck in the driver's seat, you feel confident in what you're doing. You know he's got your ass -- you're protected."

Pitman shone his searchlight on a roof cubicle where it had been reported that the gunman was lurking, but no one could see anything. Saacks and the other officers on board fired volley after volley, figuring that the gunman was hiding just inside the cubicle's metal door, leading to a stairway, or in either of two adjacent alcoves, which had cinderblock walls on three sides.

Pitman passed over the roof several times. Each time, Saacks blew holes in the cinderblock with his M-16 rifle. The sniper wasn't hurt, but whenever Pitman pulled the helicopter away to circle back, cops positioned in neighboring buildings said the sniper would run out of the cubicle and shoot at it. From time to time, bullets smacked the exterior of the copter.

The cops aboard the Sea Knight ran out of ammunition a couple of times, and Pitman had to land so they could reload. After one of those pit stops, the sniper hit the Sea Knight with gunfire but vanished when the helicopter began to pass over the hotel.

Pitman lingered over the roof and focused his searchlight on the cubicle as the cops blasted away. Saacks then realized how the sniper was able to hide so well: Whenever the helicopter approached, the sniper would apparently shimmy up a fire standpipe inside one of the alcoves, leaving him hidden from the officers' view.

The police on the helicopter then shot the pipe and split it open. Pitman began pulling away for another pass, taking the searchlight off the cubicle.

The gunman scrambled out to the roof to squeeze off a few more rounds at the helicopter. Pitman suddenly reversed course, reappearing over the hotel and scanning the roof with the searchlight. Suddenly, the light illuminated the gunman. He was several yards from the cover of the cubicle.

The sniper fired once at the helicopter. Pitman observed a flash and a red streak speeding toward him. "When he fired ... at me, the helicopter jumped," Pitman joked, explaining that he instinctively jerked back on his controls. The bullet struck a little bit above the cockpit, hitting the transmission casing.

Pitman steadied the helicopter and kept the searchlight on the sniper. Saacks, his colleagues in the helicopter and the officers in surrounding buildings emptied their weapons at the figure on the roof. The sniper collapsed and died. He was struck more than 200 times.

It was 9 p.m., about 10 hours after the hotel had come under attack, but it wasn't until the next day that police finally recovered the sniper's body and decided there were no other gunmen in the hotel or on the roof. Though officials concluded that Essex was a lone killer, even today many of those who worked to stop him believe that he had at least one accomplice.

COPS, HOTEL EMPLOYEES, GUESTS WERE AMONG VICTIMS

A native of Emporia, Kan., Essex had been discharged from the Navy because of unsuitability of character and behavior disorders. An African-American man, he was enraged about racism he experienced in the Navy. He sympathized with radical Black Panther politics, loathed cops and came to New Orleans to meet up with a like-minded friend.

Essex actually committed his first slayings on Dec. 31, 1972, when he shot police cadet Alfred Harrell Jr. at Central Lockup with a .44-caliber Magnum carbine, and later officer Edwin Hosli Sr., who was investigating a warehouse burglary alarm tripped by Essex at the corner of South Gayoso and Euphrosine streets. Harrell, Essex's only black victim, died immediately. Hosli, who was white, died two months later.

Essex eluded authorities for a week. Then, on the morning of Jan. 7, wielding his .44 carbine, he shot and wounded a grocer he surmised was helping the police, stole a car at gunpoint and drove to Howard Johnson's. He killed the hotel's general manager, W. Sherwood Collins; the assistant manager, Frank Schneider; and two guests, Dr. Robert Steagall and Betty Steagall, a Virginia couple who had been married just seven months.

Essex also killed a pair of NOPD officers, Phil Coleman and Paul Persigo, and the department's deputy superintendent, Louis Sirgo. In all, Essex had killed nine people and wounded 13 others on Dec.31, 1972, and Jan. 7, 1973.

There could have been many more victims had Pitman not gotten involved when he did, according to Moon Landrieu. "The fact that we had a helicopter gave us a tremendous advantage because we didn't know where (Essex) was on the roof. We suspected we would get the upper hand (with the helicopter), and we did," the former mayor said.

'Chuck put everything on the line'

Pitman soon learned that his actions could lead to a court-martial. But he said the issue was dropped after his commander sought out longtime U.S. Rep. F. Edward Hebert, a New Orleans Democrat and at the time the powerful chairman of the House Armed Services Committee. It also worked in Pitman's favor that he didn't cause more casualties by, for example, being shot down or crashing the Sea Knight into a building.

Saacks -- who later became the NOPD's deputy chief but was fired in 1994 because of allegations involving a private security enterprise he ran on the side -- said he will always admire Pitman for what he did to help the NOPD foil Essex. "Chuck put everything on the line -- not only his life, but his career," Saacks said.

Pitman was transferred out of New Orleans in June 1973. Seven years later, he was in charge of the helicopter crews that participated in Operation Eagle Claw, an attempt ordered by President Jimmy Carter to rescue 52 Americans being held hostage in Iran. The mission ended in disaster when a helicopter collided with a transport plane, killing eight American servicemen.

Pitman considers Eagle Claw one of the most difficult moments of his career. But better days were ahead for him. He became the Marine Corps' deputy chief of staff for aviation in 1987, and attained the rank of lieutenant general in 1988.

Pitman, who has two sons and two daughters, retired from the Marine Corps in 1990. Now 77, he lives in Pensacola Beach, Fla., with his wife. Among other things, he is a consultant for an aircraft maintenance company and advises a special weapons and tactics training group based in Weatherford, Texas.

During his nearly four decades in the Marines, he earned numerous honors, among them a Silver Star for valor, four Distinguished Flying Crosses, a Bronze Star with Combat "V," a Purple Heart and 65 air medals. Nonetheless, he says he is perhaps most proud of having served alongside the New Orleans police during their clash with Essex on one of the darkest days in the city's history, for which he was made an honorary NOPD captain on Nov. 8, 1991.

"I'm glad I was able to do it," Pitman, who has visited New Orleans countless times to celebrate Mardi Gras, said in Pensacola Beach this month. "It makes you feel good doing something good for the country, good for the city of New Orleans."

SPARTA VIETNAM VETS SPEAK TO PJ PLAYERS "MISS SAIGON" CAST

By TERESA SELLINGER
February 17, 2020 at 8:53 PM

Sparta Vietnam War Veterans Mayor Jerry Murphy, VFW Commander Peter Litchfield, and Doug Nobile shared their Vietnam War experiences Friday, February 7 with the Pope John Players, who will be portraying U.S. Marines and Vietnamese military members and civilians in their February production of "Miss Saigon " at Pope John XXIII Regional High School.

"We were very honored to have these brave men take the time to truly bring to life the experience of fighting for our country during the Vietnam War," says Social Studies Teacher and Theatre Director Jacquelyn Burt, whose own daughter is a U.S. Army Captain. "It's hard for teenagers today to imagine what it would have been like to be living life as a high school student one day, then enlist or be drafted and find themselves suddenly stationed in the jungles in Vietnam surrounded by enemy fire."

Sparta Mayor Jerry Murphy served in the U.S Marine Corps as a helicopter pilot and spoke of the difficulty of experiencing the deaths of fellow Marines: "Our helicopter and another took off on a flight through terrible fog and mist. They had trouble navigating and went down. Never returned. You expect to lose friends in war, but you can never truly be prepared for when it actually happens."

VFW Commander Peter Litchfield, U.S. Marine Corps, fought in the famous battle of Khe Sanh in which 6,000 US Marines held off 30,000 North Vietnamese Army fighters. Litchfield recounted, "We got off the plane and asked the guys leaving if they'd seen any action and they said, 'No, nothing.' I thought, 'Great, this is the place to be.' We were attacked and lost 150 Marines within the first 24 hours."

Doug Nobile a U.S. Army Purple Heart recipient, talked about getting shot while trying to save his best friend who'd been shot in the chest: "He didn't make it. I should have known he wouldn't. They had to medevac me out. The next day, my entire platoon was wiped out. In a way, my best friend saved my life."

In addition to speaking of the horrors they experienced during the Vietnam War and the hostile environment to which they returned in the United States, the Veterans spoke to the career and travel benefits of military service, the friendships formed, and the humor shared. Following speeches, the veterans and the Pope John Players "Miss Saigon" cast participated in a question-and-answer session. Select cast members then performed an a cappella rendition of

"Miss Saigon" song "Bui Doi" at the request of Litchfield.

The Pope John Players are honored to perform the area regional high school premiere of "Miss Saigon," the challenging, Tony award-winning production by the "Les Miserables" team of Boublil and Schonberg that follows the lives and love stories of a Vietnamese orphan, two American GI's, an American girl and the sleazy club owner who manipulates them during the Vietnam War as Saigon falls. Based on the Puccini opera "Madame Butterfly," "Miss Saigon" comes from the production powerhouse of Cameron Mackintosh ("Phantom of the Opera," "Les Miserables" and "Cats.") "Miss Saigon" garnered 31 theatrical awards, has been performed in 25 countries and viewed by over 35 million people worldwide. Tickets cost $12. and are available at the door only. Show dates/times are as follows: Wednesday, Feb. 26: Senior citizen show: 3:30 p.m. (Complimentary Senior Dinner to follow. Senior citizens admitted free of charge on this date only); Thursday, Feb. 27: Opening night: 7 p.m.; Friday, Feb. 28: 7 p.m.; Saturday, Feb. 29: Matinee: 2 p.m., closing night performance: 7 p.m. (Sunday, March 1: Snow date: Time TBD) For more information, visit www.popejohn.org/apps/pages/pjplayers.

Located at 28 Andover Road in Sparta, New Jersey, Pope John XXIII Regional High School is an 8th grade - 12th grade institution committed to the Catholic tradition of education. Guided by the belief that each child has unique gifts and is entitled to an excellent education, the Pope John community fosters its students' intellectual, spiritual and physical growth, and champions the importance of social responsibility. SENTENCED TO LIFE FOR MURDER, HE HAS HELPED 1,500 FELLOW INMATES EARN DEGREES

By Alix Wall | March 22, 2018

JAMES A. WHITE AKA "SNEAKY," A LIFE -SENTENCE PRISONER WORKING TO GET EDUCATION FOR FELLOW INMATES

Prisoner C27182 walks toward me in his blue prison uniform at the California Medical Facility in Vacaville. James A. White Jr. is easy to spot, with his distinctive long white beard and hair — he recently cut off his ponytail to donate to Locks of Love — and is something of a legend in the state penal system, where he has been locked up for 37 years serving life without parole for murder.
It has not been time wasted.

White is nearly 80, a highly decorated Jewish Vietnam vet, and the person credited with establishing a college education program at Ironwood State Prison, allowing inmates to work toward an associate's degree while behind bars. Some 1,500 Ironwood prisoners have graduated from the program since its start in 2001, a personal achievement that many of them never thought possible.

"In my 22 years in the Department of Corrections, I've never seen such a beneficial program as this one," said Bill Hobbs, a correctional counselor who worked closely with White in launching the college program and other initiatives benefiting the incarcerated at the Riverside County facility. Hobbs recalled happy parents and grandparents of the inmates attending graduation ceremonies, thrilled about their son or grandson being the first in the family to get a college degree.

White, who did not finish college himself, grew up in a mostly kosher Jewish home and still orders kosher meals in prison, wears a kippah and takes advantage of whatever Jewish life is available. He was one of the few Jewish prisoners during his 20 years at Ironwood, and both Jewish chaplains, Rabbi Yonoson Denebeim and his successor, Rabbi Mendel Kessler, got to know him very well.

Denebeim said White made contact with him as soon as he was transferred to Ironwood and they remained close until Denebeim retired four years ago. White calls him "my rabbi."
"Jim was rough around the edges," said Denebeim. "Almost his entire adult life was either in the military or in prison, and yet he possessed a depth of character and a level of integrity, maturity and vision that other prisoners I met don't necessarily exhibit.

"He has a genuine concern about other inmates, and his desire to assist those who were willing to put in the effort to improve the quality of their lives went far beyond the prison system," he said. "That they could then go out into the world and make something of themselves was very important to him."

The Ironwood program was groundbreaking when it was created. Educational options for inmates began to expand with the 2014 passage of state Senate bill 1391, which cleared the way for face-to-face college instruction in prisons, and the 2015 decision by the federal government to offer Pell grants to eligible inmates. Today nearly two dozen community colleges are providing instruction to 7,000 inmates in 34 prisons, according to the California Community Colleges Chancellor's Office, which noted that education is key to preparing inmates for life outside the walls.

It also helps prevent recidivism. A 2013 study by the Rand Corp. found that inmates who participated in educational programs were 43 percent less likely to return to prison within three years than those who did not participate. The study also found that every dollar invested in prison education programs saved nearly $5 on later incarceration costs.

In a 2014 TEDx talk, White spoke to the Ironwood program's early success, reporting that of the 53 inmates enrolled the first year, all but one had graduated and very few had returned to prison a decade later. Statewide, the overall recidivism rate is as high as 65 percent, according to a study by Princeton University.

"We have a lot of people who are doing really important work in our prisons; he's just been doing it for a very long time," said Krissi Khokhobashvili, a spokeswoman at the California Department of Corrections in Sacramento. "Our prison system was very different 17 years ago, so to be doing that work at that time, there were a lot of challenges. He definitely helped pave the way for the work that's still being done today."

White has launched several other programs to help inmates use their time in prison more productively. He's started veterans organizations open to both inmates and staff and has raised $350,000 over the years for various charities, all while serving his sentence. It is an incredible sum considering that the fundraising events have been limited to walkathons around the prison yard and pizza sales.

He's also put effort into improving himself. He keeps up with politics, has taken many college courses over the years, and says he is a voracious reader and subscribes to several magazines, including Smithsonian and Mother Earth News. On the day we met he was reading a book about King Henry VIII.

He has written a memoir, self-published and available on Amazon, called "Laotian Highway Patrol," which some guards have bought and asked him to autograph.

With all the good White has done, the two rabbis and others who know him believe that he has paid for his crime — one they argue was unfairly prosecuted and deserved a more lenient sentence — and should be allowed to live out the rest of his life in freedom.

"For me, the question is not should he be released, it's how can it be justified that he's still inside?" asked Kessler, a Chabad rabbi and former prison chaplain who got to know White at Ironwood.

"I've been on this case for almost 40 years and I am still holding out hope," said Floyd "Shad" Meshad, a fellow Vietnam vet and founder of the Los Angeles-based National Veterans Foundation, who met White when he spoke to a group of veterans in prison and has been advocating for his release ever since. "This one baffles me more than any other. Here's a guy who has put education in the largest prison system in the country and raised $350,000 for charity from prison, but [he is] locked up for life."

On a Sunday in January, I drove the 50 miles to Vacaville, where White was recently transferred. Visiting hours are from 8 a.m. to 3 p.m. on Saturdays and Sundays, but he attends Shabbat services Saturday mornings, so we agreed I would come on a Sunday.

White's prison record permits him to sit outside in the courtyard during visits, with minimal supervision, but visitors can bring in almost nothing — no phones or recording devices, no pen or paper. All I could do was listen as White spent four hours telling his life story. Later, in the parking lot, I scribbled everything I could remember on a pad of paper, and then verified the facts and quotes in a series of 15-minute phone calls (the maximum time allowed) over the next few weeks.

James White was born in London in 1939 or 1940, which makes him 77 or 78 now. The details about his early life are vague. He doesn't know his birth name, or anything about his birth parents. He was adopted by James and Margaret White, a wealthy Jewish couple in Connecticut who later moved to Texas. They sent him to Wales for boarding school for much of his education.

Though his parents kept a "relatively kosher home," White said, their Judaism consisted mostly of "writing checks." He believes his father, who was born in Europe, chose to have nothing to do with his religion because of the anti-Semitism he had experienced. But young White always showed an interest and would have his parents drop him off at synagogue.

After three years of college at Texas A&M, White joined the military. He served 10 years in the Army and the Marines, earning the rank of sergeant, with four tours in Vietnam. He was awarded numerous medals but would not elaborate on how he earned them. His friend and fellow vet John "Crusty" Garrison, who served with him in Vietnam, said he got the Distinguished Flying Cross for saving the lives of crew members on the aircraft he was flying. The citation noted his "uncommon courage, bold initiative and selfless devotion to duty at great personal risk." He was later awarded three silver stars.

Vietnam was where White earned his nickname, Sneaky, for sneaking across a field filled with landmines unharmed. The nickname sticks to this day.

By 1972, White was out of the military. Without a college degree, and in the middle of a recession and widespread anti-war sentiment, he said, "not a lot of people wanted to hire a Vietnam vet." He supported himself doing odd jobs, and in 1975 went to Southern California for construction work. It was there that he spotted a woman watering her lawn and said it was "love at first sight." He and Nancy Napoli married in 1978 and settled in Sunnymead, near Riverside.

She had been married twice before. According to White, Napoli's second husband had been abusive and violent toward her. Now he began threatening White and Napoli, ignored a restraining order and then molested one of his former stepdaughters. That was the last straw for White, who went to the man's office soon after, shooting and killing him.

White turned himself in as soon as he heard the police were looking for him. "I didn't think about the consequences at all. I was angry and fed up and wasn't looking at the ramifications. I had to stop the problem as I saw it."

Although White admits to his crime, it occurred at a time when post-traumatic stress disorder had just been introduced into the DSM, or Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders, and it was still highly controversial. He was later diagnosed with PTSD, he said, but he has always felt it was a sign of weakness, and the issue never came up at his trial.

"Since I've been in prison I've gone through a PTSD class," White said. "I haven't gotten over it, but I understand some of why I feel the way I do.

I'm not going to say I've whipped it because you don't get over it, but it's impossible to forget all the Vietnam stuff that I carry."

"With what we now know about PTSD, he never would have gotten this kind of sentence today," said Meshad, who has served as an expert witness in numerous trials for vets with PTSD. "When it came to my peers in Vietnam, we became trained killers taught to search out and destroy the enemy, and they didn't de-tune us when we came back."

In 1981 White was sentenced to life without parole. He spent several years at Folsom State Prison, six years at San Quentin, seven years at Solano State Prison, and then was incarcerated at Ironwood for nearly 20 years before being transferred to Vacaville in the summer of 2017.

By all accounts, White has been a model prisoner. In Folsom, he said, he saved the lives of two prisoners who badly maimed themselves in the license plate pressing machine, administering tourniquets until medical assistance arrived.

In San Quentin, after hearing rumors of a pending attack by inmates, he intervened and put himself between a guard and the inmates who were planning to stab him. The guard later said that White had saved his life.

"I took a life and it's affected me ever since, so I'm not going to watch someone else lose their life if I can help it," White said.

Also in San Quentin, he teamed up with Black Panther Elmer "Geronimo" Pratt and started his first veterans organization for staff and inmates in the late '80s.

The vets "asked me to approve baseball hats with a veteran's insignia, and they proudly wore them to the mess hall," said Steve Cambra, who was chief deputy warden at the time and a vet himself. "San Quentin had always had a history of racial segregation, but all races joined the vets' group, and they'd have their hats on and eat together. As an administrator, I found it very healthy that for the first time ever, different races were eating together in the mess hall. It broke that barrier for a bit."

Soon after his arrival at Ironwood, White first started thinking about setting up a college degree program. He had read about a study from McGill University showing a significantly lower recidivism rate for those who leave prison with an education.

JAN. 2016 WAS THE LAST TIME WHITE SAW HIS WIFE, NANCY, BEFORE SHE DIED IN MAY, 2017.

He had already started a veterans group in the prison, as well as chapters of Alcoholics Anonymous and Narcotics Anonymous. "Over 90 percent of inmates enter with some sort of drug or alcohol problem," he said, though he was not among them. "I got to be pretty good with paperwork and understood what needed to happen to get these groups started, and I knew they'd be useful to people."

I'M NOT GOING TO WATCH SOMEONE ELSE LOSE THEIR LIFE IF I CAN HELP IT.

After he got the go-ahead on the college program, he started evaluating applicants. "I wouldn't let them in if they were screwing up on the yard," White said. "I had to see the lightbulb come on, for them to say: 'I want to change my life and I need the tools to do it.' I'd then say 'I'll give you the tools, but then it's up to you.'" He used skills he'd learned in Breaking Barriers, a program that helps inmates understand "why you screwed up, and … change your motivational input to make good choices."

Hobbs worked closely with White. "We were very selective as to who we put in the program as we wanted to be sure that they succeeded and that the program succeeded," said Hobbs. "We took the cream of the crop. When the head of the Playboy gang wanted in, [White] convinced me we should let him in. I wasn't sure, I thought it was a radical move, but he convinced me. For those two years, we had not one incident with a Playboy gang member in the yard."

The college program also created tutoring opportunities for graduates, like Julio Acosta, who tutored his fellow Ironwood inmates in math for five years before his release in 2013. Acosta is now obtaining his bachelor's degree in electrical engineering at CSU Northridge.

Acosta was 18 when he was convicted of two second-degree murders and received a 30-years-to-life sentence. He said he signed up for the college program when it was brand new, mostly to please his mother. He had already earned his GED in prison.
"At first I thought it was a joke," he said, and when he first met White, "the old guy with the white beard that started it," he thought of him as Gandalf from "Lord of the Rings."

But now he sees just how much the college degree was worth. "If not for that degree, I don't know what I'd be doing," he said. "I'm sure I'd be working, but would be very unhappy as there's not much open to you straight out of prison. But this college degree opened up doors right when I got to Northridge. They said 'Your degree is good, we'll transfer your credits; you can start as a junior.'"

He said the strict ethnic segregation in prisons would have prevented him from ever socializing with White, but he got to know him in the veterans group, and over time White became not only a mentor but a grandfatherly figure to him.

"He gave me a sense of community and taught me about what it means to have community," said Acosta. "In prison, it's every man for himself, and everyone thinks so selfishly, but he taught me to start thinking beyond myself, and to think about helping others. He said to me, 'If you ever get out someday, you'll want to be a good citizen, and that starts today.'"

White's influence has reached way beyond the prison walls, in part because of his exposure on television and the internet. Danielle Walker of Sacramento came across White in the National Geographic program "Prison Fight: Ironwood State Prison California Lockdown" when she was taking a sociology course at a community college. She had come from a very unstable home and had been convicted of a DUI.

White's influence has reached way beyond the prison walls, in part because of his exposure on television and the internet. Danielle Walker of Sacramento came across White in the National Geographic program "Prison Fight: Ironwood State Prison California Lockdown" when she was taking a sociology course at a community college. She had come from a very unstable home and had been convicted of a DUI.

"I was watching all kinds of documentaries as part of learning about the sociology of criminology and addiction when I came across the documentary with Mr. White in it," she said. "I was in my mid-to-late 20s and had already been through so much. My self-confidence was so low. I wondered who will hire me with a criminal record, but when I saw what he was doing in prison, I realized here was someone in a way worse position and was still finding hope in helping others get an education."

Walker wrote to White at Ironwood and shared her story, and he began counseling her through letters and phone calls. They continued communicating for several years until he got transferred to Vacaville, which is when they finally met in person.

Walker recently graduated from CSU Sacramento and is considering a master's program in social work. She says White's guidance was invaluable to her at a time when her family and friends weren't able to be of any support.

"I could rely on him to tell me what I needed to do and guide me in the right direction," she said. "He was a friend when I didn't have those kinds of friends. He was a mentor who taught me that no matter what your circumstances are, you can make it a priority in your life to give back."

Despite this kind of testimony from all corners, and a wide circle of supporters advocating for his release, White has been unsuccessful in his appeals. He even petitioned Gov. Jerry Brown for a pardon (and Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger before him), to no avail.

Rabbis Denebeim and Kessler, Meshad of the veterans foundation, prison counselor Hobbs and White's friend Garrison all expressed their frustration at the fact that someone who in their eyes has not only paid for his crime but so clearly poses no danger may well spend the rest of his life behind bars. All have been active on his behalf, in some way or other, trying to bring attention to his story.

Denebeim said every day White lives with the pain of committing a murder, a kind of self-reflection the rabbi didn't often see in prison.

"He's chosen to live with that pain day in and day out, which is not something you find every day. To live with it is very painful, but to say 'I'm going to hold onto it so I hold on to my humanity' is quite exceptional. I met a few exceptional people in prison but not on that level."

White said that at one time he held out more hope that he would be released. His wife, who stayed with him to the end, had dementia in her final years and he expressed great sorrow about not being able to care for her. Napoli died last August, and White got teary every time her name came up.

"When I can't sleep at night, that's what I think about," he said. "I think about how much I failed her when she needed me most."

If he were to be released early, he said, he would work for Meshad for $1 a year (for insurance purposes) and then eventually live off the grid (he's been reading up on solar energy) in eastern Washington, near his friend Garrison, and plant a garden, maybe have some chickens and other animals.

"My hand is not out," White said. "I'm not looking for anything. I just want people to know that even in prison we can do mitzvahs and do something good for society. Just because a person commits a crime, it doesn't mean that he or she is no longer a worthy person."

Adds Denebeim, "According to authentic Jewish thought, a prisoner is only a prisoner in his mind. I truly believe that the Creator puts us where we need to be where we can affect others and it's not by accident, but there's a divine purpose for him being in prison, to be able to affect a quality of life for those he encounters.

Two fans: Danielle Walker, who reached out to White for life advice, and Julio Acosta, who got a college degree in prison and is now enrolled at CSU, Northridge

"As depressing as the walls and barbed wire can be, Jim embraced every day as a way to make a difference."

the events recounted here Therefore there is much more to be written that I cannot write alone. I hope that all of you who were there will help fill in the details .

There will be a more complete version available to members in the near future. I will also be putting personal recollections in the section entitled "In their own words" Beneath this heading on the left sidebar menu). You may E-mail these to me, write, call or send a tape cassette or CD with your stories, or add them to the comments page on this site. I will edit them for you if desired. My personal first choice would be either Email or submitted as comments via this site, that way they are already digitalized. However, I will accept calls, tapes, letters (if legible) etc, if necessary.

NOTE: Since some of the events in this narrative occurred before or after my tour while I was hospitalized, I can only vouch for the verity of those events I actually witnessed and participated in. Even then, one's own subjective experience and perception of events can vary greatly from another person's. Also some of the things were written at or near the time they occurred, others years later - and memory can be deceitful!

Events I did not participate in directly are compiled from a number of sources - official records where available, and oral or written accounts from participants, both contemporary and later.

The official records are often subject to the usual errata an / or "official" point of view, and the personal statements were, like mine, sometimes made years later, and in any case, are colored by the individual's experience, perception, and memory.

However, despite these caveats, this is as truthful and accurate an account as I am able to present, and one that has rarely been presented. In truth, it is long overdue, because except for Ray Stubbe and a few others, this chapter of history has been almost completely ignored.

FOUNDATION

In February 1967, the Narrative Summary of the HQ 3rd Mar Div (Rein) notes the establishment of Sub Unit # 5 at Khe Sanh. This date corresponds to the establishment of Oscar Company.

The company eventually consisted of the HQ unit and 3 CAPs. HQ was combined with CAP Oscar 1 in "downtown" Khe Sanh village. HQ and 0-1 formed a "double CAP" - 2 CAP plts + 2 Plts of the 915th Regional Force Co. (RVN). There were also,4 US Army advisors for a total of approx. 178 men.

Outlying units were Oscar 2, on the north side of Hwy. 9 at the western end of the village, and CAP Oscar 3, assigned to Ta Cong Village in Khe Sanh Valley. (This CAP was originally located on the South side of QL-9 appx 800 meters south of the west end of the main Khe Sanh Airfield.)

Originally, the unit seems to have been commanded by a sergeant, whose name have been unable to find. 1st LT (later CPT) William T. Sermeus arrived to take command sometime in February 1967. He was in command when the late Raymond Gray arrived in February 1967. 1st LT Sermeus picked him up, along with two men whom Ray described as "CIA" at KSCB. They rode in a Mighty Mite, (M422/Al, a field utility vehicle somewhat like a jeep). They visited CAP 0-3, en route to CAP 0-1.

EARLY TRAGEDY

LT Sermeus and Ray later traveled back to 0-3, where the LT issued orders to clear a "friendly" mine field. The NCOIC complied, though with serious reservations, as there was no map of the field.

On June 14th, CPL Albers (see in memoriam) lost both legs removing mines. Ray said that the word came while LT Sermeus was out on patrol with them. LT Sermeus was described as being "terribly shaken" by the news. Ray described the sergeant at 0-3 as extremely distraught as he had been close to the man. (According to the official reports, there was another man injured as well, but I cannot find a record of him, or his name. Does anyone have that Information?)

CAP 0-3 LOSES A PATROL

There was an NVA rocket and mortar attack on the base just after midnight on June 27th, 1967. A patrol from 0-3 was sent to investigate suspected rocket and mortar launch sites spotted by observers. The patrol members included LCPL Francisco Alberto Mazariegos, CPL Dennis Alfred O'Connor, CPL James Merrill

Shepard, Jr., and LCPL Charles Aaron Lynch of Oscar-1, who was along because he had been visiting his friends at 0-3.

They launched at 0830, and about 1230 had reached the top of Hill 689, where they were ambushed, receiving heavy enemy fire, including rockets and automatic weapons. They Immediately sustained casualties, some hit trying to reach comrades. An artillery mission was called in, but was nearly on top of their position. The survivors were unable to reach the KIA and wounded, except for one WIA who died enroute to the camp. After the artillery fire, two men attempted to sweep the hill for friendly WIA and KIA, but were driven back. The remains of the patrol were forced to retreat, leaving two Marines and one Bru PF on the hill, status MIA. The survivors fell back to their compound, where elements of the other CAPs were mustering.

A rescue force was almost immediately mounted by the remainder of CAP-3 and the other CAPs, who had just completed a grueling patrol, but was repulsed by the NVA, who were apparently well dug in and in force. India and Lima company 3/26 came to relieve CAP and try to dislodge the enemy. They assaulted the hill, and lost a number of officers, NCOs and enlisted men including. Lima CO CAPT Bynum and LT Allen of India's First Platoon, all KIA, and a substantial number of WIA. Although they eventually gained the hill, It took several days and a ferocious air and artillery barrage to shift the determined enemy.

LT Sermeus was replaced by (I believe) CPT Haines (does anyone know his full name and the time frame? I am working on getting the chronology right), who was in turn replaced by lST LT Ernest Elmore. (Again, does anyone know the time frame?)

During this period, things were relatively quiet after the ambush, despite the build-up that was going on in the area. Patrols, LPs (listening posts) and ambushes were being run, and some contact was made.

I arrived at 0-2 in late September of 1967, and found things were rather calmer than I had expected them to be. I was new to scouting and patrolling, having been assigned as an admin man and later to FDC with HQ 3/12, but I remembered the basic infantry concepts and the men who had been there were quick to teach me the ropes. In our unit, CPL Joe Potter and others gave me valuable training on how to operate in the bush.

WEAPONS AND EQUIPMENT

Of course, as the FNG, I got to hump the radio. As I recall, these were mostly the older PRC-10s, which were fairly useless unless you were in line of sight of a tower or relay, or on top of a hill. They were old, cranky, heavy, and much of the time they were malfunctioning.

We were originally armed with the M-14, but we soon received the M-16. I had a very worn XM16El. (I have since been told that the X stands for "experimental - this would have been a prototype model. How and why it was in the field in combat Is beyond my comprehension.)

I was very sorry to lose my M-14, because despite the weight, it always functioned. The M-16 was very subject to jamming, especially the old pieces of junk we were issued. Most of us were in the habit of taping an assembled bore punch (cleaning) rod to the side of the stock to facilitate clearing the jams.

I have had this discussion with many troops, Marine and Army, and although some tolerated or even liked the weapon, the bulk of the men I knew who used them in combat didn't. The ones who did were usually armed with the newer "improved" versions, which had addressed at least some of the malfunction Issues the weapon had.

I soon came to cordially and deeply hate mine, and "acquired" a .45 (with 4 magazines) and a sack of grenades. At least [knew these would sustain me when the inevitable jam occurred.

I think that I can say without fear of contradiction that the "pucker factor" • ever present in combat - is at an all-time peak when your weapons fail to function. (Of course, as one of Murphy's Laws of Combat remind us; "Never forget that your weapons were made by the lowest bidder.")

I think the incident depicted below is a fairly typical example of a night combat encounter· often, both sides would come upon one another totally unaware which could lead to disastrous results. I recently spoke to a former CAP commander in another group who recounted an ambush that resulted in four US Army troops being killed - because the Army operational commander had earlier refused the CAP's request for well-defined operational areas and joint planning. Fortunately for us, there were no US patrols operating in our AOR the night of this encounter.)

FIREFIGHT NEAR 0-2

I was on point, and heard the enemy before they detected us. (I couldn't see anything - It was in part of the Poilane plantation to the southwest of our compound and as black as pitch. Fortunately, my hearing was much better in those days.) As I recall, LCPL Gullickson (aka "Gully") was leading the patrol, and he came quietly up as I halted the patrol. I indicated the apparent direction of the enemy. He nodded and prepared his favorite trick - an air burst with a grenade. Pulling the pin, he popped the spoon and held the thing for what seemed an interminable time - then he let fly. It burst in the area we believed them to be in, and we all opened up with everything we had. The enemy was apparently as surprised as we were, and may have been stunned and perhaps wounded by the airburst and heavy volume of fire.

They returned sporadic fire at first, but got their act together and soon were putting out a moderate volume of fire In a matter of minutes, ALL the M-16s had jammed - if the Bru hadn't been armed with M-ls and a BAR and I hadn't had my .45 and grenades, the enemy might have waxed us. However, the Bru quickly went through their meagre supply of ammo. (They were issued 90 rounds a month, as I recall, supplemented by us as possible.)

The BAR man was a small but sturdy man we called 'Popeye" because (as I recall), his Bru name sounded similar to that of the cartoon sailor, he had a bit of a squint, and he smoked a small pipe.

(The Browning Automatic Rifle, a .30 caliber fully automatic weapon of WW II and Korean vintage that, as the name implies, was something of a cross between a machine gun and a rifle. It is large and heavy, with a heavy recoil, but he still managed to control it and keep putting out rounds!)

Finally, "Popeye" and I were the only ones still firing, though some of the others were still throwing grenades.

As it was, we beat a fighting retreat to the road, in reverse order of our entry, with Popeye and me in the rear, popping rounds off in the general direction of the foe. Once on the , we hadn't gotten very far from camp when the action occurred, and they came running!

However, the enemy, whether from their own losses, orders, or just prudence had already decamped. We found little evidence of their presence the next day when we "swept" the area - they typically left a very tidy battle-ground, both because they could ill spare the equipment, and because they wanted to prevent us from gathering information on them.

(Does anyone remember this incident, and who else was on this patrol and the reaction force?)

(Just for the record, I have had many proad, we regrouped, and started moving back towards camp, awaiting the reactionary force that soon came pounding out in support - fortunately people tell me the same sort of story. As for those who have said; "They just have to be cleaned properly.' - I was raised around guns. My dad was a WW II Marine and hunter, as were most of my family. I know how to shoot and clean weapons - I have been doing it since age 8. Any combat weapon that is that finicky is, IMO, crap. Others are entitled to their own opinion.)

We often used the weapons meant to be issued to the PFs - these were WW II and Korean War surplus weapons and ammo sent to Vietnam as part of the military aid program. They included small arms like the M-l rifles and carbines (as well as the M-2 fully automatic carbine), the Browning Automatic Rifle, .30 Caliber machine guns, 60 MM mortars (aka "the company commander's personal artillery"), M -3Al "grease gun" and other such implements of destruction. For some good pictures and tech descriptions of many of these weapons, go to the Korean War Weapons Web-Site a well-illustrated site dedicated to the Korean War.

We would often carry these weapons on patrol in lieu of the despised M-16s. (I personally favored the Browning pump riot shotgun with 00 buckshot at night.) Here is a picture of Rick Valdes ready for a patrol as point man. Note he is wearing (then unauthorized) jungle camouflage, bush hat, and shotgun, with ammo waist belt. We often wore what we wished, as uniform regulations were very loosely enforced.

When I was at Cam Rahn Bay, trying to get back to KSCB after the Tet Offensive started, I was wearing what I had been med-evaced in - a worn set of "jungle" trousers, a green wool Marine issue cold weather shirt over a Navy issue (but not to me' black sweater, and a Scottish Balmoral cap that a girlfriend had sent me.

A beefy Army MP NCO (an obvious REMF in spit-shined jungle boots and starched jungle fatigues) looked me over with a jaundiced eye and asked; "Who in the hell are YOU with? Is that uniform authorized?" Since I didn't want to be bothered with a Charge sheet for being out of uniform, and/or telling an NCO to do something unnatural and impossible to himself, I just Bullshitted him and told him I was with a covert ops unit at Khe Sanh, which I was now headed back to.

Something told him not to press the issue, but he had to have the last word, so he said; "Well, OK, but if you're still here tomorrow, you'd better be in issue gear!" Since I had no intention of being there the next day (I had finally gotten a flight out!), I just smiled and said, "OK, Sarge" I later had a run-in with a Marine SGT/MAJ in Danang on the way home, but that is another story!

THE BIG SWEEP

In October, shortly after my arrival, we formed part of a major sweep of the surrounding hills. All the CAPs participated, as did Marines from the combat base and I believe some of the Army Special Forces were also involved. The idea was that we would comb the hills and (ostensibly) "flush" the enemy, or locate him (and / or act as a "blocking force") and then the line units would converge to engage them more heavily.

The picture of the entire Combined Action Company was taken before that patrol. It was taken by Doc John Roberts' camera, wielded ably by a Bru PF. It is a very rare picture - perhaps one of a kind - it is the only picture I have ever seen or heard of with an entire Combined Action Company all together 'in one place at the same time.

The patrol itself was fruitless and arduous· like many military "events". I don't believe that we even had a peep of the enemy. Someone once said that war is 90% boredom and 10% sheer terror. To that I would add that it is often hot, exhausting, and uncomfortable. The noted seventeenth century philosopher Thomas Hobbs once, "Life in an unregulated state of nature is solitary, poor, nasty, brutish, and short." I would say that we although we were highly regulated, this would sum up the nature of warfare nicely.

Starting very early in the morning, we went up one steep hill and down another, the mud, wait-a -minute weeds, and other obstacles and hazards causing us much trouble as we slid back two steps or more for every three gained. In a short time we were hot, wet, sweaty, filthy, and exhausted (If you saw the patrol scene in "Platoon" you have a good picture of what such a patrol is like .) Many of us bore extra ammo for the machine guns and mortar rounds. However, as the day wore on and the sun grew even hotter, some of this extra weight was surreptitiously regulated to the debts of the jungle by some of the unwilling bearers. Thankfully, we didn't meet Mr. Charles that day, which might have caused us to regret "losing" the ammo.

W crossed a stream. As we waded through the water, most of us took the opportunity to fill our helmets with water and pour it over our heads, soaking us even more, but cooling us briefly. Since we were already soaked, it hardly mattered!

The leeches, ever present and ever ready, began swimming out to meet and attach themselves to us if possible. Some of them found home on exposed skin and as they hit the other bank, some of amused themselves by applying a lit cigarette or some alcohol from the "Docs" med kit to make them back out. I remember some of the guys would make bets on the leeches swimming abilities, and other characteristics and attributes. Marines and servicemen in general will bet on anything!

At the end of an exhausting day, we finally came down to the road where trucks were ready to meet us and ferry us back to our compounds. We were more than ready. This picture shoes Rick Valdes, Doc Roberts, and others and the Bru PFs at the end of that grueling day. (BTW, Rick's uniform was not black, that's sweat)

THE CALM BEFORE THE STORM

Things went on In the same way for some time - patrols, ambushes, LPs and OP's, civic action work including med caps, etc. Sometimes, we'd make contact - most times we saw or heard nothing, but It seemed that the activity and numbers of the enemy were increasing

On at least one occasion one of our patrols pursued a small enemy unit west, and crossed the border in Laos, before they were aware of their position. As this was not within the scope of our duties. The patrol broke of pursuit and returned. This was probably a good thing, as by this time, large numbers of the enemy were in or entering our area.

we were aware from at least October on that the enemy was ramping up his operations in the area and the patrols and other activities became even more important. This didn't stop us from making the best of our situation.

When things were quiet most of the time then, the men would engage in activities and games when not upgrading or repairing the defenses. Here is a picture of the men engaged in pitching horse shoes at O-2

The Marines in O-2 attended a feast at one of the Bru villes. As civic action personnel, we had to "do as the Romans do." This meant eating the choice delicacies they very generously offered to us, including rat, par-boiled pig, and rice, rolled into a ball from the communal bowl by the village chief, whose hands it seemed were seldom washed except by accident or in the rainy season. This resulted in a greyish rice ball of less than savory appearance, and probably crawling with bacteria of all sorts. However, as their guest, we were expected to eat what was offered, as it would have been a serious insult to turn it down.

We off–set the germs with a very unsavory alcoholic beverage that was called "drang" if I recall. I believe it was some sort of potent rice wine or whiskey, similar to sake, but with a vial taste and color. I seem to remember that it was urine yellow. However, I reckoned that the alcohol would of set the germs, and after a few servings I no longer cared about them, the taste, etc. In fact I remember very little of that evening other than the beginning.

We also prepared .for the upcoming Christmas holidays by getting a small local tree (rubber I believe), and "decorating" it with grenades and ammo belts. We also popped a couple of red and green smoke grenades to give things a appearance. It was about this time that we took "gungy" photos, taking turns posing with various weapons. We also did a group photo, but I do not have a copy of this. (Any body have one)? Doc John Roberts gave me the photos in this article.

Since one of the film companies (Kodak)?, was offering a deal on photo Christmas cards, some of us sent of our "hero" photos in to be processed, and when they returned, we mailed them to families, friends, and others including the Secretary of Defense McNamara and President and First Lady LBJ. We actually received a polite thank you from the Johnsons though it was only a printed signature, we thought it was nice that someone responded (I do not recall if McNamara did).

"BIG TET" THE ASSAULT ON KHE SANH CAPS

Sometime in mid-December, I contracted a case malaria and pneumonia, and was eventually medevaced to NSA Danang. I remained there during the rest of the month and was therefore not in the village for the initial assault of the 1968 Tet Offensive, which preceded the Siege of Khe Sanh.

(However, I was able to evade a further month in recuperation and return to my unit a few days after the initial assaults, after the company was pulled back to KSCB. For any who may be interested to know how I accomplished this when the only thing going in to KSCB was, in the words of the air travel clerk; "Beans, bullets, and bandages" my story will eventually appear after 1 have gotten the other stories posted.)

Since I was not there I, will rely on official and eye witness accounts for that eventful period I. also refer the interested reader to the sub-section under this history " In their Own Words," which as the name implies, give the story in the words of the participants themselves.

Currently, the accounts of John Balanco of 0-1 and "Doc" John Roberts of 0-2 are posted, as well as a pre-Siege article by Bob Hall (a radio relay man attached to CAP Oscar In 1967). This section will be expanded as I get more information.

Like the rest of Oscar's story, this has never been adequately treated, despite the fact that it constituted an almost phenomenal feat of arms, and almost incredible bravery and tenacity (on both Sides).

(NOTE: The following account is in the process of being re-drafted in deference to the request of COL Bruce Clarke, one of the participants, who has written what is without a doubt the most complete, detailed. and authoritative account of this action and other lesser-known actions that occurred at Khe San h. I am pleased to say that my conversations and correspondence with COL Clarke in the mid-1990s asking him for his account of the action for my history of Oscar company were the motivating factor that spurred him to write what became the draft for his book). At such time as he publishes his book, this article will re- appear with more detail and quotes I believe that every man who was there at this time, and any military scholars or buffs, will want a copy of this account. It is my understanding that he will soon publish this in a popular version with the workinq title of "Expendable Warriors: The Untold Story of Khe Sanh" {as well as his current scholarly version}, and that he is arranging publication, and possible film treatment. When he informs me of the publisher and publication date, I will promulgate it on this site.)

THE ASSUALT ON KHE SANH VILLAGE

There were many warning signs prior to the assault. Despite these, it seemed that little notice was being taken of the information we and other outlying and reconnaissance elements were providing.

For example, little was done to reinforce the combat base, or to deepen and harden its fighting positions, or provide secure magazines for the ammunition. The ammo dump for the artillery remained uncovered until the offensive began, and was blown up shortly after the fighting commenced, destroying a large portion of the on-hand ammunition needed to resist. (This was given as one of the reasons that the outlying units, such as Oscar, were pulled in.)

One of the more astounding events was on Jan. 2, 1968, a Marine listening post at Khe Sanh called in that they had movement. A patrol was sent out to reinforce the LP. They encountered the enemy, and there was an exchange of gunfire.

In the sweep of the area, the bodies of five Nort Vietnamese officers, apparently a regimental commander and his staff were found. They were believed to be reconnoitering the position. On Jan. 20, a day before the assault on Khe Sanh began, a patrol from India 3/26 was sent to 881 N. They were ambushed by a large NVA force, and after a ferocious full day action, India withdrew to 881 S.

On the same day, LT La Thanh Tone, officer of the 14th Anti-Aircraft Company, PAVN (NVA) defected. He said he was upset that another officer in his company had been promoted over him (after 14 years service). He just walked up to the perimeter and gave himself up. He also told his captors of the plans for the planned NVA attacks, and that the campaign was to be an important one for the North Vietnamese. However, the intelligence section was not entirely convinced of is truthfulness, some arguing that he was a "dis-Intel" plant, and as this was being discussed, the enemy commenced their operations.

Just after midnight, an outpost on hill 861 was assaulted. Though the Marines beat back the NVA, they suffered many casualties.

There is a divergence of opinion on when the initial assault on Khe Sanh village began. The attack on Khe Sanh Combat Base is generally given as 0530, and the 26th Marines' Command Chronology for January 1968 states that the attack on the District village occurred at 0610 on the morning of the 21st of January, 1968.

However, CPT (later COL) Bruce B. G. Clarke, who was the senior U.S. Army District advisor for Huong Hoa, wrote in April 1968 that the attack began at 0500 If so, that would make the village the first unit attacked.

It is possible that both assaults were meant to be coordinated, but due to the fortunes of war and the difficulty of coordinating separate major actions, one "went off" too soon (or too late).

(A Marine infantry officer who served in a region that had several Combined Action units once told me; "Oh, we loved the CAPs! They made great trip flares!"

The US forces at the HQ and surrounding area included a double CAP of Combine Action Company "Oscar" (HQ and O-1), two platoons of the 915th Regional Force Company, and the four-mart U.S. Army advisory group led by Army Captain Bruce B.G. Clarke, whose team medic, SFC Jim Perry, also figured prominently in the defense, by leading the medical effort to care for the wounded.

The CAP HQ element was commanded by USMC 1st LT Tom Stamper and acting CO, GYSGT, SSGT Robert Boyda, and CAP O-1 was led by SGT John J. Balanco. There were perhaps 22 Marines and two Navy Corpsmen, as well as their Bru.

The total strength of the defense force at the HQ compound consisted of approximately 178, the bulk of whom were Viet and Bru indigenous forces, four US Army advisory personnel, and the CAP Marines.

CAP O-2, led by Sergeant Roy Harper, had a squad of Marines and one Navy Corpsman, but was separated from the HQ and CAP 1, lying about 200 yards to the West on Hwy. 9 at the edge of the village of Khe Sanh.

On the morning of Jan. 21st, 1968, under cover of one of the dense fogs that often blanketed Khe Sanh at that time of year, elements of the crack 66th Regiment, 304th Division of the PAVN (NVA) attacked the Huong Hoa District HQ and the Oscar CAPs in and around Khe Sanh Village under cover of fire from their artillery (located on Co Roc Mountain in Laos), mortars, and rockets.

CPT Clarke had just completed checking the fields of fire and artillery coordinates It is almost certain that he was at times under the guns of the NVA, who, however, probably held their fire to maintain surprise. (Had they known who he was, and what great damage he would soon inflict on them, they might have reconsidered!)

When the attack started, CPT Clarke ably coordinated the supporting arms, delivering the fire so close as to be almost on top of the US positions. In addition to the Marine artillery, he was on a different radio and frequency, which he used to keep in radio contact with an Air Force FAC (forward air controller) who called in air strikes against the North Vietnamese. CPT Clarke also maintained contact with Robert Brewer, the Senior Quang Tri Province Advisor (CIA) in Quang Tri City

It is almost certain that without this supporting fire, the compounds would have been over-run by the well-planned and ferocious attacks of the enemy, despite the indubitable valor of their defenders.

Meanwhile, the CAP HQ and O-1 troops, Army advisory unit, and the RF troops manned all trenches and fortified points, ably led by SGT John J. Balanco, stood off the initial attacks in intense and ferocious fighting. He was nominated for a Navy Cross, though he eventually received a Silver Star.

PFC Jim Perry of the Anny advisory team bravely and competently led the medical response under intense fire. (He was also nominated for a medal, and eventually received a Bronze Star, but in the opinion of the men who served with him, this should have been at least a Silver Star.)

Though I was absent from that fight (see above), stories about John Balanco's surperb leadership and bravery were already circulating. John seldom talks about is own role, instead concentrating on that shown by his men. However, the following story will serve to show why the men of Oscar respect John to this day.

Sgt Balanco was making his rounds of the lines, carrying ammo and supplies to his men. He jumped into one fighting position and reversed his weapon so the butt was facing the enemy, he said to the young Marine; "Don't worry, kid! I've got 'em covered!" The Marine smiled, relieving the fear of the situation.

For a riveting first-hand account of the action, see John Balanco's story.

Meanwhile, the men of CAP O-2 were also being heavily assaulted. O-2 lay west of O-1 on the end of Khe Sanh village on Hwy 9. The unit consisted of one squad of Marines, one Navy Corpsman, and ten Bru PFs.

They were led by SGT Roy Harper; and included: CPL AL Terry Sullivan, CPL Ronald Harper, LCPL George ("Doc") Sargent, LCPL Frank Batchman, LCPL Jimmy Tyson, FC Donald Gullickson, PFC Biddle, PFC Dana Matonas, Navy Hospital Corpsman HN John Roberts and some of the Bru.

Although they lacked the numbers of O-1, their courage and determination was great. (CPT Clarke's fields of fire also included their position as he ably covered their ferocious defense.) For a first-hand account of this action, see John Robert's story

The Marines' job was to take lives - the Corpsman's job was to save them - often under fire. Doc Roberts would treat the Bru or Vietnamese as well as a Marine. On this day, he would have to both take and save lives.

'Doc" was always there for all of us and the Bru. Before and during the assault and Siege, he was always among the first on hand when help was needed, no matter if the rounds were coming in - which they often were. He risked his life selflessly on numerous occasions to help his Marines. He was (and is) a real hero, in our opinion.)

About midday on the 21st, the fog lifted and the intensity of the assaults were reduced. However, the NVA continued to place pressure upon the defenders with mortar and RPG bombardments, they limited their infantry action to small arms fire and probes.

Helicopters attempted to resupply the compound, but could not land because of the enemy fire. However, the crews managed to hover low enough to kick out some sorely needed ammunition.

Two relief expeditions were then dispatched from the Combat Base, one Marine force and one air assault mixed Army and Vietnamese force. They also failed In their attempts to relieve the beleaguered garrisons in the village. The Marine force consisted of a platoon from D Company, 1st Battalion, 26th Marines. When the platoon reached the hill overlooking the village, they could clearly see North Vietnamese troops deploying. COL Lownds, decided that the relief mission was too dangerous and ordered the platoon to return.

The second expedition was an airborne operation mounted by the Army, and unfortunately, due to a series of misunderstandings, ended in one of the worst disasters of the entire Siege, and indeed the war.

According to Ray Stubbe (in his book, "The Final Formation") Robert Brewer, the senior CIA representative in Quang Tri Province and Senior Provincial Advisor, called a council of war to decide upon a relief effort.

Although the units in the village or the village itself were not of great strategic or tactical concern {other than its position astride Hwy. 9} the District HQ was of great propaganda value. Both sides recognized that, which is why so much energy and so many troops were expended in a drive to seize the village, and why Brewer and the political operatives were determined to keep it if possible. They decided to send an aerial relief force, and launched LTCOL Seymoe of MACV Det. #19.

LTCOL Seymoe, instead of landing in the Khe Sanh village HQ, landed in the "French Fort" (by then an NVA position). sevmoe and most of his relief force wet- slaughtered. CPT. Stiner, a pilot, (who had been celebrating his 30th birthday before the launch), was one of the few who somehow managed to escape, getting help from the French planter, Felix Poilane, but was unfortunately captured by Marines of CAP 0-3 who initially thought he was a Russian advisor. Stiner was held until the next morning when he finally convinced the CAP members that he was an American.

NOTE: While some might see this as excessive caution or even stupidity on the art of the CAP, we had often been told that various European nationals, including Russians, East Germans, and others were operating with the enemy, sometimes Pulling "Trojan Horse" routines on isolated units. Whatever the truth of this, the Russians and other Soviet Bloc countries including East Germany certainly had advisors and observers in country.)

Overall, the relief effort, though gallantly intended, was an unmitigated disaster. 3 pilots and 14 enlisted crewmen, as well as Lt Col Seymoe were lost, and the South Vietnamese RFs were all killed or missing.

Seymoe's remains, and a number of the others, were only recovered following the Siege by the 1st Air Cavalry. At least one is still MIA.)

Ray Stubbe wrote, (in "Valley of Decision"), that LTCOL Seymoe's relief attempt 'as; "in terms of proportionate casualties and equipment losses ..... the worst military debacle of the entire campaign at Khe Sanh."

Oddly enough, this action and others that were disastrous (such as Lang Vei have received far more attention (and more medals) than the defense of Khe Sanh ville.)

During the night (21 to 22 January 1967), the situation in the compound in Khe Sanh Ville was fairly quiet, although they received NVA sniper fire. The Marines at both compounds had sustained several wounded but amazingly, no dead, given the great numbers of the enemy and the ferocity of their attacks. Unfortunately, the ARVNs and Bru had suffered a number of casualties KIA, as well as their wounded. (This fact points up the ability and bravery of the indigenous troops when ably led.)

In the morning of 22 January 1967, the men of O -2 had broken out of their compound in an "all or nothing" dash, shooting as they went. Thankfully, they met no resistance and made their way to HQ, where they joined the defenders.

SGT Balanco led a patrol towards the "Old French Fort", hoping to find survivors of the aborted relief mission, but turned back at the bottom of the hill upon seeing some Vietnamese in what he called "strange uniforms." He gestured for them to come down, and they in turn gestured for him to come up - he very correctly declined. These were almost certainly NVA seeking to lure him into an ambush.

Upon his return, SGT Balanco's patrol recovered at least 150 weapons from the enemy KIA, including RPGs and assault rifles, many of them brand new. SGT Balanco described seeing; "hundreds of mutilated and mangled NVA." He believes there were at least 300 and possibly 500 bodies there. He once informed me that they used ponchos to slide the gear in, because there was too much to carry.

(When I returned, I was envious, because I had missed the fight, and all of the men who had been there now had NVA belts, knives, and enameled Red Stars, among other souvenirs. My lobotomy has since more or less healed.)

Many years later when visiting John at his home in Oregon, I saw among his other trophies a rare Fairbairn-Sykes British Commando knife. He had taken it from one of the NVA they had killed. It had markings on the blade that, when traced, told an interesting story.

It was one issued during WW II to the Free French Forces (mostly Foreign Legion I am told) under De Gaulle before Normandy. How it got to Khe Sanh in 1968 is unknown but I can hazard a guess - the main forces defending Dien Bien Phu were Foreign Legionnaires. It seems possible that one was a WW 11 vet, and that he had been one of those the knives were issued to. Captured after the surrender his knife had been "liberated- by an Viet Minh, who in turn had wound up at Khe Sanh. We'll never know, but, as often when I handle old weapons, I wish that they could tell their tale.

The Oscar 2 Marines also reported many bodies (300-plus) and much equipment, though they brought little out with them. One of the CAP 0-2 Marines (it may have been Tyson) brought out my Scottish Royal Standard which had been above my bunk. He later told me that as he was grabbing the little gear they were allowed to take out, he thought; "Taylor will want this!~ and stuck it in his pack. He later gave it to me when I returned from the hospital, and I flew it over my bunker on FOB-3 for the first part of the Siege - many flew state flags and the like - however, it was the last individual flag {other than the US flag} to come down.

Unfortunately, as they were severely limited to what they could take, he didn't recover my bagpipes, which remain combat losses to this day, along with most of my personal gear from that time and place. or have often wondered if they survived, and if so, whether they are gracing some Vietnamese mantle piece (or its equivalent)! 1STLT Grenville Sutcliffe (of whom more anon) later volunteered to retrieve them for me when he went on a mission to reconnoitre Khe Sanh Ville after the evacuation. (He told me that he liked bagpipes.) As it happened, he and the patrol he was with found a very warm reception from Khe Sanh's new occupants that didn't lend itself well to recovering musical instruments.

Late on the morning of January 22nd, a Marine helicopter took Lt Stamper to Khe Sanh to report to Colonel Lownds the base and area commander, about continuing ie defense of the Ville

COL Lownds later stated; "... after long consideration and proper evaluation of the facts I decided to evacuate the units."

His was the only logical decision. Despite the propaganda value of the village, and the demonstrated ability of the defenders. it had little tactical value. In addition, the village was too remote, and too difficult to continue to defend without tasking the artillery and other support elements at KSCB too greatly. COL Lownds was of the opinion that he would soon need all his rounds for the main command, but even he didn't know how correct this would prove - the artillery ammunition dump would soon be a blazing inferno. In addition, the weather at that time of year would often preclude the use of the air support which had proved so useful in the defense, as we later came to see.

SGT Balanco said; "We received an agonizing radio message from LT Stemper telling us to pack up." LT Stamper also told him that "No R.F.'s or Bru with their weapons would be allowed on the helicopters to return to the combat base." (Indeed, to the Marines' disgust, no Bru or ARVN were allowed on the flights at all! They were inclined not to leave their brave counterparts, but they were ordered to do so, and, being Marines, complied. (It would not be the last order they would obey against their will at Khe Sanh.)

The evacuation was, as such things often are, chaotic, and included justifiably panicked Vietnamese and VA shelling. Six evacuation missions flew out. As the choppers took off, frightened Vietnamese. civilians rushed to try to board. SGT Balanco, knowing that they would overload the aircraft and cause them and their crews and the wounded to be lost as well, fired "a few M-70 rounds" in the opposite direction, to hold them back. (The WIA:. were Americans, including two U.S. Army NCOs from the Advisory Group).

SGT Balanco departed on the last helicopter out. Before he boarded, two Bru approached him carrying a badly burned man and asked the Marines to take him on board. The pilot reportedly shouted: "No one except Americans can go." and that he was departing immediately.

Balanco took out his pistol, thinking to put the man out of his misery, but change his mind. Instead, he "got him on that last chopper out."

Meantime, CPT Clarke also had received orders (from Robert Brewer), to evacuate. According to CPT Clarke, Brewer had wanted to try to hold the village, but without Marine artillery support, agreed that was not possible.
However, CPT Clarke and SFC Perry declined to board the choppers. They had no intention of leaving their loyal Vietnamese counterparts to whatever mercy they could gain from the NVA. Instead, they organized the remaining men of the 195th RF Company and a number of the Bru PFs, and marched back to the FOB-3 compound along a secret trail.

In my personal opinion, this was one of the bravest and boldest feats of this or any war, and CPT Clarke and SFC Perry should have been awarded at least an Army Cross for their exploits in defending the ville and leading this latter-day "Anabasis. "

Ap-3 had not been attacked, but they also were ordered to evacuate their Bru hamlet of Ta Con (north of Khe Sanh) and returned to the combat base, here, the CAC Oscar Marines regrouped, and rejoined the RF troops and the popular Force Bru at the southern edge of the FOB-3 compound. However. Here they found another unpleasant surprise - the Marines refused to allow the Bru and Vietnamese troops on their portion of the combat base, supposedly because they feared they harbored spies among them. The CAP Marines, already distraught at having been ordered to retreat without their Bru, were truly in a quandary.

However, the Special Forces commander at FOB -3 {which was separate from and not subject to the orders of the Marine CO}, already had many Bru among his IDG teams. He happily accepted our counterparts - in fact, he was so glad to get them, he even accepted the Marines - though much less happily I have been told!

Visualize the scene in "Blazing Saddles where the towns people are debating accepting the Black, Chinese, and Irish railroad workers - but don't want the Irish.

There has been some debate as to who actually gave the orders to abandon the Bru and Viet troops. COL Lownds (in a Marine Oral History interview), said he had ordered the aerial evacuation of the Bru CAPs and RFs, but that they and CPT Clarke chose to walk out. However. the accounts of CPT Clarke and SGT Balanco make it clear that the orders came from the Marine command post, relayed by LT Stamper.

Of course, COL Lownds' orders may have been misunderstood by LT Stamper.
It has also been speculated that it could also have been a decision of the pilots due to the situation in the LZ. However, it again seems clear from CPT Clarke's and SGT Balanco's accounts that the command was generated earlier at a higher level.

Whatever its origins, it was a bad order, and only redeemed by the bravery of CPT Clarke and SFC Perry.

Later that afternoon, CPT Clarke led a Special Forces unit in by chopper from OB-3. They salvaged what they could, and destroyed everything of value to the enemy in the headquarters.

Despite the great valor of the defenders and their repulse of superior numbers of NVA, inflicting heavy losses upon them, this unit has never gotten more than a footnote or a paragraph or two at most in any histories I have read. (Ray Stubbe' being one of the rare exceptions.) This valiant defense, defeat of the NVA forces, and marching out of the indigenous defenders under CPT Clarke were one of the most impressive stories of that campaign. A small unit, less than 200 men. Fought off with few losses one of the finest regiments the NVA could throw at them, then marched back through the midst of their enemies.

OBIT

CECIL BUXTON,USMC
KHE SANH VETERAN 2/9

Cecil "Buck" Buxton, 75, of Unionville, beloved husband of Donna Morocco, died unexpectedly Sunday March 8th. Born February 22nd, 1945 in Waterbury, son of the late Cecil A. and Dorothea (Burns) Buxton, he was a graduate of Lewis S. Mills High School in Burlington, Class of 1963 and the school of hard knocks. He served proudly as a U.S. Marine in the 2nd battalion 9th Marines in Vietnam and participated in two of the bloodiest battles of this War. The 1968 Battle of Khe Sanh was the longest, deadliest and most controversial of the Vietnam War, pitting the U.S. Marines and their allies against the North Vietnamese Army. Buck spent a total of 54 days in this battle.

And the battle at Dong Ha, which for 3 days in April and May of 1968, a beleaguered battalion of 652 Marines fought what was arguably the most tenacious and significant battle of the Vietnam War. Buck spent many years with his wife Donna taking many memorable trips to places like Puerto Rico, Las Vegas, California, Pennsylvania, Texas, Aruba and of course many delightful trips to Maine to visit his daughter and her family. He immensely enjoyed many winters in Myrtle Beach, SC and was even more delighted when his daughter and her children could join him for some extremely lively visits.

His grandchildren loved him deeply and even deeper than their love for "Grampa Buck" was their love for teasing Grampa Buck. His grandson Gage found great pleasure often hiding Grampa Bucks remote control which would always send Buck into quite an animated tizzy. He enjoyed great friends at his clubs The American Legion and VFW in Plainville and the Knights of Columbus in Unionville. He was named bartender of the year in 1996 at the Knights of Columbus in Unionville and he had a strong affinity for a cold Coors Light. Besides his wife, Buck is survived by his beloved daughter, Sarah B. Berry and her husband Jason of Newry, ME, his three grandchildren, Gage Buxton Berry, Jordan Berry and Payton Berry, his two sisters, Cathy Buxton of Collinsville and Mary-Ann Schwarzmann of Farmington, his beloved Neicey WeeSees, Katie Garcia and Debbie Norton and Nephews Curt MacDonald . Burial with full Marine Corps Honors were held in Calvary Cemetery, Collinsville. In lieu of flowers, memorial contributions may be made to St. Jude Children's Research Hospital, 501 St. Jude Place, Memphis, TN 38105.

Just joined this FB group. This picture was taken on Hill 861 in late June of 1967. I was with Bravo 1/26. I'm the one without the shirt and to my left is Ron Norris of rockets. I was wounded about 3 weeks later on patrol out on Route 9. I was section leader of 60mm mortars at the time. I've been a life member of KSV for a long time but have yet to attend reunions. I do enjoy the Red Clay magazine and read it cover to cover. A special thanks to Craig Tourte, I enjoy your articles. Semper Fi all.

TYPHOON HITS THE DUC REFUGEE RICE FARMING VILLAGE
(A TRUE STORY)

Morning. A steady rain douses a line of Vietnamese villagers as they wait to reach the first aid station set up by the Combined Action Program. Inside, 24-year-old U.S. Navy Corpsman Steve Blakemore uses antiseptic to clean a minor wound of one Vietnamese child, then applies a Band Aid to it. Another child with a thermometer in her mouth is seated next to him. The parents of the children thank Blakemore. One gives him food as a gift. The Corpsman returns the favor by handing each person a bar of soap. There is obvious trust between this corpsman and the villagers.

In a South Vietnamese family's hut, two very tired Marines talk about the ceaseless rain of the monsoon season, now in full swing. The Marines are obviously living with the family, since a few family members are moving around the hut, as well. "I kept waking up last night hoping it has stopped raining," George Dros says. "It hasn't been more than two days, and it's already getting to me."

"I never thought it could rain this much—anywhere," Jack Cunningham says. "When I was a kid growing up in Rosedale, I thought it rained a lot, but that was a joke compared to this. I'm figuring today's patrol will have to be cancelled. There won't be rice patty dikes to walk on. They're flooded out. Under water, already."

The two Marines decide to cook up some C-rations. It's slim pickings. Jack looks through George's pack. "Hey, George, what are you going to eat—the ham and lima beans, pork slices or spaghetti?"
"You take you want," George says. "I don't care which I get."

"You know what? Let's make a stew out of all of it," Jack says.

"Done deal. Sounds good," George says. "And I'll get some hot chocolate started."

The Marines walk around the hut trying not to get in the way of the Papasan, the village carpenter, whose workshop is part of the hut, and the Mamasan living there. Their two children follow the Papasan everywhere he goes as he tends to his carpentry.

"You know, George," Jack says, "I feel more comfortable in this hootch [hut] than any other one in the village. Papasan Bay is always trying to make us feel at home. I don't know how I know that, exactly, because he can't speak a word of English, but I know it."

"Yeah, me, too," George says. "He's a friend. It sounds corny as shit, but you can tell that without any words, right?"
Jack nods.

As Jack starts to dish out the stew he has prepared, Papasan Bay walks over to the two men with a large bowl of rise, lays it in front of them and nods his head.

"Thanks," Jack says.
"Thank you," George says.
Papasan leaves.

"Listen," Jack says, "Before we leave to go home we have to give this family something really nice. What would that be? They sort of have everything they need, right?"

"We'll figure something out, Jack," George says. "We've still got 136 days here. Hey, mix some of this rice in with your stew. It's great."

The two Marines finish breakfast, then clean their rusted weapons. "Somehow," Jack says, "sitting out in the rain for hours on patrol, waiting for Vietcong to attack, then getting the rust off my weapon, wasn't something I saw in any John Wayne flick," he says.

"Not that you're complaining," George laughs.

Marine Sergeant Phillip Assante walks into the hootch. "Dros, Cunningham, get up. The jeep from the Ca Co is on its way here. It's your turn to pick up the supplies. Try to make sure you keep the rain off the mail. The last time you guys went, all the writing in my letters had smudged off."

The two men grab their weapons and ponchos and start to walk down the water-covered path to the road. "I just don't know how it doesn't ever fricking stop raining," Jack says. "How are we going to walk back with all the supplies."

"Very carefully," George says. "I don't want Assante pissed at us like last week."

The two men reach the road, but only after almost falling into the swollen rice patties a few times.
"Where's the jeep. Should have been here by now," George says.

Two other Marines are coming up the path. "Hey," the shorter of them, named Neal, yells. "The jeep is stuck up the road. Sarge wants us to go up there and get the supplies."

"Sure," George says, "but that mud is a foot-and-a-half deep. How are we going to get the supplies back to the hootches?"
"No idea," the other newcomer Marine named Benny says. "But we better do it."
The four men start up the muddy road. Their feet slip and slid through the mud, as if it is ice and slush.

"Why don't we just forget about supplies for the day?" Neal asks. He falls into the mud and is just starting to pick himself up when the Ca Co jeep shoots around a curve in the road.

"Jump on everybody! I can't stop or I'll get stuck again!" the driver yells.

The jeep slows down as the men try to get on. Three of them do.

"It's like trying to grab a greased pig," Benny, the last of them, laughs, as he's dragged across the muddy road.

"Grab him before he falls off," yells the driver.

The three marines stretch over the side and back of the jeep to try holding onto their friend. Mud files into their faces and into their mouths as they laugh.
"I wish we had a movie camera to film this," Jack says.

The jeep comes to a full stop. Everyone lets go of Benny, sending his head crashing into the mud-caked truck. The laughter literally erupts now, with passing villagers joining in the fun.

"Hurry up and get your shit off the jeep," the driver yells. "I have another stop to make up at Hill 65. I don't have all day."

"Go fk yourself," Benny says. "We're having a little fun." He picks himself up out of the mud.

"You compound bums always have it easy," Jack yells to the driver. "Sorry to inconvenience you."

As the rain starts to come down even harder, the four men unload the supplies. Within a minute, the road has little lakes in between the huge mud tire tracks left by the jeep.

"Come on," the driver says. "If you don't hurry up, I'll never get back to Ca Co."

"Don't worry about it," laughs George. "You can always sleep out here in the village."

The marines finish unloading and start walking up the path.

"I think in just the last 45 minutes this water got a lot deeper."

"Agreed," says Neal.

"Watch it, Jack," George yells. "There's a snake right next to your left foot. Don't move."
"It's only a Buddha snake," Jack says.
"What the hell is that?" Neal asks.

"A snake that hangs around Buddhist shrines a lot. They like it cool and damp. They're not poisonous," Jack says. "But if this rain doesn't stop, there are going to be lots of snakes floating around, so thanks for the heads up."

They walk into the hootch. "Where do you want everything, Sarge?" George yells.
"I don't care what you do with the C rations, I just want my mail," Assante answers.

"Hate to tell you this, but there is none," George says.

"That makes four fking days without mail!" Assante says.

"In my last CAP unit, we didn't get any for two weeks, one time," Jack says.

Assante lays himself back on his wooden bed, obviously laid low by not receiving mail. Mail was the lifeline to home. Without it, home seemed too far away.

"Who gets the peaches and pound cake from the C rations today?" Neal yells.

No one answers. Everyone is busy drying their socks and boots.

All of a sudden, a voice on the radio blares: "Charlie House 2, this is Charlie House. Come in."
"This is Charlie House 2. Come in Charlie House," answers Assante.

"You better move your unit to the highest point of the village," the Ca Co radio man warns. "This rain is not supposed to let up. There's a typhoon heading this way from the Phillipines.

The men jump to their feet.

"What the hell is a typhoon?" Neal asks.

"It's like a hurricane, but with stronger winds and more rain," Jack says.

"Thanks for warning us," Assante tells the Ca Co radio man.

The radio goes silent. The men look into one another's eyes. No one has ever told them what to do when a typhoon hits. Most of the village is only five feet above sea level. Even the highest point was only a few feet higher."

"Don't panic," Assante says. "I think the school house is the highest point. We'll stay there. Get your gear. We move out in 10 minutes."

The worried Marines run out of the hootch to get their gear from the other hootches.

"Do you think the typhoon will actually hit us?" George asks Jack.

"No," Jack says, "Knowing the weathermen in New York, I don't think the Vietnamese are any better."

"Yeah, but there are American weathermen working here, too," George says.

"Then we definitely aren't getting hit," Jack jokes.

Jack and George try to explain to Papasan how the wind and rain are going to surge. It takes a few minutes, but Papasan eventually gets it and points to the rafters of the house.

"He's telling us not to worry," George says. "The family will go up there."

The two Marines pick up their gear and wave goodbye to their Vietnamese friends.

"I'm just hoping they'll be okay," George says, on the way out.

"He's got a good head on his shoulders," Jack says.

"Hurry up!" Assante yells at the two of them. "You two are always late."

The look on Jack's face says, "I'd love to put my foot in that guy's mouth."

The unit walks up the path and onto the muddy road. Man after man gets his boots and legs stuck in mud holes and can't get out without help from other Marines. A man slips into a road side river patty and is searching for his rifle.

They finally make it to the school house after what seems an eternity. Up ahead by 100 yards, the men see that the road is completely covered by the overflowing river.

"Thank God the V.C. aren't out today," Jack says. "I don't think I could handle the V.C. and the water."

"They could have wiped us out if they ambushed us on the road coming up here," George says.

"Don't stop worrying about them because of the higher water," Assante says, "They'll probably come looking for us tonight."

"With this much rain?" Jack says. "They'll have to attack us by boat." He laughs.

The school was comprised of three small concrete buildings and a tiny thatched hootch used by the school teacher.

"This place was built by CAP. They finished about a year-and-a-half ago," Jack says.

"And they don't appreciate it," Neal says. "They never do."

"Some of them do," Jack says. They invite us into their homes every day. Gotta be a reason."
"I guess," Neal says. "You're right, I guess."
The winds start to pick up as the day goes on. Rain pours into the school house from every open window. Even when the Marines try to cover the windows with their ponchos, the strong gusts of wind just tear them away.

The view of the mountains is all grey shadows. And the Marines know that rain falling on the mountains means water flowing down and into their alley.

"We can forget about trying for a night ambush tonight," Assante says. "We won't be able to go anywhere. If this keeps up, the school's gonna be gone, too, soon."

Darkness descends on the village. The winds only get stronger. The men walk around the school house trying to find good spots to lay out.
Five P.F.s arrive at the school house.

"How deep is the water," Jack tries to ask them.
One of them lays his M16 on the cement floor and a few ounces of water rushes out of the barrel.
The other P.F.s laugh as they joke with one another in Vietnamese.

"How deep?" Jack asks, again.
One of the P.F.s named Tiu smiles and raises his hand to his chest.
"Um, that would be about four to four-and-a-half feet," George says.

"These guys risked their lives coming up here to be with us," Jack tells George.

"Make sure you let thse P.F.s rest tonight," yells Assante. "They had to go through hell to get here. Everyone else takes turns on watch tonight. Two men at all times."

"But, Sarge, the place is completely surrounded by water. How can we be attacked?"
"I don't care," Assante says.

The Marines argue about what time slots each of them will get. Those who can start to try to sleep. The next day is certain to be a tough one.

The howling winds and rains continue all through the night and, by the next to last watch, the water reaches the school house floor, slowly stretching its way across the concrete foundation. The men who were sleeping start to wake up from the dampness.

"Hey, Sarge, when are you going to call the Ca Co to get us out of here?" George asks, stepping off the concrete slab into the cold water.

"Scared already?" Assanted says. "Wait until the water is at your waist, and I'll start thinking about getting us helicoptered out."

"Charlie House 2 . . . Charlie House 2, this is Charlie House," the radio man blares.

Assante grabs the radio. "Charlie House, this is Charlie House 2."

"Weather looks like the typhoon will pass to the north of us," the radio man says. "But expect winds at 40 miles per hour and gusts to 70 miles per hour. The rain should continue all day. Tell us when you want out."

"Roger," Assante says.

Before long, the water is a foot deep in the school house, and climbing. The men's eyes keep returning to the radio, hoping that someone will make an independent decision to send a helicopter.

Jack and George sit on top of some of the desks, listening to a tape of the Beatles Abbey Road album.
The water starts rising faster.

Assante is obviously losing his cool. "Alright," he says a minute later, "Get everyone into this building. I'm calling the Ca Co to get us out of here." He starts using the radio to do just that.

Everyone seems relieved. Help will be on the way.
The trouble is that Assante has waited too long. There's a waiting list for a helicopter, and Ca Co tells Assante it will be at least an hour to get the men out.

Assante looks at the short P.F.s, with the water already up to their knees. "Start piling desks on top of one another," he orders the marines go around to the other buildings and collect desks, in case all of them need to be used. Even after an hour, there's no helicopter approaching—only the sounds of some in the distance.

The water rises to the P.F.s' waists.

The Marines start to lift the P.F.s out of the water and onto the desks.

"Don't move!" a Marine named Bill shouts. "There's a snake right by you George." The other Marines slowly climb onto desks to get away from a greenish snake that then dives under water. They all know this isn't a Buddha snake. It's a bamboo viper, one of the deadliest snakes in the world. It can kill a human in less than a minute.

When the snake reappears near George, ten M16 rifles fire, tearing it apart and sending it into the air outside the school building.

"You could have killed me!" George yells.
The Marines laugh.

Then, all grow silent again, listening for the helicopter. And . . . then . . . they hear it.

By now, the water is six feet deep outside the school house and coming out the side of the building is impossible. So the Marines get up near the roof and pull it back. They succeed enough so that one person at a time can fit through.
Neal goes first. "Pass me up P.F.s!" he yells as he lowers his arms through the hole in the roof. The P.F.s are passed through the hole, one by one.

The helicopter pilot keeps trying to hover over the roof, but can't stay closer than 10 feet. There's too much wind and rain, and the heavy machine could easily crash down into the school and kill everyone.
George pulls himself onto the roof just as one P.F. slips and starts falling off. Neal and George grab his legs and pull him to a safer position. The P.F. looks into their eyes with profound gratitude.

With the P.F.s and the two Marines on the school roof, a side door on the CH-46 copter lowers, exposing three Marines. "Jump up and grab my arms!" one of them yells. He lowers himself down from the doorway, with the two other Marines holding his feet to keep him from plummeting.

George and Neal forget about their own safety as they lift the short P.F.s to the outstretched arms of the hanging Marine.

The Marines in the school house are still waiting, as snakes swim below the desks they are perched upon . . .

When it's finally time for the Marines to be taken out of the school house, Jack remembers they have to collect all their weapons and make sure none are left behind. Some of their gear just has to be sacrificed to the waters.

The men lift two M.60 machine guns through the hole in the roof. As Neal tries to lift one of the guns up towards the helicopter, he feels his foot start to slip. He has to let go of the weapon. It falls into the rushing water. Filled with guilt, he looks at George and says, "Fk me. That weapon will be killing Marines."
"You would have fallen in with it," George assures him.

One at a time the Marines climb through the hole in the roof. They are slowly rescued, despite harrowing odds.

George will be the next-to-last to be lifted into the helicopter.

Sergeant Assante will be the last to go.
"I wonder if all the villagers got out okay," George says.

"God willing," Assante says. "They have boats. They know floods."

Just as George jumps, a gust of wind pushes the helicopter away. Miraculously, George catches one of the arms of the hanging Marine. The helicopter has to keep swinging side to side in order for George to grab the Marine's other arm and be lifted into the copter. Assante comes aboard next.
The men look at one another. They're all Marines—willing to risk everything for one another, again and again.

"A man good enough to shed his blood for his country, is good enough to receive a square deal afterwards . . ."

They were known as the Black Panthers (note his patch). They had recently come from Hue City where their relatives were murdered along with all priests while the Black Panthers were south of Phu Bai helping the CAP Marines in the villages fight off attacking VC during Tet. When the young Captain linked into the Khe Sanh lines, he chose the only approach suitable for NVA tanks. He told Col. KHE SANH VETERANS IN THE NEWS

A FRIENDSHIP FORGED IN WAR REKINDLED 50 YEARS LATER, AND A HEARTFELT GIFT

By Bill Lohmann, Richmond Times Dispatch

During a luncheon last week, Vietnam War Veteran Mike Bonacci (Right) shows a watch given to him by Ron Echols. The watch is a replacement for one lost during the war.

In December 1967, Ron Echols, a Marine platoon Sergeant, had been in Vietnam less than a year and had never quite hit it off with his platoon commanders - one had rotated home, one had been wounded, one had been relieved of his duties. Then Mike Bonacci arrived.

As lieutenants went, Echols said with a laugh, Bonacci was on the ball." We worked together for about three months,' Echols, who was 21 and from Ohio, said of Bonacci, who was 24 and from Pennsylvania. "we became buddies ."

Out on patrol. one, day, terrible sound of someone stepping on a booby trap. It was Bonacci, Echols raced to the front to help.

"I thought his foot was blown off." Echols said, "His leg was " shredded from the shrapnel. "

A corpsman bandaged him up. Echols helped lift Bonacci's stretcher onto a helicopter for transport to a ho spital.

Bonacci asked: Echols to take the watch off his arm. Echols had taken a liking to Bonacci's distinctive Zodiac Sea Wolf, a diving watch, over the months they'd gotten to know each other, often joking that Bonacci should sell it to him for $10.00 or some other ridiculous price.

Echols thought Bonacci wanted him to put the watch in the lieutenant's pocket so he wouldn't lose it. No, Bonacci said, "Put it on. I want you to have it.

Echols replied, Ok, I will keep it until next time 1 see you."

That turned out to be a very long time. Before we get to the rest of the story, however, I should tell you that a lot happened in the ensuing years.

Echols was later wounded during an ambush as he was maneuvering troops against the enemy. Losing the watch in the confusion. He returned to the States, after four years in the Marines, having received a Purple Heart and Bronze Star and retiring as a second Lieutenant. He settled in Richmond because his wife, Sue, is from here. He's been here since 1968.

Over the years, he searched for Bonacci from time to time - wondering if he'd made it home and how he was doing with out luck.

A few years ago, he attended a reunion and saw Bonacci's name on a platoon roster. He hadn't had the correct spelling of Bonacci's last name. The search was on again, and this time in 2017 there was success. Or as Echols tells it, he was from Northeast Pennsylvania. I was from Ohio, and I found him in Fredericksburg.

Echols placed a call and Bonacci couldn't believe it was his old friend. They met the next day, talking for three hours. Ron filled in a lot of the blanks I had, "Bonacci said."

One of the blanks that Bonacci filled in was that he been told, while recuperating at a hospital in Japan. that Echols had been killed Hence, he never searched for Echols once he was back stateside.

Bonacci, who operated an insurance agency in Fredericksburg. spent most of a year in and out of hospitals as doctors- saved his leg and foot. He still walks with a bit of a limp. and he needs to stop every couple of hours on car trips to get out and stretch. But he's dealt with it. knowing the alternative.

"I'm glad I'm here.' he says.

The men see each other regularly now, volunteering as docents at the National Museum of the Marine Corps along Interstate state 95 in Triangle .

"He and I are the only two docents at the museum who served in combat together" Echols said.
Echols teaches a class on combat leadership for sergeants at Marine Corps Base Quantico talking about his experience in Vietnam, including the time he captured about 50 Viet Cong soldiers without firing a shot.

He had been leading a small patrol, when the area became overrun with Viet Cong. Badly out numbered. Echols had his men hide in a ditch next to a road until the Viet Cong passed except they didn't pass by. They came to a standstill on the dirt road, a few yards from where Echols and his men were hiding. Echols still isn't sure why he did this, but he leaped from the ditch, yelled the Vietnamese word for "stop" and they did. Help arrived soon, and the Viet Cong were taken prisoner.

He also tells the story about Bonacci. When Bonacci is available, he introduces him at the end. which is always a nice moment.

He did that last week when he was asked to speak at the monthly Houston-Holicky-Sitter Veterans Group lunch in the upstairs meeting room at the Publix on John Rolfe Parkway.

When Echols introduced Bonacci, the audience, mostly Marines stood up and applauded in an extended standing ovation. But that wasn't all

Echols, now 73, invited Bonacci 76 to the front of the room and pulled out a small box

"Mike", I lost that watch," said Echols handing Bonacci a watch with the Marine Corps emblem on its face. "but I got you a replacement.

"Love you, man.' Bonacci said after lunch that he was surprised by the watch and gratified by the friendship with Echols they have rekindled, "I'm glad I made the trip." he said of the drive from Fredericksburg, "and I am glad we reconnected "

WELCOME HOME 26TH MARINES
Old Article Brings back Memories

The Marine regiment that defended Khe Sanh has returned home.

More than 300 Marines of the 26th Regiment landed at the El Toro Marine Corps Air Station, carrying their colors, command element and a record of almost three years of steady combat.

They were greeted by five Marine Generals, including General Leonard F. Chapman, Jr. Commandant of the Marine Corps, as well as several hundred mothers, wives and sweethearts.

The return of the 26th Marines the regiment that turned a siege into defeat for two NVA divisions in early 1968, as part of the President's Phase III redeployment of troops from Vietnam.

In formation, commanded by Col James E. Harrell the returnees heard the Commandant say "You have earned your rest and these colors have earned their rest, too. Thank you for your service, Marines, and welcome home ."

The 26th Marines became a unit of the 5th Marine Expeditionary Brigade, commanded by BGen Ross T. Dwyer, The regiment was deactivated at Camp Pendleton. The unit won the Presidential Unit Citation for its defense of Khe Sanh, and prior to leaving Vietnam, it was presented the Vietnamese Cross of Gallantry,

LATE DOCTOR, ADVOCATES FOR DISABLED TO RECEIVE GREENSBURG ALUMNI HONORS
BY Jeff Himier
DANIEL PULTZ, USMC KHE SANH VETERAN

A Vietnam veteran who assists today's wounded warriors, a consultant for nonprofits who advocates for people with physical challenges and a late Greensburg pediatrician who cared for young patients for more than 60 years will be honored at April's annual Greensburg Salem Distinguished Alumni banquet.

Presented by the nonprofit Greensburg Salem Education Foundation at Ferrante's Lakeview in Hempfield, the latest alumni awards will recognize, respectively, Daniel Pultz of Pittsburgh's North Side (Class of 1961), Linda Dickerson of Pittsburgh (1978) and the late Dr. Pascal Spino (1941).

The event has been held since 2014. It honors graduates of Greensburg High School and Greensburg Salem High School who are "dedicated to public service professionally and personally" and serve as role models for today's youth.

Pultz, who grew up in Southwest Greensburg, served two tours as a Marine Corps officer in the Vietnam War, surviving the siege of Khe Sanh. He was awarded the South Vietnamese Cross of Gallantry with Silver Star.

In a varied civilian career, Pultz worked as a counselor and cottage supervisor at the Warrendale Youth Development Center for adjudicated delinquent boys, founded the Chariot Group of Companies, which specialized in leasing cars, and developed Applied Business Computers, a technology firm that sold and serviced hardware and software networks for regional companies.

Most recently, he assisted at Semper Fi Odyssey, a transition program for wounded service members. He has been a team leader at 47 of the program's weeklong events, accumulating more than 10,000 volunteer hours.

Dickerson operates 501(c)(3) Squared, a Pittsburgh firm that provides management consulting services to clients including nonprofit organizations, and is a principal in Lynch and Dickerson Resource Development. She serves on the boards of the River City Brass Band, Pittsburgh Zoo & PPG Aquarium and Carnegie Mellon University and is an ex officio member of the Point Park University board. She has chaired the boards of Pittsburgh Ballet Theater and Visit Pittsburgh and served for two years as CEO of the National Aviary in Pittsburgh.

Dickerson, who uses a wheelchair, is a longtime advocate for disability rights. As noted by the non-profit Disability Rights Pennsylvania, Dickerson founded and served on the board of Accessibility Development Associates, an organization that performs accessibility audits around the country.

She worked with entertainment venues to ensure they have wheelchair-accessible seating and created a business plan for Bender Consulting, a company that operates nationally to locate jobs for people with disabilities. She also is credited with working toward passage of the Americans with Disabilities Act in 1990.

Spino earned the Citizens Service Before Self Honor from the Medal of Honor Association, in 2011, "for a lifetime commitment to treating children, often not charging those who could not afford health care." He received the Westmoreland County Community College Humanitarian Award in 2001.

A World War II Navy veteran, he served as a lieutenant on the medical ship the USS Hope. In a 2008 Tribune-Review story, he noted that his desire to become a doctor was reinforced after he contracted tuberculosis as a teenager and spent time in a sanatorium.

Spino retired from medical practice in 2008 and was 91 when he died on July 27, 2013. His son, Domenic Spino, is expected to accept the alumni award on his behalf.

JERRY WILCOXEN RECALLS THE BATTLE OF KHE SANH
BY JERRY MAY

KEATCHIE, La. - It was a busy 13 months for Jerry Wilcoxen in the Vietnam War. The Marine fought in 22 campaigns, including what he calls "the big one."

He was among about 5,500 Marines who were cut off and surrounded by three North Vietnamese Army divisions. That meant they were outnumbered nearly 4 to 1 and under siege. Jerry was just out of Woodlawn High School. It was now January of 1968, when he and his fellow Marines were attacked at their garrison. So began The Battle of Khe Sanh.

"The longest 77 days," Jerry says. "Some days you might take 12, 13-hundred incoming rounds. People don't understand what that's like. It's very unnerving.

"You just lay there and take it. That's all you can do and hope it stops at some point before it gets you," Jerry added. "They'd just shell, bomb. Shell, bomb. Everybody around me either got hit or got killed.

"There were times I thought my number was up, but it just didn't work out that way. I had a little something to say about it," he went on to say.

The North Vietnamese would fire, then hide their big guns in caves. But with improving weather, the U.S. brought in their big weapons from above.

Jerry Wilcoxen holds a group photo with fellow survivors of the Battle of Khe Sanh, as they gathered at the U.S. Marine Corps War Memorial in Washington, D.C.

"I really think what broke their backs was the B-52 strikes," Jerry says.

He described watching the bombers make drop on long lines of NVA targets.

"A mile across there, one plane would just blow it up. Boom boom boom boom boom," Jerry rattled off.

The U.S. inflicted thousands of casualties on the NVA and Viet Cong, while losing an estimated 1,500 of our own before withdrawing from Khe Sanh.

Jerry wasn't wounded there. But he was a few months later at another battle. He was hit by shrapnel in three places. Some of it's still in his left arm.

"They asked me if I wanted a Purple Heart," Jerry recalled. "I said, 'Purple Heart and ten cents would get me a cup of coffee.' And I just kept on going."

Jerry shrugs off the effects of the war, like PTSD and some ailments from Agent Orange, just like he did not getting that Purple Heart. After his stint in the Marines, Jerry built an air conditioning service business.

NAVAL CHAPLAINCY SCHOOL AND CENTER RETURNS TO NEWPORT

The Naval Chaplains School, as NCSC was once known as, resided in a building at Naval Station Newport, dedicated and named for Lt. Robert Raymond Brett, a Navy chaplain killed in action while serving with Marines in Vietnam in 1968. In 2009, NCSC moved from Naval Station Newport's Brett Hall to Fort Jackson, South Carolina as part of the 2005 Base Realignment and Closure Commission. Bringing chaplain and religious program specialists (RP) training together, the combined training location was renamed the Naval Chaplaincy School and Center.

In March 2019, the NCSC returned to Newport, Rhode Island and to its historic home in Brett Hall. Throughout a year of renovations and updates, the NCSC continued to train chaplains and RPs and to develop and deliver ready, relevant religious ministry training to achieve fleet readiness. Initial training for chaplains occurs at NCSC in Newport and initial RP training in Meridian, Mississippi. Throughout their careers, chaplains and RPs return to NCSC for further rank-based training.

"I'm very excited about NCSC's return to Newport," said Lt. Cmdr. Justin Hayes, an instructor at NCSC. "By moving back here we're reconnecting with our roots as Sailors. Those who leave here go to their commands ready to help strengthen the warfighter's spirit. A lot of the different weights we carry on our shoulders can degrade mission readiness, and it's the chaplain's role to be someone who breathes fresh life into the fighting spirit of the warrior."

Brett Hall's namesake felt called to become a Catholic priest from a young age and was commissioned as a lieutenant in the Navy in June 1967. On Feb. 22, 1968, five months after arriving in Vietnam and six months after graduating from Naval Chaplains School, Brett and his Marine chaplain assistant, Cpl.

Alexander Chin, were in the midst of the 77-day siege of Khe Sanh. A helicopter arrived at their po sition, which Brett and Chin intended to board but they waived off and returned to the trench, aware that the Marines were continuing to take fire and that care would need to be offered. Moments later, the area was attacked with a barrage of 122mm rockets, with at least one hitting their trench. Brett and Chin were killed, along with six other Marines. All NCSC students are encouraged to uphold Brett's example through his ministry of presence, continued care, and selfless devotion to duty with Brett embodying the Chaplain Corps motto, Vocati ad Servitium, "Called to Serve." Brett and Chin's legacies continue to reverberate in the halls of NCSC where chaplains and RPs prepare to be with Sailors, Marines, and Coastguardsmen when the next fight comes.

TOM QUIGLEY BRAVO CO 1/26 KHE SANH VETERAN

Here is BRAVO! Marine Tom Quigley who was guest speaker today for Illinois' annual Vietnam Veterans Recognition Day, always held the last Saturday of March. In one of those coincidences that Skipper Kenneth Pipes believed were not coincidences at all, this year's event was on March 30, the precise 51st anniversary of the Payback Patrol. Today's event was held at the Mt. Zion Civic Center. We salute you, Tom! Semper Fi.

SPEAKER'S BIOGRAPHY

Tom Quigley was born on August 11, 1948, in Springfield ,IL He enlisted in the Marine Corps in March of 1966, and served a tour in Vietnam from June 1967 to March 30 1968. He was wounded March 30 during the Siege of Khe Sanh and was awarded the Purple Heart on April 1, 1968 while on the hospital ship the USS Repose.

As a result of his wounds, he spent 10 days on the Repose and 2 months in a Naval Hospital in Japan. He was honorably discharged in June 1969, with the rank of Sergeant. In 2010 he had the opportunity to participate in a documentary, "Bravo: Common Men, Uncommon Valor", in which he was interviewed about his experiences in Vietnam and the Siege of Khe Sanh.

A life long resident of Springfield, he spent almost 35 years in the automotive business, as sales manager and then as a wholesale representative. He retired in 2015

M/SGT DAVID MAGEE USMC KHE SANH VETERAN HMM-364 PURPLE FOXES

Dave was born April 22, 1943 in Salt Lake City, Utah to Agnes Greer and Harry Dewey Magee Sr. He was raised by his mother Agnes and his stepfather Benjamin Edwin Anderson.

At seventeen year's old, Dave enlisted in the United States Marine Corps. He was a Vietnam Veteran and retired as a Master Sergeant after twenty years of service. During his time in the Marine Corps he made many lifelong friends. One of the highlights of his Marine Corps service was to be a member of the helicopter squadron HMM-364 Purple Foxes. In his retirement years he enjoyed acting as webmaster for the squadron alumni as well as organizing multiple reunions to help bring these brothers back together.

He married Geneil Paget in Jacksonville, North Carolina on September 9, 1967. Geneil would say their relationship was adventurous and loving. Dave always said that even though he grew up in a big family he came to understand what family really was after he married Geneil. His children and grandchildren often teased them about spending so much time together.

Dave recently celebrated thirty-five years of sobriety. He was actively involved in Alcoholics Anonymous.
It was rare to see Dave sitting still until later in his retirement. He was always on the go and working on a project. Dave enjoyed spending the day on his favorite trout stream. He loved woodworking and always had a project in progress. His favorite past time was spending time with his grandchildren and great grandchildren.

He is survived by his wife, Geneil; daughter Vicky Cook (Roger); son Benjamin Roy Magee (Lisa); 4 grandchildren, Kari Horner (Michael), Jordan Cook, Alexandra Marie Pentecost (Jordon), Nathanial Tims Barrow, and 6 great-grandchildren, Gracie Horner and A.J. ALTOONA VETERAN TO BE INDUCTED INTO PITTSBURGH HALL OF VALOR

FRED MONAHAN ECHO CO 2/3

ALTOONA, Pa. (WTAJ) — Altoona native Fred Monahan will soon be inducted into the Joseph A. Dugan Hall of Valor at the Soldiers and Sailors Memorial Hall and Museum in Pittsburgh.

He is one of the most highly decorated marines from Pennsylvania that served in the Vietnam War. His story will be honored with that of other veterans who were awarded the Medal of Honor and other medals of distinction, like the Navy Cross.

Monahan was awarded the Navy Cross March 24th, 1968 for what happened to him and his men in Vietnam about 15 months earlier.

On May 3rd, 1967 Monahan was a rifleman, and an intelligence scout in a position on a hill that was of great interest to both sides.

In a battle for the position near Khe Sanh, Monahan's company came under intense mortar, automatic weapons fire and hand grenade attack. While others pulled back, Monahan put himself in between hundreds of attackers and the command post and was injured by a grenade.

He stopped repeated enemy assaults while commanding 4 other men. "It was certain death, so we're going to go down swinging. And it was an enemy position they vacated on a hilltop and we took without a fight. They came back 3 nights later to take it back off of us. I knew when I heard enemy sergeants and lieutenants screaming to their men, 'go get 'em, kill those Americans.' I knew I better, people better put up a fight"

FRED MONAHAN, VIETNAM WAR VETERAN

They kept the enemy pinned down until reinforcements arrived. Then Monahan guided the American troops in a counter-attack.

Monahan said that he fired rifles and threw grenades for 5 hours. Monahan doesn't consider himself a hero. "I am not a hero. The solders, sailors, airmen and Marines who lost their lives are the heroes." Fred lives in Greystone Court Villas in Altoona and has a son in Punxsutawney.

JOYCE L. DeVERNEY (1949 - 2020)
WIFE OF WAYNE "BUTCH" DeVERNEY
USMC KHE SANH VETERAN, HQ CO 2/26

Joyce Lloydette (Brancroft) DeVerney passed away Sunday, April 19, 2020 at her home after a courageous battle against ALS "Lou Gehrig's Disease". She was born on September 13, 1949 at Munson Hospital. Joyce grew up on a farm in Kingsley, Michigan and graduated from Kingsley High School class of 1967.She moved to Marquette to attend Northern Michigan University where she met Wayne "Butch" DeVerney. The two were married in St. Christopher church in Marquette on May 11, 1974.

Joyce was devoted to her family, husband Butch, daughters Jessica (Jeff) McLaughlin and Emily (Kriss) Hahn all of Midland. Her pride and joy was her 7-year-old grandson Easton Hahn. Joyce also cherished her sister Beth (Fred) Bynum and her nieces and nephews.

She was a member of the Midland VFW Ladies Auxiliary Post 3130 and spent countless hours volunteering her time there. She was also a member of Sanford American Legion and was very proud to be the wife of a military serviceman. Joyce was a strong advocate for Title 7, which encourages all schools to teach Native American culture. Private family service took place at the Ware Smith Woolever Funeral Chapel with Khe Sanh Veterans Chaplin Ron Rayner officiating. Those planning an expression of sympathy are asked to consider the donor's wishes.

In loving memory of Joyce DeVerney, a most caring, giving and wonderful woman, one of our Khe Sahn Veteran wives. I will miss sharing treasured moments with you at reunions. We will all miss you. Rest In Peace, my dear, dear friend. Prayers and condolences to Butch and your family.

HENRY J. DUVAL SR., USMC KHE SANH VETERAN H&S CO 2/26

BENNINGTON, VT- Henry Joseph Duval, 70, of Rutland, VT died Tuesday morning April 7, 2020 at the Vermont Veterans Home in Bennington.

He was born on June 19, 1949 in Proctor, VT the son of Charles and Germaine (Knapp) Duval.

He attended Castleton Elementary School and Fair Haven Union High School before enlisting in the United States Marine Corp in June of 1967.
Henry graduated from Marine Corps boot camp at Parris island South Carolina on September 1, 1967. His tour of duty in Vietnam took place between 1968 and 1969 as an artilleryman where he took part in the famous battle of Khe Sanh among others. He was honorably discharged from the United States Marine Corps on June 27, 1973 at the rank of corporal.

After his service, he was employed as a welder and was a member of the International Brotherhood of Boilermakers Union. He also did carpentry work with several contractors in the Rutland area.

His hobbies included fishing and hunting, especially with his nephew Neil Cunningham and niece Michele Clark, and he even had a crossbow license. He also enjoyed shooting guns, playing cards, and antiquing. He was a collector at heart. He loved to dance and play the guitar with his brothers and had an affection for real country music. Two of his favorite song were "The Old Man and His Horn" by Gene Watson and "A Daisy a Day" by Jud Strunk.

He was known for speaking his mind regardless of what anyone would think and his grandchildren inherited that spitfire for sure.

Survivors include a son Henry J. Duval Jr of RI and his fiancé Amber Holden, 3 sisters Carolyn and George W. (deceased) Aitken of Poultney, VT, Barbara and Thomas Ettori of Castleton, VT, and Joanne and Bruce Williams of Poultney, VT, brothers John and Bobbi Duval of New Bern NC and James and Sandy Duval of Granville, NY, 2 granddaughters Ashley and Kyle King and Bailee Cameron, a grandson Hunter Cameron, a great-granddaughter Grace King, and nieces and nephews.

He was predeceased by his daughter Melissa "Missy" Cameron on January 17, 2008, mother in 2013, father in 1981, a sister Charlene Weyrach in 2008 and 3 brothers Bill Duval in 2015 Charles Duval Jr. in 2000 and Michael A. Duval Sr in 2018

Graveside services with state Honor Guard were held in the Hillside Cemetery in Castleton, VT.

PRIVATE REFLECTIONS AND STEVE WIESE BY CRAIG W. TOURTE

Ken Rogers did a wonderful job sharing with us his article, "Steve Wiese was an American Hero" I am confident Steve would have respectively appreciated the article and kind words, he loved the Marine Corps, those he served with and in particular those in Bravo Company. His ending salutations on the Khe Sanh Board and other articles he had written always ended with "Bravo Lives." His way of showing the men he served with and so loved were never far from his thoughts. I wanted to take a few minutes here to say a few words about my friend Steve.

This is not an obituary, but rather just some personal reflections I have on the Steve Wiese I knew as a friend. I first met Steve at one of our Khe Sanh Reunions and we discovered that we lived but a few miles from each other. I introduced Steve to the little bar group I play golf with, Steve didn't play golf but bought a set of clubs and started swinging away, he was a natural athlete and within a year was playing much better than I. He attended our January 21st Khe Sanh luncheon in Chico/Oroville each year hosted by Tom Horchler. Steve never assumed anything, and I always had to personally invite him, when he felt comfortable, he enjoyed himself as much as others enjoyed his presents.

Unbeknownst to many, the camera and microphone loved Steve, he was one of the most elegant impromptu speakers I have ever heard. When Steve and I attended Jim Kaylors memorial, he shared a few memories of his association with Jim. Steve's moving and inspirational parting words from the podium were, "Be sad that Jim is gone, but happy that he was here." In 2012, the Military Channel under the title "Combat Tech" aired a segment that was filmed at my home. Steve did a wonderful interview. I was rather stunned during the interview, which was included in the broadcast when he said, "…the whistling of the bombs falling before they hit the ground was like an angel's voice." It was just a wonderful and profound statement that left little doubt in the mind of the viewer the impact the B 52 bombings had on the morale and spirit of those who had endured that horrific event.

I could get verbose here, but it would just be redundant, we spent many hours together and shared many thoughts and opinions, too many to recount and most just left to my wonderful memories of one of my good friends and true heroes. In closing we had several conversations about religions, sometimes when you see great tragedy you ask yourself "Why" as in why me, why did I survive? the answer is, we will never know, "That's why we call it faith." When speaking about organized religion and its complexity and beliefs Steve told me something his grandmother said, "The Lord knows what's in my heart." A personal statement so simple and easy to understand, we agreed it described our beliefs. So, this sad chapter closes for all of us, knowing the book of departure waits for us all, but we find solace in the words Steve spoke, "Be sad that he is gone, but happy that he was here."

FROM HIS LOVING DAUGHTER

Today you would have been 72. It's been 60 days now and it still doesn't feel real. You told me I was your rock and God knows I'm holding it down as best I can. But I would trade it all if I could get time back. I know you are looking down on us and smiling.....laughing, at times probably angry as well

(stubbornness runs strong in this family). Today we will try to keep the tears back and just remember the good times. The fun times. The jokes and laughter. The good memories that over power the bad. And I will end this with something from you. Happy birthday old man

VETERAN OF VIETNAM WAR RECOUNTS BATTLES NEAR KHE SANH COMBAT BASE

By PAUL J. CHOCLIS
MARINE CORPS STAFF SGT.

This account was written by Khe Sanh Veteran USMC, Staff Sergeant Paul Choclis, of Marion Heights.

This year marks the 50th anniversary of the battles and Siege of Khe Sanh Combat Base in the Vietnam War: The valley mountain base was located in the northwest corner of South Vietnam, a few miles below the (demilitarized zone) separating north from south, close to the Laotian border to the west.

In 1968, Khe Sanh gained Worldwide attention When an estimated 40,000 to 60,000 North Vietnamese Army enemy forces laid Siege to a garrison of about 6,000 US servicemen Called to arms to defend Khe Sanh were legendary units of the Marine Corps 5th (Spearhead Division), consisting of three battalions, of the 26th Regiment, along with their main artillery support, the 1st , 13th Marines.

In addition, joining the fight was a group of South Vietnamese Rangers and the 1st Battalion, 9th Marines, also known as the Walking Dead .

In 1967, as a result of actions in and around the surrounding hills and at the Khe Sanh Combat Base, hundreds of US. forces were killed in action and thousands wounded.

I remember when my special landing team of the 3rd Battalion, 26th Marines and C Battery, 1st Battalion, 13th Marines received orders to move north and engage the enemy at Khe Sanh.

Our units had arrived "in country" in the Republic of South Vietnam in December 1966. At Christmas, we received a baptism of fire in the Valley of Shadows/ Death at Cobithanhtan northwest of the imperial capital at Hue.

Military intelligence . reported an estimated 4,000 retcong/NVA forces in and around the valley sector. Immediate contact was made upon entering the valley, and we engaged the enemy in a weeklong battle.

Our first KIA was Paul Evans, of Lima Co., 2nd platoon, 3rd Battalion, 26th Marines. The battle site at Cobithanhtan Valley was named in his honor: Camp Evans.

After our first battle, we were ordered to conduct combat operations of the entire valley and jungle areas near the base of the Ho Chi Minh Trail We spent nearly three months in the torrential, punishing monsoon rains of 1967 before returning to the base at Phu Bai, near Hue, for refitting.

Near the end of April 1967, while still recovering from valley operations at Cobithanhtan, our positions at Phu Bai were hit with some 200 plus rounds of 82mm mortars. Several aircraft, vehicles and structures were damaged or destroyed. Sixty-eight Marines were wounded.

It was at Phu Bai in June 1967 that we received word of a large enemy buildup in the north DMZ areas. Orders were cut for us to engage the enemy at Khe Sanh.

On or about June 13, 1967, our units headed north . In a convoy to the base at Khe Sanh. Along the way, we took sniper fire from a rice paddy near a Quang Tri Village and, before we reached Khe Sanh base. the NVA blew out a bridge in front of us. The convoy was halted and choppers were called in to fly us into Khe Sanh.

The NVA/Vietcong were well aware of our every movement Khe Sanh's vulnerable position in a valley surrounded by rolling hills and higher elevation made a virtual shooting gallery for the enemy.

On June 27, 1967, about a half hour after midnight, the Khe Sanh Combat Base and nearby positions were hit with some 5O-plusrounds of 82mm mortars. Then, just before dawn on the same day, the enemy hit again with 50 rounds of 122mm rockets.

Our C Battery, 1st Battalion, 13th Marines (105 howitzer parapet area) took a direct rocket hit, missing the guns and the command bunker but hitting our supply tents just several feet away.

This deadly attack would take the lives of 24 U.S. servicemen and wound well over 100. Many actions, encounters and battles would take place in the First Corps region below the DMZ before 1967 ended.

Then, in January 1968, a 77-day siege of. Khe Sanh Combat Base took place, remembered now and forever in American history as one of the deadliest actions in the Vietnam War.

In 1983, the Khe Sanh Veterans Association was formed and dedicated to preserving the memories of the gallant warriors who served, fought and died as a result of the Khe Sanh combat experience. The founder of Khe Sanh Veterans Inc. is Navy Chaplain Commander Ray W. Stubbe. He is a survivor of the siege in 1968 and a leading authority on Khe Sanh. Stubbe also authored or co-authored many articles, papers and books.

I am an original member of the Special Landing-Force, 3rd Battalion, 26th Marines in the Western Pacific (Wespac) operations of 1966-67. I served as a scout/forward observer for C Battery, 1st Battalion, 13th Marines, attached to infantry companies Lima and Mike, 3/26 Marines, at the Khe Sanh Combat Base in 1967.

A true experience and actions of my units in the Vietnam War is featured in the book "to Hear Silence," By Author Ron W. Hoffman".

I also am a life member of the Khe Sanh Veterans Inc. and of the Disabled American Veterans.

Note: For extraordinary heroism in action against the NVA and Vietcong enemy forces in the Republic of Vietnam, the 26th Marines and 13th Marines received America's highest unit combat award, the Presidential Unit Citation.

BY CRAIG W. TOURTE
HQ BTRY 1/13

Everyone who knew William Denman called him Buddy and that nickname appropriately described who he was. Buddy grew up in the town of Maxwell, located in Northern California. Maxwell is the quintessential example of a rural small-town America where everyone knows your name, family, and most of your relatives if they had lived around those parts for a few generations. There would be no reason for the road traveler to take the exit off Interstate 5 and drive into the little farm community of 500 where most folks live in quiet obscurity. Some have come and stayed and raised their families while many others have moved along and are now mostly forgotten.

From the Virtual Wall - "Dau Tieng, Tay Ninh Provence, 03 Nov 1966 - elements of the 196th Infantry Brigade and the 25th Infantry Division got into a heated fight with entrenched and bunkered VC troops, a fight that grew into a full-fledged battle fought over a three-day period. Landing Zone Lima Zulu, slightly north of where 1st Bn, 27th Infantry fought on 03/04 Nov, drew some of the heaviest fighting beginning after C Company, 2/27 Inf, was inserted at about 1400 on 04 Nov."- "

Landing Zone Lima Zulu, slightly north of where 1st Bn, 27th Infantry fought on 03/04 Nov, drew some of the heaviest fighting beginning after C Company, 2/27 Inf, was inserted at about 1400 on 04 Nov."

Buddy was a popular kid, handsome and athletic with blond hair and light blue eyes and he possessed an independent and adventuresome spirit many admired. Buddy had a difficult and tragic family life; there were many challenges and hardships including a grievous personal experience between his parents that he witnessed at a very young age. After he graduated from high school Buddy volunteered for the Army and attended boot camp at Fort Ord located in Monterey California. He thrived in the Army life with direction, discipline, and a sense of belonging. He found a new beginning, writing to many friends about the respect and admiration he had for the warriors he had met, respected, and hoped one day to emulate.

In the summer of 1966, I was living with my aunt and uncle in Maxwell and looking forward to going off to Marine Corps boot camp. Going into the Marine Corps was an adventure I was looking forward to even though I knew I would be deployed to Vietnam shortly after my training was completed. Buddy had completed his Army training and was home visiting his mother and sister and preparing for his deployment to Vietnam. I went over to his house with my cousin Larry Bowen (1947-1968) and walked into his bedroom where a few of his friends were visiting with him. It was mid-morning and he was still in bed, stating that he wanted to rest as much as he could after all the training and before his deployment. He was in high spirits and looking forward to serving his country and all of what that entailed. We talked about his military training and what he expected while in Vietnam. I sensed that he too was in pursuit of action and eager for a new experience. I told him that he would be returning from Vietnam before me and when I returned home, we would share and compare experiences. I wished him luck and was a little envious that he would get to the war before me. I left knowing he was doing what he wanted to do and I was looking forward to becoming a United States Marine. I entered Marine Corps Boot Camp (Platoon 1145) on October 29, 1966.

When Buddy arrived in Vietnam his Sergeant asked him what he wanted to be called, William or Bill. His response was "My friends call me Buddy." His Sergeant said, "Then Buddy it is." He was assigned to A Company, 2nd Battalion, 27th Infantry (Wolfhounds), 25 Infantry Division. Within a short period of time, he went into combat against the experienced, prepared, and determined Viet Cong forces. Tragically only three and a half months after arriving in Vietnam he was killed in action.

C/2/27 moved south from LZ Lima Zulu, intending to link with 1/27, but could go only a few hundred meters before being stopped by VC dug into a tree line. Unable to move forward, with enemy troops infiltrating to their rear, the battalion and company commanders dead, and under fire from three sides, C/2/27 pulled together after nightfall, using a left flank displacement to get out of the "horseshoe" and avoid encirclement. The maneuver worked, and C/2/27 held out through the night amidst sporadic hand-to-hand fighting. By 1030 on 05 Nov, Alpha 1/27 fought through and relieved C/2/27." At the same time, HHC and A Company, 2/27, was coming into LZ Lima Zulu, intending to take the VC from the rear, pounding them against the anvil formed by A/1/27 and C/2/27."

05 November 1966 - While the engagements cost the VC dearly, with several hundred known dead, the US infantrymen paid a high price with 50 men killed in action over the three-day period. William (Buddy) Denman was one of the twenty Americans who was killed at LZ Lima Zulu on the 3rd day of the fight."

The community cemetery of Maxwell is located a mile west of town. William Luther Denman (August 25, 1946 - November 5, 1966) is buried near the flagpole; his final resting place is identified with a brass United States Military Headstone. He was the first to be killed from the small town of Maxwell and County of Colusa during the Vietnam War. He had the largest funeral ever attended with vehicles stretching for a couple of miles leading to the cemetery.

Several years ago I placed a small note on the A Company, 2nd Battalion, 27th Infantry Wolfhound website regarding Buddy, just so others would know he had someone who continued to remember him and his sacrifice for this wonderful country.

Similar to the Khe Sanh Veterans websites (Where I served during the Vietnam War) - Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc & Khe Sanh Veterans Home Page - which have contributed to bringing together those who fought in the battles on the hills and the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh, the Wolfhounds website is followed by those with comparable experiences.

Several months ago I received an email in response to that little notation I had written on the Wolfhound web site. A former Vietnam and Wolfhound Veteran Robert Park contacted me and said that he was with Buddy during that particular battle and continues to remember Buddy's death with great sadness. Robert said he was the one who asked Buddy what name he wanted to be called. Having been in the country longer and with more experience, Robert felt an obligation to watch out for Buddy and has carried with him all these years a feeling of responsibility for Buddy's death during the battle. A few years ago, Robert had come to Maxwell to visit Buddy's grave and say goodbye but was unable to locate his grave at the cemetery. He asked around town, but no one seemed to recall who Buddy was nor were they familiar with the location of his grave. Robert has vowed to return someday to say his final farewell.

A few of weeks after my email communication with Robert I received an email from Chuck Dean, another Vietnam and Wolfhound Veteran who told me he had been in communication with Robert and that he had been with Buddy when he fell and was planning on driving to California and visit Buddy's grave. I shared both emails with people I knew were close to Buddy while he was growing up.

Email from Chuck Dean - "I plan on visiting Buddy's grave in May of this year (2012), something I have tried to face for 45 years. Buddy and I were very close friends in Vietnam. We were both Grenadiers in A Co 2/27 Wolfhounds. I was with Buddy when he fell. I only wish I could have done this years ago, but have only been able to come to grips with Vietnam in the last couple of years. I have hooked up with some of the other "Hounds" such as Robert within the last year and have been steadily working my way out of the shadows. I will be in the Maxwell area to visit Buddy's gravesite in May. Buddy will always be part of the band of brothers called the Wolfhounds and will never be forgotten. His memory will live on as long as there is one Wolfhound alive."

Freedom Is Not Free" Reads the program pamphlet provided at the Memorial Day Service held at the Maxwell Cemetery, May 28, 2012 - I attended the Memorial Day Service with 100 or more people from the community sponsored by American Legion Post 218 (Maxwell) - Ronald Azevedo, Commander. The Maxwell High School Band played the Star-Spangled Banner and one of the high school girls sang the National Anthem. The service included a bugler playing taps and a rifle volley "Salute to Deceased Veterans." I didn't notice any politicians or back-slapping significant officials, just local folks with moist eyes and heavy hearts who attended out of respect and honor for those who served and for those who had fallen.

Chuck Dean arrived for the service and was shown the location of Buddy's grave by Paul Richter (1st Lt. U.S. Army) and my cousin Gary Bowen (1949-2013) (U.S. Navy) who were childhood friends of Buddy's,. There was a large floral wreath standing at the headstone sent by Robert Park in the name of all the Wolfhounds Buddy served with. Chuck said that he had driven out from Alabama to finally say goodbye. We had a long conversation where he reflected on the battle and Buddy's loss. Chuck said that Buddy was just a few steps behind him when he was shot and killed. He walked over to Buddy, turned him over, and saw that he was deceased. Chuck said that he had the canvas helmet cover Buddy had worn that day. I held the now faded green camouflage helmet cover and observed written in black ink Buddy's blood type, unit, and the words "Pat" for his high school girlfriend Patricia. Chuck said that he had kept the cover locked away for 45 years and now it was time the cover should be with Buddy's hometown, family, and friends.

Chuck handed the helmet cover to Buddy's friend Paul Richter for safekeeping until it could display properly in a place of care and honor. I recognized that Chuck's act of presenting Buddy's helmet cover to Paul and the town of Maxwell was more than just transferring some possession of property. It was a spiritual release, a dedication, shared memory, and memorial of an item of hallowed significance to be forever treasured. It was part of Buddy's spirit and represented his life and sacrifice in battle and that significance had been tucked away for 45 years in a corner of Chuck's heart and soul.

Paul told me there were efforts under development to build an appropriate incased memorial with memorabilia dedicated to Buddy which would include the now gifted helmet cover along with his military Bronze Star, Purple Heart, military photograph, and additional items relating to Buddy already on display at the American Legion. The new display would not only be a tribute to Buddy but also to the many who have served in the Armed Forces and a reminder to all that, "Freedom Is Not Free."

OBIT

MAJOR GENERAL VICTOR HUGO JR. USA KHE SANH VETERAN , C/O 1ST BATTALION 44th ARTILLERY

Major General Victor J. Hugo, Jr., United States Army (Retired), a 1954 graduate of the U. S. Military Academy @ West Point and great-grandson of the renowned French author Victor-Marie Hugo—Les Misérables, The Hunchback of Notre-Dame, etc.—recently passed away. General Hugo played an under recognized role in the 1968 battle @ Khe Sanh since he commanded the U. S. Army's 1st Battalion, 44th Artillery and as such he provided a battery, with supporting units, for badly needed fire support in defending the Combat Base.

It was my good fortune to meet General Hugo a few years ago. He was a most gracious gentleman. We had a pleasant conversation, which included discussing the battle—he was most interested in my views even though I emphasized that, as an eighteen (18) year old PFC on a nearby hilltop, I had a most insignificant part and limited direct knowledge.

Mostly my knowledge was based on my exposure to the men with whom I served. The General assured me that all of us were heroes; that what we accomplished with the assets we had was absolutely remarkable. General Hugo was a remarkable man. Rest in eternal peace Sir.

MIDLAND REMEMBERS SERGEANT ALLAN ARCHER, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN VIETNAM VET

VIRGINIA FLOREY

Sometimes a single moment defines our entire life. Such a moment came for Allan Archer on Hill 55 in Vietnam in March of 1967. This is the story of that moment and the men who shared that moment with him.

The Vietnam Conflict was unlike any other war that young American men were called upon to fight. Guerrilla warfare was the enemy's strong point. The mountains and vine-tangled jungles of Vietnam enabled the communist forces to hide. To shoot. And to slip back into the jungle leaving young Americans dead or wounded from bullets coming from an unseen enemy. Some of the enemy wore black clothing to blend in with the darkness of the jungle. They wore tennis shoes or handmade sandals so the sound of footsteps wouldn't alert the Americans that they were coming. Some wore uniforms.

The Vietnam conflict proved to be a hard lesson to learn by men accustomed to knowing where the enemy was. The enemy in other wars had faces. But not this time. The enemy was bullets chattering through the trees with no faces and no names. A man named Colonel Ba was the man in charge of the communist snipers. His team was both ruthless and successful until the appearance of an American Marine they called White Feather.

In October 1966, two young Marines named Carlos Hathcock and John Burke were trained to be snipers. It wasn't long before Carlos Hathcock began his tour of duty in Vietnam. A young Marine who stuck a white feather in his camouflage cap for good luck. And it was on Hill 55 that Carlos Hathcock would meet another young Marne named Allan Archer, the man who pledged his life to keep snipers like Carlos Hathcock alive.

Allan Archer was only 19 years old at the time when one officer gave high praise to Allan Archer, describing him as a fearless leader, bold with an inner strength and iron determination. Faithful, loyal, true to his word. A sniper team could trust Lance Corporal Archer with his life.

Pelting rain, a steamy fog, endless waiting for the enemy to appear, Carlos Hathcock and John Burke were enduring it all as they waited for relief. Their relief was coming in the form of Lance Corporal Allan Archer and the 18 men in his Platoon. Archer would never tell his men to do something that he wouldn't do.

Bullets chopped through the tree line as Hathcock and Burke lay concealed in a small gully and then they heard a thrashing sound behind them. It was Allan Archer and his platoon and Hathcock called out, "Archer?" And Archer answered back, "Are you two alive?"

Hathcock said to Archer, "Hope this little bit of what we have lasts. I think all your boys have are M -16 rounds and M-60 belts. And I don't want to be trying to yank rounds out of those machine gun belts with this bunch coming at us."

Sliding over to Hathcock's side, Archer told him he had radioed operations when the shooting started and told them that he and his platoon would consolidate and set up a defense with Hathcock and Burke. Hathcock asked to see the map Archer had used and said to him, "Are these the numbers you gave?" Archer said they were, and Hathcock replied, "That red dot is us," and pointed to Archer's map. Archer had unerringly located Hathcock and Burke.

Settling back with the map in front of them, Archer told Hathcock that a little close air support and a couple of choppers with about 70 or 80 reinforcements were coming. It was a definitive moment in the life of two young Marines on Hill 55 in Vietnam.

Allan Archer, Rank E-5, 1/26th Marine Battalion, Company Bravo, enlisted Feb. 1, 1966, and served until Jan. 31, 1968. He moved through the ranks rapidly beginning as PFC, Lance Corporal, Corporal and then Sergeant at Khe Sanh. He participated at battles at the DMZ, the three gates of hell, the Mekong Delta, Operations Prairie and Hastings and spent most of 1967 in Khe Sanh. Allan participated in 17 major operations while in Vietnam.

After Allan Archer left Khe Sanh, his replacement and 34 Marines in Allan's platoon died in an ambush. By Feb. 27, 1968, Allan's platoon was wiped out and it took 45 days to remove all the bodies. It was called the Ghost Patrol.

Allan received a note he treasures to this day from Sept. 11, 2014, by Lt. Col. USMC (retired) Guy A. Peete Jr. to Allan.

"Archer, you are one of Marines greatest and effective combat leaders of Marines that I have ever had the pleasure of serving with in my career of 24 years in the Corps. The third herd will always be with us," the note reads. "Lest we forget – Semper Fi."

When Allan returned to Bay City, he went back to his home at 1111 Madison St. where his 1959 Oldsmobile was still sitting in the yard. To his amazement, it started up immediately. Today Allan and his wife, Elizabeth, live in Midland. The Vietnam Conflict has been over for decades. Still, veterans of that time in our history carry the memories of a part of their life they will never forget.
Semper Fidelis is the motto of the Marine Corps.

It's Latin for Always Faithful and Sergeant. Allan Archer treasures those words a half century after returning home from the Vietnam Conflict. He served with dignity, faithfully fulfilling his part in a war that lasted 19 years. His duty? To protect. To help. To lend aid wherever it was needed. Allan Archer personifies the proud record of the Marine Corps.

Editor's note: This is the final installment of the May 2020 Midland Remembers, which has featured veterans with local ties all month long. Midland Remembers will return to its regular publishing schedule in June, which is the first and third Thursday of each month.

I transferred in to Archer's squad in April of 1967, almost a broken man from 86 days in the bush with Lima 2 3/26 on Operation Chinook I and II. Straight out of the bush many of us were transferred from the men we had grown to trust with our very lives. Men who had become closer than family. Fear of not having that kind of support with the new Marines I was assigned to Bravo3 1/26 was overwhelming me.

Archer took me into the squad with a calm but firm demeanor. I personally credit him with getting my head back on straight. His leadership inspired me to become the Marine I had been and gradually learn to trust the men in this new to me platoon as I hope I earned theirs. I ended up spending more time in country with this platoon and am proud of everyone of them. Have had the chance to meet our old Lt Guy Pete a few years ago and talk to Archer on the phone. Guy Pete has been extremely good at keeping me and others informed of those he is in contact with. Can't say more than he did in the above article except to say I found Archer to be everything that was said in this outstanding article. Semper Fi, Brothers.

AN OLD COBRA RETURNS TO ITS ARTILLERY ROOTS AND FINDS A NEW HOME IN OKLAHOMA

Posted on May 28, 2020 by Dan Parsons

U.S. Army Cobra 15654 began its career with three years of combat during the Vietnam War, and almost ended its days in Minnesota with birds nesting in its engine compartment.

Now it has been fully restored to its original configuration as an aerial rocket artillery helicopter and found a new home with the folks who will care for it at the U.S. Army Field Artillery Museum at Fort Sill, Oklahoma.

Known as attack helicopters and the precursor to the AH-64 Apache, the AH-1 initially served the Army in aerial rocket artillery units providing close air support to troops on the ground in Vietnam, said Jon Bernstein, a Cobra historian and director of the Air Defense Artillery Museum at Fort Sill.

"Aerial rocket artillery was a very specific role and there were actually only three units that performed that mission through the entirety of the war," said Bernstein. "Their main mission was support of troops on the ground. They weren't like Cavalry where they use Cobras to seek and destroy the enemy and they weren't like assault helicopter company Cobras, which were designed primarily to escort Hueys in and out of hot landing zones, although Cobras in ARA units did all that, as well. They were supposed to be on-call fire-support units for ground troops in contact."

It was for this reason that Bernstein decided the artillery museum should have its own Cobra, so he went hunting for one in the collection of old vehicles and other artifacts the Army keeps from past conflicts. Artifacts on the so-called "de-accession" list typically end up at museums outside the government system or are reused by the Army for other purposes.

"I looked through the entire collection to see what Cobras were there and to see if any of them had aerial rocket artillery provenance and I came across this one, which was due to be de-accessioned," Bernstein said. "I said, let's grab this one while we can."

Before arriving at Fort Sill, the helicopter lived outdoors at the Minnesota Air National Guard Museum in St. Paul, which was hoping to "get rid of it," Bernstein said.

The 50-foot-long AH-1S Cobra attack helicopter arrived at the museum in March 2019 and has undergone extensive restoration by Bernstein and exhibits specialist Zane Mohler since. During the recent shutdown, Mohler had time to finish painting the entire fuselage in preparation for it being installed in the museum.

Entering service in 1966, the Bell AH-1 was a production model gunship for the U.S. Army, with one 1,400 shaft horsepower (1,000 kW) Avco Lycoming T53-13 turboshaft engine and shared fuselage commonalities with the UH-1 Huey.

This particular Cobra was flown by A Battery, 4th Battalion, 77th Aerial Rocket Artillery (ARA) in Vietnam and Laos from December 1970 to March 1971, when it was blown up during a sapper attack on the Marine Corps fire base at Khe Sanh.

"I started digging a little deeper and we actually were able to find video of it at Khe Sanh on the morning after the sapper attack," Bernstein said. "You can clearly see all the damage to the tail boom and other things."

The helicopter then went back to manufacturer Bell for a rebuild, after which its operational history becomes "a little fuzzy," Bernstein said. It might have been rebuilt as a G-model at that point or as an AH-1Q, which introduced the M65 tube-launched, optically tracked, wire-guided (TOW)/Cobra missile subsystem, M65 telescopic sight unit (TSU), and M73 reflex sight. It was those sighting systems that sat in the nose turret the aircraft sported when it arrived in Oklahoma.

In any case, by the late 1970s the helicopter was sporting new 1,800 shp (1,300 kW) T53-L-703 turboshaft engine that classified it as a baseline AH-1S, Bernstein said. It flew with the Minnesota National Guard for an unspecified amount of time before being demilitarized and placed on static display outside the museum in St. Paul.

"It was in rough shape," Bernstein said. "It had been outside for years. There were 18-inch deep bird nests in the engine compartment."

It went into the museum workshop in December 2019 to emerge during the Covid-19 lockdown and will be installed atop its piling in the coming weeks as the museum prepares to reopen.

Pretty much from December through [May 27] we've been working on it, of course with the quarantine and everything, Zane [Mohler] has been the only person in the exhibit shop and he was able to get the entire thing painted and stenciled during those two months."

Before that, the pair had to remove all the anachronistic add-ons of its later service, including wire-strike protection devices, and replace the tail rotor and tail rotor gearbox. They also had to replace the AH-1S nose housing, which features the later addition of a swivelling turret.

Bernstein was able to track down an older, smoother AH-1J nose to backdate the helicopter to its aerial artillery days in Vietnam. But when the helicopter had its nose job in the 1970s, one of the forward fuselage bulkhead was widened to accept the new turret. Those had to be narrowed by about 1.5 inches in order to accept the older nose.

"It was more involved than I thought it was going to be, but definitely a challenging and rewarding experience," Bernstein said.

Much of the credit goes to Mohler, Berstein said. As the lone person with access to the museum shop during the shutdown, Mohler continued the work. He was able to hand-build four "impossible to come by" M200 rocket pods by borrowing the real deal from the Army Aviation Museum at Fort Rucker, Alabama, and copying it using PVC pipe, plexiglass and sheet metal.

Mohler also had to build proper pylon fairing from scratch by molding fiberglass using original technical drawings and Vietnam-era photos.

For Bernstien, a former Apache pilot, returning this Cobra to its aerial artillery roots is a complete circle. After the battle of An Loc in 1972, the Army realized that helicopters could kill tanks, Bernstein said. For the past two decades, the Apaches he flew as tank killers have been performing air support for troops in Afghanistan and Iraq. "The Army shifted focus from a fire-support platform to a tank killer and that's how the Apache evolved," Berstein said. "And now, the Apache now has been doing a very similar role to what the ARA Cobras did in Vietnam."

PATRICK GAVIN TADINA, VIETNAM WAR'S LONGEST CONTINUOUSLY SERVING RANGER, DIES AT 77

By CHAD GARLAND | STARS AND STRIPES
Published: June 1, 2020

A 30-year Army veteran who was the longest continuously serving Ranger in Vietnam and one of the war's most decorated enlisted soldiers has died

Patrick Gavin Tadina served in Vietnam for over five years straight between 1965 and 1970, leading long range reconnaissance patrols deep into enemy territory — often dressed in black pajamas and sandals, and carrying an AK-47.

The retired command sergeant major died Friday morning in North Carolina. He was 77.

"Early this morning my Dad ... took his last breaths and went to be with all the Rangers before him," his daughter Catherine Poeschl said on Facebook. "I know they are all there waiting for him."

He is survived by his wife, two sisters, two daughters, four sons, six grandchildren and two great-grandchildren, the family said in a brief online obituary. A funeral had not yet been scheduled.

A native of Hawaii, Tadina earned two Silver Stars, 10 Bronze Stars — seven with valor — three Vietnamese Crosses of Gallantry, four Army Commendation Medals, including two for valor, and three Purple Hearts.

After the release of the second Rambo movie, he was profiled in Stars and Stripes, where he was contrasted with Sylvester Stallone's beefy — often shirtless — portrayal of a Vietnam combat veteran. "The real thing comes in a smaller, less glossy package," wrote reporter Don Tate in December 1985. "Tadina stands just over 5-feet-5, and swells all the way up to 130 pounds after a big meal."

His small stature and dark complexion helped him pass for a Viet Cong soldier on patrols deep into the Central Highlands, during which he preferred to be in the point position. His citations describe him walking to within feet of enemies he knew to be lying in wait for him and leading a pursuing enemy patrol into an ambush set by his team.

In Vietnam he served with the 173rd Airborne Brigade Long Range Reconnaissance Patrol, 74th Infantry Detachment Long Range Patrol and Company N (Ranger), 75th Infantry.

Tadina joined the Army in 1962 and served in the Dominican Republic before going to Southeast Asia. He also served with the 82nd Airborne Division in Grenada during Operation Urgent Fury in 1983 and with the 1st Infantry Division during Operation Desert Storm in 1991.

A 1995 inductee into the Ranger Hall of Fame, he served with "extreme valor," never losing a man during his years as a team leader in Vietnam, a hall of fame profile at Fort Benning said.

Some 200 men had served under him without "so much as a scratch," said a newspaper clipping his daughter shared, published while Tadina was serving at Landing Zone English in Vietnam's Binh Dinh province, likely in 1969.

Tadina himself was shot three times and his only brother was also killed in combat in Vietnam, Stars and Stripes later reported.

The last time he was shot was during an enemy ambush in which he earned his second Silver Star, and the wounds nearly forced him to be evacuated from the country, the LZ English story said.

As the point man, Tadina was already inside the kill zone when he sensed something was wrong, but the enemy did not fire on him, apparently confused about who he was, the article stated. After spotting the enemy, Tadina opened fire and called out the ambush to his teammates before falling to the ground and being shot in both calves.

Patrick Gavin Tadina is pictured here in an undated photo wearing North Vietnamese Army fatigues and carrying an AK-47, as he often did as a long range reconnaissance patrol team leader over five years straight serving in Vietnam during the war. One of the most-decorated enlisted soldiers of the Vietnam War, Tadina retired as a command sergeant major in 1992. He died Friday, May 29, 2020, at age 77.

He refused medical aid and continued to command until the enemy retreated, stated another clipping, quoting from his Silver Star citation.

"When you're out there in the deep stuff, there's an unspoken understanding," he told Tate in 1985. "It's caring about troops."

He was not one to boast of his experiences, his daughter said in a phone interview Monday.

After retiring from the Army in 1992, he continued working security jobs until 2013, Poeschl said, including stints in Iraq, Afghanistan and Pakistan.

In recent years, he'd been struggling with dementia and other ailments, she said, and he often believed he was back in the Army with his buddies.

He always seemed most at home with his "Ranger family," his daughter said. She was trying to get word of his death to as many as she could.

"He was my dad, but he belonged to so many other people," she said.

VETERANS SAY THEY FEEL 'SAD' AND 'TERRIBLE' WITHOUT TRADITIONAL MEMORIAL DAY EVENTS

Updated May 24, 2020; Posted May 24, 2020

During Operation Lam Son 719, Tony Goodson defended the tactical operations center — all day and night — from attacks in every corner during the Vietnam War. But one explosion struck near him, shooting him into the air.

When he landed, he looked down and saw his legs covered in bloods and scars.

Goodson was winded, but after medical officers picked the shrapnel out of his legs, he was sent back into the field to defend the Khe Sanh Combat Base, supporting South Vietnamese troops.

"I felt very lucky the next morning," Goodson said.

Lam Son 719 left over 200 Americans killed or missing in action while 1,149 were wounded, according to History Net.

Goodson, now 70 years old, told The Jersey Journal on Sunday that he can never forget about those he lost during the war. Memorial Day is a "bittersweet time," he added, but not being able to get together for the traditional annual events — due to coronavirus virus concerns — makes him sad.

Goodson, a commander at VFW Shelton Post 2294, said they will instead have a small gathering for a flagpole raising and prayer service outside, spaced out from one another, on Monday at 10 a.m. Members of the post will also visit monuments individually.

All Jersey City-run events are canceled until further notice.

On Friday, Gov. Murphy loosened state restrictions allowing groups of 25 outside. Though Monday will have a smaller crowd, Goodson said it's the right move to follow guidelines and avoid hosting large gatherings because it's not worth the risk.

The Jersey City native was a U.S. Army sergeant and served in Vietnam from June 1970 to May 1971. He was also part of the 101st Airborne Division during Lam Son 719 where 19 U.S. Army aviators died, 59 were wounded and 11 went missing, according to the Air Force History and Museums Program.

"Birthdays, holidays, it's all the same to me," Goodson said. "... I always think about those who couldn't be here."
For Stephen Holinka, 72, he said he feels "terrible" without the traditional Memorial Day events, which are a way for him to commemorate his former comrades — people who he thinks about often.

Holinka has marched with Jersey City's Lafayette Amvets Post 33 in its annual Memorial Day parade for the last 40 years. Afterwards, there would also be a mass, memorial services and a luncheon for members, family and friends at Broadway Diner in Bayonne. But those are other events that won't be happening Monday due to COVID-19.

"Just a shame we couldn't have it...," Holinka said. "... It's been a very disappointing year."

Holinka said that on Monday he'll be thinking about all the people he knew during his three years of service. He was a former sergeant and spent a tour in 1966 to 1967 in Korea before volunteering in 1968 for the Vietnam War.

The commander of Amvets Post 33 also said he'll been commemorating the former World War II veterans of the post, many of whom have died.

"I knew many of them very well and we had some great times at the post," Holinka said. "I just think about them so much and what they've done for this country."

"I constantly think about them. They're part of me." Though there'll be no parades, some places like Weehawken have decided to move their festivities online.

Weehawken Mayor Richard Turner told The Jersey Journal Saturday that there will be a virtual Memorial Day Ceremony on Monday. It will include a dedication of wreaths, veterans ritual, naming of deceased Weehawken Elks Lodge members and more.

The broadcast will be available through the township's government Facebook page and website.

"I think we're all disappointed," said Elks Exalted Ruler Lorraine Wuillamey. "But of course, everybody understands."

JIMMY TAYLOR SHARED A POST

Lt. Col. Fred Headley. Col. Headley was the Army Airfield Commander at Khe Sanh during Lam Son 719. One of the finest men I ever met. We became friends during my time at Khe Sanh (his tent was next to mine) and I found out he had married a girl from Ft. Valley, Ga, just up the road from where I was from. A few years ago I set out to find him. Sadly, he had passed away some three years before but I found his family and his widow reaches out to me on certain days like today. One of the photos was taken behind Col. Headley as we watch a C-130 taking off from Khe Sanh. This was early March, 1971 before the base itself had started taking incoming. The other photo shows Col. Headley on the far right in a steel pot with sleeves rolled up as he and some of the air traffic controllers and one of the Air Force weathermen, which was my job, enjoy a lukewarm Pabst. This pic was taken after the incoming started.

VETERANS SPOTLIGHT

JOHN FERGUSON SR./US AIR FORCE
By WAYNE SOARES May 15, 2020

While interviewing this week's Veterans Spotlight feature, two words kept coming to mind—class and humility. John Ferguson Sr. served his country in the US Air Force from 1958 to 1969, ending his career as a captain.

He grew up in Westerly, Rhode Island, and graduated from the University of Rhode Island. He entered military service as a second lieutenant via an ROTC program in college.

During the Vietnam War his unit, originally stationed in the Philippines, was sent to Dong Ha because the US government wanted a radar site as close to the DMZ as possible. He was promoted to captain during this period.

We had no idea what we were getting into…my first impression was to stay alive…didn't know one Vietnamese from the other," Captain Ferguson remembered.

He shared this story: "We had a Vietnamese man that received a security clearance to work in our kitchen…we didn't know it at the time but he was actually a VC (Viet Cong) soldier…they shot him while he was lobbing grenades towards an area with Marines…place we never should have been…only thing war does is kill people."

When I asked Captain Ferguson about the closeness of his unit in the everyday threat of danger he responded with this: "We were mortared a few times under full moons…we had no casualties except equipment…that's because everyone worked together…we were close."

Captain Ferguson brushed aside a question about the holidays. "It just became one day…would like to have been home with my wife and four kids but I wasn't…looked at it as another day," he said.

Did he ever have the chance to see Bob Hope? "He didn't dare come that close to the DMZ…had a two-star general come in…I liked seeing him because he could get us equipment," Captain Ferguson said seriously

I asked Captain Ferguson if any one particular memory stands out during his time in Vietnam. He shared this: "We had four fighter aircraft on standby under my command…I was talking to Khe Sanh…they were under heavy mortar fire…you had to go through three to four different channels of communication all the way back to the Pentagon to get approval to send out the fighters…I wasn't getting the go-ahead but radioed Khe Sanh…they said they'd send up colored smoke where the fighters should bomb…I gave my two lieutenants permission to send the fighters…we squashed the mortar fire and saved everyone in the unit from capture or death…next day a lieutenant colonel comes in and ripped me…wanted to know who gave permission to send the fighters…told him I did…never said I did the right thing."

Captain Ferguson explained the qualities of a good leader, especially one involved in heavy day-to-day combat. "Understand your job…make sure your troops are taken care of and make sure the mail comes," he said

He was asked what he thought about when coming home from Vietnam. He said, "Wanted to see my family, badly…we got mortared a few times…and fortunately, we didn't lose any men."

Now 86, he has had prostate cancer and suffers from Parkinson's disease caused by exposure to Agent Orange.

Captain John Ferguson, thank you for your service to our great country.

MEMORIES

On 02 June 1969 Recon Team "Flight Time" from D Company, 3rd Reconnaissance Battalion, was inserted on Hill 471 about a kilometer south of Khe Sanh in the Quảng Trị Province, Vietnam, On the night of 03/04 June 1969 the team was attacked by an enemy force and requested both emergency extraction and immediate reinforcement. Communications with the team were lost at 0320. When the reactionary force arrived a little after 0400 they were too late ... the six members of "Flight Time" were dead. Five members of the team were in a small trench; the sixth, Cpl Buck, was approximately 10 meters further down the hillside. It was apparent from the state of the battle area that "Flight Time" had been overwhelmed in fierce Hand to hand combat.

OBIT

Warren Titcomb, 74, died on Saturday, June 13, 2020 after a long illness. Born in Portland, Maine, he was the son of Virginia and the late Warren Titcomb. Warren was the beloved husband of TJ (Teri) Titcomb. They married after a 7-week courtship and celebrated 50 years of marriage on April 21. It was the only impulsive thing Warren ever did but he said he never regretted it.

Warren graduated with a B.A. in Psychology from Miami University of Ohio in 1967 and was commissioned a second lieutenant in the United States Marine Corps. He served in Vietnam, including time at Khe Sanh during the 1968 Tet offensive. After his honorable discharge as a USMC Captain in 1971, Warren and TJ moved to Arizona. He completed his master's degree in Counseling Psychology at Arizona State University. In their fifteen years in the Phoenix area, Warren worked as a mental health therapist and clinic director. He was a long-distance runner, braving the heat and sun to compete in 10K runs and marathons. Warren also began playing classical guitar and enjoyed his lessons with Miguel who regaled him with stories of his study under Segovia. Warren continued his love of making music throughout his life, although he rarely performed for any audience other than the family cat.

The Titcombs moved to Lancaster in 1986 after a two-year search for a new home. They chose Lancaster County for its quality of life, beautiful countryside, and relatively balanced four seasons. For the next thirty years, Warren helped thousands of individuals, couples and families as a therapist with Catholic Charities, the Lancaster Guidance Center, Family Service, and Wellspan Behavioral Health. He was widely known for his caring and innovative work, using cognitive behavioral approaches to help those with a dual diagnosis of major mental illness and substance abuse. Warren never met a "sick" person – he always looked for and found the goodness and potential of each individual.

Warren was an active member of First United Methodist Church in Lancaster, singing tenor in the Chancel Choir. He served on the Board of Allegro Orchestra Lancaster for twenty years and was a friendly presence, welcoming concert goers at the door.

Warren is survived by his wife TJ, mother, brothers Joel and Jason in Maine, and extended family. The family is deeply grateful for the loving and respectful care he received

WHAT I NEVER HAD

By Craig Tourte
HQ BTRY 1/13

II was sitting around my favorite watering hole a few years ago after playing a game of golf, shooting the stuff with a few old guys my age. The discussion got around to serving in Vietnam and "where were you and what did you do." One of the guys talked about his time in the Air Force and how he saw the world and the various bases and countries he had been in. Another talked about his time in the Navy and the food on the ships and how his bunk was right under the flight deck and the noise it made. Another said that he was in the Corps but never made it to Vietnam but had spent time at Twenty-Nine Palms and Okinawa. Then one of the guys smiled and asked me where I was, while I was in the Marine Corps. Of course, everyone knew I had served during the Siege at the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh. I didn't want to disappoint anyone. I tried not to make my story into a whine, but I knew what they all wanted to hear. I started out with "I Never…"

I figure I spent ten months on the Khe Sanh Combat Base. The other times in Quang Tri after the Siege, guarding something way off away from everything. Anyway, my story started off, "I never sat on a flush toilet, I never spoke to a Vietnamese, I never was in a town or large village, I never went into a bar, I never took a bath or shower from a forced water pipe, I never walked on cement or asphalt, I never saw an American woman, I never slept ion a bed, I never had a pillow, I never slept in sheets, I never saw a television, I never listened to a radio, I never sat in a chair, I never wore any under clothing, I never had my cloths washed except when I washed them in a bucket, I never ate a hamburger or had french-fries, I never had any shaving crème, I never walked on a rug, I never had more than one pair of boots, I never stood near a heater, I never had more than one pair of socks, except for two occasions of warm beer I never had an adult beverage, I never went to a USO show, I never went anywhere without a weapon, I never had nor wore civilian clothes, I never saw nor did I talk to any civilians, I never rode in a car…"

I think I stopped at that and looked around, I was kind of shocked to see the look on all of their faces, mouths were open, and eyes were wide and strangest of all, no one said anything. I said, "I think it's time for me to go home" and I stood up and walked out.

When I got home, I thought a great deal about what I had said and oddly the list got longer. I looked around my house and the list of "I never" just seemed to continue on forever. I hate the "my time was tougher than your time" because each has their own individual cross to bear and after all, I knew that my deprivation was much less than many and certainly less than those up in the hills of Khe Sanh.

JAMES T, CONNACHER, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN

June 8th, 1940 - June 21st, 2020 James Trafford Connacher, a long time resident of Corona, CA, passed away at Kindred Hospital, Rancho Cucamonga, CA after a lengthy illness. James was born in Indiana, PA to Lisle and Mary Connacher, and grew up in Clymer, PA. He was their only son; he had three sisters. During his senior high school year, James met the love of his life, Sondra Sunday, while she was working as a cashier at a grocery store. James often joked that Sondra's father begged him to marry her, or she would "throw herself from the town bridge in grief". They were married shortly after he joined the Marines. James joined the United States Marine Corps shortly after graduating high school in what would become his first career. James was a patriot who spent 20 years in the Marines. He found himself in aviation as a helicopter mechanic, which led him to being a crew chief on various helicopters. He served four tours in Vietnam, being shot down on one occasion. But luckily after evading the enemy for one night, he was rescued the following day.

During the course of his service he traveled the world, and was stationed in many countries, and for a while was assigned to the USS Boxer as a Fleet Marine with his aviation unit. While in the Marines James was recognized for his exceptional service and devotion to duty, and was selected as one of the first recipients of the Marine Corps Air Crewman Award (now an annual award recognizing exceptional Marine Corps Air Crewmen). James participated in numerous rescue operations (both military and civilian), and he received several life-saving awards, which were personally presented to him by Igor Sikorsky (the developer of the Sikorsky Helicopter). One of James' proudest moments was when General Krulak pinned his Combat Air Crew "Wings" on him after the siege at Khe Sanh. James' last duty station was Marine Corps Air Station Tustin (known as LTA for the Lighter Than Air ships that were once stationed there).

While flying over Southern California, he noticed the then small town of Corona, CA, and thought it would be a nice place for his family to settle down at the end of his final enlistment.

He retired in 1978 as a Second Lieutenant having risen through the ranks from Private. After retiring from the Marines, James began his second career working for Alcoa Aluminum at the Corona Foundry. He started on the Foundry floor, and ultimately worked his way up to the position of Foundry supervisor, where he was responsible for supervising the molding casts for various military projects including the cruise missile. After retiring from Alcoa, James, who was a licensed pilot, returned to his love of aviation keeping his hand in by working as an air frame and power mechanic for several local flight schools. He often said he did this so he could continue to fly on the cheap.

James was a long time member of the American Legion Post #0742, Corona CA. His hobbies included shooting and reloading his own ammunition (he was a lifetime member of the NRA), wood working and wood carving (he was a member of the Norco Chip Chuckers), fishing, and traveling with Sondra in their travel trailer. James had an appetite for knowledge, and loved to learn "what made things tick". For example, when he got into the sport of shooting, he wanted to know how firearms worked, so he took a gunsmith course, which led to his building several of his own firearms. He took up SCUBA diving. Not content to just learn to dive, he fashioned his own air tanks, built his own air regulator, melted and molded his own lead weight belt, and constructed his own wetsuit.

James is survived by his wife of 59 years, Sondra; his son Timothy (Pam); his daughter Tammi Meeks (Bruce); grandchildren Nikole Sanchez (Daniel), Rebecca Meeks (Jake), Christina Sesepasara (Lepe), Patrick Meeks all of Riverside, CA, and Stephanie Rust (Joseph) of Omaha, NE; and eight great grandchildren. Of all the titles James held, the ones that meant most to him were "Papa" to his grandchildren and "G-Paw" to his great grandchildren.

James was loved by his family, and will be truly missed. Graveside Services were held Wednesday, July 1st, 2020, 11:30 am Riverside National Cemetery 22495 Van Buren Blvd. Riverside, CA 92518

CAPTAIN ALPHONSO NOSAL, USMC KHE SANH VETERAN, BRAVO CO 3RD RECON

Mystic - Alphonso "Alphy" William Nosal, formerly of Somers and Mystic and most recently Scituate, Mass. died Oct. 17, 2020, after spending his last days with his family. Alphy succumbed to pneumonia after years fighting back from cancer that stole many physical things but not his love for his family and desire to live. Hard work, a great sense of humor and integrity were the hallmarks of his remarkable life. Alphy was born Dec. 13, 1943, in Enfield to Mary Maniscalci and John S. Nosal. He was the second of four boys, graduating from Enfield High School, where he was a standout athlete and later American International College in Springfield, Mass. In 1966, Alphy enlisted in the United States Marines Corps and attended Officer Candidate School at Quantico where he was commissioned as a Second Lieutenant and deployed to Vietnam in 1967. Just before shipping out to Vietnam, Alphy married his wife of almost 50 years, Ann Marie Olschafskie "Babe" also of Enfield. In Vietnam, Lt. Nosal served in combat as a platoon leader and, after being promoted to First Lieutenant, a company commander where he led his units in the battle of Khe Sanh. Alphy was honorably discharged from the Marine Corps at the rank of Captain.

Alphy had a 40-year career as a financial advisor working for the same company, known today as Morgan Stanley, in the Springfield and Harford Offices and as vice president and branch manager in Mystic. Throughout his career, Alphy was known literally as an "honest broker" and helped countless clients achieve their dreams through his financial advice and guidance. Before his battle with cancer, Alphy was an avid golfer and he remained a skilled fly fisherman and avid boater throughout his life. He and Babe traveled the world and enjoyed the company of some great friends and their extended family. Alphy was also known to be quite a "shooter" at the "Sun".

In addition to being a hero and enjoying success in life, Alphy was first and foremost a great dad instilling his sense of hard work, humor and integrity in his son and daughter. His humor, love and candid advice on all things life will be missed greatly by all those who were fortunate enough to have experienced it, especially Jed and Sarah. Nothing however compared to his love of his grandchildren who meant everything to him and kept him fighting after the toll cancer took on his body to be around to watch them grow, laugh with them and be an influence in their lives (mostly appropriate) – they are lucky to have had such a great "Pop". Finally, Alphy was also devoted to his dog, Happy, a larger than life golden doodle and faithful companion that never left his side.

Alphy is predeceased by his wife, Babe and survived by his children and their spouses, Jed M. Nosal and his wife Elaine of Milton, Mass. and Sarah E. Smith and her husband Jason of Scituate, Mass.; grandchildren, Andrew and Hannah Smith and Kiera and Oliver Nosal; three brothers, Michael Nosal and his wife Barbara of Enfield, John Stanley and Joseph Nosal, both of Briny Breezes, Fla.; his beloved in-laws, Elinor McGilvery of New London, Jeanne Young and her husband, Richard, of Longmeadow, Mass., Marylee Telford and her husband, Peter Anastas of Waterford, Francis Olschafskie and his wife, Anna Poor of Jamaica Plain, Mass.; and numerous nieces and nephews.

A graveside service with military honors was be held at 1:30 p.m. Friday, Oct. 23, at the Elm Grove Cemetery on Route 27 in Mystic. There are no calling hours. Arrangements are handled through the Mystic Funeral Home in Mystic.

OBIT

DONALD S. BROWN USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN, 81 MORTARS 1/26

BERLIN CENTER, Ohio (MyValleyTributes) – Donald S. Brown, 74, of Berlin Center, passed away unexpectedly Thursday, May 28, 2020 at his residence.

Born March 26, 1946 in Wadsworth, he was the late son of Donald I. and Elizabeth (Beres) Brown. Don grew up in Sharon Center and was a 1964 graduate of Highland High School.
He proudly served in the United States Marine Corps during Vietnam. Prior to retirement, Don was a self-employed carpenter.

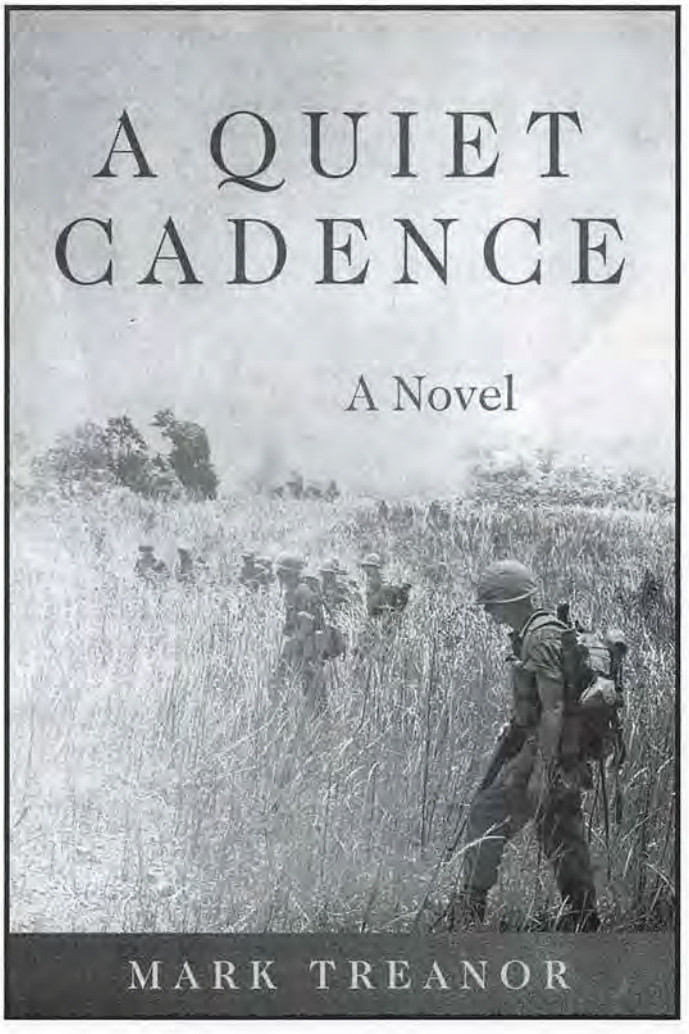
Don was a member of St. James Church. He also was a long-time member of the Berlin Township Fire Department, VFW Post 9571, the Men's Garden Club of Youngstown and a charter member of Berlin Center Historical Society. And a member of the Khe Sanh Veterans.

Don is survived by his wife of 51 years, the former Shirley Balogh; his sisters, Jolan (Henry) Silberhorn and Patricia (Robert) Witschey; many nieces and nephews and great-nieces and nephews.

Services were held and interment with military honors took place at Western Reserve National Cemetery.

BOOK REVIEW
Sometimes it takes years for a combat vet to understand what his war did to him when he was nineteen. And even longer to explain the cadence he has marched to since then to the people he loves.



Family and friends know Marty McClure as a kind, peaceful man. They aren't aware that when he was young, he plumbed the depths of terror, hatred and despair with no assurance he'd ever surface again. Now he needs to reveal what happened in Vietnam and how, with the help of Patti, his wife, Corrie Corrigan, a disabled vet, and Doc Matheson, a corpsman turned trauma surgeon, he made peace with the ghosts that have visited his dreams all these years.

With the perception and reflection of a man on the cusp of retirement from a career teaching high school kids, Marty recalls the relentless intensity of prolonged combat as a teenage Marine machine gunner facing booby traps and battles in a war with few boundaries. Arriving in Vietnam, he is appalled by the savagery of his fellow Marines as they hunt an enemy indistinguishable from the villagers he believes they are there to protect. But as friends are crippled or killed over the ensuing months, Marty has to fight not only the enemy but the vicious darkness growing in him. Wounded and sent back to the U.S., he struggles to make sense of all he has lost in a war his country abandoned. He works to become a good husband, father and teacher while he fights to bury the war and rails against friends' enthusiasm for the Memorial and the Welcome Home for Vietnam Veterans planned in D.C. Only if he accepts help from his wife and his friends will he find real peace.

DALE DYE (COMMENT)

Like a lot of other Vietnam Veterans, I've read a ton of books about our war, even written a couple myself, They generally run from mundane to gut-wrenching with most somewhere in the middle. That's why I exult when another Veteran writes a book that is such a credit to the genre like the one penned by Mark Treanor titled "A Quiet Cadence." Beyond the title, there's nothing quiet in Mark's epic work which follows one young Marine machinegunner from his first day in the Nam, through harrowing action in the mine-riddled Arizona Territory of I Corps and through his difficult adjustment at home. That's too bland a description for this wonderful book. If you're a Vietnam combat vet, you NEED to read this one. If you're a veteran of our other military operations since then, you also NEED to read this book. Treanor gets it all right and so very familiar, including the action, the characters, the conversation and the emotional toll. This author is the real deal, a platoon leader with 5th Marines circa 1969. And his book goes on top of a short stack of war novels that I will read again, and again, and again. S/F - D

BILL JAYNE (COMMENT)

I urge you to share this message on your groups and pages as appropriate and to get a copy of the book and read it when you get the chance. Thanks. As Dale Dye notes, Mark Treanor is a Naval Academy graduate who served as a Marine platoon commander in Vietnam. I've known Mark for nearly 40 years. We worked together on a nationwide volunteer program called the Vietnam Veterans Leadership Program in the early '80s. He was one of our most outstanding leaders in that program. Semper Fidelis.

DANNY R. COKER, USMC KHE SANH VETERAN BRAVO BTRY 1/13
May 22, 1947 - July 19, 2020

Danny R. Coker passed away July 19th, 202 at 73 years of age in his home in Roby Texas. He was born on May 22, 1947 in Rotan Texas to Denziel L Coker and Lucille Myrle Parsons. Danny attended Monterey High School and achieved his GED while in the military. He served in the Marine Corps from 1965-1969. While serving in Vietnam, his unit established the Khe Sanh Military Base. Danny completed the Border Patrol Academy in 1971. During his career, he served as a Border Patrol Agent and advanced to Senior Special Agent with the Federal Drug Enforcement Task Force. He retired from the Department of Justice in March 1999.

Danny was very athletic and was active in organized softball, the Law Enforcement Rodeo Association, and loved to play golf. He was a member and officer of the American Legion Post 227 in Roscoe

Texas and a lifetime member of the VFW. He was predeceased by both of his parents. Survivors include his children Wendi Fleer, Ryan Coker, and Scott Coker, his grandsons Blake and Tyler Fleer, and Cash James Coker, his brothers and sisters Donald Coker, Darlene Moore, Debbie Trotter, Davey Coker, and Della Jane Tolbert son in law Rob Fleer and daughter in law Jacqueline Coker. He is also survived by multiple nieces and nephews, Great nieces and nephews, and many friends who loved him all dearly. The family would like to thank all who helped in his care, especially Todd Coker, Amy Trotter Wilson, Crystal Coker, and Dave Coker. A memorial service will be held at a later date. OBIT

ROBERT J. PUSKAR "BOB" C/O MACTU-62 USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN

Paradise Valley - Bob Puskar, 77, of Paradise Valley, AZ passed away peacefully on August 25, 2020, with his loving wife of 48 years, Dottie, at his side as they held hands for hours. He was born in Palmerton, PA on December 17,1942, as one of three children. Bob is survived by his sister, Diane Tackas (Bernie); mother-in-law, Velma Peskuric; brother-in-law, Michael Peskuric (Timmie); and sister-in-law, Diane Brewer (Ned). He has five nieces/nephews and several grandnieces/nephews.

Bob graduated from Lansford High School as Valedictorian. He earned a Bachelor of Science Degree in Electrical Engineering from Penn State University where he also participated in ROTC (Reserved Officers Training Course). Years later, before they met, Dottie earned a Bachelor of Science Degree in Mechanical Engineering at the University of Pittsburgh. After graduating from Penn State in June 1964, Patriot Puskar was commissioned as an Officer in the United States Marine Corps. He served in Viet Nam in 1967-68 as Captain, commanding MATCU-62, First Marine Air Wing, 3rd Marine Division. He fought gallantry during the Siege of Khe Sanh and Dong Ha. He is the recipient of the Silver Star, Presidential Unit Citation, Vietnam Gallantry Cross Unit Citation, Vietnam Campaign Medal, and the National Defense Service Medal. Bob was wounded on March 25, 1968 during a Rocket Attack at Dong Ha. Patriot Puskar was awarded the Purple Heart Medal by the Commandant of the Marine Corps.

Following his military service, Bob joined the IBM Corporation, where he held many sales, marketing, and general management positions over the course of a very successful 30-year career. His Leadership positions include: Marketing Manager; Branch Manager; Western Region Manager; North America Sales & Mktg. Vice-President for IBM Printing Systems Company; and Vice-President of New Markets, IBM Global Technology Group, an $8 Billion business unit. While at IBM, he participated in extensive IBM general management, finance, sales, and product education conducted by the Harvard Business School.

After retiring from IBM, Patriot Puskar became CEO of two startup software companies: Rule Base in Scottsdale, AZ; and Beta Sphere in Palo Alto, CA. Bob is currently the founder, owner, and CEO of R&D Ventures, Inc, focused on asset management, equities, options, and commodities trading activities.

His involvement in the MOPH, Dept. of Arizona was extraordinary as an Officer: Adjutant 2004-8; AZ State Cmdr. 2008-11; Patriot Puskar was elected to four National Officer positions: Region VI Cmdr. 2011-13; National Jr. Vice Cmdr. 2013-14; Sr. Vice Cmdr. 2014-15. Bob was unanimously elected as MOPH National Commander 2015-16. Since then he has been serving as Past National Cmdr. The organization known as the "Military Order of the Purple Heart of the USA" was formed in 1932 for the protection and mutual interest of all combat wounded veterans and active duty men and women who have received the decoration. The MOPH is unique among Veteran Service Organizations in that all its members - from all branches of the Military - were wounded in combat, fighting in all Wars from the present going back to 1932. For this sacrifice, they were awarded the Purple Heart Medal. This Organization promotes Patriotism, Fraternalism, and Preservation of America's Military history. Most importantly, they provide comfort and assistance to all Veterans and their families, those who are homeless, disabled, and those requiring employment assistance. Other programs include: JROTC Leadership Award, Scholarships, Welfare, and numerous community service programs.

Memorial Visitation Was held at Messenger Indian School Mortuary on Wednesday, 9/9 from 2-6 PM. On Thursday, 9/10, at 10 AM, a Funeral Mass will be held by Blessed Sacrament Catholic Church, 11300 N. 64th Street, Scottsdale. Interment at National Memorial Cemetery followed..

OBIT

VINCENT BEGAY, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN A CO 1/26

Vincent W. Begay passing. A 1/26. "My friend and comrade Vincent W. Begay has passed on to meet his maker. Vince was in my squad on the North side of the east end of the runway during the siege of Khe Sanh. After the siege, we were in 2nd platoon "A" company 1stBn. 26th Marines together.

It was an honor to be able to talk to Vince two weeks ago. He showed great courage and told me he was thankful for his family and wonderful life. He said he did not fear dying and meeting his God. As chaplain of the Khe Sanh Veterans, I offer the following prayer and scripture for US Marine Vincent W. Begay and those who love him;

O Loving God, please be with us as we honor the life of one who served our nation, for Vince has been taken from our midst and is now in your care. We are pained by the gap in our lives. Yet love is stronger than death; (Song of Songs 8:6) the bonds love creates are eternal. And ours is the blessing of memory, through which the lives of our departed continue to be with us.

Please accept our prayers on behalf of Vince. May he rest in peace, and may light perpetual shine upon him. Please look with mercy upon those among us, family, friends, and comrades, who are bereaved by this passing. Please comfort and console us all with your presence and tenderness. In Christ Jesus' name we pray Amen" Ron Ronald Howard Rayner

This brave woman came to Khe Sanh. She was a freelance reporter from Europe. She is pictured interviewing some Marines who were only too glad to be interviewed. Not only was she the only woman ever to be there, she was quite beautiful and courageous as well. She sent a pallet of Easter eggs to us after she left with a shrapnel wound in her rear end. They were all dyed olive drab. She saw first hand how we lived there , and had love and compassion for us. We will always remember her and her contribution to our morale! God Bless Her.

WRITINGS FROM THE KSV BOARD FROM A NEW MEMBER

Board: Thomas O'Grady

The Khe Sanh Message Board and now this Facebook site that Mike Fishbaugh has developed has brought many of us together. It gives us the opportunity to connect with others, meet people with similar experiences, bitch, argue, vent and most of all realize that we are not alone in this journey. You won't be judged about your writing ability, errors, mistakes or misstatements. Write and share your thoughts and feelings, welcome to the brotherhood, we are all "Eternally Bounded"

I just want to thank all of you who have kicked in on my posts. I appreciate all of you and your input. It means a lot to me. I have not really spoken at any length about my time with you at Khe Sanh or the times after out in the field on our seemingly endless search and destroy missions. I'm finding memories that I had stashed away in the depths of my mind. I spent a lot of time putting them there. Now I'm finding that I need to relate those things somehow and get some kind of release from some of the depression that comes with the kind of experiences that we shared over there. I've not been on the net very long so I'm still muddling around. If I make any errors that are questionable to any of you I apologize in advance if I have done so already I apologize here and now. I value my status among you and would not intentionally jeopardize it.
Thanks Marines. Very much.

I just would like to say that this site is a great asset to me personally. I assume it it's the same for a great number of us. I've been a member of the Association for awhile now and have never until now had any real Contact with others from the Battle. It is a pleasure and a privilege to be able to do so. I have all the same demons hounding me as the rest of us who endured and survived. I'm trying to put them in their place and tame them.

I have many memories that are as clear as crystal and some that are dim and hard to put a time and place on. This is an issue with me and causes much frustration and anxiety. I'm retired and disabled and find myself with an inordinate amount of time on my hands and I'm trying to stay ahead of the game surviving 'Retirement'. This site has given me a way to reach out and actually touch bases with guys that actually shared that space of time and real estate with me. I find it very helpful in many ways. So if I sound Gung Ho about stuff its because I am. Those words have meaning, both literally and figuratively. I'm interested in all and any input that you guys have to offer. I offer mine spontaneously and candidly. If any of you have recommendations for sources or books I might be interested in I would like to hear about them. I have read a lot of books but not nearly all that are available. I do not use a stockpile of Info as I'm not good at that kind of thing. So having specifics in front if me is not in play. I'm just trying to put it together in my head. I throw out a question about something that has come into my mind and hope that it has value. Not just to me but to my Brothers as well. SF

My late husband Ken found being a member of the KSV group was extremely helpful, comforting, and one of the best things for him to help deal with his memories of life during the time he spent being a Marine during Vietnam. I hope you find some of the same things for yourself. God bless you all.

ANOTHER GATHERING OF KHE SANH MARINES AT TOM HORCHLERS FARM ON SUNDAY AUGUST 09, 2020 IN CHEROKEE, CALIFORNIA

Tom is just one of those fine Marines to which others are drawn. When visiting I never know who is going to be present or will just show up. Tom looks forward to sharing 17 years of his food and beverage experience by always hosting and cooking gourmet meals for everyone. Besides being overserved, we sit around and watch sports on television, talk about our experiences from long years past, remember those who are no longer with us and work on solving the world's problems, if only others would listen to us and take our advice. Who would have thought 50 some years ago after serving at the Khe Sanh Combat Base, we would still be around this day to share stories about our adventures and mishaps, along with a very few mistakes in judgment?

L to R: Kenneth Soerensen (A/1/13, FO 1/26), David Tonick (A/1/26 Guns), Larry Brooks (I/3/3), Craig Tourte (HQ. 1/13), Tom Horchler (HQ. 1/13), Borlaug (I/3/3).

I had a wonderful day with these two Grandsons and their parents. Both of these guys have done two Spartan races to date and they love the challenge! I love them both very much.

LEARNED LESSON # 1

SHIT HAPPENS ... AND RELIGION DOESN'T HELP.

My mother tried to raise me "right." She made me go to church. I served as local and district president of my high' school youth group. When I went to Vietnam, I was Protestant lay-leader for my company. At Khe Sanh, it was a target rich environment; I killed many of them and held some of ours as they died. Then came the day that I lost two friends. I have heard it said, "a thousand deaths can be a statistic. One death can be a tragedy". It all depends on the degree of relationship. Having a person die in your arms feels like a part of you goes with them. That night through tears, I made a vow to NEVER again have friends - or feelings.

LEARNED LESSON #2

IT'S EASY TO GIVE UP ON GOD.

After all, if God is supposed to be real, if God is supposed to be totally in control, if God is supposed to be love then:
*Why did He let good men die?
*why didn't He let me die with my friends? WHY ?
*Why weren't we allowed to fight to win?
*Why weren't we respected by our own families, our own friends, our own country?
*Why were we called "baby killers" (when our own nation sanctioned abortion the same year the war ended)?
*Why was it so hard to forgive and to forget?
* Why have I often done the very things I hated?

LEARNED LESSON # 3

THERE ARE MANY TIME WE COULD HAVE,SHOULD HAVE BEEN WIPED OUT.

You have your stories. I have mine.
Guys right next to me, killed, and I didn't have a scratch. Blown down three separate times from blasts - and never a scratch. Car wrecks, never a scratch. Financial wrecks, and I survive. Marriage wrecks, and still together.

Waaaay beyond statistical probability.
Waaaay beyond my control.

What about you?
How often should you have been wiped out? Why are you still alive?
Bet it's beyond your smarts and beyond your strength. But you know, despite all the wrecks and close calls, somebody has been covering you.
And WHO is that somebody?

LEARNED LESSON # 4

AT 18 YEARS OLD, YOU'RE FULL OF PISS & VINEGAR AND DESIGNED FOR ADVENTURE.

I was born into a rodeo and ranching family. With that background went lots of responsibility and independent experiences early in life. But I wanted more. I probably watched too many John Wayne movies and combat looked like the ultimate passage into manhood. So, at 18, I enlisted in the United States Marine Corps, the ultimate fighting machine.

LEARNED LESSON # 5

IF SOMETHING BLOCKS OUR WAY, WE FIND A WAY AROUND IT.

It was 1966 and the war in Vietnam was heating up. I got 'stuck' in an intense training role for over a. year. I kept trying to get to combat - - but no luck. Finally, I called a United States Senator, he "encouraged" the Corps to let me deploy. I extended my enlistment because I was a short-timer.

LEARNED LESSON # 6

GAMES AND MOVIES CAN'T CONVEY VIDEO WHAT WAR REALLY IS.

Only when you've actually experienced the real thing can you know. And then, you can't find the words to convey to others that haven't been there what war really is like, so you isolate. It's also funny that ten guys in the same firefight can have 15 different perspectives on what happened. The noise, the smells, the blood, the adrenaline overwhelm the boundaries of normal experience

LEARNED LESSON # 7

WHEN YOU KILL PEOPLE AND WHEN CLOSE FRIENDS ARE KILLED, IT DESTROYS A PART OF YOUR SOUL.

In combat I started killing people and it was like hunting deer back on the ranch in South Dakota.

As our guys were killed, I'd go over to "Graves Registration" and "borrow" their now-surplus weapons for my men. But, when a number of men that reported directly to me were killed, killing the enemy became very personal and I started to kill with HATE and PASSION and JOY. And I became something I never before could have imagined

LEARNED LESSON # 8

WE FEEL GOD CAN'T FORGIVE US FOR WHAT WE HAVE DONE.

I did not FEEL guilty about killing the enemy. I de- humanized them. They were killing our guys. They were trying to kill me. I'd been raised on the ranch where hunting and killing was a normal part of life. In my mind, the enemy soldiers were just animals that needed to be killed. But, when I started losing friends and losing guys under my command, it became personal, and I transitioned from cold to cruel and started joyfully and systematically killing people we weren't supposed to kill.

LEARNED LESSON # 9

WE FEEL RESPONSIBLE WHEN OTHERS DIE.

I didn't know it was called, "SURVIVORS' GUILT". Guys better than me. They're dead. I'm alive.

LEARNED LESSON # 10
IT'S EASY TO BECOME ADDICTED TO RISK.

I Began taking crazy risks. And didn't care if I was killed

Because I was ashamed to still be alive, I started to do stupid and risky things. I passed up a chance to leave for R & R. When I was finally shot and told I was being sent back to the states, I begged the doctor to let me stay.

* The fight was MY fight.
* Those men were my men.
* And the enemy was MINE yet to be killed.

LEARNED LESSON # 11
LIFE AFTER COMBAT IS FRUSTRATING, CONFUSING & VERY DIFFICULT.

One-minute you're in a life-threatening, life-changing, adrenaline-rush action leading a high-performance team in a well-defined mission with the highest stakes ... and the next minute you're selling "crap" and mowing the grass in your spare time.

LEARNED LESSON # 12
YOU DON'T KNOW WHAT YOU DON'T KNOW.

I was engaged to Liz prior to deployment. And we were married while I was still in the hospital- but neither she nor I had a clue how much I had changed. It was years after combat before I finally began putting a name to life after combat, Post Traumatic Stress Disorder. I controlled things reasonably well. Yet on rare occasions I'd have a blowout - - and only by God's grace did I not kill anyone, including myself. (Though He knows I tried like hell several times.)

LEARNED LESSON # 13
YOU HAVE TO MOVE ON.

You aren't the king.

You're not in control of everything as much as you'd like to be. Especially when your time is up or you have a medical discharge, you have to move on.

LEARNED LESSON # 14
YOU WANT CONTROL. COMPLETE CONTROL OVER EVERYTHING.

Totally 'greased' by three incoming rounds. Immobile. Held together by wires.
Using a bed pan.
Unable to walk or use my hands.
Life looked HOPELESS. Especially when a doctor told me to accept the fact that I'd never be able to use my hands or walk again.
I was no longer in control.
Previously, I watched officers and politicians make stupid decisions that got good men killed.
And though I kept trying to have complete control over everything, I had to finally accept that control is merely an illusion.

LEARNED LESSON # 15
YOU STILL LOOK FOR RISK.

Is it the chemical fix of the adrenaline rush? Whatever it is, you're hyper-alert, living with a hair trigger, out there looking for meaningless sex, the fastest car, the biggest business deals, the stupidest fights.

LEARNED LESSON # 16
PEOPLE DON'T RUN TO PLEASURE. THEY RUN FROM PAIN.

No, the primary reason we overdose on booze, gambling, business, drugs, adultery isn't because those things are so great (especially when they each have a negative consequence). The main motivator is some pain in our past that we seem incapable of relieving, so we grab a cheap and fast pleasure to medicate to try and cover over the hurt.

LEARNED LESSON # 17
MY PLEASURE COMES AT OTHER'S EXPENSE

If anyone had caused my wife a tenth of the pain that I caused her, I would have killed them.
Hurt people, hurt people

LEARNED LESSON # 18
SOME BECAME "DOWN-AND-OUT".

After the military - some isolated.
Some became wild.
Some became reclusive.
Some became drunks.
Some had multiple divorces.
Some couldn't hold a job.
Some looked for bar fights.
Some did drugs.

LEARNED LESSON # 19
SOME BECAME "UP-AND-OUT".

And the world called them, "down and outers".
After the military - some apply their intensity to becoming socially successful. Business leaders, always on the go. Trying hard to be successful in certain areas because other areas of life are a total wreck. Whether "down-and-out" or "up-and-out" ... out is still out. A mess is still a mess! A gold-plated turd is still a turd!

LEARNED LESSON # 20
NOTHING COULD FILL THE 'EMPTY' INSIDE

So, moving up and out, this veteran got a master's degree in business and became a millionaire. Youngest president of different organizations by decades! Hoorah! Do I drive the Corvette or the Lincoln today? The governor just named a day for me as our highest decorated Vietnam Vet.

Whoever says sin isn't fun hasn't done some of the things I've done; hasn't had the toys and experiences I've had. But nothing gave any lasting peace or contentment. Nothing filled up the hole inside.

LEARNED LESSON # 21
SO, YOU TRY HARDER AND TRY MORE

I lied to myself.
Yes, all the 'stuff' and experiences did make me happy. For two hours. Or two days. But then I was like an addict - and would need another 'hit' so I'd try something bigger, faster, riskier.

LEARNED LESSON # 22
COMBAT VETS DON'T TRUST OTHERS.

I could play the 'game' to get what I wanted -- but on the inside, I was critical, suspicious, a loner -- who, under pressure would attack.

LEARNED LESSON # 23
WHEN OTHERS LAUGH -I DON'T, AND WHEN THEY DON'T -I DO.

Combat changes your perspective.
Gotta be MACHO.
No tears.
Stuff your feelings.
Did that work? No.
Frankly, you gotta feel it to heal it!

LEARNED LESSON # 24
IF THEY HAVEN'T BEEN THERE- THEY CAN'T UNDERSTAND.

So, it's easy to isolate. And not feel.
Except when you are alone. And remember

LEARNED LESSON # 25
DEPRESSION IS REAL.
THOUGHTS OF SUICIDE ARE REAL.

I felt,
"Nobody cares". "Nobody understands".
"I've been abandoned". 'Nothing is going to change".
For a lie to work, it has to have an element of truth. Yes, my physical pain was real.
Two guys pulled me off the battlefield. Pumped full of drugs, I'm flown to a surgical facility and then it's months of pain, operations, therapy, neglect ... and none of my family ever visited once.

LEARNED LESSON # 26
MY PLEASURE COMES AT OTHER"S EXPENSE

It's easy to consider suicide, murder, adultery, stealing, lying. Try NOT to think of the word 'elephant' for five seconds. -It's impossible. Try NOT to ever think about the friends that have been killed. Try not to ever think about the people that have screwed you over. Try not to think about all the hurtful crap you've done to others. Depression can be a chemical imbalance but generally it is anger turned inward.

LEARNED LESSON # 27
THE SOUL IS SEPARATE FROM THE BODY

Navy surgeons began piecing my body back together. But nobody addressed the wounds to my mind, will, emotions..

LEARNED LESSON # 28
WE JUDGE PEOPLE BY WHAT THEY DO, NOT WHAT THEY SAY.

To medicate my pain and prove to the world I was "somebody", I decided to build a BIG house. One day I saw some excellent brick work on another house, so I hunted up the contractor.

LEARNED LESSON # 29
WE GET SURPRISES ALONG THE WAY

After we'd gone through the house plans, the brick man says, "Hey, I made a trip to the Holy Land and have some pictures. You want to see them"? He didn't know of my religious background, or that I'd gone to church, and learned Bible verses in Sunday School. I had actually read the Bible cover-to-cover at least twice.

LEARNED LESSON # 30
RELIGION ISN'T THREATENING-BUT A PERSONAL RELATIONSHIP WITH GOD IS.

As we looked at his pictures, he asked me some easy questions:
"Do you believe in God"? To have a creation means you must have a Creator, so I said, " I do believe there is a God".
Next, he asked, "Do you believe in Jesus, born of a virgin, died on a cross, rose from the dead"?
I don't believe in the Easter Bunny or Santa Claus, but I told him I did believe those things about Jesus.
Then he asked, "Ken, if you were to die tonight, what would happen? Heaven? Or hell"? I told him I thought I'd probably go to heaven. After all, I wasn't killing people anymore and gave lots of money to various community projects. I figured if your good outweighed your bad, then you were "in".

LEARNED LESSON # 31
CONFRONTING TRUTH IS A SHOW-STOPPER

Then he asked, "Do you know that you can know whether it's heaven or hell"? And, when I had that deer-in-the-headlights look, the brick man pulled out a Bible and showed me I John 5:11-13 ..
"And this is what God has testified: He has given us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. Whoever has the Son has life; whoever does not have God's Son does not have life. I have written this to you who believe in the name of the Son of God, so that you may KNOW you have eternal life".

WOW! "... that you may know?"
I didn't know. And, if I didn't know for sure, then this said I was going to hell!

LEARNED LESSION # 32
I'D BEEN TAUGHT BY MY DAD'S ACTIONS AND MARINE CORPS TRAINING TO RUN TO TROUBLE

If there was a problem, get there fast to get control quick. And, the bigger the risk, the bigger the reward. But now, here's a guy with mere words, and I want to get out of there!

THANK YOU &
GOODBYE

LEARNED LESSON # 33
NONE OF US WANTS TO BE PUSHED OR MANIPULATED

The brick man didn't try to push me. Instead, he asked, "Do you have a Bible at home?" I said, "yes". "If I write some verses down, will you look them up"? I said I would. I went home, pulled out a Bible and read those verses.

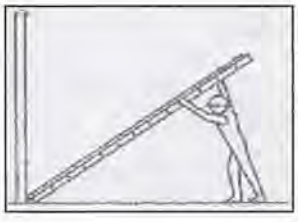
LEARNED LESSON # 34
YOU DON'T NEED SPARE TIRE,UNTIL YOU HAVE A BLOW OUT

* Romans 3:10 ... No one is righteous-not even one.
* Romans 3:23 Everyone has sinned; we all fall short of God's glorious standard.
* Romans 5:8 ... God showed His great love for us by sending Christ to die for us while we were still sinners.
* Romans 5:12 When one man, Adam sinned, sin entered the world. Adam's sin brought death, so death spread to everyone, for everyone sinned.
* Romans 6:23 For the wages of sin is death, but the free gift of God is eternal life through Christ Jesus our lord.

*Romans 10:9-11 If you openly declare that Jesus is lord and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, you will be saved. For it is by believing in your heart that you are made right with God, and it is by openly declaring your faith that you are saved .... anyone who trusts in him will never be disappointed.

*Romans 10:13 Anyone who calls on the name of the lord will be saved. I'd seen them all before. But before I'd always felt "in Control," working my own agenda. Now I had to acknowledge my agenda wasn't working.

LEARNED LESSON# 35
ALL THE "STUFF" WE HAVE, CAN'T MAKE US HAPPY



For the first time in my life, I stopped to realize I'd climbed my little "ladder of success" but the sucker was leaning against the wrong building! Others would have given their right gonad to have what I had but NOTHING I had was giving me lasting satisfaction ... No peace. No contentment.

LEARNED LESSON # 36
YOU SURRENDER WHEN YOU DON"T HAVE ANY OTHER OPTIONS.

And I finally gave up.
Got down on my knees and said, "God, I've really screwed up. I'm sorry for what I've done. Please forgive me and come in and take over my life".

LEARNED LESSON # 37
FEELINGS ARE LIARS

That was the sincerest prayer man can pray, but I felt nothing.
And, I thought, God forgives sin, but I'm such a bad sinner, He won't forgive me. That night, I cried. I hadn't cried for over 10 years. I hadn't cried since those first two close friends were killed and I'd made that vow to never have close friends or feelings again.
Only later did a guy that I respected share with me, "Ken, you can't put your faith in your feelings. You have to put your trust into God's Word".

LEARNED LESSON # 38
GOD CAN'T FORGIVE ME.

If people knew what I've done - - if they knew what I'm thinking -- they'd lock me up.
But God knows. Always has. And He had His Son, Jesus, pay the penalty for my sin on the cross, that I might have forgiveness of my sin and be right with of God.
So, when I say, God can't forgive my sin", that is really quite prideful on my part. The creator of the universe, He hung the stars in the sky, raised the dead. He suffered on the cross and rose from the dead for you and me. Yet we say, "He can't forgive my sin"? That's exactly WHY He came" He knew ahead of time whatour sins would be. Jesus still paid our penalty on the cross for our sins that we would have forgiveness and be made right with God.

The New Testament book of Romans, chapter 8 verses 1-2 say, "Those who belong to Christ Jesus are no longer under God's judgment. Because of what Christ Jesus has done, you are free. You are now controlled by the law of the Holy Spirit who gives you life. The law of the Spirit frees you from the law of sin that brings death.
Wow, stop and reread those verses again!

LEARNED LESSON # 39
I AM WHAT I PUT INTO MY MIND

This guy, the brick layer / mentor, that I respected began to show me things out of the Bible that I'd never thought of before.
I was a successful business guy, with a master's degree in business, but I had no clue the Bible talks more about money and business than it talks about heaven and hell!
Slowly, I began to learn and apply Biblical principles to my business, my marriage, to raising our kids, to working with other people.

LEARNED LESSON # 40
WE ALL WANT TO LIVE A LIFE OF PURPOSE AND IMPACT

The three classic questions of life are:

Where did I come from?

Why am I here?

Where am I going?

As I learned Biblical principles, through reading the Bible, I began to find those answers.

And, my life started to change BIG TIME.

LEARNED LESSON # 41
GOD DOESN'T WASTE PAIN.

I often don't understand or like what God is doing, but I need the faith of the little boy that walks into the room full of horse manure and starts to giggle cuz he knows there's a pony in there somewhere.

Bottom line: I've learned God is totally IN CONTROL & has my best long-term interests at heart. So, the issue never is what has happened or is happening or will happen. Instead the primary issue always is,

"How will I respond"?

And when I know the character of God and His love for me - - even when it's painful or doesn't make human sense - - I can STI LL give Him THAN KS and keep walking forward in faith.

LEARNED LESSON #42
MARINATE

Life is like two dogs fighting. There's a good dog and a bad dog - and they are really going at it.

Which dog wins?

It's the one you feed.

We are in the middle of a war between God's Holy Spirit and the Satan's unholy spirit. I MUST CONTINUE TO DAILY MARINATE - soak, in God's word, the Bible, to have the scriptural and responsive "flavor" of Christ. Every day I read my Bible plus I also use several other daily devotionals. This constant war, called life, feels like dying. And, it is. To the old "self".

LEARNED LESSON # 43
TO HAVE SOMETHING 'NEW' I NEED TO GIVE UP THE 'OLD.

You can drive trucks over a concrete highway and the road surface isn't hurt but if that same concrete is freshly poured and someone walks across it, those footprints are there forever.

Many of us were damaged before we went into the military. Then, when we were young and in combat, all those experiences were deeply impressed into our souls and some of those memories and consequences continue to be "speed bumps" many years later.

To avoid the pain, we try to deaden the feelings and fill our lives with experiences, relationships, things that make us forget. But nothing heals the deep scars. In fact - - like a pothole in a highway - - over time the damage just goes deeper and gets bigger and we (and those around us) continue to be impacted.

So, we try harder to forget. We try harder to medicate. But that only causes us to move further from our true self.

True Self? What's that?

Our true self is what we were designed to be but those potholes, ruts, pains have scarred and fractured that image.

And as we reflect, we realize some of that damage actually began before we ever joined the military. Back when we were really "fresh cement"' and very impressionable.

We know a mark of insanity is to continue doing what hasn't worked yet hoping for different results. So, what to do? How can we find and regain our "true self"?

Everybody has to make their own decisions and live with their own consequences but if you are not satisfied with how life is working, I'm glad you are taking time to consider my failures and how Christ is helping me heal and grow.

LEARNED LESSON # 44
IT'S OKAY TO BE MAD AT GOD

My dad was a hard ass. He made drill instructors look like high school cheerleaders. He's the first that I heard get mad at God when he said. "Look, if there was a God, He wouldn't have let us be so poor I'd have to watch my two brothers die because we couldn't afford medical help".

It took me a long time to realize my dad believed in God. After ail, you must believe He exists if you're going to be pissed at Him. And I became exactly like my dad when I didn't feel God lived up to my expectations.

So, I walked away from God and religion for ten years.

LEARNED LESSON # 45
WE ARE GREATLY INFLUENCED BY OUR PARENTS AND OUR ANCESTORS.

For over 70 years my family has been in the professional rodeo business. We breed horses to buck because we know those traits are passed on to the following generations. We humans know the same thing is true, so we say things like, "you're just like your old man," or "the apple doesn't fall far from the tree".

As a kid, I said to myself, "I will not be like my dad".

And I became exactly like him

You didn't choose your skin color or where you were born or your body type. Those physical details were chosen for you. Yes, you picked up some positive mental, emotional, relational, habitual propensities from your ancestors. And you picked up some negative ones too.

Did you know the Bible says the sins of the fathers are passed onto the third and fourth generations?

So how are you and I going to process and improve upon what we have inherited?

And, what kind of legacy are you and I leaving for our kids and the generations to come?

LEARNED LESSON # 46
YOU GOTTA FORGIVE

Unforgiveness causes bitterness and is like eating rat poison and waiting for the other person to die.

Hate is a cancer in the soul.

We can be very critical of certain people, but the person we are toughest on is ourselves. When I understand how Christ forgave all my sins at the cross, then I need to also forgive myself. And I can begin to give others that same grace that I've received.

LEARNED LESSON # 47
BEING 'BORN AGAIN' GETS YOU INTO HEAVEN-BUT YOU CAN STILL LIVE IN 'HELL' ON PLANET EARTH.

You don't have an "up" without a "down."
You don't have an "in" without an "out."
You don't have a "right" without a "left."
You don't have a "Holy" without an "unholy."
Yes, there really is an "unholy spirit", and he HATES those that God loves. The unholy is powerful and loves to deceive, divide and destroy.

LEARNED LESSON # 48
THE REAL ENEMY IS SATAN.

And when you know his strategies and limitations, you can KICK HIS BUTT.
Our battle is not against the deceived.
Our battle is against the deceiver.

LEARNED LESSON # 49
THE TEMPTATION TO SIN NEVER GOES AWAY.

Satan has an I.Q. of 20,000+ and he knows where we are vulnerable and when to attack.
Please consider the acronym HALT.
Because that is when we are most susceptible to' cave to our temptation.

HUNGRY, ANGRY
LONELY. TIRED.

Forewarned is forearmed. So, I must constantly watch my physical needs while marinating in Christ.

LEARNED LESSON # 50
IN COMBAT YOU HAVE TO WEAR YOUR ARMOR

My body was shredded. My VA disabilities total 260% but I'm alive and function because of my protective gear. My helmet was blown off and I still have shrapnel in my head. My arms were ripped, but my flak jacket protected my torso. My leg had a huge hole in it, but my gonads were protected because I had flak panties on. A boot was blown off. I was a mess. And I'm incredibly stupid because when I finally surrendered to Christ it was years before I finally understood that I need to daily put on my spiritual armor to prepare for the spiritual battle, led by Satan facing me each day. Now, daily AND audibly, I put on the belt of truth, the breastplate of righteousness, the preparation of the gospel of peace, the shield of faith, the helmet of salvation, and the sword of His Holy Spirit. I don't leave home without getting dressed in my spiritual armor found in Ephesians chapter 6 in the Bible's New Testament. If you want more information on how to daily protect yourself against this war, email kkorkow@ptgi.us.com. to request the Spiritual Warfare card.

LEARNED LESSON # 51
THE VA AND MANY OTHER WELL-MEANING ORGANIZATIONS ARE OFTEN INEFFECTIVE.

They offer recreation. They offer job training. They offer group counseling. They offer medication. But these are the equivalent of putting a sugar pill on the tongue of a patient. Our military will try just about anything to deal with suicides, divorces, drug and alcohol abuse, etc. - - anything EXCEPT GOD.
If you're a "wounded warrior" you can take yoga, go on hunting and fishing trips, be in group counseling, get drugs - - all free. Recent articles indicate the military has spent money testing a nose spray using the illegal drug ecstasy and now the most recent article talks about using marijuana to help wounded warriors overcome combat stress.
Problem is - - IT'S NOT WORKING!
Only by surrendering to Christ can a person actually experience healing and growth beyond the challenges of military service. God has a monopoly on what truly heals and gives growth.

LEARNED LESSON # 52
THERE ARE TWO KINDS OF GUILT

False guilt.
And valid guilt.
False guilt comes from the unholy spirit.
Valid guilt comes from the Holy Spirit.

Problem is—they both feel the same

So, we have to back up, consider the facts, see where the guilt-feeling would take us and then over-ride our 'feelings' with God's Truth. I didn't feel guilty about those I killed in combat. But I did kill some we weren't supposed to kill. And I'm forever thankful my sin was covered at the cross.

LEARNED LESSON # 53
YOU GOTTA KNOW THE ENEMY"S STRATEGY

Satan's strategy is very simple:

deceive, divide, destroy.

So, the unholy spirit (Satan) desires that false guilt us to a sense of discouragement and isolation - - which is easily done when we feel we are alone without a bunch of "godly buddies" for mutual counsel and encouragement.
When it's valid guilt the Holy Spirit desires we stop, confess and clean up the mess to get back on track with Him.

Reality is that life can feel lonely and God can seem distant, but we are NEVER ALONE because the Lord will NEVER FORSAKE US. And the antidote is to audibly rebuke Satan and his followers in the Name of the Lord Jesus Christ, telling them to go where Christ tells them to go, and to stay there with their deceptions.
When I face problems and challenges, I need to commit the outcome to the Lord with the recognition that He sees around corners, over hills and into the future. He will divinely guide me to the Best Outcome. 50, I make the best "faith decisions" I know and then go forward trusting the results to Him.

LESSON LEARNED # 54
REALITY IS THE WAR CONTINUES.

We expended effort going down the wrong path. Now it will take effort to reverse course and gain ground going in the right direction.

1.Daily submit to God - simply talk to Him every day.
2 Daily read the Bible. A good place to start is in the book of John and then Acts, both found in the New Testament using a Bible version translated in today's modern language.

Online Apps: BibleGateway.org or Read5cripture.org
Once downloaded, search "Book of John."
Hardcopy Bible: please let me know, I'll send you one- free.

LEARNED LESSON # 55
OTHERS HAVE HELPED ME, SO, I'M AVAILABLE TO HELP YOU.

I'm no guru. I still make mistakes. But Christ doesn't. And while I'm available to answer questions, your best source while continuing to marinate in His words - the Bible, is to ask the Lord to help you to find someone that is willing to come along side you to help you understand God's words and to guide you in this new life with Christ.

VOLUNTEER VETERANS INSTALL HONOR BELL AT THE VIETNAM VETERANS MEMORIAL IN ANGEL FIRE

the August 14-17 weekend, members of the Marines Motorcycle Club of Northern New Mexico volunteered their time to install a Freedom Bell at the DVS-managed Vietnam Veterans Memorial in Angel Fire.

The group raised more than $5,000 to design the bell-with approval by DVS. The group then purchased the bell, prepared the ground, poured cement, laid surrounding bricks, installed the bell and commemorative plaque, and applied a "finish" coat. The group donated the bell for use at ceremon ies at the Memorial.
The plaque, which is surrounded by emblems representing our nation's five military service branches, reads "This Honor Bell is presented to the New Mexico Department of Veterans Services Vietnam Veterans Memorial, with respect for the David Westphall Veterans Foundation, on behalf of the Marines Motorcycle Club, 2020. Our comrades may be gone, but they shall never be forgotten, Semper Fidelis!

THANK YOU

KHE SANH VETERANS, INC. SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION - 2020-21

The Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. Scholarship Foundation is now in its twelfth successful year of providing financial support for children and grandchildren of paid up members of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc.

In 2009 the KSV Scholarship Foundation started with 6 applicants and has risen to an average of 25 applicants each of the last three years. Many of the student scholars have finished 4 years of post secondary education to successfully achieve their selected bachelors degrees due in part to the support from Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc ..

In this, the 2020-21 school year, we have received 12 applicants for a grand tally of 184 young scholars in 11 years who have benefitted from the KSV Scholarship Fund. Over $110,000 in generous donations from the Khe Sanh Veterans Brotherhood and proceeds from the reunion silent auctions have kept the Foundation healthy. However, the individual awards have trended lower due to the increased volume of applicants vs. reduced donation levels.

The Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. Scholarship Foundation is committed to keeping the program healthy and going forward for all students who meet the eligibility guidelines printed in the RED CLA Y newsletter. We ask for your continued financial support.

Dan Fisher, Scholarship Chairman

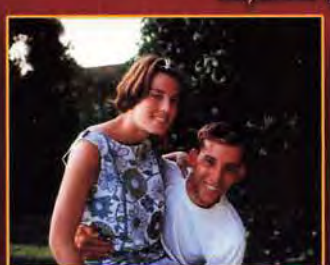
Half Way Point

For Better or For Worse

In Sickness and In Health

Two are better than one.

Because they have a good reward for their labor. For if they fall, one will lift up his companion. But woe to him who is alone when he falls, For he has no one to help him up. Again, if two lie down together, they will keep warm; But how can one be warm alone? Though one may be overpowered by another, two can withstand him. And a threefold cord is not quickly broken.



OBIT

William R. "Bill" Cron, 73, was born March 15, 1948, and returned to heaven April 16, 2021.

In the years between he lived a wonderful life. He had an idyllic childhood in rural Belleville, provided by his loving parents, the late William E (Bill) and Marjorie (nee Johnson) Cron.

He joined the United States Marine Corps, surviving Khe Sanh, Vietnam siege and the Tet Offensive. Becoming a Marine was one of the defining moments of his life.

Bill returned home to achieve status of Journeyman Carpenter and was a member of The Brotherhood of Carpenters. He also enjoyed truck driving, bus driving and being a greens keeper.

After retiring he enjoyed volunteering and traveling throughout the United states. Accompanying him on these journeys was his adoring wife of 40 years Jeri C. Cron (nee Wetmore.). Finally he settled in Hecker.

Bill was proud of his son by marriage Ronald "Ronnie" Reed (Susan) of Collinsville and loved seeing his grandchildren Chelsey Reed of Collinsville and Emily Dively (Cory) of Moro, along with the great-grandchildren Caleb and Cooper Dively of Moro.

Bill's little sister Gwen Flach (nee Cron) was his biggest fan. He so loved her and her children, his niece Jennifer Flach and nephew Matthew Flash (Alyssa) both of Belleville and their children Andrew Flach and Clara Flach.

Bill was born again Christian and tried to live his life by the teachings of Jesus. He was so grateful to be a member of the New Life Church in Waterloo – the prayers of friends and church family have sustained him though difficult times.

He was buried April 22 in Jefferson Barracks National Cemetery, St. Louis.

OBIT

SOERENSEN,THOMAS K., USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN, A BTRY 1/13, ALPHA 6 F/O TEAM, I CO 3/26

Thomas K. Soerensen
March 17, 1941 – May 3, 2021

Thomas K. Soerensen, longtime resident of Oroville, California, died at his home early on May 3, 2021 at age 80, after a more than 4 years-long battle with cancer.

Thomas was born in Poznan (German-occupied Poland), on March 17, 1941, to Edward and Anna Soerensen.

In January of 1945 Thomas and his mother, along with his older siblings Karin, Klaus and George, were forced to flee their home country from advancing Russian forces. His father was away at the time, serving in the German military, but he miraculously found them, and they fled to Bavaria where the American military forces had liberated Germany. Thereafter they lived in several displaced persons camps in Northern Germany. His youngest brother, George, was born in 1946. Eventually, the Soerensens were sponsored by a family friend in Long Island, New York and passage was arranged to the USA by Lutheran World Federation. They sailed from Bremerhaven, Germany on the naval transport ship, USS General W.C. Langfitt, which, over the war years, carried many immigrants to the USA. The family arrived in New York Harbor on January 9, 1956. Thomas was 14 years of age

Thomas thereafter graduated from Massapequa High School, Class of 1959-60 in New York. He then enlisted with the US Marine Corps in 1960 and served for 4 years. In 1966, when he was already discharged from the Marines, working and attending college, he re-enlisted.

Thomas K. Soerensen is a decorated veteran of the Vietnam War, and was attached to "A Battery 1st Battalion 13th Marines" as an artillery forward observer during the infamous battle of Khe Sanh (January 21-July 9, 1968). On September 5, 1966, he was wounded in action, but declined medical transport and despite his injuries, continued to direct a successful night-long mission. He was the recipient of numerous military awards for his years of service and sustained acts of heroism in combat, including The Bronze Star, The Purple Heart, and a Marine Corps Commendation. He received the "1968 Presidential Unit Citation" which was awarded to the 3d Marine Division (Reinforced) for extraordinary heroism and outstanding performance of duty from March 8, 1965 to September 15, 1967. He proudly served our country for 6 years as an active duty Marine, achieving the rank of Sergeant. He was a member of the Khe Sanh Veterans Association and several other related military organizations.

In 1982 Thomas and his family moved to Oroville, California, where he and his wife, Evva, owned and operated the historic Miner's Café restaurant on Oro Dam Blvd for more than 15 years.

Thomas loved the outdoors and was an avid hiker. A lover of music, he appreciated a wide range of musical genres from classic rock to classical music. He was an industrious person and when he wasn't working he spent much of his free time improving and maintaining his home Rose Hill, VA

WINSTON, KELLY, USMC
KHE SANH VETERAN

Winston Kelly, age 72, went home to be with his Lord on March 1, 2021 in Claiborne County Medical Center. He was a native of Harlan County, KY, the son of the late Millard and Ethel Mae Hall Kelly. He joined the United States Marine Corp in 1967 and was honorably discharged in 1969. His tour of duty was in Vietnam where he served in the Battle of "Khe Sanh" on Hill #861 for the entire battle. Winston was the recipient of two Purple Hearts. He was a retired coal miner spending twenty three and a half years with Arch of KY in the same mine #37, spending another three and a half years at another mine before his retirement. He moved from Harlan County and came to Virginia in 1995. Winston was of Baptist faith.

Survivors are his wife of 53 years Sandra Eldridge Kelly of Rose Hill, VA. Two sons; Winston Jr. Kelly and wife Tina of Jonesville, VA, Chris Kelly and wife Michelle of Rose Hill, VA. Grandchildren; Winston Kelly III and wife Andrea, Alyssa Combs, Joshua Kelly and wife Emma and Grace Kelly.

Great-grandchildren; Colton Kelly and Samuel Combs. He was a wonderful father and a fantastic grandpa.

The family would like to thank Dr. John Michael Robertson and all the staff at Claiborne County Medical Center. He would want us to list all his close friends but there are far to many. The family will receive on Sunday, March 7, 2021 from noon until 2:00 pm at Sturgill Funeral Home in Pennington Gap with services following with Pastor Rick Phillips and Pastor Richard Long officiating. Interment will follow in Lee Memorial Park West in Rose Hill, VA. Pallbearers will be Bo Kelly, Danny Perkins, Ed Jennings, Wayne Marcum, John Douglas and Randy Eldridge. Social distancing and masks will be required due to the Corona Virus. To view obituary and sign guest book please visit www.sturgillfuneralhome.com. Mullins-Sturgill Funeral Home of Pennington Gap is in charge of the arrangements.

WHAT MIGHT HAVE BEEN
By Michael Archer

Fifty-three years ago today, on July 6, 1968, Marine Lance Corporal Thomas Patrick Mahoney III, weary from the endless combat that had decimated his company, distraught at the final abandonment to the enemy of nearby Khe Sanh Combat Base just hours before, and having just received bad news from home, walked unarmed away from his platoon's tenuous defensive perimeter on the western sector of infamous Hill 881 South into an inevitable death by enemy soldiers waiting just a few yards away.

Tom's despair that afternoon reverberated over the subsequent decades in the heartbreak felt by family and friends and the gnawing sorrow and guilt among his fellow Marines who, though they had survived, were now left with a lifetime of lingering regret that they had not been tuned-in enough to his emotional state to avert the loss of such a well-liked colleague. Others, like myself, who had left Khe Sanh three months earlier, would nonetheless carry the burden of survivor guilt for very long time after the war.

The events leading up to that day—and after—are detailed in my book *The Long Goodbye. S*ince my last update on this site in June 2020 (Government at its Best (khesanh-battle.com), I've made several attempts to gain information from the US Defense POW\MIA Accountability Agency about any renewed activity in the search for Tom's remains, but have gotten no new information.

As the years pass, and despite great advances in the science of identifying even minuscule remains, described in that June 2020 blog post, it is increasingly unlikely that an identifiable remnant will be found. In 2016, a DPAA field team, escorting Tom's platoon commander Frank Ahearn and another witness to the event, Tom Northrop, narrowed down the location of where Mahoney's body was last seen. What happens next, remains up to the DPAA command. Understandably, they have a responsibility to apply their resources to situations that will have a higher probability of success.

Had a search team been dispatched within a few years of his death, the chances would have been much greater, which brings us to an odd "what might have been" connection between Tom Mahoney and one of the Marine Corps' most revered heroes, Colonel John Ripley.

Then-Captain Ripley was involved in a number of daring incidents during his time in Vietnam serving with various reconnaissance organizations and, for about a year, when he led Lima Company, Third Battalion Third Marine Regiment, called "Ripley's Raiders," during combat missions throughout the northern part of the country, including around Khe Sanh in 1967. During his tours in Vietnam, Ripley would be wounded several times, but only claiming one as a Purple Heart because he did not want to reach the magic number of three that would send him home. None of his exploits were more incredible—or legendary—than his destruction of a bridge over the Cua Viet River near the town of Dong Ha on April 1, 1972---singlehandedly stopping a vast North Vietnamese Army offensive consisting of nearly 30,000 troops and 200 battle tanks.

As advisor to group of well-disciplined South Vietnamese Marines, Ripley, and Major Jim Smock, immediately realized their M-48 tanks would be easily outgunned by the superior Soviet-made armor that the NVA were moving forward, and so had to determine how to stop this formidable tank column approaching the bridge. A successful crossing would lead them unhindered to their objective-- the old Imperial City of Hue.

The bridge was constructed of iron I-Beams, overlaid with steel decking, covered by two feet of timber, all sitting atop six-feet-thick concrete supports. The only way it could be brought down was with well-placed demolition. Ripley ordered explosives be brought forward. Once they arrived Captain Ripley, who could not use the roadway of the bridge due to withering enemy gunfire from the north side of the river, went to work underneath, sliding 75 pound cases of TNT between the edges of the I-Beams to a point over the middle of the river. Because there were six such I-beams, the job would take two hours. The shape of the I-beam allowed Ripley to use the protective channel to shield him from the enemy gunfire that was raking the area in an effort to stop him. However, at times he was forced to dangle precariously from the bottom of the bridge, advancing hand-over-hand.

After all the explosives were in place, Ripley lit the primer cord with a match, but crawled out once more to set a backup detonator with electrical caps. He then raced toward a protective bunker 90 yards away. The bridge exploded before he got there. All he later remembered of that moment was lying on his back "as huge pieces of the bridge were hurtling and cartwheeling across the sky above."

His heroic actions bought time for a South Vietnamese Army counteroffensive to be organized and eventually the North Vietnamese were driven back. Three years later they would return—and overrun the entire country ending the war. Ripley would receive the Navy Cross for his actions and in an interview published by the US Naval Institute years later would say: "The idea that I would be able to even finish the job before the enemy got me was ludicrous."

What fewer people know about Ripley is that six months earlier, in September 1971, he and his South Vietnamese Marines, set out on a perilous mission to the slopes of Hill 950, about two miles from the abandoned Khe Sanh Combat Base, hoping to recover the remains of several American Marines killed there in a helicopter crash earlier in the year. The first two attempts resulted in Ripley's helicopters being badly shot up by enemy antiaircraft fire and forced to glide down into hard landings on the nearby abandoned Khe Sanh airstrip. Each time the men were able to escape capture. After recovering from wounds received during the second attempt, Ripley, and his Vietnamese Marines, made a third try, this time landing on a nearby Hill 1015 and going overland, eluding the hundreds of North Vietnamese Army soldiers in the area, and successfully locating the American bodies.

As a chopper carrying them and the remains ascended from their make-shift landing zone on the slope

Hill 950 on September 20, 1971—in what would prove to be the final American military action at Khe Sanh—it passed directly over the deserted, shell-pocked, partially overgrown plateau where just over three year earlier the plight of thousands of besieged Americans had once captivated the world's attention.

Ripley's success in recovering those remains opened the possibility of other such missions to the Khe Sanh area. In a document I received years later (Joint POW-MIA Accounting Command (JPAC) Research and Investigation Team Research Report, Case 1224, 1993), I would learn that just two months after that mission, the accountability command considered the possibly of trying to recover Mahoney's remains just five miles southwest of Ripley's successful effort, However, they soon decided against it because "the continuing hostile threat in the area precluded any visits or ground inspections in his case."

The 1973 Paris Peace Accords would include provisions for locating those still unaccounted for at the conclusion of hostilities, creating a joint military team with all signatories represented. The U.S. component, called the Joint Casualty Resolution Center (JCRC), was responsible for field searches, excavations, recovery and repatriation activities negotiated through these accords, but was often hampered by ongoing fighting in the south, and open and aggressive hostility from the North Vietnamese and VC soldiers in the potential search areas. With the fall of Saigon in April 1975, Americans lost all access to the old battlefields.

For a decade afterward, most Americans sought to forget Vietnam in an effort to pull the nation together after a period domestic unrest and violence that had bordered on civil war. While returned veterans were still considered pariahs by many, in the late-1980s President George H.W. Bush and Congress acted on growing public interest in locating missing Americans. This became the foundation for ending a nineteen-year trade embargo with Vietnam and establishing economic relations.

In 1994, American investigators returned to Vietnam, Cambodia and Laos, interviewing former NVA and VC soldiers, conducting field searches and excavations, and sifting through military archives in Hanoi. The mission of the JCRC was reassigned to the Joint Task Force-Full Accounting (JTF -FA) located in Honolulu and soon most U.S. government documents pertaining to MIAs in South East Asia were declassified and available through the Library of Congress.

From those records, I learned that on July 12, 1993, twenty-five years to the day after the battle of Khe Sanh ended with the departure of the last Marine unit from Hill 689, a four-person JTF-FA team traveled for the first time to Hill 881 South in search of Tom's remains. The investigators had no one to interview, because there were no local civilians in the region at the time of his death, and Hanoi's antiquated record-keeping system still prevented them from identifying the NVA unit involved in the incident. They performed a perfunctory surface survey of the area where Tom was last seen and "found no evidence of remains or burial."

Had the decision been made in 1971 to try and duplicate Ripley's recovery mission at Khe Sanh, this time looking for Tom, this story might have had a different ending. We will never know. But what we do know is that what Chaucer wrote 700 years ago still rings sorrowfully true today in our effort to finally bring Tom home: "Time and tide wait for no man."

NIGHTMARE NORTH OF CAM LO
28 FEBRUARY 1867
PREFACE

In late February 1967, a Recon team patrolling northwest of Cam Lo near the DMZ made contact with a sizable NVA force. They killed one enemy soldier in the initial firefight, but they had actually engaged the point element of a regiment sized unit from the 324B Division. Outmanned and outgunned, the Recon Marines withdrew to the south and radioed for help. During the subsequent 48-hour period that followed, at least 4 Marine rifle companies were sent out to rescue the Recon team and exploit the enemy contact, but they would pay a heavy price. By the time the fighting was over, the Marines would suffer 20 KIA, and at least 135 wounded. My dad, 1st Lieutenant Jim Ambrose, was the Artillery Forward Observer assigned to Golf Company, 2/3, the unit which linked up with the Recon team and fought through a hellacious NVA ambush near the base of hill 124. This is his recollection of that rescue patrol and the grim battle that followed.

Jim Ambrose, Jr., former Captain, USMC

DEPARTURE INTERRUPTED

"Where's Lieutenant Ambrose at? We need him up at the CP A-S-A-P!" Oh shit. I can still remember that young Marine running from hooch to hooch searching for me. Vietnam was filled with nightmares and this was usually how they started. It was the morning of February 27, 1967, and I had been in country for 7 months. On that particular day, though, my seabag was packed, and I was listening to records by the Animals and Dusty Springfield on a battery powered record player in our primitive bunker at Camp Carroll. My unit, Bravo Battery 1/12, was scheduled to rotate out of Vietnam for a month of training on Okinawa, and the trucks that would take us to Dong Ha were due to arrive any minute. The thought of four weeks away from the blood, mud and combat up in I Corps sounded too good to be true, and when things sounded too good to be true in Vietnam, they usually were.

Premonition of Death

"Vietnam was filled with nightmares and this was usually how they started."

On that same morning, Captain Carl Bockewitz made his way over to the 2/3 OPS bunker at Camp Carroll to ask the S-3 a question. Bockewitz was the CO of Golf Co., and he had recently volunteered to extend his combat tour in Vietnam. The tall, lean, former cop from Bourbon, Missouri wanted to know if his company would be patrolling north of the Cam Lo River that day.

1ST LT JIM AMBROSE, ARTY F/O ON PATROL NORTHWEST OF DANANG.

The S-3, Major Robert Sheridan, dismissed his question and assured him that G Co. was not going anywhere. Like B/1/12, 2/3 was also scheduled for training on Okinawa, and more than half the battalion was already embarked on ships offshore. Bockewitz walked out of the bunker feeling quite relieved because the previous night he had dreamed that he would die if he went north of the Cam Lo River.

MY MISSION

My Mission Up at the CP, 1st Lt. Richard Brammer, the Battery Fire Direction Officer, briefed me on the situation. He told me that our trip to Okinawa was on hold because a Marine Recon team had bumped into a large NVA force northwest of Cam Lo. After a short firefight, they broke contact but now they were surrounded and needed help. Lima Co 3/4 had been patrolling nearby with 5 M-48 tanks, but thick vegetation in the area prevented them from reaching the Recon team. The only remaining unit available to help the Recon team was Captain Bockewtiz' Golf Company, and they needed an experienced Arty FO for the mission. Brammer chose me.

CAPT. CARL BOCKEWITZ, CO OF GOLF 2/3, DREAMED HE WOULD DIE IF HE WENT NORTH OF THE CAM LO RIVER.

I gulped hard and tried to hide my disappointment, then hustled back to my hooch to grab my helmet and flak jacket. I threw some C rats and .45 ammo into my light marching pack and then made my way up toward the 2/3 position near the plateau atop Camp Carroll. I had a list of on call targets prepared by Brammer in my cargo pocket along with a single lens binocular I had created with a hacksaw following Operation Hastings in August 1966. During my time in Vietnam, I had learned that being as inconspicuous as possible while calling in fire missions prolonged one's life expectancy as an Arty FO.

THE GRUNTS

The 2/3 CP was abuzz with activity as sergeants and corporals organized Golf Co for the rescue patrol. Young infantrymen were loading up magazines for their M-14's, while in the background the outgoing artillery fire was frequent and intense. Like me, these Marines were probably trying to suppress their shock and disappointment over the Okinawa trip being cancelled, and it had become increasingly obvious to everyone that this hastily assigned rescue mission was certain to bring us in direct contact with the NVA.

I didn't know any of the Marines in 2/3, but I did my best to find someone in charge. From the midst of the chaos came Lt. Col Victor Ohanesian, the Battalion CO. He greeted me with a smile and a handshake, then "thanked" me for reporting in. I wasn't aware that this was an optional mission, but his affable demeanor helped calm my nerves. It was obvious that he was an experienced combat leader who inspired confidence amongst his Marines. He handed me a couple of loaded magazines for my.45, then brought me over to meet Capt. Bockewitz who gave me a brief handshake just before issuing the patrol order to his rifle company.

My best guess is that there were approximately 75 Marines in the reaction force, about half the size of a fully manned rifle company. As far as other officers, I saw a 1st Lt. FAC and two 2nd Lt. platoon commanders. When Bockewitz finished his order, we mounted up on 6x6 trucks which took us from Camp Carroll down to Route 9. It occurred to me that these were probably the same trucks which were supposed to take us to Dong Ha for our trip to Okinawa. We convoyed east about 5 clicks east then disembarked to begin our march north into the DMZ

At some point I was introduced to Corporal George Schieder, a wiry Marine rifleman who had volunteered to be the radio operator for arty FO teams attached to Golf Co. We made small talk during the short truck ride, and he let out a chuckle when I told him I was from Boston because he was from upstate NY. Schieder was a squared away Marine, and I would soon learn that he was a cool customer under fire.

THE PATROL

It was late in the afternoon as we set out, and a cool, steady rain was falling. We marched swiftly north along a thin, narrow footpath which took us through dense jungle underbrush six to eight feet high in places. Each Marine in the column held onto the cartridge belt of the Marine to his front in order to avoid being separated in the dark. To the northeast we could hear the sounds of an intense firefight developing. After establishing a defensive position for the night, L/3/4 had come under attack from an NVA force who disabled one of their M-48 tanks with RPG's.

LT COL VICTOR OHANESIAN 2/3 BATTALION CO

HIGHLIGHTED GOLF 2/3 PATROL ROUTE FEB 27-28, 1967

Soon the dense vegetation gave way to a clearing and we were on the bank of the Cam Lo river. It was swollen from monsoon rains, and I had to hold my .45 and maps over my head as we marched across. At that particular moment I didn't know an ything about Capt Bockewitz' ominous dream, but I can only wonder what ran through his mind as we marched across that river to where he told the S-3 he would die only hours earlier. The narrow trail we were following continued on the opposite bank of the river. In the distance and slightly west of our patrol route we could see the looming shadow of a large hill identified as "Kho Xa" on my map.

" I HAD TO GET SOME ARTY IN QUICK, OR RISK BEING OVER-RUN OR ANNIHILATED..."

GOOGLE EARTH IMAGE, PRESENT DAY.

Bockewtiz may have suspected there were enemy scouts on top because he ordered the company to halt, and then had me request a fire mission. Kho Xa was one of the pre-plotted targets prepared by Lt. Brammer so I was able to obliterate the hill top with 105mm howitzer rounds that screamed in from Camp Carroll within minutes. After the fire mission, Bockewitz told me to stay near him at the front of the column and track the company position on my map.

We moved further north into the DMZ and soon began hearing sporadic gunfire from the Recon team as they zig zagged south with NVA troops in pursuit. Bockewitz attempted to make radio contact to better determine their location, but the Reconners would only respond with clicks of their handset because they were so close to the enemy. With the use of white parachute flares as reference points, though, we eventually linked up with them at approximately 2300. They emerged from the darkness wearing huge packs and soft bush covers.

We took up defensive positions in the cold, rain soaked elephant grass while Bockewitz radioed the higher ups back at Camp Carroll. Having accomplished our mission, I briefly hoped we would head back to route 9 with the Recon team, but the worst part of this patrol was yet to come.

One of the recon Marines had a Boston accent like mine, and he told me that they had been patrolling in the area north of Kho Xa for several days when they bumped into 4 unusually tall NVA soldiers with AK-47's on a narrow trail—they were wearing pith helmets and green utilities with red metal stars on their collars. They shot and killed one of them, but the others retreated back up the trail and into the jungle. Within minutes they were under attack and being pursued by what they estimated to be at least 100 NVA soldiers. That's when they called for help.

Bockewitz received orders to move a few thousand meters southeast and establish a defensive position in an abandoned village marked "destroyed" on my map. We arrived there sometime after midnight and set up a CP in an old church whose roof had been destroyed in a previous battle. I could make out some ornate sculptures depicting the stations of the cross which harkened back to my days as an altar boy at the Sacred Heart Church in Roslindale, MA.

"CAPT. BOCKEWTIZ'S PREMONITION OF DEATH HAD COME TRUE."

Corporal Schieder and I spent the night shivering underneath a single poncho making periodic radio checks with the battery at Camp Carroll. We were bone tired, but adrenalin and fear kept us from sleeping. The battle between the NVA and Lima 3/4 raged through the night just a few thousand klicks northeast of our position. A steady bombardment of artillery from Camp Carroll helped them stave off several determined NVA attacks.

At first light we were ordered to move north about 2 klicks to establish a blocking position on top of hill 124. The Recon Marines told us that they had found numerous fighting holes and freshly used trails in and around the base of that same hill, and they estimated that at least a battalion size NVA force was in the area. However, intelligence reports would later reveal that it was a regiment sized unit (1000-2000 troops) from the 324thB Division which had recently returned to the Song Ngan Valley after being bloodied there by the Marines in Operation Hastings six months earlier.

With Lima 3/4 pinned down in a defensive position to protect their disabled tanks, Golf 2/3's undermanned rifle company of 75 Marines was the only intact fighting force capable of maneuvering and undertaking offensive operations in the Cam Lo area at that particular moment in time. We were cold, wet, and weary of the inevitable contact with an NVA unit which likely outnumbered us by 10 to 1. But on the morning of 28 February, we stepped off toward hill 124 where a battle hardened and fiercely determined enemy force was waiting for us because we were U.S. Marines and we had orders to do so.

We marched in a staggered column, NCO's forcefully reminding the riflemen to maintain their interval and stay alert. Their heads were on swivels, scanning left and right with M-14's in jungle slings. Although we could hear the battle with L/3/4 to the east, the approach to hill 124 seemed eerily quiet. The terrain was flat and devoid of the heavy vegetation we had traversed the previous night while searching for the Recon team. For a brief moment I thought that maybe all of the NVA troops in the area had left to join the fight against L/3/4, but they had not.

We were about 100 meters from the base of the hill 124 when I heard the firecracker sound of gunfire near the front of the column. It was light at first, but then it seemed to erupt from everywhere. We hit the deck and took cover in a shallow gully that was located alongside our route of march. The NVA were dug in amidst the vegetation at the foot of hill 124 and along our right flank no more than 30-40 meters away. The grunts shook off the shock of the ambush and returned fire with their M-14's. Within seconds the noise reached a hellacious cacophony.

I knew Bockewitz would want some arty to suppress the ambush, so with Corporal Schieder in tow, I scrambled over the grunts in a half crouch toward his position at the front of the column.

We arrived to find a Navy Corpsman working frantically to save several seriously wounded Marines. The bodies of two dead Marines lay nearby.

Bockewitz and one of his senior enlisted Marines were in a crouch behind the gully pointing and yelling something about the M-60 machine guns which lay idle in the kill zone 15-20 meters away. Their respective crew members had been cut down in the opening moments of the firefight, and some brave young Marines had crawled out in the face of withering enemy fire to recover their bodies. Some of them had been shot in the process, though, which added to the growing number of casualties.

I never got the chance to speak with Bockewitz. Much to my shock and to the shock of the Marines around me, he stood up, ripped off his flak jacket and threw his helmet to the ground. Then, with his .45 in hand, he leapt up over the berm and sprinted in a crouch toward his wounded Marines and the M-60s. He was shot full of holes instantly, his body falling lifeless near the other dead and wounded Golf Company Marines. Capt. Bockewtiz' premonition of death had come true.

Things were deteriorating rapidly for our beleaguered patrol. The skipper was dead, and we were pinned down by the massive volume of enemy gunfire. There were two other platoon commanders, but I had no idea where they were or what they were doing. It occurred to me that we should attempt some kind of envelopment around the NVA position, but any movement from the gulley would have been suicide at that point. We were a force of 75 Marines up against what was most likely an enemy battalion firing from well prepared defensive positions. I had to get some arty in quick, or Golf Company would risk being overrun or annihilated by the numerically superior NVA unit.

Schieder and I scrambled in a half crouch back to a position near the middle of the column. I popped up and wedged my chin into the lip of the berm to eyeball some targets, and 2 or 3 enemy rounds cracked just above and beside my head. I ducked down and crawled 3-4 meters to the right, and then back to the left, each time popping up to get a quick look at where the enemy might be located, and each time I w as greeted by purposely fully aimed gunfire.

We were near the base of hill 124 which was a prominent terrain feature on my map, but it was covered in the type of dense, Vietnam vegetation that made spotting and adjusting rounds difficult. I wanted to shift fire from the concentration I had plotted on top of hill 124 before we departed from the church earlier that day. After getting a ballpark reading with the mils scale on my single lens binocular, I grabbed the radio handset from Cpl. Schieder:

"MORTGAGE, MORTGAGE, THIS IS MONEY 62, FIRE MISSION, OVER…."

The Army battery at Camp Carroll responded immediately:

"MONEY 62, THIS IS ALPHA O'LEARY NINER, SEND YOUR MISSION OVER…"

"FROM CONCENTRATION TWO FOUR ZERO, RIGHT 100, DROP 200, ENENY TROOPS FIR-ING AUTOMATIC WEAPONS, ADJUST FIRE, REQUEST SPLASH OVER…"

"WE DIDN'T FIND ANY DEAD NVA BLOOD LEADING OFF INTO THE JUNGLE."

In a few moments two rounds were on the way. The absolute worst thing that can happen to an Arty FO is for incoming rounds to fall short and cause death or injury to his fellow Marines. Regardless of who is at fault, the grunts will blame the FO.

Schieder and I passed the word to the Grunts and they in turn shouted up and down the column: "ARTY ON THE WAY!" A few moments later the call "SPLASH" came over the radio which meant 5 seconds until impact. The two rounds screamed overhead and landed about 50 meters directly in front of our position, exactly where I wanted them. This was a "danger close" fire mission, and dirt and debris from the impact rained down on our heads. The Army cannon cockers were true pros, so I immediately asked them to "FIRE FOR EFFECT."

The wind tearing roar of six shells came next, bearing down on us like an airborne freight train. Then six large explosions of black smoke and dirt erupted right where the first two rounds hit.

Success! With the enemy positions accurately bracketed, I was able to call in mission after mission, shifting to the left and right across what was about a 75-meter front, directly on top of the NVA positions. They were dug in deep, and I wanted to pulverize them so I requested delayed fuse rounds which would only explode 5 seconds after penetrating the soil, and variable timed (VT) rounds which would burst in the air about 5 meters above the target, inflicting maximum casualties on any exposed enemy soldiers.

The exact sequence of events which followed is somewhat of a blur, but Schieder and I brought in hundreds of rounds on the NVA positions over the course of the next few hours. Most of the arty strikes were so close (40-50 meters) that heaps of dirt and debris landed on us when the rounds impacted. It felt good to hit back at the enemy who had ambushed us, but these were battle hardened NVA regulars who did not quit easily.

Lieutenant Flaherty, the company FAC, who I would later become friends with aboard ship, made his way over toward Schieder and I. He tapped me on the shoulder and gave me a big thumbs up in admiration of our work, then he pointed his finger to the sky and shouted "I GOT AIR ON STATION." I looked up and saw two F-4 Phantoms circling our position and working their way down from about 5000 feet. In what was called the "Save A Plane" concept at the time, we checked fire to let the pilots go to work without fear of being hit by a 105 round.

Just when it seemed they had disappeared from sight, one of the Phantoms came roaring by at tree top level from right to left tearing up the NVA positions with machine gun pods which sounded like the world's biggest jackhammer tearing into cement. Napalm would have been nice, but Flaherty said we were too close to the enemy. With each pass, the F-4s hit full afterburner and pulled straight up with an awe-inspiring roar. The sight of "MARINES" painted in large black letters on the fuselage of each jet was a pretty good morale jolt for all of us.

The combination of airstrikes and artillery missions began to take its toll on the enemy, and the amount of gunfire directed at us began to taper off by late afternoon. The NVA had probably started pulling back into the mountains north of hill 124, but at least a few stayed behind. When an H-34 rumbled in toward our position from the West, the NVA opened up on it, hitting the tail and underside with disturbingly loud pinging noises. Dead and wounded Marines were loaded on board as the crew chief kicked out crates of ammunition. When the old piston-engined chopper lifted off, the door gunner ripped into the NVA positions with his M-60.

Among the wounded loaded onto the chopper was 2nd Lt. Larry Gerlach, one of the two platoon commanders with Golf Co on the patrol. An enemy bullet had smashed through his right hip, and a corpsman had given him a generous shot of morphine. In his delirium, he was mumbling something about "the lieutenant is prepared to receive his critique Sir…," just the way we were taught to speak to our tactics instructors at The Basic School. It was a brief moment of humor on a battlefield far, far away from Quantico. Larry recovered and made a career out of the Marine Corps, but he was badly wounded during the Beirut barracks bombing in 1983.

By the time the battle was over, we had suffered 7 Marines killed and 18 wounded. 2nd Lt. Richard Mellon, the senior platoon commander, received orders for us to withdraw back to a position near route 9 where we set up a defensive perimeter for the night. While our casualties were bad by any measure (roughly 1/3 of the company), Lima 3/4 suffered worse.

While we were battling at the base of Hill 124, Lt. Col Ohanesian was ordered to lead a relief force to the Lima 3/4 position with all the remaining Marines from 2/3 at Camp Carroll. They held off several enemy attacks with the help of heavy artillery fire and close air support, then received orders to move west and provide reinforcements for our battle against the NVA. They never made it. Immediately after departing the Lima Co. position they were ambushed by a large enemy force that employed mortars and rocket propelled grenades. By the time the battle was over they had sustained 13 KIA's and over 100 casualties. Among those killed were Lt. Col Ohanesian and his battalion Sgt. Major Wayne Hayes.

LT. COL. EARL "PAPPY" DELONG AND A RETURN TO THE SCENE OF BATTLE

We spent an otherwise quiet night in our defensive position near route 9. Rumors spread that we were going back to Camp Carroll because fresh reinforcements were being flown in. At dawn, though, there was frantic word that a G Co. Marine and a Corpsman were unaccounted for. Lt. Col Earl "Pappy" DeLong, the 3rd Marine Regiment's XO, was flown in to take charge of 2/3 and all of the units that had been attached during the previous 24 hours. DeLong ordered Lt. Mellon and I to brief him on the previous day's battle.

LT COL EARL "PAPPY" DeLONG, WHO TOOK COMMAND OF 2/3 AFTER COL VICTOR OHANESIAN WAS KILLED. HE WOULD LATER EARN A SILVER STAR FOR ACTIONS UNDER FIRE IN THE HILL FIGHTS NEAR KHE SANH MAKING HIM THE ONLY MARINE IN HISTORY TO EARN A SILVER STAR IN WWII, KOREAN WAR AND THE VIETNAM WAR,

DeLong was as salty as they come, and easily could have passed for one of Chesty Puller's close relatives. He wore his .45 in a shoulder holster and smoked a cigar while holding court with Mellon and I. Marines never leave comrades behind on the battlefield, so Pappy quickly issued an order for us to return to the site of the ambush near hill 124. This time we had fresh reinforcements from 2/9, and they made fun of our raggedy appearance. Nearly all of the Golf Co. Marines (myself included) had torn knees on our utility trousers as a result of crawling around in the gully for hours fighting the NVA.

This time we approached hill 124 from the west, and DeLong ordered one platoon to establish a base of fire position, while another platoon enveloped the terrain held by the NVA 24 hours earlier. As Pappy had expected, though, the NVA had fled. We found the bodies of missing Marine, PFC Richard Dewane from Buffalo, NY, and the Corpsman, Petty Officer 3rd Class John Agee from Lindsey, Ohio. I didn't see PFC Dewane's body, but I distinctly remember seeing Corpsman Agee. He was lying on his back, eyes still open, and his hand, stiff with rigor mortis, reaching up toward the sky

We didn't find any dead NVA bodies. Just trails of blood leading off into the jungle. There were impact craters from our fire missions everywhere. Amongst them were dozens of deeply dug enemy fighting holes, some filled with blood soaked rags and human remains, but very little else. Our fire missions had been right on target, but the NVA, ever phantom like, had withdrawn and taken all of their casualties with them.

The surviving members of 2/3 and I eventually made it out to Dong Ha where we rode in Mike boats from the Cua Viet river out to an amphibious transport ship that took us to Okinawa. Once aboard we enjoyed clean beds, hot showers and real chow.

Our time on Okinawa seemed like a dream compared to the hell we had just been through. But we returned to a war that had only worsened in its ferocity and intensity. In a few short weeks, I was at Khe Sanh with B/1/12 to once again provide artillery support for 2/3 as they battled to take Hills 881N and 881S under the leadership of Lt. Col Pappy Delong. Some of the same Marines from the 28 February patrol participated in those hill fights, including my radio operator, George Schieder.

THE FOLLOWING ARTICLES WERE WRITTEN BEFORE THE 50TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BATTLE OF KHE SANH BY COLONEL BRUCE CLARKE, USA DISTRICT ADVISORY TEAM 4

WAS AMERICA DUPED AT KHE SANH?

As we approach the fiftieth anniversary the siege of the Khe Sanh Combat Base (KSCB) we can anticipate a plethora of articles about the battle that decided the Vietnam War. The first of these was in the New York Times on January 1st ("Was America Duped at Khe Sanh?") The article by John Mason Glen is spectacular in its attention grabbing title but weak on strategic analysis. Having lived through the battle and written about it in Expendable Warriors: the battle of Khe Sanh and the Vietnam War, I feel uniquely qualified to rebut Glen's argument. The main theme of the article is that the attack on Khe Sanh was a diversion to draw American forces away from the populated areas in anticipation of the Tet Offensive which started 9 days after the beginning of the siege of the KSCB. This argument is inaccurate for many different reasons:

The attack on Khe Sanh had been anticipated for 3 months. Elements of 2 Army Divisions had been moved north in vicinity of Hue and Quang Tri. It was these forces that blunted part of the attacks on those two province headquarters.

Khe Sanh was reinforced by 4 battalions of Marines with most of the reinforcements arriving after the North Vietnamese Army launched its missile and artillery barrage on 21 January 1968. (More on the multiple implications of this attack in subsequent articles.) 4 battalions of Marines in the bigger scheme of things was not consequential to stopping the Tet attacks.

The diversion of air assets to support the defense of Khe Sanh was not as significant as Glen would have one believe. Mush of the air support used was B-52 carpet bombing not pin point close air support. Such bombing approaches were inappropriate for populated areas.

Glen mentions the internal opinion divisions within the North Vietnamese leadership. One faction was focused on the Tet offensive and the other on Khe Sanh. He correctly points out that one faction focused on the general uprising goal while General Giap was seeking to break the American public support for the war by the attack on Khe Sanh. He wanted to repeat his success at Dien Bien Phu where the French public support for the Indochinese war was destroyed. To people like Glen it was one or the other. Why couldn't they have been reinforcing? Glen does not examine this point.

The agony of Khe Sanh played out for 77 days on the screens and in the newspapers of main street America. This is where the war was lost! Certainly Tet contributed to the loss but it was Khe Sanh that was the deciding factor.

It should be noted that in the Burns PBS documentary which has been critiqued on these pages the siege of the KSCB is barely mentioned—another of its fatal flaws as has been recounted on these pages. In fact both Khe Sanh and Tet were significant failures militarily for the North Vietnamese. They lost both battles. The war was there to be won, but the political will to do so had been lost. Giap had been right. (There is a unique event highlighted in my book that makes this point explicitly.)

But the bottom line is that the battle of Khe Sanh was won and the war lost at the same time.

In my next response to the Glen's article I will respond to his critique of General Westmoreland. Stay tuned!

Returning to John Mason Glen's opinion piece in the New York Times ("Was America Duped at Khe Sanh?") We must also set the record straight about General Westmoreland and the strategy in theVietnam War. Again Mr. Glen displays his lack of historical perspective by attributing the strategy of attrition in the Vietnam War to General Westmoreland's analysis of the battle of the Ira Drang Valley. (The basis of the book and movie We Were Soldiers Once, Young and Brave.)

Glen correctly paints General Westmoreland as the perfect image of a soldier—World War II leader, Airborne Infantry leader, former Superintendent of West Point—with a very stiff soldierly look. Westy, as he was called by cadets at West Point and soldiers in the field in Vietnam was all that Glen describes. One must also remember at this point in history the Airborne Mafia, as it was called ruled the Army. There was admiration for the Airborne coming out of World War II. President Kennedy was enamored with the Special Forces (Green Berets) all of whom were airborne qualified. Glen attributes Westmoreland's strategy to this background and does not attribute the country's experience and successes to the strategy in Vietnam.

When Westy was superintendent at West Point I was a cadet there studying military tactics and history. Much of our studies revealed that the US military strategy grew out of Grant's defeat of Lee. The battles of the Wilderness in late 1864 and 1865 were battles of attrition. The North had the wherewithal in terms of men and equipment to fight a war of attrition against the South. This strategy succeeded. The lesson learned was that attrition warfare was a way to win.

The world wars in Europe and Asia were also wars of attrition where superior resources were able to win the day, over time. When one couples the US military experience of success through attrition warfare with Robert McNamara's "bean counting" revolution in the Pentagon one can understand how body count became the measure of success for the war in Vietnam. If more bad guys were killed in an engagement than good guys then the good guys "won". This became the approach in Vietnam.

Given this view that attrition / body count would cause the enemy to stop fighting one can clearly understand the desire of a set piece firepower intensive battle to crush the North Vietnamese Army (NVA). Khe Sanh offered this opportunity. The hope was that the NVA would go for the bait that was the Khe Sanh Combat Base and provide a large number of targets to be attacked by superior fire power and destroyed. For this strategy to succeed the bait could not be compromised by the NVA learning of the plan. The close-holding of the intelligence that the NVA was going to attack Khe Sanh lead to my advisory team in Khe Sanh village being "expendable". We were part of the bait and could not leak to our Vietnamese counterparts what was coming for fear that they in turn would leak it to the NVA. The solution was to just not tell us what was about to occur.

Many of the readers of Expendable Warriors have commented on how critical we deal with General Westmoreland. One former Chief of Staff of the Army refused to endorse the book because of this perspective. I must admit that the after taste of being "expendable" may have colored my perspective. However, I have learned the bigger lesson—strategic leaders must make strategic decisions based upon the bigger picture. In this regard the small advisory team and mixed force of Vietnamese, Bru Montagnards and Marines may have truly been expendable. Though we will probably never admit it.

The soldiers, sailors, airmen and Marines did not lose the war in Vietnam the politicians and strategists did. In April/May of 1968 the strategy had succeeded. The NVA and Viet Cong had been defeated by all body count measures, but the political will to win was gone. The political will had not been considered by the strategists of the day. It was not until Colonel Harry Summers published his book On Strategy: a Critical Analysis of the Vietnam War that Clausewitz's dictums on political will were brought again into consideration by strategic thinkers. Colonel Summers was part of the Vietnam negotiating team and his discussion with a North Vietnamese counterpart is often quoted. He told his counterpart: "we won every battle." To which the North Vietnamese officer replied "But you lost the war."

If one reads my writings on conflict termination he will see Colonel Summers' views used as a basis for defining what it means to win. Body count is also dismissed as the failed measure of success that it is. A subject of another blog in our continuing discussion leading up to the 50th anniversary of the siege of the Khe Sanh Combat Base.

LIMITED WAR AND RULES OF ENGAGEMENT

Some time ago one of my readers asked that I write about how the rules of engagement (ROE) severely restricted US forces freedom of action and thus played a significant role in the resultant "loss" in Vietnam. In this case ROE were linked to limited war. What is limited war you ask?

Limited war is where one side in a conflict decides to limit its application of military force for a whole series of reasons. The Vietnam War really had two phases:

- The pre-1 April 1968 phase where the US was fighting to win though with significant limits on the application of force, and
- The post 1 April 1968 date where the goal was to achieve a negotiated agreement. Initially this phase had even more restricted ROE, but after Nixon's perception of North Vietnamese intransigence there was a significant loosening of the ROE—decreasing the limits on the use of military force. But the goal was still a negotiated agreement.

The above raises several questions:

What were the initial limits and why were they imposed?
What is so significant about 31 March 1968?
What were the limits in the ROE?
What were Nixon's relaxation of limits?

When the US began its escalation of the use of force in Vietnam in 1964/5 there were significant limits placed upon the forces. Cambodia and Laos were off limits to conventional forces, as was North Vietnam. The bombing of North Vietnam was severely limited as to the targets that could be engaged. The whole theory of limited war was meeting a test. A test that it failed, but more about that later.

These limits were imposed on US forces because of a fear that any expansion of the war would cause the Chinese to intervene. The memory of Korea was still keen in strategists' minds. There was also fear of a confrontation with the Soviet Union. For these reasons there were severe limits placed upon US forces.

In late 1967 the North Vietnamese tested these limits with the extreme shelling and limited attacks across the DMZ in the vicinity of Cam Lo. Unbeknownst to the Americans this was a test—a test to see if it would abide by its limits and not invade North Vietnam. When the US did not invade the North Vietnamese were free to move several divisions west to come down the Ho Chi Minh trail and attack Khe Sanh. Which they did.

What is so significant about 31 March 1968? The evening of 31 March President Johnson announced his partial bombing halt as a means to entice the North Vietnamese into negotiations to end the war. It was at this point that the war was "lost." As recounted elsewhere (Expendable Warriors) a proposed offensive military action into Laos was deemed to be politically unacceptable. The war had been won on the ground in Vietnam but lost politically. The US was unwilling to lift its limits and win the war on the ground and North was not fighting with any limits. Instead increased limits were imposed on US forces.

North Vietnamese intransigence and an attempt to disengage US forces while not increasing the degree of loss lead the Nixon Administration strategy of Vietnamization. This was coupled with several expansions of the war—relaxation of the limits imposed on US forces. First was the invasion of Cambodia as an attempt to destroy North Vietnamese Army (NVA) sanctuaries and to buy time for Vietnamization to take hold.

The second expansion was Lam Son 719A—the invasion of Laos in 1971 to cut the Ho Chi Minh trail. For several reasons this Vietnamese attack with US support was a miserable failure. The main reason probably being the loss of surprise—the NVA were waiting and the Army of the Republic of Vietnam (ARVN) got mauled.

The final escalation was the use of B-52s over Hanoi and Haiphong. Previous bombing restraints/limits were relaxed and a massive bombing finally caused the North Vietnamese to agree to a settlement. In hiding the overall loss Nixon/Kissinger called it "Peace with Honor". The POWs came home.

In Vietnam we relearned the lessons of Korea. When one side is fighting a limited war—limited in ways and means and the other side is fighting an unlimited war—applying all of the ways and means at its disposable to win the outcome is at best a draw. Does or should the MacArthur dictum: "there is no substitute for victory" apply? In the Gulf War we saw the limits replaced by the Powell Doctrine of "Over-whelming Force." However there were limits in that conflict such that after several years the second Bush administration felt that it had to fight another war against Iraq—in short to do what the first Gulf War had prevented the over throw of Saddam Hussein.

To return to the original issue of ROEs and limited war it should be clear that at no time except a nuclear threat will the United States not fight a "limited war." But the extent of those limitations will clearly have a potential impact on the outcome of the conflict. Politicians and military strategists must decide before the conflict begins as to whether any limits being considered will prevent the achievement of the military objectives that have flowed from the political objectives of a conflict.

KHE SANH—THE INTELLIGENCE BUILD UP

Expendable Warriors was so named because General Westmoreland and Colonel Lownds at the Khe Sanh Combat Base (KSCB) knew that the North Vietnamese Army was going to attack Khe Sanh as much as 3 months before the attack began. However, the Advisory Team in Khe Sanh village in the District Headquarters were not told. We guess for fear that the intelligence would be leaked to our Vietnamese counterparts and then get back to the North Vietnamese. What was the intelligence?
The intelligence that the NVA were going to attack Khe Sanh got its first visibility in November 1967 when Colonel Lownds (Commander of the KSCB) told some Marines that: "you will soon be in the American history books."

Recently unclassified intelligence showed that in October 1967 an NVA Division began moving towards Khe Sanh. There was also information from signal intercepts that a new headquarters had been formed to control a multi-division attack on Khe Sanh.

General Westmoreland's intelligence brief of 12 January confirmed that the attack would begin on 21 January. During the entire month of January Military Assistance Command Vietnam (MACV) began preparations for the battle of Khe Sanh.It began preparations for the upcoming battle by:

- Reinforcing the KSCB first on the 13 December with and additional Marie Infantry Battalion. The order sending the battalion to KSCB noted that reinforcements should not flow to KSCB too quickly so as to avoid the NVA knowing of General Westmoreland's intentions.
- An air campaign to target the NVA using B-52s as they approached Khe Sanh was begun on 5 January –Operation Niagara
- Approval to use what was then a classified controlled fragmentation artillery munition (COFRAM—also known as fire cracker) was sought
- An Air Support Radar Team was deployed to KSCB on 16 January to control radar guided air attacks.
- On 17 January an additional Marine infantry battalion arrived at Khe Sanh bringing the force up to 3 battalions.
- On 18 January sensors were diverted from the Ho Chi Minh trail in Laos and deployed around the KSCB to monitor the movement of the NVA into the area.

During the period beginning in December 1967 the Marines at KSCB began improving their defensive positions by digging deeper and putting up more sand bag reinforced bunkers. Ammunition resupply by air began in earnest. This Marine effort was intelligence to those of us on the Advisory Team in the District Headquarters. We began to take similar actions by improving the defenses of our little compound.

Finally on 19 January an NVA officer was captured performing a reconnaissance of the wire surrounding the KSCB. This office had the entire plan for the attack from the northern Division (NVA Division 325 C) that was to attack KSCB beginning on 21 January.

The information on the pending attack was known to the leadership at Khe Sanh and throughout the relevant portions of MACV, BUT not in the District Headquarters. The scene was set for the events of the next almost 80 days.

COMMAND AND CONTROL IN THE KHE SANH AREA OF OPERATIONS

(AO)

As we approach the 50th anniversary of the Siege of the Khe Sanh Combat Base (KSCB) it will be useful for the reader to understand the very confused and dysfunctional command and control relationships that existed in the Khe Sanh AO. There were at least 5 different higher headquarters.

The advisory team of 5 soldiers responded to the Province advisory team in Quang Tri. The District Chief Captain Tinh-A-Nhi responded to Province Commander who was a full Colonel in the Army of the Republic of Vietnam (ARVN).

The Special Forces (Special Forces Detachment A-101) at Lang Vei along the border with Laos reported to a C Team headquartered in Hue Phu Bai, which in return reported to the Special Forces Group in Danang.

In the village headquarters was the headquarters of a Combined Action Company (CAC-O) and one Combined Action Platoon (CAP O-1) of 10 Marines and about 25 Montagnards. The CAC reported to Colonel David Lownds the KSCB Commander but also had a battalion headquarters in Danang.

Located as an appendage on the western edge of the KSCB there was a special forces Forward Operating Base (FOB-3). The men of FOB-3 with their Montagnard soldiers conducted reconnaissance and raids in North Vietnam and Laos. They reported to a Battalion commander in Hue Phu Bai and Military Assistance Command Vietnam Studies and Observation Group (MACVSOG or SOG) in Saigon.

Finally there was a two man intelligence team located in the village headquarters that reported to a headquarters in Danang.

Colonel David Lownds as the senior American officer in the Khe Sanh AO exercised very loose operational control over the units in the area. All the units would go to the Marines at the combat base for support, but when that support was not forthcoming they would go to their parent units. This was especially true for the Special Forces and Advisory team.

The relations between the Army units—special forces and advisory team—and the Marines were so bad that they had developed their own code terms and frequencies to coordinate with each other so the Marines could not listen in.

Additionally each of the units mentioned had very different missions and therefore different objectives. So the lack of unity of command resulted in a loss of unity of effort, which is what the whole concept of unity of command is all about. Unity of effort is supposed to flow from unity of command. All of the units would be working towards a common goal. The Marines goal was to kill NVA. The Advisory Team and District Government's goal was to provide political leadership for the people of the area and to provide them security from small enemy forces. A-101's mission was border surveillance and to block the major avenue of approach into the area—route 9. The SOG team at FOB-3 only staged in Khe Sanh for out of area operations in Laos and North Vietnam. Thus no unity of effort.

This spaghetti bowl of relationships was the situation that existed when the battle of Khe Sanh began on 21 January 1968.

THE SIEGE OF THE KHE SANH COMBAT BASE— THE NOOSE TIGHTENS

Recently, when reading my VFW magazine I encountered an article entitled "Tanks in the Wire". It was a brief, but still not accurate, synopsis of the battle of Lang Vei Special Forces camp on 7 and 8 February 1968—50 years ago. (I would commend David Stockwell's two books on the battle. First came Tanks in the Wire and just recently The Route 9 Problem) I was underground in my bunker at the Khe Sanh Combat Base (KSCB) but listened to much of the battle on the radio and the next morning was part of the planning for the relief effort for the beleaguered forces at Lang Vei.

To put the battle in perspective it actually started at the end of January when the 33rd Royal Laotian Battalion was overrun by the North Vietnamese Army (NVA) in Laos using tanks. The Surveillance and Observation Group (SOG) Special Forces at Forward Operating Base 3, which was an appendage to the KSCB and where we had the local Vietnamese government in exile, had a close connection to the Laotians.

When the Laotians reported that they were overrun by tanks nobody believed them. The 33rd Battalion fled Laos and settled at Lang Vei in a camp near the Special Forces Camp. They were reinforced by Special Force elements from Hue Phu Bai lead by LTC Schungel. So now there were two Special Forces camps at Lang Vei—the old camp with Laotians and Special Forces in it and the new camp with A 101 and its Vietnamese Civilian Irregular Defense Forces (CIDG). CPT Frank Willoughby, the commander of A 101 Special Forces detachment at Lang Vei requested anti-tank mines but his request was denied because the report of tanks being used was not believed by higher headquarters. The Special Forces did scrounge some Light Anti-Tank Weapons (LAWs).

The scene is now set with two camps near the Bru village of Lang Vei and track sound being heard on several evenings before the attacks. On the evening of 8 February the new camp was hit with artillery and mortar fire followed by an infantry attack led by PT 76 light amphibious tanks. The forces fought back and called artillery from the KSCB on the attacking NVA. Some of the LAWs failed to operate correctly and many of those that did were ineffective. Eventually, the defenders of the new camp either secluded themselves in the deep underground command bunker or fled to the old camp. The fight continued all night long. CPT Willoughby requested reinforcement by the Marines from KSCB, but was turned down twice!

Communications from the command bunker became difficult with the antennas knocked down but the single side band radio with its buried antennae continued to allow communications to the outside. At this point there was a PT 76 tank on top of the command bunker and the NVA were throwing tear gas down into the bunker. CPT Willoughby and his crew continued to communicate.

Forces from the old camp, supported by artillery and air strikes made up to five attempts to reach the bunker with no success. The 7 weak from wounds and dehydration survivors in the bunker made their plans to escape. CPT Willoughby told the aircraft overhead to make 3 hot strafing runs over the camp and then make runs without firing. During the "dry" runs the survivors would make a dash to the old camp. Actually it was to be more of a limp. The survivors met little opposition and with the help of a brave Vietnamese Lieutenant who drove a jeep to pick them up made it to the old camp.

The final saga of the battle was the evacuation. There are several versions of the fight for helicopters, but COL Ladd, the 5th Special Forces Commander in Danang was forced to go to General Westmoreland who was in a meeting with LTG Cushman (the Corps Commander) and could not be disturbed. COL Ladd turned to GEN Abrams who had established a MACV forward command in the northern part of the country. GEN Abrams ordered the Marines to release the helicopters to rescue the survivors of the battle. The relief operation was planned by the Special Forces at Lang Vei and lead by Major George Quomo. After reluctance of the Marine CH 46 helicopter pilots to land at the old camp the Americans and the wounded along with the Laotian Battalion leadership were evacuated by air to KSCB and then once medically treated were taken to Danang. The individual soldiers and the Bru civilians were left to fend for themselves. They walked the distance to the combat base where they were disarmed and turned away. (This was to create a political incident between the Laotian government and MACV.) I radioed Quang Tri thru may radio relay that the 1500 or so mixed group was on its way. The advisory team in Quang Tri prepared to house and care for these stragglers. The Laotians were evacuated through Saigon back to Laos.

Route 9 was now not impeded—the Lang Vei and District Headquarters impediments had now been removed. The route to the KSCB was now open and the noose had been tightened.

THE KHE SANH VILLAGE FIGHT

At 0500 the North Vietnamese Army (NVA) attacked the Khe Sanh Combat Base (KSCB) rockets and artillery. The sound of the barrage woke up the District Advisory Team and the defenders of the District Headquarters (a mixture of Bru Montagnards, Vietnamese Regional Forces, Marines from Combined Action Company O (CAC-O) and the small 4 man advisory team.

At 0530 the ground attack against the District Headquarters began. NVA after action reports suggest that the attack was 30 minutes late in being launched. The attacking force from the 66th NVA Regiment had been slowed down by the B-52 strike of the previous day—all of the downed trees etc. that it caused.
The weather on the morning of 21 January 1968 was extremely foggy with visibility down to no more than 5-10 yards. Fortunately some of the improvements made due to the observed activity at the KSCB included the emplacement of trip flares along the entire outer perimeter.

Another improvement that CPT Nhi had made was to place a 3 man element on the roof of the warehouse. These brave montagnards were equipped with a case of grenades to drop on any one trying to conceal themselves behind the warehouse. Both of these improvements were to prove critical to the defense of the District Headquarters.

The District Headquarters to include the Regional Force Compound to the south bordering the Landing Zone

The attack with artillery and mortar rounds impacting throughout the area. One bunker was directly hit and collapsed on the occupants. SFC Perry dug the survivors out and treated them in a makeshift aid station. The enemy sought to penetrate the compound in the seam between the Regional Force Compound and the District Headquarters which was defended by Bru montagnards and Marines under the command of SGT Balanco.

The initial ground assault was announced by trip flares being set off. The Bru knew where to shoot when certain trip flares were set off. Thus they could engage the enemy that they could not see. The same was true for Regional Force (RFs) in their old French fort made of pierced steel planning with about 12-18 inches of Khe Sanh red clay filling the space in between. It stood up well to the enemy attack.

CPT Nhi and CPT Clarke were in the command bunker in the center of the compound. CPT Clarke was to request and adjust over 1100 rounds or artillery during the next 30 hours. The advisory team had 4 preplanned concentrations that were shaped like an L and located basically at each corner of the compound. By moving those concentrations East and West and North and South one could cover the whole compound with steel. The only rounds fired were fuse variable time (VT) a round that detonates in the air and throw shrapnel down to hit everyone who was not in a bunker with over- head cover.

The Marines in the compound became the fire brigade. SGT Balanco moved Marines around to meet the largest threats. The presence Of Marines bolstered the morale of the RFs who had born the brunt of the attack. The ground attacks came in several waves, each of which was stopped. The key spot was the two bunkers on each side of the seam between the two parts of the headquarters. The NVA seemed to be on something as an example when I shot an NVA sapper who was trying to take the north western bunker in the RF compound the two parts of his body, though separated continued to move towards the bunker with his pole charge. (A charge on the end of a pole to place the charge into an aperture of the bunker and detonate it so as to create a gap in the defense.) SFC Perry also thought that the NVA was on something.

In the late morning the fog burned off and the defenders were able to get some air support. This will be the discussion in our next article.

Air Support for Khe Sanh Village

In the last several articles we have discussed the bravery of the defenders on the ground in Khe Sanh village. In this article we shall discuss the use of air support to provide a critical ingredient in the successful defense of the District Headquarters and the rendering combat ineffective a North Vietnamese Army (NVA) regiment.

The dense fog finally burned off in late morning. A Marine Forward Air Controller (FAC) put in a flight of 2 F-4s to attack targets to the south of the District Headquarters. One of the F-4s was shot down. Following this the FAC advised that: "That's all I can do!"

Fortunately, part of the preparations of the defense was to establish an alternate form of communication with the Province Advisory Team in Quang Tri. Radio contact with Quang Tri was always spotty at best, in spite of numerous efforts at antennae construction and acquisition of more powerful radios. The Special Forces had established a radio relay site on a high hill north (hill 950) of the Khe Sanh Combat Base. The Special Forces were able to talk to Quang Tri and thus relay messages. CPT Clarke kept Quang Tri informed as to the status of the defense and when the Marine FAC could not provide additional air support he requested it form Quang Tri.

CPT Ward Britt (one of the advisory team's FACs) flew his light observation aircraft through the valleys to reach Khe Sanh and to coordinate for air support. He requested air support from air craft attacking targets along the Ho Chi Minh trail in Laos. The pilots flew below the clouds to the village. Every time he coordinated for bombs on a target and he blew away the trees to the south he found more targets.

CPT Nhi was listening to one of the NVA tactical radio nets and heard a request for additional stretchers to carry off wounded soldiers. This was passed to CPT Britt who found the force of about 100 enemy and after another air strike he could not see any movement. This became the norm as CPT Nhi provided target locations to CPT Clarke who then vectored CPT Britt to the target.

In the middle of this CPT Britt landed at KSCB and refueled under fire. He remained on station until the approach of dusk. At that point he had to return to Quang Tri. For his bravery he was awarded the Silver Star.

CPT Clarke and CPT Nhi tried to guess where the enemy would go to regroup. Based upon their analysis a B-52 strike was requested. They provided a rectangle 3 kilometers long and 1 kilometer wide that was centered on the hilly area about 6-7 kilometers south of the District Headquarters. The Province Advisory team coordinated with the Air Force and the mission was flown. Several days later a NVA soldier deserted and was picked up by the Special Forces at Lang Vei. He told them that his unit had been hit by the B-52 strike.

Before the B-52 strike a gun ship (Spooky—a C-47 plane that carried flares and several mini-guns) patrolled the area and engaged every target that it saw. It was a quiet night except for some snipers.

The combination of artillery, air support and the bravery of the Bru, Vietnamese, Marine and army soldiers inside the headquarters combined to render a regiment combat ineffective

THE BATTLE OF KHE SANH VILLAGE IS OVER

The morning of 22 January 1968 dawned bright and quiet. The North Vietnamese Army (NVA) forces were gone. There was a sense of exhilaration in the District Headquarters—the attack had been stopped! Patrols were launched to determine the damage and collect information on the enemy. There were numerous blood trails and bodies found. Over 150 weapons and 3 Rocket Propelled Launcher 7s (the first seen in South Vietnam) were recovered. Many of the weapons still had cosmoline on them as they must have just been issued.

As the Marines and District Forces were conducting their limited patrols LT Stamper (Combined Action Company Commander) was boarding and flying by helicopter to the Khe Sanh Combat Base (KSCB). He was not to be seen again. He radioed back to the Marines to pack their stuff as they were being evacuated.

Colonel Lownds sent a radio message to the Advisory team that he could no longer provide artillery support to the District forces. Both CPTS Nhi and Clarke reported this to their superiors in Quang Tri. Bob Brewer, the Province Senior Advisor said that there was a long meeting. No one wanted to evacuate the District Headquarters as it would be the first governmental headquarters ever surrendered. In the end the order was given to evacuate.

SFC Perry with all of the wounded and SFC Kaspar were evacuated by helicopter. SFC King and CPT Clarke worked with CPT Nhi to organize the withdrawal from the village. The small force of about 140 men followed a little known trail to reach KSCB. Throughout the trek CPT Clarke was coordinating with the Special Forces in FOB-3 for mortar coverage along the route and a reception when they got to KSCB. (The Marines had told the advisors that armed Vietnamese and montagnard soldiers could not enter their compound.)
The small force reached FOB-3 and were assigned defensive areas on the it's perimeter to prepare fighting positions. Little did they know that this was going to last over 77 days.

CPT Clarke reported all of the weapons that had been left behind. The Special Forces quickly organized a raid to get back into the District Headquarters to recover the NVA weapons and destroy anything else of worth that was there. CPT Clarke was the second in command of this raid and led the Special Forces into the compound after they were landed in the wrong spot.

The weapons were loaded and hauled off and then the helicopters returned for the raiding force. CPT Clarke remembers lying on the floor of the UH-1 helicopter and emptying his 30 round magazine at an NVA patrol that was approaching the village from the west as they were leaving.

Later the charges set in the food warehouse exploded as did the grenades that CPT Clarke had used to booby trap the food in the Advisor's store room.

The battle of Khe Sanh village had ended. Just over 50 years ago, but sometimes it seems like yesterday. Post Scripts: The Special Forces at Land Vei offered what was called a Mike Force to re-secure the village, but this request was never acted upon. When the 37th Army of Vietnam Ranger Battalion was sent to Khe Sanh the original intent was for it to be used to re-secure the village, but the Marines would not support such an attack.

BATTLE WON! WAR LOST

On the 1st of April 1968 the 1st Cavalry Division (Airmobile) launched Operation Pegasus. Many newly interested authors focus on the battle for the old French fort. What they don't realize that just as the operation was beginning the war was being officially lost.

As the senior advisor in Khe Sanh before the beginning of the "agony of Khe Sanh" on 21 January 1968 I was seconded to the 1st Cavalry Division to assist in the planning for Operation Pegasus. (For a complete discussion of the siege of Khe Sanh see: www. Expendablewarriors.com or my recent postings here.)

It was strange to fly over what had once been the area along route 9 and see rice paddies where there had never been paddies before. In actuality what I was seeing was bomb craters that were filled with rain water. (I flew into Khe Sanh with Major General John Tolson (commander of the 1st Cavalry Division) several times, During the planning process units from the 1st Cav, the 101st Airborne Division and the 3rd Marines were conducting operations along the DMZ as a diversion to the relief operation. The engineers were busy building a short runway and underground bunkers for the command and control of Operation Pegasus near Calu. The new facility was to be named LZ Stud.

For Operation Pegasus the 1st Cav had an extensive set of capabilities

- The 1st Cavalry Division with its 400+ helicopters
- A Marine BDE with augmenting engineers and artillery
- An Army of Vietnam (ARVN) airborne brigade
- 26th Marine Regiment +--the whole force defending the Combat Base (5000 strong)
- Massive air support

This was the equivalent of a small Corps.

The attack began the morning of the April 1st with the Marine Brigade attacking along route 9. Its mission was to open Route 9 from LZ Stud to the combat base. This required the repair of numerous road by passes that had been destroyed by the NVA and neglect over more than a year. The air assault was delayed until 1 PM due to fog in the Khe Sanh area. The initial air assault was into areas where the vegetation had been flattened. or by use of a bomb called a Daisy Cutter (a 20,000 pound bomb that was dropped from a C130 aircraft and detonated when the long pipe that was its detonator struck the ground—thus creating standoff and blowing things down without creating a crater). The Infantry and engineers followed to secure the area and move the blow down so that howitzers, crews and ammunition could be lifted in. As a result a firebase was created.

With fire support for support of the infantry and to support the next hop forward closer to Khe Sanh the next unit could be inserted and the leap frog towards the combat base and the enemy could continue.

It was on this day 1 April 1968 when the war was lost. Major Paul Schwartz and I had to brief General Tolson on the proposed concept for the Division's next mission—clearing the NVA out of the A Shau Valley (about 40-50 kilometers south of Khe Sanh. There were 4 people present at the briefing—General Tolson, his Chief of Staff, Major Schwartz and myself. We proposed attacking through Khe Sanh to the Vietnam-Laos border. Going into Laos, cleaning up the Ho Chi Minh Trail and then turning south to enter the A Shau Valley from the west—not the traditional route which was from the east. There were 90 days of supplies at Khe Sanh to draw upon and thus not have to back haul. Most importantly such an approach would have caught the NVA by surprise and had war winning effects.

After about 4 minutes of briefing General Tolson said" "Obviously you didn't hear the President last night! What you are proposing is politically impossible." Lyndon Johnson had just announced a partial bombing halt in an effort to enter negotiations with North Vietnam.

3 years later the US was to support ARVN in Lam Son 719A which was an attack into Laos where the ARVN got clobbered. The NVA had used the 3 years to recover. A year or so later President Nixon was to start the B-52 bombing missions over Hanoi and Haiphong. These would result in a peace agreement.

President Johnson's bombing halt decision was when the US decided to not try and win the war on the battlefield—just as the NVA were on the throes of collapse. There war was winnable after the eventual Khe Sanh and Tet victories, but the political climate in the US had so turned against the war there was no political will to try and win on the battlefield.

1968 ADVISORY TEAM 4 NEWSLETTER WRITTEN IN APRIL 1968

There was a battle fought in Khe Sanh on 21 and 22 January 1968 that very few people know about. Everyone knows of the artillery barrages and the trenches, but one of the big battles took place when at 0500 hours 21 January 1968 the 66th Regiment, 304th NVA Division launched an attack against the Huong Hoa District Headquarters in Khe Sanh Village (about 4km south of the Khe Sanh Combat Base). The District Headquarters was defended by an understrength Regional Force (RF) Company, elements of 2 (Popular Force) PF platoons and Combined Action Company O (CAC-O) Headquarters and one Combined Action Platoon (CAP) with 10 or more Marines.

The attack was from three directions with the main effort coming from the southwest against the RF Company. The weather was extremely poor with very heavy fog. The initial enemy assault was beaten off by the courageous efforts of the RF Company and by almost constant barrages of Variable Time fused artillery fire. After the initial assault was broken, the enemy simply backed off and using the positions he had already prepared, attempted to destroy the key bunkers by recoilless rifle and B-40 fire. Simultaneously they moved into Khe Sanh village and setup mortars with which they attempted to shell the compound. At this time the police station was still communicating with the District Headquarters and made it possible to put effective fire on the enemy moving into the village. For the next four hours there were constant attacks or probes against the compound which were beaten off by the valiant efforts of Bru (Montagnard) PFs and the Vietnamese RFs working with the Marines who SGT John Balanco moved to critical areas of the fight, as needed. These various types of soldiers fought as a coordinated team. The four advisors were constantly moving through the compound, reassuring, reorganizing and helping the compounds' defenders.

At about 1130 the fog burned off. During the next five hours there were three attempts to resupply the beleaguered garrison, which was in dire straights for ammunition. The third attempt included a 46 man RF reaction force that was badly mauled. LTC Joe Seymoe, the Deputy Senior Province Advisor, lost his life in this effort. All during the afternoon CPT Ward Britt, an Air Force FAC, working out of Quang Tri put in numerous air strikes on the massed NVA who were trying to reorganize. On one of these airstrikes he put in two fighters on 100 NVA in the open and after it was over he could not see any movement, just bodies.

The night of 21 January the NVA were unable to make an attack and only sniped throughout the night.

The next morning the evacuation of District Headquarters was ordered after Colonel Lownds, CO, 26th Marine Regiment, ordered the evacuation or the Marines from the garrison. The marines and the wounded were evacuated by air. CPT Clarke and SFC King, two of the advisors, accompanied the District Forces who, using an unknown route, successfully escaped from the District Headquarters.

MEMORIES

During the first 5 days of July the 3rd Bn, 26th Marines was conducting search and destroy operations in the western end of what was known as "Happy Valley". On 3 July, Lima 3/26 lost three men while engaging an NVA unit in the tiny village of Tung Heo Bac, 14 kilometers north-northeast of the Ha Tin airfield. The three men were

- Cpl Franklin D. Ratliff, Chattanooga, TN;
- LCpl Arnold A. Ades, St Paul, MN; and
- Pvt Thomas A. Strande, Chicago, IL.

My main Man Phineas and I always debated anyone about the date of that event. Both of us were convinced it was July 4th not the third. Years later I got copies of letters Bill Correia sent his folks talking about that day. The letters were dated July 3rd.I remember the events so clearly, as if they occurred this morning. Bill was close to Strande and his loss is something, I am sure, Bill carries to this day L/ Cpl Ades is not someone I knew and until I read the Virtual Wall info I never knew he was KIA or even who he was for that fact. My Bad!

'RAT' was quite the other story Struggling with the poncho used to carry him back into the perimeter his best friend Davis with tears running down his face said, "They shot him right through his heart". "He had the biggest heart of anyone." I was able to assist carrying 'Rat' to the chopper that carried him from the field of battle. It was 'Rat' who wasn't sure to stand and salute or sit and laugh when I strolled into the tent where they were playing Bid-Wiz while wearing a fatigue blouse that had a Captain's insignia sewn onto the collar. I demanded a proper salute but couldn't keep a straight face.

Perhaps it was the fact as Bill Correi said, "You looked like you were 12 years old."

Amid all that happened that day I received a bunch of 'Atta Boys' for getting confirmed kills. I know of one for sure but the letters Correi sent home said the guns got six confirmed.

I'm certain that we got six of them if not more. While I started the firing with the first NVA, I rolled left and Ronnie Marcella shouldered the 'gun' as I opened cans to feed him additional belts. Six confirmed was an easy count as once I opened up on the first one there was a flurry of NVA all charging the perimeter at one point. It was like turning the lights on in the kitchen and watching as the roaches scattered.

I always wonder how receiving positive reinforcement to such a negative action [taking a human life a 5th commandment thing] shaped my psychic outlook. Well, just some thoughts and memories of a time some 54 years ago.

Enjoy your Families and Loved ones this weekend.
Never Forget.

Remembering Jerry Ferren, Dave Divik, Gunny Dadamo, and all who lost their life onboard USMC VMGR 152 C-130 " 149813 Feb 10, 68.. Also, Pilot Budd Wildfang... who stayed at the controls hands-on fire... Thoughts of Danny Sullivan who got Jerry into his ambulance and to Charlie Med.

I'd spoken to Jerry Ferren three days before 813 went down. Jerry was regular crew on many 152 Khe Sanh flights, Dec, Jan Feb. He'd just received a letter from his wife informing him she'd just given birth to his daughter. He was thrilled. Jerry only had 17 days left in-country. We were friends. Jerry loved his Nikon camera. He told me to buy a pair of Nikon 8x35 binoculars for my 152 flare drop mapping job. He volunteered for 813, taking the crew spot for another navigator who was ill. The crew was an all-volunteer mission since the cargo was liquid oxygen for Charley Med, chopper fuel bladders, and flames ignition caps....

NVA guns on the approach. In the detailed after-action reports, Dave Divik came to the aid of Gunny Datamo, who fell to NVA 51 that raked the fuselage when he was trying to stop the escaping fuel flowing in toward the bladders that were igniting from taking the 51s, fire. Their bodies were found clinging together by KS Crash Crew. Dave was found laying on top of Gunny D. Jerry deliberately stood on the small platform at the forward hatch, blocking flames from the cabin with his body, protecting the flight deck crew trying to land 813 off the flight line to keep it open to traffic.

Jerry Ferren passed in the Sam Antonio Burn Center on Mar 1. I didn't know until a buddy wrote Jerry a letter, that was returned stamped ' Deceased, ' in red. As Danny Sullivan, everyone thought Jerry survived. We had a small memorial for VMGR 152 Khe Sanh losses in May. Jerry's nephew contacted my April, 010... to tell me Jerry's daughter he never saw, born during the siege, was a Missouri school teacher... I asked him about Jerry's Nikon... He told me his family had received it. Sad indeed...

My platoon CP bunker was just off of the runway, about 50 meters from the crash site. I just happened to be standing outside my bunker when this event unfolded. The plane was slowly coming to a stop and it veered off of the runway to the right. The aircraft seemed to be tilted to the right because of the slope of the elevated runway. Initially, for a very short time, there seemed to be no smoke or evidence of fire. Someone opened the escape hatch above the cockpit and exited. I assumed they were the pilot/ copilot. Then the aircraft started to show smoke and the subsequent fire. The crash crew was on site and attempted to extinguish the fire and enter the aircraft to rescue any passengers, but the flames quickly engulfed the aircraft. I happen to have a few pictures of the burning aircraft.

This accident drew quite a crowd. I began to tell Marines who were spectators to get back into their bunkers/trenchline. We had an active NVA 60mm mortar right outside the wire (the north perimeter facing hill 1015). "C" Company had already lost some Marines to the H&I fires. I was concerned that the NVA would drop in a few rounds, but thankfully that never happened. Also, I was concerned about what cargo the aircraft was carrying.

During the siege (can't recall if it was before or after the C-130 crash) an AF C-130 (painted cammie pattern) was hit on the landing approach, landing west to easy. At the end of the runway the turnaround apron was outside of the wire near the steep drop-off of the terrain. The bird turned around, shut down and sat on the apron outside of the wire. I thought we would have been ordered to go out and provide some type of security. Alpha Co had a platoon manning the trench near the aircraft.

We still had that 60mm mortar active and the NVA were digging assault trenches near the runway and it wasn't uncommon for NVA troops to shoot at aircraft landing and taking off. in An RPG could have easily destroyed the C-130. We finally found out about the death of the trapped Marines in their aircraft and the cargo of fuel bladders. Well after the war I read that the AF C-130 was carrying pallets of artillery rounds and the pilot decide it was too dangerous to come into the base. After determine that the bird was safe, he taxied to the terminal. I think that plane stayed there for a few days while a crew of mechanics were sent up to fix the plane and it eventually took off.

Sadly, in almost the same location as the Marine C-130, a CH-53 Sea Stallion had it's tail assembly hit by a mortar round (the 60 that I mentioned?) as it was lifting off and fell about 30' impacting to the right of the runway. The big floppy blades continued to turn and when the bird hit the ground, the blades kept going downward and sliced through the cockpit. The pilot and copilot were both decapitated.

Although my company (Charlie) was not in the thick of ground combat, we experience the unfortunate fate of our Company CP taking two direct hits resulting in the death of several Marines. The first was at the beginning of the siege and the second was when our brand new CP was hit on March 22. We also lost several Marines to sniper and incoming. In writing this, I can recall all of this as if it happened just yesterday.

OBIT

RONALD MARCELLA, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN, LIMA CO 3/26

With a heavy heart I am reporting the passing of my Brother Ronald F. Marcella. I first meet Ron at KheSanh on January 2, 1968 my second day in country Ronnie was later to be my team leader and squad leader, both duties which he eventually passed on to me. As fate would have it I reconnected with Ronnie in August of 2010.We stayed in constant touch these past eleven years and had many a memory and story to share. Along his journey Ronnie was able to attend several of our KSVA reunions, most recently the 50th anniversary in Washington DC.

Ronnie shall be laid to rest after a private service at St Marys Catholic Church and interred with his late wife Sarah. He is survived by his children Genevieve, Jessica, Mariah, and Christian. He is also survived by his grandchildren Isabella and Joseph, as well as many nieces, nephews, Sister-in-laws and cousins. While a deep void shall exist with Ronnies passing it should be said that we are all better off for having had the pleasure of his company along this journey. Rest Peacefully alongside your mate Sarah. K now that we'll see you in that morning when we shall all be together again.
Go with God my Brother.

OBIT

MICHAEL E. O'HARA, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN, BRAVO CO 1/26

Michael E. O'Hara in prayerful hope went to be with his Lord and Savior on April 16, 2021.

Michael was born in Indianapolis on 31 May 1948, the second of six children born to Wayne and Gladys O'Hara.

Michael spent his youth in Brown County, Indiana. He obtained his work permit at the age of 14 and immediately entered into the workforce. During his summer months, Michael worked under the employ of Mr. Dick Wetzel. It was in the burning hot hayfields of what was once Bakalar Air Base that Michael began to develop his strong personal ethic of hard work and determination.

Michael graduated from Brown County High School (BCHS) in 1966 with academic achievements. Soon, as Michael began to evolve as an adult citizen, he became convinced because of his compassionate spirit that the only thing he could do to contribute to a better world was to become a United States Marine. Michael served honorably, in 1968, with Co "B" 1st Battalion 26th Marine Regiments during the infamous "Siege of Khe Sanh." Michael would be awarded three Purple Heart Medals for his courage during intense combat operations. Upon returning to the continental U.S. as a very young Sergeant, he would spend the next two years training over 200,000 Marine Recruits in the arts of weaponry. Michael would one day say it was the most important job he ever held, and he was just 20 years old. Michael has always cared deeply for all of his "Marines."

Upon returning to civilian life, Michael would eventually become a small business owner as proprietor of Michael E. O'Hara Custom Carpentry. His artistic skills can still be seen in many homes and businesses in the Brown County area.

However, in 1993, as Michael's children were leaving the nest, he knew in his deepest thoughts he had much to do. Michael never forgot all the suffering brought about because of the Vietnam War. He set out to honor his high school friend, Larry C. Banks, the only native son to fall during those tragic days. Michael successfully led a drive to name the new high school gymnasium after his friend while also establishing a scholarship fund which has helped numerous young people from the county further their education.

KHE SANH VETERAN, IN THE NEWS

STORIES OF HONOR: A FORTUNATE MAN DUNCAN ADAMS

PAUL J. BEAUSOLEIL, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN, MIKE CO 3/3

Grief threw a catch into Paul Joseph Beausoleil's voice.

The Vietnam Veteran, now 74, had just opened a Veterans of Foreign Wars book titled "Brutal Battles of Vietnam." He had turned to a page about the Hill Fights, which occurred during the spring of 1967 near Khe Sanh.

Beausoleil and fellow U.S. Marines had endured the bloody battles there, fighting at Hill 881 South against soldiers from the North Vietnamese Army. He survived without major injury. But many of his fellow Marines were killed or suffered grievous wounds.

Beausoleil still carries visions of the carnage and sometimes wonders why he lived and so many others did not. Military historians have observed that the Hill Fights featured some of the Vietnam War's most vicious and bloody fighting.

That was my life-changing experience," he said during a recent interview at the home in Anaconda he shares with his wife, Michelle. I can still hear the screaming, the crying I guess you would say, of the wounded," Beausoleil said, shaking his head.

Just two years before the notorious Hill Fights, Beausoleil had graduated from Anaconda Central High School. He decided to follow in the footsteps of his father, World War II veteran Paul V. Beausoleil, and become a U.S. Marine — a decision he said kind of shocked his father but also made him proud. He entered the Marine Corps in January 1966 and left for boot camp in San Diego. He said U.S. involvement in the Vietnam War was escalating and he didn't want to miss the fight

For any young buck born after the World War II era, the mindset was you didn't want to miss a war," Beausoleil said. Boot camp was, he said, the most grueling 12 weeks of his life. He said his drill instructor, Sgt. C. Paine, was aptly named.

In March 1966, Beausoleil graduated from boot camp and joined forever the steadfast Semper Fi community.

"That's the proudest day of your life," he said.

All these decades later, hearing the "Marines' Hymn" elicits a predictable reaction. Even "today, I get the chills right up my spine," Beausoleil said.

In June 1966, he deployed to Vietnam. When he stepped unarmed off the military plane in Da Nang he was nearly overwhelmed by the heat and humidity.

"We didn't have any weapons at that point. I thought, 'Jesus, Mary and Joseph, there's something wrong with this picture," Beausoleil said. Ultimately, Beausoleil's service in Vietnam as a foot soldier, or "grunt," took him from Da Nang to the Demilitarized Zone, or DMZ. Ultimately, Beausoleil's service in Vietnam as a foot soldier, or "grunt," took him from Da Nang to the Demilitarized Zone, or DMZ.

He was first assigned to Headquarters Company, 3rd Marine Regiment, Security Section.

In January 1967, he was assigned to Mike Company, 3rd Battalion, 3rd Marines, and to patrol duty near the DMZ in a strategically important area known as the Rockpile.

In late April 1967, Beausoleil and other Marines were trucked and then flown to Khe Sanh Combat Base. His company received orders to join an assault of Hill 881 South.

"Our main mission was to take these hills and clear them of the enemy," he said. "We were working toward that objective."

A history of the assault reported that that North Vietnamese Army "had expertly camouflaged themselves on Hill 881 South" and the Marines who started up the hill did not know that a large number of enemy soldiers awaited their ascent.

Beausoleil said the fighting was the most intense he'd experienced. "Everything you can imagine happened there," he said.

The M16s issued to the Marines were notorious for jamming.

"I'm no hero, by any means, but I served with a lot of them," Beausoleil said.

"During that period of time, I used about five rifles.

You had to take them off dead bodies," he said.

Paul Beausoleil remembers his friend who passed away during the Vietnam War. "I wasn't with him when he died. I always wondered where he was and I tried to look him up," says Beausoleil. He said he made a strong connection with Robert Hice because they had similar backgrounds growing up in blue collar towns. Beausoleil found Robert Hice's name on the Wall when he visited Washington DC. "He was just a really good man. He should have survived."

put that napalm right down on us. It was so close I can still feel the heat to this day."

Ultimately, an intense air bombardment by Marine F-4 Phantom Jets allowed Marines on the ground to capture Hill 881 South. The Marines discovered more than 250 bunkers the NVA had built. The intense bombing runs had destroyed most of them.

One account of the Hill Fights quotes a Captain Rogers describing how moved he'd been by the valor of youthful Marines involved in the battles for Hill 881 North and Hill 881 South.

"I learned to respect the individual Marine — the 18

-year-old, 19-year-old, 20-year-old — more in this one particular battle than any other time that I've been in the Marine Corps. He was given a job; he went up in the face of danger, in the face of just being blown away, more or less, and he went up and did his job. To see the faces of the Marines dragging back their dead buddies, their wounded buddies, you could see how close the Marines really were with each other."

Beausoleil agreed with Capt. Rogers' assessment, but added, "By the time we came home, we were old men."

In July 1967, having served his 13 months in Vietnam, Beausoleil returned to the U.S. and to his family of origin in Anaconda. There had been no opportunity to decompress" There was no transition from the field to my mother's kitchen," he said. "That wasn't good." After a 30-day leave, Beausoleil's service with the Marines continued. Following Sea School training at San Diego he was assigned to the USS Bon Homme Richard, an aircraft carrier, thereby honoring the early roots of the Corps by becoming a seagoing Marine.

Beausoleil was honorably discharged in May 1972 as a sergeant. He returned to Anaconda, where he worked through the years as a smelterman, drove a truck for the county and held other jobs.

He met and married Michelle. They have five children.

Beausoleil readily acknowledges that memories of combat in Vietnam surface from time to time in ways that can ambush his emotions. He said he believes veterans should reach out for help if they are struggling.

He considers himself lucky to have survived the war, to have married and raised a family and to be a U.S. Marine.

WHY THE ENEMY SHOULD HAVE BROUGHT A BATTALION TO KILL THIS SOLDIER

"I'm a fortunate man," he said.

Specialist Michael Fitzmaurice was stationed in the area near Khe Sanh on March 23, 1971. The base had just been re-activated to support Operation Lam Son 719, the South Vietnamese invasion of Laos. That night in March, the American base was attacked by North Vietnamese regular army sappers, who expected to overrun the Americans.

They just didn't count on a 21-year-old from the Dakotas being there. They should have – and they should have brought more sappers.

Operation Lam Son 719 was an effort by the South Vietnamese to invade Laos to be able to cut off the Ho Chi Minh Trail, North Vietnam's "secret" supply line into the South. It did not go well for the Army of the Republic of Vietnam (ARVN) forces or the Americans who were there to evacuate the wounded and cover their retreat. By March 25, 1971, the ARVN were in full retreat. Two days before the end of Lam Son, however, the North Vietnamese tried to hit the Army's base at Khe Sanh with a force of sappers. Luckily the Army was able to repel the surprise attack and turn the NVA around.

Among those Army troops stationed at Khe Sanh that day was Michael J. Fitzmaurice, a soldier from the Dakotas who was about to take it to the Communists like a badass American from the Great North.

Fitzmaurice was manning a bunker that day with three other members of his unit, unaware that the base had been infiltrated by NVA sappers. What he did notice was three explosive charges tossed in the bunker from out of nowhere. He quickly tossed two of them out of the bunker and then threw his body, flak vest first, over the last explosive. The blast severely wounded Fitzmaurice and partially blinded him, but his fellow soldiers were still alive. But Fitzmaurice didn't stop there. He also didn't stay there.

He left the bunker and began taking down enemy troops with his rifle, one after another until another grenade hit him and disabled that rifle. Still undeterred, he stopped an enemy soldier with his bare hands, killed him, took his weapon, and began fighting on. With that weapon in hand, he went back to the bunker and started taking down the attackers one by one, refusing to be evacuated.

For saving his buddies and taking down the enemy in the most conspicuous manner possible, he Was rightfully awarded the Medal Of Honor

GLENN E. PRENTICE, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN, I CO 3/26, C BTRY 1/13

10-years ago I did a little documentary called Khe Sanh: A Walk in the Clouds. Tonight I got the news that one of my Marines and friend from the doc, Sgt Glenn E. Prentice, has passed.

There we are below in 2001 on top of Hill 881 south in Khe Sanh, Vietnam. I'm kneeling between 2 heroes, Sgt Glenn Prentice to my right and Cpl Bob Arrotta to my left. Both of these heroes fought and survived through the 77-day Siege at Khe Sanh.

Arrotta was the forward air controller with India Company 3/26 up on 881 during the whole siege. Captain Bill Dabney was his CO, who happened to be married to Chesty Puller's daughter. Imagine that guy being your father in-law.

They dubbed Arrotta the Mightiest Corporal in the Marine Corps because of the amount of ordinance he brought down on the NVA during the siege. Undoubtedly he saved a lot of Marines lives and for his actions he was awarded the Silver Star.

Bob and Glenn remained the best of friends for years after the war until Bob passed unexpectedly in 2009. They shared a true Marine brotherhood and Glenn never seemed the same after Bob's passing. Now you're together again boys and that makes me smile no matter how sad the whole thing is.

Glenn... I will always cherish the memories from our trips to Vietnam, humping those hills, the leeches, and the red clay stuck to our boots. You supported me and everything I did and I don't think I ever got the chance to truly thank you and tell you how much it meant to me. You always took the time brother. You even flew to NY with me to be there when I met the Dunham's for the first time. I asked you why and you told me... "Because he's a Marine."

Today I drove to San Diego and it's weird how I thought about you as I passed through Oceanside... thinking to myself... I need to call you. 2 hours later I got the news. It saddens me to know that you're gone and that I didn't get a chance to talk to you one more time.

He was Buried at the Miramar National Cemetery. One of the most generous individuals I have ever known. I hope he rests with the rewards he so nobly earned in his time on earth.

AMERICAN HERO

American Hero: The most decorated Native American soldier in U.S. history - 4 Silver Stars, 5 Bronze Stars, 3 Purple Hearts. He earned a total of 42 medals and citations. - Pascal Cleatus Poolaw Sr Died on the battlefield in the Republic of Vietnam on 7 November 1967, while serving with Company C, 26th Infantry Regiment, 1st Infantry Division. Posthumously awarded his 4th Silver Star on a "Search and Destroy mission" near Loc Ninh. Pascal Cleatus Poolaw Sr. is a full blooded Kiowa, was born on January 22, 1922 in Apache, Oklahoma. Poolaw served in World War II, the Korean War, and the Vietnam War.

In 1942, Poolaw, his father, and his two brothers joined the armed forces. While serving with the 8th Infantry Regiment's M Company near Recogne, Belgium on September 8, 1944, he earned his first Purple Heart and Silver Star. On that day, Poolaw's unit was engaging fire with the Germans. He pushed his company forward while facing heavy machine gun fire for give minutes as he hurled hand grenades, causing numerous enemy casualties. According to his Silver Star citation, " Due to Sergeant Poolaw's actions, many of his comrades' lives were saved and the company was able to continue the attack and capture strongly defended enemy positions. Sergeant Poolaw's display of courage, aggressive spirit and complete disregard for personal safety are in keeping with the highest traditions of the military service. "

Poolaw's military career did not end in Belgium or with the Germans. During the Korean War, lPoolaw saw combat and was wounded again and awarded the Distinguished Service Cross, a second Purple Heart and two more Silver Stars. His first Silver Star for that war was for his heroic actions on September 1950 when his company met still enemy resistance. Poolaw volunteered to lead his squad in an assault, charging up a slop to hit the perimeter of the North Korean's position. His squad engaged in fierce hand-to-hand combat and Poolaw's persistence encouraged his squad to keep going until they were able to seize their objective.

The second Silver Star during this war came on April 4, 1951 near Chongong-ni where Poolaw and his platoon was pinned down by a automatic weapons and mortar barrage. He exposed himself to the enemy and slowly advanced across the open terrain, firing his weapon as he went. By keeping the North Koreans' eyes on him, his platoon maneuvered to a better position and were able to carry on the mission at hand.

He returned to the U.S. in 1952 and retired from the Army ten years later. This is not where is story – or military career – ends.

During the Vietnam War, all four of the Poolaws sons were in the military. In February 1967, his son, Pascal Jr., was injured by a landmine in Vietnam. This injury resulted in amputation of his right leg below the knee. Poolaw's youngest son, Lindy, was drafted. Afraid of what could happen to his sons as the war progressed, Poolaw rejoined the Army at the age of 45. Giving up his rank as a 2nd Lieutenant (a promotion he earned in Korea), with the intentions of serving in direct combat, Poolaw hoped to keep his youngest son away from the front lines by taking his place. Regulations prohibited two members of the same family from serving in combat at the same time without their consent. Unfortunately, by the time he arrived on the West Coast, Lindy had left for Vietnam the day before.

Poolaw was deployed on May 31, 1967 as a first sergeant of the 26th Infantry Regiment's C Company. His last Silver Star was for an event that occurred a few months later. On November 7, 1967, Poolaw's unit were part of a search and destroy mission near the village of Loc Ninh. Their unit was ambushed by a Viet Cong force with intensive claymore mine, rocket, small arms, and automatic weapons fire. Through a hail of bullets, Poolaw raced to the lead squad position to lay down a base of fire – saving countless lives. While wounded, he continued moving among his squad making sure everyone was positioned properly while pulling casualties back.

As Poolaw was carrying a wounded soldier to safety, he was struck by a rocket propelled grenade and killed. For his heroic actions Poolaw was awarded a Silver Star and a third Purple Heart posthumously. "He has followed the trail of the great chiefs," his wife Irene said at Poolaw's funeral. "His people hold him in honor and highest esteem. He has given his life for the people and the country he loved so much."

The citation reads as follows; "The President of the United States of America, authorized by Act of Congress July 9, 1918, takes pleasure in presenting the Silver Star to Staff Sergeant Pascal Cleatus Poolaw (ASN: 18131087), United States Army, for gallantry in action against the enemy while serving with Company M, 8th Infantry Regiment, 4th Infantry Division, near Recogne, Belgium, on 8 September 1944. While attacking in support of a rifle company, Sergeant Poolaw displaced his machine gun squad forward across an open field under heavy mortar and small arms fire in such a manner as to affect a minimum number of casualties among his squad. After reaching his new position, Sergeant Poolaw saw the enemy advance in a strong counterattack. Standing unflinchingly in the face of withering machine gun fire for five minutes, he hurled hand grenades until the enemy force sustained numerous casualties and was dispersed. Due to Sergeant Poolaw's actions, many of his comrades' lives were saved and the company was able to continue the attack and capture strongly defended enemy positions. Sergeant Poolaw's display of courage, aggressive spirit and complete disregard for personal safety are in keeping with the highest traditions of the military service."

His 2nd Silver Star was awarded to him for his bravery under fire and his disregard for his own safety while assisting his brothers in arms. The citation for his second Silver Star, earned in Korea, is as follows;

"The President of the United States of America, authorized by Act of Congress, July 9, 1918, takes pleasure in presenting a Bronze Oak Leaf Cluster in lieu of a Second Award of the Silver Star to Sergeant First Class Pascal Cleatus Poolaw (ASN: 18131087), United States Army, for conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity in action while serving with Company C, 27th Infantry Regiment, 25th Infantry Division. On 19 September 1950 when the company attack on an enemy position was halted by stiff enemy resistance, Sergeant First Class Poolaw volunteered to lead his squad in an assault. Courageously leading his men in a charge up the slope to penetrate the enemy perimeter and engage the numerically superior enemy in fierce hand-to-hand combat, Sergeant First Class Poolaw inspired his men to hold their position until the remainder of the company was able to seize the objective. Sergeant First Class Poolaw's outstanding leadership reflects great credit upon himself and is in keeping with the highest traditions of the American Soldier."

On April 4, 1951, once again, Sergeant Poolaw honored his people and the warriors creed by serving the calling of America. For his actions on that day, Master Sergeant Poolaw received his 3rd Silver Star. The third citation reads as follows:

"The President of the United States of America, authorized by Act of Congress, July 9, 1918, takes pleasure in presenting a Second Bronze Oak Leaf Cluster in lieu of a Third Award of the Silver Star to Master Sergeant Pascal Cleatus Poolaw (ASN: 18131087), United States Army, for conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity in action while serving with Company C, 27th Infantry Regiment, 25th Infantry Division. On 4 April 1951 near Chongong-ni, Korea, while attacking strong hostile positions, one squad of Master Sergeant Poolaw's platoon was immobilized by a devastating automatic weapons and mortar barrage. Exposing himself to the deadly fire, he slowly advanced across open terrain, firing his rifle as he progressed. By deliberately diverting the attention of the foe to himself, he enabled his men to maneuver to more advantageous positions. Master Sergeant Poolaw's valorous actions were instrumental in the fulfillment of the unit mission and are in keeping with the highest traditions of the American Soldier."

The citation for First Sergeant Poolaw's 4th Silver Star, awarded posthumously for action in Vietnam, reads as follows; "The President of the United States of America, authorized by Act of Congress, July 8, 1918 (amended by act of July 25, 1963), takes pride in presenting a Third Bronze Oak Leaf Cluster in lieu of a Fourth Award of the Silver Star (Posthumously) to First Sergeant Pascal Cleatus Poolaw (ASN: 18131087), United States Army, for gallantry in action against a hostile force in the Republic of Vietnam on 7 November 1967, while serving with Company C, 26th Infantry Regiment, 1st Infantry Division. On this date, during Operation SHENANDOAH II, First Sergeant Poolaw was accompanying his unit on a two-company search and destroy mission near Loc Ninh. As the patrol was moving through a rubber plantation, they were subjected to sniper fire. Within minutes, the area was raked with intensive claymore mine, rocket, small arms, and automatic weapons fire from a numerically superior Viet Cong force.

First Sergeant Poolaw unhesitatingly ran to the lead squad which was receiving the brunt of the enemy fire. With complete disregard for his personal safety, he exposed himself to assist in deploying the men and establishing an effective base of fire. Although wounded, he continued to move about the area encouraging his men and pulling casualties to cover. He was assisting a wounded man to safety when he was mortally wounded by Viet Cong fire.

His dynamic leadership and exemplary courage contributed significantly to the successful deployment of the lead squad and undoubtedly saved the lives of many of his fellow soldiers. First Sergeant Poolaw's unquestionable valor in close combat against numerically superior hostile forces is in keeping with the finest traditions of the military service and reflects great credit upon himself, the 1st Infantry Division, and the United States Army. It should be noted that in the ferocious fighting at the Battle of Loc Ninh where he earned his 4th Silver Star and 3rd Purple Heart, it also resulted in the awards of Honor, 1 Distinguished Service Cross. . 14 other US Army soldiers also lost their lives in that engagement."

STEPHEN R. STEGICH III, USMC
KHE SANH VETERAN, HMM-262

STEGICH--Stephen RICHARD Stegich, III was born on March 17, 1942 in Little Falls, New York. He passed away on August 19th at his home in East Hampton at age 79. He is survived by his daughter, Stephanie Stegich and son, Erich (Diana) Stegich, his grandchildren Joshua, Olivia, Lila, Sophie and Marin, his four siblings, Donna Kauffman, Sharon (Bob) Avery, Alan (Maria) Stegich and Jeffrey (Kay) Stegich and many loving nieces, nephews and cousins. He was predeceased by his niece, the Hon. Louise K Sira. Steve was a proud veteran of the United States Marine Corps. He served as a combat helicopter pilot with squadron HMM 262 in the Vietnam War and received the Air Medal with 5 stars, a National Defense Medal, the Presidential Unit Citation for "extraordinary heroism in action against the enemy," and the Purple Heart. He survived two helicopter crashes, retiring as a Captain in 1969. after being seriously injured by gunfire while flying near Khe Sanh.

Prior to his service, Steve attended the University of Notre Dame on a military scholarship and graduated in 1965 with a BS in Architecture. When he came home from Vietnam, Steve practiced architecture in Syracuse, New York for a year and then returned to South Bend, where he started a family and attended Notre Dame law school and was a member of the Law Review. After receiving his JD in 1972, he moved to New York and began a 49-year career as an aviation lawyer and partner at Condon & Forsyth. He was serving his clients in the aviation industry until the day that he died and was preparing for an October 2021 oral argument before the United States Supreme Court.

He was beloved by many clients, colleagues and friends and was known as a brilliant and passionate lawyer. He was a mentor to many young lawyers and inspired his son and four nieces and nephews to follow him into the profession. Steve had boundless curiosity. He consumed books, poetry, films, music and news with enthusiasm, and he took an interest in everyone who crossed his path. He loved history, art, opera and seeing the world. He found love again in the last decade of his life, and that brought him and his family great joy. Perhaps because he came from modest means, Steve genuinely appreciated all of the finer things in life and loved sharing them with others. He celebrated his seminal birthdays with his children and closest friends in locations like London, Cortina Italy, and Barcelona. He was a master gift- giver and expert chef at Thanksgiving and Christmas. For the last 20 years, he enjoyed entertaining his family and friends in his yard in Wainscott, where his expertise in landscaping and green thumb were always on full display. His children and grandchildren were his greatest joy. They were a constant presence in his life. He attended his daughter Stephanie's countless marathons and was so proud of her accomplishments in her career and as a mother raising three girls. He was awed watching his son Erich grow his company from one employee into one of the preeminent general contractors in New York City.

He loved hearing about Erich's construction projects, encouraged his adventures and passed along to him a love of skiing, boats, planes, and cars from Stuttgart. He watched his grandson Josh play football from the age of six and was looking forward to watching him play this fall at Denison University. Steve frequently lectured his four granddaughters that women can do anything men can do, only more efficiently, and he encouraged them to break any glass ceilings. He told them that there was no luck in life, only hard work, and he was the first to cheer on their accomplishments. Steve was a fiercely loyal friend, advocate and most of all father, grandfather, son, brother and uncle who was happiest when surrounded by his family. He was larger than life and will forever be missed. Semper Fi

GEORGE O. GATES, USN SEABEE, KHE SANH VETERAN CBMU 301-DET B

ANDOVER, Vt. – George Osborne Gates died peacefully Sunday, Aug. 8, 2021 at the Cardinal Wing of the Vermont Veterans Home in Bennington, Vt., at age 75, following a brief illness. George resided at the VA under their loving care for the past four years after developing a sudden onset of early dementia. George brought joy to the veterans' community.

George was born in Springfield, Vt., June 11, 1946 and was the son of Gordon Gates of Chester and Patricia Rowell of the Rowell's Inn in Andover. The Gates family owned and operated the lumber mill – until destroyed by fire – on Lowell Lake where they lived in Londonderry, Vt., later moving to Andover, Vt.

George was a man of many talents and interests. Graduating from Chester Union High School in 1965, he went on to serve his country as a U.S. Navy Seabee in the Construction Battalion Maintenance Unit 301 where he was assigned to the Detail Bravo Khe Sanh where he served as EO3 (Third Class Petty Officer) and promoted to EO2 during his service. He was rated with Navy Union Commendation Ribbon for his time at Khe Sanh, National Defense Metal, Vietnam Service Ribbon, and two Campaign Stars. George was present during the Battle and Siege of Kha Sanh and family has been able to piece together his accounts through numerous letters written to parents Gordon and Patty while in Vietnam.

He was released from active duty in September of 1969.After returning from Vietnam, he was an accomplished woodworker and homebuilder with a career as a carpenter working for his dad's family-run business, Gordon O. Gates & Sons Construction. His craftsmanship was excellent and a great source of pride. He was an avid hunter and angler who enjoyed deer and raccoon hunting along with trout fishing in local streams all the way home from work daily during summer months. George could fix absolutely anything but preferred working on American-made hot rods, Jeeps, and pickup trucks that he owned over the years. Coming from a musical family, he played the banjo, fiddle, spoons, and juice harp. He loved to dance and often spoke of the square dances held in local barns.

George is survived by a daughter Juliette (Tim) Gates Britton of Peru, Vt. and Jessy (Jamie) Gates Richardson of Denmark, Maine, and sisters Susan (Robert) Turco and Sylvia (Robert) MacDonald. He was predeceased by brother Charles Gates, also of Andover, Vt. George was a loving grandfather of six grandchildren and uncle to several nieces and nephews that he also loved.

A graveside service with military honors was held Aug. 13, 2021 at Village Cemetery in Peru. A gathering followed services at the J.J. Hapgood Store owned by daughter Juliette Britton. Both the service and the celebration following included live music by Ida Specker.

MILITARY RETIREES INFORMATION

By Jim Absher

Military retirees and disabled veterans could see their monthly checks jump by hundreds of dollars each month in 2022, the largest increase since 1983. The annual inflation-based Cost of Living Adjustment, or COLA, soon will be determined by the government, and all the figures point to an increase of at least 6%, and maybe more, beginning in 2022.

That means that next year, military retirees will see their monthly retirement check increase, with the average monthly check going up by around $160. Veterans receiving disability compensation from the Department of Veterans Affairs also will see their monthly disability payments increase, with the average monthly amount increasing by nearly $100. According to the Defense Department, there are around 1.87 million military retirees, with an annual average retirement payment of $30,265. The VA says nearly 5.1 million veterans receive disability compensation, with an annual benefit of $18,549.

The annual COLA increase is based on the Consumer Price Index (CPI), which is measured by the Department of Labor. That agency measures the costs of a select group of goods and services and compares those costs to the previous year. If there is an increase, retirees and many others receiving government benefits see an increase in their monthly payments for the upcoming year. If those costs go down, the government payments will remain the same in the upcoming year.

In 2021, costs for most goods and services have gone up much faster than they have in the past. The most recent data from the Department of Labor is showing a 5.4% increase from last year, and there are two more months left in the current fiscal year, which ends on Sept. 30.

So, unless there is a major turnaround of the economy, with prices dropping dramatically in the next month or so, next year's government payments should see a hefty increase.

The CPI also is used to determine federal employee retirement and social security COLA adjustments as well as other federal benefit programs, so the CPI increase will affect over 50 million Americans.

Next year's COLA is scheduled to be announced in early October. When it is, Military.com will have the latest information, including disability pay rates available to you.

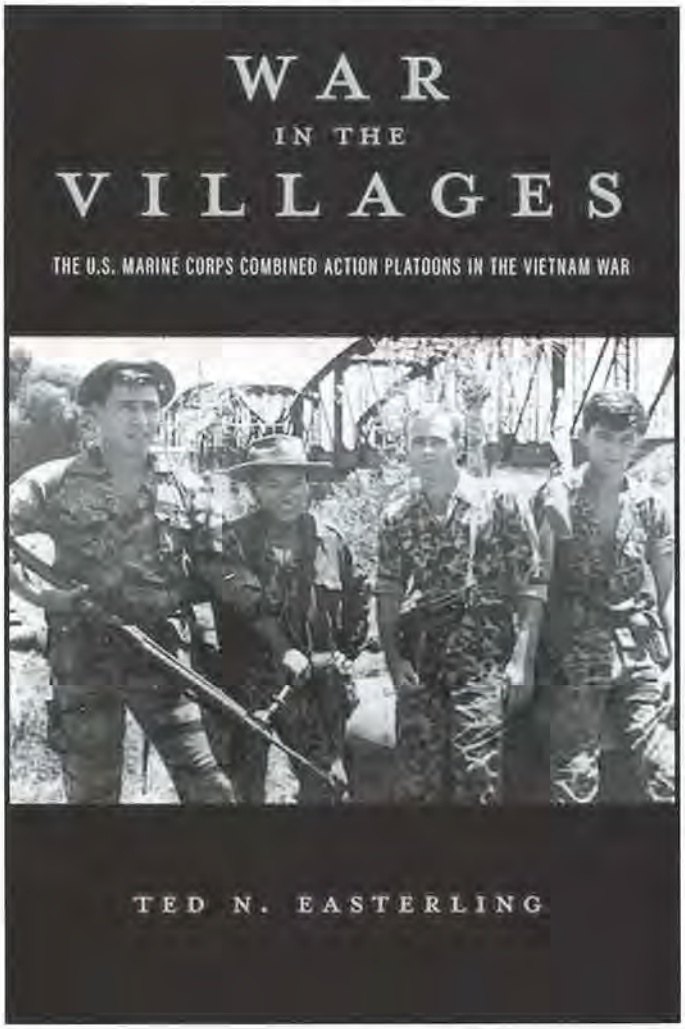
BOOK REVIEW

WAR IN THE VILLAGES BY TED N. EASTERLING



Men of the U.S Marine Corps Combined Action Platoons in the Vietnam volunteered to live with and protect South Vietnamese villagers in I Corps. Ideally a CAP was made up of fifty men—14 Marines, one Navy corpsman, and 35 South Vietnamese Popular Forces troops, although in reality the teams often fell below those numbers. The program, designed to fight guerrillas during the night and help villagers during the day, was in place in Vietnam from 1965-71, and was the subject of controversies between upper echelon Marine and U.S. Army commanders. In essence, the Army favored the search-and-destroy strategy, and the Marines wanted to emphasize hearts-and-minds counterinsurgency programs.

In War in the Villages: The U.S. Marine Corps Combined Action Platoons in the Vietnam War (University of North Texas Press, 247 pp. $29.95, hardcover; $23.95, Kindle) Marine Vietnam War veteran Ted Easterling tells the story of the effectiveness of CAPs against the Viet Cong and the North Vietnamese Army. Easterling holds a doctorate from the University of Akron where he taught history. Relying primarily on secondary sources in his book, Easterling concludes that CAP never realized its potential.

The book's lengthy introduction details the principles of guerrilla warfare, communist ideology, and revolutionary warfare to show the formidable military challenge posed by the communist forces in Vietnam. Easterling also explains a range of counterinsurgency tactics designed to meet the challenge, the core of which fostered disagreement between Marine Gen. Victor (Brute) Krulak and his boss, U.S. Army Gen. William Westmoreland.

Easterling conscientiously takes the reader through all the stages of CAP's existence, a struggle intensified by the program's limited size and insufficient support from the South Vietnamese government. Even when CAP became a separate command, a lack of supplies hampered progress.

Several recently released books about the CAP have reached conclusions similar to Easterling's. In Spreading Ink Blots from Da Nang to the DMZ, for example, the British military historian David Strachan-Morris rates CAP as successful—a minor success, perhaps, but nevertheless successful. For him, counterinsurgency is an effective way to achieve a specific objective, within a specific area, and (ideally) for a specific period of time. Beyond those parameters, he says, it is ineffective.

A more personalized view of CAP comes from Tiger Papa Three by Edward F. Palm, a former CAP Marine who lived with villagers between Cam Lo and Dong Ha, ten kilometers south of the DMZ in 1967. Palm reports that villagers acted indifferently to the Marines, did not buy into civic action projects, "and never had any great call for our medical services."

What's more, he says that the South Vietnamese Popular Forces avoided taking risks, and the U.S. Army offered no help or encouragement. He labels CAP as the Marines' "enlightened gesture of dissent" against a strategy that was "proving to be self-defeating."

Regardless of the degree of CAP effectiveness, War in the Villages provides an in-depth study of a controversial program that once again shows the high degree of commitment by the U.S. Marine Corps.

LANCE CORPORAL BOB PARSONS
D/1/26
By Craig W. Tourte

It was time for a new Golf Club Driver, not because I'm any good, but my Cobra Driver was getting pretty beat up from all the miss-hits, pulls, and shanks. My wife told me she was surprised I'm not any better than I am; as much as I play, my response was, "So Am I." I tried all the major brands, Cobra, Titleist, Ping, etc. I wanted one that would drive straight and long and one I could afford. I had heard about the brand PXG but only knew they were one of the most expensive clubs on the market, costing as much as $255 to $375 per club.

A little research revealed the name brand "PXG" stood for "Parsons Extreme Golf," and the founder was Robert Ralph "Bob" Parsons." It has been stated; Parsons told his engineers he wanted to spare no expense in developing the best golf clubs made, and there was no budget or timeline.

He is an American entrepreneur, billionaire, and philanthropist. In 1997 he founded the GoDaddy group, which included numerous very successful companies. In June 2014, he stepped down from his position of Executive Chairman. He also founded YAM Worldwide, Inc, with power sports, golf, real estate, and marking. As of September 2020, Parsons is ranked No. 378 on the Forbes 400 list of The Richest People in America.

Lance Corporal Bob Parsons
United States Marine Corps

After nearly flunking out of high school, Parsons enlisted in the Marine Corps. In 1969 he served as a rifleman in Delta Company 1/26 and did a tour in Vietnam Quang Nam Province. He was wounded in action and medically evacuated, spending two months in a naval hospital recovering, he earned the Combat Action Ribbon, the Vietnam Gallantry Cross, and Purple Heart. He attributes his success in his various businesses to the few years he served in the United States Marine Corps. In 2018 he founded the "Lance Corporal Parsons Welcome Home Fund for Vietnam Veterans," "where care is provided to veterans of all US service branches wounded, injured, or suffering life-threatening illness based on their participation in combat operation in Vietnam."

And yes, I ordered a PXG Driver for their sale price of $299. I haven't hit the driver yet, but my expectations are high.

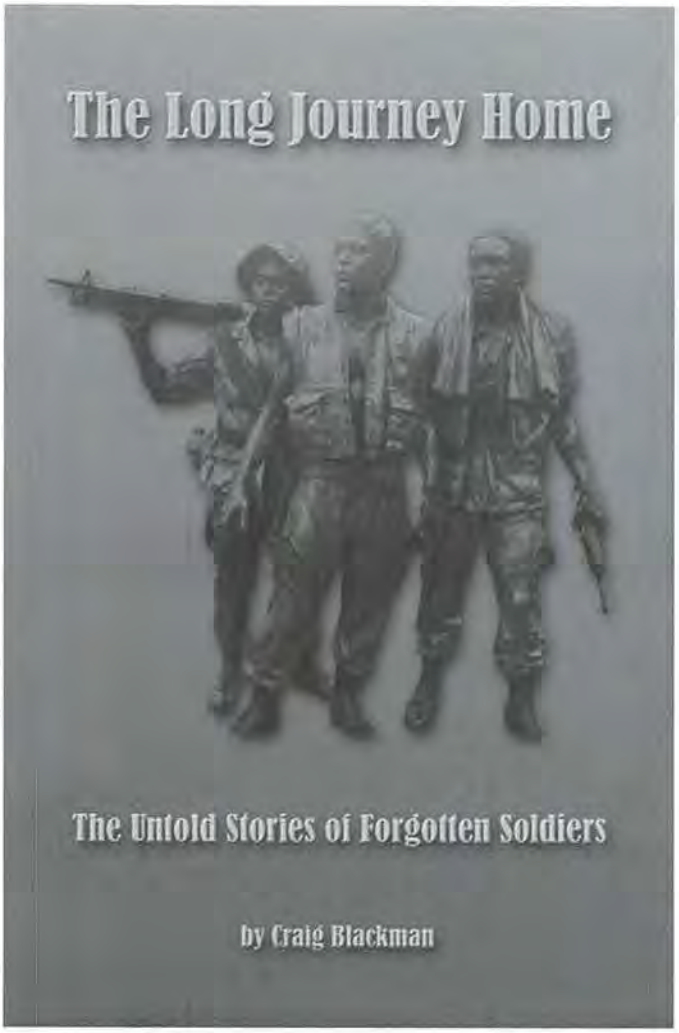
THE LONG JOURNEY HOME BY CRAIG BLACKMAN



With the support of Chris Mulholland (VFW Post 2894) and many others, I completed a book entitled The Long Journey home: The Untold Story of Forgotten Soldiers. The book, which took me 6.5 years to write, was based on a 2014 AP class project that changed the lives of my students. It is the story of how a diverse group of post-millenials rediscovered their local history and had a better understanding of the cost of war. They went beyond the learning objectives and developed relationships with Gold Star families that changed their lives. In a time when patriotism is diminishing, reading these stories of teenagers honoring Vietnam veterans is uplifting. Louis Franklin Staples and Kermit Anthony Ray, two men featured in the book, fought at Khe Sanh.

2021 Albuquerque Reunion
By Craig Tourte

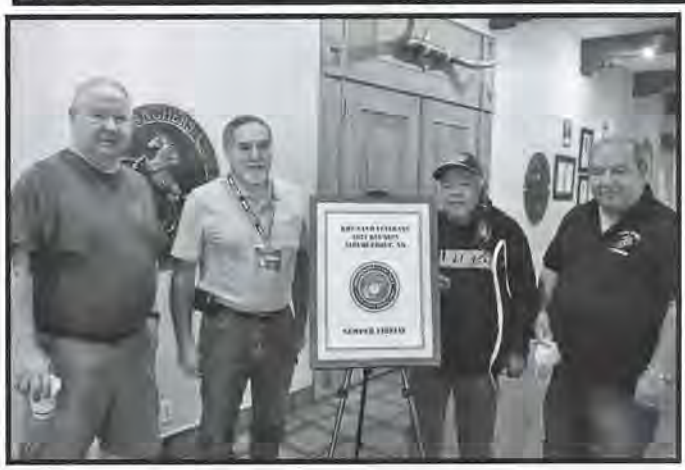
It was another wonderful reunion with the Khe Sanh Veterans Association, which was held this year in Albuquerque, New Mexico. Considering the restrictive circumstances of the ongoing pandemic, the reunion was well attended with members, family, friends, associates, guests, visitors, and volunteers. As usual, Tom Eichler, Russ and Kathy Turner, David Meyer, Tom Ford, Rolland Kutzback, Merle Moritz, spouses, and those I have unintentionally left out made it all possible.

Even with the restrictive circumstances, all seemed to enjoy themselves. Many enjoyed their visit by taking the "Sandia Peak Tramway," ascending 10,378 feet in fifteen minutes for an 11,000 square mile panoramic view. The Tramway is considered the "most stunning urban peak" in America. Albuquerque's "Old Town' is another wonderful historic spot many attendees visited. Its narrow streets and century-old adobe houses, along with numerous places to eat and shop, and the 18th-century San Felipe de Neri Church made it a must-place to visit. The nearby Museum of Natural History and Science had dinosaur skeletons and western art. Bruce Geiger and I visited the "American International Rattlesnake Museum." Bruce was a walking encyclopedia when it came to rattlesnakes, having raised, and kept them as pets. I must admit he was making me a little nervous with all his rattlesnake talk, and I learned more about rattlesnakes than I needed to know, which was primarily avoidance when at all possible. While in Old Town, we stopped in at "Church's Café" for a light snack in an old adobe building off the beaten track and watched the many tourists walk by.

With Native Americans and Khe Sanh Veterans Robert "Chief" Longcrane and Wayne "Butch" DeVerney, we visited the "Indian Pueblo Culture Center." Admission for them was free with their Native American Tribal Card, and I paid the $10.00 entrance fee. The IPCC is owned and operated by the 19 Indian Pueblos of New Mexico and is dedicated to the "preservation and perpetuation of Pueblo Indian Culture." It is a 10,000 sq ft museum filled with authentic history and artifacts of Pueblo people from "Pre-Columbian" to current times. I found the section dedicated to Pueblo women particularly interesting, with the many exhibits highlighting their role in Indian culture. I observed a beautiful wall hanging titled with the words, "Our Cycle of Existence" It read, "In our traditional stories, we recognize and celebrate life cycles. We pray for those who have gone on, those here now, and those yet to come. In this way, we are connected to our ancestors, to each other, and to future generations." It was attributed to "Grandfather Storyteller, Pablita Velarde, Santa Clara Pueblo."

The Crowne Plaza Hotel chosen by the reunion committee was accommodating and affordable; the hotel certainly did its absolute best to make our reunion an enjoyable experience. Breakfast was included, and the Saturday evening meal and menu choices were appreciated and enjoyed by all.

In a discussion I had with Bruce Geiger, he said, and I'll paraphrase here, "the Association is not anything without the reunion." I thought that was correct and very poignant. Those of us who can and are able and who want to keep our Association alive and continue to prosper should make every effort to attend our reunions, or our Association will cease to survive. With that said, those who were unable to attend this reunion were sorely missed and we certainly look forward to seeing as many as possible next year.



THE 2022 KHE SANH VETERANS ANNUAL REUNION WILL BE HELD IN RENO, NEVADA FROM 23 OCT TO 30 OCT 2022, AT THE NUGGET CASINO & RESORT LOCATED AT 1100 NUGGET AVENUE, SPARKS NV 89431 . ROOM RATES ARE $99.00 (Plus Local Tax) RATE IS GOOD FOR THREE DAYS BEFORE AND THREE DAYS AFER THE REUNION DATES. PARKING IS FREE. THERE ARE FREE SHUTTLES TO THE AIRPORT. If YOU CALL THE HOTEL DIRECT, 775-356-3300 YOU MUST MENTION THE CODE GKHE22. IF YOU CALL THE TOLL FREE NUMBER 800-648-1177, YOU MUST ALSO MENTION THE SAME CODE, GKHE22.

CHAPLAIN'S CORNER FALL 2021
KSV CHAPLAIN RON RAYNER

Heaven and Winning Your Spiritual Battles to Get There

My younger sister passed away in June of 2020. Just prior to her passing I had ordered a large number of pamphlets -line from the Christian book store. The first book I reonad was Heaven by Randy Alcorn and the next was Winning Your Spiritual Battles by Tony Evans. These two books helped me to console my family and have clarified my beliefs on what the future holds for us in relation to Heaven. They gave us all the hope that we will be together again with my sister, parents and others we love in Heaven.

When I took my chaplain training in 2002, I was told my main role at a funeral service I was performing was to provide comfort in the family's time of loss and hope for the resurrection. My intention with this article is to give all who read it, comfort and hope for the resurrection as all Khe Sanh veterans are over age seventy and should be considering what comes next. The number of obits in each Red Clay tells a story.

First of all, I have always based my Christian belief in Heaven on the following Scripture:
"One of the criminals hanging beside him scoffed, 'So you're the Messiah, are you? Prove it by saving yourself –and us, too, while you're at it!'
But the other criminal protested, 'Don't you fear God even when you are dying? We deserve to die for our evil deeds, but this man hasn't done anything wrong.' Then he said, 'Jesus, remember me when you come into your Kingdom.'
And Jesus replied, 'I assure you, today you will be with me in paradise.'"

Luke 23:40-43 (NLT)

Bottom line, if you believe in Jesus Christ as your savior, through grace (undeserved favor), you will be in Heaven with him. My friend, Khe Sanh veteran Larkin Spivey, puts it quite eloquently:

"By definition, a Christian is a fallen human being whose only value comes from the grace of God and trust in Jesus Christ. There is no room for a "holier than thou" attitude toward any other human being."

Larkin Spivey
Battlefields & Blessings
Stories of Faith and Courage from World War II-page289

The apostle Paul explains the order of grace and works by saying you cannot earn your way into Heaven, it is given through grace.

"God saved you by his special favor when you believed. And you can't take credit for this: it is a gift from God. Salvation is not a reward for the good things we have done, so none of us can boast about it. For we are God's masterpiece. He has created us anew in Christ Jesus, so that we can do the good things he planned for us long ago."
Ephesians 2:8-10 (NLT)

That is the simple version to get you interested in seeking Jesus Christ as your savior. You do have to seek and search for the Lord.

"The Lord is a shelter for the oppressed, a refuge in times of trouble. Those who know your name trust in you, for you,

O Lord, have never abandoned anyone who searches for you."

Psalm 9:9-10 (NLT)

Hopefully, you are considering seeking Jesus as your savior. Winning Your Spiritual Battles takes some Bible study and prayer. I told a minister in about 1976 that "I wanted to believe in Jesus, but it was not working." He asked me to "Try praying at every meal." Praying at every meal became a habit and I became a believer. My life has changed and I now realize how a guardian Angel has been watching over me and blessing me my whole life.

"A final word: Be strong with the Lord's mighty power. Put on all of God's armor so that you will be able to stand firm against all strategies and tricks of the devil. For we are not fighting against people made of flesh and blood, but against the evil rulers and authorities of the unseen world, against those mighty powers of darkness who rule this world, and against wicked spirits in the heavenly realms.

Use every piece of God's armor to resist the enemy in time of evil, so that after the battle you will still be standing firm. Stand your ground, putting on the sturdy belt of truth and the body armor of God's righteousness. For shoes put on the peace that comes from the Good News, so that you will be fully prepared. In every battle you will need faith as your shield to stop the fiery arrows aimed at you by Satan. Put on salvation as your helmet, and take the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God. Pray at all times and on every occasion in the power of the Holy Spirit. Stay alert and be persistent in your prayers for all Christians everywhere."

Ephesians 6:10-18 (NLT)

The answers are out there. You have to look for them. Find a good Bible based church. Ask your Christian friends. Read a daily devotional such as "The Upper Room" or "Daily Bread." Checkout the Christian Book Store online. "Seek and you shall find."

Loving God, we thank you for your Son, Jesus Christ, whose love washed away our sins. We come before you, secure in the knowledge that we are accepted by grace. In Christ Jesus' name we pray. Amen.

OBIT

FOREVER IN OUR HEARTS

A REALLY SALTY 102 OLD VIETNAM VETERAN WHO SERVED IN WWII, KOREA & VIETNAM

It is with great sadness; wea learn the passing of Colonel Carl Cooper, a veteran of WWII, Korea and Vietnam. He was 101-year-old.

Colonel Carl Cooper was born in Clanton on March 18, 1920, and was the seventh of ten children, Colonel Cooper was the only one of his siblings to go to college. He was studying biology and on his way to medical school when his life and the world changed.

He registered for the draft Sept. 3, 1941, according to military record. He enlisted in the Marines on April 1, 1942 and was a member of the 6th Marine Division.

He left Guadalcanal for Okinawa on April 1, 1945. Okinawa was the site of the greatest casualties in the Pacific during World War II.

When they landed, some of the amphibious, tractor-like vehicles hit underwater bombs. Cooper said he was close enough to shore to swim there, and most of his troops made it.

"On the northern part of the island, we were securing it, and I was the only outfit that went up to secure the remaining holdout," he said. "So, we got in some of the caves, and we eliminated a few Japanese along the line."

On the Fourth of July, Cooper left Okinawa aboard a ship headed for Guam.

"At Guam, we were getting ready to invade Japan. And of course, the big bomb was dropped, and that changed everybody's plans," he said.

After the war, he returned home to his wife and met his 1-year-old son. He and his wife later had a daughter, and Cooper said he was able to be present for her birth.

Cooper spent some time as a teacher and coach in Marion before serving in the Korean War. When he returned from that war, he became Mountain Brook Junior High School's first principal.

"Mountain Brook called me in, and I was the first principal they hired when they created the new school system," he said. "I enjoyed it. I'll tell you what, you have a good faculty and it makes the job a whole lot easier."

Cooper's fellow staff members told him he was pretty strict in his role.

"And I was strict on the discipline," he said. "But still, we had a good school. And still today, sometimes I'll run across one of them, and they'll make some comment about, 'You were hard on us. You were strict.'"

He served as principal there for eight years until he was called to serve in the Vietnam War.

On April 1, 1980 – the same day of the year on which he had been sworn into the Marine Corps 38 years before – Cooper retired at 60 years old.

"You feel lonesome," he said about retiring. "You miss it. But I knew it was going to come. This happens to us all."

Continuing Service

Even though Cooper was finished serving his country in the Marine Corps, he found a new way to serve by working with the Federal Emergency Management Agency. He traveled all over the country in his new role.

"I enjoyed it," he said. "It wasn't a military operation, so to speak, but it employed all of the principles of setting up an operation like you were getting ready to attack the enemy. And we were getting ready to attack the enemy – by helping out to restore what the hurricanes and the weather had done to our country."

He made an impression in South Carolina after Hurricane Hugo hit in 1989. They needed Cooper to help find a place to set up 300 offices as close to the disaster as possible. Within three or four days, Cooper had converted every room at a former Holiday Inn and outfitted it as an office, right down to the paperclips.

"Well, when they give you a credit card and say there's no limit, you go for it," Cooper said, laughing.

He spent 30 years working for FEMA, refusing to quit until he hit 90 years old. He said he enjoyed serving his country in that capacity.

During the Gulf War, he even tried to get on Operation Desert Storm.

"I called and said, 'I'd like to come back on active duty if it's possible,'" he remembered. "They started laughing. They said, 'Colonel, you've had your fun. Let some of these other younger folks have theirs.' "I was in my mid-'70s or '80s. Of course I didn't think they would do it, but I said, 'I'm going to give it a chance,'" he said.

Cooper has outlived his wife and two children. He has four grandchildren, 16 great-grandchildren and one great-great-grandchild.

A STORY OF BRAVERY AND A PARTNERSHIP FORGED IN COMBAT

By Father Matthew Weber

Honor guard members stand watch over the urn and folded ensign of Father Francis Brett April 24, 2019, on Chaplains Hill at Arlington National Cemetery. The cremated remains of Father Brett, a priest of the Diocese of Knoxville and longtime Army chaplain, were buried in the same gravesite of his brother, Father Robert Brett, a Navy chaplain who was killed while serving in Vietnam in 1968. May 27 2021

In 2014, while stationed at Saint Bridget University Parish in Glassboro, I had come to know about Navy Chaplain Robert R. Brett who was killed in Khe Sanh, Vietnam, during the height of the Tet offensive in 1968.

At the time, a parishioner and I were changing the linings of the collection baskets when, behold, underneath one of the linings, was a yellowed, torn obituary, hidden for almost 50 years: "Navy Chaplain Killed in Vietnam: Collingdale Priest Was Saying Mass."

In addition to an obituary about a priest-chaplain killed in action, what struck me most was the town "Collingdale." Collingdale, a borough on the outskirts of Philadelphia in Delaware County, is the site of my home parish of Saint Joseph. It was where I was baptized and eventually ordained a priest.

Unfortunately, I had never heard of this local priest or of his Gold Star mother who lived across the street from the parish — that is, until 2014. Even though the article piqued my interest, I set it aside. Finally, almost under inspiration, I read the obituary again on Feb. 19, 2018, three days shy of Father Brett's 50th death anniversary. I decided then to research Father Brett's life. What unfolded was devotion and bravery, but also a story of a partnership forged in the heat of combat, united in death, and reunited after death.

Father Brett was the son of Margaret H. Brett of 1001 Bartram Ave., Collingdale, whose home, at the time of her son's death, was directly across the street from Saint Joseph's Parish grotto of Our Lady of Lourdes. Father Brett, however, grew up in the Grays Ferry section of South Philadelphia and attended Saint Edmond and Saint Gabriel schools.
He became a priest in the Society of Mary (Marists) in February 1962 and, in June 1967, he entered the Navy Chaplain Corps. The obituary states that Father Brett "told his family he wanted to go to Vietnam to give spiritual guidance to the men." A family member later recalled, in a 1987 newspaper article, that Father Brett "was neither a hawk or a dove, but he wanted to be where the men needed him most, so he requested combat duty in Viet Nam."

Lieutenant Brett was assigned to the 26th Marine Regiment, 2nd Battalion, at Khe Sanh and was assisted by Private First Class Alexander Scheleph Chin.

Pfc. Chin, 23, of Baltimore, was a seasoned combat veteran with three Purple Hearts when assigned as chaplain assistant to Father Brett. Together for three months they had forged a close partnership as they served frightened, wounded and dying Marines in combat.

A May 27, 1999, article from the Washington Post states: "Chin, family members say, was deeply religious and, after several months of combat, told his commanders in Vietnam that he could no longer kill the enemy. Instead of a court-martial, relatives said, Chin was given a job protecting and assisting Brett." Years later, Navy Rear Admiral Barry C. Black, deputy chief of chaplains, quoted Chin saying, "I won't take a life, but I'll put my life on the line for another."

The last time anyone saw the chaplain and his aide alive was on an airstrip in Khe Sanh where a rocket attack took their lives. It was Feb. 22, 1968. The Washington Post wrote, "Marines who witnessed the attack said the two were about to board a helicopter when they came under assault. Brett, they said, told the chopper to take off without them, allowing another man to go instead."

The mangled bodies of Brett and Chin were pulled from the shrapnel and shipped home for burial in Pennsylvania and in Maryland.

Father Brett was buried, at his mother's request, in the cemetery of the Penndel, Pennsylvania, seminary where he received his religious training. PFC Chin was buried in his family plot in the town of Princess Anne on Maryland's Eastern Shore.

Years later, at the request of family, Father Brett's remains were reinterred at Arlington National Cemetery in 1998. The family also felt strongly that Chin should be there, too. Eventually Father Brett's nephew, Edward Rouse, had tracked down Chin's relatives in the Baltimore area. At the behest of Brett's family and with the permission of Chin's relatives, the remains of Pfc. Chin were removed from his family plot and reinterred on Chaplains' Hill on May 26,1999, next to the chaplain whom he served.

Larry Ballard, a former Marine who served in the 26th Marine Regiment at Khe Sanh, stated, "They were always on the battlefield giving last rites and dragging the wounded to safer positions. They were heroes. They placed themselves in mortal danger. Both of them."

Father Matthew R. Weber is pastor of Holy Cross Parish, Bridgeton.

OBIT

ALICIA RAYNER POTE, SISTER OF KSV CHAPLAIN RONALD RAYNER A CO 1/26

Alicia is remembered for her indomitable positivity. Throughout life and in her later illness, she brightened others' days with kind words, and embodied the phrase, "never knew a stranger." She was an accomplished baker, and the wedding cakes she baked for friends and family are happily remembered. A lover of animals since childhood, she rescued many cats and dogs throughout her life. Above all, she cherished her friends and family, and was a loving daughter, mother, sister, aunt, and most recently, grandmother.

She is survived by her children Kaitlyn Pote (Steven Silverstein) and James Pote, granddaughter Margaux, siblings Al Rayner (Mary), Ron Rayner (Cathy), Glenden Rayner, Marcia Green (Bill), Tom Rayner (Becky), and John Rayner (Beth), brother-in-law Jim Watt, and many loving nieces, nephews, cousins, and friends. She was preceded in death by her parents, Albert H. and Emma Gene Rayner (nee Archer), and her sisters Elizabeth (1961) and Jeanne Watt.

A memorial service was held at Grace and Peace Church at 451 W. Kennett in Pontiac on October 23rd at noon. In lieu of flowers, donations may be made to Grace and Peace Church in her memory.

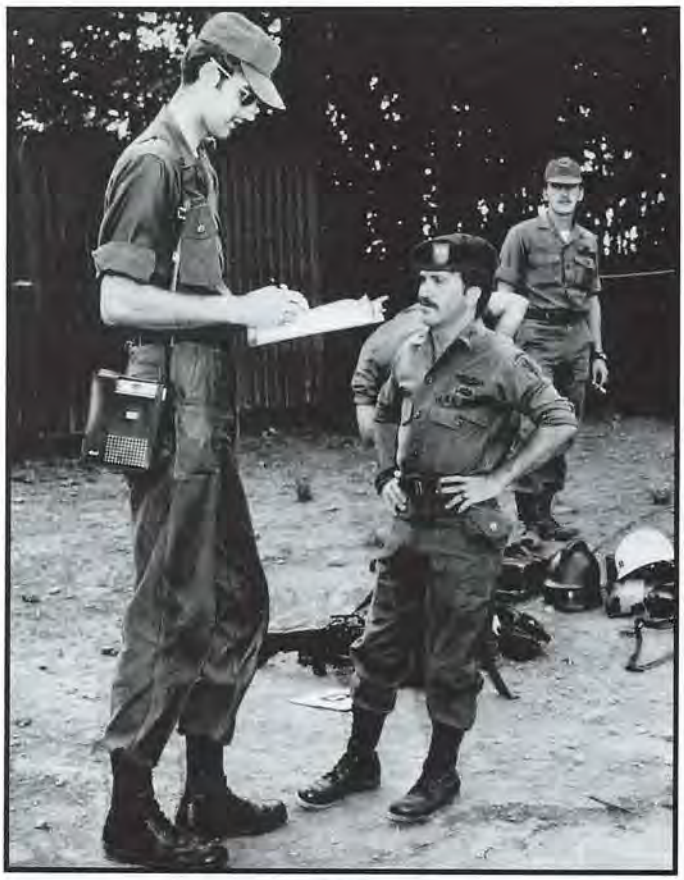
THE GIANT KILLER

Recon's Echo Platoon lead by the smallest soldier 4' 9" 97lb Lt. Richard Flaherty. Beginning in 1968, the infantry began experimenting with a new concept that would combine experienced combat personnel, stealth, firepower, and operating independence. The result came to be called, "Echo Recon," or battalion reconnaissance platoons.

The Echo Recon platoons were made up of veteran personnel that had at least six months in the field with a regular line infantry unit. They were not required to be Airborne, Ranger, Recondo, or Special Forces qualified, although many personnel were.

They operated much of the time as "Hunter-Killer" units, engaging the enemy whenever possible and then calling in the rest of the battalion instead of being assigned strictly reconnaissance missions.

Despite being the smallest soldier in the US military, Flaherty would go on to become a Green Beret Captain and earn the Silver Star, 2 Bronze Stars, & 2 Purple Hearts. His unbelievable & inspiring life story was captured in the book, The Giant Killer available on Amazon, Walmart, & Barnes & Nobles.



OBIT

MICHAEL T. SEGURA, USMC KHE SANH VETERAN, D CO 1/26, 1ST PLT 1ST SQD

Michael Terry Segura, 76, of Fort Davis, went home to Heaven on Friday, May 21, 2021.

Terry was born on June 15, 1944, in Corpus Christi to Ovey & Margaret Segura. He was the eldest of 8 children and was raised in Port Arthur, Texas. In February of 1962, he married Sue Stokes and eventually became the proud father of 3 daughters, Karen, Betsy and Ellen.

Terry was a decorated military veteran of the Vietnam War. In 1968, he voluntarily signed up to join the Marines and was a Corporal in the Company D, 1st Battalion, 26th Marines (Khe Sanh) from March 2nd, 1968, to March 28th, 1969. He was awarded the Achievement Medal for Radio Operator in Combat Operations.

Upon returning from war, Terry worked as a professional butcher in Beaumont and Houston for over 35 years.

He enjoyed studying Karate for some time at House of the White Moon in Houston, cutting a rug to James Brown any chance he could get, watching movies, educating himself on the world, and spending time with his best friend, Willis. Terry also enjoyed visiting with his family and witnessing his grandchildren and great-grandchildren grow.

Funeral services werel held at 2:00 PM on Wednesday, May 26, 2021 at the Alpine Memorial Funeral Home in Alpine, Texas.

Terry's parents preceded him in death. He is survived by his daughters, Karen Busa and husband, Steve Busa of Cypress, Betsy Bates and husband, Steve Bates of Montgomery, Ellen Huskey and husband, Alan Huskey of Magnolia; Grandchildren, Brandon Djie and wife, Jackie Djie, Brittany Djie-Mills and husband, Nick Mills, Spencer Busa, Summer Walker and husband, Henry Walker, Ellie Noland and husband, Blake Noland, AJ Huskey and wife, Josselin Huskey, and Kodi Bell and husband, Travis Bell; Great-grandchildren, Lexi and Brysin Noland, Evelyn, Devon, Lincoln and Roslyn Djie, Arlo Mills, Arya Huskey, and Bowie Bell.

299TH ENGINEER BN: SIEGE OF DAK TO: MAY THRU JULY, 1969

Dak To is about 55 miles northwest of Camp Enari where I was stationed w/the 4th Infantry Division & right on the Cambodian border. I ETSed in August 1967 after my tour..

The buzz of the incoming rockets caught the men of the 299th Engineer Battalion (Combat) in their noon chow lines. One second they were standing around joking with one another, the next they were frantically scrambling for cover as panicked voices yelled "INCOMING! INCOMING!" For nearly thirty minutes the engineers huddled in bunkers as twelve 122mm rockets and eighteen 81mm mortar rounds ripped into their camp at Dak To. Then, as suddenly as it began, the barrage ended. Amazingly, no one was hurt by the blasts. The engineers pulled themselves from cover, dusted off their fatigues and looked around. What the hell was that all about? They wondered. They had no idea that their little corner of the war was about to heat up.

Dak To sits in the middle of one of the most hotly contested regions of South Vietnam. Deep in the rugged, jungle-clad mountains of the Central Highlands, the hamlet is a mere twenty kilometers from the border where Laos, Cambodia, and South Vietnam come together. A spur of the Ho Chi Minh Trail crossed the border here and paralleled Route 512 east through Ben Het, Dak To, and Tan Cahn. From there it was a straight shot south down Route 14 to Kontum, Pleiku, and then east to the coast. It was axiomatic to the Americans that if North Vietnamese forces controlled the Central Highlands, South Vietnam would fall.

To prevent that from happening, the Military Assistance Command, Vietnam, beginning in 1964, had established a chain of Special Forces camps along the border, including one at Dak To. From Duc Co in the south to Kham Duc in the north, the Green Berets and their indigenous troops patrolled the unforgiving terrain in search of the enemy. And they frequently found the North Vietnamese Army forces. Bloody clashes were common. Sometimes it was more than the unconventional forces could handle and regular infantry units were called in. In the fall of 1965 the 1st Cavalry Division's 7th Cavalry was mauled at LZ X-Ray in the Ia Drang Valley. In the summer of 1966 the 1st Brigade, 101st Airborne Division had its turn. After one of its companies was nearly overrun the paratroopers were pulled out. In the fall of that year two brigades of the newly arrived 4th Infantry Division were handed responsibility for the two major provinces of the Highlands: Kontum and Pleiku.

Fierce combat raged throughout those provinces over the next year. The action reached a climax with the Fall 1967 Border Battles that engulfed two brigades of the 4th Infantry Division and the 173rd Airborne Brigade. The fighting was so brutal a battalion of the 173rd was trapped on Hill 875 for two days before a relief force could get to them. In thirty days of fighting, the American units suffered nearly 1,800 casualties, of which 376 were killed in action. A relative calm descended on Dak To after the North Vietnamese suffered heavily in their January-March 1968 Tet Offensive. To secure the region, MACV placed the 1st Brigade, 4th Infantry Division at Dak To. Fifteen kilometers west a Special Forces team with a force of native soldiers held Ben Het. The Army of the Republic of Vietnam's 42d Infantry held Tan Canh.

Into this arena stepped the 299th Engineer Battalion (Combat). The 299th arrived in South Vietnam in October 1965. In the summer of 1966 it relocated from Tuy Hua to Pleiku. The battalion remained there, attached to the 4th Infantry Division, but assigned to the 18th Engineer Brigade, for two years before it moved to Dak To. The 299th's mission was to provide the infantry units with engineering support and to keep the roads to Ben Het and Tan Canh open. Mine sweep patrols headed out in each direction daily. As weather permitted, the engineers were paving Route 512 between Dak To and Ben Het. Not only would this ease the passage of the frequent truck convoys, but it would also hamper the NVA's mine-laying activities.

When Lieut. Col. Newman Howard took command of the battalion in January 1969 his companies were scattered throughout the hills surrounding Dak To. "The Fourth's infantrymen held the fire support base and air strip at Dak To," Howard recalled. "My men were spread all around the area." Shortly after Howard arrived, the United States implemented its new policy of "Vietnamization" which transferred increasingly greater combat responsibilities to the ARVN. Giving the ARVN responsibility for the much fought-over Dak To area would clearly demonstrate the confidence MACV's new commander, Gen. Creighton Abrams, had in them to fulfill their mission.

Unfortunately, about that same time, the NVA reassembled its forces in the region. In late January 1969, intelligence sources reported two NVA infantry and one artillery regiments operating south of Route 512. A prime target was Ben Het. In early February 1969 the NVA's 40th Artillery Regiment began blasting the camp. Specialist 4 Jay Gearhart, of the 299th's 15th Engineer Company (Light Equipment), had just arrived in Ben Het a few days earlier. "About twenty of us were detailed to go to Ben Het," Gearhart recalls. "The monsoons were coming and Route 512 was the only overland supply route to Ben Het. We were going to upgrade the road before the rains came."

All went well for the first week. Then the enemy shells came down. "There was only sporadic incoming for the first few days and we worked right through it," Gearhart said. "After about a week, though, they started pouring over a hundred rounds a day into that little camp. "We ended up being pinned down in a trench right near their little airstrip. We spent nearly two months like that. I counted over twenty-seven hundred rounds inside the wire in twenty-three days. And Ben Het was small!" The daily artillery barrages at Ben Het were but a preview of what Gearhart would experience at Dak To.

Meanwhile, Colonel Howard prepared his battalion for Vietnamization. After the 4th Infantry Division's troops were pulled out, two of Howard's companies, B and C, were relocated. Howard then brought his remaining three companies in from their outlying sites. "Our final mission was to prepare Dak To for the 42d ARVN," Howard said.

Specialist 4 David G. Swanson, a motor pool dispatcher in Headquarters Company, remembers the move. "We'd been on one of the hills overlooking the airstrip since I'd joined the battalion in October," Swanson said. "When the infantry left we were brought down and told to clean up the area. We were supposed to remove all the debris, empty ration cans, used artillery canisters, garbage--you name it. There was so much crap we had to use front-end loaders to dump it outside the wire.

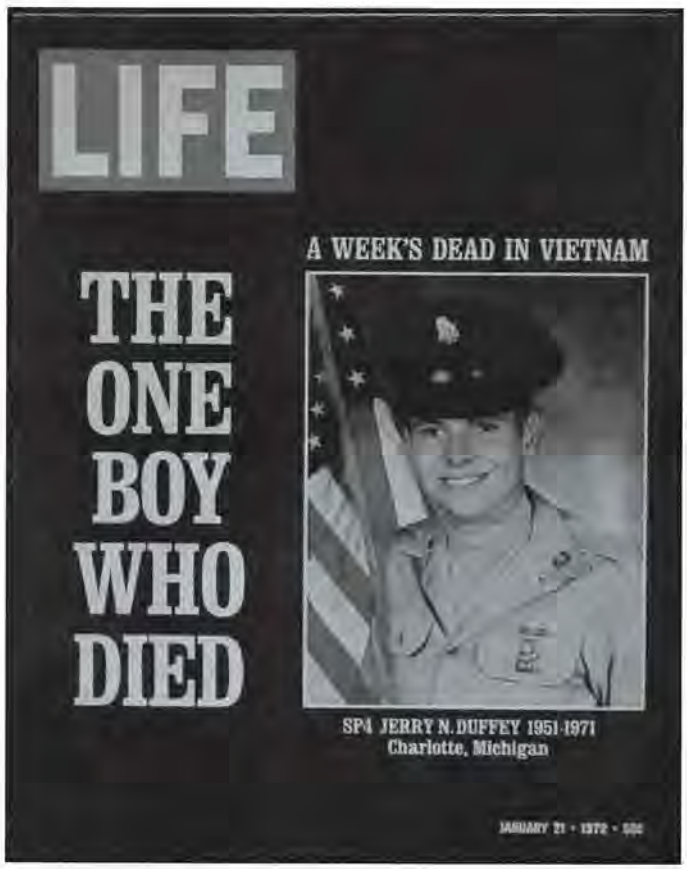
When we'd finished with that we were supposed to load up all of our equipment and join our other two companies near Qui Nhon." That was what Colonel Howard understood, too. Once the base was squared away it would be turned over to the ARVN. The rest of the 299th would then be on its way. But things changed.

A platoon of U.S. Cavalrymen struggle on foot through the high elephant grass on their way towards the Khe Sanh Marine combat base on April 5, 1968 during the Vietnam War. They are taking part in Operation Pegasus, a joint marine and cavalry drive to relieve the base, which has been under North Vietnamese artillery fire for the last three months

INTERESTING STORY THOUGHT I WOULD HELP HER REMEMBER

FORT PIERCE MOTHER REMEMBERS SON WHO FOUGHT, DIED IN VIETNAM. JERRY DUFFEY

A month after Sgt. Jerry Norman Duffey was killed in Binh Dinh, South Vietnam; Life magazine dedicated its cover and a feature story to the Army trooper.



On the grand scale, the 20-year-old from Michigan wasn't more or less special than those with whom he served. His death wasn't on account of any over-the-top heroic action.

He was killed when Hill 131 — the hill was named for its height in meters — was mortared and attacked by Vietcong sappers with explosives. Duffey's position was undermanned and no longer lit well enough to see the enemy, according to the magazine.

His mother, Fort Pierce resident Joyce Cope, hangs tight to her memories of her eldest son, whose life, more than his death, was recounted in the pages of Life on Jan. 21, 1972.

It's something that happened in my life, but the hurt never goes away," said the Gold Star Mother who has lived on the Treasure Coast for 30 years. Gold Star Mothers is an organization of mothers who have lost a son or daughter in service of the United States.

Now 73, she wanted to share the story.

Duff, as his friends called him, died for his country 19 days before the hill was to be turned over to the South Vietnamese. At the time, he was one of 45,000 Americans killed in Vietnam. President Nixon commented on Duffey's death during a televised interview as an example of the on-going de-escalation of troops.

Duffey was highlighted because he was the only death announced in a weekly reporting period. At the time it was the lowest number of recorded deaths for a reporting period since a week in February 1965, when no one was killed.

"It was kind of a political thing. He wasn't really special, but he was special to me," said Cope. "They asked if they could write the story. We didn't get any money, but it was an honor to have it written. And I thought they did a really nice job on the story."

To Joyce Cope, he was more than just the oldest of her five children, who have given her seven grandchildren and 14 great-grandchildren. "He was a really nice boy and really well liked in the community." Jerry grew up on a farmhouse in a town called Sunfield, Mich., about 30 miles from Lansing. At 10 he began raising chickens and selling them. He sold enough that at age 11 he bought himself a horse he called Comanche. He later turned his interests to auto mechanics. But the war was always in the background. Buddies were being drafted or enlisted, so at 19 he decided to volunteer.

His first overseas assignment was Germany, to the ease of his father Stub Duffey, who questioned the war in the magazine. Three months after Jerry was born, Stub had been drafted and sent to Korea, returning when Jerry was 21 months.

However, it wasn't too long before Jerry Duffey was off to Vietnam. He even agreed to extend his tour by six months so he could get home leave for Christmas in 1971. But he never made it.

On Dec. 12, 1971, he was working the "graveyard watch" when Vietcong slipped through jagged wire and blew up several buildings, leaving 17 GIs injured and Duffey dead.

It would be more than a week before his mother learned of his death.

It was a very tough Christmas, it was really hard on the other children," Cope said. "But we had many friends and we thanked the Lord for that."

MY FOND MEMORIES OF MY TIME IN VIET NAM WITH CWO RICHARD L. HOLYCROSS USMC H&S CO 1ST BN 3ND MARINES CLNC, KIA 10 SEPTEMBER 1967

EDDIE TEAS USMC

Today I will honor, remember and tell you about a Marine who was my first Platoon Commander that I met as a young 17-year-old Marine PFC 53 years ago when I reported to the 106mm Recoilless Rifle Platoon of H&S Company, 1st Battalion, 2nd Marines CLNC in 1966. CWO-2 Richard L Holycross was a Marine Chief Warrant Officer with a Bursting Bomb on his collar. He was known as Gunner Holycross. He was KIA 52 years ago today in Viet Nam.

This Marine not only showed me what a Leader should be, but also taught me how to follow. That is something that too many forget as they move up the ranks.

The Battalion was sent to Guantanamo Bay Cuba sometime around September 1966 to provide security at the base for the next for four to five months. This is where it all started for me. As a young PFC, I tried to do most things by the Guidebook according to what we all had learned. One day on the FEBA (Forward Edge of the Battle Area), we were on one side of the barb wire/minefield and the Cubans were on the other side where we were looking at each other. Gunner Holycross was walking up to our position and I could clearly see it was him. I did what the Guidebook said and what I was trained to do. I Yelled out, "Halt Who Goes There?" He said, "Gunner Holycross". I responded, "Advance to be recognized". He responded, "Neas YOU ASSHOLE, you know it's me". I didn't laugh then, but I do now.

Another time on a Battalion Reaction Exercise to see how fast we could get out to the wire, he was in the Command Operations Center (COC) and I got on the Battalion Net (not a good thing to do as a PFC) after seeing flashes around the COC and asked him, "Sir what are those lights on the Hill?" Not a good move on my part and I could only imagine what they must have said to him at the COC. When we got back to our Platoon area, he held a formation and gave the platoon an After-Action Report on how we did. He then pulled me out of formation and told the platoon that PFC Neas was so worried about the COC, he was promoting me, to Colonel. Yes, everyone laughed, and I heard about this for months, but every time I ran into Gunner Holycross and he saw me first, he saluted first and said, "Good morning/afternoon Colonel."

He taught me that you can be Squared Away, Tough as Nails and still have a sense of Humor as a Leader. I never forgot that. He left for Viet Nam in early 1967 and a few months later I followed. I wrote him two letters while in Viet Nam and received one from him. The second letter I sent him, was marked RETURN TO SENDER and I got it in October of 1967 just as I was getting ready to board a Helicopter at Quang Tri for the start of Operation Medina. I did not know what it meant, so I ripped it up and buried it in the sand. A few weeks later I got word that Gunner Holycross was killed on 10 September 1967 near Con Thien as a member of H&S Company, 3rd Battalion, 26th Marines, 52 years ago today.

I was devastated to say the least, but I went on. I not only honor him today, but I do every day and think where I would be without his Leadership and mentoring that he gave this young PFC 53 years ago. He was the Epitome of a Marine Officer and Leader.

I have attached a few pictures and the four-page letter he sent to me while in Viet Nam. Please feel free to read it. It's the only letter I have from my time in Viet Nam. He addressed the letter, Colonel and crossed it out and put L/Cpl. He talked about those two incidents and made mention of many members of our Platoon.

So today when someone calls me an ASSHOLE, I think back to that day when Gunner Holycross first said it and it brings a Smile to my face and yes, a tear in my eye.

Semper Fi and Thank You, Gunner Holycross "You Led the Way."

1968 HUE, US MARINE AT THE BATTLE OF HUE.
Picture by Don McCullin.
God Bless our Vets!

The Marine was swallowed by the night. When he was found he was mute, though in his eyes lay a stare best unmet while dreaming: a gaze that was part trance, part fear, but mostly horror. The men who'd located him recall that he neither blinked nor uttered a single word.

His true name is lost and his fate has become a mystery. But you may know his face already, for a photograph of him remains his only known legacy. Taken by British war photographer Don McCullin during the battle for Hue in Vietnam 50 years ago, it is the portrait of the -frozen man who became known to the world by a clumsy caption: "Shell-shocked US Marine". Other than his photograph and those words, all that remains of the Marine at the centre of one of the most totemic war images of the 20th century are shards of memory, half a century old, smoke-edged and bullet-griddled, from the few men who encountered him in the ruins of Hue and managed to survive. It was to them I turned when I began to look for him. It took me nearly two years to track them down.

It was monsoon season, February 1968, when the Marine went missing. The night air was cold and heavy with mist, which mingled with the smoke from burning buildings set ablaze by shellfire, reducing visibility to a few yards. To the US Marines crouched there, the city of Hue was reduced to snapshots of rubble and fog, which shrouded their memories of the fight there even before time eroded them further. Long after the battle was over, the smell of smoke and fire and the bodies of the dead, the cold of the rain and the imprint of fear and grief came more readily to the minds of many of those left alive than any sense of orientation or time during the fighting.

Standing in the gloom of a ruined dwelling on the city's front line, exhausted from lack of sleep and already twice wounded, Staff Sergeant Robert "Cajun Bob" Thoms waited for a pair of his Marines to report back. He did not know their names. Thoms had been given command of a platoon from Delta Company, 1st Battalion, 5th Marines, a few days earlier, and many of his new command had been killed or wounded after his unit reached Hue and became embroiled in the battle inside the city's walled citadel. The turnover of casualties and replacements was so fast there was little time to get to know individuals.

That night, while consolidating a newly won block of houses near a street nicknamed "rocket alley" by the Marines, Thoms had sent the two men out into the darkened ruins to check that a house to their rear was clear of NVA (North Vietnamese Army). But only one Marine came back. "Where's the other guy?" Thoms asked. The Marine could not explain his absence. "F..k," said Thoms. He collected a couple more men to search for the missing man, suspecting he had somehow been overpowered and killed by the NVA.

Minutes later, as they moved though the darkness of the house in which the man had disappeared, Thoms saw something white in the corner of a room. "It was a face," he tells me. "I went over and this was the Marine. Just kinda sitting against the wall with his eyes open."

The missing Marine — described as a tall, well built man — was so still that at first Thoms assumed he was injured, and checked him for wounds. "I thought someone had cut his throat, the way he looked," he recalls. "Because I've seen people with their throats cut and their eyes just wide open."

But there was not a mark on the man, who -neither moved nor spoke. Unnerved by this -petrified figure, the other Marines consolidated their positions around the house while Thoms laid him down on the floor. At dawn he had his men fetch a medic to examine him. The medic duly checked out the frozen figure, then turned to -Sergeant Thoms. "Sarge," he murmured, "his mind is not there. We need to get him out of here."

British photojournalist Don McCullin in Hue, February 1I started the search for the Marines in -McCullin's photographs in 2016 with just one name that the photographer recalled: Captain Myron Harrington. In February 1968 Harrington was a 29-year -old Marine officer, a commander of Delta Company; he'd already lost more than half of the 120 men under his command in the battle for Hue when he was told that one of his Marines — the one who had been found in the ruined house — was "not willing to participate in the action".

It was early morning on February 21 when -Harrington was called to see the shell-shocked Marine, who was being escorted away from the front by two of Thoms' men. "He was in a state of shock," -Harrington recalls. "He had the classic thousand-yard stare, and was kind of frozen. I ordered that he be evacuated. That's my last -sighting of him."

I hand him McCullin's picture to double-check we are talking about the same man. We are. -Harrington stares at the details I am so familiar with: the filthy flak vest and combat jacket; the stubble; the bitten fingernails; the pen in the top left breast pocket; the suggestion of tattoos on the man's left knuckles. This was no newly arrived grunt; no "FNG" – "f..king new guy". This was a -seasoned -veteran, broken by a moment of war we could only guess at. "The human mind can only take so much," concludes Harrington. "If we had taken him behind a building and slapped him around a little bit, would he have come out of it? I don't know. But it was imperative to get him out of the battle area as quickly as possible."

The shell-shocked Marine was escorted to the Delta Company command post. He was left there awaiting evacuation as Delta's most senior NCO, Gunnery Sergeant Odell Stobaugh, tried and failed to communicate with him. -McCullin appeared. The photographer, then 32 years old, had arrived in Hue a week earlier on assignment for The -Sunday Times. On seeing the frozen Marine he dropped to one knee to photograph him. "I noticed he was moving not one iota. Not one eyelash was moving," McCullin says. "He looked as though he had been carved out of bronze. I took five frames and I defy you to find any change or movement in those frames."

Then the photographer left the yard. Minutes later, at 7.45am, an NVA rocket hit the edge of the wall above the command post, showering shrapnel onto the Marines below. Seven were wounded, including Stobaugh.

Private Eric Henshall, a Marine sniper attached to Delta Company, was there when it happened; the explosion threw a lump of debris right between his eyes, which hurled him to the ground, semiconscious. For Henshall, then 24, it was the end of what had been an eventful battle. One week earlier he'd won the Bronze Star after sniping the NVA crew of a 126mm rocket launcher, then calling in tank fire that had wiped out the survivors. As part of a two-man sniper team he had crawled as close to the enemy position as he could, and spotted through his -binoculars as his partner shot one man before Henshall grabbed the Remington 700 rifle for himself. "I got seven of them." Twenty-four hours later he was wounded in the legs but returned to combat after two days, when McCullin took his image in one of the most haunting portraits of the battle: "The Sniper".

Though McCullin recalls speaking to Eric -Henshall for some time while taking his photograph, Henshall remembers nothing of the -photographer or the moment his picture was taken. And this highly decorated career Marine, whose own courage was so publicly acknowledged, draws no distinction between his own fixed stare in McCullin's photograph and that of the shell-shocked Marine. "I look like that," he adds, staring at the picture of the frozen man when we meet at his home in Arizona. "Something had to have happened to have me looking this way," he murmurs. "I don't know what it was, but it wasn't good."

Today, thanks to the internet, it would be -relatively easy to search for the identity of a -contemporary US Marine in a photograph from, say, Iraq or Afghanistan. Yet no internet existed for returning Vietnam veterans. Moreover, they completed their tours as individuals and returned home alone rather than as a unit.

None of the Marines I found from either Delta or Charlie Company had maintained contact after returning home. It was only the advent of mainstream internet use, and with it veterans' sites and Facebook pages, that allowed some of them to reconnect 30 years after they'd fought in Hue.

Having first contacted Captain Harrington, within a few months I had managed to trace three other Marines from Delta. These in turn introduced me to other men among the network of -surviving Hue veterans. I also secured a copy of the microfilm archives of Delta and Charlie companies' unit diary for the year 1968, as well as the 1st Battalion's after -action report. The unit diary was essential, because it contained the daily details of casualty reports, and night after night, month after month, I pored through thousands of documents for February 1968, looking for clues about the identities of the shell-shocked Marine and the other men photographed by McCullin.

A major breakthrough occurred last year, when McCullin mentioned that he had left the Marine in the company of Delta's gunnery sergeant, and recalled that the "gunny" had been wounded minutes later by a rocket attack on the command post. Knowing each Marine company only had one gunnery sergeant, I called Harrington, confirmed that his gunny was Odell Stobaugh, then cross--referenced that name with the microfilm entries to see when he was wounded, thereby confirming the date and time McCullin took the photograph. I was convinced that this was the eureka moment, and that by tracking down each man evacuated that morning I would identify the shell-shocked Marine. Yet I ran immediately into two problems. First, Odell Stobaugh, who might have remembered the name of the Marine, had died in 1999. Second, my faith in the documentation was misplaced. No record of a non-injury evacuation existed during the key week. I managed to track down the Delta Company clerk in California, and he pointed out that in the bureaucratic bedlam surrounding the battle, the details of a non-physical injury may never have been recorded. Still, I continued to hunt the shell-shocked Marine from the strangest places. During the nine-month battle for Mosul in Iraq, I sometimes returned from the front to scour microfilm details from Hue in my hotel at night, hoping that the weird link-up between the ruin of two cities would afford karmic aid. It didn't.

hen at one point last year, staying in a dirty guesthouse on the Iraqi side of the Syrian -border, waiting to cross over, I spoke with a go-between in the US who twice weekly met a severely -traumatised Delta Company veteran in a cafe. A fragmented entry of a document suggested this might be the man I was after. The go-between duly handed this veteran a carefully worded and extremely gentle letter I had written asking for his help in identifying Marines in photographs from Hue. The picture of the shell-shocked Marine was attached. Yet the moment the man saw the photograph, the effect was terrible. He became distraught and walked out of the cafe. The go-between told me the attempt could never be repeated.

Yet I searched on, aware as I did so that with each voice of another veteran I encountered, so the ghostly, shell-shocked Marine became more a guide than a quarry. He had begun in my mind as the distillation of every man's worst fear — frozen and reduced. Yet he changed. In his footsteps I met others, and learnt of time and war and grief and brotherhood, and how Marines grow old, but trauma never fades away.

There was never a pretender or claimant to be the shell-shocked Marine. No one was out there who years later said, "That's me." But many people wanted to be Richard Schlagel, the Marine with the octopus tucked into the band around his -helmet, or thought that they might be the bandaged Marine he cradled in his arms aboard a tank. I remember first noticing McCullin's photograph of these two Marines when I was a teenager. The -rubber octopus on Schlagel's helmet, irreverent and cartoon-like, had always stuck in my mind, riffing off the desperation of the moment. What had become of him and the Marine he held? Now Schlagel sits before me and I am about to find out.

He remembers every moment aboard the tank in Hue, though nothing of the minutes before. But as he held the dying, bare-chested Marine in the foreground of McCullin's image, memories of Fred Tate on Hill 110, in the Que Son Valley of South Vietnam in spring 1967, came back. Tate had been injured in a mortar attack and Schlagel had given him mouth-to-mouth in a vain bid to keep him alive. "There were no signs of life," he says of the wounded Marine on the tank. "I didn't see any breathing or movement or anything. It was like I felt guilty because I lost Tate on Hill 110, and I really didn't want to lose someone else that I was trying to help." There is no doubting Schlagel's identity. He still has at home the octopus that appears in the photo, minus a couple of tentacles lost in the jungle; it had been given to him by his brother in a Christmas package in December 1967. But the main point of contention, exemplifying both the fog of war and the passage of time, concerns the dying young man in Schlagel's arms.

The dispute over this man's identity was most recently resurrected last year on the publication of Mark Bowden's outstanding study of the battle, Hue 1968, in which Bowden and photographer John Olson both identified the casualty as a man named Alvin Grantham, who survived his wounds and lives today. Grantham is a respected Marine veteran who was indeed shot through the chest — the wound exiting out of his shoulder blade.

Yet the testimony of the Marines present on the scene that day with whom I speak, combined with unique access to McCullin's -contact sheet of images taken at the scene in the minutes before his famous tank photograph, suggest beyond any reasonable doubt that there was no happy ending for the Marine -cradled in Schlagel's arms. His name was James Blaine, and he had received a terrible gunshot wound that entered his right upper torso, breaking his spine, before exiting his lower left back just below the belt line. Blaine died the same day. It was -February 15, 1968. The shell-shocked Marine may have always been one step ahead of me. But in his -footsteps other mysteries ended.

Myron Harrington says the shell-shocked Marine never came back to Delta. Thoms tells me that he later heard the Marine had been sent to a psychiatric ward in a catatonic state. The personal medical records are not accessible. The trail went cold. I had walked through the valley of the shadow of Marines' memories in search of him all the way from DC to Tennessee, from the Arizona sun to the snows of Michigan — and I lost him.

Yet there was one more Marine who I found while looking for the frozen man, and every detail of this man's story glowed with the wealth of a hard-fought internal peace. He was not alone in that. I found Marines who had made their own peace with -Vietnam. But his words held particular resonance, and if I wished for an -epitaph for the shell-shocked Marine, it would be written in "Frenchie's" final words to me.

His full name is Melvin "Frenchie" Bourgeois. He is from south Louisiana, and is the Marine in the centre of McCullin's own favoured photograph from Hue, captioned "Crucifixion", in which he is held, his arms over the shoulders of two comrades, his head leaning back in pain from a bullet wound. McCullin photographed Frenchie, 18 at the time, on February 17. He'd been shot in the groin by an NVA soldier, the bullet entering his upper thigh and exiting from his buttock. Dragged behind the cover of a wall, he was treated by two Marines and a medic. As they lifted Frenchie up, McCullin took his photo. But the connection did not end there. Every Marine was needed for the fight, so -McCullin offered to carry Frenchie away from the wall. Amid the crackle of gunfire he held the Marine over his back so that Frenchie's arms were over his shoulders, his body and legs draped down. At some point he stumbled and fell, a moment each recalls, as they negotiated the steps down from the wall.

It was the last time Frenchie ever saw McCullin. He recovered from his wounds and later returned to duty in Vietnam with Delta -Company. A few months later, out on patrol, the man in front of him triggered a booby trap. -Frenchie received a sucking chest wound. "Well, if Don called me the subject of a crucifixion in that first photograph," he tells me, laughing, "he should have seen me the second time I was hit: I looked like Christ being stabbed with a spear — I had blood and water -spurting out of my chest."

He recovered from that, too, and continued to serve in the Marine Corps until 1972. It was not until 2016 that he saw McCullin's photograph. "I have not shed the memories," he says as we sit discussing the war and day begins its fade. "But I have shed some of the weight, the burden that you pick up in war. The losing of friends — I haven't -forgotten them. I've just put it in a place where I can manage that, and live peacefully. I can still have those memories, but in such a way that I am at peace with that. I am OK with my past.

BOOK REVIEW

"THERE IT IS... IT DON'T MEAN NOTHIN"

Charles Hensler's There It Is...It Don't Mean Nothin': A Vietnam War Memoir (289 pp. $9.95, paper; $3.99, Kindle) is a gripping account of Hensler's tour of duty in Vietnam from April 1968 to May 1969. This unique memoir is written as a long letter to Hensler's family. This creates an intimacy between the author and readers. In addition to his wartime experiences, Hensler provides a timeline of the war's key events and the changing political landscape at home.

Hensler's dual approach is compelling. With sober clarity he illustrates the growing number of American casualties and the dwindling support for the war. At the beginning of his tour nearly 14,000 American troops had died in Vietnam. One year later that number more than doubled.

After recounting his childhood in rural Pennsylvania, Hensler describes his decision to enlist in the U.S. Army in 1967, his training at Fort Polk, and arriving in Vietnam in the spring of 1968. He notes that during the Tet Offensive the Viet Cong and North Vietnamese Army had proved their resolve to win at any cost. Despite huge losses, they staged uprisings all over South Vietnam, shocking the American public.

Hensler served with the 199th Light Infantry Brigade northeast of Saigon. His descriptions of his first days, then months, in country are vivid. As a new mortarman, he carried heavy loads of equipment and ammunition on long patrols.

In addition to the risks of tripping mines and booby traps and being ambushed, there was the hostility of the environment itself. The triple canopy jungle was rife with leeches and red ants, forcing men to continually check for the first, and often strip naked to free themselves from the second. Staying dry was impossible in the heat, humidity, and constant rain. Because wet underwear caused chafing, men rarely wore any. Even writing letters home was challenging. Trying not to drip sweat on the pages, Hensler says that he wrote in pencil because ink would quickly wash away.

In addition to the constant tension and fatigue from the long patrols and nights on guard duty, he and his buddies felt that they were there in Vietnam for nothing–a point perfectly summarized by the often-said G.I. phrases in the book's title.

"Most GI's in Vietnam," Hensler writes, "felt they were getting screwed over by being there, at least in the post-Tet Offensive years when the country turned the corner on the war. It became apparent, even to the lowest private, that with the way things were run we were never going to win."

With his engaging, unsettling, often haunting style, Hensler imbues in readers a sharp sense of the conditions American infantrymen endured: Their exhaustion. Their loneliness. Their doubts, even despair. Their cautious anticipation of the end of their tours. Their dream of the Freedom Bird, the plane that would take them home.

OBIT

MORLEY R. SWEET, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN, H&S CO 26TH MARINES,COMM MESSAGE CENTER

LOWELLVILLE — Morley R. Sweet IV, 71, passed away Tuesday, Sept. 21, 2021, at St. Elizabeth Boardman Hospital, following a brief illness.

Morley was born in New Castle, Pa., on Oct. 10, 1949. He was the son of the late Morley R. Sweet III and Elizabeth Jane McConahy Sweet, the oldest of four children. Mr. Sweet attended New Castle High School, Class of 1967.

Morley married the love of his life, Rebecca Jean Gray, on Sept. 6, 1969, and recently celebrated 52 years of holy matrimony. Together, they had six children, Rachel (Rich) Sieman, Sarah (James) Johnson, Esther (Ken) Snodgrass, Lydia (Steve) Minford, Morley (Barbara) R. Sweet V and Elizabeth (Jeffrey) Kiley. Morley was grandfather to 26, Robert, Alexander, Katherine, Gwendolyn, Lauren, Emily, Matthew, Andrew, Samuel, Abigail, Will, Elise, Nathaniel, Evan, Laura, Logan, Landon, Harrison, Morley R. Sweet VI, Collin, Nolan, Rowan, Gavin, Vincent, Genevieve and Oliver. In addition, Morley had eight great-grandchildren, Reagan, Natalie, Cooper, Tucker, Duke, Daniel, Brianna and Rose.

Morley leaves behind a legacy of love and of family. He maintained deep and individual relationships with each of his children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren … leaving each to believe that they were his favorite. Morley invested in the lives of those around him on a daily basis. He taught kids to drive and to spell and to excel and to push limits and boundaries. Morley built soapbox derby cars, entered kids into the spelling bee, taught games of strategy like chess, and created champions.

Morley was an active member of Venture Church in Boardman, and a staunch supporter of the Reformers Unanimous Program. He was generous with his worldly possessions and with his time. He will be remembered as a remarkable storyteller and a formidable Scrabble enthusiast. He despised blueberries and macaroni salad and had a terrible golf game that he thoroughly enjoyed. Morley was a world-class whistler and enjoyed Sousa marches and classical music.

Morley enlisted in the Marine Corps, on Oct. 14, 1966, four days after his 17th birthday. He completed basic training in Parris Island, S.C., where he was recognized on the Marine Corps birthday on Nov. 10 for being the youngest recruit. He completed secondary training at Camp Lejeune, N.C. Morley and his family continued to observe the Marine Corps birthday, including a birthday cake, every Nov. 10.

Sgt. Sweet served as a teletype operator in the 3rd Marine Division of the 26th Marines Regimental Status, Headquarters Company. Morley served during the battle of Khe Sanh, a 77-day siege during the Vietman War, that went on to be the longest in documented U.S. history. On Feb. 23, 1969, Sweet received a bullet wound to his chest and left shoulder by incoming enemy fire, and a wound to his left hand from shrapnel, rendering his left hand paralyzed. He received a Purple Heart for his wounds sustained in battle. He was featured in the book "A Patch of Ground, Khe Sanh Remembered," by Michael Archer. Morley was a lifelong member of the Disabled American Veterans.

After being given retirement status from the Marine Corps in November 1969, Sgt. Sweet went on to earn his Bachelor of Science degree in business administration from Youngstown State University, where he was the president of the Delta Nu Alpha business fraternity 1974 / 1975. Sweet worked on the B&O Railroad as an operator and teletypist in a tower for 11 years, typing 40 words per minute with one hand. He also served as the division griever chairman and treasurer for the Baltimore and Ohio Credit Union. When the railroad towers were shut down, Mr. Sweet owned and operated Chris Glass Block window company in Youngstown, and New Castle, Pa., employing dozens of area youths before his retirement.

In addition to his wife, children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren, Morley leaves behind his brothers, Jon and Jay Sweet; and his sister, Susan Sweet; as well as aunts, cousins, nieces, nephews; and many fellow Marines and lifelong friends.

He was preceded in death by his son-in-law, James Johnson.

Celebration of life services were held at the Davis-Becker Funeral Home, 8536 Market St., Boardman, OH 44512. The Rev. Roland Gray, brother-in-law of Morley, officiated. Interment immediately followed in Graceland Cemetery, New Castle, Pa. Pallbearers will be Morley's grandsons.

In 2009 the KSV Scholarship Foundation started with 6 applicants and has risen to an average of 25 applicants each of the last three years. Many of the student scholars have finished 4 years of post secondary education to successfully achieve their selected bachelors degrees due in part to the support from Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc ..

In this, the 2020-21 school year, we have received 7 applicants for a grand tally of 179 young scholars in 11 years who have benefitted from the KSV Scholarship Fund. Over $110,000 in generous donations from the Khe Sanh Veterans Brotherhood and proceeds from the reunion silent auctions have kept the Foundation healthy. However, the individual awards have trended lower due to the increased volume of applicants vs. reduced donation levels.

The Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. Scholarship Foundation is now in its twelfth successful year of providing financial support for children and grandchildren of paid up members of Khe Sanh Veter-

KHE SANH VETERANS, INC. SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION

GOVERNING RULES FOR OPERATION OF THE KHE SANH VETERANS, INC. SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION

The purpose of the Khe Sanh Veterans Scholarship Foundation (KSVSF) is to provide financial aid to high school graduates who plan to attend an accredited educational institutional as a full time student OR who are currently enrolled full time in an accredited post secondary curriculum.

Scholarship funds will be awarded to applicant students who have at least one parent , legal guardian or grandparent who is a paid-up member in good standing of KHE SANH VETERANS, INC., a 501 C (19) charitable organization.

IT IS THE RESPONSIBILITY OF THE STUDENT APPLICANT TO SEE THAT THE SCHOLARSHIP APPLICATION REQUIREMENTS ARE FULLY COMPLETED AND SENT DIRECTLY TO THE SCHOLARSHIP COMMITTEE CHAIR BEFORE 5/1/2020 AT THE ADDRESS BELOW:

Mr. Dan Fisher
KSVSF Committee Chairman
6050 52nd St. North
Oakdale, MN 55128

CRITERIA FOR SELECTION

Applicants must be the legal child or grandchild of a paid up member (sponsor) of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. (see member definition in the KSV by-laws). This includes deceased, life members of KSV and those Khe Sanh Veterans listed as KIA/MIA in Vietnam if the family member are paid up, associate members of KSV, Inc. Children and grandchildren of associate members are not eligible for this scholarship.

Information provided by each applicant on the attached forums will focus on the following qualities; proof of enrollment at an accredited educational institution, good grades, scholastic character, citizenship, school activities and a personal essay on educational and career goals.

A scholarship review committee will serve at the pleasure of the President of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. to review the application forms for completion and correctness. The KSVSF Chairman will provide scholarship financial report, a list of applicants and their KSV member sponsors and a summary to be presented to the membership at the annual reunion and for publication in RED CLAY newsletter.

NEW!! SCHOLARSHIP AWARDS (school year 2021 onward). NEW!!

I Married The War

I Married the War is complete, but the work continues. Our job now is to be sure the film is seen by all the spouses and family members it can help, and for the general public to aid their understanding of the sacrifices made not only by combat veterans, but also by their families. Supporters giving $ 50 or more will receive a DVD of I Married the War.

WIVES OF COMBAT VETERANS TELL THEIR STORIES

REVIEW & STORY ON PAGES 17-20

I MARRIED THE WAR HAS THE POTENTIAL TO HELP THOUSANDS--IF NOT MILLIONS--OF SPOUSES WHO HAVE EXPERIENCED THE AFTER EFFECTS OF WAR WITH OUR RETURNING VETERANS. THE FILM OFFERS ENCOURAGEMENT TO THOSE SPOUSES AND FAMILIES, DEMONSTRATING THEY ARE NOT ALONE IN LEARNING TO ADAPT TO THE PHYSICAL AND MENTAL INJURIES BROUGHT HOME FROM THE BATTLEFIELD. THE BROADER PUBLIC, WHICH MAY HAVE LITTLE DIRECT EXPERIENCE WITH WAR AND ITS AFTERMATH, WILL ALSO GAIN AN UNDERSTANDING THAT WAR DOESN'T NECESSARILY END WHEN THE FIGHTING STOPS. YOUR SUPPORT NOW WILL BE A POWERFUL FORCE IN THIS IMPORTANT NARRATIVE. SUPPORTERS GIVING $50 OR MORE WILL RECEIVE THE I MARRIED THE WAR DVD.
THERE ARE TWO WAYS TO CONTINUE TO SUPPORT US.

1) THROUGH PAYPAL PLEASE MAKE SURE TO INCLUDE YOUR MAILING ADDRESS TO RECEIVE ANY PRODUCTS DUE FROM YOUR SUPPORT CONTRIBUTION.

2) OR BY MAIL: PLEASE MAIL YOUR CHECK MADE PAYABLE TO SYRINGA CINEMA, LLC PO BOX 44 KUNA, ID 83634

ABOUT THE RANCH MINISTRIES

STORY ON PAGES 73 & 74

The Ranch is a venue for spiritual awakening, growth, and healing. Hundreds of men and women struggling with PTSD, both young and old, have found refuge and help at The Ranch. The Ranch sits on 540 acres of South Dakota prairie, about 20 miles southeast of Pierre, SD, right in the heart of pheasant hunting country. In fact, our location is situated in an area known as the best in the world for pheasant hunting. Our ministry uses pheasant hunting as a keystone for helping veterans and for our fundraising. During the pheasant season, we host pheasant hunts for veterans, including those who are wheelchair-bound or have suffered other severe physical and mental injury. But our ministries involve more than hunting. The Ranch relies on a variety of outdoor activities that veterans and others enjoy. Our ministries also focus on worship, prayer, fellowship, and meditating on God's Word. All these things work to bring healing through Christ closer for each visitor.

Picture in your mind the farms and ranches near Pierre, South Dakota – a landscape similar to what's shown in the movie "Dances With Wolves" (the film was shot right in this area). This land produces feed corn, wheat, soybeans, and seed grains. It also produces people of the land who've inherited a profound sense of tenacity and pride in a job well done at the end of a day filled with hard work. One of those is Ken Korkow.

Ken found college "boring," and like many of his buddies back home, enlisted in the military. Ken, specifically, entered the Marine Corps. After basic training, Corporal Ken Korkow was transferred directly into combat in Vietnam as a mortar section leader in Company B, 1st Battalion, 3rd Marine Division, at the notorious Khe Sanh Combat Base. This base suffered relentless daily attack by the North Vietnamese Army for 77 days. During this time, Ken received citations for The Navy Cross and the Purple Heart. On March 30, 1968, Ken's men came under intense attack. He single-handedly destroyed the hostile mortar placement, and made repeated trips under fire to carry his wounded men to an aid station. Ken was seriously wounded in this attack, and contributed to the defeat of the numerically superior enemy, while saving the lives of many of his brothers in arms.

After his medical discharge, Ken earned undergraduate and MBA degrees and became a successful land broker. During this time, Ken threw himself into work, becoming a work addict as a way to deal with war-torn memories. But it wasn't keeping away the nightmares, anguish, and "survivor's guilt." He was suffering from Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD) before there was a name for it.

But before Ken succumbed completely, he vowed to do something about – and help others suffering. Ken abandoned his lucrative business and returned to his spiritual roots, becoming the regional director of a Christian business organization helping other workaholics to find new hope. During this time, as he overcame his own PTSD, he developed a successful, spiritual approach that is helping thousands of other service members and veterans find peace in their lives.

OBIT

JAMES F. ALEXANDER, USMC ,KHE SANH VETERAN,
H&S CO 2/26

James Francis Alexander, 75, passed away July 31, 2022. He was born on July 8, 1947 to Frank H. Alexander and Slyvia G. Alexander. James was preceded in death by both parents as well as his sister Nancy Livengood. He is survived by his wife Emily Rose Lisowski Alexander; children Larry Wright (Ginger), Julie Alexander, Kelly Ewing (Greg), Anne Roach (Anthony), Pamela Buchanan; 14 grandchildren; several great-grandchildren, as well as several nieces and cousins.

James served in the United States Marine Corps during Vietnam. He worked as an Air Traffic Control Supervisor. During James's younger years he was an avid go-kart racer. He later found a love for restoring old cars to their original condition. He once won the Bloomington Gold Award for his Corvette. James eventually got into sail boating and power boating. He and his wife lived on their boat for two years while traveling all over. Both James and his wife loved to boat and go on cruises. Per James's wishes cremation has been chosen and Samaritan Funeral Home will assist in the arrangements. A memorial service will be held at a later date for James.

"REMEMBERANCES LEAVING KHE SANH"

AN ARTICLE BY RICHARD M. FOLEY, JR. INDIA CO 3/26

I//3/26 had come down from the mountain. The Cav said the siege was over, and, I guess, it was for them. The three or four NVA rounds that came in every half hour suggested that not everything was finished.

I was the Exec of India Company and had been since the battalion left Camp Evans in December. We had left the combat base on December 26 for Hill 881S under the command of Bill Dabney. We hardly expected to remain there for four months, but that's another story.

Now we were back at the combat base, preparing to leave Khe Sanh for Quang Tri. Bill had picked up his gold leaves on April 1 and had been replaced by Captain Lawrence Luther. Luther had been injured during the evacuation of 881 and I was acting in his place. The plan for our departure from the combat base had India first on the airstrip. C-130's were to land and discharge ARVN Units and we were to board the planes for the trip to Quang Tri. I had moved India into position along the airstrip but was angered to find that the "trenchline" there was barely one foot deep. The base was still being shelled and shortly before the first C-130 was to land, a large explosion took place behind me. A round had landed next to the trenchline, killing Lt. Mike Ammons and wounding several others. As the first C-130 landed, more incoming. I made a decision to pull India off the airstrip. As we withdrew to the western side of the base, an order came from above to "evacuate the airstrip." This change in plans undoubtedly saved me a great deal of explaining.

We were now to be flown to Quang Tri by helicopters. However, the order of evacuation was reversed and India would be last. The battalion had been staged for this transfer in the southwest comer of the base. If I remember correctly, the helilift started in the early afternoon. I had set up India's plane teams, making sure to get our new company commander and the two marines assisting him on the first chopper. In the early evening, with most of the battalion off to Quang Tri, I was notified that there would be no more flights until the next morning. That left twenty-five of us to pass the next twelve to fourteen hours in a very tight perimeter, as far away from the ARVN confusion as possible.

It is quite likely that none of us slept. The base was still under NVA fire, but none of the rounds fell near us. I wondered what my marines were thinking. We had survived seventy-seven days under fire on a hill the size of a baseball field. I'm sure the cruel irony of being among the last Marines at Khe Sanh was not lost on them.

And then, at first light, I saw one of the most remarkable sights of the war. Scanning the terrain beyond the perimeter of the base, I noted a very large cloud of dust. Through my field glasses I found the dust cloud was generated by one of the largest masses of humanity I had ever seen Five, Ten, thousand people? They were not soldiers. Men, women, children all moving in a general northeast direction. There were hundreds of carts, some being pulled by animals. By now, all of my little band were staring in amazement at this scene. I got on the radio, wondering who I would be talking to. "This is Northtide India Five to anyone on this band." A voice responded and I think I was talking to someone from the 26" Marine HQ. "Hey", I said, "are you guys prepared for breakfast guests?" No response. "Well, if you look to the southwest you will see a very large group of people who are not enemy soldiers heading this way." Still no response.

I was about to suggest that whoever I was talking to pass this information along when the communication was broken off and our transportation appeared on the horizon. Shortly thereafter we were joining the rest of the battalion at Quang Tri, getting hot showers and steak dinners. Damn, it was almost like we were home that is until a rocket attack that was probably aimed at the airfield fell short and killed six Marines from Lima Company. We had survived the siege only to find that a different kind of war still raged.

What the hell, I was "short." Only one hundred and eighty-seven days to go.

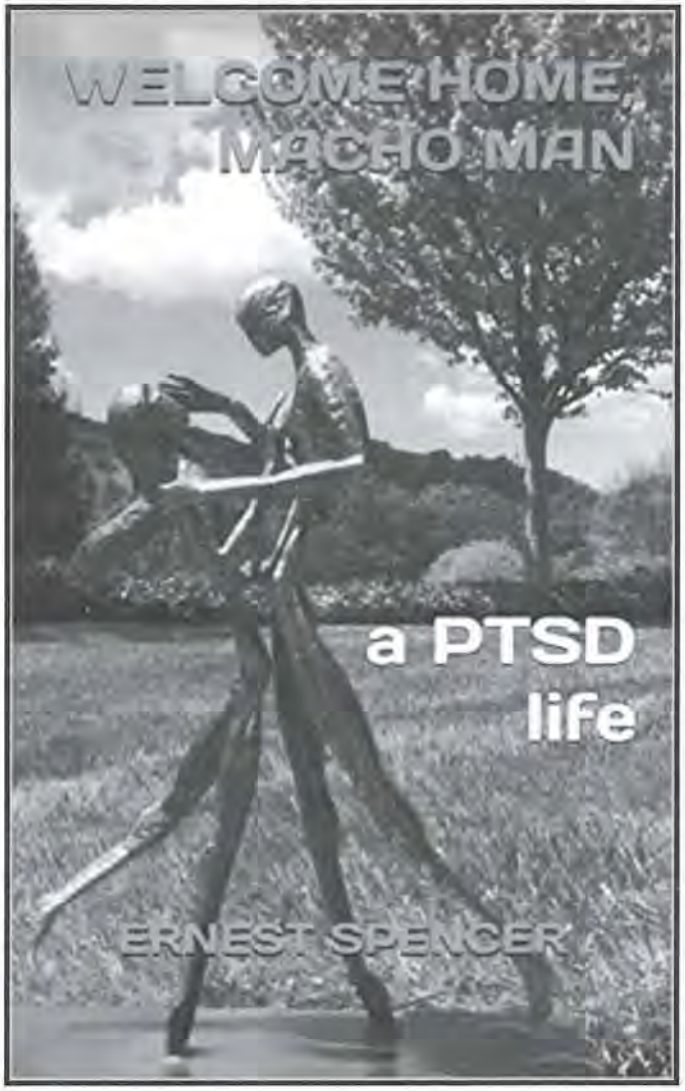
WELCOME HOME, MACHO MAN: A PTSD LIFE

by Ernest Spencer D 1/26 (Author)

Jana Doyle Hollenbeck (Editor)

REVIEW:

Had Ernest Hemingway been a Marine, he might have penned "Welcome to Vietnam Macho Man," and this sequel "Welcome Home Macho Man." Ernie Spencer, the author of these two important contributions to Viet Nam literature, writes in the same straightforward, clear, and honest style. The first book details his experience as an infantry company commander. It's among the most authentic accounts of combat during the horrific 77-day siege of Khe Sanh.



This second book about why he became a Marine and how his life turned upside down after the war is equally powerful. A real page-turner, I couldn't put it down. It's arguably more relevant today considering the tragic number of veteran suicides. Spencer reveals his struggles with suicidal depression and PTSD which wreaked havoc on his health, relationships, and career. In doing so, he gives voice to the countless number of veterans still suffering from physical, mental, and emotional trauma. This book should be read by anyone wishing to understand the invisible wounds of war through the lens of a warrior's lived experience.

I was privileged to serve under then 1st Lieutenant Spencer at Khe Sanh. I witnessed his superior leadership skills, and ability to stay cool under fire, earning the respect of everyone around him. He wasn't the puffed-up chest-thumping kind of leader. But the kind with enough strength of character to not only seek help but also to help others, including offering homeless vets a place to stay in his own home. Ernie Spencer was and still is Macho Man!

I'm posting the below book review on Amazon for Ernie Spencer's latest book.

HON LEE D CO 1/26

How does a Macho Man become a Macho Man? And what does he do with himself after getting to play "god" as a Vietnam War Commanding Officer of a Rifle Company in combat? This sequel to "Welcome to Vietnam, Macho Man" digs deep into the mind of a Khe Sanh vet. The author, Ernest Spencer, opens up and shares with the world his life experiences from both before and after surviving the longest battle in the Vietnamese War - 77 non-stop days of combat in Khe Sanh.

Ernie offers a historical recount of growing up in a bi-racial family in Hawaii, loving and learning from ever present parents, grandparents and extended family and being exposed to military exercises, and heroism from a very early age.

HOW DOES WARTIME SERVICE CHANGE A PERSON?

Ernest shares his struggles with finding a place to fit back into the American Dream. Some, like the author, transition back into society very well in the eyes of the world, yet the demons deep inside are grappled with daily. Ernest's undiagnosed PTSD creates havoc in his life. He feels ashamed of himself for surviving the battle of Khe Sanh while he observed so many around him perish. His silence and the sequestering of his feelings inside causes chaos and destruction in his life.

Some veterans cannot make the transition back into their former everyday life and spend a large part of their post-war lives suffering outwardly, struggling with drug addiction, and consequently being rejected/ignored by the community around them. Ernest discovers many of these veterans and retells his attempts to rehabilitate and empower them to be healthy and productive adults. Who really stands up and supports veterans with post-war mental illnesses and what are their methods? Enjoy this book, think deeply, and give praise to our brave young soldiers and all that they've endured for our country.

COL JOHN C STUDT
COMMANDING OFFICER
3D BN, 26TH MARINES, HILL 881S
KHE SANH VETERAN

REMEMBRANCE OF
COLONEL JOHN STUDT
BY FORMER CAPTAIN
CARLTON B CRENSHAW USMCR

A few weeks ago several members of Colonel Studt's former command in Vietnam learned from his son that the Colonel had died, Colonel Studt's wishes were to not have a formal funeral. Several of us prepared Remembrances of our time in Vietnam with him and sent them to the family. Meanwhile other members of Colonel Studt's family decided to have a funeral at a local Catholic Church in Hartland, Maine. One of his relatives came to the funeral from France and officiated the ceremony as he was a Catholic Priest.

Colonel Studt assumed command of the Third Battalion, Twenty-Sixth Regiment in March, 1968 about midway during the 77 - day Siege at Khe Sanh. His command was located on Hill 881 South (India Company and 2 platoons of Mike Company), Hill 861 (Kilo Company) and portions of the northwest perimeter of the main Khe Sanh Command Base (Lima Company and a platoon of Mike Company). At this time the Marines at Khe Sanh were under orders not to leave their defensive positions until reinforcements arrived. In early April elements of the First Marines who were coming down Route 9 and the Air Cavalry Division both arrived to help relieve the stalemate. This enabled each of the infantry units at Khe Sanh (1/26. 2/26. 3/26 and 1/9) to strike back at the NVA units that had been pummeling them during the preceding 3 - month period. All of 3/26 was flown UP to Hill 881 South. Preparations were made by 3/26 to attack Hill 881 North on Easter Day. During that day Colonel Studt accompanied the lead company of a 3 - company attack of Hill 881 North. The attack was successful and killed 300 NVA.

The Third Battalion, Twenty-Sixth Marines was in turn flown to Quang Tri and was involved in a series of major battles with NVA regiments that attempted to overrun the Quang Tri Combat Base. Colonel Studt's Marines, with the assistance of artillery and air, caused major casualties to the attacking

NVA formations. The NVA were unsuccessful in their efforts to overrun the base. At the end of this battle 3/26 patrolled the areas outside the combat base. During one of those patrols Major Joseph Laughran, 3/26's XO, stepped on a land mine and was killed. That same mine blast severely wounded Colonel Studt - who refused to be med-evacuated from his unit.

Subsequently, 3/26 was transferred from the operational control of the 3rd Marine Division to the 1st Marine Division. The objectives set for 3/26 were to move through a series of areas west of Da Nang all the way to the Laotian border over a period of nearly 2 months. Three Twenty-Six moved from Hill 55 through Happy Valley, along Charley Ridge, Go Noi Island, and the mountains all the way to the Laotian border. During this movement 3/26 was engaged nearly every day with NVA units attempting to impede their progress. A number of NVA base camps were overrun and destroyed including the headquarters for a NVA General officer. Enemy losses were very high. For a 3 - month timeframe 3/26 had the highest ratio of KIA's (enemy vs Marines) of the over 30 Marine infantry battalions that were in Vietnam. Colonel Studt ensured that his Marines were never caught by surprise. He constantly used massed artillery fire to destroy the enemy as his units moved west. Colonel Studt rotated home after being relieved by his XO, Major Dick Blair.

Colonel Studt always led from the front. Throughout the 3 months after he received his wounds at Quang Tri, he had to heal under some of the most grueling conditions possible. The battalion doctor was flown out to treat him almost daily while we were moving rapidly up and down mountains and fighting constantly. The weather was horrendous and exceeded 100 degrees nearly every day. Colonel Studt always looked out for the welfare of his Marines. His actions were appreciated by all of the members of his command. Many of us carry a few pieces of shrapnel from fighting in Vietnam. His son notified me that his dad had over 40 pieces of shrapnel all over his body.

Colonel Studt's remains were buried in a local VA cemetery next to his wife, who died a number of years ago. On Behalf of the Third Battalion, Twenty -Sixth Marines

REMEMBERANCES

I was a junior officer under Lt Col Studt for a 3 month period beginning on April 10 ,1968. Prior to that time I was the Executive Officer and Officer in Charge of a half battery of 105mm howitzers on Hill881 South in the Khe Sanh Valley. Two days before the 3rd Battalion, 26th Marine Regiment 3/26) was to attack the North Vietnamese on the adjacent hill, Hill 881 North, Major Matthew Caulfield, 3/26's Operations Officer, and Lt Col Studt approached me and asked if I would be Lt Col Studt's personal forward artillery officer for the planned attack. They said that they had cleared this with my artillery battalion commander, Lt Col Henley, down at the Khe Sanh Combat Base. I readily accepted this offer and wanted to participate in the planned attack. The forward artillery coordinator (FSC) for 3/26 planned 30 different targets from our hill to Hill 881 North. They were to be fired in sequence as we moved down our hill in the attack starting at 0300 in the morning of 12 April. Because we wouldn't have any light until daybreak around 0600, I memorized those fire missions. As we descended our hill, I called the first 5 targets. We had to wait perhaps 15 minutes while the FSC cleared those targets. That was not acceptable in the circumstances. On the spot I was promoted to be the artillery FSC for 3/26. The attack went well and 3/26 overran the NVA positions on Hill 881 North. There we're over 300 NVA killed in that attack.

Three Twenty- Six returned to Hill 881 South that evening and was flown out of Khe Sanh a few days later while I was evacuated to Da Nang with a severe rat bite that I encountered on Hill 881 South the night after our attack. After receiving 14 shots of rabies medicine, I returned to 3/26 two weeks later. That morning Major Joseph loughran, 3/26's XO, had stepped on a land mine and was killed and It Colonel Studt was severely wounded by the mine blast. Colonel Studt refused to be evacuated and stayed with the battalion during a grueling 2 plus months of movement west from Da Nang overrunning many NVA base camps in the process.

Lt Col Studt was a very impressive Marine leader. He was very bright and aggressive and expected excellence among his officers and non-commissioned officers. He was an officer who led by both example and was always close to the lead position in the battalion. During this timeframe It Col Studt was suffering from his wounds and was treated daily by our battalion physician. We kept a grueling pace going up and down tall hills and mountains while engaged with the NVA. I was always close to him and could see that he was suffering. Yet he never let that interfere with our operation. There was one situation that I will never forget. One day, a very hot day, we were under pressure from the heat. One of our Marines fell out and sat down. It colonel Studt walked over to him and told the Marine to "get his butt off the ground" and walk behind him. John carried the Marine's pack in addition to his own. I volunteered to carry it but he wouldn't listen to me. Word of this incident spread through the battalion and we never had anyone fall out again.

Colonel Studt told me that he wanted to use artillery a lot and to not commit infantry to an attack before we had neutralized the enemy with artillery fire. I wholeheartedly agreed with that same philosophy. The FO's from the four companies and I blew everything away whenever possible. After about 6 weeks we had an incident where fixed wing aircraft missed their target and killed an entire Marine squad with 500 - pound bombs. We had to have them picked up in a cargo sling through the thick canopy. Colonel Studt told our forward air controller that he would never use bombs again close to his infantry. He leaned on me even more. Fourty - years later Colonel Studt informed me that my artillery regimental commander from the 11th Marine regiment wanted me relieved for "excessive use of artillery" - ten times as much as other Marine battalions were using. Colonel Studt and his superior, Colonel Bruce Myers, Regimental commander from the 26t!' Marine Regiment, appealed this to the commanding General (CG) of the First Marine Division and told him that our battalion had the highest kill ratio of every Marine battalion in Vietnam. The CG responded to his artillery commander to double the amount of artillery rounds used. I never learned of this until about 10 years ago.

We were engaged by NVA almost constantly during our search and destroy mission and never once were we caught off-guard by the NVA. We were always on the offensive and running over NVA units nearly every day.

Colonel Studt also took care of his men. Somehow he got us hot food delivered in makeshift field kitchens 2 times and had us resupplied with new uniforms as the ones we were wearing were disintegrating after a month of fighting in exposed weather every day. He ensured that every enlisted Marine ate their meal before the officers were allowed to eat. The same thing applied to uniforms. He also had his doctor bring small cordial bottles of "medicinal" brandy with him every day and I believe brought 10-12 every day. I got one nearly every night and truly enjoyed this one small creature comfort. I stayed in contact with Colonel Studt over the past 53 years since we were together in Vietnam.

When it was discovered that our recommendations for a Navy Cross award for Captain Dabney were lost and never submitted, Colonel Studt got into action and got both Matt Caulfield and me to resubmit recommendations as well to organize a Steering Committee to bird-dog the recs through the labyrinth approval process as well as to coordinate a ceremony for the award at VMI, close to the Dabney residence. I met Colonel Studt at the award ceremony and his son John. That was a fantastic experience. Colonel Studt and I stayed in contact over the 10-12 years after the award ceremony through emails, phone calls and Christmas cards. I will truly miss him.

Sincerely,

REMEMBERANCES

LtCol John Studt was my battalion commander in Vietnam. I served slightly over a year in the 3rd Battalion 26th Marines as a radio operator in Comm Platoon H&S Company. I served under four different battalion commanders - two for very brief periods of time and two (to include LtCol Studt) for the full length of their tours. He was, by a marked difference, superior in all ways to the battalion commander he replaced.

When he first arrived at 3/26 we were at the Siege of Khe Sanh and I was attached to India Company on Hill 881S. I first met him when I returned to Khe Sanh Combat Base in early February. I began to serve on rotation within the Battalion CP as the TACP radio operator. He was instrumental, along with Majors Caulfield and Loughran, in getting me meritoriously promoted to Corporal. I didn't use the term "professionalism" in those days, but I was immediately impressed with his knowledge and discipline. He expected a lot from his troops, but he also never forgot that he was once a troop himself.

We left Khe Sanh in mid-April 1968 and operated out of the Quang Tri area for about a month. In May, we were all set to deploy to the DMZ area to counter NVA troops in the Cua Viet area. Sometime during the night, our orders were changed and the battalion was transferred to the operational control of the 1st Marine Division. We were almost immediately deployed to support operations southwest of DaNang. We were to spend the remainder of my tour in the bush. With the exception of a couple of weeks when I filled in for the battalion radio operator in Kilo Company while he went to Hawaii on R&R, I spent the rest of my time in the battalion CP group. There I got to observe close up LtCol Studt and I admired him for his leadership. He was a big believer in the use of supporting arms in that an artillery barrage preceded the movement to a new hill as we chased the NVA westward through the mountains. Despite still suffering from wounds received in the Quang Tri area a month or so earlier, he was insistent upon carrying his own gear. Several times I personally heard him arguing with officers in the rear at 1st Marine Division, who from the safety of their position were insisting upon actions that he felt would be detrimental to the battalion. I would have followed him anywhere.

In May 1969, I got out of the Marine Corps and went to college. One day I was walking through the student union and heard my Vietnam nickname. It was my former platoon commander who was now an Officer Selection Officer. I shortly signed up to return to the Corps. While in OCS, we had an assignment to write about an individual whom we admired. I chose LtCol Studt.

My first tour after completing TBS and Communications School was in Comm Company Headquarters Battalion, 3rd Marine Division. Midway through my tour, sometime in 1975, we had a battalion change of command and now Colonel Studt was named the new commander. I scheduled a few minutes to say hello and was impressed that he remembered me from Vietnam. I had recently been approved for a two year extension as a Reserve Officer and he encouraged me to apply for augmentation. I later was surprised to find out that he was the Reviewing Officer on my next fitness report and on my augmentation package. Evidently he had asked our company commander to write my fitness report vice the OIC of the Communications Center (who was also my platoon commander) which was the normal practice. I attribute his enthusiastic review as greatly helping me augment into the Corps.

Several years later, I was stationed at Quantico and was being transferred to 1st Radio Battalion in Hawaii. If I remember correctly, Colonel Studt was the Chief of Staff at the Education Center. In any case, I stopped by before leaving to tell him that I was grateful for his support over the years. I never forgot the lessons he taught me through observation

MAJOR WALTER WHITESIDES
USMC(RETIRED)

MAJOR GENERAL MATTHEW P. CAULFIELD USMC(RET) LETTER TO STUDT FAMILY 2023 SOUTH PACIFIC STREET OCEANSIDE, CA 92054 OCTOBER 10, 2021

Dear Studt Family,

On hearing of your father's passing, I have thought non-stop about him. I thought the best thing I could do for him is to ensure all of you know him as I did. It's important to me because I believe he was the greatest Marine combat leader of our generation who never received, indeed refused, personal recognition. He insisted that recognition and praise for his accomplishments be passed-on to his Marines. He was honest to a fault and acted on his convictions without consideration for the effect it might have on his future success. We developed a close friendship, as close as a friendship can be between a senior and junior officer in the Marine Corps. By the way, every surviving officer who served with us in Vietnam feels the same as I do. We tried to dedicate the 3rd Battalion, 26th Marines Remembrance in the National Museum to him but he refused to let us do so.

I served with your father on two occasions: Vietnam in 1968 and Okinawa in 1976. Our battalion in Khe Sanh was in very bad shape when he assumed command. We had been in Khe Sanh about a month. It was a hell hole. The enemy was one problem in that we were surrounded and lived in holes in the ground to escape incoming artillery and mortars. We were prohibited from patrolling outside of the base and physically were wasting away in holes in the ground. We didn't have showers and subsided totally on c-rations. The more serious problem was we were badly led. Our battalion commander was inept and should not have been in command of an infantry battalion under any circumstances, not to mention combat. The Regimental commander seldom left his headquarters, which was less than two hundred yards away from our CP and a short but harrowing ride to our combat outposts. He had no idea of our battalion's predicament. The bright spot was the second in command of our battalion, Major Joe Loughran was highly competent. Although serving as the executive officer, he in fact commanded the battalion. As the S-3 operations officer, I fought the battalion under Joe's guidance.

Your father's arrival was a godsend. The first night of his arrival, I was on the radio, responding to an intense artillery bombardment when he reached over, took the radio handset from my hand, and directed the battalion. , felt as though a weight was lifted from my shoulders. In short order he visited every one of our positions in the combat base and despite the regiment's warnings, helicoptered to our isolated outposts on 881S and 861 S. He was the only commander to visit those units in the seventy-seven-day siege of Khe Sanh. He ordered the reinforcement of our command post and bunkers surrounding it. The reinforcements were based on his knowledge of proven lessons learned. That act saved my life, and several others, when an enemy 152mm artillery shell scored a direct hit on our command post. We soon learned that your father had an almost encyclopedic knowledge of military history, which he applied to everyday events. Within a few days he knew every detail of our situation and planned to attack the enemy positions surrounding the base. We discussed that plan almost every day and just about every day he pleaded with the regimental commander to let us go on the offensive.

That attack began on Easter Sunday. Your father decided on a night attack despite the physical condition of the Marines after months of inactivity. He was with the lead company. Supporting arms, including seven stacks of aircraft, every artillery piece within range, mortars, and direct overhead fire from 50 caliber machine guns simultaneously preceded and accompanied the lead elements on to the objective. I was with your father in a position with clear observation of the objective when an air observer reported, and with binoculars we could make out, enemy soldiers running from the objective. A few minutes later we sighted a Marine climbing a burned-out tree on the objective and attaching an American flag. At that time, we thought the attack was carried out without any friendly casualties. Our joy in the realization that we carried out a perfect battle, and had the enemy on the run, which is something the North Vietnamese Army never did, is impossible to describe. A few minutes later I received a radio call and had to report to him that three Marines had been killed earlier in the battle. I will never forget the agony on his face.

In early May we departed Khe Sanh. Your father insisted on being with the last of our battalion to depart the combat base. We arrived in lang Vei, in an Army operations area located in a relatively safe area. Our mission was to rebuild our battalion. All of our personal records and equipment, including vehicles had been destroyed in Khe Sanh. Nevertheless, it was as though we arrived in paradise. The first day of arrival, we showered, were provide new utility uniforms and a sumptuous hot meal- and best of all, cold beer. It was a wonderful to sleep off the ground on a cot - until about 0200 in the morning.

The impact from the rocket that impacted on the crossbeam of the tent next to ours literally threw me out of the cot. I got up confused, ran in the pitch dark, looking for a trench. I tripped into a culvert along a road. Other than the sounds from the stricken tent and a few shouts, it was relatively quiet. I got up, ran to the stricken tent. It was a gruesome scene. I heard your father's distinct voice. I found him. He was leading a handful of Marines who helped him pick up and place bodies and body parts into canvas bags.

A few days later we began operating in the relatively secure lang Vei area. Our first operation was supposed to be a "walk in the sun", meaning no enemy contact expected. Joe loughran, decided to join us, although his executive officer job usually tied him to administrative and logistic chores at the base. The morning was uneventful. About noon time we were joined by an Army Cavalry Squadron. Your father suggested I patrol with the Squadron, so I climbed on to the Bradley vehicle and off we went in a cloud of dust.

It was a fun afternoon being with the Cav Squadron. Early afternoon the sound of an enormous explosion to our rear drew my attention to the vicinity of where the battalion was operating. There was a huge plume of smoke. I thought it was either mortar, artillery or a bomb. It turned out to be a mortar round attached to a pressure device. Joe Loughran was walking several meters behind your father when he stepped on it. I still can hear your father's distinct hoarse voice over the Bradley's radio screaming, "Matt get back here, Joe's hit." He never called me by my first name.

We raced back. The medevac helicopter was just taking off. Jumping down from the Bradley, I could have touched the helicopters underside. it was that close. The corpsman told me Joe kept repeating that he wanted to see his newborn son. He added that Joe probably wouldn't make it. Corpsmen always know. He said that he was more worried about the Colonel. He said he was seriously wounded by the same explosion but refused to be evacuated.

Your father looked awful. His complexion was ashen. His trousers and shirt were bloodstained as were the dressings on his arms and legs. He said two things when I tried to convince him into being medevaced: "It was my fault." And "take charge of the battalion and get us back to camp" I replied, "yes, sir" and began the longest walk of my life.

Your father was immediately behind me and didn't utter a sound. All I heard was a sloshing sound every time he took a step from the blood which was running down his leg into his boots. I walked back to him several times to urge him to accept a medevac. On each occasion he told me, "They will take the battalion away from me." I argued that I had to report that he was wounded. His reply was that, " No, I will take care of the reporting". We kept trudging on with me thinking that any minute he would collapse, and I then I would call a medevac.

We finally got back to our camp and found out that Major Loughran did not survive. I was a close friend before joining the battalion and we became very close because of our otherwise leaderless situation in Khe Sanh. After settling in the battalion, I went to my tent, fell to the dirt floor and cried my eyes out. It was the worst night of my life. Your father shared my grief and in addition was suffering from very painful, serious wounds.
I found him the next morning, struggling with the assistance of the corpsman and sergeant major to get up from his cot. He was clearly in a great deal of pain, grimacing and grunting in agony with the slightest movement. The regimental commander was inbound, and he had to show him he was physically capable to command, which he clearly was not. How he was able to convince the colonel is still a mystery to me. I do know that the new regimental commander, Colonel Bruce Myers and your father had a relationship that went back to Korea. Then Captain Myers commanded the company in which then Private Studt served in and was wounded.

In any event, your father convinced him. At your father's direction we began operating at a high tempo. He continued his practice to lead the battalion from the front. The way he did so was having the sergeant major on one side, his runner on the other side, literally hold him up as he got in and out of helicopters. We continued to dig-in every night as was his standard procedure.

The next morning, as your father was preparing to report to a very agitated general, I tried coming up with an alibi for him to use, when he cut me off curtly and asked, Ipresume you guys won the fight with the Australians". As he strapped on a captured North Vietnamese pistol, a gift from the troops which he always wore, I reminded him that the general had a strict rule against using captured weapons. I pointed out that there was a sign on the Division CP to that effect. He replied, lithe troops gave it to me." He prized that pistol and could care less about what the general thought.

He came back beaming from the ass-chewing with the general. The general told him to take his "mob" and go on an operation that was being planned by the 7th Marines. He couldn't wait to get back to an operation in the field. We were delighted to get away from the general's wrath should he find out about our Australian altercation. We jumped-off on the right flank of a 7th Marines battalion, accompanied with an earth-shaking artillery preparation. The same general who referred to us a mob a few days prior observed our departure sent a message, stating that it was the most expert utilization of supporting arms he had observed in Vietnam. Your father believed that there was an inverse relationship between the use of supporting arms and Marine casualties. We never moved in unfamiliar terrain without supporting arms. On several occasions he refused to move out until his demands his were met.

The terrain was very difficult and moving through the thick vegetation was even worse. We often had to crawl up slippery slopes, hanging on to branches. We seldom saw the sky, leaches were an everyday event and we had to deal with snakes and on one occasion, a tiger. The effective use of supporting arms was always a challenge. The 7th Marine's battalion on our flank was evacuated after two weeks due to attrition caused by non-battle casualties. The casualties usually involved severe stomach upset and diarrhea caused by failure to purify water taken from streams, which involved treating canteens with a foul-tasting pill. Your father refused to evacuate non battle casualties, particularly when the cause was failure to purify water. On one occasion a Marine suffered horribly and almost died from diarrhea, but your father refused to relent.

He believed evacuations gave away our position to the enemy. One irresponsible Marine could endanger the entire battalion. On the other hand, as hard-headed as he was with evacuation of what he suspected were self-induced non battle casualties, he showed unusual compassion and made extraordinary efforts to evacuate Marines for non-battle causes such as loss of a family member at home. The only word to use is "fanatic" in describing the way he demanded immediate medevac for battle casualties.

We trudged on for fifty-two days, which was a record by a factor of 3 for any Marine unit operating in that kind of terrain. We managed to continually reposition heavy mortars to a series of fire bases that we moved into. And by the way, we dug in every night. He dug half the hole, I dug the other half.
Air support was especially difficult. The vegetation made it impossible to mark targets and for the pilot to visibly confirm its location, in accordance with regulations. We instituted a system in which the pilot, in coordination with our forward air controller, flew a compass heading to the target. It deviated from regulations, but it was the only way to ensure air support. It worked as was evident day after day in the numerous successful sorties flown in support. Not once did the enemy initiate an engagement. One day, in one sortie, a pilot flew one degree off azimuth. It resulted in the most tragic day of your father's tour in Vietnam.

An entire squad, thirteen Marines were killed instantly. To make matters worse, we had to lift the bodies out of the jungle to our fire base in a cargo net slung from a helicopter. It was a sight none of us would ever forget. Your father stoically walked down to where the net had released its gruesome cargo to supervise the transfer of the bodies to a waiting helicopter. As the helicopters departed, he turned to me and said, "under no circumstances do I want that pilot held accountable."

As was inevitable, a few days later a Marine Air Wing investigating officer, a full colonel, arrived at the fire base. Before he said a word your father stated, "I am totally responsible. I insisted on the deviation from procedures." And then repeated what he had told me a few days before: "under no circumstances do I want the pilot held accountable." Your father personally wrote the mishap report and in writing accepted full responsibility for that tragic event. We never heard another word about the incident or the investigation.

As your father's rotation date home approached, he frequently talked about extending his tour to stay on with the battalion. We were close friends by then, having shared a fighting position throughout the operation. I was hoping he would stay on. We all know he was demanding but the very best. Survival in Vietnam improved being with the best. Your father was a tough man and set the highest standards of professional performance. He was a disciplinarian because lives depended on it. Under that uncompromising and rigid exterior lay a sincere compassion and deep love for the men he commanded. He also had a keen sense of humor and often made fun of situations that arose from the environment we were in. He could also laugh at himself. Working for him might be exhausting at times. Serving with him was always professionally rewarding. His repeated references to military history made every day a learning experience.

We knew each other's families well by sharing news from our letters. I know of no one who loved his family more than he did. I knew that leading from the front as he did had risks. I guess that's the reason I helped to convince him not to extend his tour in Vietnam. The day he departed was not a happy day.

On his return home among the first things he did was to visit my wife Pat. After my return to Quantico a few months later, we got to know each other' families, including spending time together in your mother's family house in Rehoboth Beach. By good fortune several other members of our battalion also were transferred to Quantico, including the regimental commanding officer. We had some of the best parties ever.

An event I have suspected had a profound effect on you father's career happened in Quantico. I don't have first-hand information as I was not present, and my conclusion is based on conjecture. I mention it because it says so much about your father's character. As a student in the Command and Staff College, he presented a case based on our experience in Vietnam that was not well accepted by Marine Corps leadership. He related several instances during classroom discussion from our experience in Vietnam in which Marine helicopter support was deficient. His presentation was based on factual instances in which Marine helicopters medevacs were prohibited from flying in certain weather and combat conditions whereas Army helicopter medevacs were not Similarly prohibited. We often called first for Army medevacs when available before tasking Marines. He believed it was not the issue of the individual pilots but the system. He reported the situation in several combat after action reports, but remedial action was never taken.

This time the situation got headquarters' attention. The three-star, deputy commandant for Aviation, an iconic Marine helicopter pilot, arranged to address his class. Your father was looking forward to the opportunity to finally remedy a situation that was unsatisfactory as well as a highly emotional one. Your father made his case and spoke up forcefully as was his custom, but it apparently fell on deaf ears. He told me later that the general just didn't believe him. I thought about this incident several times over the years, as I learned how higher levels in the Marine Corps sometimes react to criticism. There is no more sensitive issue than to criticize the superior support Marine air brings to the battlefield. And by the way, no one believed in Marine aviation more, or utilized it better than your father.

Unfortunately, there is a tendency to fault the messenger.

Well, I think I should end here. I had much more to say but I hope you understand why I and so many others believe he is the greatest combat leader of our generation, albeit unrecognized. He also has been an inspiration to me as an example of the highest standards of professional competence and personal character.

COLONEL THOMAS L. JOHNSON, USAF, KHE SANH VETERAN, 3RD AD GUAM B-52, ARC-LIGHT

Dr. Thomas (Tom) LeRoy Johnson, 85, of Elberta, Alabama, died Thursday, May 17, 2018, at his home with his wife Judy, children, grandchildren, and great granddaughter at his side.

Tom was born on March 26, 1933 in Seattle, Washington. He attended the University of Washington and graduated with a B.S. in Business Administration in 1956. He served in the U.S. Air Force for twenty-seven years, including four tours in Vietnam. Tom was a radar navigator on B-52 combat missions over Vietnam including the battle of Khe Sanh. He was a special guest and keynote speaker at the November, 2014 Khe Sanh reunion. By the time of his retirement from the military, Tom achieved the rank of full colonel. Tom received his Doctor of Arts in Computer Science from Nova University in 1988 and taught for sixteen years as a college professor at the University of Maryland and University of Mobile. He and his wife Judy enjoyed traveling to many exotic destinations throughout the world. Early this year Tom published his first book, "Skid Row Kid," an autobiography and in-depth look at the life of a young boy trying to survive on the streets of Seattle during the World War II Era.

Tom was laid to rest in Arlington Cemetery. The family urges readers to support the Wounded Warriors

OBIT

JAMES D. THORTON, USMC KHE SANH VETERAN, DELTA CO 1/26

James Donald Thornton of Siler City, NC passed away on December 5,2020. Born October 18, 1946 in Asheville, NC to the late William Walter Thornton and Virginia Goldsmith Thornton Hyde. He graduated from TC Roberson High School and A-B Tech in Asheville.

He is survived by his sister, Anne Thornton Wood (James) of Boones Mill, VA, nephew Dale Wood (Sheri) and niece Pamela Brown (Dean). His ex-wife and still best friend, Vickey Utter and her sons, Everett and Bruce.

He proudly served with the 26th US Marines, 1st Battalion, Delta Co and was in Vietnam for 2 years. While there he was at the battle of Khe Sanh where many of his fellow Marines gave their lives and one of his last emails to his sister he said "they are rolling in their graves with what is going on in America today."

After moving to Siler City, he was "adopted" by Ronnie & Hilda White and their family, but it was Cody that changed his life after Vietnam. Cody who is a very special young person took away many of the awful memories that the horrors of war leave in our Veterans.

Don was a true patriot and conservative and was concerned about the future of America and our young people. There will be no service at this time because of Covid

Tribute From Anne T Wood (Sister)

Please accept this check(Donation Scholarship Fund) in the memory of my brother, James Donald Thornton (Spanky) ... I didn't know about the name Spanky for a long time. He, like so many others lived Khe Sanh ever day until the day they pass away and for him it was December,2020. He was part of the 1st Battalion, 26th Marines from 1967 to 1969.

I remember those years so well ... I remember watching every day for the mailman to come. We had a super nice mailman. Mr. Kinsey and after he made his mail run and went back to the post office, he would look and see if a letter had come in during the day and bring it back to my mom and I. I try to explain to my children and grandchildren that we did not have the communications back then and were totally dependent on the mail. When you all went off to war, your family didn't know where you were or if you got there until the letter got home. Don came home with all the evils that war leaves you with. He drank, smoked and was the most hateful person to people (especially his sister).

But then he left the states and moved to the Virgin Islands for about 3 years. When he came back, he moved to Siler City NC and became friends with a Navy Medic that had been in Vietnam, he understood and they were there for each other. His Navy friend, Ronnie White had a grandson (Cody) about 28 years ago that was born with Downs Syndrome and I will never be able to explain it but he changed Den's life. Even the nightmares stopped, he didn't tell me about that until about 2 years ago. Cody would not talk but the 2 of them bonded and understood each other. Cody remained his best friend until the day he died.

Don, like myself do not understand what is going on in our country and how people can feel the way they do about soldiers & police. Race relations are worse today than they were in the 60's. I will not get on the political bandwagon but God help this nation!

Thank you for your service.

OBIT

JAMES LESLIE HAIR, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN. C BTRY, 1/13

James Leslie Hair Died on Nov. 11, 1947, in Riverside, to Eslie Everett Hair and Barbara Jean Bridges. He grew up on a family owned ranch in Sunny mead with two sisters, a brother, uncles, aunts, and eight cousins. After graduating from Riverside Poly Technic High School in 1965, James attended Chapman College for one year and toured Europe with the William Hall Corale.

Jim enlisted in the United States Marine Corps in 1966 where his MOS was as a heavy equipment operator. He miraculously survived the Siege of Khe Sanh where enemy fire blew up his bulldozer while he was operating it to put out burning and exploding ammunition dump. He was subsequently awarded a bronze star with combat V and a Navy Commendation Medal. Jim considered his time in the Marine Corps a valuable training ground for leadership and character building.

Jim was a gentle giant but still had the can do heart of a Marine. After an honorable discharge with the rank of Sergeant from the Marine Corps he met and married Carrol Yvonne Owen and began a 25 year career working for Southern California Edison's Hydro Generation Division. He first worked as a heavy equipment operator, then entered management. Jim was privileged to work in the beautiful mountain locations of Big Creek, Bishop, Three Rivers, Kern Rivr, Springville and at various local hydro generation stations in the foothills of the Inland Empire. While working for SCE he earned a Bachelor of Science degree in Business Administration. After retiring in 1996 he began a new career as an Associate Pastor at Yucaipa First Baptist Church, now called Grace Point Fellowship. Jim served as an administrator, counselor, teacher, did hospital visitation and officiated at many wed dings and memorial services. His greatest passion Was teaching, sharing, God's Word and encouraging people in their walk with the Lord.

Upon retiring from full-time Pastoral Ministry he worked as a project manager for SCE in Big Creek and served as an interim pastor for a small church there. After returning to Yucaipa permanently he continued to volunteer his time at Grace Point Fellowship as an elder, teacher and mentor. The most common comment in the many cards the family has received is "Jim was there for me when ... "

Jim is survived by his faithful wife of 49 years, Yvonne, his loving daughter and son-in-law, Erin and David Buchanan, "like a son" Bob Martin and wife Diana, three precious granddaughters, Emily, Rebekah and Abigail. He also leaves behind three siblings; Pam Reed and husband Jim, Patty Bearden and husband Fred and Dan Hair and wife Jeanne and four beloved nephews and their families.

Memorial services for Jim were private. Remembrances for Jim can be sent to Samaritan's Purse, P.O. Box 3000 Boone, NC 28607 marked "Operation Heal our Patriots."

Sally Jackson, widow of Art Jackson, WWII Medal of Honor Recipient, is one of the eleven wonderful spouses featured in I Married the War. Here's a nice the story from Lance Santiago: A month before I started working at the Idaho Division of Veterans Services/Office of Veterans Advocacy [in Boise}, Sally Jackson gave some [challenge] coins to the VSOs [Veteran Service Officers] in our office - her [late] husband, United States Marine Art Jackson's [personal] Medal of Honor coins for his heroic actions on the island of Peleliu in WWII! I have been bitching and complaining since July of 2017 that I came a month late. And then today I was presented a coin from Sally a month and a half before I retire! Miracles are live and in concert! I am very grateful!"

DOCUMENTRY REVIEW
"I MARRIED THE WAR"

Ken & Betty Rogers have spent the last 6 years writing their documentary "I Married The War'
This Documentary brings to life the ways in which families are impacted and forever changed by the unique personal struggles, victories, and defeats experienced by our country's veterans. Hear about sharing a marriage with a WWII Medal of Honor recipient, a Vietnam War corpsman, an Iraq War survivor.

The film giving voice to wives of combat veterans from World War II to the present-day Middle East wars. From every corner of our nation, women have waited and welcomed our warriors back from battle, only to discover that the conflict followed their husbands home.

Directed by Betty Rodgers and Ken Rodgers, The wives in I Married the War recognize hypervigilance, isolation, the quick temper, and the emotional escape that are manifestations of post traumatic stress. As a result of traumatic brain injury, they have dealt with their husband's memory loss and reduced ability to express themselves. They have battled their spouses' substance abuse and survivor's guilt. They have nursed their veterans' mangled bodies.

Wives feel isolated in their personal struggles until realizing they share experiences with women and families around the nation and the world. Hear how they have learned to adapt, how some have built on their husbands' strengths, and how some have discovered their own strengths and reestablished their identities in the process.

A few Short reviews from other Authors:

Siohban Fallon: Author of "You Know When the Men Are Gone" "a nuanced, heart –breaking, and, most of all, magnificently inspiring film"

KEN AND BETTY RODGERS

TERRI TOPMILLER WIDOW OF BOB TOP-MILLER WAS PART OF PANEL DISCUSSION AFTER THE DOCUMENTRY FILM.

CASA GRANDE — When combat veterans return home, the war often returns with them. With their new documentary film, "I Married the War," Betty and Ken Rodgers share the stories of 11 combat veteran wives, highlighting how the trauma of war can linger, impacting families and communities for decades "Married the War" is the second documentary by the couple and they say, making it was personal. Ken, a former Casa Grande resident and 1965 Casa Grande Union High School graduate, is a Vietnam veteran. Betty, his longtime wife, understands the difficulties and struggles of living with a former combat veteran.

"We wanted this film to give women and families of veterans a voice," Betty said. "There are 5.5 million caregivers of combat veterans in America and they've been silent all these years."

The film focuses on the stories of wives whose combat veteran spouses fought in conflicts ranging from World War II to the Iraq and Afghanistan wars.

The film focuses on the stories of wives whose combat veteran spouses fought in conflicts ranging from World War II to the Iraq and Afghanistan wars.

In the film, "they share their common story of homecoming, loss and resilience. Their story of love," a description of the film says.

The Thursday evening premiere also included an art exhibit showcasing the work of area artist Palmer Miller III, an Army veteran whose work often focuses on military and patriotic themes.

Following the film, a panel discussion will be held, featuring the filmmakers, local veteran families and Terri Topmiller, one of the women featured in the film.

Topmiller, who is from Arizona, was married to a Vietnam veteran who died by suicide 40 years after his Vietnam experience.

She was among the first people interviewed for the film.

"Her husband never recovered from the trauma of the war," Betty said.

Making the film and hearing the stories of the women featured in the documentary impacted the filmmakers in many ways.

Betty said she understood their stories and saw the similarities in her own. Ken was a member of Bravo Company when it survived a 77-day siege of Khe Sanh by North Vietnamese troops in 1968.

"Fifty-four years later, that siege is still fresh in his mind," Betty said. "It was heart-wrenching listening to some of the stories."

For Ken, listening to the stories told for the documentary was an eye-opener.

"I heard them talk about PTSD and its symptoms of rage and anger and paranoia and I thought, 'this is me. I do those things,'" he said. "The message of the film is a good one. It's about the long-term consequences of combat. PTSD is a normal reaction to combat and the film makes us think about our relationships with our families."

The couple set about making the documentary about six years ago, soon after finishing their first film, "Bravo! Common Men, Uncommon Valor," which tells the stories of war veterans who survived the 77 -day siege in Vietnam.

The Rodgers travel to show their films and after one showing of "Bravo," Betty was approached by a member of the audience. "He said, 'as a wife of a veteran, you're impacted too.' It made me realize that that's an important part of the story," Betty said.

"I Married the War" received two Impact Docs awards in January, including a special mention in the Documentary Features category and an Award of Merit with special mention in the Contemporary Issues category.

Ken, a former business manager, has a master's degree in fine arts. He has also written poetry, personal essays and a book of short stories titled "The Gods of Angkor Wat."

Betty worked for years in an investment office but always had an interest in photography.

They combined Ken's interest in storytelling with Betty's knack for photography and together created "Bravo," initially released in 2011, enlisting the help of experts in the documentary film industry.
"We stumbled around a little but were lucky to find people to help," Ken said.
"Bravo" was re-released in 2014 and was shown several times in Casa Grande. It can be streamed on Amazon Prime Video.

DAVID H, ESTENSON, USMC, DELTA CO 3RD RECON, & LIMA CO 3/4, 26TH MARINES KHE SANH VETERAN

Estenson, David H. 75 of Minneapolis, Alexandria and Ft. Myers, FL. passed away on December 21st. David graduated from Washburn HS in south Minneapolis and the University of Minnesota. He was a proud Marine serving in Lima Company 3rd Battalion, Fourth Marines and company D 3rd Reconnaissance Battalion, and the 26th Marines 3rd Marine Division Reinforced). Lance Corporal Estenson became squad leader and eventually company operations chief. He received the Presidential Unit Citation and was awarded the Combat-V. David was fresh out the Marine Corps in 1968 after a brave and distinguished tour in Vietnam in the thick of the action at Con Thien, Khe Sanh and other reconnaissance missions throughout North Vietnam.

One day he strolled into the architecture and planning office where his future wife Mary Anne worked. While testing and awaiting an opening with the Minneapolis Police Department, David became an exceptional salesman selling high end furniture to architects for their clients. He always dressed like an Ivy Leaguer and he acquired a lifetime of extraordinary good taste for all things contemporary in the world of art and furnishings. Alas, he joined the police department and eventually took the light, Mary Anne, away from the architecture practice. David was extremely loyal and had a great store of empathy for those he touched and respected. He was always on top of the list to care for those who needed help of any kind. Always there for his friends, their parents and children. David was constantly reaching out to the elderly or ill to give comfort, play some cards or shoot the breeze. His skills of observance and listening, as well as his voracious reading, contributed to a vast intellect which allowed lively conversations with anyone, no matter their station in life.

There was never a fiercer or fairer opponent to square off against on the racquetball court, tennis court, ski hill or fishing on a beloved lake. David was a fine golfer and a student of the game to the very end. He was a member of both the Alexandria and Gateway Golf Clubs. David's abundant curiosity made him a world class traveler who was able to instantly bond with people from other cultures. David and Mary Anne often found time to visit friends stationed in faraway places, and were welcomed with delight. Whether traipsing through Russia alone at the end of the Cold War, cruising the Mekong River, Yangtze River or Seine River, he was a fabulous travel mate except when he would disappear up the road to talk to a local street cop.

Somehow he could always communicate after showing his ID's. While a recently planned trip or two were cancelled, those who knew David well will continue to travel the globe with him alongside in spirit. David was a Minneapolis Police Officer proudly serving for 25 years. Much of that time was with the Minneapolis Police Bomb Squad. Sgt. Estenson was the driving force behind the development of "ESTY", the 32 acre Explosive Storage and Training Yard in the south metro that over the years hosted critical training for bomb technicians from around the country. David is preceded in death by his Father Harold, Mother Clara and brother-in-law Jim Hibbard. He is survived by his wife of 49 years Mary Anne, brother Craig (Susan), brother-in-law John Hibbard (Cheryl), Sister-in-law Margaret Hernlem James), nieces, nephews and cousins from around Sunburg, MN. Goodbye for now, Semper Fi! In lieu of flowers donations may be sent to Hope Hospice,9470 Health Park Circle, Ft. Myers, FL 33908.

KHE SANH VETERANS IN THE NEWS SERGEANT VINCENT RIOS, USMC (RET)

Vince Rios is a veteran of the Vietnam War, recipient of two Bronze Stars and three Purplehearts. after losing both legs and his right arm to a concealed land-mine explosion, Sergeant Rios, known to friends as Sarge, returned home to a hostile anti-war, anti-military, anti veteran civilian world. With medical assistance from the US Department of Veterans Affairs, he recovered rom his severe wounds, underwent physical and occupational therapy, and was fitted with prosthetic devices. With grants from the VA, he purchased and modified an automobile, built a wheel-chair accessible home, and earned two Master's degrees. Over a lifetime career as a federal representative covering the Western United States, American Samoa, and Micronesia, Sarge was a tenacious advocate for the disabled in employment. He retired in 2001.

Sarge was most recently National President of the First Marine Division Association. Now, after completing his term, he is enjoying constant contact with his Marine friends who served with Able/ Alpha One Five of 1st Marine Division. A-1/5 Marines hold strong but diverse views, Sarge observes, but all agree that we are living in the most consequential period in US history. "We also agree, in a noblesse oblige ' sort of way, to voice our views: write, telephone, e-mail and lately, "Zoom' all who we think hold the most hope for salvation." He does so mostly with his grandchildren and enjoys encouraging them to gain as much education as possible; to read the classics, learn more than one language, and to find a wholesome role model He wants them also to be aware that "Grampy's" day, and that of others his age for leading our country, is slowing down and their parents will soon follow. He reminds them that whatever field they choose, make it one they love, and one where they can make their contribution to the fields that are most consequential in governance politics, media, and medicine-for a better world. He also hounds the various groups to which he belongs to set the example, starting with following the letter and spirit of their own by-laws with integrity.

Vince Rios was born in Houston at the end of WWII and joined the Marine Corps out of high school in 1964. When he was retired from the Corps, he chose to stay in California and lived in San Francisco until 2008.

Though he returned to Texas, were Sarge to choose a home anywhere, he says, it would be the Marines' Memorial Club. He joined the Club in 1984 at the encouragement of longtime friend and former Board member Don Reid. He had attended many business events and celebrations at the Club since moving to San Francisco in 1973 but hadn't known that membership a3 open to all Marines.

In 1998 Sarge began serving the first of several terms on our Board of Directors. The discussion at the· time, he recalls, was whether to elevate non-Marine members from associate to regular membership status., and then whether to have sitting members on the Board from the non-Marine branches. He stayed on until 2007.

In 2001, when Harry Reiter retired as General Manager of the Club and a search went out for a replacement, Sarge was a strong proponent of hiring Major General Mike Myatt "There were three candidates" he says, "all Marines. Two had extensive experience in the private sector. The third had virtually none; his career had been spent in the Marine Corps."

Sarge was adamant that Maj Gen Myatt knew things about the Corps and about Marines that the other candidates didn't have time to learn, and should therefore be our choice. Summed up, he says, Myatt knew the true meaning of Semper Fi and Esprit de Corps. He made every persuasive argument he could muster that these were our underpinnings and, in the end, won over unanimous support. Thus a new era for the Club was born.

Since he moved to Texas, Sarge has stayed at the Club maybe a half dozen times. He's joined friends at the Flying Leatherneck Lounge and Leatherneck Steakhouse, stayed over for Veterans Day, Memorial Day and Fleet Week. "Unfortunately" he laments, "time, distance and circumstance have lim-ited my visits and the true joy of being in the Club." Still, the friendships he values most are linked to the Marines' Memorial and always within reach.

THOMAS N. QUIGLEY USMC
KHESANH VETERAN, B CO 1/26

Tomas "Tom" N. Quigley, 73, of Springfield, passed away on Tuesday, March 22, 2022 at Springfield Memorial Hospital. He was born August 11, 1948, in Springfield, the son of William and Besse Perrine Quigley. He married Nancy L. Lamb on April 12, 1980 and she survives.

Also surviving are his two children: son, Shane Quigley and daughter, Erin (Jacob) Parsons, both of Springfield; three grandchildren, Julia, Autumn and Carlin; and a "bonus" grandson, Arlo.

He was preceded in death by his parents and brother, Bill Quigley. Tom enlisted in the Marine Corps in March 1966 and served a tour in Vietnam from June, 1967 to March 30, 1968. He was honorably discharged in June, 1969, with the rank of Sergeant. In 2010, Tom had the opportunity to participate in a documentary, Bravo: Common Men, Uncommon Valor", in which he was interviewed about his experiences in Vietnam and the siege of Khe Sanh.

Tom was a lifelong resident of Springfield. He belonged to First United Methodist Church. He was a member of the Purple Heart Organization and DAV. He spent almost 35 years in the automotive business as a sales manager, then as a wholesale representative. He retired in 2015.

Tom enjoyed playing poker, video games and was a huge movie buff. He was an avid Chicago Cubs fan and enjoyed listening to Elvis. One of Tom's greatest joys was playing with his grand children.

Graveside Service: was held Friday, April 1, 2022 at Camp Butler National Cemetery, where military honors will be conducted.

Memorial contributions may be made to the American Cancer Society or Wounded Warrior Project.

DAVID L. HANSEN, USA KHE SANH VETERAN, 237TH MED DET (DUSTOFFS)

Dave died on Monday after a long fight with Prostate Cancer that had spread to his spine. Thank you very much, Agent Orange, from the war that keeps on hunting many of us down. It was Dave who first conceived of a universal Peace Garden at Khe Sanh. He raised funds, made numerous trips to KS, at his own expense, planted trees, and actually got permission from higher-ups in the government to proceed in this large endeavor. He, his wife Carol and Luke attended a number of our reunions and he was always grateful that Tom Eichler gave him time to speak at our membership meetings. Told me that in a phone call 3 weeks ago. Once he was first diagnosed it put an end to his travels there and to his dream. The trees he and many others planted are still there and per his request some of his cremated remains will be sent to Vietnam where the local Vietnamese man he dealt with numerous times has agreed to plant another tree at KS with Dave's cremains in the ground with it. A good man as many of you know. On one of his trips back he hired a local guide and the two of them climbed Hill 950! A monumental feat for someone who was in his late 60's.

COLONEL DAVID L. ALTHOFF, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN HMM-262, MAG-36

The Marine Air wing lost a legend today, Col. Dave Althoff (center). I was honored to know the colonel from our MCL detachment in Phoenix. Col. Althoff was a triple Silver Star recipient, along with numerous other combat medals. Col. Althoff was the most humble and decent human being as well as the fiercest combat pilot. Some of the Marines on here may have served with him or crossed paths

Born in Effingham, Illinois, in 1932. Served in Arizona National Guard, U.S. Navy, and commissioned in U.S. Marine Corps in 1954. Served in Korea and flew 1,080 combat missions in Vietnam. Retired as Lieutenant Colonel in 1972 with decorations including three Silver Stars, four Distinguished Flying Crosses. Graduated from ASU with a Bachelor of Science in Business. Active in the East Valley in real estate serving as president of the Board of Realtors in 1975; Past President of Tri-City Multiple Listing Service. President, Chandler United Way, 1975. Served on various medical facility boards since 1973 including nine years as Chairman of Chandler Regional Hospital Board of Directors, and Chairman of Arizona Hospital Federation. Active with American Hospital Association. Inducted in to the Arizona Aviation Hall of Fame, Tucson Aerospace Museum, 2000. Member of Veterans of Foreign Wars and Disabled American Veterans.

LTC David L. Althoff and his crew in the period 1967 through June 1968 flew more than 1000 combat missions in Vietnam. During that year in combat, their CH-46 was shot out of the sky four times. Althoff and his crew, in order to resupply forward area troops with ammunition, food and water and rescue wounded troops, placed themselves in harm's way many times Althoff is credited with saving hundreds of Marines who were critically wounded in battle, surrounded by the enemy and in need of immediate evacuation from the battlefield.

Althoff developed airmanship/helicopter combat flying tactics and techniques used throughout the USMC. In 1968, Althoff was selected by the USMC as the Marine Corps Aviator of the Year and awarded the Alfred A. Cunningham Trophy. He is the recipient of 3 Silver Stars, 3 Distinguished Flying Crosses, 1 Bronze Star, 1 Meritorious Service Medal and 55 Air Medals. Althoff has been an Arizona resident since 1948.

COLONEL ROSS A. BROWN, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN, CO H&S CO 1/26, XO D CO 1/26

Ross A. Brown was born in San Diego, California on July 25, 1944. He passed away peacefully at his San Juan Island home on Aug. 29, 2022 with his family at his side. As a young man, Ross earned the rank of Eagle Scout. Ross always wanted to be a Marine like his uncle, Ross Miner. He enlisted in 1962, graduated from San Diego State College, and was commissioned as a Second Lieutenant in the USMC in June 1966. He served three tours in Vietnam, including at the Siege of Khe Sanh.

He returned to the US and married his college sweetheart, Kare, in June 1969. Together they lived in Japan, Korea, Okinawa, and many places in the US during his Marine Corps career. Ross commanded a regiment of 4000 Marines during Operation Desert Shield from 1990-1991.

After serving 30 years and earning the rank of Colonel, Ross retired in 1992. Ross and Kare then moved to San Juan Island. Ross spent many happy days on the water fishing for salmon. His most exciting catch was a 40 pound chinook. Ross joined the Einer Nielson-Becky Barr fishing tournament committee to bring the fun of salmon fishing to others. Ross and Kare traveled extensively during their retirement years. He loved being aboard a cruise ship with Kare (rather than with a regiment of Marines!).

Ross is survived by his beloved wife, Kare, of San Juan Island, daughter Care Maree Harper and grandson Odin Harper, of Sammamish, WA and cousins Trish Lehman of Friday Harbor, Broge Miner of Renton, WA, and Eric Miner of Sequim, WA. A memorial service was held at 2:00 PM on Saturday, 8 October at St. David's Episcopal Church in Friday Harbor. In lieu of flowers, Ross requested donations be made in his honor to Disabled American Veterans. Semper Fidelis.

MORE KSV IN THE NEWS

Lake Charles, LA (KPLC) - David Grimm signed up for the Marine Corps in 1968, knowing full well that the Vietnam War was raging in Southeast Asia. Grimm still remembers what it was like the first time he shot at the enemy.

"The first man I shot, I cried," recalled Grimm. "I literally watched him fall and I cried. But then I looked over at the guy beside me and he was dead. The crying stopped. It stopped. It's something that clicks inside of you. You know, you're here to defend your country, but you're also here to defend yourself."

Grimm's 2 tours of duty in Vietnam included some bloody fighting. He remembers being on night patrol at Khe Sanh.

"Just as it was breaking daylight, I watched my point man get shot. I raised my arm up to let my men know to get down, and I got shot in the arm, the muscle came out, and it spun me around and I got shot in the back of the leg in the knee."

Grimm was awarded the Purple Heart for his injuries. He admits it was hard to return home to a nation that was divided over America's presence in Vietnam.

"Maybe I am a little bitter. But I'm not bitter to the point where I wouldn't do it again because if they came to me and said, 'Would you go back?' I know they won't take me. I'm 71 years old now. But I would."

Grimm is especially proud of his three sons, David, Mike and Scott, who followed their dad and joined the Marines, and served in Iraq, Iran and Afghanistan.

FANWOOD, NJ -- A Scotch Plains Boy Scout who discovered a lost soldier with ties to his hometown of Fanwood will unveil a sign above Paterson Rd. at 10 a.m. on Saturday, May 28, to honor and remember to Robert Wood, who was killed in the Vietnam War.

For his Eagle Scout project, Michael Mahaffey heard news of lost solider Cpl. Wood, who died in April 1968 at 21-years-old, and decided he had to do something to aid in the memory of him. Wood was assumed to be a native of Georgia before his birth records were found a few years ago.

"One of the prevailing factors in the interest of Robert Wood was that he was a corporal in the United States Marine Corps, having served in the Vietnam War. Instantly, I thought of my own grandfather

MOMENTOUS CHANGES IN THE MARINE CORPS DESERVE DEBATE. RETIRED GENERALS RAISE TELLING QUESTIONS ABOUT THE CURRENT COMMANDANTS RADICAL NEW IDEAS. BY JIM WEBB USMC FORMER SECRETARY NAVY

Where is it written that a subordinate or former commander can set aside deference and demand a second look?

For more than two years many of the Marine Corps' finest former leaders have struggled with this dilemma as they quietly discussed a series of fundamental changes ordered, and in some cases already implemented, by Gen. David Berger, the current commandant. Among Marines there are serious questions about the wisdom and long-term risk of dramatic reductions in force structure, weapon systems and manpower levels in units that would take steady casualties in most combat scenarios. And it is unclear to just about everyone with experience in military planning ·what formal review and coordination was required before Gen. Berger unilaterally announced a policy that would alter so many time-honored contributions of the Marine corps

The unique and irreplaceable mission of the Marine Corps is to provide a homogeneous, all-encompassing "force in readiness" that can go anywhere and fight anyone on any level short of nuclear war. The corps has fought many Political battles to preserve that mission but never from within-until now.

Among other decisions, Gen. Berger's "Force Structure 2030" plan includes theses provisions:

• Elimination of three infantry battalions from the current 24, a 14% reduction in frontline combat strength.

• Reduction of each remaining battalion by 200 Marines, taking an additional 4,200 infantry Marines from the frontline combat capabilities.

• Elimination of two reserve-component infantry battalions of the present eight, a 25% reduction of combat strength.

• Elimination of 16 cannon artillery battalions, a 76% reduction, to be replaced by 14 rocket artillery battalions, for use in "successful naval campaigns."

• Elimination of all the tanks in the Marine Corps, even from the reserves.

• Elimination of three of the current 17 medium tilt-rotor squadrons, three of the eight heavy-lift helicopter squadrons, and "at least" two of the seven light attack helicopter squadrons, which were termed "unsuitable for maritime challenges.'

After several unsuccessful attempts by retired senior officers to engage in a quiet dialogue with Gen. Berger, the gloves have now come off. The traditional deference has been replaced by a sense of duty to the Marine Corps and its vital role in our national security. Recently, 22 retired four-star Marine generals signed a nonpublic letter of concern to Gen. Berger, and many others have stated their support of the letter.

A daily working group that includes 17 retired generals has been formed to communicate concerns to national leaders. One highly respected retired three-star general estimated to me that "the proportion of retired general officers who are gravely concerned about the direction of the Corps in the last two and a half years would be above 90 percent."

There is not much time to stop the potential damage to our national security. Questions should be raised. The law does not give the commandant of the Marine Corps carte blanche to make significant changes in force structure. Title 10 provides that the commandant perform his duties "subject to the authority, direction, and control of the Secretary of the Navy," and that the Navy secretary "has the authority necessary to conduct all affairs of the Department of the Navy including ... . organizing,," but "subject to the authority, direction, and control of the Secretary of Defense." And the president retains, ultimate authority as commander in chief.

The risk involved in a restructuring of this scale should have required full consideration and debate in such Pentagon offices as the Defense Resources Board, then a formal approval by the defense secretary before being sent to the White House for further review, and then extensive overt-site hearings in Congress. Few of our most serious members of Congress would have simply nodded and funded a program.

who served himself as a captain in the United States Marine Corps, also in the Vietnam War," said Mahaffey, a student at Union Catholic. "Finding a story so similar to my own family is what sparked such a great interest in learning more about this inspiring man." The story of Robert Wood struck an emotional chord for the Boy Scout.
"This is so important to me as I couldn't even imagine what it must be like to have a family member or yourself forgotten by the town that you grew up in," Mahaffey said. "More importantly, I saw this story, thought of my own grandfather, and felt a moral duty to show the respect I have for this great man. Finally, I spent the first ten years of my life as a resident of Fanwood before moving to Scotch Plains. Anyone from this great town is a proud Fanwoodian, and we should honor Mr. Wood as such."

According to the New Jersey Vietnam Veteran's Memorial, Robert Helm Wood was born on Oct. 22, 1946, and was the youngest of six sons born to John and Amelia McLean Wood. The family lived in Fanwood, where Robert attended public school before the family moved to Point Pleasant, where he graduated from junior and senior high school. Military records list his home of record as Fort Benning, GA, but in 1963, at the time of his dad's death (his mother died in 1959), Robert moved to Georgia to live with his older brother, Richard, an Army Major stationed at Fort Benning.

On this date 55 years ago, I was at Khe Sanh. Samey same many of you. 30 years ago on this date, I was at Khe Sanh. Back in 1993 not many American vets had returned to Vietnam. Fewer had gone back to Khe Sanh, as it was very difficult to visit the former combat base. The only sign it had been a battlefield was this monument celebrating the victory of the Liberation Army over the US and puppet troops. The monument was defaced with graffiti and was taken down by the government -- I don't recall it being mentioned by other visiting veterans. A Vietnamese friend translated the words on the monument for me. Her grandfather, who fought the French and the Americans, passed through the area in 1968 and said "it was a sea of bodies" and he was surprised he made it out alive. I felt that way too on a couple of occasions, back in 1968. Best to all of you.

The FMF Corpsmen Memorial was finally be dedicated on October 12, 2022, at Lejeune Memorial Gardens on Montford Landing Road in Jacksonville, North Carolina. The ceremony will occur at 1000 hours (10:00 AM).

The time is now. A long-awaited dream is at last being realized. The FMF Corpsmen Memorial, nearly fifteen years in the making, will finally be dedicated on October 12, 2022, at Lejeune Memorial Gardens on Montford Landing Road in Jacksonville, North Carolina. The ceremony, complete with the 2nd Marine Division Band Brass Quintet, Military Color Guard and much more will occur at 1000 hours (10:00 AM) directly behind the Vietnam Memorial. Limited seating is available.

The members of the Corpsmen Memorial Foundation, formed in January 2008, fought an uphill battle to obtain the private funding for this project through many fund-raising projects and grant appeals. They are now happy to reap the rewards of their efforts and present to the public an emotional statue created by renown sculptor, Abbe Godwin, who also created 'The Guardian' statue for the Beirut Memorial.

The statue (which is loving referred to as 'Doc') depicts a wounded Marine being treated by a Corpsman who is also shielding him from incoming fire. It is a tribute of the lasting bond between Marine and Corpsman both on and off the battlefield. We welcome the public to join in this celebration and witness firsthand the emotion displayed by both figures in this sculpture. There will be no photography prior to the unveiling of the statue at the conclusion of the ceremony.

SEABEE : SOMETHING GOOD AT KHE SANH

NMCB 121 Delta CO. I left my weapon and gear behind at Camp. I was packed and ready to go on R&R in Malaysia I had my camera and hoped I haven't forgotten anything. I caught a ride to the airfield at Phu Bai in a Jeep that was going on a mail run. I got dropped off behind a little office about 50 yards from the runway. I stood with a small group of men waiting on the plane. Most of them were going on R&R . Some were talking about the fun to be had in the next five days. We stood and smoked as we waited. I saw the C130 circle and make an approach to the runway.

I heard someone give a cheer as we watched the plane settle toward the runway. As the wheels touched mortars started hitting and exploding around it. The pilot touched and go , we heard the engines roar as the pilot desperately tried to yank it back into the air. As it lifted a mortar hit directly in front of it. The plane seemed to fly right through the explosion as it roared up into the sky. I lay on the ground and watched it fly south , it seemed a miracle that it escaped. The Mortars stopped as the plane flew away. A moan went up , now we have to wait for another plane. I stood up out of the sand and brushed myself off . Sirens were wailing and the runway was damaged .

Peter had a passion for cars and motor racing, having restored several antique cars over the years. Peter adored his grandchildren and loved watching them play sports. He was an honest man with a big heart and a tremendous work ethic The family is planning a military honor funeral and mass to be held in Buffalo, NY, June 2023. In lieu of flowers, donations to Good Shepard Hospice of Lake Wales, Florida can be made in Pete's honor.

VIETNAM STILL WITH DAVE SITZMANN

By LESLIE MIELKE For the Bingham News Chronicle
Nov 10, 2022 Updated Nov 10, 2022

BLACKFOOT – Dave Sitzmann from Blackfoot volunteered for the U.S. Army during the Vietnam War. He entered the Army on Jan. 6, 1970, and was discharged on Feb. 22, 1972.Sitzmann went to Vietnam on his birthday, July 19, 1970, and returned home, landing in San Francisco on his birthday, July 19, 1971.

"My dad picked me up at the airport in San Francisco; I was greeted by a lot of hecklers. My dad, who was a WWII vet, said of the hecklers: 'This is just ludicrous.'"

After Vietnam and during the war in Iraq, the country realized vets had done a service for them," Sitzmann said. "Since Vietnam vets got out, vets from the Iraq and Afghanistan wars are shown respect and honored. It's heart-warming.

When I meet vets from Iraq and Afghanistan wars, they thank me and tell me they are being honored and respected because of what the Vietnam vets went through." In Vietnam, I was a Huey helicopter door gunner and crew chief," Sitzmann said. "The basic work of the crew chief was to have daily and weekly inspections of the helicopter and its guns to make sure they were operable. The crew chief determined if the helicopter flew that day or didn't fly."

Sitzmann was part of Charlie Troop 7/17 Cavalry (Cav).If a helicopter needed major repairs, maintenance handled it. The standard configuration of a four-man helicopter crew were pilot, co-pilot, crew chief, who was the gunner on the left side of the helicopter, and the door gunner on the right side. The helicopter could carry eight infantry men.

The crew chief (and left gunner) was on the left side of the helicopter because the tail rotor is on the left side of the helicopter. The left gunner watched to ensure the helicopter stays clear of trees and branches because it spins much faster than the main rotor. The main rotor is heavier and slower. We were a very slow, lazy target," he said. "Our men could hear us coming; so could the enemy. We would fly whenever or wherever needed, five to seven days a week, often multiple times each day. We would fly a mission, return to base, refuel and go back out."

Normally the helicopter formation was made up of two Cobra helicopters that carried mini-guns (motorized Gatling guns) and rockets; one Huey helicopter that was command control (CC) and one Loach helicopter that was the scout helicopter. The Loach crew was looking for the enemy as well as our soldiers

The Cav unit's job was search and destroy," Sitzmann said. "We were looking for tunnels, stashes, smoke and/or personnel on the ground." War correspondent Joe Galloway, who was the only civilian awarded a Medal of Valor by the Army for combat action in Vietnam, called the pilots and gunners on Huey helicopters "God's own lunatics." "Vietnam is a beautiful country with its white sand beaches and thick jungle canopy — right up to the time the enemy is firing on you." In December 1970, Sitzmann's unit was instructed to "pack everything up and turn it into supply — be on ready to go." In February 1971, the unit was going to Khe Sanh on a top secret mission. They were heading into Laos.

This was a South Vietnamese mission with the objective of closing off the Ho Chi Minh trail," he said. "We were told if we got shot down, American troops could not be put on the ground to find us."The mission did not go well. The name of the operation was Lam Son 719. The South Vietnamese troops were overrun by North Vietnamese and the Viet Cong during the Lam Son 719 operation.

When helicopters came in to help withdraw during Lam Son 719, "the South Vietnamese were hanging off the skids, wanting to be the first ones out." There were drugs over there but not as rampant as reported," Sitzmann said. "The seven crew chiefs and seven gunners on the Huey helicopters formed a pact that came to be known as the 'Slick Platoon.' We could drink beer but no drugs were allowed." All of the members of the Slick Platoon lived to return to the States but one, Sitzmann's door gunner, who died on Feb. 25, 1971. "It was not a good day," he said.

Sometimes I don't have good nights and I have a hard time sleeping. It helps to talk about it." He has attended a number of PTSD clinics sponsored by the Veterans Administration. "They help." "The Vietnam War has never ended for many. There were snakes, booby traps, and people shooting at you. Still now, when I hear a diesel backfire or hear a bang, I'm going down to the pavement. "War sucks" I'm glad I went and served. I think everyone should go into the military; it made me grow up and totally helped me."

Sitzmann was in the Army two years and two months. After returning from Vietnam, he was assigned to Fort Hood, Texas, for six or seven months. The policy for length of service had changed. If the soldier had been in Vietnam one year, he/she could get out early. Sitzmann qualified. He was then assigned to active reserve which required he participate in wargames for one week end a month and two weeks in the summer.

Returning to the States, Sitzmann rejoined his uncle who was an electrician. I've been an electrician my whole life," he said. He and his family moved from California to Blackfoot in 1974In 2008, Sitzmann joined the Elks Lodge because "it has a nice quiet atmosphere." He also serves on the Elks Veterans Board. On Saturday, Nov. 12, the Elks Lodge is hosting its annual Veterans Appreciation Dinner. It's a free dinner for vets; the vet pays for his or her spouse to attend the dinner.

AUTHOR AND MARINE KHE SANH VETERAN MICHAEL LEE DIES AT 76

By Tom Recchio

After joining the Marines, training as a clerk (and an infantryman, as all Marines are), and then being retained on Okinawa for some months to teach scuba diving to fellow Marines, the idea of war seemed unreal to him. When he finally arrived in the country and saw the lushness of the mountain landscape, he thought he was "lucking out."

But he soon learned he wasn't when he was wounded on the day after Christmas. His subsequent exposure to Agent Orange made his initial sense of luck doubly ironic.

Michael Lee died on May 16, 2022, in Brewster after a long, complex illness. He was 76.

The jarring juxtaposition of beauty with sudden brutal reality characterized much of Lee's published writing. In the opening story of his critically praised collection Paradise Dance, the narrator describes the fate of his brother, Jake: "It all ended for him in a sudden jungle when his patrol was ambushed just outside Khe Sanh on a January day in 1968."

Jake had been leading an eight-man squad on patrol when he "was hit with a hot knurl of metal that bored into his left arm pit, tumbling and slashing a frightful path to his young heart." For the narrator, and for Lee, "Things seemed much less important since that day."

Lee, an only child, was born in Reading, Pa. to James and Jean Lee on Feb. 23, 1946. The Lees moved to Framingham where Michael finished high school. His parents had a summer cottage in Dennis.

Lee attended college intermittently over many years, earning an associate's degree in journalism from Miami-Dade Junior College, a B.A. from the University of Massachusetts Dartmouth, and, in the 1980s, an M.F.A in writing from Emerson College.

As he explained in "Witness to War," after high school he was given a football scholarship to attend Oklahoma State University. When he lost the scholarship and became eligible for the draft, he decided to join the Marines.

He had two reasons. His father had survived the battle of Guadalcanal in World War II, and, Lee said, "I knew they trained you well."

Once in Vietnam, Lee was assigned to Khe Sanh, where, he said, "I had to turn my typewriter in for a machine gun," as the base was under siege for 78 days. Lee was engaged in nearly continuous combat. "I remember," he said, "five days before I came back from Vietnam, I was on a night ambush. Then, six or seven days later, I was cruising the bars in San Francisco."

He brought back from the war both a sense of community and solidarity and invisible wounds that would work against any notion of comfort in community.

"I was angry about everything," he told his high school interviewers, "and lived the typical PTSD lifestyle, you know, drinking, drugs, and outbursts of anger, not answering the phone, having nightmares."He lived for a few years in Key West, then in 1978 settled in Wellfleet, which he considered his hometown. Over the years, he worked as a shell fisherman, a chef, a teacher, and a writer. He "made great ribs" when he was running Bahama Mama's with his wife, Kathy Selleck, in the early 1980s, said Ira Wood. But it was in his engagements as writer, reviewer, and teacher that he found a vocation and sustaining community.

Lee hosted a series of readings called "Night of New Works" at the Academy of Performing Arts in Orleans for many years. All writers were welcome, from published authors to high school students. Beth Seiser, a regular participant, said there was one basic rule: the piece had to be current, a work in progress. Seiser met Lee when she took his adult education course in fiction writing at the elementary school in Wellfleet; she was the youngest in a group of mostly senior citizens. "I handed in embarrassing manuscript after embarrassing manuscript," she said, "but he would find a nugget in each one, even if that nugget was only three words." After that course, Lee invited Seiser to join his weekly kitchen -table writing workshop. Over the decade that she participated, "No one ever left discouraged," she said, partly because "he was an absolutely hysterical guy." The one piece of Lee's wisdom that remains most powerful in Seiser's memory: "You just have to make friends with the fact that you're a good writer."

That's what Lee himself was, a good writer, but whether he managed to make friends with that fact is anyone's guess. As a Marine, he contributed to Stars and Stripes from Khe Sanh; he also wrote for the Framingham News, Cape Cod Times, and Cape Codder. He was a senior editor for the Cape Cod Voice, and his short stories appeared in Yale Review, Potpourri, Writer's Digest, Northeast Magazine, the Boston Herald, and Fantasy & Science Fiction magazine.

Lee published three books, a poetry chapbook, Low Tide, writen with Eric Linder of Chatham's Yellow Umbrella Books; the short story collection Paradise Dance, published by Ira Wood's Leap Frog Press in Wellfleet; and In an Elevator with Brigitte Bardot, a collection of his best columns from the Cape Cod Voice, supplemented by eight longer essays.

Library Journal's review of Paradise Dance called Lee "New England's best kept literary secret" who "should have been recognized long ago." His work calls to mind that of Andre Dubus and Raymond Carver, observed Publisher's Weekly. Norman Mailer thought highly enough of it to provide this blurb for the cover: "Michael Lee's short stories have a rare quality. They are tough, hard-bitten, and surprisingly sensitive to the nuances that motivate behavior in people we assume too quickly are without nuance."

In 2011, it was reported that Lee had finished the first draft of a novel, Dancing Man.

Lee is survived by his wife, Julia Cataldo Lee of Orleans; his ex-wife, Kathleen Selleck; and two cousins, Rob Lee of Virginia and Katherine Lee Muir of Florida.

A funeral service with full military honors is planned at a yet to be determined date at the National Cemetery in Bourne.

MCDONALD, WEATHERSFIELD HONOR KHE SANH VETERAN DENNIS JOHNSON STREET TO BE NAMED AFTER VIETNAM WAR CASUALTY

Weathersfield Trustee Steve Gerberry said plans are to name a portion of McDonald Avenue from Ohltown McDonald Road at West Second Street south to Watson Marshall Road as the "Dennis Johnston Memorial Boulevard." The area of McDonald Avenue is near McDonald High School.

"Because the road travels through both the village of McDonald and Weathersfield, officials from both communities want to honor Dennis Johnston by naming a section of the road in his memory," Gerberry said.

Seaman Dennis Neil Johnston, a 1966 graduate of McDonald High School, enlisted in the Navy, serving with the 3rd Marine Division, 1st Battalion, 9th Marines, HS Company with a specialty as a hospitalman.

Gerberry said Johnston gave his life while in active service to the United States in the Vietnam War. He said Johnston was killed in action on April 16, 1968, while engaging hostile forces during the battle of Khe Sanh on the south slope of Hill 689 in Quang Tri Province, South Vietnam.

"He was just 20 years old and was the only graduate of McDonald High School to fall in Vietnam," Gerberry said.

Gerberry said Johnston also is honored at the Vietnam Veterans Memorial in Washington, D.C.
For his bravery, Johnston was awarded the Purple Heart, the Combat Action Ribbon, the National Defense Service Medal, the Vietnam Campaign Medal, the Vietnam Service Medal, the Navy Presidential Unit Citation, the Vietnam Gallantry Cross, the Navy Good Conduct Medal and the Navy Expeditionary Medal.

Gerberry said the township will install a donated sign along the road reflecting the memorial designation. McDonald Mayor Glenn Puckett said village council, like Weathersfield trustees, also has approved a motion to honor Johnston. Puckett said plans are being discussed to have the official dedication of the sign on Memorial Day or sometime that weekend.

Puckett said he has spoken to Weathersfield administrator David Rouan about plans for the event. He said the area is behind the high school with one side of McDonald Avenue in Weathersfield and the other side in McDonald.

Rouan said Johnston lived in the township on Watson Marshall Road, but attended McDonald school district.

"We were approached by veterans who felt that Dennis Johnston should be recognized in some way for his service and sacrifice," Rouan said.

Raymond Bishop, a retired command sergeant major with the Army, sent a letter to trustees asking them to consider dedicating the section of McDonald Avenue to honor Johnston. He said Johnston was among the 40 Marines and Navy corpsmen killed April 16, 1968.

"I am not requesting to have the road name changed but to have your approval, along with the village council of McDonald, to have the roadway designated Dennis Neil Johnston Memorial Boulevard," Bishop wrote.

Bishop said the request will not cost the township. The signs will be paid for by a fund that has been established to honor those who have died in service to the country and are recipients of the Purple Heart

Rouan said talks have been held to have a sign with Johnston's name and the name of the street at both entrances to that section of McDonald Avenue so motorists can see the sign from both directions.

"It will be large signs that can be seen by anyone traveling by. This will let us show our appreciation for the sacrifice he made," Rouan said.

OBIT

LT COL WILLIAM DINWIDDLE USAF, KHE SANH VETERAN

LT. Col. William Dinwiddie "Bill" Tucker USAF (Ret.), 94, of Arlington, Virginia, passed away peacefully on January 18, 2023. Bill, son of the late Hubert Quinton Tucker, Sr. and Mary Elizabeth Carpenter Tucker, was born in Washington, DC, on October 5, 1928.

Bill was raised in Washington, DC, and graduated from Central High School in 1948. He attended the University of Maryland – College Park, where he was a Track & Field athlete competing in middle distance and hurdles, a football player, a wrestler and a member of Kappa Alpha Order fraternity. He graduated with a Bachelor of Science degree (Dean's List) in Physical Education in 1953.

In 1950, Bill went to Missoula, Montana, to train as a smokejumper, an elite group of fewer than 6,000 members. He was active for three seasons in the Bob Marshall Wilderness and had ten practice jumps and jumped into and fought nine forest fires. One such fire was immortalized in the article "I Jump into Hell," published in the October 1955 issue of Cavalier magazine, where he was part of a team struggling to get their wounded colleague out of the forest. Bill can also be seen in the 1952 film "Red Skies of Montana," working alongside Richard Widmark and Jeffrey Hunter. Until recently, Bill returned periodically to Montana for smokejumper reunions where he would work on clearing trails and reminisce over cold bottles of Moose Drool beer with his friends.

In 1953, Bill joined the USAF Reserves, transitioning to active duty in 1961. He served as a USAF Military Pilot and Aircraft Commander with the 53rd Weather Reconnaissance Squadron (Hurricane Hunters) at Ramey AFB in Puerto Rico. In Vietnam, Bill served as a Pilot and Instructor flying C-123s and C-130s on transport and defoliation missions. After the war ended, Bill went back into the USAF Reserves, working at Andrews AFB with the 459th Congressional Wing until he retired as a Lieutenant Colonel in 1979.

His military decorations were many and include the Air Force Commendation, an Air Medal with ten Oak Leaf Clusters (one for Hurricane Hunting and nine for his service in Vietnam, with each Cluster for Vietnam representing five combat missions) and the Distinguished Flying Cross. The citation for the Distinguished Flying Cross notes how Bill successfully completed a high priority mission despite his aircraft sustaining significant damage. He also flew a number of transport missions during the Battle of Khe Sanh.

While stationed at Ramey AFB, Bill met the love of his life, Jeanne McCoy, who was teaching on the base. Bill and Jeanne married on August 31, 1968, in Elyria, OH. The couple eventually settled in Arlington, VA, where they lived in Bill's family home. They remained happily married for 53 years until Jeanne's death in 2021.

His love of horses began in his youth, leading him to be a trainer, to play polo and to ride in the Rappahannock Hunt. He was a member of the Blacksmith Guild of the Potomac, and an avid collector of U.S. Calvary memorabilia, with many of these artifacts being featured in the U.S. Calvary Museum in Fort Riley, Kansas. One of Bill's greatest joys was spending time down at "the cabin," his family property in Culpeper, Virginia.

Bill will be greatly missed and remembered fondly. Bill was preceded in death by his wife Jeanne McCoy Tucker, and his brothers Dr. Hubert Quinton Tucker, Jr. and Joseph Travis "Joe" Tucker, Sr. He is survived by his sister, Mary Frances Tucker

Fannon, as well as many loving nieces, nephews, great nieces, great nephews and a great-great niece. Bill will be interred at Arlington National Cemetery in Arlington, Virginia, with the interment and a memorial service to be held at a later date. In lieu of flowers, the family requests that donations be made to the National Smokejumper Association, https://smokejumpers.com.

FOR MY BROTHERS AND SISTERS, WHO SERVE, HAVE SERVED, AND HAVE GIVEN MORE THAN CAN BE IMAGINED,

With every passing year, some memories fade for some of us, and for others they are as relentless as always, no matter what conflict the trauma of war is never ending, how we cope is a skill we were taught in Boot Camp, in my opinion it is the mental toughness and confidence built into our very being as they tore all the old parts of us away, the words I heard the most were to NEVER BE AFRAID OF SUCCESS, NO MATTER HOW BIG OR SMALL, NOT EVERY DAY IS A GOOD DAY BUT THERE IS GOOD IN EVERYDAY, sounds like cliches, but those words and God brought me back, broken, scared, and feeling beat to hell, but unlike many of our other Brothers and Sisters we came home, A SUCCESS, everyday is a blessing. May each and every one of you Have a Good New Year filled with hope and Success

Finally, a burial service today for Doc Mole who was killed in the opening minutes of the attack on 861. He was returned to Florida; a funeral service was held; but it seems that the paperwork was never filed by the family for a marker. In the decades that followed that went uncorrected. Thanks to some dedicated people in the Orlando area, he finally gets his moment.

RENO REUNION

2022 KHE SANH ASSOCIATION REUNION
OCTOBER 23RD – 30TH
NUGGET CASINO RESORT
SPARKS, NEVADA
BY CRAIG W. TOURTE

The annual Khe Sanh Association Reunion has come and gone, another year under our belt so to speak. The Reunion was well attended, given the worries about the pandemic, various travel restrictions, and at times, limited staff on hand to handle the ever-increasing traveling clientele. As usual Tom Eichler, Sara (Kathy) and Russell Turner, David Meyer, Tom Ford, Rolland, Dennis Mannion, (Mike Fishbaugh was sorely missed this year), spouses, and those I have unintentionally left out, made it a great success.

The Nugget Casino Resort was a most interesting and historic venue. First opening in 1955 it was known as "John Ascuga Nugget." "The Celebrity Showroom, first known as the Circus Room, played host to Liberace, Peggy Lee, Sergio Franchi, The Osmond Brothers, Robert Goulet, and many other popular entertainers of the day. It has over 1,600 guest rooms and is now famous for the annual "Best in the West Nugget Rib Cook-off held annually in September and is considered one of the largest in the country, as well as the largest fireworks show in Northern Nevada after New Year's Eve in Downtown Reno."

Several of our attendees took advantage of the van the Association rented and rode up to Virginia City, besides visiting the "Bucket of Blood" Saloon they took a rather famous train ride. I'm not identifying this individual but while visiting the "Bucket of Blood" for a beer, the train left without him. I thought that was a great story to share.

"The Virginia and Truckee Railroad's northern terminus is located at Virginia City. A project was started in 1972 to begin rebuilding one of the nation's "crookedest railroads". The portion of the line that has been rebuilt so far stretches south to Carson City and through Gold Hill. The project ran the first steam engine from Carson City on September 5, 2009, and continues to provide tourist excursions between Carson City and Virginia City on weekends. Other trains are pulled by historic locomotives on weekdays between Virginia City and Gold Hill on 35-minute round trips."

The buffet dinner was wonderful, and I particularly was partial to the Peach Cobbler, some of the best I have ever eaten. Everyone seemed to enjoy themselves and it was great to visit with old friends and make new ones. As Bruce Geiger once told me, and I'll paraphrase here, "The Association is not anything without the reunion." I thought that was correct and very poignant. Those of us who can and are still able should make an effort to attend these reunions or our Association will cease to survive. Those who were unable to attend this year were most certainly missed and we all look forward to seeing as many as possible.

WHERE DID EVERYONE GO?
By Craig W. Tourte

I have heard and read all of the stories, as I am sure you have. How there were so many of us on Khe Sanh Combat Base during the Siege that they just could not put any more boots on the ground in that very small space. How we were stepping all over each other. They could just supply so many people with so much food; ammo and we had reached our limit. I guess that was true, I have read there were from five to six thousand of us. Seems like a huge number for a place measuring about one half mile by about a mile. Made it sound like us troops were standing shoulder to shoulder in the trench line with no room to spare. I guess the numbers were correct, but my question is, where in the heck were you?

When that big old rocket screamed in on me I laid down in a communication trench dug just a few inches below the ground, as it smashed into the ground just inches from me, I was alone. When the 152's went off and were roaring my way, I dived into a bunker on the line and I was all alone as the ground shook from the impact beside me, you must have left. As I got up from my fighting bunker which was just one sheet of runway matting I placed over the trench line and put a couple of layers of sandbags on top and that rocket entered right where I had been standing just seconds before, I was alone again, where did you go. When I stood guard all night long at the main gate and that snake crawled over my feet and the rats onto my lap, you were not around. I could not see you on either side of me. I was alone as usual, what happened to you. As I looked out into the foggy night, looking for movement and the shadows I knew were the enemy, only I could see them, you were not to be seen. As I ran to Charlie med to repair the shrapnel wound to the back of my neck, I ran alone and you were not beside me.

When I prayed to God every morning to let me live another day, you did not pray with me. When I thanked God at night for letting me live another day, you were not there to thank him with me. Sometimes at Khe Sanh I just felt so alone, but you were there weren't you? Standing right beside me, because if you hadn't been there with me, I wouldn't be here today. Thanks for sticking around.

RESPONSE:
I was a United States Navy Seabee and I was NEVER alone even when I was. I always knew my brother Seabees and Marines were with me at Khe Sanh and those that are surviving are with me today. One of the things that I am proudest of when it comes to my military awards is that they are all unit commendations. We worked as a unit, brothers. We were never alone.

55 years ago, today, it started at the Main Base. We lived, laughed, bled, cried for our fallen, and somehow God spared us to tell the story of our Brave who can no longer speak of those 77 days of the largest battle in Marine Corps History. It is said more ordnance was used in defense of Khe Sanh than the landing of Normandy, I have no doubt it is true, we had multiple artillery bases, Air power 24/7, support troops from the Army at the end, clearing Hwy 9, and every ambulatory Marine of the 26th Marines ready for some payback. Gen. Giap who orchestrated the Siege had failed, even though he had beaten the French at Dien Ben Phu 15 years earlier, but we were not the French, we prevailed at a terrible cost, but that's what Marines do, we live, laugh, bleed, cry, and stand tall for God and Country! We honor all our fallen, from all branches who gave us support, and the leadership of our beloved Col. David Lownds, Rev Ray Stubbe Thomas Eichler, and so many more too numerous to mention, but most of all, I honor God for putting me with my Brothers of the 26th Marines, men of Honor, Distinction, and Brothers Forever.

Tim Haley

U.S. Marine Corps 1966-1969
The Vietnam War - The Walking Dead; Khe Sanh

Tim served in the Vietnam War on 1st battalion 9th Marines 3rd Marine Division as a rifleman. His Specialty was 81 mm mortars, but they put you where they needed you. Eventually he got into 60mm mortars in Charlie Company and remained with them for 13 months where he attained the rank of Corporal. His battalion was known as "THE WALKING DEAD', due to the highest number of casualties sustained by any other battalion in the history of the Marine Corps while in country.

Tim held numerous jobs throughout his service, including, rifleman, ammo carrier, 60 MM mortar gunner, squad leader, section leader, and weapons platoon sergeant. His combat operations were in and around the De-militarized Zone and numerous locations throughout Vietnam. Most notably was Tim's service during the now famous battle known as, "The Siege of Khe Sanh."

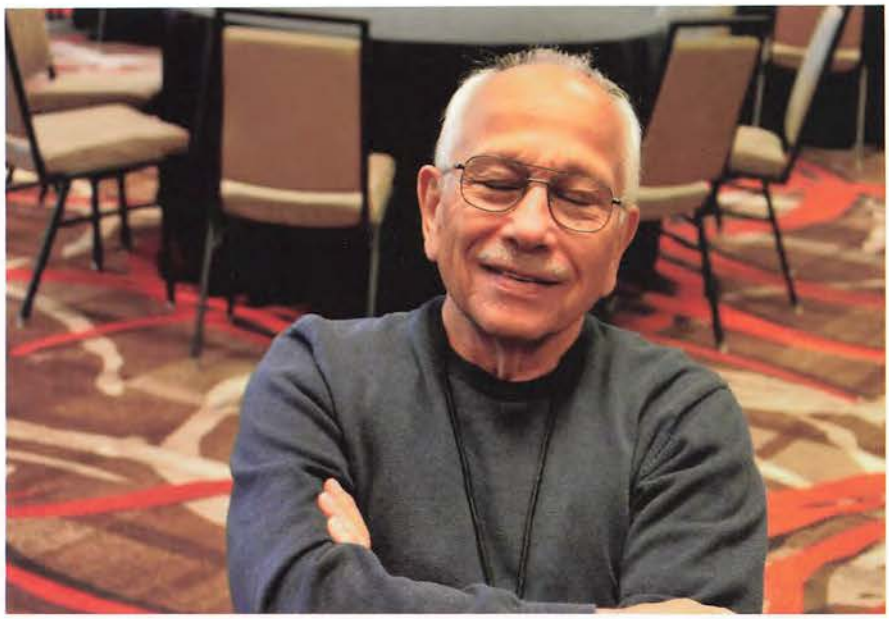
Tim's medals and ribbons include the Purple Heart, Navy Achievement with Combat "V," Good Conduct, Combat Action Ribbon, two Presidential Unit Citations, National Defense, Vietnamese Gallantry Cross Color with Palm Unit Citation, Vietnam Service with three Bronze Stars, Vietnam Campaign, Rifle Sharpshooter Badge, and Pistol Marksman Badge.

After his service, Tim completed college on the GI bill and has been happily wed to the love of his life, Janet Campbell, for 54 great years with whom he has two daughters and three grandsons. He has retired from the pool and spa industry, and stays busy between, spending his time with family, especially his wife Janet, hunting, fishing, hiking, camping, travel, gardening, horseback riding, boating, and his volunteer commitments with veterans' organizations.

Tim's commitment to remembering the fallen and honoring those who continue to serve and sacrifice for our freedoms is noteworthy. Tim's an active member of the Central Coast Leatherneck Honor Guard, providing color guards at special events and military honors at funerals for veterans. In 2002, he was a Founder of our museum, CCVMM, Museum Director, and Board Member, developing the mission to 'honor all veterans from past and present'. He went on to spearhead a Hwy 101 Purple Heart sign project, as part of the nationally recognized Purple Heart Trail, securing 10 signs along the Hwy. In 2010, Tim was awarded "Veteran of the Year" for California Assembly District.

Tim's lifelong dedication to his fellow veterans and the veterans' community at large are reflected in his many activities with the following: 1/9 network, 3rd Marine Division Association, Khe Sanh Veterans, DAV, Veterans of Foreign Wars, American Legion, Los Osos Valley Memorial Park Veterans Events Committee, past Board Member of Atascadero Faces of Freedom Veterans Memorial, Junior and Senior Vice Commandant of Central Coast Marine Corps League Detachment #680, past Commandant. Toys for Tots, member of Veterans Recognition Day Luncheon Committee and American Heritage Monument committee, to name just a few.

God Bless and keep all safe for the time we have left, as we honor our HEROS each and everyday, through Red Clay Magazine and the KHE SANH VETS page we are blessed to have.



OBIT

JOHN E. MCRAE, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN

John E. McRae passed away suddenly on Saturday, Jan. 7, at the age of 75 in a no-fault single car accident on the Ohio Turnpike south of Cleveland. He was returning home from a trip to New Jersey.

John was born in Lumber City, Ga., on March 11,

1947, and lived in his home state of Georgia until his teens, when he moved to Newark, N.J. After high school graduation, John joined the US Marine Corps. He was deployed to Vietnam, where he was one of the few to survive The Hill Fights, the first battle at Khe Sanh.

Upon returning home from the military, John looked for a job, enrolled in college, met and eventually married his wife Joy. It was a soul connection. John and Joy enjoyed 52 years of hard work and fun, with adventures together to the mountains of Jamaica. the coast of southern California, the deserts of New Mexico and the fall foliage of New York State.

In his young adult life, John built a successful career driving charter bus tours to hundreds of sites in the U.S. and Canada. His competent professional driving skills and his courteous charm and lively sense of humor won the hearts of passengers, young and old. He had a special place in his heart for his senior citizen passengers and went out of his way to handle everything needed for a safe, memorable trip.

John's greatest loves were animals, food, fixing things, planting trees, jazz and Jeeps. Like his mother Nealie, he loved to cook and listen to exclamations of delight as people tasted his blueberry pancakes or his jerk chicken, black-eyed peas and collard greens while listening to the jazz of Wes Montgomery or Miles Davis.

In John's lifetime he restored an 1890's Victorian house, a 1950's lake cottage and more old Jeeps than we can count! At his last house he rekindled his childhood joys of living closer to the land, planting trees and growing okra and tomatoes. All kinds of animals found John and looked to him for healing or company everywhere he went: trapped birds, lost dogs, stray cats, deer, raccoons, squirrels, possums, even groundhogs and moths! Hawks mystically appeared and kept him company in times of need.

John is survived by his wife Joy, his daughter Mashanda Winfrey (Sharon Bivens), his grandchildren Genavee Winfrey (Nathaniel Barnes III) and Jae Atunbi-Winfrey, his great-grandchildren Zaire and Cairo Barnes and many dear relatives and friends in Georgia, New Jersey, Ohio and Jamaica. Walker Funeral Home in Port Clinton handled John's cremation. At his request, there will be no funeral, and his ashes were scattered in water at three locations. Online condolences may be shared at www.walkerfuneralhomes.com. Memorial contributions in memory of John can be made to Friends of Ottawa National Wildlife Refuge friendsofottawanwr.org).

HIEN NGO

I read the book Valley of Decision: The Siege of Khe Sanh that Ray Stubbe and John Prados (who passed away a few months ago) co-authored. I really enjoyed the book and learned a lot from it, particularly since I spent two years teaching English at Khe Sanh High School. On Jan 8, 2023, I met Chuck Theusch, a US Army veteran who founded Children's Library International, in Dong Ha and Chuck informed me that Ray Stubbe made donations to his War Legacies Project which provides sponsors to the victims of unexploded ordnance accidents in Quang Tri Province. On the next day, Chuck traveled up to Khe Sanh to hand Ray's donation to the Bru family of 15-year-old Ho Van Sy who was injured when a bomb fuze he found while looking for honey in his village near the former airstrip exploded (he had tampered with it). Ho Van Sy now has fully recovered from his injuries and is enrolling in a high school for the Bru in Quang Binh Province. Please convey our appreciation to Rev. Stubbe. God Bless Him!

In the photo: Chuck Theusch gave Ho Van Sy who was seriously injured in a post-war unexploded ordnance accident in June 2022 the War Legacy Grant contributed by Chaplain Ray Stubbe.

There were to so many comments concerning love for Ray that I would have had to use this whole Red Clay Magazine. So please do not be offended if your comment was not included

VETERAN DENNIS MANNION RECOUNTS PERSONAL CONNECTION TO VIETNAM MEMORIAL

BY JOHN ROOK, CHESIRE HERALD STAFF

When Cheshire native Dennis Mannion heard that the Vietnam Veterans Memorial Wall was set to be revealed in Washington, D.C. in November of 1982, he knew he had to go.

Then an English teacher at Sheehan High School in Wallingford, as well as a coach of the Choate Academy football team, Mannion informed his bosses that he would need to take some time off. Jumping into his car, the Vietnam War veteran who served in the Marines for three years, drove all the way down to Alexandria, Virginia, where he checked into a hotel for the night.

"I called my wife (Joan) and told her that I'd arrived safe and sound," recalls Mannion, "and it was (in the evening). She said to me, 'I don't want you going back into D.C. at night,' and I said, 'Oh, no. I'm just going to stay here and order a pizza.'"

Cheshire's Dennis Mannion, a Marine who served for three years in Vietnam and fought in the Battle of Khe Sanh, has been making regular trips to the Vietnam War Memorial in Washington, D.C. since it opened in 1982 and will be a part of the Traveling Vietnam War Memorial ceremonies when it arrives in Cheshire on June 1.

That's exactly what Mannion did. However, after finishing a few slices for dinner, the thought occurred to him: He hadn't driven all the way down from Connecticut to stay in a hotel room for the night. He needed to see the wall.
So, Mannion jumped back into the car and went directly to the memorial.

There was no pavement in front of the wall. No lights had been installed. It was dark, and Mannion admits that, at first, he had a hard time figuring out exactly how to navigate the long, black marble wall that contained more than 57,000 names at the time (there are now more than 58,000 listed).

He knew he was looking for one name in particular — Lt. Benjamin Fordham.

"There were a few people there," Mannion remembers. "One guy saw me and asked if I needed help. I told him I was looking for a name and knew it had to be (listed on a certain section of the wall)."

The man had a flashlight and, directed by Mannion, pointed the light to where Fordham's name was believed to be, and … there it was.

"The man said he'd be around if I needed any more help, and I said thanks," said Mannion. "As soon as he left me, I fell to my knees. I just cried and cried."
"I didn't go back to the hotel for two days," he continued.

Mannion volunteered for the Marines in 1966, just after turning 20 years of age. His father, who worked for the FBI at the time, was distraught, but Mannion believed it was something he had to do. Years later, when father and son discussed that time in Mannion's life, his father would admit that his frustration and fear was partly born out of believing, because of information available to him through his job, that the war could not be won.

In 1967, Mannion found himself at Khe Sanh, a mountainous area of South Vietnam near the Laos border. Though not an officer, Mannion was made a forward observer, the only enlisted man in K-Company, 3rd Battalion, 26th Marines to hold such a designation.

"It meant I had a map," said Mannion. "You hear (veterans) say sometimes, 'I didn't know where the hell I was.' I always knew where we were. That really helped me."

A forward observer's job is to be the eyes of the artillery, accurately plotting coordinates so as to quickly and effectively engage the enemy. At Khe Sanh in the fall of 1967, it meant Mannion was at the top of Hill 861, overlooking what would become one of the most famous battlefields in the entire Vietnam War.

As Mannion explains, in December of 1967, he and his fellow Marines took a shower — a quick dash of water, a little use of soap, and then rinse off — and did not take another one until April of 1968.

"I was on hill from that point forward," he explains- For those reading about the Battle of Khe Sanh in the history books, it is described as one of the longest and bloodiest battles of the war. The attack by the North Vietnamese came at midnight on January 21, 1968, with a massive artillery strike, one that led to the American main store of ammunition being destroyed, along with 90% of the U.S. artillery and mortar rounds.

It was determined by American military leaders that Khe Sanh should be defended at all costs, which resulted in 77 torturous days of fighting.

Mannion lived it ... and lived through it, despite being injured twice. In recounting his experiences during the intense battle, he recalls one evening before the major attack, when he was sent down into the trenches. There, he and his fellow Marines could hear the enemy troops cutting the wires to make their forward surge possible, talking as they did so. The impact on the Marines, who did not fire so as not to divulge their location, was chilling.
"I thought, 'Oh, my God, they are coming here,'" Mannion stated.

He also remembers the grizzly sight of North Vietnamese troops who had been killed during fighting while trying to get through the wire defenses, and how their bodies were left there by the enemy to rot.

"Within (a few weeks) they were just skeletons," he said. "Between the rats and the maggots ... they were just skeletons there, with their helmets, their backpacks still on."

Life-and-death experiences became an everyday occurrence at Khe Sanh. One time, during an artillery attack, when a mortar landed right in between his foxhole and a friend's, Mannion just barely escaped unscathed, though he didn't initially realize it. When the two Marines emerged, Mannion noticed a portion of the artillery round still stuck in the ground. As he inspected it, his friend pointed Mannion towards a towel hanging outside his foxhole, and the "hundreds of holes" that were in it.

"That's how most of the (soldiers) in Vietnam died ... not from bullets, but from shrapnel," said Mannion. He kept the towel.

Through it all was Fordham, with whom Mannion spent much of his time.

While. normally a forward observer would be invited to stay with the officers, Mannion's superior did not like the idea of an enlisted man serving in that capacity. That meant that he and Fordham were together "kind of freelancing."

"We were just kids," he recalls. "We used to exchange books. We would talk about all kinds of things. We'd talk Texas football, Notre Dame football."

U.S. officials had expected that the North Vietnamese would mount a major offensive against the base at Khe Sanh but it never materialized, so by mid-April a joint operation Army, Marines, and South Vietnamese soldiers — was conducted to relieve the Marines at Khe Sanh.

On Mannion's final day on Hill 861, he and Fordham were waiting to be evacuated by helicopter. Mannion was set to go first, with Fordham right behind. "We were in the dirt together. His group had LZ (landing zone) security, so they were going to be the last group out," recalled Mannion. "As I start to get up, he squeezes my hand and says, 'Good luck — I'll see you at the base."

Approximately five minutes later, Mannion had landed at his destination, waiting for the last group of Marines, including his friend to arrive. "Who comes in but a bunch of Marines, carrying five dead," he said, "and one of them was Lt. Fordham." Fordham had been killed by an artillery shell that exploded at the ramp of the helicopter as he was boarding.

As Mannion sat on the ground in front of the wall in D.C. that November night in 1982, names began to flood back to him. Mannion vowed that, over the years, he would make it a point to visit the memorial at least once every five years, a schedule he has stayed true to.

On one such visit, with family and a few friends from Cheshire, Mannion woke his group early to arrive at the wall before the crowds began to emerge. As he found names of the men he'd known listed on the wall, he began to tell the stories that accompanied those names. At first, it was just his group that gathered around. Then, he noticed a few other people standing close by, listening. By the end, a whole audience had formed.

"There were (dozens) of people there, just listening," he said. "I think it's just a really powerful experience for so many people."

Mannion was a part of the proceedings when the replica wall arrived in Cheshire back in 2007. He spoke on the first night it was displayed, sharing with an audience of young and old, not just his experiences during the war, but also his belief that all veterans need to be honored for their service.

In the aftermath of the Vietnam War, the country was divided, and while Mannion insists he was never mistreated for being a veteran upon arriving home, he did feel the impact of those divisions.

On his flight back from Vietnam, he was seated next to another man who asked him where he was headed and where he was coming from. When Mannion explained that he was on route to Connecticut after having served in Vietnam, the man asked if he'd seen "any combat."

"I said, 'Yeah, a little,'" remembered Mannion. After the flight lifted off, the man hit the call button for the flight attendant, who immediately responded and asked how she could help. "He said, 'I need a seat as far away from this man as possible,'" recalls Mannion, "and he moved his seat."

Similar instances arose when Mannion began attending the University of Connecticut, on his way to pursuing a career as a teacher. When fellow students would learn of his service in Vietnam, some would pick up their items and move. "That happened quite a number of times," Mannion stated.

Now, the mood has changed. Mannion proudly displays a license plate that has "Khe Sanh" on it, and he will routinely wear a shirt that announces that he is a Vietnam veteran. Many will now stop and thank him for his service.

It's one of the things he most enjoyed about the wall when it came to Cheshire the first time, and what he hopes a younger generation will appreciate now. Mannion compares the wall to a high school yearbook, where "time stops." "There is no future in a yearbook," he said. "The wall is the same way. Time stopped for the names (listed on it). Every one of them has a story. Some were (high school) educated, some were college grads … all were different."

"When I speak to the students (in lead-up to the arrival of the wall in June), I want to make the point of just how much has happened just in the time since 2007, when the wall was last here," he continued. "The world keeps on moving, but for those men, it all stopped."

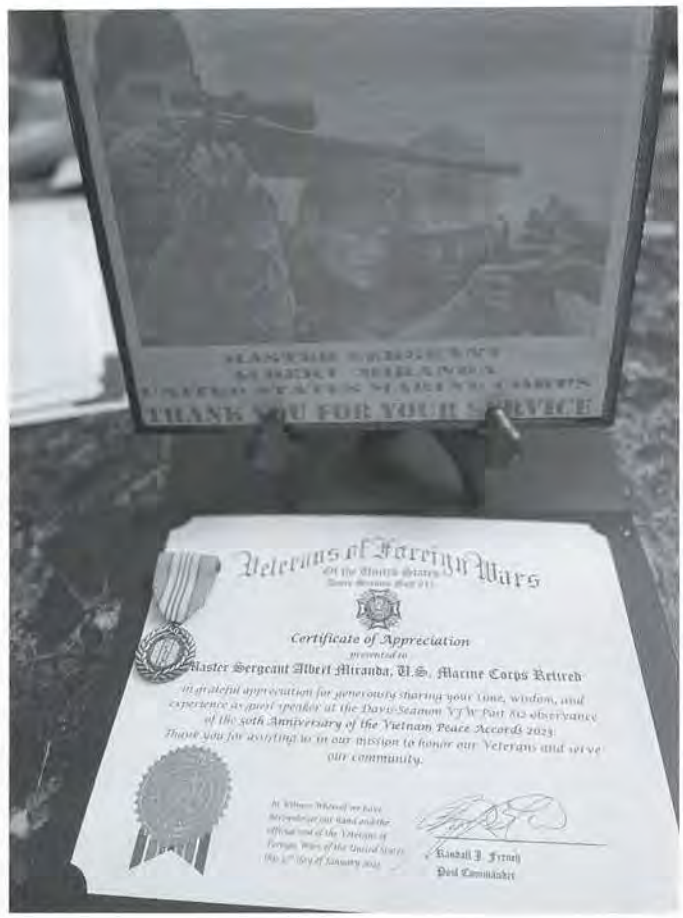
KHE SANH VETERANS IN THE NEWS
ALBERT MIRANDA
SCOUT/SNIPERS 26TH MARINES

Tonight I had the honor to address our Brothers of the VFW as the guest speaker for the 50th Aniversity of the Vietnam war. I shared a little bit of history as to what transpired at the battle of Khe Sanh during the Tet offensive in 1968. Thank you Lord for sparing me and afforded the opportunity to share the experience. It was also the time to remember those who made the ultimate sacrifice. Semper Fidelis.



SEABEES

WHAT IS A SEABEE
AUTHOR UNKNOWN

Between the awkwardness of a soldier and the dignity of a Marine there is a questionable character called a SEABEE.

SEABEES come in assorted sizes, shapes, and weights, but at ha the same code: to enjoy every second of every hour of every day, whether at work or at play, and to protest by griping (their most beloved privilege) when issued an order. SEABEES are found everywhere: on top of, inside of, climbing on, swinging from, running around, or more likely than not, turning to. Mothers and sweethearts love them, Fathers are proud of them, Brothers look up lo them, Sisters admire them, Airdales hate them, Company Commanders tolerate them, and Chief Petty Officers drive them.

A SEABEE is a composite; he has the appetite of a horse, the digestion of a sword swallower, the energy of a pocket-sized atomic bomb, the curiosity of a cat, the lungs of a dictator, the imagination of a Paul Bunyon, the slyness of a violin, the enthusiasm of a firecracker, and the spirit of a fighting cock. He likes: liberty, leave, holidays, weekends, 9iris, chow, beer, movies, gedonks, swimming, pin-ups, sleep, and Comic books.

He isn't too hot for: duty nights, watches, taps, reveille, routine discipline, officers, drills, or secured heads.

Nobody else is so early to rise without actually wanting to get up.

No other person gets so much fun out of liberty or Shore Patrol. No one can have so much fun on so little money.

A SEABEE is a magical creature; you can chew him out, but you can't get the work done Without him; he is dirty, unpolished, unkempt, often overbearing, and sometimes reluctant.

A SEABEE is a man of magical abilities; he can weld, build, drive, repair and fight, he can wreck or he can beautify, he can make something out of nothing, work never tires him nor does he seem to tire of it.
His motto is "CAN DO", to which has added "HAS DONE" and "DID" this frequently miraculous occurrence is recognized In the form of a "WELL DONE" by everyone from the Commanding officer on down

The average SEABEE is a thick-headed individual of a varieties of nationalities. He won't admit it to anyone or anywhere except in the defense of his Corps that his is the best job in the Navy. Without him, the Fleet would have nothing to gripe about; Marines would have nothing to talk about, and history would have nothing to Write about.

OBIT

HAROLD E. LOCKWOOD USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN, HMH-CH-43, SEA STALLIONS DOOR GUNNER

Harold Lockwood was instrumental in getting the state of New Mexico to install and dedicate a bridge across IH-40 in Laguna, New Mexico. It is dedicated to ALL fallen Marines and servicemen (Army, Navy & Air Force) that were lost during the 77 day siege at the Khe Sanh combat base. He also got the state to place a road side marker honoring that battle. The pics below show this accomplishment. Harold is to be applauded. I go under the bridge twice, going and coming from the Heavy Haulers Gathering held in Laughlin, NV every two years. We will do it again in October of 2019. It is about 40 miles west of Albuquerque on I40 and can't be missed. Harold lives in the red house on the NW side of the bridge, just above it. How many of us can wake up every morning and look out a window over our coffee cup and see something we've accomplished in life. Ooh-Rah! Harold! New Mexico as a state has some very attractive overpasses. Some of them quite special.

My sincere condolences, I met Mr Lockwood at the dedication of the historic Khe Sanh Road Marker and again at the dedication of the Khe Sanh Bridge. He was a wonderful man, proud of his service in the Marine Corps and as a representative of his Native American heritage. May he never be forgotten and rest in eternal peace.

A letter from an atheist.

You are really convinced that you've got all the answers. You've really got yourself tricked into believing that you 're 100% right. Well, let me tell you just one thing. Do you consider yourself to be compassionate of other humans? If you' re right, as you say you are, and believe that, then how can you sleep at night? When you speak with me you are speaking with someone who you believe is walking directly into eternal damnation into an endless onslaught of horrendous pain which your 'loving' god created, yet you stand by and do nothing.

If you believe one bit that thousands every day were falling into an eternal and unreachable fate, you should be running the streets mad with rage at their blindness. That's equivalent to standing on a street corner and watching every person that passes you walk blindly directly into the path of a bus and die, yet you stand idly by and do nothing. You're just twiddling your thumbs, happy in the knowledge that one day that 'walk' signal will shine your way across the road.

Think about it. Imagine the horrors Hell must have in store if the bible is true. You're just going to allow that to happen and not care about saving anyone but yourself? If you're right then you're an uncaring, unemotional and purely selfish [expletive] that has no right to talk about subjects such as love and caring.

WISHING YOU A SEASON FILLED AT THE WONDER OF HIS LOVE! Ken & Liz Korkow

Our father, Erv Korkow, started into the rodeo business in 1947 with an incredible insight into horses. Over the years my brother Jim has continued to build that breeding program and the Anchor K brand is well-recognized as "THE BREED THAT BUCKS." Now Onion Ring has been named BEST SADDLE BRONC OF THE YEAR in professional rodeo. A ten-year-old sorrel, the 1,300-pound gelding has twice been voted one of the top three broncs in the Pro Rodeo Cowboys Association (PRCA). World champion cowboy Kaycee Feild won $50,000 riding him at Rodeo Houston last year, and he's had multiple ninety plus point rides. But he's got a unique personality, says Jim's son TJ Korkow. "He's a gentle giant.". "You can walk up to him in the pen and pet him all over. But when he gets in the chute, it trips his trigger and he knows his job." Most bucking horses aren't as calm as Onion Ring. Even in the pasture, Korkow said, he can be petted. "He'll come up to you, you can take pictures of him, and he'll stand right there and want to know what's going on." Onion Ring has been selected to buck at the Wrangler National Finals Rodeo five times. He started as a bareback horse; Korkow switched him to a bronc saddle horse last winter. When combat veterans come to the ranch - they enjoy seeing up-close-and-personal the bucking mares and their colts+ all the other rodeo horses - but we advise them to keep distant from the rodeo bulls!

"REMEMBERANCES"
CAPT HARRISON LEROY HALEY
KIA 861A MAY 26, 1968

"WE HARDLY KNEW HIM"
BY ROBERT KOURY DELTA CO 1/1

During the month of March, 1968, Capt. Harrison Leroy Haley assumed command of D/1/1. The exact date is unknown (as far as I can tell, because I have not found the 1/1 command chronologies for that month). It is not surprising that there could be this lapse. It was just following the Tet offensive, the battle of Hue and many changes in 1/1.

I was not present when Capt Haley assumed command of the company. Most of Delta had Route 1 bridge protection duty during Tet and ancillary assignments during the battle for Hue. I was a, new in country, 1st Lt assigned to D/1/1, but sent directly to Hue on the third day of the battle and my fifth day in country- before they blew the canal bridge. There was no one else from Delta in Hue as far as I knew. So I did not report to Capt Haley while I was in Hue and never saw him until after.

The remainder of this article is based on my personal memories and so, necessarily but unfortunately, includes a lot about me. I welcome any edits and additions to produce a fitting tribute to Capt Haley (rckoury@earthlink.net).

As I came to know of Capt Haley, he was revealed to be the right kind of guy. I can find no records of his service before commanding D/1/1. But recall that he was a senior 03 Capt that had been working somewhere in the Division historical branch. Killer assignment for a hard charging senior infantry Captain of Marines during the height of the Vietnam war. He died just short of becoming 32 years old, pretty senior, and as best I know, he had no prior combat experience. He was a "by the books" type of leader. To his credit, he apparently had to fight to get into the fight with an infantry unit.

After Hue, I recall that Delta regrouped at Phu Bai. Then we went on Operation Ford, a nasty little affair, with Capt Haley as the Delta CO. Capt Haley's other D/1/1 platoon commanders at that time were 1Lt Danny Anderson (later KIA) and 1Lt Roger Rowe. Ford ran roughly March 15-21, 1968. The operation used parts of 1/1 (D & C companies at least) and 2/3 to sweep north on the sand flats east of Hue, chasing the NVA who had fled Hue.

In the opening air assault, I recall witnessing the results of our initial artillery shelling from out the window of our CH-46. Round were impacting and a village actively burning next to our landing zone. That shelling pretty much wiped out a local village. The only problem was that it turned out to have been a village occupied primarily by our ARVN allies and their families. So much for Marine "intelligence".

After overcoming light resistance at the landing site, we started the assault north in pretty heavy woods. Capt Haley had his hands full keeping track of his Delta troops which were on the left flank of the main attack. Especially my platoon 1/D/1/1 which had been tasked with dragging around a mechanical mule. As fate would have it, the battle moved due north, pursuing the NVA in the wooded area. But the wood line's western edge, which bordered on sand flats, aligned slightly northwest. With the mechanical mule in our charge, 1/D/1/1 could only move NNW on the left flank, out on the sand flats. As the main attack moved due north in the woods, we continued to get further separated out on the sand to the left of the main assault.

The 1/1 battalion CO, Lt Col Gravel, of Hue City notoriety, was continually on Capt Haley's ass during the operation. Gravel was trying to keep the battalion attack on a straight line front with no gaps moving north in the woods. Delta was being continuously stretched from side to side on the widening left flank trying to maintain contact. And we represented one third of the bodies available to Capt Haley to cover an expanding attack frontage. We could hear Capt Haley being chewed out on the open battalion radio net. Of course, Capt Haley then had to chew my ass. But there was nothing anyone could do to keep all in visual contact and on line as the front got wider.

In retrospect, I think LtCol Gravel beat on Capt Haley excessively and publicly in part because of his lack of combat experience. Anyone who had not passed the Hue City test was suspect in Gravel's book. That was unfortunate. Capt Haley was as good as they came, but lacked combat experience through no fault of his own.

One generally undocumented event on Ford was extraordinary. And because I was on the left flank of the advance in the open sand flats, not the woods, I had a perfect view of it. 1/1 had been pinned down by dug in NVA while advancing north in the wood line, and the advance was halted. My friend, Lt Mike Casey in C Company was shot in the forehead and KIA during that contact.

That evening, 200 meters to my front, E/2/3 assaulted across the open sand flats from west to east (left to right in my perspective) and into the dug in NVA position in the woods. It was a motion picture style event with a whole Marine company in the assault, firing from the hip, at dusk. Uncountable thousands of green and orange tracers trading places- spectacular and deadly. I did not know it at the time, but a TBS platoon mate, Bill Tehan, was leading his platoon in that assault. Years later, he sent me this description:

"That on line assault you saw was Echo 2/3. My platoon was on the south flank of the assault, closest to you . One hundred yards out from the tree line, the NVA opened up. We had four killed and over a dozen wounded covering that hundred yards. When we hit the tree line the NVA had their backs to the river about 50 meters into the tree line and tried to pull out to the North. Then it was payback time. We killed more than a dozen and my platoon over ran and captured two machine guns, a 7.62 Gorunov on a 2 wheel trolley and a 12.7 (DShK) machine gun on a tripod. Never saw a machine gun before that big. And never saw such a big muzzle flash when it fired at us. But it only got off a few rounds when the Ontos attached to my platoon started firing beehive into the tree line. One 12.7 round went into the Ontos just to the right of the driver's hatch, passed through the vehicle and exited the left back door. Moral of the story, don't piss off an Ontos!"

That night, a couple of Amtracs came south from that fight on the sand flats, and opened their hatches at our position in a cemetery, looking for friendly medical aid I guess. The floors of both were lined full with dead and wounded Marines. Ford was a damn serious, but little known operation. Pretty sure Capt Haley and the rest of 1/1 had no idea what 2/3 had accomplished in the woods just ahead of them.

As the Ford sweep north continued, I was able to get rid of the mechanical mule and get the platoon into the main part of the assault. We had experienced some fighting while on the open sand left flank, but mostly at 200-300 meter ranges. It was also memorable that our "rocket man", LCPL Layfetta Wardlow shot a sniper out of a tree with a LAAW at 300+ meters on the first try. Thereafter being known as "Wardlow The Magnificent" until KIA on 689.

Capt Haley seemed to do well as we drove the NVA ahead of us. At one point of resistance, my platoon was prone and on line assaulting the NVA position and had called for air support. I looked up to see an approaching Marine Corps attack helicopter on our left. Then, we were strafed by it with its machine guns, all on the wrong side of the orange panels we had out. Absolutely amazingly, I watched the rounds come right down our line of 20+ Marines and hit the sand between us, without touching a single Marine- a miracle. Capt Haley got the air support called off immediately.

We all had other "near death" experiences on the Ford sweep. Mine included: -A 60mm mortar round that landed while we were in a rice paddy and exploded in the 8' between me and Cpl Kelly- no injuries; and- A box mine that was tripped by the Marine 10' in front of me- just he was WIA and evacuated, but his privates were OK- I checked for him; and- A booby trapped gate that I kicked open in frustration, hearing the distinct click of the explosive detonator that failed to trigger an explosion; and- While standing in the open sand flat, near Capt Haley, a loud whirring sound came from above and then a loud thunk in the sand, just 6" from my right boot. Reached down and picked up (and immediately dropped) a 6" x 3" x 3" chunk of burning hot metal from a bombing run 300m to our front.

I share my close calls in this article only to illustrate what Capt Haley, the rest of Delta and others endured on Ford. It was not a Hue City, but it was not a walk in the park for anyone there.

Ford wrapped up, little known and unappreciated in the larger scheme of things. We finished hot and thirsty on the sand flats. Believe we were trucked back to Phu Bai.

Delta Company's next adventure commanded by Capt Haley was Pegasus, which started in April, 1968. We were trucked to Ca Lu (LZ Stud) and ran small patrols out of there in all directions. We had been assigned as base security. It was all platoon level activities, with Capt Haley and the Company HQ only doing the necessary support admin.

On April 16, 1968 our collective D/1/1 Company experiences abruptly entered the big time. At mid day, we boarded helicopters with little idea of what was awaiting us. We had been chosen to relieve the 26th Marines on 881S. That was one of the most chaotic movements of our collective Vietnam experience. I don't think Capt Haley had been well briefed, or briefed at all, and we certainly were not. As the back door of our helicopter opened to the hill, we were rushed out past another group of Marines going in the other direction. Their welcoming words were "get the f--- down" and "get the f--- out of my way".

I think we were supposed to have a briefing and a proper exchange of positions on arrival at 881S. But it was nothing like that. In the space of two or three minutes, the old guys, who looked like zombies, were gone and we were under attack from the neighborhood mortars to our south. As well as machine gun fire trying to shoot down the helicopters coming and going.

When the dust from the helicopters and mortars settled, there we were. Hiding in absolutely unfamiliar positions on the top of 881S. To his credit, Capt Haley got us spread out to cover the existing trench line and tried to figure out what we were going to do from there and how we were gong to do it.

We apparently had been ordered to not to patrol at any significant distance outside our wire. We learned MUCH later that earlier Marine experiences trying to secure additional ground in this area were pretty much not worth it. We were there as a plug in the gap to keep larger forces from attacking Khe Sanh. Not sure exactly how we were supposed to do that because all the larger forces had to do was walk around the base of the hill and we never would have known. For all we knew, everything out there was all bad guy land- and it was. Except for that, we were pretty clueless. But Capt Haley sorted out what had to be done and how to do it.

Our days consisted of taking incoming during the day and hand grenades at night. A typical daily situation report went like this: "Company D received 60/75 rounds incoming grenades and 60 mm motors. Returned fire with M79, M26, 60mm and 81mm motors which ceased enemy fire. D Company later received 182 rounds of rifle grenades and mortar fire resulting in seven WIA. Plans for 20 April 1968- Continue assigned mission". And "From D- Spot Rep #7; Received 1 82mm resulting in 1 KIA". " During this Period (one day) 395 rounds fell within the various (1/1) perimeters. The ordinance ranged from grenades to 122 rockets. Company "D" reported the greatest majority of fire received." And on it went- every day.

We also spend our days trying to spot enemy movement from the heights of our position. When we did so, we would will call in artillery or air support. In later years, I had the opportunity to look back down on 881S from 881N. The bad guys knew every single thing we were doing and exactly what our lines look like. All it took was a high powered set of binoculars. But, in retrospect, it was better that we were on that hill than they. That was pretty much the mission.

During this time, Capt Haley continued the tradition of having a morning flag raising. A couple of our guys would jump out of their holes, and raise the flag and get back underground. If they did this within less than 45 seconds or so, they could just escape the inevitable incoming 120mm mortar rounds which became an unwanted part of the ceremony. It went much better for us if there was a heavy morning fog- a blessing.

Capt Haley did all the right things during this chapter. We had regular Company briefings, assigned tasks and patrols, and he moved around the trench lines as expected day and night. But, there just wasn't much that we were able to do as a fighting Marine force.

We suffered a steady attrition of wounded and dead. And that meant that we had to have more than the regular number of helicopters for resupply. Every helicopter landing was a major event with inevitable additional casualties as the NVA mortars and machine gun fire took their toll. Reading later about the exploits of our predecessors on the hill, I learned about the "super gaggle" assembly of artillery, fighter planes, attack helicopters, smoke accompanying the transport helicopters. We never heard of or saw such a thing.

I think I knew as much about what was going on in the big picture as any Marine on that hill. And I was absolutely clueless about what had preceded our arrival there. The hill fights, the lost patrols, the assaults on 881N, the attack on 861 or any of it. We were simply ignorant about what had happened before we got there. Capt Haley was in a tough leadership position because I am certain that he knew about as much tactically about the area as I knew, which was damned little. If some of the local Khe Sanh hills knowledge and history had passed his way while he was working at Division, that would've been the only possibility. But he never shared any of that with us, and I doubt he knew of it.

On May 16, 1968 the battalion had a couple of the companies exchange hill top positions. I think the only reason for this was to appear that we were doing something productive besides just sitting on the hills in our bunkers. Included in the first swap was D Company which displaced from 881S to Hill 558 while Company B would do the reverse. Except, we walked /attacked (mostly down hill) arriving at 558 on 18 May, and they were choppered up to 881S. For us, that was a company sized patrol on the south slopes of 881S and 861. The move went without contact.

So Capt Haley had to organize our defensive positions, now on 558, set up patrol schedules, defensive fires and all the usual preparation for a Marine Company in defense.

During this time Company D was tasked with sending a platoon to the small radio relay position on Hill 950 north of Khe Sanh. Capt Haley chose my platoon. The mission was to reinforce the 950 position, I guess as result of some enemy intelligence. But we were also tasked with running a patrol east from 950 along the ridge spine to ominous Hill 1015 overlooking Khe Sanh. Now, this was super bad guy country and rarely entered. My platoon had never been quieter and more perfect in patrol technique. Our butts were puckered. I can report now, that the whole reverse slope of that 950-1015 ridge was full on NVA bunkers. We saw them, but I did not report them to anyone for fear we would have to "check them out". On the reverse slope there was no artillery support available and there were no reinforcements to call. If we had lost a man in that complex, recovery would have been impossible.

Back at 558, life was temporarily a bit of a skate for Capt Haley and Delta. Significant was that: "A fire caused by an illumination round spread to Company D lines, detonating an unknown explosive device resulting in two WIA evacuations". And also significant was an outbreak of Dysentery. Days spent sitting on the cut-in-half 55 gal drums filled with diesel (used for toilets) while vomiting.

On 26 May, the battalion executed another rotation of companies between its hilltop positions. Again styled as company sized combat patrols. Delta was to move from 558 to 861 around the north side of the hill masses. Capt Haley organized the company movement as a patrol. We had never been on this side of those hill masses before, but did not anticipate heavy enemy contact.

As we advanced to the west in a company in-line formation, I recall that there was some sort of enemy artillery incoming on our left (south) flank as we got to the back (north) side of the 861 hill mass. This area was pretty much blown away landscape, but with a few remaining hulks of giant trees. Against all odds, I noticed that one of these hulking dead trees was very slowly falling toward us. Shaken loose from its dying hold to the earth by the enemy artillery vibrations. In very slow motion, it got closer and closer falling toward us. Then I realized I was on the tree-target line! Because we were were 10' or more separated, I seemed to be the only target. I started to run, but like Wile Coyote, I chose the long axis to escape. The massive dead tree hit (smooshed) me literally flat and unconscious. Had a branch been at the right angle, it would have gone right through me.

When I came to, I was on my back looking up at Capt Haley's angry face. With groggy but quick thinking, I started murmuring about needing a "med evac." He would have none of it. I had held up the company movement long enough and we were behind schedule. And, likely as punishment for whining, he put me and my platoon on point for the final climb up the north side of 861A.

All that I was briefed was that we were to be met by guides from the departing company. They would take us through the 861A abandoned position and into the 861 main position which word be our destination. And this had to be, tragically, all that Capt Haley was told.

So up the back of the 861A hill mass I stormed, with just one man in front of me, leading the whole company. Although the after action reports say it was mid day, we were a lot later than that. And we still had to get into the undefended position and set in, all before the bad guys snuck in, and definitely before dark.

And the unnecessary tragedy started to unfold. No one had told me that there was a friendly minefield in our path. Or had provided a safe route to enter the position from this direction. All depended on a simple reliance on guides from the departing company.

But the guides were no where to be seen. And there was nothing specific about where or when we would need to meet them.

I climbed the 861A hill, head down, in a pissed off and pissed on huff. I think, generally following a faint trail up, but maybe not. All I knew was that we were late and in a hurry. Capt Haley was on my ass to get there before dark. And it was my fault for not escaping the killer attack tree.

I got to a line of barbed wire maybe 150 meters from what looked like might be the 861A hill top. I stopped. The whole company stopped when I did. There were no guides to be seen!! I radioed to Capt Haley for instructions. He told me to stand by, that he would be up there as soon as he could to sort it out. This was no easy climb.

So there we were, D/1/1, stopped and strung out in a single file. Displayed on the north side of Hill 861A. Not a blade of grass for cover. An entire Marine infantry company standing in the open. In plain view of every NVA artillery observer north of 861 and 881. And easily from their 881N positions. The stuff of artillery dreams, just after targeting the "lone pine" in every artillery training syllabus.

Sometime after I called Capt Haley, while he was climbing up to me, we saw in the distance, a couple of tiny individuals waiving their arms at us from the main 861 hill top to our right (west). They had to be 500 meters or more distant. I do not recall if I had time to report this to Capt Haley before it happened.

Looking back down the hill behind me, I could see the helmet tops of the Company command group climbing up to us. Maybe 7 meters below me, there was an explosion in the command group. And the "ching" of metal pellets zinging past me on both sides. No idea why I wasn't hit, there were plenty of pellets that were were less than inches close. A bouncing mine had been triggered.

We were standing in an unmarked minefield that was below the barbed wire where I had stopped. All we knew at that moment was that where I had walked was miraculously safe. Except for the command group, everyone in the whole company had followed in my footsteps. The command group, led by Capt Haley, had veered off that path to get around the stalled Marines and up to me.

Capt Haley took the brunt of the explosion. One other Marine was KIA and three more WIA.

The hero of the moment was SSgt Herbert Kahrer who was serving as our company Gunny. He figured out what was going on and somehow kept everyone on the safe path while sorting out how to help the wounded. And accomplished all of this without setting off more mines. He brought Capt Haley's 45 pistol up the hill to show me- it had a hole from the mine pellet that had passed all the way through the heavy metal barrel area.

Then from "Gunny" Kahrer, the staggering report: "Capt Haley is dead. You are senior. What do we do now Lt?".

So I assumed Capt Haley's command, in a minefield, almost dark, strung out on a hillside, with two KIA and three WIA Marines, and the vacant position to be defended that night still well above us. What great fortune that the NVA observers did not make it much, much worse.

So, we needlessly lost a fine Captain of Marines with others killed and maimed. It never had to happen. Apparently just about everyone knew there was an old minefield on our route of march except Capt Haley and us. The guides should have been instructed to be near our entrance point, not napping a hilltop away. As best I knew, the guides did not even have a radio to communicate with us. So many failures at so many levels. No lessons learned to pass on. And no one to accept blame or to be held accountable.

I found out years later that Capt Haley had been awarded the Silver Star. Two weeks after Capt Haley was KIA, the battalion CO and XO, were shot down while in the same helicopter. I witnessed the crash from the next hilltop south of Route 9. The Bn CO was seriously injured and evacuated out of country; the Bn S-3 was KIA in that same crash. As Capt Haley's immediate reporting superiors, neither of them could have witnessed or sponsored the Silver Star award. I do not know who did. I was never asked to be a witness or be a sponsor in the award process.

The award reads in part: "On 26 May 1968, during Operation SCOTLAND II, Captain Haley's company was assigned a search and destroy mission in the vicinity of Hill 861 in Quang Tri Province, to be followed by an assault against a battalion objective. In the initial phase of the operation, Captain Haley repeatedly disregarded his own safety to engage and destroy the enemy. Fearlessly exposing himself to heavy enemy fire, he maneuvered his units with great skill and effectiveness, forcing enemy units to flee in panic from their well entrenched positions. While aggressively leading his men toward the objective, Captain Haley was killed by an exploding enemy land mine."

Not the way I remembered it. But, I was still loopy, suffering from the brutal attack of the Killer Tree, and likely not a reliable witness. If it happened as the citation recounts, I am damned proud of Capt Haley, SSgt Kahrer and everyone in Delta. The award is a lasting tribute to them. Despite his needless death, Capt Haley would be proud to share this tribute.

We hardly knew him, but he was a fine Captain of Marines. Godspeed.

MEMORIES:
THE WARRIORS OF HILL 881S
By Gary Parker
H&S CO SP

Christmas day 1967I arrived on Hill 881S which was about a mile or so from the Khe Sanh base to replace another radio operator who was killed the night before. I also found out that I was also going to be doing landing zone duties as a HST Marine along with radio duties as I was a 2531. My job was with helicopters coming and going that included calling down the hill for supplies and replacements and guiding the CH-46's and at that time 34's in to land.

The worst part of my duties were when I had to call in choppers to get our seriously wounded off the hill because those who were killed could wait. There were priorities first. I remember looking out if the helicopter window and I remember the crew chief telling me we would have to circle for awhile because the hill was taking incoming and it wasn't safe to land. When we did the crew chief was screaming to get the hell off and fast because the mortar and snipper fire was all coming in. Didn't have to ask twice. The first thing I saw while running out of the helicopter was about 6 dead Marines covered up with their ponchos waiting to be taken off the hill. Little did I know that would become a daily routine. I knew It was going to be a bad place.

I asked someone as to who was in charge. And that someone was Lt. Dabney. Later after the firing stopped he told me that he wanted me to work off of 2 landing zones on the hill and to check in with him every night to relay down the hill what they needed such as food, water and ammunition. He also wanted me to get whatever I needed off the Marine I replaced before he was taken off the hill. He was one of the dead Marines next to where I got off the chopper. I took the radio off his back and a few radio batteries and that was the first time I saw a dead Marine and knew I was in for a long hell on earth. I set up in a hole next to 2 Marines manning a .50.

Every morning before I set out to get in contact with the Lt. I had to decide which landing zone I would be using and both were zeroed in by the North Vietnamese army. No matter which I chose both were zero'd in. When the choppers came in, the dead and wounded had to be loaded on board before the bullets and mortar rounds came in and that was nerve racking to say the least. It didn't always work that way and sometimes I would loose. I can remember being the only Marine out in the open guiding the helo in to land. It was so risky landing. I also remember many, many times standing under the cooper hooking up cargo nets and looking at the crew chief looking out of the chicken hole while others took cover while the mortars came in. It was funny but being there you couldn't hear the bullets or explosions because of the noise of the chopper blades. It was better that way because you just didn't know and I didn't have time to think about getting killed till the job was done. There was no other choice other than to stand there and prey that today wouldn't be the day. I not only had to worry about my butt , but the lives of so many seriously wounded Marines. It was my responsibility to get them out as soon as I could. Something that I think about almost daily.

There were times When I had very badly injured and when I say badly injured I mean clinging to life lying right next to me at times asking for their mothers or wives waiting to get off the hill so that they might have a chance to live another day. I also remember at times the incoming was so bad that the helicopters just couldn't risk landing but those pilots had balls. There were times I even felt God like because I was the only one that could guide them down as safe as I could. If things went wrong sometimes they died waiting and something died in me also. I felt like I failed them. I believe I carry every dead Marine inside me to this day. I remember everything they said to me as they took their last breath. Something over whelming for a 19 year old. There was nothing more I could do for them. I just wanted to crawl under a rock and die. I also thought that if I could I would have given my own life to save there's I would have in a heartbeat

SEMPER FI: FROM SILVER STARS TO STOLEN VALOR

One Marine's Determination to Set the Record Straight

When Mike Fishbaugh graduated high school in 1967, America was embroiled in the Viet Nam War. So, like any other young man seeking to avoid being drafted, he did the only thing that he could: He joined the United States Marine Corps.

In December of 1967, Mike found himself in San Diego, at the United States Marine Corps Recruit Training Center located there for "boot camp". Upon completion of boot camp, Mike was sent to Advanced Individual Training, then Cook/Baker School. By August of 1968, Mike Fishbaugh was in Viet Nam as part of the Force Logistics Command. When I asked him what, exactly, a baker did in Viet Nam, he shrugged and said that he made big loaves of bread to feed the hungry Marines. Then, after a slight pause, he added, "And we'd pull perimeter duty two or three times a week." When I commented that it seemed odd to me that a baker would be pulling perimeter duty at night in a war zone, he smiled and recounted the following story to me:

"We had a cook arrive at the base, but the problem was, there were already too many cooks on the base. So, they made him a door gunner on an aircraft. His second mission out, he was killed by enemy fire." When I protested that the man had been a cook, not a gunner, Mike smiled at me and said, "Every Marine is a Rifleman, no matter what your job may have been."

I let that sink in. At first, it seemed somewhat unfair, but then I remembered I was talking about the United States Marine Corps. Devil Dogs. Leathernecks. Jarheads. And suddenly, just like that, it made perfect sense. Mike continued to tell me about his time in the Corps. He had joined for four years, and after his seventeen month deployment to Viet Nam, he rotated back home, where he finished his enlistment at the Marine Corps Air Station in Yuma, Arizona, until he mustered out in 1971.

Mike returned home to Indiana and became a very busy man. He married his wife in 1974, became a factory worker, a First Responder, a volunteer firefighter, and joined the American Legion. In 1978, he added being a night dispatcher for the Kosciusko County Sheriff's Office in Warsaw to that list, a job he kept until 1981, when he became a Town Marshall. He remained a Town Marshall until 1985, when he attended the police academy and returned to work for the Kosciusko County Sheriff's Office until one fateful night in 1996, when Mike quit his

The Stolen Valor Act of 2013, making it illegal to make false claims of military service in return for monetary gain, property, or other tangible benefits. As the number of men and women without honor spiraled at a horrifying rate, claiming awards and citations that they had not earned, it soon fell to men like Doug Sterner, Billy Myers, Mike Fishbaugh, and women like Mary Schantag to find these individuals that shame our country with their selfish deceit, and expose them for what they were. Again, these diverse individuals work together without personal gain to ensure that the men and women that serve our country so proudly will not have their honor besmirched by those that live under the very umbrella of freedom that our military personnel fight and die to protect.

I have said several times throughout this two-part article that Mike Fishbaugh is a busy man. And no truer words have ever been spoken. Mike is the Historical Researcher for the Khe Sanh Veterans Associations, he is on the staff of the magazine put out by that organization, Red Clay" (So named for the thick red clay that makes up the soil at Khe Sanh, Viet Nam, he is the Secretary for the United States Marine Corps Food Service Association, and he maintains his own website, "Force Logistics Command" t www.mikefishbaugh.homestead.com.

But more than all of these things, Mike Fishbaugh is humble. "I'm no hero", he says, "I was just a baker at Dong Ha. My job was to make sure that Marines didn't go hungry." This is true, Mike was a baker, and he did make sure his Marines were fed. But as I have pointed out before, every Marine is a rifleman. And while being a baker may seem to be a less than heroic job, I would like to see anyone, this writer included, do it while under siege by an enemy force of 20,000 surrounding you and the six thousand Marines with you for 77 days.

I refer back to that Cook I mentioned in Part One of this story: He arrived at Dong Ha expecting to do his job, and that's just what he did. They had enough cooks. What they needed were door gunners on aircraft. So that Cook said goodbye to all the Advanced Individual Training he had received to feed hungry men, and fell back on his real job; being a U.S. Marine. And just like that Marine, Mike Fishbaugh, Baker by trade, put down his kitchen instruments two or three times a week and picked his rife to pull guard duty on the perimeter. Mike was guarding that perimeter against anything that might hurt his brothers-in-arms inside in 1968. Nothing much has changed…

Mike Fishbaugh is still guarding his brothers-in-arms in 2015. He has just changed weapons. Instead of a rifle, Mike stands guard now armed with a computer, a loyal group of like-minded individuals, and the never-surrender zeal that is the hallmark of that most striking of creatures, a United StatesMarine.
SemperFidelis. www.aroundpaintsville.com

At the Sheriff's Office. He said, One of the reasons I quit was because one of the detectives told everyone he would see them tomorrow and left for the night. He was killed fifteen minutes later. The call came in of 'shots fired, officer down'. After that, I just lost interest in it, just didn't want to do it anymore."

Mike moved to Johnson County, his wife's home, and in 1996, twenty-five years after leaving the humid jungles of Viet Nam, he was diagnosed with Post Traumatic Stress Disorder. While Mike was hesitant to believe the diagnosis, what he was told by the psychiatrist that saw him made it even harder to believe. While many veterans returning from the Viet Nam War had suppressed their war-time trauma in drugs or alcohol, Mike was told he had become a" workaholic" , burying all his personal demons stemming from the war under an enormous workload. Declared one hundred percent disabled by the Veteran's Administration in 2000, Mike stayed home and spent time with his wife, children and grandchildren, until his wife's passing.

And then, in 2004, something happened that would change the lives of hundreds, if not thousands of people. Mike bought a home computer and taught himself how to use it.

He was contacted by a member of his old unit and asked to come to a reunion. Mike went, and as he and his brothers-in-arms passed tales of the war back and forth, they began asking questions about who had received what awards and citations, and when and where they had received them. Finally, after much debate, it was decided that, using the Freedom of Information Act, Mike and his buddies would compile a database for that very purpose.

Many people would assume that such a database would have already existed, run by the military or the government, but there was, in fact, no such database in existence at that time. Many men, having been told by their Commanding Officer that they were putting them up for the Bronze Star with Valor, the Navy Cross, or any of the multitude of awards, ribbons, and citations awarded to military personnel, left the service after their enlistment was up and went back to their lives, thinking they had won such an award. It was only after several men discovered that the medals they believed they had won had never been passed on by the chain of command that the full size and shape of the problem became apparent.

While the U.S. military keeps records of every service member of every branch, the fact remains that many of those service members either left the service thinking they had received an award they had not, or worse, had actually received an award that didn't go into their file until after they had separated from the military. There simply was no way to verify these things without a protracted paper battle with one of the many different places these records were kept, St. Louis, Missouri being the largest. And, as incredible as it seems, no one in the government had created a searchable database where these service members, or their families, could find out.

It was at this time that Mike Fishbaugh, former Sergeant of the United States Marine Corps decided to help change all that. Mike Fishbaugh knew he had a daunting task before him. At first, he determined to simply find all the Valor Awards received at Khe Sanh, where his unit was stationed. To many, the name Khe Sanh evokes the memory of the 77-day siege in which 6,000 U.S. Marines were surrounded by two divisions (20,000 men) of North Vietnamese Army troops. From January 21st until July 9th, 1968, the Marines at Khe Sanh suffered constant attack by artillery, mortar, rocket, and small arms fire. The base was in constant fear of being overrun, and without the aid of the air power of the Navy, Air Force, and Marine Aviation units, it might well have been. "Operation Niagara", the code name for the aerial bombardment, saw the dropping of over 100,000 tons of bombs in support of the Marines. Mike is one of the first to lay praise on those men above the clouds. Without them, he might never have returned home to tell his story.

Although most Americans that remember Khe Sanh, it is only the siege they remember. What they don't understand is that the base there was in operation from 1964 until 1973, almost a decade. Chaplain Ray William Stubbe was at the siege of Khe Sanh, and kept day-to-day diaries and records that assisted Mike in his search. Soon, Mike began to expand his search of Valor Awards recipients to include everyone that had served at Khe Sanh. It soon became apparent that he was not alone in trying to honor those that had earned them. Doug Sterner, Viet Nam Khe Sanh Veteran and, like Mike, on a quest for the truth, runs a website called "Home of Heroes". Mr. Sterner researched not only every single person to ever receive the Medal of Honor, going all the way back to the Civil War, but began an online database that intends to list every single citation and award every received by U.S. military personnel. Mr. Sterner's work is so comprehensive that the F.B.I. has used his insight to investigate cases of Stolen Valor. Another man working along the same lines was Billy Myers, author of "Medals, Marines, and Viet Nam" and "Honor the Warrior". These men, working both alone and together, set about creating a public, searchable database. For Mike, it was the Silver Stars, and then requesting records for every Valor Award given at Khe Sanh during its existence. Then, moving outward, working on finding the Silver Stars that have been awarded to all branches of the military. To date, Mike has verified over 2,500 Silver Stars for Marines and Navy Corpsmen.

The manner in which this is done is a tedious, time-consuming process that boggles the mind. First, Mike needs names, branches of service, unit numbers, the officers that put in the request for the citation, or any possible combination of the information listed above. Then, he sends a Freedom of Information Act request to St. Louis, Missouri, or one of the many other depositories of military personnel records. Then, he waits. There is most often a great deal of back-and-forth between Mike and these government entities, and Mike has the paperwork to prove it. Without showing me any names or personal information, Mike showed me binder after binder full of military personnel and the awards they are listed as having received. These binders cover bookcases in his office. In addition to these binders, he focused my attention on large plastic tubs, all full to bursting with envelopes full of this same information. Thousands upon thousands of names, and Mike is constantly getting requests from family members about their loved ones, and what medals and citations they may have received. As I have stated before, Mike Fishbaugh is a busy man. Mind-blowingly busy.

Mike isn't greedy with his information, either. Every record he locates, he forwards on to Doug Sterner for his database, http://valor.militarytimes.com/. In 2013, MSG James T. Born wrote a book entitled "The Bronze Star Medal, Viet Nam War". Mike sent MSG Born all the information he requested, and Born wound up using between 250-280 of Mike's records for his book. Mike is credited in the acknowledgments page of that publication. Mike also works with Mary Schantag, who keeps the official POW-/MIA listing. Regardless of branch of service, these tireless unsung heroes go the distance to shed light on any and all questions asked, and do so free of charge. It is amazing to see these individuals from the Army, Navy, Air Force, Marines, or civilians, putting aside all petty inter-service rivalries and work together with such grace and determination. Amazing and inspiring. Forget all the stories you've heard about the Army and the Air Force insulting each other, or the Marines and the Navy brawling in bars, the vast amount of respect and love of country and their fellow service members dwarfs all considerations with these individuals.

Doug Sterner's wife, Pam, worked with the members of the House of Representatives and the Senate in helping to pass the original "Stolen Valor Act" in 2005. And while Stolen Valor was ruled unconstitutional by the Supreme Court in The United States vs. Alverez on August 17th, 2010, because they felt it violated the Fourth Amendment, it was revised as The Stolen Valor Act of 2013, making it illegal to fraudulently claim having received a valor award specified in the Act, with the intention of obtaining money, property, or other tangible benefit by convincing another that he or she received the award.

VETERAN REMEMBERS BATTLE OF KHE SANH

This year the U.S. Marine Corps commemorates 55 years since the Battle of Khe Sanh, which lasted from Jan. 21 to March 31, 1968.

In early 1968, Khe Sanh Combat Base gained world-wide attention as the roughly 6,000 Marines defending the base were encircled and besieged by three North Vietnamese Army regiments of about 20,000 troops. For 77 days, the Marines and their South Vietnamese counterparts, with support from an element of U.S. Army soldiers and U.S. Air Force bombers, would endure one of the longest and bloodiest battles of the Vietnam War.

Among the Marines defending the base was U.S. Marine Corps Sgt. Ronald Echols, who was serving with Company M, 3rd Battalion, 26th Marines, 3rd Marine Division on Hill 881 South.

"We had Marines at Hill 861, and we had Marines at a radio relay tower, which was on Hill 950, and my company was on 881S," said Echols. "There was two 881s, one 881 South and 881 North, we maintained those hills because we wanted to keep the high ground away from the North Vietnamese that overlooked Khe Sanh."

North Vietnamese forces conducted a massive artillery bombardments on Khe Sanh, located just 10 miles from the Sepon River, which marked the border between Laos and South Vietnam.

"I remember that during dawn it would still be foggy and as soon as the fog burned up, they would start hitting us with mortars and artillery. If there was daylight, we would get hit," Echols said.

Due to the constant attacks from the PAVN, Marines at Khe Sanh faced significant supply challenges, but their training helped them find ways to capture water and overcome the lack of supplies.

"For the first 30 days they couldn't get us resupplied; seven helicopters got shot down bringing supplies into us," said Echols. "We went nine days one time without anything to eat. Fortunately, with the thick fog, we were able to spread plastic down the hill and catch condensation. We needed to have about two 12 oz. cans of water to last until the next morning, but guys were still dehydrated, they weren't getting enough to drink."

During the siege, Marines created an air delivery method called a "super gaggle" to provide supplies to areas cut off from land supply routes after several aircraft were lost during resupply missions. The super gaggle method coordinated air and artillery strikes to occur simultaneously during resupply missions, providing a shield for aircraft delivering much needed ammunition, food, water and evacuating the wounded.

"The airwing came up with the idea they could come in and bring jets in and bomb, then come around the hill, put up a smoke screen, and then the helicopters would come in five-at-a-time with the resupplies; they looked like geese coming through there, so they called it the super gaggle, and that's how they started getting us resupplied," said Echols

Echols added that helicopters often had just 20 seconds to land, and evacuate the wounded and get airborne before the mortar attacks resumed. Echols also remembers the air support provided by American bombers and how close they were to his positions on Hill 881S.

"We had a couple of North Vietnamese soldiers surrender. We asked them why they surrendered, and they just pointed up to the sky," said Echols. "You can't just imagine what these B-52s do. They called it an Arc Light, and they would just drop hundreds of bombs out of one plane, and there was three or four planes at one time. It was just devastating."

By the end of the battle, U.S. Air Force assets had flown more than 9,000 sorties and dropped 14,223 tons of bombs on targets within the Khe Sanh area.
It would not be until April 14, 1968, that Marines from 3rd Marine Division, soldiers from the US Army 1st Cavalry Division and South Vietnamese soldiers would be able to break through and push back NVA forces from the area. Khe Sanh would continue to see combat until the end of July 1968, after which the base was destroyed and abandoned by American forces.

"On April 14 my company moved off of the hill, and they had showers set up outside for us," said Echols. "You get a bond with your fellow Marines that's indescribable. I've got two brothers, but I've never had with them the bond I had with the guys I was in combat with. They were my brothers."

Echols received a battlefield commission and a Bronze Star for his actions during the Battle of Khe Sanh. According to his Bronze Star Medal citation, "on numerous occasions, Staff Sgt. Echols served as a platoon commander, a billet normally assigned to a commissioned officer, and repeatedly disregarded his own safety to maneuver his unit against the enemy. While his company was three deployed on Hill 881 South during the siege of Khe Sanh, he worked tirelessly to ensure the safety and welfare of his men despite constant North Vietnamese mortar and artillery fire."

OBIT

GORDON A. GILLENS, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN, HQ BTRY 1/13

Plainfield Police Chief and longtime Plainfield Resident died unexpectedly, Tuesday afternoon, January 17, 2023. He was born July 16, 1945 at the Mary Hitchcock Memorial Hospital in Hanover, NH. He attended schools and grew up in Canaan, NH and was in the first class from Canaan to attend and graduated from the new Mascoma High School. He joined the US Marine Corp right after high school and served our country for four years including a year at Khe Sanh, in the Vietnam War. When he returned home, he held a few different jobs before he took a position with the Windsor Police Department. Upon his completion of training at the police academy he returned to Windsor and worked as a patrolman for the next fourteen years. Gordon liked his work and built a good reputation throughout the area law enforcement community. In 1985 he was hired as the Plainfield Police Chief, a position he held for the next twenty-five years. Gordon was married to Sarah Jean (Tuck) Longacre on June 8, 1996. They made their home in Plainfield on Route 12A. He retired in 2010. He received may accolades during his long career including two awards that had him traveling to Washington DC to receive The Law Enforcement Officer of the Year and also the U. S. Department of Justice Distinguished Service Award.

As Police Chief, Gordon had many experiences. He worked to keep people safe and would often be seen corralling a stray animal. He presented the department budget each year and made sure that his officers were well trained. Gordon enjoyed traveling around the local area with Sarah. He loved being home and working on their property, using his tractor for multiple purposes and tending to horses, chickens, ducks, cats and dogs. Gordon had a special love for animals and they for him a characteristic that served him well during his law enforcement days and beyond. He was a member of the Grafton County Rod and Gun Club and the Plainfield Community Church.

He was predeceased by a son Jason Gillens and a brother Michael Gillens. Gordon is survived by his wife, Sarah, her sons, Timothy Longacre and his wife Nicole, Joshua Longacre and his wife, Meghan and her daughter, Melinda Taber and her husband Breck, all of Plainfield, NH, son Scott Gillens, daughter, Diane Gillens, six grandchildren, one great grandchild, a Sister, Viola Wilson of Canaan, NH, as well as several nieces and nephews.

2009 the KSV Scholarship Foundation started with 6 applicants and has risen to an average of 25 applicants each of the last three years. Many of the student scholars have finished 4 years of post secondary education to successfully achieve their selected bachelors degrees due in part to the support from Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc ..

In this, the 2020-21 school year, we have received 7 applicants for a grand tally of 179 young scholars in 11 years who have benefitted from the KSV Scholarship Fund. Over $110,000 in generous donations from the Khe Sanh Veterans Brotherhood and proceeds from the reunion silent auctions have kept the Foundation healthy. However, the individual awards have trended lower due to the increased volume of applicants vs. reduced donation levels.

The Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. Scholarship Foundation is now in its twelfth successful year of providing financial support for children and grandchildren of paid up members of Khe SanhVeterans, Inc.

KHE SANH VETERANS, INC. SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION

GOVERNING RULES FOR OPERATION OF THE KHE SANH VETERANS, INC. SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION

The purpose of the Khe Sanh Veterans Scholarship Foundation (KSVSF) is to provide financial aid to high school graduates who plan to attend an accredited educational institutional as a full time student OR who are currently enrolled full time in an accredited post secondary curriculum.

Scholarship funds will be awarded to applicant students who have at least one parent , legal guardian or grandparent who is a paid-up member in good standing of KHE SANH VETERANS, INC., a 501 C (19) charitable organization.

IT IS THE RESPONSIBILITY OF THE STUDENT APPLICANT TO SEE THAT THE SCHOLARSHIP APPLICATION REQUIREMENTS ARE FULLY COMPLETED AND SENT DIRECTLY TO THE SCHOLARSHIP COMMITTEE CHAIR BEFORE 5/1/2022 AT THE ADDRESS BELOW:

Mr. Dan Fisher
KSVSF Committee Chairman
6050 52nd St. North
Oakdale, MN 55128

CRITERIA FOR SELECTION

Applicants must be the legal child or grandchild of a paid up member (sponsor) of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. (see member definition in the KSV by-laws). This includes deceased, life members of KSV and those Khe Sanh Veterans listed as KIA/MIA in Vietnam if the family member are paid up, associate members of KSV, Inc. Children and grandchildren of associate members are not eligible for this scholarship.

Information provided by each applicant on the attached forums will focus on the following qualities; proof of enrollment at an accredited educational institution, good grades, scholastic character, citizenship, school activities and a personal essay on educational and career goals.

A scholarship review committee will serve at the pleasure of the President of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. to review the application forms for completion and correctness. The KSVSF Chairman will provide scholarship financial report, a list of applicants and their KSV member sponsors and a summary to be presented to the membership at the annual reunion and for publication in RED CLAY newsletter.

NEW!! SCHOLARSHIP AWARDS (school year 2023 onward). NEW!!

APPLICANTS FOR SCHOLARSHIP AWARDS WILL RECEIVE A ONE-TIME-ONLY AWARD, REGARDLESS OF THEIR PRESENT YEAR IN SCHOOL. SCHOLARSHIP AWARDS AMOUNTS ARE DIRECTLY AFFECTED BY DONATIONS TO DONATIONS TO THE SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION FROM KSV MEMBERS AND THE REUNION SILENT AUCTION. WE CAN NO LONGER SUPPORT MULTIPLE YEAR AWARDS. THIS IS THE DECISION OF A VOTE BY THE KSV BOARD OF DIRECTORS AT THE 2019 REUNION.

ALL AWARDS WILL BE EQUAL FOR EACH CERTIFIED APPLICANT AND WILL BE AWARDED UPON PROOF OF REGISTRATION FOR THE UPCOMING SCHOOL TERM AND SENT TO THE CHAIRMAN'S ADDRESS ABOVE

Picture in your mind the farms and ranches near Pierre, South Dakota – a landscape similar to what's shown in the movie "Dances With Wolves" (the film was shot right in this area). This land produces feed corn, wheat, soybeans, and seed grains. It also produces people of the land who've inherited a profound sense of tenacity and pride in a job well done at the end of a day filled with hard work. One of those is Ken Korkow, BRAVO CO 1/26 KHE SANH VETERAN.

KHE SANH VETERANS IN THE NEWS

'IT TOOK 50 YEARS': JOHNSTOWN MAN RECEIVES VIETNAM SERVICE MEDALS

JOHNSTOWN, Pa. – David "Dee Dee" Osborne initially had little interest in pursuing the medals he had earned during his service in the United States Marine Corps in Vietnam.

Osborne didn't speak much about his time in Southeast Asia. In fact, the less he thought about his being among those U.S. forces cut off and isolated while defending the Khe Sanh Combat Base during a brutal 77-day siege, the better for the Johnstown resident.

"I was 19 years old, a sergeant, back then and I turned 70 on Sept. 4," Osborne said. "It took 50 years."

Osborne is well-known throughout the region as a former baseball coach who spent25 years at Greater Johnstown High School and was a manager of the successful Pepsi-Cola teams that played in the All American Amateur Baseball Association Tournament. He currently is a Cleveland Indians scout.

Osborne also is a member of the Greater Johnstown School District Board of Directors.

His father Harold encouraged him to inquire about the medals decades ago, putting into motion a sometimes frustrating process that finally had a successful ending 50 years after his service in Vietnam. "My dad said, 'Pursue it. You earned them. Get them,'" said Osborne, who joined the Marines as a 17-year-old with his parents signing off. He served in Vietnam from early 1967 through 1968, when he was injured in combat.

Osborne's father died in 1999, about a decade into a process that involved attempts to locate and verify military records and accounts of men who served with Osborne.

SERVICE TO OUR NATION'

U.S. Rep. Keith Rothfus, R-Sewickley, helped complete the effort as Osborne recently received:

- Presidential Unit Citation ribbon bar with one bronze star.
- Meritorious Unit Commendation ribbon bar with one bronze star.
- National Defense Service Medal.
- Vietnam Service Medal with four bronze campaign stars.
- Republic of Vietnam Meritorious Unit Citation (Gallantry Cross Color with palm and frame) ribbon bar.
- Republic of Vietnam Campaign Medal with 1960 Device.

"I am proud to congratulate Sergeant David 'Dee Dee' Osborne on finally receiving his medals in recognition for his dedicated service to our nation as a Marine during the Vietnam War," Rothfus said in a statement. "Helping our district's veterans and constituents is one the most important duties I have as a member of Congress. It was an honor to assist in the efforts to secure the recognition that Dee Dee deserves, and I thank him for his years of service to Johnstown and our nation."

Osborne had letters from late U.S. Rep. John P. Murtha, whose office began the process in November 1988. Correspondence from Murtha in July 2000 documented efforts to reach a chaplain who served with Osborne.

After Murtha's death in 2010, Congressman Mark Critz briefly took up the cause. Representative Bryan Barbin's office also played a role in collecting documentation.

Finally, Rothfus, with contributions from staffer Brian Subich of Johnstown, put the final pieces in order.

"Helping constituents like Mr. Osborne is one of the most rewarding parts of my job ," said Subich, a field representative on Rothfus' staff. "I am glad to have been a part of getting Dee Dee the recognition he deserves."

BADLY INJURED' SAVING A LIFE

Osborne said he appreciated the efforts by all of those involved since 1988, and especially thanked Rothfus and Subich.

"All the records were destroyed when we got overrun in Khe Sanh," Osborne said. "The NVA (North Vietnamese Army) got inside the wire."

Once the medals arrived, Osborne said he thought of his parents as well as his brother Ray, who also served in Vietnam.

Of course, he remembered his comrades, many of whom didn't make it back to the states.

A hand-written letter signed by Phillip J. Wright, USMC, was dated Oct. 18, 1999. The correspondence originally had been submitted as testimony for a Purple Heart, which Osborne has not been awarded. Records in files on Osborne assembled by Murtha and Barbin's offices indicate that one eyewitness, Wright, provided documentation of the event, but another eyewitness account is necessary to award a Purple Heart

"Sergeant Osborne was almost killed, but badly injured saving the life of an already wounded Marine," Wright wrote.

"On or about 3-15-68, Sergeant Osborne was placing another wounded Marine on a MedEvac helicopter. As always, the enemy tried shelling the helicopter and got far too close.

"Abruptly, the pilot shot straight up to clear the area. Sergeant Osborne realized the stretcher would fall out if he let go before the crew chief could get hold of the other end of it, so he held it as the helicopter climbed. Once the crew chief had the stretcher secured, Sergeant Osborne had no choice but letting go of it and falling to the ground, landing on his side from a height of two or three stories. He badly injured an arm and a foot and was himself on the next MedEvac to Dong Ha."

'BLOOD STAINED YOUR UNIFORM'

Osborne said he was fortunate to survive the incident.

"A sniper had his sights on me," Osborne said. "There were tracer rounds and everybody was yelling for me to drop the stretcher. I couldn't do it. The poor kid was yelling, 'Help me. Help me.' I saw the tracer rounds going over my head.

"Everybody was on the ground yelling, 'Ozzy, Ozzy, get down.' A sniper had three shots on me and missed all three times."

Osborne became somber when looking at a Stars & Stripes publication photograph of two Marines evacuating two wounded men from a field near Con Thien Combat Base in South Vietnam.

"I was standing right here," Osborne said, pointing at the photo. "The NVA let us go down that road, down that field. When we came out, they wouldn't let us out. They ambushed us – 200 casualties."

The photograph caption confirmed the casualty count, stating the unit returned from the Vietnamese Demilitarized Zone (DMZ) and the Marines were "caught on an open road."

"I saved seven guys that day. I didn't give a shit anymore," Osborne said. "I just went out and heard the yelling and screaming, 'Help, help.' I just went and grabbed them, put them on my shoulder, ran them up there and they got a stretcher and put them on. Blood stained your uniform ..."

Osborne's eyes teared up. He glanced away from the newspaper clip and looked at the medals neatly arranged on a table in his kitchen.

"I was just a young kid," he said. "Fifty years I waited for this. I wish my dad could see this."

MORE HONORS FOR OSBORNE

I'M REALLY HUMBLED'

Soon, Osborne's name will be attached to one of the fields where he coached, managed or mentored players of all ages who competed in youth baseball, high school and college-level leagues, as well as the annual AAABA Tournament.

Johnstown City Council passed a resolution 7-0 on Wednesday to name the Roxbury Park AAABA field in honor of Osborne, 74, of Hornerstown.

"I'm really humbled. I'm really lost for words," Osborne said, choking back tears during a phone interview. "I got a lot of years up there. A lot of championships. I'll be darned. This is a great honor."

In 2008, the AAABA Hall of Fame inducted Osborne, a successful manager and general manager who is credited with changing how teams recruited players in the mid-1980s and building powerhouse franchises in the Johnstown Junior League/ AAABA League into the early 2000s.

At Greater Johnstown High School, Osborne coached Trojans baseball for 25 seasons. He amassed 239 wins, including a District 6 Class 3A championship in 1998, when Greater Johnstown stunned a highly regarded State College squad. His AAABA teams collected a combined 541 regular-season victories and made nine national tournament appearances with Osborne serving as either a manager or GM in the local league. As a manager, Osborne had 267 regular-season wins and four trips to the tournament. He guided the local powerhouse Pepsi-Cola team that produced future major leaguers such as Keith Williams, Mike Holtz and Joe Vitko.

Later, he managed Moxham Bank and Principle Development and was a GM with the wildly successful Delweld franchise.

A list of former Osborne players reads like a who's who of area baseball performers who went on to success at the college and pro levels. A longtime Cleveland Guardians scout, Osborne also started the Dee Dee Osborne Showcase, a summer event that has been held for more than 20 years with Greater Johnstown graduate and AAABA Hall of Famer Tom Walter directing the action for his former coach.

The showcase annually was held at Roxbury for years before it moved to Mount Aloysius College. Currently the head coach at Wake Forest University, Walter is among those who pushed for the Roxbury Park field to be named after Osborne.

'DEE DEE IS BASEBALL'

"Dee Dee is baseball in Johnstown," said Walter, an MVP on Osborne's Pepsi-Cola team in the Junior League. "He is the guy that brought baseball to life for me and so many others. He's impacted my life in so many ways and certainly is one of the reasons I got into coaching.

"He is a guy who cared so much about his players, not only as baseball players, but on a personal level. To this day, I talk to Dee Dee at least once a week. He's somebody who's been like a second father to me."

Another Johnstown product joined Walter in the cause. Ross Kott, a AAABA Hall of Famer who was an MVP on Sani-Dairy's tourney runner-up team in 1995, coached with Osborne at Greater Johnstown after playing for the Trojans.

Now a resident of New Orleans, Kott will join Walter in Johnstown for a planned dedication ceremony in April, when Wake Forest is to play at the University of Pittsburgh.

Hopes are that a game between Greater Johnstown, coached by former Osborne assistant Kerry Pfeil, and Westmont Hilltop, led by former Osborne assistant Chris DelSignore, can be arranged for the gathering. DelSignore is a AAABA Hall of Famer who managed Delweld to AAABA Tournament title game appearances with Osborne as general manager.

"I think this is the crowning achievement for Dee for his commitment to Johnstown High School and the local baseball community," Kott said. "Dee Dee bleeds Columbia blue and black. He put the baseball program on the map and helped countless players gain opportunities they may have never had before his arrival.

"Dee Dee gave his life to local baseball and I'm just one of the many who were fortunate to have him help me not only in baseball, but in life," Kott said. "He deserves this honor and I'm happy I could help."

'GENERATIONAL IMPACT'

City of Johnstown Public Works Director Jared Campagna teamed with Walter and Kott as well as city officials throughout the months-long process. "Tom and Ross brought the idea together, and collectively, we kind of breathed it to life and brought it to fruition," Campagna said. "The whole community can benefit from it. Dee Dee's impact has been a generational impact on young people's lives."

Johnstown Councilman Rick Britt, a Greater Johnstown High School graduate, thought the resolution is appropriate.

"It's a great idea. He definitely earned it," Britt said. "His record, his teams' performances, the leadership that he gave his ballplayers. I think he's earned it."

Councilman Chuck Arnone, like Osborne, served in the United States Marine Corps. Arnone appreciated Osborne's service to his country.

In 2018, Osborne received Vietnam War medals he had earned 50 years earlier during the siege of Khe Sanh. He was wounded in combat.

"Dee Dee is a former Marine, and there is a brotherhood that stands longer than the history of the United States," said Arnone, commander of Johnstown American Legion Post 294. "Dee Dee was a hard-working guy and he gave himself to the city 100 different ways as far as baseball.

"A lot of times, we don't honor somebody until it's posthumous. I think it's a great to honor someone while they're still alive."

Arnone said efforts are underway to install a 30-foot flagpole adjacent to the field, noting that many are surprised to learn no pole currently exists in the park to display the American flag.

A NCAA Division I baseball coach with more than 800 career wins – nearly 400 at Wake Forest University – Walter said plans call for future fundraising efforts to improve the field.

"They've talked about eventually putting turf in there and doing some other things," Walter said. "Giving back to baseball in Johnstown is something that always has been important to me, something instilled by Dee Dee. We'd like to upgrade that facility and try to make it a second version of the Point."

MAJOR STANLEY C. GROMALA USAF B-52 AVIATOR , KHE SANH VETERAN

Stanley C. Gromala, 78, of Enfield, passed away peacefully on March 9, 2023. Stas' as he was called by those who knew him, was born in Meriden on April 4, 1944 and was the son of Stanley J. Gromala and Harriet (Laskarzewski) Gromala. He graduated from Platt High School and went on to obtain degrees from Drexel University, and later Central Connecticut State University. After Drexel he was commissioned and proudly served as an aviator in United States Air Force where he flew the C-130 Hercules. While in Vietnam he was awarded two Distinguished Flying Crosses for going above and beyond the call of duty, one for his actions during the Siege of Khe Sanh.

He later served in the Panama conflict and retired with the rank of Major out of Westover Air Reserve Base in Chicopee, MA. He would often say that he "absolutely loved flying and being in the Air Force" but because he was a single dad, he chose to give it up to raise his two children. After the Airforce he worked at Aetna as a computer programmer until retirement. After retiring he traveled around New England working with his cousin Gerry and would later go on to drive school buses for the public school system.

He was an avid reader and loved to read about science, history, military history, and financial strategies. He liked to garden and was well known by those close to him for his love of tomato plants and his wonderfully dry sense of humor. In his later years he enjoyed spending most of his time with son Stanley, his sister Rita and his beloved grandchildren Valentina and Ignacio. Stanley is survived by his son, Stanley and his partner Daisy; his daughter, Susan Gromala; his sister, Rita Gromala-Schoenborn and her husband Michael his grandchildren, Gabriel, Valentina (who adored her Dziadziu), and Ignacio; his nephews, Steven and Joseph Schoenborn and many cousins. Relatives and friends may join the family on Thursday, March 16, 2023, from 4 – 7 pm at Leete-Stevens Enfield Chapels, 61 South Rd, Enfield, CT. A Mass of Christian Burial took place at 11:00 am on Friday, March 17, 2023 at St. Stanislaus Church, 82 Akron St, Meriden, CT 06450

EUGENE LOMBARDI & JOE REBOLTZ, TWO MARINES FROM BRAVO 1/1 WHO WENT OVER TO OKINAWA WITH THE 1ST TRANSPLACEMENT BATTALION 1959 WITH THEIR LOVELY WIVES.

FROM THE WEB BY JACK HAIGWOOD

This is a lengthy story but well written and a very true story. The Jim in the story is now deceased, but the Jack & Ray (author) continue to live.

There is no Bob Hope In a land far, far away, in a time long ago, there lived. Wait, this is the way, fictitious stories begin. This is a true account, I am going to present you with facts , just the facts.

Time is Dec, 1967, exact day is uncertain, but close to Christmas. Location is Southeast Asia. Republic of South Vietnam, I Corp, Khe Sanh Combat Base to be exact.

This forward Combat base is located the North East region of I Corp near the DMZ and the infamous Ho Chi Min trail. A once lush and green Jungle/Forest, with a abundance of wildlife. The French had Tea and other crops plantations here. They also used this area as a resort for , hunting, trekking and other leisure activity for those that could, during French Colonial days.

Today it's usage is for military , by the United States Armed Forces to defend the world from Communist aggression, I digress into politics and that is Fiction also, back to the facts

The Khe Sanh Combat Base at this time is inhabited by US Marines I will not try to separate the individual units since all Marines are indoctrinated to believe they are all Rifleman first, and whatever else they do is secondary. Twenty five hundred plus Marines plus some Air Force personnel, with a compliment of Special Forces and other Army personnel.

Complimenting and in support of the entire Base was a Detachment of the finest and best, US Navy Seabees. This unit is important to the story so the facts are, Bravo Detachment from Construction Battalion Maintenance Unit (CBMU) 301, Approximately 32 men, from the various rates that Seabees hold. Unlike Marines each Seabee has a distinct rate, a specialty or trade to speak.

The Seabees hold rates as Heavy Equipment Operators, Construction Mechanics, Electricians, Builders, Steelworkers, Utility (plumbing/AC), Engineering Aids, specialties that do not allow any Seabee to perform each other's trade. (Union contract)

On or about the week of Christmas, orders were given to pick up some equipment and parts in Danang. The assignment fell to Third class Construction Mechanic Jack Haigwood and Construction Mechanic Jim Lange. A Equipment operator also was directed to travel with the Mechanics in the event the equipment had to be moved, this task fell to EO Raymond Cruz

Due to the conditions on the base of constantly being harassed by NVA Gunners and the possibility of a ground attack, they each are fully dressed in the uniform of the day. That being Jungle Fatigues, Jungle boots, Flak jacket, Helmet, M-16, and full ammo belt, with gas mask.

If anyone has flown in and out of, example JFK, O'Hara, LAX, all you have to do is look at the reader board to locate your flight, gate and destination. The Khe Sanh Combat Base had none of these. You would walk out to the parking apron with gear in hand and waited for whatever landed and was able to get off the ground. Oh, the base also lacked Red Cap service, so you travel light.

I remember we three jumping aboard a CH-46 "Chinook", hoping it was going to Dong Ha, where our main unit was located. This would be a bonus flight since we could visit with friends, get some good food and maybe get a shower. (Marines were always in the mood for a fight, I believe due too the chow being served at Khe Sanh). Oh no such luck, the Chinook lands in Quang Tri, south of Dong Ha. Quang Tri another base full of pissed off Marines, must be something in the Kool Aide.

The process is started all over again, wait and we wait, all planes landing and leaving are going elsewhere. Late that afternoon finally a C-123 s heading for Danang and with some luck there is room in the coach section, we must be truly blessed. Lets give this some perspective.

In today's modern air travel, this would take 1+ hour for the distance we were traveling. it has taken us a complete day. Arriving in Danang late in the afternoon we still have to acquire transportation to Naval Support Activity Danang. Taxis must be on some union break we could not hale one down. An Air Force Tech Sergeant in pressed starched greens, noticed our desperate look and allowed us to sit in the back of his shiny green pickup and dropped us off at the NSA Danang gate. The Gate that this wonderful Air Force personnel, who kindly gave us a lift is at the farthest point from the Supply Depot. This we find out after the Tech Sergeant leaves us in the hands of a Fleet Sailor playing Mall Cop at this gate. The Sailor in Garrison belt and 45 strapped to his side, checks our orders, waves us in, cool. We turned towards this marvelous image of Security and ask "where do we go", very efficiently he points, without facing us .

Arriving on foot with twilight now at our backs. We know nothing is going to happen but we pressed on, since orders are orders and they must be carried out. NSA supply depot personnel are all gone with the exception of a lone First Class. who was kind enough to tell us we could come back in the morning. After much stammering, he advised us we could spend some time in the EM Club and that the Bob Hope Christmas show was happening this day, Truly we are blessed, someone in the group must have kissed the Blarney stone, I dismiss myself since, I have kissed a few Irish girls but no Blarney or Barnie. We have managed to stay in shape the last couple of months so the walk across the base in full uniform of the day, has not hampered our jog to the Bob Hope Christmas show.

Having been at Khe Sanh for almost 4 months, it takes a lot to get me excited, as well as the two traveling companions Jim and Jack, who have yet to miss a step, we walk in cadence almost automatically, nothing has yet broken our temper. Had we known then what we had ventured into,

We approach the outdoor theatre, we can clearly hear loud laughter, something we could only imagine ever happening at Khe Sanh, (it did happened once, the Chow hall posted a menu describing the evening meal, Soup de Jour, a green salad, choice of Prime Beef, or Chicken in a light cream sauce with mixed greens and wild rice) those cooks are real comedians. again I digress

We follow the throngs of well pressed Greens toward the sounds of laughter and the signature of humans with no stress, you can actually smell the relaxation in the air. This was like a pheromone too us Finally three resident from Khe Sanh are going to share in something other than C-rations, dust, mud and rats. We approach another Mall Cop who without hesitation and with the authority of Superman stopping a speeding train, puts his hand up flat up to our faces. With all of the education he received at some Ivy League school bellows out," Where the fuck do you three fucks think you are going" such language took us by surprise.

We are going to the Bob Hope Christmas show, again the Ivy league trained linguist, opens his mouth "NO! the fuck your not". This sets off a switch in every Seabees cerebral cortex and the three, step forward closer to the subject to cut down on swinging wildly and missing

A second MP approaches and begins to flex something of a muscle under those starched Greens and Helmet. The two Mall Police in Chorus say, NO! you are not getting in. We three Seabees move closer That gives us the appearance of looking bigger, a method used in the wild.

The two MP's take a step back, and each reach up, grab and pinch their noses, "You guys Smell" With complete astonished look, we fell silent and searched each others faces for an explanation for why such a comment. We leaned into each other and took a whiff of each other and could not detect any strange odor Fact, we had just spent the last 3+ months working 12 to 16 hour shifts rebuilding the Runway at Khe Sanh. Round the clock work schedule, in that Red laterite and mud that makes up that region. Sleeping in tents or Bunkers, eating C-rations and constantly diving, crawling, and dodging the daily and increasing frequency of Artillery shells. We all had that well worn out look, there was no laundry service and why? So to us, every one there at Khe Sanh, looked and smelled the same, nothing to write home about.

The two MP's then and may I mention very eloquently pointed out that we not only smelled, our uniforms were filthy, and we had weapons, I had a M-16,16 magazines loaded, 2 grenades and a bandolier of 5.56ball ammo plus a Gas mask, pretty standard walking around outfit at Khe Sanh. Jim and Jack pretty much the same, except for the sidearm they carried.

We informed the two MP's that we could not surrender the weapons, they informed us again, we were not going in. We started to press the issue when a handful of cloned MP's arrived (shiny helmets, starched greens, MP armbands) they all look alike.
We could have shot our way in, since I doubt those sidearms they had, were probably empty and just for show. After much deliberating we decided to return to NSA and get a bunk for the night.

The MA on duty was very kind, think he took one look at us and felt it his Christian duty to help those in real need. We worked out an arrangement to have our weapons and gear in a separate locked storage unit. He pointed us to a gedunk that was still open, and had real food. We rushed over, inhaled some

Some warm food. Returned to the Barracks and spent the next 2 hours in the hot showers. We each must have lost 5 lbs of layered red laterite that had accumulated on our skin. I washed my socks and skivies, while in the shower. then slept a full night on a mattress, with no rude awakenings

William "Billy" Waugh, a famed Army Special Forces soldier and later CIA operative, passed away today, at the age of 93.

BILLY WAUGH – SPECIAL FORCES LEGEND

From hitchhiking at age 15 in order to join the WWII effort to hunting Bin Laden in his 70s in the mountains of Tora Bora the story of Billy Waugh is straight out of a Hollywood movie; but it is entirely true.

Billy Waugh had two long careers, one in Special Forces and the other in the CIA as a paramilitary operations officer. In total, he served for more than 50 years as a special operator.

A HITCHHKERS ATTEMPT TO JOIN THE MILITARY

Waugh was born in Bastrop, Texas on December 1, 1929. He was bitten by the bug to join the military during World War II. In 1945, he met a pair of Marines who had just returned to Texas from fighting in the South Pacific. So, at the age of 15, he decided to enlist. Somehow, he got the idea that you could enlist at the age of 16 in California, so he set off hitchhiking for Los Angeles.

He got only as far as Las Cruces, New Mexico when he was stopped by a police officer. He was put in jail for having no identification and refusing to give his name. Eventually, he was released and returned to Bastrop.

Waugh decided to throw himself into high school until he was old enough to enlist. He graduated with a grade point average (GPA) of 4.0 from Bastrop High School.

Waugh eventually joined the military in 1948, but he enlisted with the Army, not the Marines. After going through basic training at Ft. Ord, California, Waugh went through jump school in December 1948.

He re-enlisted in 1951 to get an assignment with the 187th Airborne Regimental Combat Team (Rakkasans), which was then fighting in Korea.

After the Armistice ended the Korean War, Billy Waugh was assigned to Germany. There, while riding on a train, he met a couple of NCOs from the 10th Special Forces Group. They explained the opportunities that existed for NCOs in the unit and what Special Forces (SF) were all about. Waugh volunteered and entered the training pipeline, earning his Green Beret and joining the 10th Special Forces Group.

The men hunted for the notorious terrorist in the Afghan mountains outside of Tora Bora. At 71 years of age, when any thoughts of being an operator are long past for warriors, Waugh was on the hunt one final time. Waugh on horseback in the mountains around Tora Bora in 2001. (Hunting the Jackal/Avon Press)

"If the mind is good and the body is able, you keep on going if you enjoy it," Waugh said in the interview with Stubbs. "Once you get used to that, you're not about to quit. How could you want to do anything else?"

Because of security restrictions, no one (other than Waugh) knows in how many classified operations he participated. He Billy Waugh is rightly a legend in the special operations and paramilitary community.

Forces Group (10th SFG) in Bad Tölz, West Germany.

During the early 1960s, Special Forces A-Teams were being sent to Southeast Asia to train indigenous tribesmen for the joint SF/CIA Civilian Irregular Defense Program (CIDG).
In Waugh's first tour in 1961, he trained tribesmen in both South Vietnam and Laos. In the same year, he began his first tour with the CIA's Special Activities Division, being on loan from the Special Forces. It wouldn't be his last.

BILLY WAUGH IN VIETNAM:

Waugh conducted five combat HALO jumps during the war in Vietnam. (Hunting the Jackal/Avon Press)

In 1965, his A-Team (A-331) and his CIDG unit conducted a raid on a North Vietnamese Army (NVA) unit compound in Bong Son, in Binh Dinh Province. Intelligence gave the Special Forces troops an estimate of a few hundred NVA troops in the area. This was a gross miscalculation, In reality, there were more than 4,000 troops in the area, including Chinese regular troops bolstering the NVA and Viet Cong.

During the raid, Billy Waugh found himself out of grenades and nearly out of ammunition. On the way to the predetermined exfil point, he was hit in the knee by a Soviet-made RPK.

Crawling along a levee, he was hit again in the foot and ankle. Reaching his medical aid bag, he gave himself a shot of morphine but this did little for the pain.

The CIDG and SF troops were soon in danger of being overrun. At that point, Waugh was shot in the head and knocked unconscious.

In an excerpt from his book, Hunting the Jackal, Waugh described what transpired, "I took another bullet, this time across the right side of my forehead. I don't know for sure, but I believe the bullet ricocheted off the bamboo before striking me. It sliced in and out of a two-inch section of my forehead, and it immediately started to bleed like an open faucet. It sounds like the punch line to a bad joke, but you know it's a bad day when the best thing about it is getting shot in the head."\

The NVA overran the position. They believed Waugh was dead and helped themselves to his gear, Rolex watch, and clothes, stripping him naked before leaving him there and moving on. His teammates found him and got him to safety. For his conduct, Billy Waugh was awarded a Silver Star and a Purple Heart — his sixth, for that operation.

He spent the remainder of 1965 and part of 1966 recovering from his wounds at Walter Reed Hospital in Washington DC. However, as soon as he was released from the hospital, Waugh was right back in Vietnam.

Waugh joined the Military Assistance Command-Vietnam Studies and Observations Group (MACV-SOG). This was a unit composed of special operators from all the services, but mostly Green Berets. It conducted dangerous missions deep in enemy-occupied territory.

While working for SOG, Waugh helped train Vietnamese and Cambodian forces in unconventional warfare tactics to fight against Communist forces in the region.

Waugh was the senior NCO of MACV-SOG's Command & Control North (CCN) based at Marble Mountain on the South China Sea, outside of Da Nang. Waugh held the command sergeant major position during the covert unit's transition and name -change to Task Force One Advisory Element (TF1AE). He spent the remainder of the war working for the unit.

The price for conducting these "over the fence" operations was high. The casualty rate for SOG forces was over 100 percent. In an interview about SOG with a Miami newspaper, Waugh said, "If you were going up there, you were either going to die or get shot all to hell. Everyone in the outfit was wounded once, twice, three times."

SGM Billy Waugh conducted the first combat High Altitude, Low Opening (HALO) jump, into enemy territory in October 1970. Waugh also led the last combat Special Reconnaissance parachute insertion by American Army Special Forces HALO parachutists into denied territory on June 22, 1971.

After the U.S. troops were withdrawn from Vietnam, Waugh, a veteran of 7.5 years of combat deployments, was to be reassigned to the 10th Special Forces Group. Nevertheless, he told the Army to change his orders or he would retire.

The Army had no need for Special Forces — and never liked the unit, to begin with — so they told Waugh to retire. And thus he did. Waugh retired from active military duty at the rank of sergeant major (E-9) on February 1, 1972.

BILLY WAUGH RETURNS TO THE CIA

Waugh went back to Texas and worked for the U.S. Postal Service. But for someone who was used to the adrenaline rush of combat with SOG, a postman's job wasn't for him.

But in 1977 his career would refocus. He and three other retired Special Forces operators were recruited to train Libyan Special Forces troops. The men believed that this was a CIA operation, but the more they learned, they realized that it was not. Instead, it was a private operation run by an ex-CIA operative named Edwin Wilson.

Wilson would later be convicted of attempted murder, illegally selling arms, explosives, and ammunition to a foreign country, and was sentenced to 53 years in prison.

However, just prior to deployment, Waugh was approached by an active CIA agent who asked him to take photos of people, places, and anything else of value. This was a needed bit of insurance for Waugh in case things went wrong.
He took pictures of the men he was training with and of SAM (surface to air missile) sites. He then passed them on to the CIA.

Waugh was in Libya in 1979 when the U.S. Embassy in Tehran was overrun. Libya was no longer safe for him and he escaped to Frankfurt, Germany.

The new heads of the CIA under the Carter administration outwardly didn't want anyone like Waugh in the fold any longer. So, Waugh took a job as the deputy chief of police at the U.S. Army Kwajalein Missile Range in the Marshall Islands. The force was tasked with stopping the Soviets from stealing classified information on the U.S.'s missile technology.

TRACKING BIN LADEN AND HUNTING THE JACKAL:

But in the late 1980s, the agency came calling again. So, Billy Waugh ended up in Khartoum, Sudan, hunting a then-unknown terrorist and terror organization. The man was Osama bin Laden and the group was al-Qaeda. At that time, bin Laden was not a major target, so Waugh was told to watch and report on his activities. He got within a few feet of him several times.

I was within 30 meters of him," Waugh said to Air Force journalist Nick Stubbs during an interview in 2011. "I could have killed him with a rock."

In 1993, Waugh and a team of CIA operatives set up a surveillance mission to try and locate the wanted terrorist, Ilich Ramirez Sanchez, aka the infamous "Carlos the Jackal."

No one had photographed the Jackal for 10 years. But Waugh's team tracked him down and set up a surveillance point across the street from his house. They monitored Carlos's routine and eventually, the French came in, raided the house, and captured the Jackal.

After 9/11, Waugh had one last fight in him. Having so much knowledge about bin Laden, he convinced the agency to deploy him to the mountains of Afghanistan. Waugh deployed with ODA-594 of the 5th SFG.

MICHAEL R. EIBEN, USN, KHE SANH VETERAN

Michael R. Eiben, Age 79, U.S. Navy Veteran of Vietnam War, Born into Eternal Life on March 23, 2023. Beloved husband of Suzanne "Suzy" Eiben (nee Scanlan) for 53 years. Loving father of Jennifer (Michael) Gervasio, Larry (Ann) Eiben, Gretchen (Sean) Lyons, and Emily (Luke) Lyons. Proud "Papa" of George, Suzanne, Charlie, and James Gervasio; Michael, Leo, Genevieve, and Loretta Eiben; Elise, Emily, Julia, and Thomas Lyons; Olivia, Luke, and Quinn Lyons. Beloved son of the late Lawrence and Rita (Bloomfield) Eiben. Loving brother of Mary Ellen Hoyt, Therese, and Peter Eiben, and the late Judith Hall. Cherished uncle to the Eiben, Batdorf, Hoyt, Brown, Doran and Scanlan families. Michael was born in Cleveland, Ohio, attended St. Edward's High School and graduated from the University of Notre Dame with a degree in Architecture.

At Notre Dame he was a member of the Naval ROTC and a monogram winning member of the wrestling team. He went on to serve as a Naval officer in Vietnam from 1966-68 and was a highly decorated Officer-in-Charge of Beach Jumper Unit 1, a naval special warfare team. He was awarded the Naval Achievement Medal with combat "V" for his service during the Battle of Khe Sanh, during the Tet Offensive. After the war he married the love of his life Suzy Scanlan and settled in the Beverly neighborhood in Chicago. Together they raised four children in Christ the King Parish. Michael worked at Chicago-based Bertrand Goldberg & Associates before launching his own successful architectural and computer engineering firm. In 1979 he was appointed by President Jimmy Carter to serve on the Special White House Task Force on Small Business representing military veterans' interests. He also served as Commissioner of the Urban Renewal Board and the Commercial District Development Board helping to establish the Theatre District and Block 37. In his spare time, he was an avid outdoorsman, who loved hunting, fishing and traveling with his family, especially throughout the American West. Family and friends will meet at Christ the King Church, 9235 S. Hamilton Ave., Chicago, IL 60643 on Saturday, April 1, 2023 for visitation 9:30am-1:00pm. Mass of Christian Burial at 1:00pm. Livestream of the funeral mass will be available beginning at 1:00pm using the link:

MARCH 29, 2023
2023 NATIONAL VIETNAM VETERANS DAY CEREMONY AND PARADE, HONOLULU, OAHU
BY CRAIG W. TOURTE

What an honor it was to attend the 2ed Annual National Vietnam Veterans Day Ceremony and Parade in Honolulu held on Kuroda Field at Fort DeRussy, to honor and thank Vietnam Veterans for their service and sacrifice. The ceremony consisted of numerous speakers and dignitaries "On an invitation from the Historic Programs in Hawaii, 117 representatives of the Mandan, Hidatsa and Arikara Nation on the Fort Berthold Reservation traveled to Hawaii from North Dakota" to take part in the Annual Vietnam Veterans Ceremony and Parade. Dressed in traditional Native American clothing including beautiful full feathered headdresses (Warbonnets) they performed traditional Chants and Native American tribal and cultural dances. Their performance was emotional and spellbinding.

Kuroda Field was packed with numerous bands and marching groups from local schools, youth organizations, VFW Organization, the Marine Corps Band, Vietnam Veterans Organizations. The parade down Kalakaua Ave and Saratoga Street lasted at least an hour and was a mile long.

I sat in a chair in front of the ceremony stage and listened as a Marine Corps Brigadier General gave a wonderful presentation of his experiences and appreciation of those who had gone before him. He included those who fought at Khe Sanh, Con Thien and Fallujah and many other signific sacrifices.

I was wearing my Khe Sanh Veterans shirt and after the ceremony, I walked to the stage and thanked him for including Khe Sanh in his presentation. He invited me onto the stage where I had the privilege of shaking his hand.

It was a wonderful experience, I was moved by the many who showed such great patriotism and noted the very stern expressions on the faces of the young people present and standing along the parade route and on the faces of those who marched in the long parade, it was obviously a proud moment for many. I am looking forward to going back to Hawaii and hopefully once again attending the National Vietnam Veterans Day Parade and Ceremony.

MEMORIES
FROM THE WEB BY KEVIN SELDON

Remembering these brave warriors on this 55th anniversary of one of the worst days in Vietnam for the Marine Corps. God bless them and Semper Fidelis.

55 Years ago today their world went dark. This is the story of the most fateful day the Marine Corps endured in the entire Vietnam War. On that day, 87 Marines from 1st Battalion, 9th Marines gave their lives in a brutal and vicious struggle against a dramatically numerically superior enemy force. This is their story and these are the faces of the men who lost their lives in a region northeast of Con Thien in an encounter known as 'The Marketplace' ambush.

Those who gave their lives at the Marketplace July 2, 1967:

HERE IS THEIR STORY:

The following information was obtained from several sources. Most notable "Operation Buffalo" by the late Keith W. Nolan and "Con Thien, The Hill of Angels," by James P. Coan. More information was also obtained from the July 1967 Command Chronology of 1st Battalion 9th Marines as well as the casualty files of those involved.

Operations in and around the Con Thien Marine outpost located just below the Demilitarized Zone had put 1st Battalion, 9th Marines into a very intense period of contact with seasoned elements of the North Vietnamese Army. For months, the Marines had conducted a series of operations in and around Con Thien including Operations Hickory, Prairie I, II, III and IV as well as Operation Cimarron. Hundreds of Marine casualties had been endured as the engaged in bitter fighting with the NVA, most notably elements of the 324B Division of the North Vietnamese Army. Despite the high casualties, the Marines had inflicted horrendous losses on the North Vietnamese. Con Thien was a small outpost within mortar range of the DMZ.

Sitting on two adjacent hills amid the flat grass and brush covered ground along the DMZ, the region was dotted with small villages, coffee plantations and in the summer was scorched by the sun where temperatures climbed well above triple-digit before noon. The Marine outpost at Con Thien was about as isolated as any American position in South Vietnam. The Marines there were completely reliant on air supply and the few routes that offered resupply of ammo, food and water. Con Thien, for all the miseries it offered its occupants, was a key point that offered those in possession of it observation of NVA movements just north of the DMZ. Throughout the spring of 1967, the Marines had engaged the North Vietnamese along the DMZ area in very close -quarters and brutal firefights. By the spring of 1967, Con Thien was the epicenter of the most intense, prolonged action in Vietnam. In mid-April Charlie Company, 11th Engineer Battalion was tasked with clearing a 200-meter-wide strip from Con Thien to Gio Linh, a distance of 6 ½ miles of trees and vegetation. This strip simply became known as 'The Trace.' The engineers were protected by a task force consisting of the 1st Battalion, 4th Marines, an AMTRAC platoon, a platoon of M42 Dusters and some Army of the Republic of Vietnam units. By 19 April, despite harassment from North Vietnamese mines, small arms, recoilless rifle, mortar and artillery fire the strip was half-completed

On May 8, 1967, at 3:00 AM, a Special Forces position near the Con Thien outpost was attacked by the North Vietnamese army following a heavy mortar barrage which dropped 250-300 rounds of 82mm mortars on the outpost. Holding this position was a Special Forces Detachment of the South Vietnamese Army (ARVN), Civilian Irregular Defense Group (CIDG) of the South Vietnamese and U.S. Navy Seabees.

The North Vietnamese managed to overrun the outpost. A small command element with A and D Companies, 1st Battalion, 4th Marines and several Marine tanks from the 3rd Tank Battalion were providing security for engineers that were clearing a 200-meter-wide fire zone known as 'The Trace.' The well-organized communist attack fell primarily on Company D's northern perimeter with fierce hand-to-hand combat. The outnumbered defenders eventually repelled the attacking forces. According to reports the NVA were dressed in camouflage jackets and shorts and used bamboo-made Bangalore torpedoes. The Marines eventually counted 197 NVA bodies around their position. They recovered 3 Chinese-made flamethrowers, several Chinese Grenades, SKS rifles and noted that many of the dead had freshly bandaged wounds suggesting they had suffered wounds early in the fight, were treated and returned to keep fighting. The enemy had also used small pennant-shaped flags on sticks that were stuck in the ground to mark lanes of advance through the breeched barbwire. The final assessment from the attack was that the enemy in this area was well-trained, well versed, experienced and highly committed.

Following this May 8th attack, MACV (U.S. Military Assistance Command, Vietnam) realized that the NVA were using the DMZ as a sanctuary for attacks into I Corps, the department of defense under Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara then lifted the prohibition on US forces entering the DMZ and MACV authorized the III Marine Amphibious Force (III MAF) to now start conducting combat operations into the southern half of the DMZ. Immediately, MACV authorized Operation Hickory—the first authorized incursion into the previously prohibited DMZ. Despite the unusually and comparatively absent enemy, Hickory was successful in discovering and clearing a massive network of NVA fighting positions and operational resources in and around the DMZ. In conjunction with Hickory, Operations Lam Son 54, Belt Tight and Beau Charger also resulted in the removal of the entire civilian population from the area with the result that it was all now a free fire zone. The 200-meter-wide,

6 ½-mile-long cleared 'Trace' or strip stretching from Con Thien to approximately the village and Marine firebase of Gio Linh which would dramatically disrupt the concealment and cove

Route 561 was a mere 10-foot wide dirt cart path that connected the DMZ area to Cam Lo. Elements of the NVA 324B Division, now denied concealment and assets due to Operation Hickory pulled back north of the DMZ area to refit and regroup. No one had any illusions over whether they would be back, the Marines knew the resolve of their adversaries very well. Together with the large Marine presence at nearby Dong Ha, and Cam Lo, the anchor of the Marine presence here became known as Leatherneck square—setting the stage for what would become some of the most intense combat in Vietnam.

By June 1967, operation Cimarron which did not result in any major gains lasted throughout the month. The operation with involved elements of the 4th and 9th Marines lasted throughout the month, net little in the way of a huge enemy body count and contact was comparatively infrequent compared to previous operations in the area. Also in the month of June, the 200-meter-wide 'Trace' stretching 6 ½ miles from Con Thien to Gio Linh was further widened to 600-meters.

In the area northwest of Con Thien, Marine patrols throughout late June had stretched further into the DMZ area reaching an area just off the west side of Route 561 known as the Marketplace on the map. The Marketplace as it was identified on maps was an area dotted with abandoned hollowed-out buildings that were mere crumbling structures. On either side of route 561 near the Marketplace were shallow rice paddies gridded by shrub-covered dikes dotted with older abandoned fighting holes and craters from mortar impacts. There had been frequent contact there. On June 29, 1967, Delta Company 1st Battalion, 9th Marines were engaged in a quick heated firefight with the NVA. On July 1, 1967, both Alpha and Bravo Companies were to go into the Marketplace as part of a plan by Colonel George E. Jerue, the regimental commander who wanted to use the next operation—Operation Buffalo, to disrupt what appeared the enemy's uncontested use of the area around the Marketplace knowing full well that the Marines would frequent the area. The enemy would clearly observe Marine patrols in the area and use the habits and routes used to set up an ambush of the next unit that would enter the Marketplace. The plan for Buffalo called for Alpha and Bravo Companies to move into the area north of the Trace and establish a small patrol post north of this area and spend the next few weeks sweeping back and forth between Con Thien and the DMZ to deny the enemy access to this area. By doing so, the Marines could get a better grasp of the enemy's intentions and determine how best to use the limited and understrength 3rd Marine Division and its limited resources in this overwhelmingly massive area they had to cover. Operation Buffalo was set to begin July 2, 1967.

On July 1st, the 1st Battalion, 9th Marines pushing north from the trace reached the first of two road junctions situated south of the Marketplace and north of the trace. Once there, the Marines soon attracted sporadic NVA mortar fire. This mortar fire, however was unusually inaccurate and it was clear the NVA had not been using a forward observer to adjust the rounds. Nonetheless, the encounter re-em phasied Marketplace almost guaranteed contact.

On the night of July 1st, elements of Bravo Company bedded down just off the main route of 561 in preparation for an early morning where they, along with the other companies of the battalion would launch into Operation Buffalo, a sweep north into the DMZ area near the Marketplace. During the night, elements of Bravo Company pushed nightly ambushes out north and south of the company's position near the road junction. Throughout the night, Marines on ambush could hear noises. To the south of the company's position, the sounds of rattling cans quickly drew their attention. To the north, voices speaking Vietnamese could be heard off in the distance near the second road junction by elements of 2nd Platoon.

The following morning, the ambush from 2nd Platoon reported the commotion to the platoon commander who informed the men that the company was going to push north and that 2nd Platoon was to be point for Bravo Company. Approximately ¾ of a mile to the west of Bravo Company's nightly position, Alpha Company, 1st Battalion, 9th Marines, also prepared to move out from the hamlet of Thon An Nha in conjunction with Bravo Company's push north along Route 561. Shortly after they got underway, the point for Alpha Company tripped a series of tripwire booby traps which wounded several members of the lead platoon which delayed the advance. To the east of Alpha Company just after 9:00 AM, Bravo Company, strung out in column along Route 561, reached its first objective which was the first road intersection along Route 561 north of the Trace. 23-year-old 2nd Lieutenant George Thomas King's 2nd Platoon, the point for Bravo, radioed that they had reached the intersection and no contact had been made. The narrow path of Route 561 that ran through shallow paddies was dotted with brown shrubs that the oppressive sun had burned to a crisp. Signs of previous contact with the enemy were everywhere. 1st aid bandage wrappers and gauze, discarded helmets, mortar craters and even a burnout Ontos vehicle was within view of the road.

From the first objective—the first road junction along 561, 3rd Platoon of Bravo Company passed through 2nd Platoon to take point. The platoon was led by Staff Sergeant Alfredo Reyes a former drill instructor and career Marine. Following 3rd Platoon was the company command group or command post led by 29-year-old Captain Sterling Kitchener Coates, a Naval Academy graduate who took command of the company a few weeks earlier. Behind Coates' company command group, King's 2nd Platoon accompanied by 1st Lieutenant William Delaney's mortar section followed by 1st Platoon commanded by Staff Sergeant Leon Burns who made up the tail end of the company and had the responsibility of securing a landing zone for resupply.

Beyond the first road junction, the patrol continued with Staff Sergeant Reyes' 3rd Platoon. As they approached the second road junction where Route 561 intersected with Route 605, a series of gunshots rang out from the west. 3rd Platoon quickly veered to the west and got online to return fire. Two of the platoons squads laid down suppressive fire as a third squad rushed to sweep through the suspected enemy position believing they had run into a small enemy outpost. As the squad of Marines rushed in, enemy fire erupted all around them. The crackle of enemy rifle fire exploding into a cauldron of automatic arms. The assaulting squad was torn apart and pinned down. As the two other squads from 3rd Platoon tried to gain fire superiority, they spotted several men wearing Marine helmets and flak jackets maneuvering on the pinned-down squad. Mistaking them for friendlies they screamed for them to cease firing on their men and tried to identify themselves as Marines. As the melee continued, more and more NVA dressed in Marine helmets and flak jackets swarmed the area and quickly surrounded 3rd Platoon. Pockets of surviving Marines tried desperately to hold off the onslaught firing wildly whenever their M-16s did not jam which tragically occurred with regularity. When their M-16s jammed, Marines were forced to break them down shotgun style and use a section of cleaning rod to clear the jam.

As the ambush intensified and enveloped 3rd Platoon, Captain Coates moved his command group up and directed King's platoon to veer off the road to the east and move up to flank the NVA swarming in on 3rd Platoon. King's 2nd Platoon moved along the ground just off the road through the shallow brush. Suddenly, the area north and east of 2nd Platoon became a wall of automatic fire. Men screaming to try and push their fire teams forward were drowned out by the crescendo of battle. Elements of 2nd Platoon tried desperately to move but with each movement forward the casualties mounted. Soon the survivors of 2nd Platoon were forced to try and move back to the roadway.

With two of his platoons now engaged and pinned down, Coates ordered the mortar sections up to try and lay a base of fire on the suspected enemy positions that seemed to have the company enveloped to the east and west. Coates ran up and down the road among scattered survivors of the 2nd Platoon firing his .45 as he tried to direct the assault. Coates also reached 1st Platoon by radio and ordered them to move to the east to help plug the shattered flank of 2nd Platoon. As Staff Sergeant Leon Burns' 1st Platoon moved through the paddies along the eastern bank of route 561, they spotted movement along the high ground dubbed Hill 70 to the east of the pinned down platoon. The Marines of 1st Platoon also noticed what looked like Marines as they were wearing American helmets and M1955 flak jackets, they were however not fooled and quickly took the figures along Hill 70 under fire. Despite their efforts 1st Platoon could not move much further and they too became fully embroiled in the firefight.

Coates realizing 3rd Platoon was completely cut off, ordered squads from both 1st Platoon and 2nd Platoon to try and advance on the tree line to the northwest. Amid the chaos, the squads tried to rush forward and quickly drew withering fire. Pinned down, they could not advance any further and as corporals and sergeants tried to raise up to try and gain some semblance of command and control they were shot by NVA snipers strategically position in the trees ahead. Only a few of the assaulting squad were able to pull back to the roadway. After only a few minutes, the enemy had so effectively cut off 3rd Platoon that NVA soldiers freely ran across route 561 in the area between the 3rd Platoon and the rest of Bravo Company. Staff Sergeant Reyes' 3rd Platoon was completely overrun. Small pockets of those who survived the initial onslaught tried to hold off the hordes but to no avail. Some ran out of ammunition, many were too wounded to effectively fight and others were still hampered by their M-16s which experienced a critical malfunction. Several of enemy artillery rounds slammed into the landing zone inflicting several casualties among Alpha Company.

Within minutes of their arrival, Slater's command group along with 2nd Platoon found themselves being probed by NVA who were trying to envelope their position which meant almost all of Bravo Company had to have been enveloped. Just ahead of Slater and his company command group, Alpha Company's 3rd Platoon got hit by an NVA assault. On cue and well-orchestrated, the NVA had infiltrated along the flanks of pockets of the platoon's survivors and through their own artillery fire and sprang a rush on 3rd Platoon. The enemy who had tied stalks of tall grass to their helmets and wore clumps of grass on their back to conceal themselves swept over 3rd Platoon in mass.

A handful of 3rd Platoon's survivors were able to pull back before the enemy swarmed in behind them and got back to the landing zone where 2nd Platoon were also fighting enemy on their flanks. For the 3rd Platoon, the problem of jamming rifles once again cost Marines their lives. The numerically superior NVA now had free range to move across 3rd Platoon's position. Several NVA moved among the dead Marines rifling through their packs and pockets taking cigarettes, personal effects, canteens and even ammunition. Several of 3rd Platoons wounded were executed by the NVA. Among the platoon's dead was their commander 2nd Lieutenant Muller. The NVA onslaught continued and even swept across the hastily-established landing zone where 2nd Platoon was dug in. Several survivors of 3rd Platoon were able to make it out and joined with 2nd Platoon who were prepared to make their last stand.

While Alpha Company was swallowed up by the enveloping NVA, the scattered survivors of Bravo Company near the road junction on route 561 were holding out expecting to be overrun at any minute. Captain Keneipp, who was on the verge of heat exhaustion radioed back to battalion, "I don't think I'll be talking to you again, we are being overrun." Within moments Keneipp's position was overrun and he was killed.

To the east of the road junction, survivors of Bravo Company's 2nd Platoon still led by Staff Sergeant Burns were holding on for dear life. They were still engaging NVA reinforcements pouring over Hill 70 and eventually, Burns was able to get on the radio and direct air support on the hill. Burns also brought a napalm strike in near the road junction about forty yards ahead of his position. When Burns finally linked up with other surviving elements of Bravo Company's 2nd Platoon, they were able to fight their way south.

As Burns and his men fought their way south along the banks of route 561, NVA troops who had used the hedges along the road as cover were using flamethrowers against the pinned down survivors of Alpha Company several Marines were caught in the open and burned to death. Among them PFC Paul Glen Forbes. As the surrounding brush and bone-dry grass began to burn several Marines were flushed out trying to escape the flames and were systematically cut down by roving NVA.

As survivors of Bravo's 2nd Platoon, mortar section and those of Alpha Company's tattered platoons moved south, they were met by a rescue force consisting of Delta Company's 3rd Platoon and tanks from 3rd Tank Battalion who managed to carry wounded and several dead off the field. The other platoons of Delta Company moved up to help in the withdraw of Alpha and Bravo Company. Scores of wounded were pulled out, some walking others being carried. From Con Thien, every available vehicle was dispatched to reach the Trace where the wounded could be caravanned back. Even elements of 3rd Battalion, 9th Marine were brought in to assist.

By the day's end, the casualty totals for all engaged were 53 killed in action, 109 wounded and 34 non-recovered missing in action. Bravo Company had only 27 Marines who survived to walk out of the devil's lair. July 2, 1967 became the single costliest day for the Marine Corps during the entire Vietnam war. The remaining 34 non-recovered missing in action were unable to be recovered for days. Back at Con Thien, the battalion aid station was overrun with scores of gravely wounded men. The handful of Bravo and Alpha Company survivors were in shock at what had just unfolded. The absence of comrades whose fate was unknown spoke volumes about how bad Bravo and Alpha Companies had been hit.

The next day, an Air Force observer plane spotted an estimated 100 enemy moving from the DMZ area and closing toward the Con Thien outpost. The guns of Echo Battery 2nd Battalion, 12th Marines were alerted, and coordinates relayed. For the next several minutes, the 105mm guns of Echo Battery created a deadly chorus of cannonade that sent HE rounds splashing into the enemy ranks. Rounds were observed by the aerial spotters to be right on target scattering the sun-scorched earth with parts of NVA soldiers—a small vindication over the slaughter that Bravo and Alpha Companies had endured 24 hours earlier.

Also on July 3, 1967, a plan to recover the dead from 1st Battalion, 9th Marines which could not be brought back the day before kicked off with 1st Battalion, 3rd Marines, and 3rd Battalion, 9th Marines. As planned the two battalions were scheduled to be airlifted into the area just south of the Trace along route 561 and link up. Contrary to the initial plan, 1/3 and 3/9 were inserted way south of the trace forcing the Marines to hump several kilometers through dense brush knowing the abundance of enemy presence in the area. The scheduled recovery of Bravo Company's dead would be delayed a day. During the night, the two battalions took up positions north of the trace along route 561 south of the first crossroads. Dug in behind them were the survivors of 1st Battalion, 9th Marines acting as reserves.

Pushing out parallel to route 561, 3rd Battalion, 9th Marines moving west of the road departed around 7:00 AM. The battalion moved with three companies on line knowing contact was imminent. East of route 561, elements of 1st Battalion, 3rd Marines advanced on a three-company front as well. Both battalions knew they were going to recover their own dead. Just after 9:00 AM, Kilo Company 3rd Battalion, 9th Marines triggered the ambush just south of where Bravo Company was decimated two days before. The NVA dug into camouflaged fighting holes. The encounter, like that that greeted Bravo Company two days before quickly developed into a brutal crescendo of fire pinning Kilo Company down. NVA snipers in the fronting tree line killed several Kilo Company Marines who would only return fire and bring in air. For nearly two hours, the engagement ensued before Kilo Company pulled back a few hundred meters to let air and artillery saturate the area. Twelve Kilo Company Marines had been killed.

Shortly after Kilo Company became entangled with the NVA west of route 561, Alpha Company 1st Battalion, 3rd Marines ran into a wall of entrenched NVA about 100 meters south of the Marketplace. Immediately Alpha Company put their air panels out and let Marine air support play hell upon the NVA lines. A-4 Skyhawks screaming from the sky made bombing runs on NVA positions in the tree line. During the ensuing fire support, one A4 dropped two 250-lb bombs short and they fell into 1st Platoon's lines. One of the bombs was a dud but the explosion of the second inflicted several casualties including the platoon commander and one man who was mortally wounded after losing his leg.

Once air had laid waste to NVA positions north of Kilo Company's front west of route 561, several tanks from 3rd Tanks as well as India Company regrouped and pushed back into the ambush site to recover their dead—fifteen men in all. The mission to recover the dead from Bravo Company had turned into a recovery of the recovery team. Once the dead were secured, Kilo and India Companies pulled back for the night delaying the recovery of the dead from Bravo and Alpha Companies of 1st Battalion for another day.

July 5th was ushered in by a pre-dawn NVA mortar barrage directed at 3rd Battalion, 9th Marines. In response, Marine guns at Con Thien responded with massive counterbattery fire. Air support was brought on line and hammered the area to clear it of the NVA who were undoubtedly waiting again. By 7:15 AM, the advance resumed again over the same ground in another effort to recover the dead from 1st Battalion. As the battalions advanced, the morning remained eerily quiet. It was clear that the enemy had withdrawn and left the Marines alone to recover their fallen comrades. The enemy did however spend the night emplacing booby traps and land mines. One stretch of ground was reported to have twenty various types of mines including one rigged to a 250-pound bomb and the other to a 500-pound bomb. As they approached the ambush site near the Marketplace, 3rd Battalion, 9th Marines provided perimeter security. 1st Battalion, 3rd Marines moved into the area to recover the dead. The sun was blazing hot and the task was made much more cumbersome by the heat which had taken a ghastly toll on the dead who had laid out in the heat for 72 hours.

Donning gas masks, the grizzly task was slow and painstaking. The extent of the horror experienced by Bravo and Alpha Companies was too obvious. Several of the dead had been mutilated and disfigured by the NVA with body parts removed. It was evident that several of the wounded had been executed. One dead Marine was found mutilated and the photo of his girlfriend found on him by the enemy had been pinned to his chest with a knife. In all, the remains of 33 of the 34 missing had been recovered. The 34th Marine, 21-year-old Lance Corporal Wayne Vaster Wilson was never found. He was carried as missing in action and by 1974, with his whereabouts unknown and remains unrecoverable, Wilson was officially declared killed in action. The the wounded Marines were executed as were those who were at the mercy of trying to clear their jammed rifles in time.

As Coates tried to gain control of the situation, NVA mortars and artillery began to land among the columns of Bravo Company. The fire was so effective that it further cut Coates and his command group off from 2nd and 1st Platoons. As the rounds fell in rapid succession further pinning the already-pinned down elements of Bravo Company, NVA troops now known to number an estimated full battalion-size force were able to move south along the banks of route 561 and begin enveloping the rest of the company. With the situation quickly getting out of control for Bravo Company, battalion headquarters at Con Thien was monitoring the situation and immediately directed Alpha Company approximately ¾ of a mile to the northwest to redirect their course, head south and then turn east just north of the Trace to come to Bravo Company's assistance by moving up to the beleaguered company from the south. Battalion also summoned Charlie Company's assistance. Charlie had been at Dong Ha to rest and refit. They were directed to be choppered into an LZ that was to be established south of Bravo Company's besieged position.

As Alpha Company was redirecting and racing to reach their brothers, the point of Alpha Company encountered a well-orchestrate claymore booby trap that wounded 4 members of the point platoon. Captain Slater, realizing the perilousness of Bravo Company's situation ordered the platoon to carry their casualties and continue in route to aid Bravo Company.

As Alpha Company closed the distance toward Bravo Company, Captain Coates and his Forward Air Controller 25-year-old Captain Warren Keneipp managed to bring air support online. Two Huey Gunships peppered the suspected enemy-held tree line. Two F-4 Phantoms were also directed to come to the aid of the embattled Marines. O1-E spotter planes flew ahead and fired white phosphorus markers for the Phantoms. Within minutes the Phantoms dropped several 250 and 500lb bombs on the suspected enemy position. The proximity to Bravo Company's survivors was so danger close they were showered with debris.

As one F4 flown by Major Ray D. Pendergraft of VMFA-524 swooped down, enemy machine gun fire ripped into the belly of the Phantom causing a smoke trail. One F-8 Crusader pilot coming in to help from the airbase at Da Nang saw Pendergraft's F4 barrelling downward and nose-dive into the South China Sea just off the coast. No sign of Pendergraft ejecting nor his rear seater Captain David Spearman. Neither were ever recovered. The F-8 Cursader pilot was also struck, his fire warning signal necessitating him bailing out and descending safely into the ocean to be rescued.

As the air support faced the gauntlet of fire on the ground, the situation for Bravo Company grew increasingly desperate as NVA began to move in on both flanks and try and envelope them from the south. Shortly after the first run of air cover, Captain Keneipp, the FAC with Bravo Company radioed battalion and informed them that Captain Coates was down. Coates had been shot through the head. Keneipp was now in command and trying to keep Bravo Company alive. Only weeks earlier, Keneipp had been a F-8 Crusader pilot and was now working as a Forward air controller. Keneipp, delirious and near dehydration realized he could not hold the company together and turned command over to 1st Lieutenant William Delaney who commanded the company's mortars. Delaney tried to encourage Keneipp to hold on and reassured him that Alpha Company was double timing it over to them. All the while NVA soldiers were scurrying along the flanks drawing fire from Bravo Company's survivors.

s Slater's Alpha Company raced to help, they quickly came under well-directed heavy mortar fire from NVA gunners who almost expected the route of advance. Alpha Company suffered approximately 30 casualties before ever reaching the southern elements of Bravo Company. Slater pushed his 3rd Platoon commanded by 25-year-old 2nd Lieutenant Stephen Peter Muller to move up and help secure a landing zone on the south of Bravo Company's position. Slater, not realizing how little remained of Bravo Company, sent 1st Platoon ahead to make contact with the lead elements of Bravo Company.

As Slater's 1st Platoon moved forward they encountered scores of Bravo Company casualties scattered along and to the side of the road. They too began receiving blistering enemy fire and only a squad from Alpha Company was able to reach the surviving center of what remained of Bravo Company.

As elements of Alpha Company's 1st Platoon reached Bravo Company, 2nd Platoon had established a landing zone and within minutes several CH-34 Sikorsky helicopters were on scene to evacuate Alpha Company's wounded under heavy fire. NVA mortars and artillery were stretching further south and within moments of the evacuation, and tanks of Alpha Company 3rd Tanks were loaded with the body bags of the 33 Alpha and Bravo Company Marines. The helmets of the dead were used to recover personal items and sort them accordingly. Several Marines from 1st Battalion, 3rd Marines tasked with the recovery removed their gas masks to vomit, several were overwhelmed with uncontrollable emotion at what they saw.

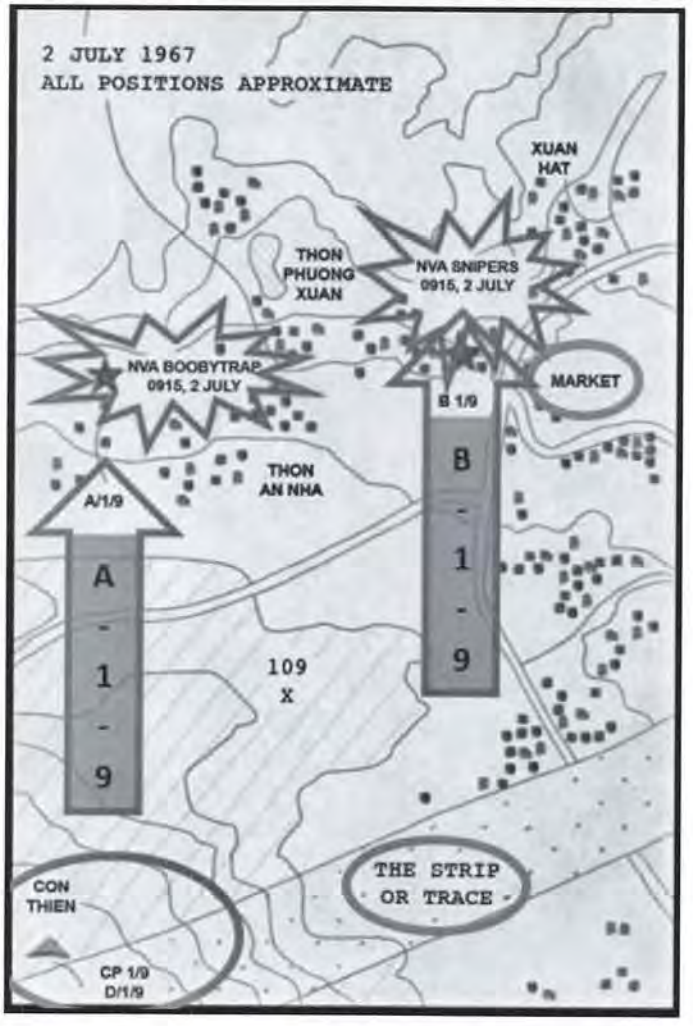
For those who survived it, that summer at Con Thien epitomized the brutality of the war in Vietnam. None of them will ever forget it and here 55 years later, their story and that of their comrades who never came home deserves to be known. Those brave Marines are remembered and honored here. Remember their story and remember their faces and they will never be forgotten. God bless them all. Semper Fidelis.



OBIT

LT/COL CHARLES E. DAVIS III USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN, C CO 1/26

The country, the Hilton Head community and his numerous family and friends lost a truly dedicated man when Charles E. Davis III passed away suddenly on April 8th at home.

Charles was born in Kershaw, SC, on February 15th, 1936, to the late Charles E. Davis, Jr., and the late Geneva Dabney Davis. He grew up in Kershaw, SC, Shelby, NC, and Greensboro, NC with his father, stepmother, Elizabeth Frost Davis and his brother, Bob. He graduated from Greensboro High School, where he met the love of his life, Claire Jacoby Davis, who predeceased him.

Charles developed his love of football while playing in junior high and high school in Greensboro. While attending the University of South Carolina in Columbia, he was active in his fraternity, Kappa Alpha, serving as its' president in his senior year. During the summers, he participated in military training as part of his NROTC scholarship. He graduated in 1958 with a BS in Civil Engineering and was commissioned as a Second Lieutenant in the United States Marine Corps.

After marrying Claire and graduating from Marine Officer Basic School in Quantico, VA, they moved to Camp Lejeune, NC, where he began a career of leadership in the USMC. The couple moved to Long Beach, California, Kaneohe Bay, Hawaii, and Woodbridge, VA as Charles continued his training as well as serving as an instructor in several infantry and aviation schools.

In 1967, Charles was assigned to the 1st Battalion, 26 Marines, 3rd Marine Division, Khe Sanh, Vietnam. There he commanded Charlie Company, first Battalion, 26th Marines until he was promoted to Major and was reassigned and served at the Battalion Operations Officer during the siege of Khe Sanh and other offensive battles throughout the northern portion of South Vietnam.

After returning from Vietnam, Charles was assigned to the Marine Corps Recruiting Depot at Parris Island, SC. It was during this time that Charles and Claire first visited Hilton Head and fell in love with the island. They decided to purchase a lot in Palmetto Dunes, looking forward to the time that they could retire to the island paradise.

The family next moved to Columbia, SC where the USMC invested in his further education and Charles attended the University of South Carolina's Master of Business Administration program. He graduated with an MBA with areas of concentration in management, operations research, and finance.

After completing his degree, Charles and the family moved to Woodbridge, VA, where Charles was assigned to the Manpower Department, Headquarters Marine Corps in Washington, DC. He also completed a tour in Okinawa, Japan as the Assistant G-3 of the 3rd Marine Division. His final assignment with the Marine Corps was completed at the Headquarters Marine Corps in the Manpower department. He retired in 1978 as a Lieutenant Colonel.

Charles was very proud of his time in the military serving his country. He talked about this time to family and friends often, sharing the lessons that he had learned about leadership and how he passed them on throughout his lifetime.

Charles and the family moved home to South Carolina in 1978 where he started a second career in banking at South Carolina National Bank (SCN) as an Assistant Vice President in charge of an Operations Research group. During over 11 years of employment by SCN, Charles was assigned additional responsibilities including statewide bank physical and cyber security, building renovation and construction, property management, purchasing and supply for the entire bank as well as disaster recovery and business continuity planning. He was promoted commensurate with the assignment of additional responsibilities to Senior Vice President, Administrator, and was a member of the bank Management Committee.

During his time at SCN, he was responsible for the construction of the bank's flagship branch on Hilton Head at 1 Sea Pines Circle. His dedication to ensuring that the building did not disturb the large live oak tree on the property was his first act of service on the island.

Charles supported the Columbia community in leadership roles as the Chairman of Columbia Area Mental Health, the Adam Walsh Child Resource Center, and the Rotary Club of Five Points. He was also a member of Forest Lake Club, where he enjoyed playing golf as often as possible.

After retiring from SCN, Charles worked for a national disaster recovery planning company, traveling around the country sharing the successful recovery of the state's largest bank from Hurricane Hugo. He was then hired by Parke Industries to create and manage their Southeast Division. Projects overseen by the Division included all SC state-owned office buildings in Columbia, SC. While living part-time in Atlanta, Charles served as the President of his condominium home owner's association.

After his fourth retirement in 1999, Charles and Claire's involvement on Hilton Head Island increased. They decided that the construction of a second single-family residence was not something that they wanted to take on and selected a condominium unit in the Captain's Quarters community in Shelter Cove as their second home. During this time, they also sold their long-time home in Richland County, and briefly resided at the Still Hopes retirement community in West Columbia.

Charles and Claire made a permanent move to Hilton Head Island in 2005. During the subsequent years, Charles continued to lead a life of volunteer leadership in community management by serving on the board of Shelter Cove Harbour Company, including five years as President, and additional years as Vice President. He was instrumental in the redevelopment of the Shelter Cove community including Shelter Cove Towne Centre, the Veterans Memorial Park and Pond, the Shelter Cove Community Park, and the Shelter Cove Marina. He also served as the President of the Captain's Quarters HOA, where he oversaw several major renovation projects. He was also a member of St Luke's Church of Hilton Head Island.

Charles enjoyed an active life with many friends who relished the stories of his life and the lessons that he learned. His sense of humor was well-known and loved by many. He loved his country, his family, and his community with all his heart and was always searching for opportunities to give back.

In addition to his three children, Beth (Claire Elizabeth), Chuck (Charles Edward IV, wife Diane) and Andy (James Andrew), he is survived by his beloved grandchildren: Chip Davis (Charles Edward V), Kyle Davis (Kyle Richard), Sophie Davis (Sophie Geneva), Stuart Davis (James Stuart), and Emily Davis (Emily Claire), his brother, Robert Dabney Davis (wife Leslie) and many cousins. He will also be missed by the many friends that he made throughout his lifetime as he traveled near and far.

Memorial Service were held at St. Luke's Church 11am, May 13th followed by a reception with family and friends. In lieu of flowers, please make donations to St Joseph's Candler Foundation with a designation of Advancements in Cancer Care in Charles' name.in addition to his three children, Beth (Claire Elizabeth), Chuck (Charles Edward IV, wife Diane) and Andy (James Andrew), he is survived by his beloved grandchildren: Chip Davis (Charles Edward V), Kyle Davis (Kyle Richard), Sophie Davis (Sophie Geneva), Stuart Davis (James Stuart), and Emily Davis (Emily Claire), his brother, Robert Dabney Davis (wife Leslie) and many cousins. He will also be missed by the many friends that he made throughout his lifetime as he traveled near and far.

Easter Sunday
Hill 881-N

A REGULAR SHIT SHOW

From my first day in country when the LP waxed the five gooks, which caused me to go outside the wire with the reaction team - along with the perennial rain of incoming explosive matter -- everything was sort of not personal. All of that changed Easter Sunday.

I watched helplessly as Phil Sheridan was cut down trying to get to a better position to call in artillery. Shortly after that I watched again as another Marine -- unknown to me to this very day -- was cut down from an entrenched NVA.

Shortly after that I was standing next to that Marine. The Corpsman kept plugging up holes whilst punching his chest and endlessly screaming, "Stay with me men! Stay with me." I stopped. Looked at his face. His clear blue eyes were looking off into the distance, said, "What's he looking at Skip?'

Skip replied, "He's dying Kenny, keep moving."

glanced again as his life ebbed away and I felt the calm that overcame him as his face relaxed into a soft smile and his eyes gazed into eternity. I knew then that he was looking into the face of God. It is as clear to me today as if it happened only this morning.

Fifty-Five years later.

As we all approach that final glide path to eternity, keep alive the memory of those who've gone before us. Keep the memory alive by sharing your life with your Children & Grandchildren. Let them know of your time spent in hell. Keep God Alive in your Heart & Soul.

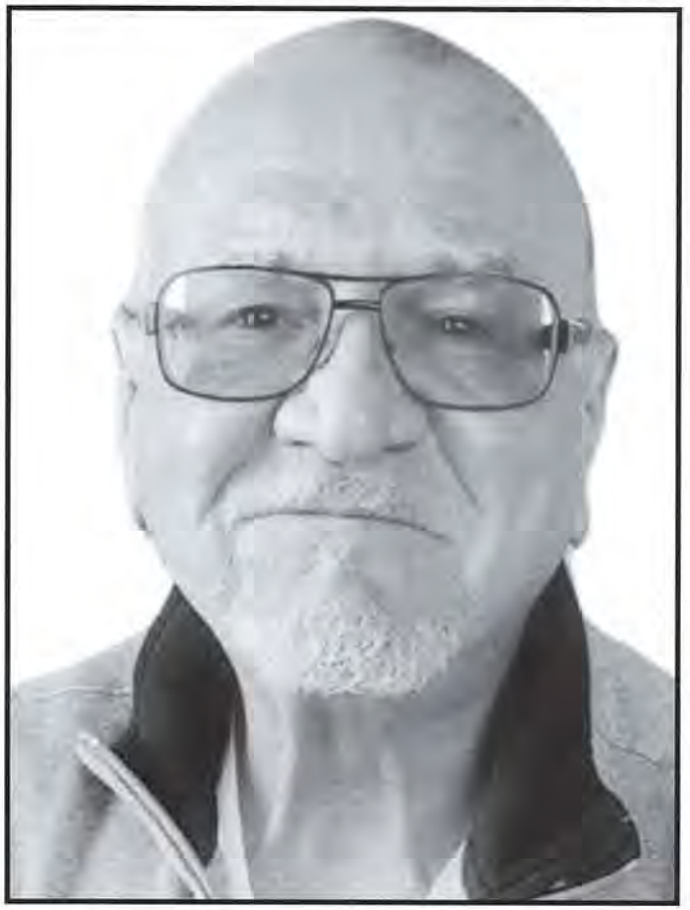
THOUGHTS
By Owen Matthews
I Co 3/26 Hill 881S

It is beautiful that I am haunted by God. He permeates my soul, spirit and all aspects of my life. Everywhere I go, I feel His presence and His love leading and guiding my steps. I feel His love overflowing from me onto everyone I come in contact with. All fear is gone. All doubt is gone. I am a new creature in God. I long for the day when I will see Him face to face, yet I am committed to remaining here on this earth as long as He wills. I will not abandon my post but will serve Him with all of the zeal and love of which I am capable.

OBIT

PETER J. MUDRINICH, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN, BRAVO CO 1/26, 81 MORTARS

Peter J. Mudrinich, devoted husband, cherished father, and beloved friend, who passed away unexpectedly on June 4, 2023 at the age of 76. Peter's life was a testament to love, service, and unwavering loyalty. His compassionate nature touched the lives of those fortunate enough to know him.



Peter was a devoted and loving husband to his spouse Ursula, the love of his life, and was by her side for 52 years.

As a dedicated father, Peter was the epitome of strength and courage. He embraced his role with unwavering dedication and love. He nurtured his sons' dreams, encouraged their aspirations, and celebrated their every achievement. Peter's wisdom, patience, and guidance will forever shape the lives of his children and leave an indelible mark on their hearts and families.

Outside his role as a father, Peter was a beacon of selfless service. Peter served as a U.S. Marine (Vietnam Veteran - Khe Sanh), a High School Teacher (Herr Moo), and a dedicated patriot. He was always ready to lend a helping hand to those in need.

Peter's passing leaves a void that can never be filled, but his legacy will continue to inspire those who know him. May his soul rest in eternal peace, and may his memory be a guiding light in the lives of those he loved and left behind.

Peter is survived by his spouse Ursula, his two sons, Erik (wife Mary) and Mark (wife Kirsten), and his three lovely grandchildren, Cole, Ava, and Evora.
"To do the useful things, to say the courageous things, to contemplate the beautiful things: that is enough for one man's life." T.S. Elliot

OBIT

JOHN W. O'NEILL, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN, MIKE CO 3/26

John "Johnny Bill" W. O'Neill 75, of Duluth passed away peacefully with family by his side on April 15, 2023.

The first of six children, Johnny was born on March 15, 1948, to John and Joan O'Neill. He was a 1966 graduate of Duluth Cathedral High School.

Johnny grew up on Park Point and loved every aspect of it. From playing and coaching, hockey, and baseball, to rowing in Lake Superior. He spent many years at The Duluth Rowing Club under coach Henning Peterson. Becoming a quarter mile-dash champion. Among the many things that Johnny excelled at, he was the most phenomenal on water skis, a real treat to watch. Besides his love for sports and the outdoors, Johnny also had a love for fast cars, and pretty girls.

Shortly after graduation in 1966, Johnny started his studies at UMD. Although he enjoyed his studies, he wanted to fulfill a lifelong dream of becoming a Marine. Johnny enlisted in the USMC and followed his Uncle Jerome's footsteps. Before his selfless service to our country began, Johnny married his love, Ruth Ann Saker, and together they had 2 sons, Patrick, and Ryan.

In 1968, Johnny was sent to Vietnam as a Marine. Part of the mission he served is known as The Battle of Khe Sanh. While in Vietnam, Johnny was injured twice, and received 2 Purple Hearts. Upon his return home to the US, Johnny continued his service in the USMC, serving out of Coronado Military Base in San Diego California. Johnny would learn later he would face many challenges in life because of getting sprayed with agent orange while serving. After his Honorable Discharge from service, Johnny and Ruth returned home to Duluth.

Johnny worked at UPS as a driver, and spent his time fishing, camping, and hunting with his boys. The love he had for his sons was unmatched.

Over the course of many years, he tried to fight the signs and symptoms of MS. Despite any of the challenges he faced, he continued to say that if he had a chance to do it all over again, he would, in a heartbeat.

Over the past 10 years, Johnny was so lucky to live at the Minnesota Veterans Home in Silver Bay MN. He made countless friendships, touched the lives of all the staff, and shared in the memories of all who lived there. He is most famous for his sense of humor and quick wit.

Johnny is proceeded in death by, his loving parents, John and Joan O'Neill, his wife Ruth, son Ryan and brothers, Tommy, and Kevin.

Johnny is survived by his son Patrick. His faithfully supportive and loving siblings, Danny (Julie) O'Neill and Margie (Billy) Maloney. Nieces and nephews, Shawn (Krista) O'Neill and their sons, William, Matthew and Brandon, Erin Boit and her children, Ian and Mya, Lindsey (Olie) Hedge, and their sons Oak and Maverick, Britney (Michael) Boyum and Madilyn Maloney.

RESPONSE FROM KSV LOUIS " CISCO" REYES E CO 2/26

Many Marines, Soldiers, Sailors, Airmen and Coast Guard served and died for you to have the right of Freedom of Speech and this is how you use it? I don't know why you think you're so high and mighty, what is you're claim to fame? What have you done in service of your country? Nothing. You let us defend her and run with your tail between your legs. I know plenty of "educated" people who are great at taking tests to get their degrees, but end up on the news because they have no common sense...like you. I was born in Guadalajara, Mexico came to this country and made it mine. I served in the Marine Corps for 20 years. I served in Vietnam and am a veteran of the battle of Khe Sanh.

I have a Navy Marine Corps Medal and 3 Purple Hearts. I was a police officer for 27 years & I am also Uncle Louie. You sit there in the class and say I am a "stupid idiot". Please feel free to come to Texas and say this to my face. You not only disrespected my Marine Corps and my fellow veterans you were disrespecting my great nephew. You are a coward who gets off on controlling your students. When really your that guy that couldn't cut it and choose to be an ass to our impressionable youth. MEMORIES FROM THE WEB: SENT BY RAY CALHOUN

From Ray Calhoun. 56 years ago this Sunday I was with my Marine buddies that had been with me in Vietnam for some 9 months. We were flown in on an emergency basis to take part in the first of the hill fights above and around the fire base Khe Sanh. Just located inside the borders of Laos and North Vietnam. A force recon patrol had been obliterated my a major NVA force. We landed and set out to find anything left of the patrol and found nothing but dead marines, some had been decapitated. We set up for the night at the the base of Hill 881 South. During the night we could hear screaming from Marines being tortured.

On 100% all night long we prepped for assaulting the hills. We were TAD to another battalion 3/9. We were Mike company of 3/3. Our experienced company CO was on R&R and we had a temporary captain fly in from a sea going operation. Early in the morning we found out our company was point for the operation. We all looked at each other in a bit of shock as this was a mission we were in support and now leading? An hour before dawn we were then told our platoon would be the point platoon and then our squad being the most experienced would be point. The 10 of us just looked at each other in disbelief. Point for a battalion, almost a thousand Marines. Randy our best point man looked at me and said if I go up there I'm dead. Randy was on his second tour and the best we had, little, agile and smart. We filled our canteens in the creek in total silence. During that time another squad member claimed he was sick and couldn't possibly make the climb. He was dropped and I told Randy it was okay as he was slow and a lousy shot. I told Randy I'd be right behind him.

We started the climb and stopped after an hour to get some water and listen up. The water tasted funny and we realized it was pink because the NVA had thrown the guys they tortured and killed into our creek. We were very pissed and maybe a little possessed. On we went in single file. As we neared the summit we noticed some logs in our path just as the NVA opened their ambush. We didn't understand that we were dialed into a killing zone. We ducked for cover behind the logs and their mortars started dropping on us with deadly accuracy. A perfect ambush.

I was the fourth man back. Randy was killed immediately with 2 rounds to the chest. Tommy was number 2 and took a round in the stomach and crawled off in the grass. Milt was number 3 killed by rounds in the neck and head. The platoon commander Buzz was right behind me and killed with a mortar round that also hit me and the radio man Don number 6. The next fire team rushed up but we're butchered. The gun team tried to come up with the M-60 but they all were shot. Some lived and I recall doing a tracheotomy on the gunner with a round lodged in his throat. Corpsman came forward and did all they could but a couple of them were KIAs as well. Everyone was hit at least once, Don the radio operator was hit with the mortar that killed the lieutenant and then protected me by rolling near a grenade taking the blast in his side. We were then trying to do a tourniquet on a marine that lost a leg and he turns to me and says what are they going to do next, shoot me? Bang he gets shot, I take a bullet to the helmet that spins around in the liner and lodges in the back of the head. We come around to see our man who lost his leg had bled out.

The rental company commander radios and ordered us to withdraw. Don and I look at each other and respond "how in the fuck could we possibly do that Captain? Get your ass us here."

We're shooting snipers, throwing grenades in machine gun bunkers, jumping in and out of the bunkers as we realized they were being replaced by men from tunnels, were shooting enemy running past us looking for bigger targets on and on. Lasted several hours but seemed like seconds. The most brutal experience I have ever experienced.

We were saved by our brothers from below fighting their way up. We screamed at them to get down and we saw 14 of them die trying to help us. We lost 41 KIA and almost 100 WIA.

I write this because I'm now 75. I've never put it into writing and thought maybe I should. If you recall the 3 of us who survived were each awarded the Silver Star as our story became known. This is just my version and memory. Like a traffic accident every one has a different perspective.

Remember the Marines from April 30, 1967. Ray Calhoun

2009 the KSV Scholarship Foundation started with 6 applicants and has risen to an average of 25 applicants each of the last three years. Many of the student scholars have finished 4 years of post secondary education to successfully achieve their selected bachelors degrees due in part to the support from Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc ..

In this, the 2023-24 school year, we have received 6 applicants for a grand tally of 179 young scholars in 11 years who have benefitted from the KSV Scholarship Fund. Over $110,000 in generous donations from the Khe Sanh Veterans Brotherhood and proceeds from the reunion silent auctions have kept the Foundation healthy. However, the individual awards have trended lower due to the increased volume of applicants vs. reduced donation levels.

The Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. Scholarship Foundation is now in its twelfth successful year of providing financial support for children and grandchildren of paid up members of Khe SanhVeterans, Inc.

Life goes on at Con Thien, despite the whirl of incoming artillery shells. Marines live, and often die, in a small community where sand-bagged bunkers are houses and winding trenches are the streets. While communist fire has decreased because of shattering American firepower and aerial bombardment, Con Thien is as it always was—muddy, miserable, dangerous. (UPI)

Tom Manconi, who was leader of the weapons squad, is the one in the middle (his back to the camera) with his flak jacket on. The Marine ducking into our bunker was "Truck" Dishong. Later that month I replaced the Senior Corpsman, Doc Smith, who was killed when the command bunker took a direct hit. Con Thien was subjected to some of the worst incoming barrages of the war. Our next assignment was at Khe Sanh for a 77 day siege which was one of the bloodiest battles of the war. 28 men of this Platoon were killed in that battle.

You have just put in writing what many of us went through at Khe Sanh. As you stated it is important to document our battles there. RAY RECEIVING HIS SILVER STAR

CITATION:

The President of the United States of America takes pleasure in presenting the Silver Star to Lance Corporal Lester R. Calhoun, Jr. (MCSN: 2197670), United States Marine Corps, for conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity in action against the enemy while serving as a M-79 Grenadier with Company M, Third Battalion, Third Marines, Third Marine Division in connection with combat operations against the enemy in the Republic of Vietnam on 30 April 1967. Lance Corporal Calhoun's company (-) was advancing to secure Hill 881 South in the first Battle of Khe Sanh when a numerically superior enemy force attacked and inflicted heavy casualties on his platoon. Advancing with the Platoon Headquarters, Lance Corporal Calhoun was rendered temporarily unconscious from an enemy mortar barrage that killed the Platoon Leader and severely wounded the Radio Operator.

When he regained consciousness he assisted in medevacing casualties to a bomb crater and providing effective counter-fire. Repeated enemy attacks inflicted heavy casualties and created a gap in the Marine defensive line. Recognizing the danger of possible enemy penetration, he attacked an enemy bunker complex and destroyed four positions with accurate M-79 fire. He then advanced to a position too close to fire his M-79, but delivered M-16 suppression fire and threw grenades into more enemy bunkers, thus preserving the line. As Marine artillery strikes temporarily prevented an enemy counterattack, Lance Corporal Calhoun again exposed himself to danger by moving throughout the battlefield to assist the wounded, collect and redistribute weapons and ammunition, and secure battle dressings from the dead to treat the wounded. Lance Corporal Calhoun persevered despite grenade and mortar explosions until receiving a severe head wound that rendered him unconscious for a second time. Amazingly, he recovered yet again and continued to fight the enemy. Lance Corporal Calhoun's courageous actions in disregarding his own safety and collecting and redistributing critical resources enabled his platoon to continue to fight and directly led to the Marine line holding. By his resolute determination, selfless sacrifice, and unwavering dedication to duty, Lance Corporal Calhoun reflected great credit upon himself and upheld the highest traditions of the Marine Corps the United States Naval Service.

OBIT

MAURICE L. COLLIN, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN

It is with profound sadness but many wonderful memories that we share the passing of Moe Collin. Born in Frenchville, ME on March 22, 1948, he was the son of Lucien Collin and Therese (Pelletier) Collin. He spent most of his childhood making mischief in Lewiston, ME, New Britain, CT and Frog Hollow in Hartford. At 17 he joined the Marine Corps, a decision that would profoundly change the course of his life.

He had many adventures in Iceland and Cuba before being wounded in 1968 at Khe Sanh, Republic of Vietnam, for which he received a Purple Heart. After a year in the hospital and disability retirement from the military,

He was employed as an auto body mechanic and postman to support his family before making the service of disabled veterans his life's work. Through the Disabled American Veterans and the CT Dept. of Veterans Affairs he devoted his life to making sure other veterans received the benefits they deserved. He retired from the position of Acting Commissioner of Veterans Affairs for the State of CT and was inducted into the CT Veterans Hall of Fame, an honor of which he was most proud. He continued helping vets through the DAV of CT, the Rocky Hill vet's Center, the Newington VA Veteran's Clothing Room, Veterans Base Camp and The Eastern CT Veterans Community Center.

He was a life member of the Disabled American Veterans and the Vietnam Veterans of America, and a member of the American Legion and Marine Corp League. Moe enjoyed traveling to new places, especially those of natural beauty, and loved going to all types of live performances with his wife and friends. He loved his family dearly and tried to be the best father, brother, Pepere and husband possible.

He lived his life with the philosophy of "every day is a gift" and said it often. He loved classic cars and listening to the Oldies, especially his beloved Beatles. He enjoyed a big bowl of chocolate anything. Most of all, he loved just sitting by the lake with a beer, chatting with his family and friends and enjoying the peace it brought to him. He is survived by his wife of 30 years, Leila (Beman) Collin, his brother Ronald Collin and his wife Kathryn of Manchester, CT, his son Marc Collin of Vernon, CT and his partner Karen Rock, his son Bryan Collin of Colchester, CT, grandchildren Alex Collin, Renee Collin, Francis Collin, and Gabriel Collin. He leaves his sister-in-law Janet Beman, his close friend Lula Oakley and many other dear friends and relatives whom he loved and cherished.

Graveside service were held Monday, May 15, 2023 at 1PM with full military honors in the State Veterans Cemetery in Middletown, CT. Moe's family would like to thank Dr. Timothy Hong, Dr. Oscar Serrano and the incredible staff of Hartford Healthcare for their wise and compassionate care. In lieu of flowers, donations to the Disabled American Veterans or St. Jude Children's Research Hospital are gratefully appreciated. And please, the next time you see a vet, take the time to tell them "thank you". It means much more than you know.

THOMAS O'GRADY, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN

Tom O'Grady, a decorated combat veteran of the Vietnam War, passed away on April 3, 2023, at the age of 73. He was born on July 22, 1949, and spent his formative years between Broadus, MT and Western Washington.

Tom attended High School in Broadus from 1966 to 1967. Only leaving his family ranch (Earley) when he was called to the Vietnam War.

Tom was a Marine and served his country with bravery and distinction in the Vietnam War. As a forward observer, Tom called in a Ring of Steel around his fellow marines during a retrograde after being nearly overrun by the enemies far superior numbers. This swift and skillful act of bravery saved many lives and earned Tom meritorious corporal.

He survived the Battle of Khe Sanh, where 6000 marines held off an assault by 30000 enemy forces. Tom designed and built a bunker that was designed by combat engineers, Tom's bunker was confiscated by the offices and staff so Tom had to build another one similar to shelter in, and built it twice as fast. Tom loved the Marine Corps and was very proud of his accomplishments as a Marine.

He was a true hero, receiving three Purple Heart medals and a Silver Star.

After his military service, Tom returned home and devoted himself to his family. He was first married to Linda Sterling, and they had a child together named Missy. However, their marriage ended in divorce. In 1996, Tom met the love of his life, Grace, and they were married. Together, they had a daughter named Tommy O'Grady, and Tom cherished his role as a father. Together he, Grace, and Tommy lived together in Northwest Washington until his death.

Tom Loved to return to Powder River County regularly. He loved visiting his brother Ben in Savage, MT and his brother Lester in Powderville on the homestead. He disliked interstate highways, but this never stopped him from finding small two lane roads to drive his 1950 Ford from his home in Western Washington all the way to Eastern Montana.

Tom is survived by his loving wife, Grace, their daughter Tommy, his daughter Missy, and his brothers Ed, Lester, Benjamin, and sisters, Connie, Colleen, Marilyn, Barbie, and numerous nephews and nieces. He will be deeply missed by his family, friends, and all who knew him. He is welcomed home by his sister Jane, mother Norma and father.

No formal service is planned currently. There will be a celebration of his life planned at a later date.

Chuck said that he had kept the cover locked away for 45 years and now it was time the cover should be with Buddy 's hometown, family, and friends.

Chuck handed the helmet cover to Buddy's friend Paul Richter for safekeeping until it could be displayed properly in a place of care and honor. I recognized that Chuck's act of presenting Buddy's helmet cover to Paul and the town of Maxwell was more than just transferring some possession of the property. It was a spiritual release, a dedication, a shared memory and memorial of an item of hallowed significance to be forever treasured. It was part of Buddy 's spirit and represented his life and sacrifice in battle and that significance had been tucked away for 45 years in a corner of Chuck's heart and soul.

Paul told me there were efforts under development to build an appropriate incased memorial with memorabilia dedicated to Buddy which would include the now gifted helmet cover along with his military Bronze Star, Purple Heart, military photograph, and additional items relating to Buddy already on display at the American Legion. The new display would not only be a tribute to Buddy but also to the many who have served in the Armed Forces and a reminder to all that, "Freedom Is Not Free."

Each year I spend a little time watching the Indianapolis 500 Race, I've always enjoyed watching the powerful vehicles race to the finish and the skill of the drivers, something I would love to have the opportunity to enjoy in person. When I was in Vietnam and serving at Khe Sanh I served with Fred Louis Thomas, Jr. Fred was from Indianapolis and one great Marine. Never complaining, brave and disciplined always willing to help, someone I knew I could and did trust with my life.

Fred and I talked about the Indianapolis Race, and he told me that when we got home, I should come out from California and visit him. His house was so close to the racetrack he could hear the cars going around the track and the roar of the crowd. I thought that was a great idea and thanked him for the invitation but at the time I was unsure if either of us would survive long enough to realize that possibility. Tragically, Fred was Killed in Vietnam on February 23, 1969, but I never forgot him and to this day I am thankful I had the opportunity to spend a few months getting to know this most generous and proud Marine.

FREEDOM IS NOT FREE
By Craig W. Tourte
HQ BTRY 1/13

Everyone who knew William Denman called him Buddy and that nickname appropriately described who he was. Buddy grew up in the town of Maxwell, located in Northern California. Maxwell is the quintessential example of rural small-town America where everyone knows your name, family and most of your relatives if they have lived around those parts for a few generations. There would be no reason for the road traveler to take the exit off Interstate 5 and drive into the little farm community of 500 where most folks live in quiet obscurity. Some have come and stayed and raised their families while many others have moved along and are now mostly forgotten.

From the Virtual Wall - "Dau Tieng, Tay Ninh Provence, 03 Nov 1966 - elements of the 196th Infantry Brigade and the 25th Infantry Division got into a heated fight with entrenched and bunkered VC troops, a fight that grew into a full-fledged battle fought over a three-day period. Landing Zone Lima Zulu, slightly north of where 1st Bn, 27th Infantry fought on 03/04 Nov, drew some of the heaviest fighting beginning after C Company, 2/27 Inf, was inserted at about 1400 on 04 Nov."

Buddy was a popular kid, handsome and athletic with blond hair and light blue eyes and he possessed an independent and adventuresome spirit many admired. Buddy had a difficult and tragic family life; there were many challenges and hardships including a grievous personal experience between his parents that he witnessed at a very young age. After he graduated from high school Buddy volunteered for the Army and attended boot camp at Fort Ord located in Monterey California. He thrived in the Army life with direction, discipline and a sense of belonging. He found a new beginning, writing to many friends about the respect and admiration he had for the warriors he had met, respected and hoped one day to emulate.

In the summer of 1966, I was living with my aunt and uncle in Maxwell and looking forward to going off to Marine Corps boot camp. Going into the Marine Corps was an adventure I was looking forward to even though I knew I would be deployed to Vietnam shortly after my training was completed. Buddy had completed his Army training and was home visiting his mother and sister and preparing for his deployment to Vietnam. I went over to his house with my cousin and walked into his bedroom where a few of his friends were visiting with him. It was mid-morning and he was still in bed, stating that he wanted to rest as much as he could after all the training and before his deployment. He was in high spirits and looking forward to serving his country and all of what that entailed. We talked about his military training and what he expected while in Vietnam. I sensed that he too was in pursuit of action and eager for a new experience. I told him that he would be returning from Vietnam before me and when I returned home we would share and compare experiences. I wished him luck and was a little envious that he would get to the war before me. I left knowing he was doing what he wanted to do, and I was looking forward to becoming a United States Marine. I entered Marine Corps Boot Camp (Platoon 1145) on October 29, 1966.

When Buddy arrived in Vietnam his Sergeant asked him what he wanted to be called, William or Bill. His response was "My friends call me Buddy." His Sergeant said, "Then Buddy it is." He was assigned to A Company, 2nd Battalion, 27th Infantry (Wolfhounds), 25 Infantry Division. Within a short period of time, he went into combat against the experienced, prepared and determined Viet Cong forces. Tragically only three and a half months after arriving in Vietnam he was killed in action.

"C/2/27 moved south from LZ Lima Zulu, intending to link with 1/27, but could go only a few hundred meters before being stopped by VC dug into a tree line. Unable to move forward, with enemy troops infiltrating to their rear, the battalion and company commanders dead, and under fire from three sides, C/2/27 pulled together after nightfall, using a left flank displacement to get out of the "horseshoe" and avoid encirclement. The maneuver worked, and C/2/27 held out through the night amidst the sporadic hand-to-hand fighting. By 1030 on 05 Nov, Alpha 1/27 fought through and relieved C/2/27." At the same time, HHC and A Company, 2/27, was coming into LZ Lima Zulu, intending to take the VC from the rear, pounding them against the anvil formed by A/1/27 and C/2/27."

"05 November 1966 - While the engagements cost the VC dearly, with several hundred known dead, the US infantrymen paid a high price with 50 men killed in action over the three-day period. William (Buddy) Denman was one of the twenty Americans who was killed at LZ Lima Zulu on the 3rd day of the fight."

The community cemetery of Maxwell is located a mile west of town. William Luther Denman (August 25, 1946 - November 5, 1966) is buried near the flagpole; his final resting place is identified with a brass United States Military Headstone. He was the first to be killed from the small town of Maxwell and County of Colusa during the Vietnam War. He had the largest funeral ever attended with vehicles stretching for a couple of miles leading to the cemetery.

A few years ago, I placed a small note on the A Company, 2nd Battalion, 27th Infantry Wolfhound website regarding Buddy, just so others would know he had someone who continued to remember him and his sacrifice for this wonderful country.

Like the Khe Sanh Veterans websites - Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc & Khe Sanh Veterans Home Page - which have contributed to bringing together those who fought in the battles on the hills and the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh, the Wolfhounds website is followed by those with comparable experiences.

Several months ago, I received an email in response to that little notation I had written on the Wolfhound web site. A former Vietnam and Wolfhound Veteran Robert Park contacted me and said that he was with Buddy during that battle and continues to remember Buddy 's death with great sadness. Robert said he was the one who asked Buddy what name he wanted to be called. Having been in the country longer and with more experience, Robert felt an obligation to watch out for Buddy and has carried with him all these years a feeling of responsibility for Buddy's death during the battle. A few years ago, Robert had come to Maxwell to visit Buddy's grave and say goodbye but was unable to locate his grave at the cemetery. He asked around town, but no one seemed to recall who Buddy was nor were they familiar with the location of his grave. Robert has vowed to return someday to say his final farewell.

A few of weeks after my email communication with Robert I received an email from Chuck Dean, another Vietnam and Wolfhound Veteran who told me he had been in communication with Robert and that he had been with Buddy when he fell and was planning on driving to California and visit Buddy's grave. I shared both emails with people I knew were close to Buddy while he was growing up.

Email from Chuck Dean - "I plan on visiting Buddy's grave in May of this year (2012), something I have tried to face for 45 years. Buddy and I were very close friends in Vietnam. We were both Grenadiers in A Co 2/27 Wolfhounds. I was with Buddy when he fell. I only wish I could have done these years ago but have only been able to come to grips with Vietnam the last couple of years. I have hooked up with some of the other "Hounds" such as Robert within the last year and have been steadily working my way out of the shadows. I will be in the Maxwell area to visit Buddy's gravesite in May. Buddy will always be part of the band of brothers called the Wolfhounds and will never be forgotten. His memory will live on as long as there is one Wolfhound alive."

"Freedom Is Not Free" Reads the program pamphlet provided at the Memorial Day Service held at the Maxwell Cemetery, May 28, 2012 - I attended the Memorial Day Service with 100 or more people from the community sponsored by American Legion Post 218 (Maxwell) - Ronald Azevedo, Commander. The Maxwell High School Band played the Star-Spangled Banner and one of the high school girls sang the National Anthem. The service included a bugler playing taps and a rifle volley "Salute to Deceased Veterans." I didn't notice any politicians or back slapping significant officials, just local folks with moist eyes and heavy hearts who attended out of respect and honor for those who served and for those who had fallen.

Chuck Dean arrived for the service and was shown the location of Buddy 's grave by Paul Richter (1st Lt. U.S. Army) and Gary Bowen (1949-2013), a veteran of the U.S. Navy, who were childhood friends of Buddy 's, there was a large floral wreath standing at the headstone sent by Robert Park in the name of all the Wolfhounds Buddy served with. Chuck said that he had driven out from Alabama to finally say goodbye. We had a long conversation where he reflected on the battle and Buddy's loss. Chuck said that Buddy was just a few steps behind him when he was shot and killed. He walked over to Buddy, turned him over and saw that he was deceased. Chuck said that he had the canvas helmet cover Buddy had worn that day. I held the now fad-

I held the now faded green camouflage helmet cover and observed written in black ink Buddy's blood type, unit, and the words "Pat" for his high school girlfriend Patricia. Chuck said that he had kept the cover locked away for 45 years and now it was time the cover should be with Buddy 's hometown, family, and friends.

It was part of Buddy 's spirit and represented his life and sacrifice in battle and that significance had been tucked away for 45 years in a corner of Chuck's heart and soul.

Paul told me there were efforts under development to build an appropriate incased memorial with memorabilia dedicated to Buddy which would include the now gifted helmet cover along with his military Bronze Star, Purple Heart, military photograph, and additional items relating to Buddy already on display at the American Legion. The new display would not only be a tribute to Buddy but also to the many who have served in the Armed Forces and a reminder to all that, "Freedom Is Not Free."

ROD FINK ALPHA CO 1/9 SENIOR CORPSMAN

This photo near the DMZ, was of the men of 1st Platoon of Alpha Company that I was assigned to as Corpsman. I was moved up to Senior Corpsman of the company shortly after this. 28 of them were killed in a battle at Khe Sanh less than 6 months later. I could have been with them. In that battle, their hill just 500 meters from the main base was mostly overrun during the night. When it was light enough we went up with a reinforced platoon to retake the hill. It was the worst day of the war for me. Also the saddest.

MEMORIAL DAY

Surviving Marines from Charlie Battery 1st Battalion Marines, the main artillery support unit for the 3rd Battalion 26th Marines in the Vietnam War, presented their wreath at the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier at Arlington National Cemetery in Virginia on Sept. 17. Staff Sgt. Paul Choclis, right front, of Marion Heights, was honored to be one of the four presenters of the unit's wreath, along with Ron Hoffman of Wisconsin, who Is standing next to Choclis; Jack Poeske, second row on right, and Jim Jasmund, of Michigan, next to Poeske. Ron. Hoffman is the author of the book "To Hear Silence," a true, almost day-by-day account of combat experiences In Vietnam from,1966 to 1967.

MARINE STAFF SERGEANT PAUL CHOCLIS, OF MARION HEIGHTS, WAS REUNITED RECENTLY WITH COMRADES FROM LIMA COMPANY 3RD BATTALION 26TH MARINES WHO SERVED IN THE U.S. MARINES DURING THE VIETNAM WAR. .

The reunion was held at corpsman William "Doc" Miller's cabin deep in the mountain forests of Potter County, known as "God's Country" where, as Choclis said, bear and deer outnumber the residents and cell phones are useless.

Better known in Marine circles as "The Filthy Few" because of their contact with the enemy and length of time spent in jungles and on battlefields, these Marines endured and survived a real life "Dirty Dozen" experience in the Vietnam. war.

In the spring/summer of 1966, due to the escalation of the Vietnam War, a specially trained regiment of Marine Corps (Spearhead 5th Division) was activated at camp Pendleton, Calif. 'The 26th Marines special landing force was one of the legendary units to fight and die at the bloody battle for Iwo Jima in 1945.

In 1946,the 26th Marines were disbanded and remained dormant for 20 years before rising from the ashes like a mythological Phoenix to answer the nation's call in the Vietnam war.

Before entering the Pacific Theatre of Operations the Marines and "C" Battery1st Battalion 13th Marines encountered a violent typhoon off the coast of Okinawa in 1966. The storm contained wind speeds between 100 and 200 miles per hour: The USS Lemawee weathered the storm for hours while dealing with 20 to 30-degree rolls to port and starboard. 'Typhoon Ida then hit the coast of Japan and claimed 800 lives.

The Marines endured a baptism under fire in an ancient battlefield, called Co Bi Thanh Tan Valley After a five-day battle engaging Viet Cong and North Vietnamese Army Soldiers estimated at 4,000 men by Marine intelligence , the area was named Camp Evans after the first member of Lima Company killed in action. The Marines went on to endure the harsh punishing monsoon season of 1966-1967 and survived the mortar/rocket attacks and fire fights at places known as Dongha Hue/ Phu Bai and battles at Hill 689, Con Tien and Khe Sanh.

Several of the Marines also served with units of the 9th Marines such as 2/9 Marines or "Hell in a Helmet" and l/9 Marines known as the "Walking Dead"

For extraordinary action against enemy forces in the Republic of South Vietnam, the Marines of Lima Company 3/26 and its main artillery support unit

"C" Battery 1/13 received Vietnam's · Cross of Gallantry and the nation's highest combat unit award-:: the Presidential Unit Citation.

Happy to be alive and having survived a multitude of traumatic events in the Viet-nam War; Choclis said these sons ot World War II heroes remain Semper Fidelis to our nation, the Marine Corps and each other.

SOUTH DAKOTA BRIDGE TO BE DEDICATED IN HONOR OF U.S. NAVY HOSPITAL CORPSMAN SECOND CLASS CHARLES T. LANGENFELD, KILLED IN ACTION DURING THE SIEGE OF KHE SANH, DURING THE VIETNAM WAR, 1968.

PIERRE, S.D. – The South Dakota Department of Veterans Affairs will be hosting a State Bridge Dedication Ceremony to honor U.S. Navy Hospital Corpsman Second Class Charles T. Langenfeld.

The ceremony will be Saturday, July 1, 2023, at 2:00 p.m. (CT) at the Redlin Art Center in Watertown (1200 33rd Street NE #310).

The Willow Creek Bridge on East US HWY 212, near Watertown, will be dedicated to HM2 Langenfeld.

Known to family and friends as Charlie or Chuck, Langenfeld was known to those serving with him in Vietnam as "Doc". On April 17, 1968, after a 77-day siege, described as some of the worst fighting in the Vietnam conflict, a standdown was called. Having spent 77 days without a bath, Langenfeld and his troops left Hill 861a to bathe in a stream nearby. On their way back to their base camp, eight hours before Langenfeld was to leave for home, he was killed by enemy aerial mortar rounds.

Naming bridges in honor of our combat veterans who died while serving their country is an initiative of Governor Kristi Noem and the South Dakota Departments of Military, Transportation, and Veterans Affairs. So far 21 Bridges have been named to honor fallen heroes.

"Whenever and wherever this nation has called, in times of darkness and danger, as well as in times of peace and prosperity, veterans have been there and have proudly carried the torch of liberty for all to see," said Greg Whitlock, secretary of the South Dakota Department of Veterans Affairs.

WILLIAM MAVES, MARINE VETERAN OF THE BATTLE OF KHE SANH ON HILL 861A DURING THE SIEGE, REPRESENTED THE KHE SANH VETERANS

"Our fallen heroes are no longer with us, but their memories live on in the hearts of their loved ones and our state," said Whitlock. "Naming our South Dakota bridges in honor of our fallen gives us the opportunity for remembrance, reflection, and respect — for honoring the men and women who gave their lives in service to this nation. They cherished liberty and loved freedom enough to lay down their lives to preserve our way of life."

RONALD RAYNER
KSV CHAPLAIN

I am 75 years old today. 55 years since I did not expect to see my 20th birthday after the regimental exec officer told me to expect 20,000 NVA to be charging right at me on the north side of the east end of the Khe Sanh runway. I was part of a reaction unit from A Co. 1/26 to fill in for ARVN Rangers. About two weeks in country and I was a squad leader for 6 guys. I also, already had my own M-60 machine gun.

I arrived in Khe Sanh about February 4, 1968 after having spent a few days on the airstrip in Phu Bi waiting for a flight to Khe Sanh. I was assigned to 2nd platoon, Alpha Company, 1stBattalion, 26th Marines. I just had to catch a ride up to Hill 861 to be with them. I spent about two weeks in the company rear burning poop, digging trenches, filling sand bags and burying artillery shells from the exploded ammo dump (pages 228 & 229, War Without Heroes).

On about February 23, about a dozen Marines from "A" company rear who were waiting to catch rides to our platoons were formed into a reaction unit and replaced an ARVN unit that had been hit the night before. So with a little over two weeks in-country, I was made squad leader and a M-60 machine gunner in a reaction force assigned to the north side of the east end of the airstrip at Khe Sanh. I only had the runway and ARVNs to my right. To my front was barbed wire, claymores and NVA soldiers. We were armed with our issued M-16s and with Army equipment salvaged from a communications bunker that had taken a direct hit from a rocket. The Army equipment consisted of an M-60 machine gun, rocket launcher and grenade launcher.

I believe the Regimental Executive officer, a Major anyway, escorted us to our section of the trench. He explained that it was expected that 20,000 NVA soldiers would be coming down the runway right at us. Then he something like "we were being backed up by a bunch of Ontos on the other end of the runway. When the NVA attacked we were supposed to watch for a single 50 caliber tracer round which would signal the Ontos were going to shoot bee hive rounds from their 105 recoilless rifles to clear the runway. We should duck when we saw the tracer.

PFC. Mitchel from Tennessee as the other squad leader. John L. Lewis was in Mitchel's squad and he is pictured in War Without Heroes on page 240 with a Heart royal flush in his helmet band. Melvin McCoy, Terry Hughes, Johnny Vaught, Elaterio "Chico" Gonzales, Jim Wilkins, Vincent Begay, and Okie (Oklahoma truck driver) were among the many Marines that spent time with "F Troop".

A French camera crew did visit us and members of "F Troop" show up in some of the Khe Sanh videos. One of the Time-Life videos showed that the big attack on the end of the runway was forming one night when the ground sensors detected them and arty and air power pretty much wiped them out.
Thank you to Captain Baig for saving my life and to Michael Archer for the information.

In 2017 I read Michael Archer's book, The Gunpowder Prince. It explained how Marine Captain Mirza Munir Baig had saved my life by pretty much wiping out the 20,000 NVA I had been told about. It had been 49 years before I learned who saved me.

CORPORAL JOE R. TAYLOR

Corporal, Joe R. Taylor, served during the Vietnam War at Khe Sanh in 1968, for which he earned the Bronze Star. He was born during a snowstorm on February 7, 1948 to Eli Taylor and Martha Coffee and left on the wind in the afternoon of March 31, 2023, to walk up the road to see the Creator Of All Things. He was a writer, a joker, a pain in the butt, a husband, and father. He left behind two daughters, three grandchildren, and one great grandson.

whom do I count among the dead?

Only those I have killed with intention? Or, the accidental as well?

like the children of my childhood and I helped place on buses to vanish in cold morning's light;

among whom were best friends and who never came back from summer vacation and Christmas holidays; deserting me to find my own way through summer's heat and cold winter's night.

were they victims by accident, or by design? Creatures sent to hurt and cripple my soul.

among their luggage were pieces of my heart and I kept giving because I was too young to know.

whom do I count among the dead?

only those I have killed with intention? Or, the accidental as well?

like all the relationships I entered and abandoned as though visiting an empty house; people seeking to lessen the suffering by taking refuge in a man who had been through hell.

If only our wounds were festers easily noted and lanced of poison, then bandaged to heal

We are all the walking wounded, limping along as we try to ease the pain of others.

When all the dead are buried, I will sing the death song and cry in their honor.

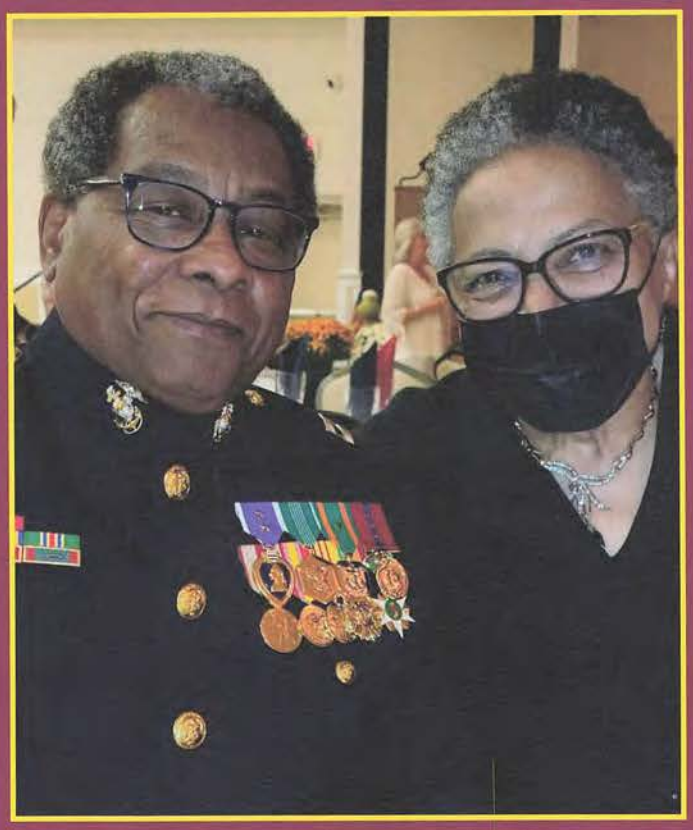
MAGNOLIA MARINE NAMED PURPLE HEART PATRIOT

MAGNOLIA — The 2023 Purple Heart Patriot Project, part of the National Purple Heart Honor Mission, has named the Rev. Carlton Cannon its honoree representing Delaware.



A Vietnam veteran and former Marine Corps captain, the Rev. Cannon will join the other awardees for a weeklong tribute tour of New York City, in honor of their service and sacrifice.

He served during the siege at Khe Sanh and "TET 1968" before being wounded in combat. Presently, he is a deputation representative for the Church of God's Ministry to the Military.

The Rev. Cannon also is a member of the Dover chapter of the Military Officers Association of America, the Marine Corps League, the Military Order of the Purple Heart, the Veterans of Foreign Wars and the American Legion.

"God has blessed me to stand with other Purple Heart recipients who represent the very best of our nation, having put their lives on the line for America and the freedoms we all cherish," he said.

Eugenia Thornton, president of the Dover branch of MOAA, praised the Rev. Cannon's dedication.

"Capt. Cannon's unassuming demeanor belies his amazing accomplishments, both in uniform and out," she said. "We are so proud Carlton was selected for special recognition by a national veterans organization. He is extremely deserving."

In addition to seeing combat during the Vietnam War, the Marine served at Camp Lejeune, North Carolina; in the Navy barracks in Philadelphia; at Twentynine Palms, California; and in Iwakuni and Okinawa, Japan.

Delaware Veterans Commissioner Doug Hudson, another member of the Military Officers Association of America, also applauded the accomplishment.

"Congratulations to Rev. Carlton Cannon on his well-deserved recognition and service to our great nation," he said.

COUREAGEOUS SHARING LIFE IN SERVING SERVING LIFE IN SHARING VICTORIOUS

FROM THE WEB BY LISA GODDARD

I Just wanted to say Happy Birthday to my Dad. Today is his 88th birthday He started sharing his experience in Vietnam with me when he was invited to a MASS 3 50yr Vietnam reunion in 2018. If any of you ever met him or worked with he or his team, I would love to hear a story to share with him. Dad worked for MASS-3,1st MAW and started his service in Vietnam as the S-3 in April 67. He volunteered just to recon Khe Sanh in early Jan 68 to see if an ASRT could be set on site to run close air support.

He was welcomed and was assisted by the Asst S-4 of the 26 Marines (name unknown). He found the terrain acceptable for emplacement and sent his ASRT team and equipment in on 16 Jan 68. On 19 Jan he was asked to take a DASC into Khe Sanh and arrived the afternoon of 21 Jan, with the base just leveled and still smoldering.

He, his team and new wireman crew set up the DASC above ground in the med C, abandoned, destroyed hut near the Grey sector. They operated at that location for a day and a half when the AirForce, Maj Hartenbower, invited his operation into their old club/ready room bunker, underground. The DASC was located next to the AF bunker which was next to the MedC bunker...we have found a few photos we believe were his bunker. His ASRT and TPQ10 were located near the area of 1/13 and had a view of FOB3.

He tells stories of working closely with Capt Pho of the 37th ARVN, meeting Lownds, the AO, and Baig (with the FSCC), attending morning briefings and recognizing the 26Marine S-3 (upper classman from the Naval Academy), working in a trenchline in front of some loud, rhythmic (possibly) 105s~grey sector~, being swept off his feet and thrown in a ditch the day the PX was blown up (it rained cigars on him!).

He met and pissed off General Moymeyer (amongst many others), General Krulak dropping into his bunker to get a 'pass' (minus his aide?), chasing the press out of his bunker- destroying a camera, trips to get over to the ASRT in heavy fog (using communication lines to follow), his LangVei ops and searching for NVA tanks, communications with MoonGlow and Spooky, his men and his defense coordinator, the ASRT bad drop investigation, being intrigued with an unusual, fortified Seabee bunker, and his exit on or about 1Mar68 (his men~both ASRT/DASC, wouldn't leave due to take off dangers), but he took one 26 Marine out of Khe Sanh with him, who he and the S-4 assigned as exit security during aircraft loading (you needed a signed pass)~this man worked with an injured foot/ankle and his identity is still unknown.

I would not be celebrating with Dad today if it weren't for every single one of you. You did your job, you tackled my Dad and shielded him from harm, as you did for many and you held the base. I am one daughter/child of thousands of yours who recognizes your work and your sacrifice. You are in my thoughts as I raise a glass today in our birthday celebration. Thank you

If any of you ever met him or worked with he or his team, I would love to hear a story to share with him.

OBIT

HN TONY MILAZZO US NAVY, KHE SANH VETERAN, KILO CO 3/4

Anthony "Tony" Milazzo, lovingly known as "Doc", died Wednesday, September 13, 2023 following a brief illness. He was 76. Born in Paterson, Tony was raised there, and graduated from East Side High School in 1964. He attended South Florida University on scholarship for one year before enlisting in the Navy. Recognizing his intelligence, the military sent him for training at medic school, and he became a Marine, serving with Kilo CO 3/4 in at Danang, Cam Lo and Khe Sanh from November of 1967 through November of 1968.

For heroic actions in battle, he was awarded a Purple Heart. He only completed his time with the Marines serving as a medic at Camp LeJeune in North Carolina. After being honorably discharged, he finished his education at William Paterson University in Wayne, and soon secured a career as a shipping manager for a biomedical firm. While at a mutual friend's party in Paterson, Tony met Mary Mitro. The couple quickly fell in love, and on September 20, 1975, were married.

Moving to Pompton Plains in 1977, they welcomed the birth of a daughter, Kristen, a few years later. Tony and Mary had a long and loving marriage, though they both had struggles with their health. In 2014, Mary passed away after her own battle with cancer. She has been dearly missed by Tony and Kristen ever since. Following her passing, Tony changed careers, and has since worked for Stryker Orthopedics in Mahwah as their Security Director. He also left Pompton Plains, and moved to West Milford to be closer to his daughter. A proud Marine, Tony was a longtime member of the Marine Corps League in Oakland. Tony is lovingly survived by his daughter, Kristen Milazzo; his cousins, Ellen, Lorraine, Mariellen, Juliann, and Wes (and their children); his best friend, John Cina; his brother and sister in law; many beloved nieces, and nephews; as well as a lot of really great friends. Memorial visitation was held September 23 from 2-5 pm.

FROM DENNIS MANNION

Just got this special photo. Larry McCartney and Rev. Ray Stubbe. Rev. Stubbe was a Navy Chaplain, serving in Vietnam and is remembered by oh, so many. My big brother, Larry, stopped in to visit today. He's that kind of guy - he just shows up wherever he's needed. One of a kind with a heart of gold.

OBIT

CPL JOSE M. PADILLA, USMC DELTA CO 1/26

It is a difficult moment that I message you about the passing of CPL Jose Martin "Marty" Padilla today, Sept. 20 at 1200 in San Antonio, Texas. You will remember Marty as one of the "Original" 1/26 ers that activated & trained at MCB Camp Pendleton (Camp Las Pulgas) before shipping out on the USS Iwo Jima, LPH-2 in August1966.

Marty was probably one of the best squad leaders you could hope for. Wounded twice at the DMZ and Hill 55 he returned home in 1967 to Barstow, CA. I met him there while I worked the Barstow Brig in late 1967-1968 for his grandma's home-made Mexican commida. If I get more info I will forward to you all the arrangements. Semper Fidelis and please pass to other Delta Co. 1/26 Marines of that era.

MARTY PADILLA WAS SIMPLY A HEROIC LEADER OF MARINES.

Marty died from complications of liver cancer from Agent Orange after a valiant 7 month struggle. We had the good grace to talk and remember the Marines of Delta Company 1/26 - First Platoon under the commands of First Lt. Charles Reid Dennis and SSGT Hank "Pineapple" Fernandez, both gravely wounded and evacuated in 1966-67 This comes upon the recent passing of MSGT Henry Pope (August. 16, 2023) in San Jose, CA who is to be buried at Arlington National Cemetery. Colonel Ross Brown.

OBIT

OBIT

THOMAS J. WILLIAMS, USMC KHE SANH VETERAN, HQ CO 2/26

Thomas J. Williams, 75, of Girard, passed away suddenly at his home on Wednesday, May 24, 2023. Tom was born January 21, 1948, in Erie, a son of the late Thomas J. and Marguerite A. (Clark) Williams.

He grew up in Erie and graduated from Erie's Cathedral Prep School in 1966.

America at this time was heavily involved in the war in Vietnam and Tom enlisted in the United States Marine Corps in 1967. Following recruit and infantry training, he deployed to Vietnam with HQ Co. 2nd Battalion, 26th Marine Regiment, 3rd Marine Division. He began his duty assignment at Phu -Bai and was later stationed at Khe Sanh, where he and his fellow Marines were under siege from the Viet Cong from January to April of 1968, eventually beating back the North Vietnamese Army. He continued his deployment following that siege at Dong-Ha, AKA "Rocket City", returning to Camp Lejeune in the fall of 1968.

Tom was awarded the Navy Achievement Medal with Combat "V" Device, the Combat Action Ribbon, the Presidential Unit Citation, the National Defense Service Medal, the Vietnamese Service Medal with 5 Stars and the Vietnam Campaign Medal w/device.

Upon his honorable discharge from the Marine Corps, Tom returned home to Erie, where he attended and graduated from Mercyhurst College (now University), receiving a Bachelor of Arts Degree in Biology. Later receiving a Bachelor of Science Degree from SUNY at Stony Brook in Cardio -Respiratory Science. In the year 2003, he also received a master's degree from Mercyhurst University in Organizational Leadership.

Tom began his employment as soon as he returned home from the Marine Corps. While studying, he worked at St. Vincent Health Center as an orderly. He began his professional career at Hamot Medical Center as a Respiratory Therapist and later Supervisor of Respiratory Therapy and later was promoted to Assistant Director of Cardiopulmonary Services and eventually Director of Cardiopulmonary Services. He was Service Line Leader and Operations Director at the Hamot Heart Institute, where he retired from in 2012.

Tom was a member of St. Jude the Apostle Catholic Church in Erie, where he was a Eucharistic Minister; a life member of the Girard American Legion Post #494 and served as Adjutant for many years. A Life Member of the Billie Simpson VFW Post #470; life member of the Khe Sanh Veterans Organization; The Lake Erie Detachment #293 of the Marine Corps league; was credentialed with the Project Management Institute as a Project Manager Professional in 2010. Tom volunteered at the Christian Cupboard and the PA Medical Reserve Corps. He participated with CERT, Community Response Team, through Erie County's 911 dispatch center.

In addition to his parents, Tom was preceded in death by two brothers, Michael W., and Leo J. "Joey" Williams.

His family includes his wife, Maria C. (Kloecker) Williams, whom he married, April 28, 2001 in Erie; a daughter, Carrie L. Williams (Dan Vogelman)); a son, LTC (R) Sean P. Williams (Nicole Mersch); four sisters, Sheila O'Brien, Julia Himmell (Martin), Maryanne Parsons (Bill Schneider) and Marguerite "Bridget" Williams; a brother, Matthew Williams (Michelle) Chief (FE) USN (R); three grandchildren, Aiden, Noah, and Eva Williams; also many nieces and nephews.

OBIT

RICHARD A. LAIHO, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN, K CO 3/9

He enlisted in the Marine Corps and left for basic training at Parris Island a few weeks after graduation. In February 1967, Ric deployed to Viet Nam as part of the 3rd Battalion, 9th Regiment, Kilo Company, 3rd Division.

During his deployment, the 3rd Division was stationed a few miles south of the Demilitarized Zone ("DMZ") in Quang Tri Province near the border of North Viet Nam. Throughout 1967, Ric's unit participated in intense combat, including action on Hills 861, and 881 North & South in the run up to the 1968 siege of Khe Sanh. In May 1967, Ric was awarded the Purple Heart after sustaining significant wounds during Operation Hickory. Ric was treated in a field hospital for approximately four weeks and then returned to combat. He was awarded his second and third Purple Hearts on September 20th, and September 25th, 1967 after suffering wounds at Con Thien ("The Hill of Angels").

KSV IN THE NEWS

'EVERY NIGHT, IT'S THERE:' VETERAN CREDITS FAITH FOR SURVIVAL IN VIETNAM

Greg Larry glarry@times-news.com

CUMBERLAND — On a warm summer day in 1967, Cpl. Ron Gulbronson found himself on his back and badly injured with dead comrades all around during a mortar attack on his unit in Vietnam.

Gulbronson recounted that dreadful day when he lay on the ground screaming for God's help as his company was being decimated outside the Khe Sanh Combat Base, a Marine Corps outpost used during the Vietnam War.

Gulbronson was the featured speaker Friday at a Veterans Day breakfast sponsored by Calvary Christian Academy in Cresaptown.

Dan Thompson, CCA administrator, said students were asked to invite family or friends that served in the military. Nearly 40 veterans from all branches, ranging from ages 32 to 93, attended.

Lola McGann sang the national anthem and three students — Anna Westrom, Jacob Green and Reagan Getz — gave short speeches extolling democracy and patriotism.

"War is terrible," said Gulbronson, a Purple Heart medal recipient and Mineral County, West Virginia, resident. Purple Hearts honor service members wounded or killed in combat.

After enlisting in the Marine Corps in 1966, Gulbronson found himself stationed in central Vietnam at Khe Sanh near the border with Laos.

"It was 55 years ago is when it hit me," he said. "It was called Khe Sanh, but we called it the butcher shop."

Gulbronson had been elevated to squad leader and for a couple of months his unit did patrols, fighting to take hills around the Khe Sanh air field.

"The first couple months we took three hills and lost 198 (men) and 400 wounded. I didn't get a scratch," he said.

Then toward the end of June 1967 things changed. His unit had just lost 25 men after spending a month on hill 881.

"We had just come off patrol," he said. "A sergeant says to me, 'I hate to tell you this but we're surrounded.' I said, 'Shut up sarge. I got a bunch of new kids with me; they're scared to death now.

"We were surrounded up there by thousands and thousands of NVA (North Vietnamese Army) and there were 600 of us," Gulbronson said, adding that he held up a pocket size version of the New Testament and said, "Thank God I had one of these with me in Vietnam."

Two days later — 1 a.m. on June 27, 1967 — the NVA attack began.

"There was no concertina wire and no mines. It was the east side of the air strip is where it all came from," Gulbronson said. "Somebody started screaming, 'incoming.'"

He said the attack began with mortar rounds, landing in groups of three consecutive rounds. At first they weren't close, but the NVA gunners were dialing in his squad's foxholes, he said.

"Then they put one right in the bomb crater five feet from me," said Gulbronson. His knees were injured in the blast.

"A Marine was screaming his hand was gone. The mortars kept coming. Another of the men had his face blown off," said Gulbronson. "He grabbed my arms and I fell straight back in the hole with him laying on top of me. He was a big boy. We are face to face and I'm trying not to drink his blood.

"I looked up and there was Lt. Larry Bolger ... his head was split open. Then I hear boom, they put another one in ... the exact same place. I couldn't believe I was alive after that second mortar."

Although he didn't know it at the time, Gulbronson had badly damaged knees, a lacerated leg, shrapnel in his head, obscured vision and perforations to his lungs and pericardium.

"I pulled my New Testament out. I was in and out of consciousness," he said. "I started screaming out, 'God help me.' ... The best explanation I could think of was my spirit was out of my body. I was real close to death."

Gulbronson gained consciousness as he was being carried away on a four-wheeler bed. They were suppose to be taking me to medical but mortars are still landing," he said. "Something hit me in the shoulder and knocked me off the thing I was on. My foot was hooked on the four-wheeler and it was dragging me. I hollered from them to stop. That was the last thing I remembered."

Gulbronson was ultimately taken by helicopter to a field medical facility with an operating room.

"A chopper came in and they said there was room for one more. They threw me in there. I thought I was going to die right there," he said.

In fact, a Catholic priest came in to administer his last rights.

"I said I was Protestant. The doctor said shut up every little bit helps," Gulbronson said.

Medical personnel stopped his leg from bleeding.

"Then the doctor looked at me and said, 'Your having trouble breathing.' He said turn on your side. No anesthesia, they stuck a tube in back but they missed. He said turn on your side again and take a breath. He pushed the tube between my ribs and the blood started draining out."

Gulbronson subsequently underwent several surgeries. He has recovered but has lingering medical issues.

"Some don't get shot or blown up but they are injured inside," he said. "You don't have to get wounded to develop a disability. Just going though it people come back with PTSD.

"It was 50 years ago but it was like it was today," he said. "Every night, it's there.

"I give all the glory and thanks to God," Gulbronson said. "Get yourself a New Testament. It takes everybody working together or I wouldn't be here. I love you all. I do."

A LITTLE HELP NEEDED FROM WEBSITE

I was a Hospital Corpsman with "The Walking Dead" beginning in November 1967 at Con Thien; then at Camp Evans; then at Khe Sanh from late January until I was wounded on April 16th. I returned to 1-9 at Cam Lo, and I was there until I was assigned to 3rd Medical Battalion in June 1968. This is a long shot, but I thought I would ask if anyone had pictures of Delta Company, 1st Battalion, 9th Marines that they would share -- either at Khe Sanh or any other period as indicated above.

OBIT

ROGER IRONS, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN MATCU-62

Roger passed away September 2, 2023 at Hilltop Healthcare & Rehabilitation Center. Born August 25, 1947 in Johnstown, son of the late William and Esther (Wissinger) Irons. Preceded in death by sister, Janice "Jan" Hershiser; nephew, William "Billy" Hershiser; great-nephew, Robert "Bo" Moschgat Jr. Survived by loving son, Broderick Irons and girlfriend Amy; daughter Rebecca "Becky" (Albright) and husband Robert "Rob" Madison; niece, Kristin Clemens; great nephews, Paul and Trey; great niece, Madelyn; and best friend, Dana Sklinar.

Roger was a proud U.S. Marine veteran. Roger was raised in the Belmont neighborhood of Johnstown, PA. he placed 4th in Plymouth's National Troubleshooting Contest in 1964 while attending Johnstown High School, showcasing his mechanical ingenuity from a young age. He enlisted in the USMC at 17 and trained as an air traffic controller, the duties of which he performed with MATCU-62 in Vietnam during the siege of Khe Sanh and at MCAS Yuma, AZ.

Roger developed a passion for gourmet cooking and entered the industry in San Diego, CA after serving the Marines at Yuma, AZ. There, he worked in and managed fine dining establishments including The Hotel InterContinental, Ten Downing Evening Fare, Bali Hai, and El Torito. His love for nature and skiing took him to the mountain towns of June Lake and Big Bear California, before Treasure Lake, PA. His ceaseless entrepreneurial spirit led him to found businesses such as The Sundance Saloon, One For All Promotions, and Precise Marketing Concepts. He created his own patch of heaven atop a mountain near Windber which he dubbed "Blue Sky Ranch", where he raised his son and the two of them enjoyed the summer crickets, tree frogs, and sunsets. An avid handyman and pursuer of projects, he built his dream home there as a monument to the peaceful solitude he enjoyed with the trees, deer, turkeys, and his cat, Smokey. Roger explored the world, becoming familiar with the people and natural beauty of Singapore, Japan, California's national parks, Washington's Puget Sound, British Columbia, Banff National Park and the Canadian Rockies, the Swiss Alps, the Bahamas, the Cayman Islands, China, Las Vegas, the Alaskan coast, Idaho, Arizona, Niagara Falls, Puerto Rico, Colorado, and the southeastern U.S.

He collected maps, friends, and stories at each bend in the road. He loved skiing, sailing, hiking, cooking gourmet meals and confections, French Bordeaux, good Scotch, rare steak, barbecue, listening to the Blues, western movies, the Pittsburgh Steelers, and a good cigar. He loved riding motorcycles, driving sports cars, and weekend trips for business and pleasure. But, his favorite place was in the company of those he loved. His favorite activity was that which brought him closer to those friends and relatives. And his favorite meal was the one he was cooking with you.

His sense of humor was enduring; at times good, at times dark, at times sarcastic, but his smile and laugh were contagious. Never one to judge, he chose his words truthfully to suit the situation. He lived his life with fierce integrity, and with unyielding loyalty to his friends and family. He will be missed dearly. In lieu of flowers, the family requests that memorial donations be sent to Vietnam Vets of America at https://vva.org/donate.

OBIT

JAMES E. PAYNE, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN

UTICA – James Edward Payne, aged 80, departed this life on Thursday, October 5, 2023.

James was born in Utica on October 26, 1942. James attended Utica Free Academy, and was a member of the UFA track team. Dealing with the many challenges that marked his early life, he displayed an inner fortitude that allowed him to succeed. After high school James became an upholsterer by trade and was employed for many years at Steats and Miller

In 1966, James was drafted into the Army but chose to volunteer the draft and enlist in the United States Marine Corps. He started recruit training at Camp Lejeune in North Carolina, where his shooting skills earned him the title of rifle expert and was placed on the regimental rifle team where the team competed against other military teams. After being stationed at Treasure Island in California, James was deployed to Vietnam as an artillery specialist with the 26th Marines under command of Captain William H. Dabney. James part of the 1968 Tet Offensive's Battle of Khe Sanh on Hill 881S always saying they were the ones who started it. James earned the following medals and decorations: The Purple Heart, the National Defense Service Medal, the Vietnam Service Medal, the Vietnam Campaign Medal, the Presidential Unit Citation, and the Good Conduct Medal. James was one of the few survivors of the 77-day battle, which later became the subject of historical books like "Khe Sanh: Siege in the Clouds" and "Valley of Decision: The Siege of Khe Sanh." James took pride in the knowledge that he and his fellow 881 marines would be remembered for generations to come.

James was an avid outdoorsman and would find solace in being alone. James was also a regular competitor at Utica Rome Speedway drag races and always prided himself on knowing how to"shave the lights" It was there he met his wife Candace "Candy" Cariglio. They were blessed with two children. Throughout their marriage Candace was always there for James. James was also a competitive muzzleloader competing across New York State and won many first place medals using his flintlock rifles named "Stonewall"and "Death Wind." He was truly a good father, protector and provider. To James his family was most important and the values he taught his children and grandchildren will always be remembered.

James was very knowledgeable and held a deep interest in American History. His favorite subjects were the Civil War and Word War II, particularly marines in the Pacific. His knowledge and passion for the subjects were evident to all who knew him. James loved trout fishing on the Lansing Kill and partridge and duck hunting at Chepatchet and the Mohawk. When his daughter Jamie was young, she always told her dad before he left to only "shoot the boy ducks." James did his best.

Left to cherish his memory are his devoted wife, Candace; his son, Jeremy Payne and his wife, Kimberly Wilson; his daughter, Jamie, for whom he had a special bond and her husband, Christopher Wilczek; and his beloved grandchildren, Dahlia Ann, and Daniel James Wilczek. He is additionally survived by several siblings. James was predeceased by his older brother, Stephen D. Payne, who passed away in March 10, 2022, with whom he shared a special bond since childhood.

OBIT

"JOHNNY BILL" W. O'NEILL, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN

John "Johnny Bill" W. O'Neill 75, of Duluth passed away peacefully with family by his side on April 15, 2023.

The first of six children, Johnny was born on March 15, 1948, to John and Joan O'Neill. He was a 1966 graduate of Duluth Cathedral High School.

Johnny grew up on Park Point and loved every aspect of it. He would take his speedboat to church every Sunday, and the rest of the family would take the car. From playing and coaching, hockey, and baseball, to rowing in Lake Superior. He spent many years at The Duluth Rowing Club under coach Henning Peterson. Becoming a quarter miledash champion. Among the many things that Johnny excelled at, he was the most phenomenal on water skis, a real treat to watch. Besides his love for sports and the outdoors, Johnny also had a love for fast cars, and pretty girls.

Shortly after graduation in 1966, Johnny started his studies at UMD. Although he enjoyed his studies, he wanted to fulfill a lifelong dream of becoming a Marine. Johnny enlisted in the USMC and followed his Uncle Jerome's footsteps. Before his selfless service to our country began, Johnny married his love, Ruth Ann Saker, and together they had 2 sons, Patrick, and Ryan.

In 1968, Johnny was sent to Vietnam as a Marine. Part of the mission he served is known as The Battle of Khe Sanh, when they were surrounded for 77 days with solid gunfire 24/7. While in Vietnam, Johnny was injured twice, and received 2 Purple Hearts. Upon his return home to the US, Johnny continued his service in the USMC, serving out of Coronado Military Base in San Diego California. Johnny would learn later he would face many challenges in life because of getting sprayed with agent orange while serving. After his Honorable Discharge from service, Johnny and Ruth returned home to Duluth.

Johnny worked at UPS as a driver, and spent his time fishing, camping, and hunting with his boys. The love he had for his sons was unmatched.
Over the course of many years, he tried to fight the signs and symptoms of MS. Despite any of the challenges he faced, he continued to say that if he had a chance to do it all over again, he would, in a heartbeat.

Over the past 10 years, Johnny was so lucky to live at the Minnesota Veterans Home in Silver Bay MN. He made countless friendships, touched the lives of all the staff, and shared in the memories of all who lived there. He is most famous for his sense of humor and quick wit.

Johnny is proceeded in death by, his loving parents, John and Joan O'Neill, his wife Ruth, son Ryan and brothers, Tommy, and Kevin.

Johnny is survived by his son Patrick. His faithfully supportive and loving siblings, Danny (Julie) O'Neill and Margie (Billy) Maloney. Nieces and nephews, Shawn (Krista) O'Neill and their sons, William, Matthew and Brandon, Erin Boit and her children, Ian and Mya, Lindsey (Olie) Hedge, and their sons Oak and Maverick, Britney (Michael) Boyum and Madilyn Maloney.

Visitation was held on Wednesday May 3, 2023, at Dougherty Funeral Home 600 E 2nd St, Duluth MN 55805 from 5pm to 7pm. Funeral service were held at St. Mary's Star of the Sea Church 325 E 3rd St, Duluth, Thursday, May 4, 2023, at 10am. Burial at the Minnesota Veterans Cemetery, 4777 Hwy 53, Saginaw, MN to follow at 2pm, with full Military Honors.

OBIT

PAUL R. ASHBURN, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN

Paul Richard Ashburn, 75, passed away peacefully in the arms of his loving wife and in the presence of his children and eldest grandson in Kingwood, WV on October 15, 2023. He was born on November 11, 1947 in Morgantown, WV, the only son of the late Frank and Pauline (Funk) Ashburn. He was a member of the Methodist Church. He spent his childhood in the Wiles Hill neighborhood of Morgantown, graduating from Morgantown High School in 1966. Upon graduation, he enlisted in the United States Marine Corps, where he was assigned to Company A, Third Shore Party Battalion, Third Marine Division. During his time in the Marines, Paul served in the Vietnam War, fighting in the Siege at Khe Sanh. While at Khe Sanh, he earned the Navy Achievement Medal due to his exemplary dedication in the battlefield and achieved the rank of Sergeant. Paul was also the recipient of the Purple Heart.

After being honorably discharged, he became a proprietor and entrepreneur, embarking in a 42 year business partnership with Ed Cogar by opening Ashco-A-Corporation. Together they hold a patent for the design of a recirculating sand wastewater treatment system. Paul also served on the West Virginia Sewage Advisory Board. Paul was an avid outdoorsman with an appreciation for the scenic landscapes of the American West. This appreciation led him on many deer, elk and antelope hunting expeditions with his friends, hunting buddies and Marine Corps comrades.

Paul was survived by his wife of 45 years Barbara Goff Ashburn of Morgantown, WV; son Aaron Ashburn (Bev), of Harrisonburg, VA and daughter April Cochran (Don), of Saint Peters, MO; grandchildren Cheyenne Rivera (Johnny) of Shenandoah, VA, Cody Ashburn of Harrisonburg, VA and Benjamin Cochran of Saint Peters, MO; great-grandson Asher Rivera of Shenandoah, VA; sisters Linda Pocock of Mathews, VA and Brenda Cogar (Ed) of Fort Martin, WV; sister-in-law Patty Bucklew (Steve) of Morgantown, WV, as well as many nieces, nephews and friends.

In addition to his parents, he was preceded in death by his sister Alice Ann Ashburn Cogar of Morgantown, WV, brother-in-law George Pocock of Mathews, VA and in-laws Walter and Josie Goff of Lake Charles, LA.

Visitation was held at Fred L. Jenkins Funeral Home, 10 S. High St, Morgantown, WV on Wednesday, October 18, 2023 from 10am-12pm until the time of service at 12pm with Pastor Steve Finn officiating. Cremation will follow the service

What is a Veteran? A "Veteran" - whether active duty, discharged, retired, or reserve - is someone who, at one point in his/her life, wrote a blank check made payable to "The United States of America," for an amount of "up to, and including his life." That is honor. And there are way too many people in this country today, who no longer understand that fact. - Author Unknown

Arnold Veterans Day Parade set for Nov. 10

By Tony Krausz
For the Leader

About 150 people will march in the Arnold Veterans Day Parade with most of those expected to attend a luncheon the Fox High School Student Council will hold after the procession, said Larry Boyce, Veterans Commission member.

"We have a pretty good turnout lined up for it," Boyce said. "It is shaping up pretty well."

The parade is scheduled to start at 11 a.m. Friday, Nov. 10. The parade is organized by the Parks and Recreation Department and Veterans Commission.

"We always look forward to this," said Reese Mullins, 18, a Fox High senior and Student Council president. "Veterans Day is such an important day, and we feel good being able to celebrate the people who have helped us."

Paradegoers are asked to gather at Good Shepherd Lutheran Church, 2211 Tenbrook Road, where the parade will start. Church members will serve coffee and doughnuts starting at 10 a.m.

The parade will travel from the church's parking lot down Tenbrook Road, across Jeffco Boulevard to the Fox C-6 School District schools campus, 751 Jeffco Blvd.

The veterans will then circle the campus, which is home to the Fox elementary, middle and high schools, as well as Rickman Auditorium, the Central Office and the Bridges Alternative School.

The procession will end near the flagpole outside Bridges, where a wreath ceremony will be held.

"We will have horses leading the parade," said Boyce, who served two years in the Army after being drafted in 1967 during the Vietnam War. "There is an antique firetruck and an antique Jeep expected to be in the parade. There also will be trollies available for veterans to ride in.

"The school really appreciates the parade, with the kids always out there, and we really appreciate what they do for us too."

Following the ceremony at the flagpole, veterans are invited to the Fox C-6 Service Center, 849 Jeffco Blvd., where the Student Council will serve lunch and dessert and will show a video that senior Ryker Bahr created to honor veterans.

Mullins, who is Boyce's granddaughter, said the school's band and choir members will perform for the veterans.

"It is moving to have (the veterans) go through our whole campus," Mullins said. "It is so much fun watching the elementary students going nuts bouncing around, and the veterans are throwing out candy. Everyone has signs and are dressed in red, white and blue."

Mullins said she drove a vehicle in the parade last year, and she is looking forward to this year's event, even though it will be a bittersweet moment.

"With my grandpa being a veteran, I have always enjoyed him coming to the campus, meeting my friends and telling them his story," she said. "With this being my senior year, it may be the last time I get to be with him for this, but I'm sure he will continue to be in future parades."

For more information about the parade, call the Arnold Parks and Recreation Department at 636-282-2380.

Horses will lead this year's parade.

Like last year, Fox band and choir students will perform.

Veterans Memorial

A Veterans Memorial has been constructed near the gazebo outside the Arnold Recreation Center, 1695 Missouri State Road.

The memorial is a large star made out of paving bricks in the center of a circle with one of the star points made of colored bricks that give the appearance of a waving American flag. Five benches are placed around the circle with the insignia of each military branch on one of the benches.

The memorial also features a flagpole that had been in the center of a police memorial outside Arnold City Hall. The flagpole was removed from the City Hall display when Arnold replaced it with three poles in November 2022.

"It is good to see that completed," Boyce said.

City officials said the memorial cost about $40,000 to construct. The Veterans Commission has held various fundraising events to cover the construction cost.

The latest event was a trivia night on Oct. 21, which raised about $8,000, bringing the total amount of donations for the memorial to about $26,000, Parks and Recreation Department Director Dave Crutchley said.

"We had about 190 (people) at the trivia night," Boyce said. "We had a full house. It was a big turnout."

"RUN BABY RUN"... THE UNTOLD STORY & HN WILLIAM O. BALLEW, USN

By Craig W. Tourte
HQ Btry 1/13

It was quite a few years ago and in response to one of the little. stories I had written on the board that I first received an email from HN William 0. Ballew (Doc Ballew). I apparently had written something about having served with H.Q. 1/13 which caught Doc's attention. He was one of the Corpsman who served in the 1st Battalion / 13th Marine Artillery Regiment Battalion Aid Station (BAS) during the siege at Khe Sanh Combat Base, south of the DMZ. Through the years we emailed back and forth and spoke a number of times on the telephone. He recalled the time I arrived at the BAS, sick to my stomach after sharing a meal with a few of the local Montagnard people while guarding the drop zone located on the West side of Khe Sanh outside of the perimeter wire. I was prescribed Compazine to settle my stomach and sent on my way. A few hours later I was carried back to the BAS on a stretcher curled up in a fetal position, unable to speak or walk due to an allergic reaction. Doc Ballew recalled that he and Doctor Lasker gave me a shot to counter-act the Compazine as they discussed my rather odd condition.

Through various emails and telephone conversations we had a great time recalling those we knew during our time at Khe Sanh. He was instrumental in my locating Sergeant Michael Secli who he had spoken with sometime after returning home. We recalled Gunnery Sergeant Emory Newman, the rather well nourished Sergeant of Cooks and Sergeant Richard (Fitz) Fitzpatrick who always seemed to find a cigar to chew on as he ran in a slightly crouched posture from bunker to bunker ... come to think of it, we all ran in that position.

As I recall there were four who staffed the Battalion Aid Station, Doctor Harold Lasker, Hospital Corpsmen William Ballew, Jeffry Campbell and Walter (Wally) Schlech. After returning from Vietnam, Hospital Corpsman Wally Schlech became Dr Walter F. Schlech III, MD, Professor of Medicine, Microbiology and Immunology at Dalhousie University, in Halifax, Nova Scotia (Red Clay Magazine, Fall-Winter 2008, Issue 71,"Khe Sanh Corpsman to Physician").

Dr. Harold Lasker served in the United States Navy from 1966 to 1968, and was awarded the Vietnam Service Medal, Vietnam Campaign Medal, a Bronze Start with "V", National Defense Medal, two Presidential Unit Citations and a Purple Heart. Dr. Lasker spent twenty years as Medical Director of Brunswick Hospital in Amityville, New York, eleven years as Staff Psychiatrist at South Oaks Hospital and was a member of the staff of New Island Hospital in the Department of Medicine in Rockville Center for fourteen years. He died suddenly on February 20, 2005.

Navy Corpsman Jeffrey Campbell has not been seen nor heard from by anyone who he served with since the Siege at Khe Sanh. His survival and /or whereabouts are currently unknown. "HN William 0. Ballew USN"

It was with shock and great sadness I read in the obituary section of Red Clay Magazine the following: "HN William 0. Ballew USN, H.Q. BTRY, 1/13 BAS, KHE SANH VETERAN, passed away 11 June, 2009.

We all walk down a broken road ... our twists and turns in life distract us. I had not heard from Doc Ballew for some time and had recently thought about emailing him to see how he was doing. In 2006 we had a discussion regarding a tape recording that was made by someone in the Regimental Headquarters area which contained the sounds of incoming. On this tape were the once again distressing and familiar sounds of rounds leaving the large enemy artillery emplacements at Co Roe, Laos, screaming towards the combat base. Just prior to impact a voice is heard to yell "Run Baby, Run!" Doc Ballew told me - and now I don't recall who he said that was - that someone had put that tape on CD and he asked me if I would like a copy. He said I could make copies and give them away at the reunion if I wanted.

I reviewed this email from him on July 25, 2006, 1605 Hrs:

"Hi Craig, We must have done everything right because I received your email OK. I had to call you about this damned old cassette that I had forgotten about. The original tape was an old reel-to-reel recorder that some of the guys used in place of writing letters. My wife and I even considered buying a tape recorder at one time, but nixed it after R&R in Hawaii. Our senses were numbed to anything except matters at hand for a fast five days. If I recall the recording was made during that bitch of a day that we took over one thousand rounds of incoming.

If you remember the Battalion Aid Station was a short distance from the communication hooch, and one of the guys gave it to one of the other Corpsman, either Doc Schlech or Doc Campbell. I discovered it when I received my foot locker from Camp Hansen where it had been stored in the WIA storage area. I forgot all about it until I mentioned it to a G.E. engineer who was working on my x-ray unit at the NIH. He said he had an old reel-to-reel recorder and would play it and put it on a regular cassette. He added the bit of music by 'Cogborn' just as filler. I realized when I found the cassette this past weekend during clean-up; it may have some historical importance to the Khe Sanh Veterans group. I will keep the original reel-to-reel tape until I hear from you after you receive the cassette. I know that it would be a miracle if the original is in good condition. Some guy with knowledge of such things could play it and record it on a CD."

Same date - email - 1700 Hrs.

"The tape is on the way. Let me know if any of the guys want to do anything with the original.'

In late July 2006 I received the tape recording on CD from Doc Ballew. It was housed in the typical clear plastic case; on the cover was the photograph of a destroyed bunker and the words, "Sounds of the Siege at Khe Sanh Viet Nam - Feb 23, 1968." I put the CD in my player and pushed "Play". I listened intently for six minutes until I got to the part where a voice is heard to say 'Run Baby, Run!' and then I turned it off I cannot express the feeling I had when I listened to it. What can I say, what words can I use to describe original. "the sounds of the rounds leaving the enemy artillery and the very distinctive and still all too familiar sound of rockets and artillery rounds screaming over head and impacting the base? I shut off the player and placed the CD on a shelf in my office. I have moved three times since I received that CD from Doc Ballew sometime in late July 2006, each time placing it in clear sight. Always meaning to listen again and write a story, a story that I knew I would someday have to write, but for reasons that are clear only to a few, I had been unable to listen to it again or reference it in any of the hundreds of stories I have written about this episode in our lives.

Until today. After I read the obituary of Doc Ballew I thought I owed him that much. I had to listen, to hear it all the way through - I had to listen to it for him, for you and for this story. It was time - before it got to be too late for me, for us or for history. So here I am, four years after receiving the CD from Doc Ballew and forty two years after the event. I won't describe it again, I'll say that the CD lasted for ten minutes and that seven minutes into the tape a voice is heard to say "Michael here comes some more!" In those ten minutes I counted one hundred and eighty seven sounds of rounds leaving the barrels of the guns of the enemy and artillery rounds and rockets impacting onto the base. When I was writing the "Khe Sanh Corpsman to Physician" story, I corresponded with Dr. Schlech about the CD. He responded that he also had a copy of the tape and that it had been recorded near a bunker towards Headquarters (First Battalion, Thirteen Marines) by two Marines on one of the days during a lot of incoming by rocket and artillery. The "Run Baby, Run!" voice was directed at someone heading down a bunker but Dr. Schlech was not sure who that person was. Dr. Schlech did say that he thought that February 23rd could have been the date it was recorded.

It is too late for me to call my old friend William Ballew. It is too late to share this story with him, and it is too late to say goodbye... to say thank you for being there for so many of us. But it is not too late to say that we who served at Khe Sanh during that terrible time will never forget those who risked their own lives to save so many of ours. I am going to put that CD back on the shelf in my office, I am not sure I'll play it again, but now every time I look over on the shelf at the little plastic CD case, I'll think of Doc Ballew - and that is a good thing.

CRAIG TOURTE HQ BTRY 1/13
KSV SECRETARY

I attended the funeral of a relative yesterday at the Maxwell Cemetery (12/7/2018), and once again spent a few minutes visiting the grave of my old friend "Buddy" Denman. I stood before his headstone and thought of years now long passed, and the many other graves with headstones of our fallen heroes now seldom visited and too often forgotten. It is only right that we remember those who gave so much. I present this article in honor of all those who now lay in hallow ground.

Everyone who knew William Denman called him Buddy and that nickname appropriately described who he was. Buddy grew up in the town of Maxwell, located in Northern California. Maxwell is the quintessential example of a rural small-town America where everyone knows your name, family and most of your relatives if they had lived around those parts for a few generations. There would be no reason for the road traveler to take the exit off Interstate 5 and drive into the little farm community of 500 where most folks live in quiet obscurity. Some have come and stayed and raised their families while many others have moved along and are now mostly forgotten.

From the Virtual Wall - "Dau Tieng, Tay Ninh Provence, 03 Nov 1966 - elements of the 196th Infantry Brigade and the 25th Infantry Division got into a heated fight with entrenched and bunkered VC troops, a fight that grew into a full-fledged battle fought over a three-day period. Landing Zone Lima Zulu, slightly north of where 1st Bn, 27th Infantry fought on 03/04 Nov, drew some of the heaviest fighting beginning after C Company, 2/27 Inf, was inserted at about 1400 on 04 Nov. "Buddy was a popular kid, handsome and athletic with blond hair and light blue eyes and he possessed an independent and adventuresome spirit many admired. Buddy had a difficult and tragic family life; there were many challenges and hardships including a grievous personal experience between his parents that he witnessed at a very young age. After he graduated from high school Buddy volunteered for the Army and attended boot camp at Fort Ord located in Monterey California. He thrived in the Army life with direction, discipline and a sense of belonging. He found a new beginning, writing to many friends about the respect and admiration he had for the warriors he had met, respected and hoped some day to emulate.

In the summer of 1966, I was living with my aunt and uncle in Maxwell and looking forward to going off to Marine Corps boot camp. Going into the Marine Corps was an adventure I was looking forward to even though I knew I would be deployed to Vietnam shortly after my training was completed. Buddy had completed his Army training and was home visiting his mother and sister and preparing for his deployment to Vietnam. I went over to his house with my cousin Larry Bowen (1947-1968) and walked into his bedroom where a few of his friends were visiting with him. It was mid-morning and he was still in bed, stating that he wanted to rest as much as he could after all the training and before his deployment. He was in high spirits and looking forward to serving his country and all of what that entailed. We talked about his military training and what he expected while in Vietnam. I sensed that he too was in pursuit of action and eager for a new experience. I told him that he would be returning from Vietnam before me and when I returned home, we would share and compare experiences. I wished him luck and was a little envious that he would get to the war before me. I left knowing he was doing what he wanted to do and I was looking forward to becoming a United States Marine. I entered Marine Corps Boot Camp (Platoon 1145) on October 29, 1966.

When Buddy arrived in Vietnam his Sergeant asked him what he wanted to be called, William or Bill. His response was "My friends call me Buddy." His Sergeant said, "Then Buddy it is." He was assigned to A Company, 2nd Battalion, 27th Infantry (Wolfhounds), 25 Infantry Division. Within a short period of time, he went into combat against the experienced, prepared and determined Viet Cong forces. Tragically only three and a half months after arriving in Vietnam he was killed in action.

C/2/27 moved south from LZ Lima Zulu, intending to link with 1/27, but could go only a few hundred meters before being stopped by VC dug into a tree line. Unable to move forward, with enemy troops infiltrating to their rear, the battalion and company commanders dead, and under fire from three sides, C/2/27 pulled together after nightfall, using a left flank displacement to get out of the "horseshoe" and avoid encirclement. The maneuver worked, and C/2/27 held out through the night amidst sporadic hand-to-hand fighting. By 1030 on 05 Nov, Alpha 1/27 fought through and relieved C/2/27." At the same time, HHC and A Company, 2/27, was coming into LZ Lima Zulu, intending to take the VC from the rear, pounding them against the anvil formed by A/1/27 and C/2/27.

05 November 1966 - While the engagements cost the VC dearly, with several hundred known dead, the US infantrymen paid a high price with 50 men killed in action over the three-day period. William (Buddy) Denman was one of the twenty Americans who was killed at LZ Lima Zulu on the 3rd day of the fight."

The community cemetery of Maxwell is located a mile west of town. William Luther Denman (August 25, 1946 - November 5, 1966) is buried near the flagpole; his final resting place is identified with a brass United States Military Headstone. He was the first to be killed from the small town of Maxwell and County of Colusa during the Vietnam War. He had the largest funeral ever attended with vehicles stretching for a couple of miles leading to the cemetery.

Several years ago I placed a small note on the A Company, 2nd Battalion, 27th Infantry Wolfhound website regarding Buddy, just so others would know he had someone who continued to remember him and his sacrifice for this wonderful country.

Similar to the Khe Sanh Veterans websites (Where I served during the Vietnam War) - Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc & Khe Sanh Veterans Home Page - which have contributed to bringing together those who fought in the battles on the hills and the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh, the Wolfhounds website is followed by those with comparable experiences.

Several months ago I received an email in response to that little notation I had written on the Wolfhound web site. A former Vietnam and Wolfhound Veteran Robert Park contacted me and said that he was with Buddy during that particular battle and continues to remember Buddy's death with great sadness. Robert said he was the one who asked Buddy what name he wanted to be called. Having been in the country longer and with more experience, Robert felt an obligation to watch out for Buddy and has carried with him all these years a feeling of responsibility for Buddy's death during the battle. A few years ago, Robert had come to Maxwell to visit Buddy's grave and say goodbye but was unable to locate his grave at the cemetery. He asked around town, but no one seemed to recall who Buddy was nor were they familiar with the location of his grave. Robert has vowed to return someday to say his final farewell.

A few of weeks after my email communication with Robert I received an email from Chuck Dean, another Vietnam and Wolfhound Veteran who told me he had been in communication with Robert and that he had been with Buddy when he fell and was planning on driving to California and visit Buddy's grave. I shared both emails with people I knew were close to Buddy while he was growing up.

Email from Chuck Dean - "I plan on visiting Buddy's grave in May of this year (2012), something I have tried to face for 45 years. Buddy and I were very close friends in Vietnam. We were both Grenadiers in A Co 2/27 Wolfhounds. I was with Buddy when he fell. I only wish I could have done this years ago, but have only been able to come to grips with Vietnam in the last couple of years. I have hooked up with some of the other "Hounds" such as Robert within the last year and have been steadily working my way out of the shadows. I will be in the Maxwell area to visit Buddy's gravesite in May. Buddy will always be part of the band of brothers called the Wolfhounds and will never be forgotten. His memory will live on as long as there is one Wolfhound alive."

"Freedom Is Not Free" Reads the program pamphlet provided at the Memorial Day Service held at the Maxwell Cemetery, May 28, 2012 - I attended the Memorial Day Service with 100 or more people from the community sponsored by American Legion Post 218 (Maxwell) - Ronald Azevedo, Commander. The Maxwell High School Band played the Star-Spangled Banner and one of the high school girls sang the National Anthem. The service included a bugler playing taps and a rifle volley "Salute to Deceased Veterans." I didn't notice any politicians or back slapping significant officials, just local folks with moist eyes and heavy hearts who attended out of respect and honor for those who served and for those who had fallen.

Chuck Dean arrived for the service and was shown the location of Buddy's grave by Paul Richter (1st Lt U.S. Army) and my cousin Gary Bowen (1949-2013) (U.S. Navy) who were childhood friends of Buddy's,. There was a large floral wreath standing at the headstone sent by Robert Park in the name of all the Wolfhounds Buddy served with. Chuck said that he had driven out from Alabama to finally say goodbye. We had a long conversation where he reflected on the battle and Buddy's loss. Chuck said that Buddy was just a few steps behind him when he was shot and killed. He walked over to Buddy, turned him over and saw that he was deceased.

Chuck said that he had the canvas helmet cover Buddy had worn that day. I held the now faded green camouflage helmet cover and observed written in black ink Buddy's blood type, unit and the words "Pat" for his high school girlfriend Patricia. Chuck said that he had kept the cover locked away for 45 years and now it was time the cover should be with Buddy's hometown, family and friends.

Chuck handed the helmet cover to Buddy's friend Paul Richter for safekeeping until it could display properly in a place of care and honor. I recognized that Chuck's act of presenting Buddy's helmet cover to Paul and the town of Maxwell was more than just transferring some possession of property. It was a spiritual release, a dedication, a shared memory and memorial of an item of hallowed significance to be forever treasured. It was part of Buddy's spirit and represented his life and sacrifice in battle and that significance had been tucked away for 45 years in a corner of Chuck's heart and soul.

Paul told me there were efforts under development to build an appropriate incased memorial with memorabilia dedicated to Buddy which would include the now gifted helmet cover along with his military Bronze Star, Purple Heart, military photograph and additional items relating to Buddy already on display at the American Legion. The new display would not only be a tribute to Buddy but also to the many who have served in the Armed Forces and a reminder to all that, "Freedom Is Not Free."

CHRISTMAS AT THE WOLFE HOUSE

FROM HIEN NGO: TRANSLATOR- GUIDE

Last Saturday, I and two younger friends of mine climbed up to Hill 881 South, also known as Cu Vo. We started cycling from Dong Ha City at four o'clock in the morning along Route 9. Arriving at

FOR THOSE WHO SERVED ON THE HILL 881-S

Khe Sanh around 7:30, we spent one hour and a half having breakfast and the best coffee in Khe Sanh. Hill 881-S is about 13 clicks from the junction at Route 9. Nothing related to the bloody fighting dating back to 1967 remains to be seen. On top of Hill 881-S are a dozen wind turbine towers with giant blades rotating in the clouds, making a sound like Huey helicopters. Wind power investors have widened a three-kilometer paved road that allows big trucks to reach the top. The road is too steep to pedal your bike. I had to walk dragging my mountain bike for half of the road. Such a great feeling to reach the peak. Looking down to the east you can see a big lake which is a reservoir of the Rao Quan Hydropower Plant.

THIS PHOTO IS TAKEN AT THE HEIGHT OF 720 METERS. THE SLOPE IS TOO STEEP TO PEDAL. I HAD TO DRAG MY MTB FROM HERE TO THE TOP.

OBIT

LARRY S. LAIRD, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN VMO-3

A Vietnam veteran and retired Sacramento County Deputy Sheriff, Larry Laird passed away October 16, 2023 at age 76. Born in Sacramento, CA on February 5, 1947 to Lester and Patricia Laird, he was the oldest of 5 brothers (Larry, Jerry, Gary, Barry and Terry). After graduating Mira Loma HS in 1965, Larry enlisted with the United States Marines Corps, serving nearly 2 years in Vietnam before returning to Sacramento and joining the Sheriff's Aero Detail Department as a helicopter pilot. He raised 4 sons, Jason, Sean, Brandon and Kevin.

He is survived by each son, his daughter-in-law's Sarah and Lorrie Tyler, his 9 grandchildren (Hannah, Sydney, Hunter, Addison, Emma, Olivia, Molly, Kamden & Nixon) to whom he was known as "Papa"; as well as his brothers Gary and Terry. Larry proudly and courageously served his Country from March 1967 – June 1968 in the Vietnam War. As a USMC V-MO3 crew chief on Huey helicopter gunships, Larry was deployed to Hue' (just south of the Vietnamese Demilitarized Zone) and jumped into action with 13 missions on his first day of combat. During his 15 months of service, which included the Tet offensive, Larry flew in over 450 missions and was awarded 24 Air Medals for his valor. Among the Air Medals was a Gold Star for "heroic achievement in connection with operations on August 22, 1967 when he assisted in extracting a reconnaissance team that was surrounded and heavily engaged with North Vietnam troops."

Always one to run to the fight in service to others, it was only natural for Larry to join the Sacramento Sherriff's Department upon his return home. Larry completed the Academy in 1973 and was a patrol officer for 5 years before moving to the Air Detail in July 1978. Over 17.5 years, Larry logged 10,000 flight hours before medically retiring in September 1995. Among his many achievements, Larry received a Silver Star in 1986 for piloting Star II "in disregard for his personal safety, in extremely hazardous conditions, maneuvered the helicopter between trees, powerlines, and TV antennas to make multiple rooftop rescue landings" to prevent residents in the Yuba County area from being trapped due to extreme flooding and rapidly rising waters. While Larry loved flying helicopters and enjoyed the camaraderie of his USMC & Sheriff friends, nothing could replace the love he had for his family… especially his 4 boys & 9 grandchildren. His presence was felt at every game, graduation and big moment of their lives. There was never a time where Papa said "no" or was too busy to be available. The ultimate big brother, the world's best son and a protector to those in need, Larry lived out his retirement by cruising around town, sometimes too fast, in his convertible Corvette (one of many he owned in his lifetime) and gardening in his immaculate yard. The world doesn't make men like him anymore. He will be greatly missed and loved forever.

RONALD RAYNER
A CO 1/26 KSV CHAPLAIN,

DOC JIM WILKENS

Jim Wilkins and Vince Begay were part of F troop on the end of the runway at Khe Sanh. I sent the previous article I wrote for Facebook to Doc Rick Zunino (corpsman for A 1/26 Marines) and he remembered Jim and Vince. I sent him this update on the two of them. Jim's parents lived about 30 miles from my hometown of Pontiac, MI. After six months of the worst combat in the Vietnam War, Jim got bit by a mosquito and died of malaria. Jim was one of three Marines not killed or medivaced on June 3. We were best friends and he had been writing letters to my younger sister. She, my future wife, Cathy and my parents went to his funeral. I met his parents when I got home and we became good friends. They were an older couple who had been married Dec. 1, 1941. Joe the father was 36 years old and Vivian the mother was 26. Joe got drafted into the Army shortly after Pearl Harbor and served as an engineer building airstrips in the South Pacific. Vivian was ½ Lakota Sioux Indian. I met her mother, who traveled the country between her children. Viven's mother had been in the Battle of Wounded Knee at the age of three. It has always fascinated me that I had met someone who had participated in a historic event from the previous century. About eight years after I got out of the Marines the Wilkins moved to Oklahoma. When Joe and Vivian moved to Oklahoma, Joe had asked me to put a United States flag on Jim's grave on Memorial Day and Veteran's Day. I still do that for both graves and keep the grass from growing over their markers.

When I retired from the Pontiac Fire Department I had a job driving truck back and forth to Las Vegas. Joe Wilkins had died by this time and I would call Vivian and stop and see her in Oklahoma. On a trip right after Thanksgiving about 1998 she didn't answer the phone when I was headed out to Las Vegas. On the return trip I did not get ahold of her on the phone until evening. I was about 100 miles away and she said she wanted me to get there and go out for breakfast. When I got there, she thought it was morning. She had flown in from her sister's in Minnesota and taken a nap and thought it was morning. She was making up a bed for me when I noticed sweat on her forehead. I asked her if she was diabetic and had she taken her insulin after her nap? She had. She passed out shortly thereafter and I got the fire Department there to take her the hospital. We spent the next 5 or 6 hours in the hospital until she got straightened out. I had known her son for 6 months 30 some years before and I lived a thousand miles away and I showed up at her door the night she overdoses on her insulin. I thought that was a miracle. Vivian passed away in 2005 and her other two children brought their ashes to Clinton Township, Michigan to be buried about 50 feet from Jim. They both died at age 92, 10 years apart.

Vincent Begay lived in Flagstaff, AZ. My daughter moved to Las Vegas, NV about 2001. Going through Flagstaff I would sometimes stop and visit Vince. He and his wife came to some of the Khe Sanh Vet reunions. Even though he had a picture of himself getting his Purple heart, I had to send a notarized letter stating I saw him get wounded for him to get some benefits. Vince passed away from cancer two years ago. His cousin, Elmer, had been in Vietnam the same time as us. I wrote a committal service and Elmer used it at the new Navaho National Cemetery in Flagstaff. Vince's grave is close to a number of World War II code talkers.

Sorry about the duplication of some of the info. Jim Wilkins was one of three survivors of 3rd platoon A 1/26 on June 7. 3rd Platoon A 1/26 took another big hit on August 18th. Just about three weeks after they were reformed. I now remember why I do not do much writing on the net!

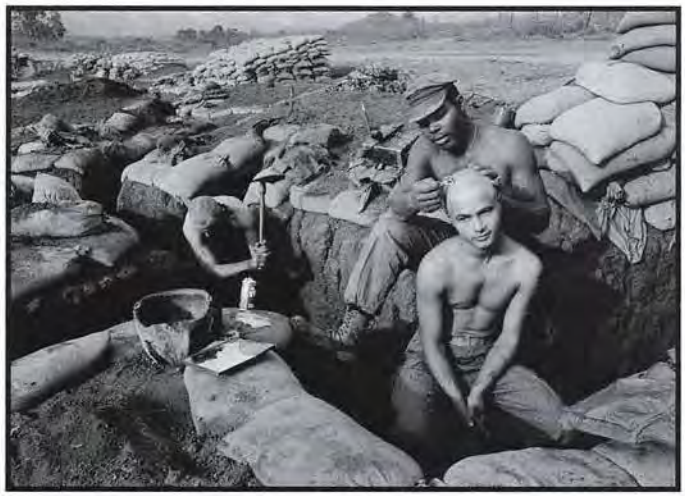
On January 24, 1964, MACV-SOG, officially known as the Military Assistance Command, Vietnam - Studies and Observations Group, came into existence. Comprised of operators from the most elite branches of the US military, including Green Berets, Navy SEALs, Air Force Commandos, CIA operatives and veterans of the Marine Corps' reconnaissance units, the group was an assembly of specialized talent.

Initially, MACV-SOG's operations in Vietnam were overseen by the Special Assistant for Counterinsurgency and Special Activities within the US Department of Defense. This arrangement granted the authority to conduct missions beyond the borders of South Vietnam. Eventually, control of the group was transferred to the military.

A significant portion of MACV-SOG's missions occurred within North Vietnam, and the utmost secrecy was imperative. This discretion was necessitated by the official American stance that the US forces were confined to operations within South Vietnam. Additionally, the group dedicated efforts to missions in Laos and Cambodia, due to the strategic significance of the Ho Chi Minh Trail, which played a crucial role in supporting the North Vietnamese Army (NVA).

Given the exceptionally perilous nature of their tasks, MACV-SOG was exclusively composed of volunteers. The hazardous conditions were so pronounced that the casualty rate for operatives stood at a staggering 100 percent; they understood their service would likely culminate in either receiving a Purple Heart for their valor or returning home in a flag-draped casket.



Hair stylist service was a rarity at the embattled Marine bastion of Khe Sanh, so Marine PFC Robert DuBois of Brooklyn, New York, did the honors for a buddy and shaved the head of Cpl. Efrain Torres of New York outside their bunker. Scores of Communist troops moving toward the Marines' fortress were killed in napalm and bombing attacks by Allied aircraft.

KSV WIVES LUNCH

CRAIG TOURTE KSV SECRETARY HQ BTRY 1/13

This Article was originally written in 2007 but things haven't changed much, I have aged 77 years, and my good friend Bob is in his middle 80s. The positive is we are both hanging in there to face life's little ups and downs. Ernie's Interlude is still operating, and a few long-time regular customers have gone on to their reward, that said many new younger folks have taken their place, and that's a good thing.

"GO HOME"

So once again I found myself sitting in the little neighborhood pub around the corner from my house. The last time I looked, it was around 1700hrs, now through the stare of one eye open and one closed so I can focus, I find its 2230hrs, where the heck did the time go. I have grown to enjoy this little piece of heaven. The bar is kind of a U shaped affair with about 20 stools and a few tables against the walls. The dusty perennial photographs in cheap frames hanging kind of crooked from the old faded nicotine stained walls hold the memoires of customers now long since gone. Small, cozy and quite, with libations that are reasonable priced and country music that plays on the jukebox reminds me of days gone by. I drove down to Beverly Hills last week, at the Four Seasons the drink I usually order cost me $17.32, that's right for just one drink. The same drink here cost me $3.00.

I'll be 60 years old in a couple of weeks and I'll admit that many of my rather rough years are behind me. Now I'm just another old guy sitting at the end of the bar with a few other old guys. You know the ones that most people ignore now, same stories, some old complaints.

My friend Bob is 67 years old, he was my roommate in the early 70's and the first man I met when I moved to this town. He has had kind of a difficult life, a couple of marriages and divorces and other issues. Bob was in Vietnam during the early 60's, flew troops around in those old helicopters but he doesn't talk about it much. When we get together we mostly talk about the girls we have known and the mischief we got into. The stories are always the same but we can't remember what we said most of the time anyway so it always sounds kind of new and is just as funny to us. Funny how you always sound fine to the guys your talking to at the bar but as soon as you talk to someone else you sound… well, you know.

We both talk about going home but know in our hearts we really don't have much to go home to, so what the heck, one more sounds good. The female bartender comes over to us and looks at us a few seconds and says "Craig you and Bob need to go home." What, I haven't been kicked out of a bar since I can remember. But we both laugh and get up and stumble home (I walked the few blocks home). The point of this, is that I realize time has come and gone and what a lot of us have left now are stories about old times and our old memories of events that are getting harder to recall, but most importantly the realization that we're not alone and there are so many just like us. And the realization that way too soon, we're all going home. Darn, I think I had better have one more; I've got another story to tell, I'm just wondering if I have told it before.

My first KSV Reunion
My FAC perspective of the Battle for Lang Vei
7 February, 1968: Lang Vei
8 February, 1968: Hill 64, Alpha 1 Firefight and day after Lang Vei
POSTLOG: At the KSV Reunion in San Diego - September, 2000

It was late last Century, in fact, late in 1999, that I first became aware of the Khe Sanh Veterans' Association. I couldn't imagine how I missed it over all those years. I had been a Forward Air Controller, flying O-2 aircraft out of Hue Citadel and Danang AB in 1967-68. That was a very vital time in my life, as it certainly was for all of us.

I looked forward to my first Khe Sanh Veterans Association Reunion in San Diego, during September, 2000. In preparation, I had a baseball cap embroidered with a FAC badge and my radio call signs. The idea was to help anyone who might have something in common, come up and talk. That way I wouldn't have to go around tapping everyone on the shoulder to introduce myself and explain how an AF FAC ended up at a mainly Marine and Army/ Special Ops type Reunion. I was somewhat prepared, because I had traded some correspondence with Ray Stubbe about the Association and about combat operations in and around Khe Sanh. I had also read his book, "Valley of Decision," and recognized a number of operations in which I had taken part. So, the idea of maybe getting to talk to guys that were on the ground during the Siege, while I was overhead, was curious and exciting.

After I had checked into the Hotel in San Diego, I prepared for the cocktail hour around the pool in the courtyard. As I passed a profusion of guys, with lots of red on hats and shirts, bearing unit designations, it was a very comfortable feeling (for a guy who was virtually a total stranger to all). As I strode out by the pool, I hadn't gone more than 25 steps before I heard someone yell "Covey!" Geez! Did that feel good. I turned to be greeted by Jim Speer who had been on the USAF Combat Control Team there at KS. He was well acquainted with a number of FACs that we knew mutually, who had been in and out of KS early in the Siege. It was a neat way to start out the Reunion, as I noted with some satisfaction, that my "hat trick" had worked. Jim had apparently been to previous Reunions and quickly began to fill me in.

As the conversation moved between people, places and events, I mentioned that I had been at Lang Vei the morning it was overrun. Jim quickly pointed out a fellow a couple of tables away and said he was there during the battle. I thanked Jim and quickly moved over to stand next to this fellow who was engaged in conversation with a couple others. There was a certain intensity, yet off-handedness about him. I must have moved in such a way that he got a hint I was waiting to talk with him. He briefly paused and looked up at me. I asked if he had been at Lang Vei when it was overrun. He looked at me with both surprise and curiosity and said, "Why yes I was." I explained that I was an AF Forward Air Controller who had been there that morning after the North Vietnamese had overrun the camp. As we ran through a quick Battle chronology of that fateful morning of 7 February, 1968, he talked about how he had evaded during the battle, and showed up later in the PM after much of the process of evacuating survivors was about concluded. At that point, I blurted out: "Wait a minute, you aren't 'Spunky Hanson 28 Bravo' are you?" He looked startled and said "yes I am." I paused, then said "we had assumed you were killed by the North Vietnamese!" It's hard to explain, but this turned into quite an emotional moment. Who knows how and where that wells up from? Let's go back to recount events long past.

MY FAC PERSPECTIVE OF THE BATTLE FOR LANG VEI:

I had been in country and at Danang AB for a few months and by that time, was feeling pretty confident about myself as a Forward Air Controller. By that I mean I had not only survived getting shot at pretty regularly, but managed to live through some episodes of "the stupids" in which I was lucky not to have killed myself. Early in the tour, I sometimes even wondered if I wasn't as much a threat to friend as to foe. In any event, at this point, Captain Rushforth was more of a steely-eyed predator (in his own mind).

In January '68, along with other FACs, I was shifted from the "Tally Ho" mission, above the DMZ to "Operation Niagra" over Khe Sanh and its approaches. As we became better acquainted with our new mission area, it was clear that something unusual was in the offing. Signs of enemy activity on the approaches from the North and West were particularly revealing.

On the night of 25 January, the Laotian community at Ban Houaysan (otherwise called "Elephant") was overrun [several miles West of Lang Vei, along Route 9]. Among the intelligence reported by us FACs was that there were tracked vehicle impressions all along Route 9, both East and West of "Elephant." In fact, it was later reported by a FAC that we had killed a tank during that battle (however, the tank quickly disappeared). After the battle, the Laotians and their Vietnamese (ARVN) Ranger liaison retreated to the Special Forces Camp at Lang Vei.

7 FEBRUARY, 1968: LANG VEI:

This account of happenings on 7 and 8 February, 1968 is from my diary and reflects the facts as I knew them and my feelings at the moment.

Well! Gerry Harrington and John Buckles had their work cut out for them last night. Lang Vei was being overrun by a large enemy force supported by at least 9 tanks. They said it was an unbelievable sight, walls of tracers, explosions, what looked like flame throwers, yelling on the radios and tanks rolling right over the tops of friendly bunkers. They had difficulty sorting out targets on the ground, but said they did have a B-57 drop some what we called "funny bombs" (a frag and hot chemical explosive pattern) on tanks breaching the Camp's Southwestern perimeter. They thought the tanks were disabled by that strike?

I got up about 0500. After a fairly inclusive Intelligence briefing on what little was known about the battle, I moved quickly for the flight line and finished the preflight. Aircraft # 396 was in good shape. It had a standard wing load, two pods of 2.75" white phosphorous rockets, a total of 14. The sense of urgency began to grow as I made the radio calls and taxied for takeoff at Danang. The weather was not that good. I'd have to climb on instruments to get on top and cruise to the Khe Sanh area, then figure out how to get under the clouds and over to Lang Vei. I took off at 0710. After about 40 anxious minutes enroute I used heading time and distance to get down through the clouds West of Lang Vei. Cloud bases were ragged at about 1000 feet above the terrain. Following Route 9 back to the East, I approached the Camp, and checked in with "Covey 688," a FAC from Ubon, Thailand who was currently in charge of air operations over the battle area. I could see his O-2 ahead, between cloud layers (forming a sort of fishbowl), circling over patches of occasional trees and brush, which were intermittently visible. Columns of smoke drifted up through the low clouds that were virtually settled on the Camp and the rolling terrain around it. It was about 0800 as I fell into loose trail formation with 688 to listen and try to figure out what was happening. I would be taking over shortly.

Our Special Ops personnel, call sign "Spunky Hanson," were holed up in their Tactical Operations Center (TOC). They were talking to 688 via FM radio. The NVA were swarming all over the TOC, throwing satchel charges, plus smoke and frag grenades down the ventilation shafts and any place they could find access. Spunky Hanson 15A and some CIDG, who had stormed the Camp to rescue the troops, were pinned down by machine gun fire. 688 told them to withdraw so he could bring in some A-1, Skyraiders (Canasta Flight) with lots of guns and ordnance to get the NVA off the TOC. He had the A-1s hold while he dove his O-2 through a "sucker hole" to see if the A-1s could work under these conditions. The terrain was actually in and out of the clouds, an extremely treacherous operation to attempt. I virtually held my breath waiting for him to pop up through the clouds, all the while fearing a flash and column of black smoke would appear instead.

After what seemed like forever, his O-2 popped up through the clouds and he began to talk with the A-1s. It was very risky. They would be in and out of the clouds and in the tree-tops. All the Canasta pilots (4) agreed to give it a try. They formed a "daisy chain" behind 688 and one after the other, dove through the hole in the clouds to see if 688 could lead them close enough to engage the NVA on the TOC. After a short time 688 came back up through the cloud deck. Now we had four A-1s in a tree-top free for all, ripping up the landscape, mainly with their guns, strafing the TOC and area around it. I again held my breath, while from an altitude of about 800 feet, except for the drone of my engines things seemed ghostly quiet. Time was suspended. Again, the tell-tale smoke of an air ground disaster was almost an expectation. When the A-1s came back above the clouds, time started again.

Spunky Hanson, in a quiet tone, said they were ap-prently successful, as the enemy activity on the TOC had ceased, at least temporarily. I was greatly relieved that the Canasta flight got the job done and were all still flying. It was an amazing feat of airmanship. The A-1 guys were all balls. It was not hard to envision those four A-1s ripping through the treetops, in and out of the cloud bases, high-G turns at treetop level, firing away at the TOC and somehow not hitting each other.

By now, the inside of my cockpit windows was getting pretty well covered with my grease pencil notes about what was going on and who all the players were. That was a pretty standard practice for FACs, trying to keep track of what is happening on the ground while managing all aspects of the air support.

The clouds were beginning to break up, revealing much of the Camp. The TOC had a tank on its side adjacent to it, and the trail/road coming up from the river, down by Route 9 (at the Laos border) had two tanks knocked out at about the Camp perimeter. I took pictures of the Camp and the tanks with my Intel Nikon Telephoto. At about this point, 688 had an engine acting up and had to depart for home. I took over the air operation. The A-1s, bless 'em, were still able to loiter and had napalm and 250/500 lb. bombs remaining.

Meanwhile, we had been trying to coordinate a rescue effort from Khe Sanh. First word was that a ground team would not be sent, because the NVA had certainly set up ambushes at advantageous points along the way. It was also stated that a Helo-Assault Evacuation would not be attempted for awhile due to weather conditions. As disappointing as this was to us, it made our course of action clear. We had to conduct a holding action to keep the NVA away from the TOC until help arrived. Perhaps Spunky Hanson 15A and the local troops could fight their way in?

It wasn't long before Spunky Hanson (SH) came up on "Fox Mike" (FM) again, relating that the NVA were back. "They're all over us out there. Give 'em everything you've got," SH said. At this point, he seemed calm and almost resigned to his fate. Initially the fighters were pressing so hard to be effective that after release, the bombs didn't even have time to arm and hit the ground as duds. In one case that may have saved us an A-1. I had aligned myself, coming right "down the chute" behind him on his bomb run. His bomb release was very close to the ground, a dud, which kicked up the dirt. The dirt then briefly swirled behind as the A-1 flew through the dirt plume. If it had gone off, it might have nailed him. The A-1 pilots quickly adjusted and managed to keep the NVA occupied with their remaining ordnance.

I asked SH if they could come out and make a run for it. "We've got badly wounded people down here that can't move, some may even be dead. We're not coming out until you come and get us." We periodically continued our calls for reinforcements and hoped for a helo evacuation task force. It wasn't happening and we were hearing words like it wasn't going to happen for awhile. I couldn't understand what the problem was? It was frustrating!

Meanwhile, Spunky Hanson 15A was having a hell of a time getting the CIDG and Elephant people to move against that machine gun and mortar fire. SH15A, a Sgt Ashley, went back to get a 37MM Recoiless Rifle to bring fires upon the NVA positions. He subsequently knocked out at least two of the NVA gun positions with the weapon. Even then, he and the Bru / Elephant troops were again driven back. At about this time, I noted a green smoke on the Northeast perimeter of the Camp. Even from 500 ft., I couldn't determine its origin. Was it a friendly trying to let me know he was there? Was it the NVA trying to spoof me so I wouldn't bomb him/them? I never did figure that one out, but elected not to bomb that area unless I determined it to be the enemy, or absolutely had to.

Hobo 01 and 02 then arrived to replace the Canasta Flight. I had them work on the West side of the compound, around the TOC with CBU (cluster bombs), napalm and strafe. They did a terrific job, but the NVA were still not ready to back off.

At this point, my own front engine overheated, coughing and sputtering from being run at full throttle for hours. That really caught me in the gut. I could just see a forced landing among the NVA down there, after beating them up all morning. Not good!

Major John Seats, another Covey FAC (Bruce Goodhue I believe) took over for me and continued the holding action, while waiting for the reinforcements we assumed would be coming sometime soon. The engine continued to shudder and sputter, but held together well enough to climb out of the area enroute to Danang.

The landing was uneventful, and I proceeded direct ly to the Intelligence debriefing room where I was told to call directly to Headquarters 7th Air Force in Saigon. A Colonel answered the phone and began the debriefing. When I mentioned tanks, he fired off and as much as called Captain Rushforth a liar or maybe just mistaken? After all we had been reporting that day and for weeks prior, I thought it incredible that he was questioning me like this. He was so adamant I became adversarial in tone, if not in words, and described the vehicles as "ya know, they have tracks on both sides, this thing that looked just like a turret on top, with a big long thing sticking out of it (like maybe a big gun)!?" Not only that, I was only 500ft. above them. To my amazement, he still wasn't buying it? I played my Ace of Spades -- "I have pictures!" "Pictures," he shouted! You get them right over to the photo lab and we'll divert a plane to pick them up immediately! I did, and he did, like within the hour. I'm sure the pictures were great on the briefing circuit (they came out well), but we never heard about them again.

Note: So far, the most comprehensive account I have read, of what happened on the ground during this battle is "The Night of the Silver Stars," by William R. Phillips, published in 1997 as part of the Naval Institute Special Warfare Series. It was indeed a night of heroism and gallantry. Among decorations the defenders received: a Medal of Honor, a Distinguished Service Cross, 19 Silver Stars and 3 Bronze Stars with "V" for valor as well as numerous other awards and decorations.

A 1 FIREFIGHT AND DAY AFTER LANG V8
February, 1968: Hill 64, Alph EI:

These are the thoughts and experiences recorded on 8 February, the day after the Lang Vei Battle. Back in my quarters at 2200, after a full day at Khe Sanh, then debriefings and planning.

0550: It was hard getting up. The bed (eat your heart out guys) really felt good. Got mission briefing for the KS area and things had apparently gotten quiet. The expectation was that the NVA were repositioning for another direct assault in strength, on Khe Sanh. The weather at Danang, enroute and on the Khe Sanh plateau was poor. At Personal Equipment, Scottie, was in rough shape, really bleary eyed. He'd been up for about 24 hours. I had some maintenance problems, but pressed on. Aircraft #331 was really in pretty good shape. (Note: this is the O-2 currently on display at the USAF Air Museum at Wright Patterson AFB.)

0645: Take off and climb enroute was all weather until on top at 10,000 feet. Using the same procedure as yesterday, I went out into the flatlands in Laos so I could let down through the clouds without hitting anything. I broke out of the clouds at about 1000 feet above the terrain, found Route 9, and followed it back toward Lang Vei. Joe Johnson, Covey 251, was in the area ahead of me and we began to coordinate areas to Recce so we wouldn't be hitting each other in the low clouds.

Lang Vei appeared to be abandoned. There were several hundred refugees on Route 9 between Khe Sanh City and Lang Vei, headed West? Guess they know where the action will be. The Marines didn't know who they were and were seriously thinking of putting artillery on them. I had to make sure - low pass on the tree tops - ooops! Damn trees all around me, zipping by the wings. The tops were defoliated and I hadn't seen them - very tall. The refugees were mainly women & children carrying belongings, etc. - old men, some younger. That sure tore at me. Those poor people just don't know where to go - getting it from both sides, one way or another. So - so sad! I felt as though I could actually see it on their faces.

Garden Valley 14 Actual at Khe Sanh called - need air to hit mortar and rocket positions just WSW, off the runway, on the ridgeline. Joe Johnson, Covey 251, went out to the West, along Route 9 at about the border to escort some fighters into the area through the cloud layers. We got Canasta 403, a flight of 4 A-1Hs (Navy). They were loaded with bombs (250lb & 500lb) and 20MM strafe. After pre-briefing the fighters, and discussing tactics, I marked the ridgeline targets with one of my 2.75" "Willie Pete" (white phosphorous) rockets and cleared them in "hot." We quickly got two secondary explosions indicating that the bombs had indeed found worthy targets. However, at this point, Garden Valley 14 Actual asked us to hold off on the airstrike and to my amazement, briefed me on a firefight on a nearby hill last night.

HILL 64: GARDEN VALLEY 14 ACTUAL DESCRIBED THE HILL AND EVENTS AS THEY KNEW THEM.

The hill wasn't apparent on my map, but there was no doubt that there was still a firefight of some sort going on just to my South. The NVA assaulted the hill in force during the night (mortars, rockets and ground assault) and there was ferocious hand to hand combat as the night wore on. The main base supported the marines in the hilltop defensive positions with direct fire on the East face of the hill (toward the main base) from heavy weapons. However, the NVA simply moved to the back side of the hill to continue the assault.

Garden Valley 14 Actual had not talked to the defenders for some time. Apparently their radios were destroyed or lost in the battle. GV14A said " We don't know what is going on up there. We don't know if our guys are still defending in the trenches, or whether they were driven out of the trenches and are trying to get back in?" My immediate reaction was "How come you didn't tell me this sooner? Here we were dropping bombs on a ridgeline, when we had nearby troops in contact?" Couldn't dwell on that. Had to get busy.

I decided that the only way to sort out who was where, was to make a low pass and look in the trenches. From about 1500 feet, I could see explosions and tracers on the hill, but not much more. I planned to get that little sucker going as fast as I could, in a dive from the base side of the Hill where there were fewer NVA. I dove, at full power, on the Eastern base of the hill, then snapped it up over the defensive trench lines in about 90 degrees of bank at about 150-200 feet. As I flashed over the trenches at about 230 knots I saw troops in hand to hand combat, grenades going off in the trenches, and about a grand total of 60 troops. The NVA were caught off guard by the pass, but hosed me down real good anyway. As I dove down the opposite side of the hill I thought, "how do I get back to altitude with this little thing without giving the bad guys a great tail shot at me hanging on a sky hook? I flew away for a while, dodging trees, then began my climb while I tried to digest what I had seen.

The predominance of the guys in the trenches were wearing flak vests, and a number had on US style helmets. "That's it!" The good guys are still dukeing it out in the trenches with the bad guys. I notified GV14A of my conclusions and told them we were going to start putting the fighters on the exterior of the hill and its North and West approaches. I briefed the A-1s on the situation and what we were going to do about it. I had them come in from the North to strafe the bases of the hill and work the strafe up the hill toward the trenchlines. These guys really got down in the weeds for this one, so they could see the whites of their eyes. The A-1s looked beautiful, terrific, skimming through the treetops, blazing away. Sure wish I had one of them. Next it was the bombs in the trees and brush along the Western base of the hill. Seemed like this suppressed the NVA for awhile, but they were soon up and at it again. I know we got a mess of 'em, but they were still ready to join the fight.

We had put in an emergency request for prop aircraft that could operate in these mountains, ridges, valleys in this weather. The A-1s were always preferred, because they could carry so much ordnance and loiter for 4 hours or so (depending upon how far they had to travel). Joe Johnson, again went West to rendezvous and escort them back to the battle area. However, we were getting short on fuel.

Bruce Goodhue, Covey 226, arrived and took over air support for the Hill. He had some A-26s enroute (twin engine, WWII, Korea vintage). They are also great for close air support, working close in bad weather, and being able to hang around for awhile.

As Joe Johnson and I were preparing to leave, we spotted some troops in the open on the backside of the hill headed for the adjacent ridge to the West. With great satisfaction we both unloaded 27, 2.75" white phosphorous rockets on them. We were on target, but had to RTB (Return to Base) due to lack of fuel, and did not get a good assessment of the situation after our attack.

Enroute Danang: I get a crazy feeling flying around watching those poor guys in the trenches getting blown up. How would I feel if I was down there. Hard to think about. Got a touch of that invincibility complex again too - I was awful low and they were shooting like hell. I'd have given anything for a mini-gun. I was about fired up enough to strafe with my M-16 out the cockpit window. Maybe we shoulda gone to Dong Ha for a load of HE rockets from the Army guys? Hell! For awhile there we were about the only ones that could fly in that weather (500'-1000' overcast, scattered to broken scud from 500' to 1700').

Had trouble letting down into Danang for landing. The base was shrouded in a thick overcast. Their radar was overloaded, so I had "Panama" GCI Radar vector me down over the South China Sea. Broke out of the clouds at about 500' above the water. Hmmm! An aircraft Carrier right over there! If I had come through the clouds a little further to the left, I might have made a real mess. Really had to piss bad - went right there on the O-2 maintenance ramp.

Called the Tac Air Control Center to debrief, got something to eat and went back to Intel for a detailed debrief for the rest of the troops. My pictures of the tanks at Lang Vei yesterday came out very well and are a great hit on the briefing circuit. Blah!

Yesterday, Spunky Hanson 15A, a Sgt Ashley, was killed on the 5th assault to rescue the troops in the TOC at Lang Vei. There were more than 9 guys rescued, not sure exactly. Tony Sazanovich was the FAC in charge for the chopper evac, yesterday afternoon. He did a hell of a job. They got the crap shot out of them, but got all but one of the troops out? They also got some CIDG and Elephant people out, though I understand it was ugly. Initially the Helos couldn't take off because they were overweight with people hanging on the skids. Had to knock (shoot?) some off or lose the whole mission and get everyone killed.

During all this Tony Sazanovich was contacted by a Special Ops troop who had apparently been evading after the Camp was overrun. His call sign was "Spunky Hanson 28 Bravo." SH28B came out of the trees at the old Lang Vei Camp to where Tony could see him. The Helo Evac force was already fully (over) loaded and pulling out to head for Khe Sanh. It became apparent that the Helos were out of the picture and Tony was preparing to land on the torn up, bombed out, airstrip at the old Camp. However, a large number of NVA arrived first and chased SH28B back into the trees and brush. Tony related that it looked like a lot of shooting during the chase. Last transmission from SH28B was "They're coming up from the other side of the strip." No way SH28B will come out of that alive. If Tony had tried to land for SH28B, it would have been nothing short of a miracle if they made it off the ground. The front prop had only 10" clearance and the ground was too irregular. It would have caught in the dirt and debris.

Meanwhile, today on the hill West of Khe Sanh, Bruce Goodhue worked some more A-1s (Canasta flight), A-26s (Nimrods) and T-28s (Zorro) on the NVA around the hill. They did a great job. When it was over, the good guys were able to get up, clear the outpost, and walk off the hill. After discussions with the relief force from the main base, they went up and reoccupied the hill. After the battle, first glance showed about 50 NVA bodies, plus plenty of captured weapons. [Understand that later a total of 150 NVA bodies were found, along with a number of machine guns, etc.]

Fingerpaint 50 (Marine FAC) did trap 2 tanks in the river Southwest of Lang Vei, and Covey 672 had some "tracked vehicles" pinned down near "Elephant." Hope this weather breaks soon. If it does, we could really clean their clock.

POSTLOG: AT THE KSV REUNION IN SAN DIEGO - SEPTEMBER, 2000

So here I am, with a lump in my throat and a tear in my eye, shaking hands with Spunky Hanson 28 Bravo - after all these years. His name is Dennis Thompson. I have since found out that he was captured and escaped several times during the next few days. He was a rather belligerent cuss and not amenable to being a prisoner. For this, he got lots of broken bones and worse. After a nightmarish 6 month trek to Hanoi, he was incarcerated with the other POWs, until the end of the war.

Dennis is a retired Command Sergeant Major of the Special Operations Command and, wouldn't ya' know, he was the featured speaker at our KSV Reunion Banquet. We've gotten a lot better acquainted since then. Dennis has a line on all the survivors of the Lang Vei Battle and some of us who supported in one way or another. We plan to meet this September in Las Vegas.

On the other hand, we have been trying very hard to find Tony Sazanovich, the FAC who was flying over Dennis when he was captured. No luck yet. We'd also like to find that "Covey 688," from Ubon, who was there at Lang Vei that morning. So why do I like Reunions? Gee, hard to figger out! This is only one story.

Note: For those that haven't read it, the best account I've found of the Battle for Hill 64, on 8 February 1968, is in Chapter 16 of Eric Hammel's book, "KHE SANH, Siege in the Clouds." It was only during the reading of this book that I began to realize that the 8 February, 1968 entry in my diary was about "Alpha-1" in this Battle.

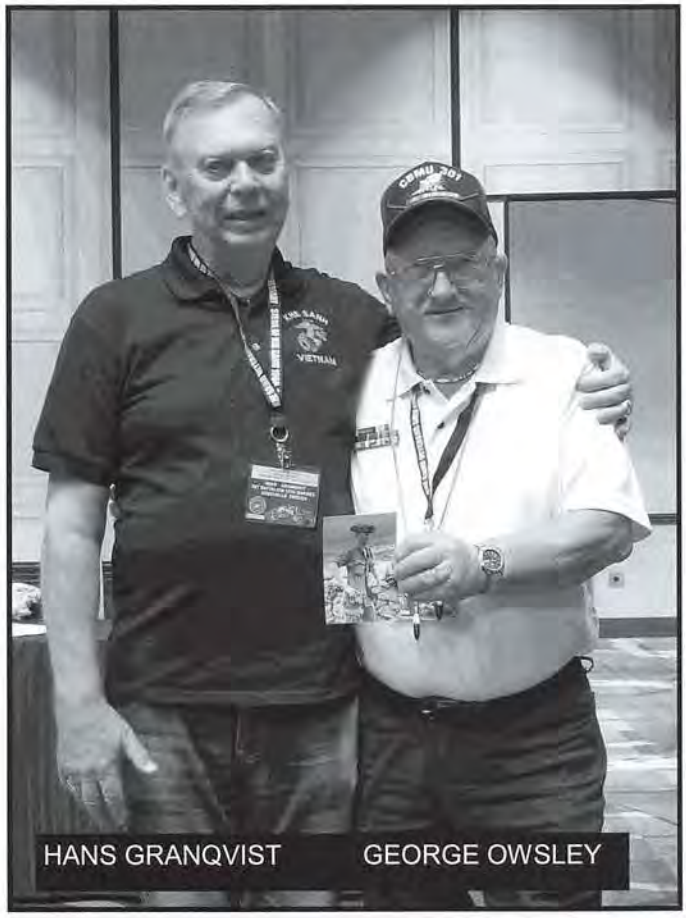
A LONG TIME BETWEEN VIETNAM REUNION

Khe Sanh Annual Reunion unites two friends from different countries, whom never physically met. Below photo is of Hans Granqvist Sweden Army who was serving with the 13th marine artillery unit. And George Owsley who served with the Seabee unit Det-B 301 with the Marines at Khe Sanh.

During an artillery attack at Khe Sanh George found a photo container on the ground. Since he did not time to look for its owner, he just put it away and kept it all these past years.



GEORGE OWSLEY PRESENTED THE PHOTO OF HANS GRANQVIST HE HAD FOUND YEARS AGO AT THE KSCB.

Hans Granqvist was in attendance at the reunion and George recognized him from one of the pictures he had saved all these years from the photo case. George presented the photo he had saved all theses years and another great friendship developed.

I'm a map person. Always have been even as a kid. That said the most significant map in my life sits quietly in a desk drawer next to me as I type this. It's creased in many places and in those creases is a patina of reddish brown. Even though it's paper and rests in the dark most of the time it is aging just like I am. On the occasions when it 's out and unfolded, I often look at those 1000 meter grid squares and see many of you on them. I think, has it really been that long ago

The Water Point; helicopter revetments; The 105mm guns of C/13; The Ghost Patrol; Route 9; Dusters; C-Med; the runway; FOB; KS ville; The Poilane house; W/13, The rock quarry; the entire length of the runway; and the looming hills: 881s, 881n, 558, 950, 689, 700, Co Roc, 861a and 861. And so much more. We only have that in our memories now and on those ubiquitous Kodak 126 Instamatic photos (which are aging too).

On my only return in 2000 there was no dam on the Rao Quan River. When Tom Ford was there in 2008 there was, and the vast area north of 558, 861, 861a, and 881n is a lake. I learned some years ago that there are numerous wind turbines north of Hills 950 and 1015 stretching in formation to the east.

Yesterday, I used Google Maps and traveled to Khe Sanh. Our Khe Sanh isn't there. The access road from Route 9 to the combat base is named the Ho Chi Minh Road. (Their country, they get to decide.) The road extends for miles, passes what used to be the combat base and continues between 558 and 861 where it curves to the left and extends way beyond 881n.

Amazingly, there is a paved road on the left just before 558 that extends up the eastern slope towards hills 700. Where that road ends there is the Rose Farm. You can drive up, have lunch and a beverage at an outside bar and take in the views. You can stay overnight as there are some rooms and tents. If you want to continue up to 700 you can walk over to the wind turbines and make a right.

Drive past 558 on the HCM Road and go a few miles more and there's another road on the left (it's paved) and you can drive up to 881s. Drive up to 881s!!!!

My purpose in this that what we experienced is decades in the rear view mirror. The present for us is this message board, Facebook -- which I am not on and won't be -- and our reunions and gatherings like the one out in California every Jan 21st.

If you have the health and the means to come to the reunion in Louisville, consider doing so. Please don't wait for a "closer one" or one in a city that's more preferable to you, because that may never happen. In that case your next KS Vet's reunion will be in the *great beyond where you can reconnect with everyone. S/F and Dennis

"GHOST OF THE BATTLEFIELD"

THE DONUT DOLLIES OF VIETNAM, THE SAGA OF THE AMERICAN RED CROSS GIRLS IN COUNTRY

The Donut Dollies of Vietnam left a lasting legacy, and their stories continue to be remembered as part of the broader narrative of the Vietnam War. Their dedication to providing a sense of normalcy, entertainment, and comfort to soldiers in the midst of the backdrop of conflict, where the harsh realities of war paint the landscape with uncertainty, a poignant scene unfolds—a meeting of the humanitarian spirit and the efficiency of military transport. Against this tumultuous canvas, a Red Cross Donut Dolly, clad in the iconic Red Cross uniform, finds herself hitching a ride in a helicopter, embarking on a mission that blends compassion with the swift mobility of military operations.

The helicopter, a mechanical bird of war, awaits with whirring blades ready to create a symphony of sound as it hovers, poised to lift off. Assisted by military personnel, the Donut Dolly, carrying the emblem of compassion and aid, ascends into the sleek and purposeful design of the aircraft. In this moment, the helicopter becomes a symbol of rapid response, an instrument of both conflict and relief.

Inside the helicopter, amidst the hum of the engine, the Donut Dolly takes her seat. The Red Cross insignia she wears becomes a beacon of hope against the military backdrop. The chopper rises into the sky, offering a bird's-eye view of the complex tapestry below – a mosaic where military infrastructure converges with diverse landscapes.

The journey unfolds with a mix of anticipation and purpose. The Donut Dolly, dedicated to providing comfort and support to military personnel, gazes out, observing the ever-changing scenery. The rhythmic thump of rotor blades and the rush of wind through open doors add a dynamic element to the experience, a constant reminder of the fluidity of the mission.

As the helicopter approaches its destination, the military base sprawls before them—a complex network of tents, vehicles, and dedicated personnel. The Red Cross Donut Dolly, embodying the humanitarian mission, readies herself to disembark. Her presence becomes a symbol of warmth and care in the midst of the military environment.

The helicopter gently descends, and the Donut Dolly steps onto the base, a figure of compassion in the heart of the military operation. Ready to offer refreshments, engage in conversation, and bring a touch of normalcy, she becomes a beacon of humanity in a world often defined by conflict.

Her unique journey, hitching a ride in the helicopter, becomes a distinctive chapter in the broader narrative—a story of compassion soaring through the skies to reach those in need, a reminder that even in the face of war, humanity prevails.

The Donut Dollies of Vietnam were young American women who volunteered with the American Red Cross to provide recreational and morale-boosting services to U.S. military personnel during the Vietnam War. The term "Donut Dolly" originated from the Red Cross practice of offering coffee and donuts to soldiers as a means of boosting their spirits and providing a taste of home.
These women were often college-educated, adventurous, and driven by a sense of duty to contribute to the war effort. They were deployed to Vietnam, where they worked in military support units, hospitals, and recreation centers. The Donut Dollies became a vital part of the U.S. military's efforts to boost the morale and well-being of soldiers stationed in a challenging and hostile environment.

The roles of the Donut Dollies were diverse and multifaceted. They organized recreational activities, such as games, contests, and entertainment shows, to provide soldiers with a break from the stresses of war. They also facilitated communication between soldiers and their families back home, offering a link to the world beyond the war zone.

One of the most iconic contributions of the Donut Dollies was their mobile recreation units, which often involved traveling to remote or front-line areas in helicopters. These units brought a touch of home to soldiers by providing games, entertainment, and, yes, donuts and coffee. The sight of the Donut Dollies arriving in their Red Cross uniforms and offering a moment of respite from the harsh realities of war became a symbol of comfort for many troops.

The experiences of the Donut Dollies were unique, as they navigated the challenges of working in a war zone while trying to maintain a positive and supportive presence for the military personnel. Their contributions were not only appreciated by the soldiers but also acknowledged by the military as an essential component of the overall well-being of the troops during a difficult time.

The Donut Dollies of Vietnam left a lasting legacy, and their stories continue to be remembered as part of the broader narrative of the Vietnam War. Their dedication to providing a sense of normalcy, entertainment, and comfort to soldiers in the midst of conflict highlighted the resilience of the human spirit in challenging circumstances.

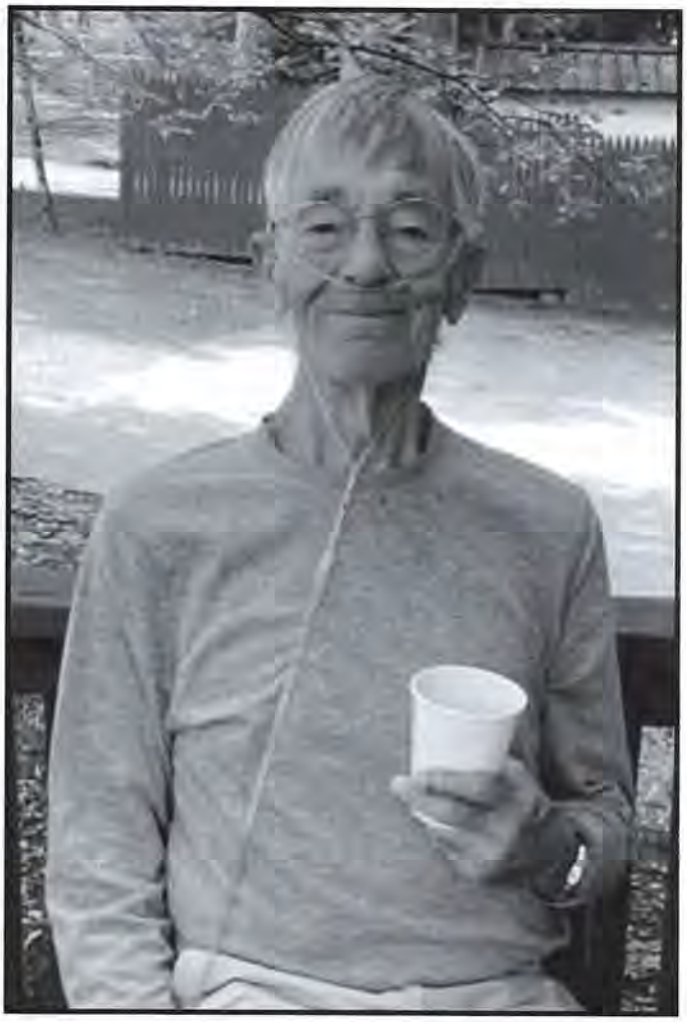
One of the two brave Donut Dollies who flew out to visit our team and enjoy the sights and smells at Forward Operating Base Aloui, Ashau Valley, November 1965.

OBIT

ROBERT F. JACKSON, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN

Robert Frederick Jackson, 76, husband of Susan C. Jackson and father of Robert H. Jackson and Aubrey W. Jackson, of Loveland, Colorado, departed this life on December 28th, 2023 surrounded by family and friends. Bob was born January 31st, 1947, to Catherine and Robert Jackson in Buffalo, NY. He was raised in Tonawanda, NY, then in Tacoma Park, Wheaton, and Burtonsville, Maryland.

His siblings were Linda Jackson, William Jackson and Sadi "Sonny" Pekerol, Jr. Bob attended Sherwood High School in Sandy Spring, Maryland, where he was active in football and performed in theater productions.



After graduating, he served honorably in the United States Marine Corps from 1966-1968. He served in a combat artillery unit in Vietnam along the DMZ, notably fighting in battles at Khe Sanh (hills 861 and 881) and Con Thien, some of the worst fighting of the war. After the war, Bob returned to Maryland, married his high school sweetheart, Susan, and settled in Carlisle, Pennsylvania, where they had two children.

There he worked for the Army War College for several years. In 1979, Bob and Sue took their two boys on an RV trip around the United States for one year, living on the road and taking in the beauty of our nation. Afterward, they returned to Carlisle briefly before relocating to Frederick, Maryland. There, Bob worked for a construction firm for several years before moving on to Green Thumb, a federal employment agency. After receiving his Bachelor's degree in Political Science from Hood College, he began working for the National Archives at our nation's capital. He worked with national records and later in the film department, administering footage from throughout American history.

For their 30th wedding anniversary, Bob and Sue traveled to Rome, Italy and London, UK, a gift from their son Bob. After retiring from the National Archives, Bob and Susan spent several years living in Frederick, Maryland, before relocating to Loveland, Colorado to be close to his son, Robert, his daughter-in-law, and his granddaughter. There he and Sue spent many wonderful years enjoying all Colorado has to offer, while still traveling back to the East Coast for visits. Bob's favorite thing was to spend time sitting and chatting with his friends and family with a up of coffee and a smile on his face. He loved discussing history, science, art, film, literature, nature, and the fabric of our country. He had a passion for all kinds of music and played bluegrass and folk guitar. He enjoyed drawing, fly fishing, swimming, motorcycling, camping, reading a good book, and just spending time with family. Bob could tell you volumes about any topic you might want to bring up and share with him. Bob is survived by his wife, two sons, and his grandchildren, Catie, William, and Theodore Jackson.

MICHAEL'S BLOG

Michael Archer
USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN,
26TH Marines COMM

This blog is intended to share information related to the topics of my books on the battle of Khe Sanh, which include A Patch of Ground: Khe Sanh Remembered and *The Long Goodbye: Khe Sanh Revisited. A third book, The Gunpowder Prince: How Marine Corps Captain Mirza Munir Baig Saved Khe San*h, was awarded the Marine Corps Heritage Foundation's prestigious Colonel Joseph Alexander Award for a distinguished book of biographical literature in 2019.

FOR YOUR TOMORROW

December 20, 2023

Last Thursday evening, I attended an extraordinary dinner with about twenty others at the venerable Italian American Club in Las Vegas at the invitation of my friend Tom McGrath. Tom is a whirlwind of service to the Las Vegas area and a champion of recognizing all military branches. As a former Marine, he has a particular fondness for helping organize the annual Marine Corps Ball at the Orleans Hotel each year and brightens the lives of countless children by heading up the Marine Corps' annual Toys for Tots. Never seeming to waste a moment, Tom's car was full of toys he'd picked up on his way to the restaurant that night.

Our host, retired Lieutenant Colonel George Rivers, served three tours in Vietnam as an advisor to the Army of the Republic of Vietnam (ARVN) and with the Third Reconnaissance Battalion. Other guests included a former corpsman, a retired army officer, and retired Lieutenant Colonel Scott McKenzie, who once served as a White House aide to President Gerald Ford. Retired Lieutenant Colonel Rob Warfield and his wife Leah, whom I knew from a previous visit, shared some fascinating stories of their time traveling the world together.

Our guest of honor that evening was retired Major General James Livingston, who was in Las Vegas with his charming wife, Sarah, to be guest of honor at the National Finals Rodeo. As a Marine captain in Vietnam, Livingston earned the Medal of Honor, our nation's highest military award, for his heroic efforts in leading his men against a vastly superior enemy force at Dai Do during the first week of May 1968.

In the months preceding that action, American and South Vietnamese forces had weathered the nationwide Tet Offensive, gaining back all the territory the North Vietnamese Army and Vietcong had taken and had hung onto the Khe Sanh Combat Base after a grueling 77-day siege. In a military sense, the Offensive appeared to be a defeat for the invaders. Still, it turned into a diplomatic opportunity at the end of March when President Lyndon Johnson announced that he would not run for reelection, curtailed the US bombing of North Vietnam, and proposed peace talks with the North to begin on May 10. Johnson's beleaguered Secretary of Defense, Robert McNamara, had resigned a month earlier. The administration promised Americans that they were winning the war in Vietnam and there was "light at the end of the tunnel," but the extent of the Tet Offensive now indicated otherwise.

The assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. in early April touched off enormous domestic upheaval, including rioting in many cities, coupled with nationwide protests and student boycotts against the war. Leaders in Hanoi saw these events in late March and April as an opportunity to gain bargaining leverage in the upcoming peace talks, and so decided to strengthen their hand by going on the offensive again in South Vietnam.

Their primary objective this time seems to have been to capture the sprawling supply base at Dong Ha, a few miles below the demilitarized zone at the confluence of two major highways, believing this would paralyze US military forces in I Corps. As the invading force of 10,000 seasoned, well-equipped soldiers with artillery support moved toward Dong Ha, a mere 600 Marines from the Second Battalion, Fourth Marine Regiment stood in their way.

During the desperate fighting that ensued, Echo Company commander Captain James Livingston was wounded multiple times while exposing himself to enemy fire in leading his men forward. An enemy machine gun bullet eventually shattered his leg, immobilizing him, although he refused to leave the battlefield until his last Marine was safe. Survivors weathered the night within a makeshift perimeter and repelled repeated attacks by the enemy to overrun them.

Four days of vicious combat included waves of attack and counterattack, often close enough to use pistols and knives. Despite their high casualties, the men of the Second Battalion held on long enough for reinforcements to finally arrive in the form of the U.S. Army's Third Battalion, Twenty-First Infantry Regiment. The Second Battalion lost 81 Marines and sailors and suffered 400 wounded out of the initial 600. Another company commander, Major Jay Vargas, would also be awarded the Medal of Honor for his efforts at Dai Do.

The NVA withdrew north back to their sanctuaries. Some military historians say the NVA had no idea how relatively small the force they were fighting at Dai Do was. Had they known, they likely would have committed more of their troops, finished off the Marines, and "changed the course of the war."

Conversely, the Third Marine Division commander, Major General Rathvon Tompkins, was criticized for not committing reinforcements sooner and for a lack of adequate air and artillery support. Tomkins, however, also suffered from inadequate information about the enemy's true intent and worried that their advance on Dong Ha was a feint to deflect attention from another target, perhaps the air base at Quang Tri.

Surprisingly, few people outside of those involved would learn about this epic battle. The war-weary American public was too busy dealing with unprecedented domestic unrest, and there were few members of the press in the Dai Do area. In fact, so little news was available about what occurred there that, despite being stationed at the time only about seven miles from there, on the southwest perimeter of the Quang Tri airbase, I never heard a thing about the battle until many years later.

Even the U.S. military did not seem to recognize the Second Battalion's valiant effort against such enormous odds. Over half a century after the battle, U.S. Senator Jon Tester of Montana requested the White House and Department of Defense honor them with a Presidential Unit Citation. According to the Defense Department, it is an unusual request because no PUC has ever been awarded so long after an event. As of May 2022, there has been no movement on this.

Meeting the legendary General James Livingston last week was indeed an honor. When I later read the citation for his medal, I noticed that some of the most desperate fighting involved aiding Marines who had been surrounded and trapped by the enemy. This reminded me of a blog piece I wrote not long ago about the Chosin Reservoir in Korea and how Medal of Honor winners Captain Ray Davis and Staff Sergeant Archie Van Winkle risked their lives to save Marines who were also trapped. I've been fortunate to have served with, or come to know, so many who risked it all in displaying such selfless, unhesitating loyalty and love for one another. Sadly, I will never meet countless others who gave their full measure of devotion in helping a brother-in-arms go home.

While the Marines at Dak Do did not fight to the last man, there is the hint of an American Thermopylae in the circumstances of that event, using sheer tenacity to stop a vastly superior army. Perhaps a more appropriate example is found in an equally obscure situation that took place on another Asian battlefield in 1944 at Kohima and Imphal, India, where 1,500 British, Indian, and Nepalese troops turned back an invading army of 15,000 Japanese soldiers. Military historian Robert Lyman later wrote that their stand "changed the course of the Second World War in Asia."

The turning point in that battle occurred on the tennis court of the British District Commissioner's bungalow, later becoming a cemetery containing over 1,400 who died there. An inscription on the cemetery's memorial was inspired by the epitaph Simonides wrote to honor the Spartans who fell at the Battle of Thermopylae:

When you go home , tell them of us and say, For your tomorrow, we gave our today.

OBIT

CAPTAIN DONALD CAMERON, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN, 3RD FORCE RECON

Captain Donald Cameron USMC, Retired age 86 of New Carlisle passed away on Thursday, January 18, 2024, at Springfield Regional Medical Center. Donald was born the son of Lester Ken & Clara Louise (Copple) Cameron on June 11, 1937, in Chi-

OBIT

MILTON "MAC" MCNEELY, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN, BRAVO CO 1/26

Milton "Mac" McNeely, 75, of Amarillo, TX, went home to his Lord and Savior on Tuesday, February 13, 2024. A celebration of life will be held at Coulter Road Baptist Church on March 2, 2024 at 11 a.m.

Milton was born on July 8, 1948, in Lubbock, Texas. Some of his most cherished childhood memories were of times spent with his Grandaddy and Granny. Even as a mischievous young boy, Milton had an entrepreneurial spirit. When he wasn't working in his father's candy shop or loan office, he attempted many business ventures. He developed a love for learning, reading and chess.

Milton frequently joked that he dodged the draft by joining the United States Marine Corps. He was a very proud American who was honored to have served his country in Vietnam from 1966 to 1970. Milton served with the Bravo Company (B-1-26) during the seventy-seven day Siege at Khe Sanh. During his service, Milton earned the rank of sergeant and received several medals including a Purple Heart.

After his discharge, Milton further pursued his passion for business. He later started his own finance company and furniture store, with the guidance and encouragement of his stepfather. Milton was a patriot who strongly believed in and pursued active political involvement. In 2017, he was recognized by his industry with a Distinguished Service Award for lobbying legislators on behalf of their professional organization.

Later in life, Milton committed his life to following Jesus Christ and became very involved in the ministry of the local church. He found a new passion in studying God's word, sharing the gospel with children and youth, and would offer to pray with anyone who would express a need.

Milton will be remembered for his impeccable dress, dry sense of humor, witty banter, growing curiosity that kept Siri busy, and love for deep intellectual conversations about faith, politics, or the next "big idea" or business venture. Most importantly, he will be missed for his integrity, kindness, generosity, love, support and advice by those who loved him.

Milton was preceded in death by his loving wife of almost 25 years, Charlotte McNeely, his father Edmund McNeely and his stepfather and mother, Ed and Willaphene Fletcher. Survivors include his son Gene McNeely; his daughter Kara Green and her husband Todd; his three grandchildren Landon Green, Cason Green and McKenna Green, to whom he was affectionately known as "Grandaddy Grinch"; his "sunshine" Pam Reed, who stayed by his side until his passing; his siblings Velvet McCurry, Kathy Fletcher and Greg Lopez, Carlton and Pam Fletcher and Lenny Monson; nieces and nephews; and many others who looked to him as a father or mentor.

In lieu of flowers, the family suggests that memorials be made to Prairie View Baptist Chapel, Coulter Road Baptist Church, Child Evangelism Fellowship or any Christian organization of your choosing.

JANUARY 21, 2024
NORTHERN KHE SANH VETERANS LUNCH
BY CRAIG W. TOURTE
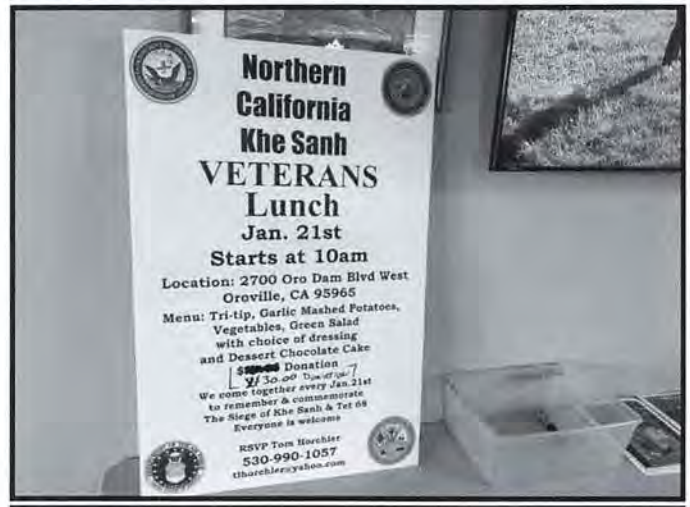
OROVILLE, CALIFORNIA

Our January 21, annual Siege Luncheon to Commemorate those who fought at the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh (1968) was once again held at the Table Mountain Golf Course in Oroville, Calif. Over 50 members of the community, Khe Sanh Veterans, fellow Veterans, post-Vietnam Veterans from other conflicts, and friends, expressed their appreciation for that unselfish service. My introduction' "We who experienced that event come together often, not to celebrate but rather to remember and commemorate those who not only served on the Combat Base but also to honor all of those who fought in the War in Vietnam, regardless of what branch, in what capacity or the location."

I would like to quote our dear departed friend Steven Wiese who said it best, "I've had people say to me that the war in Vietnam was many years ago, why don't you just get over it? You know, I wish I could get over it but on the other hand it's like I don't want to forget these guys I fought alongside. I don't want to forget what I've seen and what I have witnessed, I don't want to forget those memories."

Steve's wonderful quote line is the reason we continue to hold this luncheon each year while we are able. A special thank you to Tom Horchler who organizes the luncheon each year. Besides Tom and me, the other Khe Sanh Veterans who attended are, David Tonick, Robert Singleton, Marco Soto, Kenneth (Buzz) Sawyer, Andres (Pete) Torres, Daniel Ferguson and Robert (Bob) Feeney. I know there were a few others and I apologize to those whose names I missed.



"MY DRILL INSTRUCTOR"

OBIT

1ST SERGEANT BEN L. LEITH, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN, G CO 2/26

1ST Sergeant Ben Leith USMC, passed away in September 2023 at the age of 87. He was my drill instructor for 2nd Battalion Platoon 2085 in 1966. He was called away in the middle of our training when he received orders to serve in Vietnam. He was a very tough but fair Marine greatly respected by his fellow instructors and the recruits he had the privilege of training.

BEN AS DI

One day, Bill Simons also a member of our platoon, contacted me. He had made contact with Ben and another 21 members of platoon 2085, and they wanted a Reunion. I informed Bill that the Khe Sanh Veterans were having A union in Washington DC and we could join them. Everyone Bill contacted showed up at the Washington Reunion, included our former Drill instructor Ben Leith and his wife Jacqueline.(Jackie).

Tom Eichler from the Khe Sanh Veterans made a plague for Ben which he loved. Jackie Leith was also given gifts from the Khe Sanh veterans and members of platoon 2085. We had a great time remembering our experiences in 1966.

Ben and Jackie after this reunion became regular attendees at our annual Khe Sanh Reunions. Ben liked to hang around with Tom Ford (F CO 2/26) & I who were in charge of the Khe Sanh Veterans PX. Ben was one hell of a Marine Drill Instructor and expected his marines to be squared away at all times. If you failed to do so he would come down on you like a ton of bricks,

I spoke with him and related that times I hated his tactics and how hard he was at times with me. I later realized that his hard methods had prepared me for my survival in Vietnam.

THANK YOU BEN, you will always be remembered by all those who were gifted to have known you.

OBIT

VERNON "DOC" WIKE, USN CORPSMAN, KHE SANH VETERAN

Born in El Dorado, Kansas on June 5, 1947, Vernon Ralph Wike was the son of Virgil and Marjorie (Markee) Wike. He passed away at the Colorado State Veterans Home at Fitzsimons on January 26, 2023. He was preceded in death by both parents and both of his sons, Sean and Jedediah. He leaves his two sisters, Helen (Hull) Parker of Hays, Kansas; Virginia (Hull) Stricker of Lone Tree, Colorado; and three grandchildren, Jackson and Charlotte Wike of Rockland, MA and Joplin Wike of Connecticut.

Vern was raised in a difficult and sometimes abusive family but upon his eighteenth birthday joined the U.S. Navy and served as a Navy Corpsman with distinction in Vietnam. During the late 1960's he was pictured in Life magazine, Time magazine and People magazine treating wounded Marines during the battle for Khe Sanh.

To those he served with and those whose lives he saved, he was a hero. As a result of the action that he saw in Vietnam, he developed an arthritic hip problem and eventually returned to the United States where he received his discharge and eventual 100% disability for his hip condition and PTSD. While flashbacks and PTSD remained with him for many years, Vern had a "heart of gold" and would go to extremes to assist others that needed his assistance. He worked for some years as a respiratory therapist prior to receiving his disability determination, and continued to display the kind of care to his patients that he had to his Marine comrades in Vietnam. He lived for many years in Prescott, Arizona before his home burned down shortly before he had a severe stroke.

Following recovery from his stoke, he lived with his sister, Virginia (Hull) Stricker and her husband, first in Ankeny, Iowa before moving to Parker, Colorado in 2010. He entered the Veterans Home at Fitzsimons in 2015 where he lived until his death.

KHE SANH MEMORIES FROM WALTER SCHLECH "TO KHE SANH AND BACK - MY JOURNEY"

I, Received the latest Red Clay in the mail today and it promoted me to write this remembrance which might be of interest to some of our Khe Sanh Brothers. I penned it for my kids too before old age carries it all away!

I joined the USNR at 18 in the summer of 1964 along with some friends living on the US Naval Base in Charleston (my dad was COMSUBFLOT 6 at the time and swore me in.).

Instead of Great Lakes boot camp I did 2 weeks of pre-Sub School in New London before heading to Williams College as a freshman. I attended Wednesday night USNR training each week at the Pittsfield USNRTC while in school and was a radioman striker. The summer of'65 I did the full 8-week Sub School and became eligible for submarine duty.

With too much partying and too little studying, I flunked out of school the following spring and lost my deferment for the 2 years of active duty required by my enlistment. My father said that 2 fairly independent jobs in the enlisted Navy were "cooks and corpsmen"; I couldn't cook so decided to go to Corps school. My grandfather had also been a career Navy doc (a flight surgeon, he received a Purple Heart when he survived the sinking of the USS Wasp) so why not?

I did well at the Corpsman "A" School in San Diego (#1 in the class) but hadn't realized before going that medical services in the USMC were provided by the USN. I knew what was coming when my entire "A" School class was sent on graduation to Camp Pendleton for FMF training. interestingly my future wife's great uncle was Joe Pendleton and her father was a USMC CAPT with the 7" Marines at Chosin Reservoir - but that's another story!

With my newly minted 8404, I was assigned to Chelsea Naval Hospital, Boston where I spent 6 months on the pediatric ward before receiving orders to the 5"" Med Battalion at Camp Schwab in Okinawa. This was a skeleton group with a doc, a Chief, and I the only members as I recall. I went to jungle warfare school but was mostly bored. In October '67 I was sent to Bravo Med at Phu Bai on TDY to do casualty assessments for 2 weeks but then sent back. I remember watching helos come in to the pad outside and the frantic triage but little else.

Christmas was quiet but then the "shit hit the fan" in January '68 and I received orders to ,HQ BTRY, 1/13 at Khe Sanh. I flew into DaNang (not sure of the aircraft) and waited a few days there to get my gear and a hop to Khe Sanh on a C-130. We flew high to avoid the .51 cal. NVA machineguns and I recall a young Marine SGT continually crossing himself while we sat on our flak jackets on the short trip. As we approached the airstrip, the pilot pulled the flaps, cut the engines, and we dropped like a stone to the end of the strip. The back door opened as we moved down the strip and the loadmaster kept yelling "Out, out!" as we ran out and into shallow trenches on the side of the strip. Mortars were coming in and the C-130 turned around and roared off without stopping. Some of those C-130's are still flying and I'm proud to say my oldest son, a USAFR MAJ, is in charge of US and foreign C-130 pilot training at Little Rock AFB today!

I then walked up the road to the 1/13 compound as casualties were coming down to the Charlie Med bunker. The BAS was 30 yds down from the CP tent and 20 yds from the FADAC bunker. The 1/12 155mm battery was across the road and the 4-deuce mortar pit 20 yds the other way. We had a good view of the airstrip as we were on the high side of the KSCB. My brothers in the BAS tent were Dr. Hal Lasker, BN surgeon and HN Jeff Campbell, both who had been there for a month or two. HMC Bill Ballew arrived later that month. (RVN tour but just barely. After we had moved later in the year to Hill 55 outside Da Nang, he got a ride on a 6-by to the airstrip on his last day in-country and was wounded by an IED on the way in. He refused to stay one more day to be treated and got on the bird home with bloody field dressings in place! Hal had had enough of war and wounds and went into psychiatry with a practice at his home on Long Island. I saw him several years later when I was in NYC studying and kept in some touch later but he died suddenly in 2005 in his 60s. I was in contact with Chief Bill Ballew after he found me on Facebook just a few years ago - he had retired from the Navy, worked as a lab in the DC area, and died of emphysema a few years back. I tried over the years to find Jeff Campbell who was from Florida originally but have been unsuccessful so far.

Life at the BAS at Khe Sanh was mostly moments of terror. We did sick call and took care of minor ailments. Filled sandbags for our little backdoor bunker, ate C-rations, read and played cards. Incoming was different and scary-we huddled in the makeshift bunker until we heard "Corpsman up!". The one day I remember most was when the CP tent was hit- I ran up but the clerk was dead I think. On the way up someone passed me running back down to the BAS and when I got back he was there with an open head wound with his frontal lobe showing and scared to death! He was med-evac'ed through C Med and got a plate in his head in Yokosuka. Gunny Klidonas was also wounded that day with a big chunk of his deltoid muscle taken out by shrapnel. He was patched up and went home as well. I found him in Florida many years later and had a nice phone chat.

Another round hit near the comm shack one day and I remember putting tourniquets on SGT Smith, who I found leaning over the stumps of both legs, blown off high in the thighs. We started an IV and sent him down to C Med but he died there I think. I remember Don Saunders and Will Stovall being killed. I think it was Saunders who was filling sandbags, cut himself and while walking the 10 yds to our tent door took a mortar fragment under his armpit over the top of his flak jacket. We put a chest tube through the wound and he bled out there calling for his mother.

On another day, the tent just below the CP which was used as a bunkhouse for transients to other units was hit. I ran up and through the smoke and dust with that sickly sweet explosive smell saw one poor new guy, black-framed glasses askew, with his abdomen opened up and intestines showing in the wound. I never knew his name but was upset as he was only at Khe Sanh to report in to the parent unit before being sent elsewhere in I Corps. If he had just been told to report in to his own local unit he might be alive today. There were other casualties in the tent but I can't remember them.

Mail call was intermittent but my mother sent me a quart of Jack Daniel's in an empty plastic Darvon bottle that I shared around. She was a volunteer at a USAF hospital in Ankara where my dad (now a RADM) was the US Naval Attaché, and could get the empty med bottles for the trip to Vietnam.

Other memories include the ammo dump explosion Chief Ballew saw the "mushroom cloud", grabbed his gas mask and was convinced, albeit briefly, that the NVA had "nukes"! There were nights on the trench line above the CP where we would report in hourly by radio (call sign "Jacksonville") and wait on the Arklight notifications ("Arklight 2100 hrs"). They were spectacular as the B-52s dropped their bombs from 30,000ft to within a few hundred yards of our position. The ground would shake and we could hear the whine of shrapnel going over our heads in the trench. Watching the Skyraiders, A-4 Skyhawks, and F-4 Phantoms do their thing outside the wire was always heartening during the siege. The Skyraiders with their slow flight and the "tat-tat -tat" of their .50s was like watching a WW2 movie. The napalm runs of the Phantoms were impressive and we would yell "Get some!" from our bunkers as they dropped their canisters.

On the other side, incoming was always scary and one day, when there was heavy shelling, a couple of the brothers recorded a 8-track(Which I eventually digitalized. I think I may have been the source for "Run, baby Run" which many Khe Sanh vets have now heard but I'm not certain. When I listen to the tape now that soft, faint "boom-boom-boom• that presaged the "ssssssh CRACK" of the rounds landing still gives me chills. These wen, mostly 152mm rounds from the NVA arty buried in the Co Roe caves over the border, in Laos where they couldn't be Mt. Other scares included the time where we became convinced the NVA were digging tunnels unde, the wire to infiltrate the base. I expect In the end these were the ubiquitous rats in the partially filled ammo boxes we used for tent walls

Much else is a blur but we eventually convoyed out of the KSCB after the NVA faded away and the Army arrived. I think there was a fair amount of bitterness when the base was subsequently abandoned I got to perch up on a 6-by manning a .50cal MG as we went down Rte 9 past Lang Vei, the Rockpile short time in Dong Ha, then setting up in Quang Tri. I pulled some night guard duty in the tower on the perimeter, the only time I used a night scope on an M-16 to fire at a possible VC or NVA soldier outside the wire - not sure I hit him but it was the only time Ifired a weapon in-country. One night in the tent used to, movies at Quang Tri, Chief Ballew yelled "I'm hit" and crawled out to the BAS, where we found that a spent AK-47 round from somewhere outside the wire had entered the skin of his elbow. We pushed it out, put on a Band-Aid and he got a Purple Heart!

After Quang Tri we moved down towards Phu Bai where we stayed for a while in the countryside. I did MEDCAPS to civilians once by boat passing out soap and drugs, mostly Tylenol and ant-malarials and had a roadside beer in a small dive -- the label on the beer said bottled in French Indo-China so must have been old! At night I was occasionally on watch in a .50 cal pit on our perimeter fighting off mosquitos. One prank we pulled was lining up our Marines for inoculations in the BAS tent. At the end of the table we had filled a 50cc syringe with iodine and watched as the nervous Marines lined up thinking that it was the last of their shots before sending them out the tent relieved!

From that area we were sent to Hill 7 near Da Nang in support of the 7th Marines. It was the only position that I went out on perimeter patrol as a "grunt" but we had no contact. However, one day we took some AK-47 fire (it had a distinctly different sound from our M-16s) from the vill next door to our' camp that sent us diving for cover. We also lost our battalion exec, MAJ Green there when his jeep ran over a mine killing him and wounding the driver.

From Hill 7 we moved to Hill 55, surrounded by rice paddies, where I got to deliver a baby for one of the locals who was right back in the paddies the next day. Chief Ballew and I hitched a ride into DaNang to the PX one day and made a stop at pt Graves Co. where his brother (or an HMC friend?) was stationed -not a happy place with masks required. They were taking care of some casualties from a helicopter crash and I saw whom the Marines working there with their macabre sense of humor (needed to stay sane at Graves) called "crispy critters" ... Hill 55 was generally pretty quiet for us with no casualties over the next few weeks. Doc Lasker left us rather dramatically (see above) and I went CON US in August, replaced by another HM3 (name unknown). My tour was over.

P.S I stayed in the reserves and went back to Williams College to rekindle my academic failings in Jan 1969. I kept up with the war with the Navy Times and on the casualty list in Feb, 1969 was the name LCPL William Yaskanich. I had known him as "Tater", a wireman with 1/13 and wondered what had happened with our unit. Later that year, or early '70, I went to a campus party one night and met Jim Munroe, a fellow student (now Dean of the Episcopal Cathedral in Springfield MA). Jim said he'd also come back from Vietnam. "What unit?" I asked. "I was a FADAC guy in HQ BTRY 1/13"I Wow! I asked him what had happened to "Tater". He said the battery position outside Da Nang had been overrun by VC and that he had jumped in a hole with "Tater" when a Chi Com grenade was thrown in killing "Tater" and wounding him badly enough that he was sent home, winding up next year in the same small (1,200) student college I attended! - what are the odds? ... But I'm glad I found out about "Tater" R.I.P. I also heard my replacement had been killed although I can't recall his name.

My time in Vietnam did lead me to my career so I'm thankful both for surviving and for my vocation. I attended Cornell Med School, became an internist and infectious diseases specialist (also thanks to my tropical sojourn) and wound up as Professor of Medicine at Dalhousie University in Halifax, Nova Scotia. I'm happily married with 5 kids and 5 grandchildren (so far). Two of my boys are in the USAF, the oldest flying the C-130 and the younger the KC-10 re-fueler out of McGuire AFB so the family military tradition lives on.

Semper fidelis! ... and a Happy New Year to my surviving Red Clay brethren.

A PLACE THAT ALWAYS WAS

By Craig W. Tourte
HDQR 1/13 Khe Sanh 67-68

On Tuesday, November 10, 2009, the state of New Mexico dedicated and unveiled an Official Scenic Historic Road Marker honoring those who died at "The Battle of Khe Sanh, Vietnam 1968." The beautiful wooden marker is inscribed: "The Battle of Khe Sanh claimed the lives of 2,097 United States servicemen. This historic marker is dedicated to honor and preserve the memory of New Mexico servicemen who were killed in action or later died of their wounds. The Khe Sanh Vietnam veterans will forever live in each other's hearts." In addition, the marker is inscribed with the names of nine of those who were killed from the State of New Mexico. I am sure more names will eventually be included, as that information becomes available.

"The location of the "Official Scenic Historic Marker" is identified as being at New Mexico 124, Mile Marker 16.5. In actuality, it sits along the old Historic Route 66 Highway, North of Interstate 40 at the 104 Exit in an area identified as Acoma, New Mexico. It was an approximate 50-mile drive along Interstate 40 from the City of Albuquerque to reach an area known as "The Sky City." The Sky City is actually an area where the Acoma people lived centuries ago atop a mesa to protect themselves from enemy attacks by neighboring bands. The Native American's who live in the area are identified as the "Acoma" which means "Place of readiness." According to a little research, "Native American legend" describes Acoma as a "place that always was." Native history says "...it was first inhabited about 700 A.D." "Archaeologists agree that it has been continuously occupied from at least 1150 A.D. to the present." Acoma, New Mexico is generally considered "America's oldest continually inhabited city."

The drive from Albuquerque to "The Sky City" where the Historic Marker is located is not unlike any other drive I have taken along a desolated high desert highway. Long, straight and lonely for the bored and weary traveler who too often focuses attention on what's over the next rise. One could pass Acoma in the blink of an eye and never know anything was there except sand, sagebrush and red dirt. I wondered why a monument honoring these heroes would be erected in such a desolate location and not in a more densely populated area.

It was early evening when I drove out to the site of the Historic Road Marker where I met Harold E. Lockwood (HMH-CH-53 Sea Stallions) for the first time. Harold is a tall, proud Native American, former Marine and Vietnam Veteran who is the Sergeant at Arms of the National American Indian Veterans. We stood together as darkness approached, surrounded by red sky with a few wispy clouds off in the distance and tall red table top mountains rising up from the desert floor. Harold identified his house a quarter mile or so away from where we were standing. With the swing of his arm in a wide arc he told me about his cousins, friends, other relatives and Native Americans who lived nearby and identified those who had served and those who had made the ultimate sacrifice, all from the Reservations. We talked about the arrival of the early Missionaries, the Native American children who had been taken from their parents and even to this day, the hardships his people face.

We spent a few minutes talking about his service in the United States Marine Corps and the three years he served in Vietnam. The tragically brutal injuries and death he had observed as a helicopter machine gunner, too often recovering the dead and wounded. The missions off of ships made by young boys who eagerly entered combat for the first time, all dressed in new green uniforms and combat gear and his painful recovery of their remains after the battles. Harold remembered all of these events clearly and with great sadness as he looked up into that red evening sky, silently remembering the pain that is often overwhelming, as he searched for the words that would somehow explain to the outsider, the horrors he had witnessed. Remembrances I knew were still prevalent there were a group of young children from one of the local Native American schools who performed a dance. Adorned in Native American costume, I observed they all had very intense looks on their faces. I realized that the dance these children performed was a serious cultural interpretation of events and beliefs that had been handed down from one generation to the next. The dance was significant to the Native People and fitting in that it was performed in memory of those who had sacrificed for their people and our country.

As I stood alone looking out across the Acoma, viewing the red earth color of the valley and hills, not so dissimilar in color to the red clay of Khe Sanh, I glanced up into the very wide-open sky and understood why fate had brought "The Battle of Khe Sanh" marker here. Somehow fate had brought this remembrance marker to this spot, because this place is a "Place That Always Was," A "Place of Readiness" and in a way, a place of safety for those who we will never forget.

IN MEMORIAM: THOMAS "TOMMY" EICHLER

Tom Eichler (1940 - 2024) KSV Treasurer.

We are deeply saddened to announce the passing of Thomas Eichler, the treasurer of the Khe Sanh Veterans, U.S. Marine Corps Vietnam Veteran, and Retired Chicago Police Sergeant. Tom was a proud Marine who fiercely fought for his country in Vietnam. His bravery and service were recognized with the prestigious Bronze Star, Silver Star, and Purple Heart.

Tom's spirit of service, both in his professional and personal life, will be deeply missed by his family, friends, and the Khe Sanh Veterans community.

FROM THE DESK OF RUSS TURNER— PRESIDENT

Well friends, it's been an eventful couple of months since the reunion in Louisville KY. As most of you know Tommy Eichler has passed away and has left a void in the organization felt by many He was a huge contributing factor in keeping this organization moving forward. And with the heart of so many members—it will continue on.

This will be the last Publication of the RED CLAY until a new Editor steps up to take over. If interested, please contact me or someone on the Board of Directors.

With the passing of Tom I have taken on the duties of Treasurer (with the Boards approval) until we can get a permanent treasurer.

We had some issues with the bank as well as the IRS regarding our 501c . The bank issues are taken care of, however we are still pending with the IRS. We hope to have things cleared up with them soon, but as we all know, working with the Government can take some time. We will IMPROVISE, ADAPT AND OVERCOME!

RE— RED CLAY PAST ISSUES

FROM BILL RING

As many are aware the Red Clay was entirely composed, and distributed by Tom Eichler. With his passing the future of Red Clay is questionable as no one has volunteered to take up the task.

In the interim a few of us are in the process of collecting copies of the magazine to have them put into a digital format that is searchable by various means. This will preserve all the articles for not only our own use but for future generations and historians to study. We have a number of copies from Tom Eichler's home as well as copies from my collection as well from Jim Velcheck's basement!!! The complete list of on hand copies will send out under a separate email. What I am asking if there are anyone out there who has squirreled away copies to let me know the edition numbers and or date of publication so we can fill in the blanks.

OBIT

James Alan Thorsen, 76, of Duluth MN, passed away peacefully on Sunday February 11th, 2024. He was born on August 16th, 1947 in Duluth, MN to Lloyd and Eleanor Thorsen. Jim married Doris Watten on August 18th, 1973 in Duluth, MN. Jim served in the US Marine Corp from 1966 until 1972, including serving in Vietnam at the Battle of Khe Sanh. He was awarded many honors including, a Presidential Unit Citation and a Purple Heart for his service in the US Marine Corps. Jim also served as a Sergeant Troop Leader at Camp Pendleton. He returned to Duluth and pursued an education in engineering and architecture. He worked for MN Power in Facilities Management for 27 years. He volunteered for the VA DAV driving veterans to and from MPLS. He enjoyed being with friends and family, especially his granddaughter, Milly. He is preceded in death by his parents, and brother, Roger. He is survived by his wife Doris, daughter Sara (Ben) Schoenbauer, and granddaughter Milly.

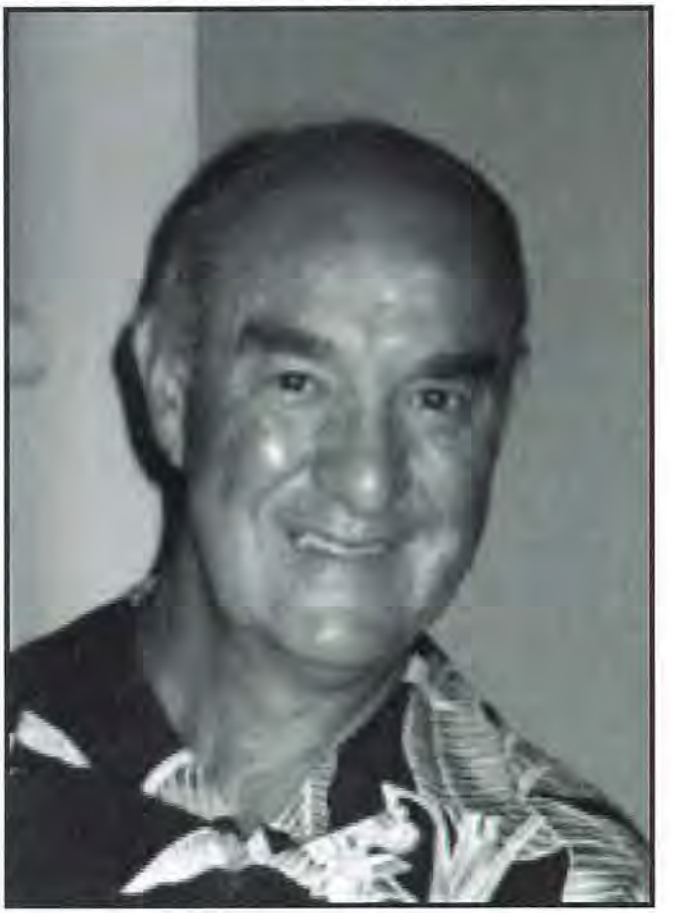
OBIT

Jim Hall's military career commenced shortly after his graduation in 1966, when he enlisted in the Marines, embarking on a path that would test his fortitude and resilience. Basic training in San Diego and advanced preparation at Camp Pendleton prepared him for the challenges ahead. Deployed to Vietnam, Hall faced the realities of war, participating in significant operations near the DMZ. His first encounter with adversity came during the battle for Cam



Lo Hill, where he sustained injuries that earned him his first Purple Heart.

Continued Service and Second Purple Heart
Legacy of a Marine

Returning to Augusta, Hall's life took a new direction as he joined the Army Guard, served with the 184th Air National Guard, and built a family, yet his Marine Corps ethos remained a guiding force. His story, a testament to the enduring spirit of those who serve, continues to inspire pride and respect within his community and beyond. Jim Hall's narrative is not just one of military engagement but of unwavering dedication to country, a sentiment that resonates with fellow veterans and civilians alike.

Jim Hall's journey from Augusta to the battlefields of Vietnam and back is a poignant reminder of the sacrifices made by military personnel. His story, marked by courage, resilience, and dedication, offers a window into the personal cost of conflict and the enduring spirit of those who serve. As Hall reflects on his service, his pride in being a Marine shines through, underscoring the deep bonds and commitment that define the military experience. Through his eyes, we gain insight into the complexities of war and the indomitable will of those who face its challenges head-on.

RAYMOND BOLTON OBITUARY

Raymond Paul Bolton, age 75, passed away on Monday, April 29, 2024 in Elk Grove, California due to kidney failure.

Ray was born on June 5, 1948 in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania to parents Dorothea Emma Gusovius Bolton and Joseph Daniel Bolton, both from Philadelphia.

Ray proudly served in the United States Marine Corps during the Vietnam War engaging in combat patrols as part of the 1st Searchlight Battery. In this assignment, he would travel alone in a jeep at night using infrared and white light to identify enemy positions. He received several military medals for his service including a Navy Commendation Medal for defending the Cam Lo Bridge after detecting enemy soldiers attempting to place demolition charges, the Presidential Unit Citation for his part protecting the Khe Sanh combat base during active combat, and a Purple Heart due to being injured in battle.

His service in the Marine Corps shaped much of his life and values. He forged a bond of brotherhood with every veteran he encountered, often addressing each other as "brother" before parting ways. He frequently treated young veterans to meals whenever he spotted them in restaurants. Following his military service, he had a 30-year career as a U.S. postal worker.

Ray cherished traveling alongside his wife, exploring his family's ancestral homes in Ireland and Great Britain. He also loved to be near the ocean with Hawaii ranking as his top destination. He would also make frequent trips to Monterey and Carmel, California. In addition, he enjoyed shopping for hats, watches, and collecting memorabilia related to the U.S. Marine Corps Ray was always generous to those he saw in need. Often, he would buy lunch for an individual he felt needed some help. He was known to offer money to nieces and nephews for French fries, a new suit, or anything he felt they needed. He also loved and cared for a group of cats in his neighborhood (much to the chagrin of his neighbors and brother-in-law who had to feed them when Ray traveled).

He is survived by his wife, Donna Scott Bolton of Elk Grove, California, his sister, Doris Jean Bolton Walsh of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and his nieces and nephews: Robert Walsh, Barbara Walsh Martina, Donna Bolton Wingood, Michael Bolton, Marybeth Bolton Mahadas, Jacqui Bolton Gilpin, and Karen Bolton White.

He is preceded in death by his parents, Dorothea and Joseph Bolton, and his brothers, Joseph Daniel (Sonny) and John Robert (Jackie) Bolton.

Funeral services were held on Monday, May 13, 2024 from 9:30 am to 10:30 am at the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints chapel located at 8679 Elk Grove Blvd., Elk Grove, CA 95624. Interment was held the same day at 12:30 pm at the Sacramento Valley National Cemetery in Dixon, California.

OBIT

Donald "Don" Gene Bigler, 76, of Cypress, Texas, passed away June 1, 2024, after succumbing to a short battle with brain cancer. Don was born in Littlefield, Texas, to Emil and Margaret Bigler on September 7, 1947. He attended schools in both Floyd and Portales, New Mexico, and graduated from Floyd High School in 1965. He voluntarily entered military service with the United States Marine Corps and deployed to Vietnam with rifle company Kilo, 3rd Battalion, 3rd Marines (Kilo 3/3). He left South Vietnam in July 1967 after being wounded in The Hill Fights (also known as the First Battle of Khe Sanh). Don was honorably discharged with the rank of sergeant in January 1969. Upon returning home to Portales, he married Janice Kaye Webb on February 16, 1969 (later divorced in 2009). He worked the family farm in Floyd while attending Eastern New Mexico University, where he earned a Bachelor of Science degree in Political Science.

During the same period, sons Tyson and Cade were born. He then worked as an adjuster for Farm Bureau Insurance in Espanola, New Mexico, before moving to Artesia where he earned his Commercial Driver License (CDL) with Halliburton. Upon the birth of son Josh in 1977, the family moved to Carlsbad where Don started driving 18-wheelers for Furr's Supermarkets. In 1983, the family moved to Fort Sumner where Don started driving for Walmart. Over the next few years, the family split time between Fort Sumner and Portales, eventually leaving New Mexico in 1987 for Brady, Texas. A final job transfer to New Braunfels occurred in 1990, with early retirement beginning in 1994 after sustaining a debilitating lower-back injury. Walmart honored him with a safety award for driving one million miles without an accident.

Early retirement was not something Don had envisioned, but he met the challenge head-on. Eventually the open road beckoned to him, and he set about travelling the country with a fifth wheel trailer for about ten years. He made new friends along the way, met up with old friends and family too, and routinely came back to Texas to be near his sons and their growing families. He spent his final years in the Cypress/Tomball area. Don's strong faith in the Lord helped him through many challenges. He was a long-standing member of the Church of Christ, most recently with the Waller congregation. Earlier in life he served as a deacon. He was always curious and liked to learn new things. He loved working with his hands and was an avid sports fan.

Don was preceded in death by his mother and father, along with his sister Gayle Herron of Albuquerque.

He is survived by his sons and their families, Tyson and Kathy Bigler (Tomball, Texas), Cade Bigler (Cypress, Texas), and Josh and Shomika Bigler (Cedar Park, Texas); a sister, Kay Heflin (Abilene, Texas), a sister and her husband, Faye and Travis Mitchell (Yuma, Arizona), and ex-wife Jan Bigler (Tomball, Texas). Other survivors include thirteen grandchildren, one great-grandchild, and numerous aunts, uncles, cousins, nieces, and nephews. Don's final resting place is at Hill Country Memorial Gardens cemetery, 11700 State Highway 46 West, New Braunfels, Texas 78132. .

OBIT

CHARLES M. MCINTYRE, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN, H&S CO 1/26 81 MORTARS

Charles Michael McIntyre, Mike, Mac, or Charlie to most, 76, of Edmond, Oklahoma, went to be with our Lord on July 9, 2024.

The Mass of Christian Burial was celebrated at 10:00 am July 17, 2024, at St. Monica Catholic Church, 2001 N. Western, Edmond, Oklahoma, with Father Balireddy Ponnapati presiding. Burial l followed the funeral at Resurrection Memorial Cemetery at 12:00 noon.

Mike was born in Oklahoma City, OK on May 21, 1948, but spent most of his youth in Chickasha, OK where he attended St. Joseph Catholic School. After his further education had been interrupted by the Vietnam Nam War, he received a GED and earned a BA Degree from the University of Central Oklahoma. However, for the majority of his college years, he attended and became an avid, life time fan of the University of Oklahoma

Mike served his country with honors from 1965-1969 in the US Marine Corps. As a highly decorated veteran, he earned these awards: National Defense Service Medal, Vietnam Service Medal, The Vietnamese Cross of Gallantry with a Bronze Star, 2 Good Combat Medals, The Combat Action Ribbon, Presidential Unit Citation and multiple other commendations, citations, and awards. He served three tours of duty in Vietnam and survived the seventy-seven day Siege of Khe Sanh. In 2020, he completed and published a book, Shining in Infinity, which was inspired by his experiences while in the Marine Corps.

Mike began a law enforcement career as an officer of the OU Campus Police before joining the Oklahoma City Police Department in 1973. After graduating from the academy, he was assigned to the Patrol Division where he excelled and was soon transferred to other specialty units within the department that included Special Projects, F.A.S.T Unit, and the Criminal Intelligence unit.

While assigned to the Criminal Intelligence unit, he investigated or assisted in the investigation of several high-profile criminal cases. His dedication to his work resulted in receiving the Medal for Meritorious Service in 2001. He also received exemplary recognition by the Vietnamese for crimes committed against their community and numerous other awards and citations. Mike retired from the Oklahoma City Police Department in 2003. Soon after, he worked at Chesapeake and played an integral role in their security department. Though most will remember his continued law enforcement service throughout his later years while enjoying and providing security at the Municipal Employees Credit Union.

Mike married Patty O'Dea in 1969. They were married for 27 years and shared three amazing children. He stood faithfully by her side until she lost her battle with cancer. In 1998, Mike married Jan Cooper who also had three wonderful children, and they lived 26 beautiful years together.

KHE SANH VETERANS IN THE NEWS

Post 290 named Ronald Shouse : B BTRY 1/13, the "Legionnaire of the Year" at their July meeting.

King American Legion Post 290 convenes for their July meeting, during which the post awarded Ron Shouse with Legionnaire of the Year. submitted

King American Legion Post 290 Commander Ed Ballard presents Ron Shouse with the Legionnaire of the Year award in July.

Shouse, a U.S. Marine Corps veteran who served in Vietnam, was indeed not expecting any award don't think he expected it," said Post Commander Ed Ballard. "He acted kind of surprised, and it's hard to get one over on him." Everybody's usually picking at me to start with; I I figured it was another 'joke on Shouse' type thing," he said with a laugh. It's flattering, to be quite honest," Shouse said. "I couldn't quite get over the fact that they thought enough of me to do something like that. I never thought of myself as anything great." The award may have been a surprise — it had been years since the post honored their top volunteer with the title — but it was no joke.

He is quite a guy," Ballard said. "I nominated him for 'Legionnaire of the Year' because all the work he does around the post. He does it, no questions...painting, repairing, fixing, building. Whatever we need on the post, he just does it. For lack of a better word, he just works his butt off."

Shouse also calls bingo every Friday night at the Legion and is a leader on the post's honor guard. The detail serves at more than 40 funerals annually. Everybody loves him at bingo," Ballard said, adding that Shouse had recently traveled to Mount Airy to pick up the fair books for the upcoming Stokes County Agricultural Fair, the post's largest fundraiser.

Clifton Kilby, finance officer for Post 290 and vice-commander of the North Carolina American Legion, said Shouse tackles an ongoing list of odd jobs I would say, just about every day if you go by the post, around 8:30, 9'oclock [a.m.] that Ron's up there doing something," said Kilby, noting that as he spoke, Shouse was at the Legion painting the flagpole. He's put in a lot of hours," Kilby said, "a lot more hours than anybody else." That fact was not lost on the post membership, and they wanted to show their appreciation.

"I said, 'well, we haven't had a Legionnaire of the Year in a while, and it sounds like that's what you all are talking about,'" Kilby said. In addition to acknowledging the efforts of a dedicated volunteer, reinstating the award is part of a successful effort to build engagement. The local Legionnaire of the Year is eligible to win at the state and national levels

"We're trying to make the post a little bit bigger now and better than what it has been in the past," Shouse said. "We're trying to dress it up and make it appealing to the younger generation."

Shouse doesn't seek out the attention brought by the award, but if it helps the post it's another job he's willing to do. He also downplays his military service. Shouse joined the Marines in 1966 as a senior at North Forsyth High School. Six months after I went in, I was walking the swamps in Vietnam," Shouse said. He was 18.

"I got shot at a couple of times over there, so that and 50 cents will buy you a cup of coffee somewhere," he said. "I didn't feel like it was anything fantastic then; I don't feel like what I've done is anything great now. I was just lucky enough to do it." It turns out being "shot at a couple of times" included fighting in the Battle of Khe Sanh The official U.S. Marine Corps website provides a refresher on that battle's significance:

In early 1968, Khe Sanh Combat Base gained world -wide attention as the roughly 6,000 Marines defending the base were encircled and besieged by three North Vietnamese Army regiments of about 20,000 troops. For 77 days, the Marines and their South Vietnamese counterparts, with support from an element of U.S. Army soldiers and U.S. Air Force bombers, would endure one of the longest and bloodiest battles of the Vietnam War."

Shouse was an artilleryman supporting infantry companies. "That was my job, and I did what I had to do. And that's what I'm doing over here right now," he said of his volunteer work at the Legion, which at the time of the interview, consisted of changing a battery in a tractor, moving vehicles and generally helping prepare the barn for a youth event the following day.

"I see some things that need to be done, and I'm just dumb enough to tell people that I know how to do it. So here I am," he said with a smile.

Shouse's Marine service ended in 1970. After retiring from Stroh's Brewing Co. in 2000, he dedicated his life to volunteering, helping spearhead the construction of the Veterans Memorial in Tobaccoville and eventually becoming active in Post 290. "I feel better for it," said Shouse. "Maybe that's the reason the good Lord saw fit to let me walk out of some places in Vietnam that I shouldn't have.

The veteran lives in unincorporated Forsyth County near Tobaccoville. His wife, Lynn Shouse, is active with the Legion Auxiliary and serves as assistant fair manager. ("She works her butt off," Ballard said.) Shouse is proud of his daughters and grandkids and, while genuinely appreciative of the award, is not much for the acclaim. "I just enjoy helping people as much as I can, and I don't need any kind of accolade for doing something like that." King American Legion Post 290 convenes for their July meeting, during which the post awarded Ron Shouse with Legionnaire of the Year.

Brothers-in-funny-hats: U.S. Marine Corps veterans Ron Shouse, left, and Post 290 Chaplain John Winfrey, are photographed together. "He is the reason I joined the Legion (but don't tell him)," Winfrey said of Shouse.

OBIT

Ret. Col. Robert Foerster , USAF

It is with profound sadness that we announce that Ret. Col. Robert (Bob) Yates Foerster, of Niceville, FL, passed away on November 24, 2024. Bob was born on August 16, 1942, in Baltimore, Maryland.

Bob graduated from the Air Force Academy in 1965 alongside his close friends from the 24th Squadron with whom he had lived for all four years of his cadet career. In 1966, Bob graduated from undergraduate pilot training at Reese Air Force Base in Lubbock, TX. Bob then went onto fly a C-130 aircraft in Vietnam in support of the defense of Khe Sanh. His Air Force career was heavily linked to the Academy-he served as First Group Air Officer Commanding, 1977-1979, as Chief of Staff to the Academy Superintendent, 1979-1983, and then as Registrar and Director of Admissions until his retirement from the Air Force in 1996.

In addition to his time at the Academy, the highlights of Bob's career included serving as the Director of Operations at Pope Air Force Base in North Carolina and Wing Commander at Clark Air Base in the Philippines

(then the largest airlift wing in the Pacific). Bob was a pillar of strength for our family and his absence will forever leave a void in our hearts. Bob was an avid golfer, greatly enjoyed sailing, and had a deep connection to nature and the outdoors. He is predeceased by his parents, Ellen Yates Foerster and Frederick Henry Foerster Jr. (USMA '39), second wife Sheila D. Foerster, and stepson Mark Larkin.

He is survived by his wife Theresa Ann Guay Foerster, first wife Linda Bishop, brothers Schuyler Foerster (Col USAF-Ret '71) and Frederick Henry Foerster III, children Katrina Varela, Leslie Presby, and Janet Sickle, as well numerous grandchildren, great grandchildren, and nieces and nephews.

Harold Elvin Rosson, Jr., 76, of Hamilton, passed away at his home Sunday morning, December 8, 2024.

Harold was born April 9, 1948, the son of Harold Elvin and Barbara Jean (Brown) Rosson, Sr., in Normandy, Missouri. After graduating from high school, he went to work as a design engineer for McDonnell Douglas. Mr. Rosson served in the Marine Corps from May of 1967 until he retired in April of 1971 after receiving the Purple Heart award. He served with the 1st Battalion, 9th Marines (The Walking Dead.) He served at Con Thien in '67, A Shau Valley in both '67 and '68 and was wounded at Khe Sanh on February 23, 1968. He farmed upon his return home and then owned and operated Supreme Swine in Elvaston for 44 years. Harold remained active in the Keokuk American Legion Post 41, the V.F.W. and Hancock County Honor Guard. He enjoyed hunting and fishing and enjoyed tournaments for 20 years. In 2007 he was united in marriage to Andrea Pierson in Miami, Oklahoma.

Harold is survived by his wife, Andrea, of Hamilton; sons, Scott (Amie) Rosson of Nauvoo and Randy (Kim) Rosson of Weldon Spring, Missouri; daughters, Melia (Jesse) Moore and Stephanie (Kerry) Bitner, both of Ottumwa; nine grandchildren; two great grandchildren; two brothers, Stephen A. (Michelle) Rosson of Highland City, IL and Mike (Nicholle) Rosson of Wentzville, MO; and a sister, Cindie Johnson of St. Louis.

He was preceded death by his parents; and his grandparents, Calloway Elvin and Isabel (Cashion)

OBIT

GAYLEN B. DOANE, USAF, KHE SANH VETERAN

Gaylen Bruce Doane was born on August 30, 1936, in Gilman, Iowa. He was the son of Bruce and Eva Doane, deceased. His only sibling, LaVonne, is also deceased. He is survived by his wife, Pauline Doane of Meredith, N.H, nephew, Ron Clay, of Las Vegas, NV, daughter, Shelly Brewer and her husband Kevin of Laconia, NH, granddaughter, Jillian Dreyer and husband Matthew of Tampa, FL along with extended family members in NH. Gaylen (aka "GB") enjoyed golf, traveling, going to the movies, and most of all a nice dinner out with family and friends. He was known to be very smart, quick with math, kind and pleasant. GB was loved by all who were lucky enough to have known him. Gaylen graduated from Gilman High School in 1954 whereupon he began exam preparations for the Naval Academy.

The following year, 1955, he received a very coveted Congressional Appointment to the US Naval Academy, Annapolis, MD. Four (4) years later in 1959, Gaylen graduated with a Bachelor of Science Degree in Engineering and was commissioned a 2nd Lieutenant in the United States Air Force. He was selected for Flight School which he completed in early 1961 and proceeded to his first flying assignment in Evreux, France flying C-130(s). His missions there varied and included extensive travel to all of Europe, Africa, and he Middle East, the most significant of which included an extended deployment of several months in Kano, Nigeria. The next phase of Gaylen's military career represented a dramatic change to the more technical side of the Air Force consisting of a tour at Cape Canaveral (now The Kennedy Space Center) in support of the then newly launched U.S. Space Effort to place a man in space. This somewhat short tour culminated in his enrollment in Graduate School at Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute where he graduated in 1967 with a Master of Science Degree. By this time the War in Vietnam was raging and required the services of all. Due to his previous and extensive foreign flying experience, he was assigned to a Tactical Combat Squadron stationed in CCK, Taichung, Taiwan. From here he flew his weekly combat missions into Vietnam; he earned the Distinguished Flying Cross during the battle of Khe Sanh.

This was to be Gaylen's last flying assignment for any other than fulfillment of his flying proficiency requirements which were accomplished in twin-engine executive jets (Saberliners) used to facilitate travel for this last and final military assignment, Space and Missile Systems Command, located in Los Angeles. He spent the last ten (10) years of his military career at this location. He retired after 20 years in late 1979. Prior to this date he began to study law and accounting and worked part-time accordingly. Upon retirement, Gaylen formed the company, East-West Coast Mgt., Inc., a Florida Real Estate Corporation which served as an all-encompassing real estate entity, brokering, constructing, and managing commercial property consisting mostly of shopping centers and medically related facilities.

OBIT

On Tuesday, July 2nd at 7:21 pm, we said goodbye to a husband, father, brother, grandfather, and friend. Joseph Paul Abrams was born on October 13, 1947, and was relieved of duty on July 2, 2024. He was the son of the late Joseph and Frances Abrams.

Joseph was a United States Marine in Vietnam from 1966-1968 and one of the surviving Marines from the Battle of Khe-Sanh; he came home and became a Long Island Railroad Police officer in NYC for 27 years.

He lived a remarkable life marrying his Sweet pea, Sandy Abrams, whom he met while working as she walked through Jamaica station. After searching for her in Guatemala, he found her, and they were married 1 year later. They have been married for 49 years. He is survived by his wife, Sandy; his brother Steven (wife, Sharon), his children, Joey (wife, Liz), Paul (wife, Julie); Charles (wife, Danielle); Daughter, Krystal. He is also survived by his grandchildren Isabella (her mother, Melissa) Gianna, Gabriella, Rocco, Joey, Sofia, Nicolas, Ava, Lorenzo, Luke, Olivia, Josephine, and Franco.

OBIT

October 11, 1945 – July 8, 2024 - Steve Crittenden, 78, passed away on July 8, 2024 due to complications from a stroke at the Select specialty hospital in Richmond Virginia.

Steve was born at Naval Hospital, Camp Lejeune, Jacksonville, North Carolina on October 11, 1945 to Chuck and Marellen Crittenden. His dad, a Marine, served in WWII and the Korean War. He moved the family to Camp Pendleton toward the end of WWII and eventually moved to Lake Oswego, Oregon where Steve grew up and graduated from Lake Oswego High, class of 63. Steve attended the University of Oregon and later joined the Marine Corps through the Platoon Leaders Class (PLC). He was commissioned a 2nd Lieutenant in July 1967 and served as an infantry officer.

He served a tour in Vietnam where he participated in the Battle of Khe Sanh. He left active duty in the Marine Corps in 1971 and served as a reservist only to come back into the Corps in February 1975. He met his wife, Ann, while on a tour as a Public Affairs Officer in New York City where he ultimately convinced Ann that joining the Marine Corps would be the only occupation she should choose! Their long careers took them to Cherry Point NC, Los Angeles, California where Steve served as the Commanding Officer of Recruiting Station Los Angeles and Okinawa Japan where he again served as the Commanding Officer of Headquarters and Service Battalion, 3d Force Service Support Group (renamed later as Marine Logistics Group (MLG). He served honorably until April 1991 and retired. Upon retirement from the Marine Corps, he and his wife Ann and their three children, Zeph, Michael and Maddie, made Stafford, Virginia their home.

Luck, Destiny, or Devine Intervention?

55 years ago in March of 1969, I came home from Vietnam after serving with Echo Co. 2/26th Marines, starting with the Siege of Khe Sanh (I had just turned 18 four months earlier). I had written to a young lady (Linda) for several months and we shared stories. Me about Vietnam and her about her dog Charlie, her family, etc. My younger brother Tom had asked her to write to me and she said she would if I wrote first. I did, and that started a fairly regular letter exchange (me when I could).

While in Vietnam, I tried to extend for 6 months more, but was turned down due to my top security clearance and a new destination of NSA, Ft. Meade, Maryland. This becomes important because had I stayed for 6 months all that came after changes dramatically. Would I have survived, would I ever had met Linda, etc.

When I came home, I called Linda and asked her if she wanted to go on a date. She said she would, but I had to meet her family first. I hung up the phone, I figured, damn, I don't want to marry this lady, just go on a date. Then, I came to my senses, and called her back to say I would be glad to meet her family.

We went on our date to see what I thought was a cowboy movie, but turned out to be a war movie "Where Eagles Dare" and then dated for the next 17 days of my leave before I had to be at NSA, Ft. Meade, MD. On one of my weekend visits home, I asked Linda to go to Ambridge (her hometown).

We went to a local jeweler and he asked me what I was looking for. He showed me engagement rings and I turned to Linda and said "Pick the one you want". She was stunned for a few minutes, believing I had taken her there to pick out a ring for someone else. I said it is yours. Now, I have never been bright in the woman department, but I made up for this proposal snafu over the years since.

We were married on August 2nd,1969, about 4 months after we met. Linda later told me she told her sister, when I drove over to pick her up for our first date that I was the one she was going to marry. She had another suitor who had wanted to marry her.

Some time after we were married my mom was talking to Linda and the conversation came up about her being in the hospital and a kind woman gave her a doll (she was about 7). In those days you were placed on wards. My mom told her that she was the woman who gave her the doll, because I was also in the hospital (I was about 8) on the same ward.

Despite a terrible war, nightmares, PTSD, AO, numerous medications, meeting and falling in love with my wife and our life together has made it all worth it.

Coincidence, luck, destiny, divine intervention, you decide. We will be married 55 years on August 2nd, 2024!

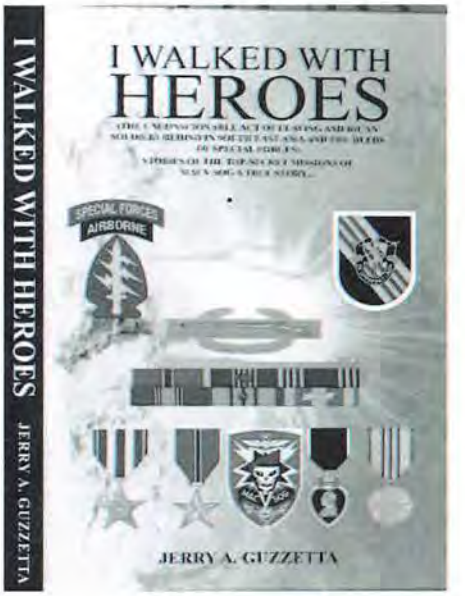
BOOK REVIEW

I Walked with Heroes, Jerry Guzzetta's new biography, chronicles the stories of the US military's most patriotic and brave figures.

The book serves as a historical collection of the events that these courageous souls went through in order to serve and protect their country. Guzzetta's book is an eye-opener to the kind of life that people in the military live, the dangers they face, and the high stakes they work in.

The author describes a number of the covert operations he and his group carried out, in which their presence in enemy territory was a threat to their lives. The people of America owe their safety to these heroes, who showed us to be tenacious and bold in the face of adversity rather than giving up.



OBIT

NORMAN JASPER

A great citizen of the United States of America was lost when Norman Joshua Jasper died on April 18th, 2024.

His life started humbly, born in the town of Shipman, Illinois with a population of only 250 people. Norman grew up during the Great Depression, and lived his life on the honesty of a handshake and a smile being sufficient for all professional dealings. His favorite saying:" Good people are like cream. They always rise to the top."

Norman was successful with all sports available to him. After graduating high school, he earned his four-year degree from Illinois State University. His major in physical fitness with a minor in history made him a valuable selection for Officer Candidate School (OCS) with the United States Marine Corps. His photo as 2nd lieutenant with the USMC is pictured above.

Norman Jasper excelled in military training with both the Army and the Marines. His Army training included Ranger school, 2nd Division Recon. battalion, and 82nd Airborne Division, among others. He was proud of making 300 free falls and made 365 parachute jumps in 8 years. His deep regret he did not have the talent to learn a second language. That obstacle kept him from becoming a full Army Green Beret.

With his thorough military training, Norman volunteered for active duty in the Vietnam War. His fondest memory was as Kilo Company Commander, 3rd Battalion, 26th Marines on hill 861, Khe Sanh, Vietnam. His less than 400 men were up against a North Vietnamese Regiment of 1000 soldiers. This time is called "The Siege" of Vietnam, where boots on the ground Marines were hit by heavy bombing and machine gun artillery fire. Norman Jasper was wounded in combat on January 21,1968; along with 25 of his fellow Marines. On that date in spite of the irreconcilable odds, there were only 10 casualties of Kilo company, 26th Marines. His combat wounds earned Norman Jasper a Purple Heart medal with 2 stars, the Vietnamese Cross of Gallantry with Gold star, and later was awarded The Bronze Star with Combat V.

His leadership and skill to lead the Marines and "Hold the Hill 861" are recorded in "The Battle for Khe Sanh" by Captain Moyers S. Shore II, USMC, Historical Branch, G-3 Division 1969, page 40. Norman Jasper is featured in the book "Last Stand at Khe Sanh" the U.S. Marines' finest hour in Vietnam by Gregg Jones. He submitted materials to the author and was interviewed on January 27, 2012.

Other periodicals and materials the family did not have access to include. Norman's reading scripture in the Vietnam War and in life is the 91st Psalm of the King James Bible.

Within a year of Honorable Discharge from the USMC, Norman Jasper was hired in pharmaceutical sales then retired after 25 years. He never stopped working to improve Veterans treatment and causes. In 1987 Norman was able to push for the Military Order of the Purple Heart license plates for the State of Virginia with political a assistance. He was active in membership of over 21 different Veteran groups. The Vietnam Veterans of America, Military Order of the World Wars, Blue Ridge All Airborne Division, and the Military Order of the Purple Heart are to name a few. His last year of activity before his infirmity caught up with him was 2018.

LLOYD T STRASNER JR. USMC

Lloyd T. Strasner, Jr. (Butch), age 76, of Katy, Texas, passed away September 3, 2024. Born August 25, 1948, in Little Rock, Arkansas. He was preceded in death by his parents, Lloyd T. Strasner, Sr. and Christine Lampkin; nephew, Dennis Davis. Butch is survived by his children, Shannon Ethridge (Lee); Sean Strasner (Loretta); grandchildren Chase Ethridge (Jessica); Mackenzie Strasner; Lindsay Ethridge; Zoe Naraghi; Jaden Naraghi; great grandchild Clara Ethridge; sisters Betty Davis (Jim); Linda Beard (Lee) and numerous nieces and nephews plus his loyal dog, Pepper, who was by his side when he died.

Butch, a Vietnam Veteran, served honorably in the United States Marine Corps from 1967-1970. During his time in Vietnam, he fought in the Battle of Khe Sanh, one of the bloodiest and longest battles of the war. He remained close friends with his fellow comrades from the 2nd Battalion, 26th Marines (2/26) Foxtrot Company, with whom he reunites annually through the Khe Sanh Veterans Association, having just returned from one on Sunday.

Butch graduated from North Little Rock High School in 1967 prior to joining the Marine Corps. He worked in the Gas Control Unit for El Paso Corporation in Houston, Texas and had to retire early in 1995 due to health issues. Butch enjoyed hunting and fishing in his earlier years and was an avid football fan with Notre Dame being his favorite team. He also loved playing golf with the Silver Eagles at Meadowbrook Farm in Katy, Texas for many years. Butch loved to travel both domestically and internationally, having visited approximately 50 countries.

OBIT

Larry H. Weaver, of Evening Shade, Arkansas, passed away peacefully on June 6, 2024, at the age of 75. Born on July 18, 1948, in Batesville, Arkansas, Larry lived a life marked by dedication, service, and unwavering faith.

Larry enlisted in the U.S. Marine Corps on August 9, 1965, at just seventeen years old. He trained rigorously for over a year before becoming eligible for combat duty. Larry served two tours of duty in Vietnam, demonstrating extraordinary bravery and leadership. His first tour began in February 1967, where he served as an infantry fire team leader and later as an infantry squad leader with F Company, 2nd Battalion, 3rd Regiment, 3rd Marine Division. Larry saw action in significant battles at Khe Sanh, Hill 881, and Hill 861. Despite being wounded three times, he returned to the battlefield, earning three Purple Hearts, a Silver Star, and a Navy Commendation Medal with combat "V".

An article from March 2, 1968, highlighted Larry's gallantry and bravery during his service. It detailed his heroic actions on May 3, 1967, when his squad was pinned down by enemy machine gun fire. Despite being seriously wounded, Larry moved forward, throwing grenades into enemy positions and preserving the lives of his comrades. His actions on this day earned him the Silver Star Medal. The article also mentioned his continued bravery, including leaping into an enemy bunker to kill the remaining defenders and later helping a wounded Marine under heavy enemy fire, despite his own injuries. His unwavering courage and dedication were widely recognized and honored.

In May 1970, Larry returned to Vietnam for a second tour, this time serving as a sergeant with a Combined Action Platoon with H Company, 2nd Battalion, 5th Regiment, 1st Marine Division. His squad worked closely with South Vietnamese soldiers and civilians, teaching defense techniques and serving as humanitarians.

After his distinguished military service, Larry pursued his passion for ministry, graduating from Liberty Home Bible Institute with a degree in General Bible Studies. For over 27 years, he served as a volunteer jail minister, offering spiritual guidance and support to inmates from 1996 until 2023. Larry was preceded in death by his parents, Lewis and Lorene Weaver; his first wife, Bobbye Weaver; and his brothers, Price and Jerry Rush. He is survived by his loving wife, Nancy Weaver; his children, Bobby Rush, Virginia Rush Smith, Gavin Franke, Nathan Marlin, and Natalie Marlin; and his cherished grandchildren, Brandon Manley, Danielle Manley, Matthew Smith, Alli Polston, Abri Franke, Oliver Marlin, Laura Lamme, Charlie Lamme, and Wendy Hardy. Larry's legacy continues through his great-grandchildren, Lucero, Trentin, Julianna, Neveah, Jada, and Kaitlyn.

A memorial service to celebrate Larry's life was held on June 14, 2024, at 2 PM at the First Baptist Church of Evening Shade.

FROM THE PODIUM OF JIM "OLLIE" COLLINS USMC - -KEY SPEAKER MARINE CORP BALL NEWPORT, RHODE ISLAND

" " GOOD EVENING EVERYONE" "

AS A MEMBER OF THE "KHE SANH VETERANS ASSOCIATION" I WAS ASKED BY LEADERSHIP MEMBERS OF THE "MARINE CORPS DETACHMENT, NEWPORT, RHODE ISLAND TO BE THE "KEY NOTE SPEAKER" AT THE 249TH MARINE CORPS "BIRTHDAY BALL."

I WAS CERTAINLY HONORED AND EXCITED TO BE HERE THIS EVENING, IN CELEBRATION! AS WE RECOGNIZE "WITH RESPECT AND DIGNITY" OUR 249TH MARINE CORPS "BIRTHDAY BALL."

YOU, MIGHT HAVE HEARD THIS BEFORE!! ALTHOUGH IT DOES JUSTIFY REPEATING! NO OTHER BRANCH OF THE MILITARY GATHERS ALL OVER THE WORLD ON THE SAME DAY EVERY YEAR TO COMMEMORATE THE FOUNDING OF THEIR ORGANIZATION, BUT MARINES DO! MARINES EVERYWHERE CELEBRATE AT FORMAL SOCIAL MILITARY BALLS, YOUR LOCAL MARINE CORPS LEAGUE OR WITH FRIENDS. EVERY NOVEMBER, MARINES FIND ONE WAY OR ANOTHER AND GATHER TOGETHER TO SHOW THAT OUR MOTTO "SEMPER FIDELIS" IS JUST AS STRONG IN VETERANS AS IT IS WITH ACTIVE MARINES. WITH THAT IN MIND! LET ME BEGIN WITH A LITTLE "VERBAL COLLAGE" AND EXPRESSION THAT "MARINES" ARE FAMILIAR WITH!! HOW CAN ANYONE REALLY KNOW WHAT IT MEANS TO HAVE STOOD TALL AT BELLEAU WOOD, TO HAVE CRAWLED AT GUADAL CANAL, CLIMED AT IWO JIMA, HELD FAST AT KHE SANH, PUSHED THROUGH FALLUJAH OR HELMAN, AFGHANISTAN, ALL TACTICAL AREAS OF RESPONSIBILITIES. HOW CAN ANYONE REALLY KNOW WHAT IT MEANS TO STAND ON A SET OF YELLOW FOOTPRINTS ON AN ISLAND IN SOUTH CAROLINA AND WRITE A BLANK CHECK TO THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA FOR THEIR LIFE. MARINES KNOW, WE KNOW. MOST OF YOU HAVE STOOD ON THOSE FOOTPRINTS. I WILL SAY TO YOU NOW! ALTHOUGH I CAN REASSURE YOU! THAT THOSE "YELLOW FOOT PRINTS" WERE NOT AROUND WHEN I ENLISTED IN APRIL OF 1965. WE HAVE CHARGED THOSE LINES, WE HAVE BEEN VICTORIOUS!

FOR 249 YEARS MARINES HAVE LED THE WAY. AS WE MARINES GATHER HERE ON THE 249TH ANNIVERSARY OF OUR BIRTH, WE ALSO CELEBRATE THOSE WHO HAVE COME BEFORE, THOSE WHO HAVE YET TO TAKE THE OATH AND MOST IMPORTANTLY WE COME TOGETHER FROM DIFFERENT GENERATIONS, WALKS OF LIFE, RELIGIONS AND WARS FOUGHT. WE GATHER AS STRANGERS TURNED BROTHERS, MEN AND WOMEN TURNED WARRIORS, AMERICANS TURNED MARINES WHILE WE ALSO NEVER FORGET BY HONORING THOSE GONE BEFORE US!!

I ENLISTED IN THE US MARINE CORPS ON APRIL 22, 1965. WHAT A WAKEUP CALL!! PARRIS ISLAND LITERALLY CHANGED MY ENTIRE LIFE FOREVER. I WAS A COMPLETELY DIFFERENT PERSON AFTER GRADUATION. THAT'S ALL I NEEDED!!!! SOMEONE OR SOMETHING TO GIVE ME "HOPE," AND A CHANCE IN LIFE'S PURSUIT OF GUIDANCE, HAPPINESS & SUCCESS. THE UNITED STATES MARINE CORPS DID THAT FOR ME!!!

I NOW HAD THE ABILITY TO SHAPE MY LIFE AND BE WHO I DESIRED TO BE!! AND PURSUE MY EDUCATION WITH PURPOSE, DETERMINATION AND EXCITEMENT. AFTER GRADUATING FROM PARRIS ISLAND, AND SUCCESSFULLY COMPLETING THE ITR PROGRAM AT CAMP GEIGER I RECEIVED MY OFFICIAL MILITARY

ASSIGNMENT ORDERS. I WAS TO BE TRANSFERRED TO 1ST BATTALION 8TH MARINES AND PARTICIPATED ON A MED - CRUISE ASSIGNED TO A BATTALION LANDING TEAM IN MARCH THRU AUGUST 1966. ALSO IN 1966 THE VIETNAM WAR WAS ESCALATING. I RECEIVED ORDERS FOR VIETNAM, IN SEPTEMBER 1966.

I WAS DEPLOYED AND TRANSFERRED TO ALPHA COMPANY, 1ST BATTALION 26TH MARINE REGIMENT! THE REGIMENT HAD A (2) FOLD MISSION TO OCCUPY AND DEFEND KEY TERRAIN!

SEEKING OUT THE OPPOSING FORCE WHILE ATTEMPTING TO ENGAGE IN A VIGOROUS INTENSIVE PACIFICATION PROGRAM.

ALREADY COMPLETING 6 MONTHS OF THE UNIT'S OCCUPATION AND COUNTLESS KIA,S AND WOUNDED FROM BULLETS, BOOBYTRAPS AND OTHER EXPLOSIVE MINES, THEN WORD CAME DOWN FROM THE CHAIN OF COMMAND TO SADDLE-UP! DESTINATION! A PLACE CALLED KHE SANH! DEMILITARIZED ZONE! I CORPS WHICH WAS NOW THE UNIT'S TACTICAL AREA OF RESPONSIBILITY, A PLACE NONE OF THE YOUNG MARINES HAD EVER HEARD OF. THE FOLLOWING ACCOUNT IS CITED BY MY PLT., COMMANDER, LT., JOHN M. KAHENY! I WAS ASSIGNED AS "PLATOON GUIDE." WE WERE A SOMBER BUNCH! WHEN WE ARRIVED ON C130'S THE "KHE SANH COMBAT BASE" WAS A VERY EERIE AND TERRIFYING COMBAT LEARNING EXPERIENCE.

AS THE RAMP OF THE AIRCRAFT CAME DOWN WE LOOKED OUT ONTO THE AIRSTRIP! WINDING DOWN THIS LONG DIRT ROAD TOWARD THE MOUNTAINS, WERE ALL THE WALKING WOUNDED FROM THE HILL FIGHTS. THERE WERE COUNTLESS MARINES SCATTERED ALL OVER, STANDING IN LINE ALL BANDAGED UP ONE WAY OR THE OTHER, COVERED WITH BLOOD AND KHE SANH "RED CLAY" MUD. MARINES FROM A/1/26, 2/26 AND 3/26 & ELEMENTS OF THE 3RD MARINE DIVISION BEGAN DAILY LONG RANGE (ROTATING) COMBAT

PATROLS IN AND AROUND "KHE SANH COMBAT BASE" CONSTANTLY ENCOUNTERING CONTACT WITH ELITE 325TH NORTH VIETNAMESE ARMY FORCES AND NVA SNIPERS.

21 MAY 1967

LT., KAHENY 3RD PLT LEADER, LED HIS 43-MAN PATROL INTO A VALLEY JUST WEST OF HILL 881-SOUTH TO EXAMINE A HEAVY TRAIL REPORTED BY AN "AIR TRAFFIC OBSERVER" THE PATROL WAS SUDDENLY ATTACKED BY A LARGE VOLUME OF FIRE FROM FOUR DIFFERENT LOCATIONS. TWO YOUNG MARINES EACH 18 YEARS OLD, PFC THOMAS HENDERSHOTT & L/CPL ROGER HEARD, STOOD UP, STOOD FAST AND FIRED INTO A CHARGING NVA FORCE, TAKING THE FULL FORCE AND DYING SO THE REST OF THE PATROL COULD ESCAPE & LIVE. EVENTUALLY FORTY-ONE MAKE IT BACK TO SAFETY, SOME BLEEDING, NONE BROKEN, BUT THE TWO GO ON HOME, TO REST FOREVER BENEATH MARBLE CROSSES. THEIR NAMES ARE NOW ETCHED IN STONE ON THAT WALL BENEATH LINCOLN'S WATCHFUL EYE! THE YEARS HAVE PASSED BUT EVERY DAY I SEE THEIR SACRIFICE REFLECTED IN THE SMILING FACES ON MY CHILDREN. FOR HAD NOT THOSE TWO BRAVE MARINES HELD THEIR GROUND WITH EVERYTHING THEY HAD, COLEEN, MEGHAN AND JOHN PETER SIMPLY WOULD NOT BE, BECAUSE ONE OF THOSE THEY SAVED THAT DAY WAS ME.

 I WOULD BE REMISS IF I DIDN'T RECOGNIZE THE BOND BETWEEN MARINES AND HOSPITAL CORPSMAN.. PARTICULARLY BECAUSE I HAVE OVER AND OVER AGAIN..OBSERVED THEM IN COMBAT ACTION SITUATIONS. A MARINE WILL PRESS FORWARD IN COMBAT THROUGH MORTAL PERIL, BUTTRESSED BY THE KNOWLEDGE THAT IF THEY SHOULD FALL, A HOSPITAL CORPSMAN WILL BE ONLY STEPS BEHIND TO AID THEM, WHILE THE FIGHT CONTINUES!

A CORPSMAN WILL RUN ON THE FIELD OF BATTLE UNDER FIRE WITH THE SOLE PURPOSE OF REACHING AND AIDING A FALLEN MARINE, EVEN IF IT MEANS SACRIFICING HIS OWN LIFE TO DO SO. THEY WILL DO THIS BECAUSE EACH AND EVERY ONE OF THEM KNOW THAT THEIR MARINES WILL PROTECT THEM WITH THEIR VERY LIVES AS WELL!! I KNOW "I AM THEIR WITNESS."

THE HOSPITAL CORPS IS THE ONLY ENLISTED CORPS AND THE LARGEST CORPS IN THE UNITED STATES NAVY WITH WELL OVER 28,000 CURRENTLY AROUND THE WORLD ON THE SEA, UNDER THE SEA, ON LAND AND IN THE AIR. "ARE THERE ANY "HOSPITAL CORPSMAN" HERE? IF THERE IS "PLEASE

"STAND & BE RECOGNIZED." IF NOT! THEIR STORY "HAS BEEN" TOLD AND SHARED THIS EVENING

27 JUNE 1967 -

JUST PAST MIDNIGHT @ 0035, KHE SANH COMBAT BASE RECEIVED MORE THAN 50 ROUNDS OF 82MM MORTARS, KILLING 4 AND WOUNDING 76, AND KILLING ONE VIETNAMESE ARVN LIAISON OFFICER. THE NVA MORTARS WALKED UP AND DOWN THE TENT AREAS OF A BATTERY, ⅓, KILLING 2 AND WOUNDING 30 MARINES, INCLUDING THE FIRE DIRECTION AND CO OF THE BATTERY CPT., BRENNAN, ESPECIALLY THE 3/26 BATTALION AID STATION. I STAND BEFORE YOU TODAY AS A SURVIVOR OF THIS EVENT AS WELL.. BUT ONLY BY THE GRACE OF GOD ALMIGHTY, I WAS SPARED AGAIN, FROM THE BEES NEST, BUT STILL HAUNTED BY THE SCREAMS OF THOSE AND THE SMELL OF LINGERING SULFUR FROM THE MANY DETONATED MORTAR AND ROCKET ROUNDS THAT POURED DOWN ON US.

AT THIS TIME!! PLEASE RISE AS WE MEMORIALIZE THOSE MARINE'S & NAVY CORPSMEN WHO GAVE THE ULTIMATE SACRIFICE 27 JUNE, 1967 BY CITING THEIR NAMES, HERE AT THE 249TH MARINE CORPS BIRTHDAY BALL, NEWPORT RHODE ISLAND!! 7 NOVEMBER, 2024.

THE DEGREE OF HEROISM REQUIRED IS THE SAME AS THAT WHICH WOULD BE REQUIRED FOR THE AWARD OF THE "NAVY CROSS" TO AN INDIVIDUAL.

THE EXPERIENCE "RETURNING HOME" FROM VIETNAM!!

AFTER SPENDING 6 MONTHS @ KHE SANH MY ROTATION DATE WAS UP. I DEPARTED KHE SANH COMBAT BASE ON A C-130. LOOKING DOWN FROM THE AIRCRAFT WAS CHILLING, FIRST WONDERING IF WE WERE GOING TO BE TARGETED BY THE NVA AND SHOT OUT OF THE SKY. GOD IS GOOD! WE LANDED AT DANANG AIR BASE. AFTER SEVERAL DAYS OF PROCESSING, WE WERE IN THE AIR AGAIN! DESTINATION, KADENA AIR FORCE BASE, OKINAWA. UPON ARRIVAL WE WERE TOLD BY THE S-1 ADMIN OFFICER THAT THERE WERE NO FLIGHTS GOING TO CONUS.....

!!!!"CONTINENTAL OF THE UNITED STATES" AT LEAST FOR A WEEK OR SO. THIS WAS VERY UNFORTUNATE NEWS. A MARINE 1ST SGT ADDRESSED THE GROUP AND PROVIDED SOME ADVICE. RECOMMENDATION! GET TO THE OFFICER'S CLUB, ASK ANY-ONE THERE, IF THEY COULD GET US ON A FLIGHT TO THE STATES. "IT HAPPENED."

TWO PILOTS APPROACHED US AND STATED "WE CAN TAKE YOU TO THE STATES, BUT IT HAS TO BE BY C-130 CARGO PLAN! AND BUCKLED TO THE INTERIOR OF THE AIRCRAFT FOR THE FLIGHT DURATION. THE 14 MARINES TOOK THE OFFER. NEXT MORNING AT 0600 HRS WE WERE LOADED AND IN THE AIR, DESTINATION; SANTIAGO INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT.

WE LANDED AT THE AIRPORT SAFELY IN THE EARLY EVENING. STILL ON THE TARMAC, SUDDENLY ONE OF THE PILOTS ADDRESSED US. "HERE THIS! WE CANNOT DISEMBARK, WE HAVE VIOLENT-VIETNAM DEMONSTRATIONS ALL OVER THE AIRPORT. NOT SAFE. WHAT A DISAPPOINTMENT!! IN THE AIR AGAIN. DESTINATION; ADAK, ALASKA, NAVAL AIR FACILITY/ IN THE ALEUTIANS ISLANDS. STILL IN DISBELIEF!! WE SPENT SEVERAL DAYS AT THE NAVAL FACILITY! THEN BACK IN THE AIR AGAIN!!DESTINATION, DOVER AIR FORCE BASE, DOVER DELAWARE. FINALLY BACK IN THE STATES. WE WERE SUPPLIED TRANSPORTATION TO THE BUS STATION. ONE OF THE MARINES GRABBED A NEWSPAPER AND WAS SOMEWHAT VISIBLY UPSET. FRONT PAGE, ANOTHER SERVICEMAN STRUCK BY HIT & RUN DRIVER. WE WERE IN OUR TROPICAL UNIFORM. THAT WAS ENOUGH SAID, WE GRABBED OUR DUFFLE BAGS HEADED FOR THE BATHROOM IN THE BUS STATION. AS WE TOOK TURNS CHANGING INTO OUR CIVILIAN CLOTHES...ALL THE WHILE THINKING WE WERE GOING TO BE TARGETED, BECAUSE WE REPRESENTED THE MILITARY SERVICE. WE THREW THE DUFFLE BAGS IN THE BELLY OF THE BUS AND WE WERE ON OUR WAY HOME ALTHOUGH STAYING VIGILANT AND CAUTIOUS, WE FELT THAT WE WERE OUTCASTS...AGAIN FRIGHTENING WAS A LIGHT TERM. SADLY, THERE WERE NO "TICKER TAPE" OR CONFETTI :

PARADES OR WELCOME HOME ACKNOWLEDGMENTS FOR THE RETURNING "VIETNAM VETERANS." WE WERE CAST AS "BABY KILLERS & WAR MONGERS. AT THE VERY LEAST, RETURNING SERVICEMEN, IF NOT VILIFIED, WERE CERTAINLY NOT WELL RECEIVED. MOST TRIED TO SLIP QUIETLY INTO A NORMAL PATTERN AND ATTEMPTED TO HIDE THE FACT THEY SERVED IN VIETNAM TO AVOID THE ANGER AND DISDAIN OF MANY.

IN CLOSING!!UNDENIABLY, WITHOUT QUESTION, INFLUENCING THE ENTIRE MARINE CORP CONCEPT, IS A THING CALLED "VALUES"

WE PERPETUATE THEM, WE PROTECT THEM, AND WE PROMOTE THEM!! SO I URGE AND ENCOURAGE YOU....TO CONTINUE TO PROMOTE YOUR "MARINE CORPS" VALUES, FOR IT MATTERS NOT HOW A MARINE DIES, BUT IT DOES MATTER HOW THEY LIVE. ALL THE THINGS WE CALL VALUES PREPARE US AS MARINES FOR THE VERY CHOICES THAT WILL ULTIMATELY DEFINE OUR CHARACTER!! WHAT A MARINE IS, IS MORE IMPORTANT THAN WHAT A MARINE HAS....AND OUR BOTTOM LINE..OUR TRUE WORTH IS WHAT WE ARE! I WANT TO THANK YOU! FOR THIS HONOR.. HAVING HAD THE DISTINCT OPPORTUNITY, BOTH PROFESSIONALLY AND EARNESTLY TO SHARE IN SOME OF MY MOST GUARDED PERSONAL CHRONICLES AND ACCOUNTS OF MANY YEARS PAST.

GOD BLESS AMERICA & THE UNITED STATES MARINE CORPS!!

KENNETH GASCH , USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN

Kenneth Alden Gasch, Sr. passed away on June 8, 2024, in Palestine, TX at the age of 82 after battling esophageal cancer for over two years. Born September 30, 1941, in Victoria, TX, Kenneth grew up the youngest (and tallest!) of seven children in a close-knit family in Bay City, TX. He enlisted in the United States Marine Corps at age 17 and began what would be a distinguished 20-year military career. Kenneth fought in the war in Vietnam for three years, where he participated in the Battles of Khe Sanh and Hue City and earned the Combat Action Ribbon.

Throughout his early military career Kenneth was stationed at Cherry Point NC, Camp Pendleton, CA, Twenty-nine Palms, CA, Iwakuni and Okinawa, Japan, and Beaufort, SC. His military accolades also included the Joint Service Commendation Medal, Republic of Vietnam Gallantry Cross, Navy Presidential Unit Citation, Rifle Expert Badge, and four Marine Corps Good Conduct Medals. In 1970 he met Dallas native Betty (whom he affectionately called "Poo") and they married in 1971.

They went on to be stationed in Seattle, St. Louis, and San Diego. Kenneth retired from active duty in 1979 at the rank of Gunnery Sergeant and they moved to Betty's family home in Dallas (Lakewood) to raise their three sons. Kenneth bbegan his civilian career at Continental Electronics, where his mastery of RF (radio frequency), can-do-it attitude, and keen mind were highly valued. Always up for going someplace new, Kenneth frequently folded his 6'7" frame into an airplane to tackle projects around the globe, including two several-month stints in India, and projects in North Dakota, Afghanistan, Puerto Rico, Hawaii, Cyprus, and Australia and on the Superconducting Supercollider in Waxahachie, TX.

In 1996 Kenneth left Continental and began roles with a series of companies that took the family to Woodbridge, VA, Phoenix, AZ, Santa Cruz, CA, and Edmond, OK, eventually returning to Dallas. Kenneth settled into retirement in the late 2010s and plunged his boundless energy into various hobbies, including restoring vintage tractors, boats, and cars; taking community college welding classes; lake and ocean fishing; tumbling gemstones; and offering consultation to anyone and everyone who had anything that needed fixing. Kenneth was a natural storyteller, a lover of bawdy jokes, and a spontaneous adventure-seeker who didn't sit still for long. His mechanical mind knew no bounds, and he never encountered something he couldn't repair or figure out how to get fixed. Kenneth loved genealogy, dogs, western movies, photography, spy novels, history, classic country music, and soul food. He held a strong faith in God throughout his life. Most of all Kenneth loved his family and took great joy in spending time with them whenever possible.

Kenneth was preceded in death by his parents, George Alden Gasch and Denal Marie Black Gasch; his beloved wife of 52 years Betty Florence Houston Gasch; and siblings Mary Tompkins, Virgil Gasch, and Billy Gasch. Kenneth is survived by his sisters Helen Freeman, Rachael Weems, and Yvonne Dodson; sister in-law Jane Gasch; brothers in-law Ben and Bob Houston; sons Ken, Jr., Bill, and John Gasch; daughters in-law Erin and Rachel Gasch; grandchildren Zoie, Winston, Tate, Benjamin, Cooper, and Emily Gasch; great-grandchildren Finley, Rayne, and Zander; and a multitude of nieces, nephews, and cousins. A memorial service celebrating Kenneth's life was held on Sunday, September 29, 2024 at 2:00 pm at Bethany Christian Church, 6282 Oram Street Dallas, TX 75214.

OBIT

Paul Weitz, 77, of Falmouth, formerly of Canton, passed away unexpectedly on Sunday, March 3, 2024.

He was born in Dorchester on December 14, 1946, and spent his younger years in Canton. He attended Boston College High School, where he was proud to be an alumnus and would go on to send his two sons.

After two years of college Paul decided to enlist in the Marines in 1967 to serve his country during the Vietnam War. He served honorably as a First Lieutenant Infantry Officer in the 3rd Battalion, 26th Marine Regiment, India Company until he was wounded in battle in March 1969. Upon returning to the United States, Paul received a Purple Heart award for his valor and bravery during combat. Paul was a Marine with every fibre of his being, and he wore it proudly.

Upon returning from the war and recovering from his injuries Paul completed his undergraduate degree in Business from Boston College. After graduation Paul began working at Liberty Mutual Insurance and enjoyed a successful career as a corporate insurance broker. Along the way, Paul earned an MBA from Babson College and retired as a Managing Director from Marsh McLennan in 2012.

He was married for 24 years to his wife, Susan, whom he adored. They enjoyed a comfortable retirement splitting their time between Miromar Lakes, Fl and Falmouth. Whenever Susan would walk into a room Paul would light up and often commented how beautiful she was in front of family and friends. What made Paul the happiest was time spent with his family. From his siblings to his wife and children, his grandchildren, his nieces, nephews and great nieces and nephews, extended family members, that time spent was always his happiest.

Paul relished his role as "Grandfather" and shared a special relationship with his first and only girl, Gwendolyn. He would proudly shower praise, encouragement, advice and a helping hand with all his grandchildren. He took such pride taking his family on a trips to Disney World and Turks and Caicos.

Paul was a voracious reader, enjoying books by John Grisham, and has over 4,000 titles saved in his Kindle. He also enjoyed watching old Western and war movies.

Paul was a kind and generous person who enjoyed a warm conversation over a cold drink. Being around Paul you felt a sense of safety and protection and regardless of the circumstance would constantly assure people not to worry and everything will work out. And if not, you always knew he would be there for you.

Paul is survived by his wife Susan (Peffer) Weitz, his children Jerry Weitz (Canton), Jonathan & Erin Weitz (Canton), grandchildren Gwendolyn, Christian & Harrison (Canton), his sisters Susan Sellon and her husband Raymond (Stoughton) and Sheryl Hopper (Virginia). Paul leaves many nieces and nephews and great-niece and nephews.

Paul was pre-deceased by his brother Jerry Weitz and his parents Wally & Gloria Weitz.

OBIT

LIEUTENANT COLONET ROBERT THOMAS BRUNER USMC (RET)

It is with deep sadness that we announce the passing of Lieutenant Colonel Robert Thomas Bruner, United States Marine Corps (Ret.), on January 14, 2025, at the age of 86. A proud Marine and dedicated patriot, Bob's life was marked by his steadfast service to his country, his love for his family, and his passion for the outdoors.

Born on January 21, 1938, Bob was a man of principle and purpose. He served with distinction in the U.S. Marine Corps for 26 years, achieving the rank of Lieutenant Colonel. His service included participation in the Battle of Khe Sanh as part of First Battalion, Ninth Marines, "The Walking Dead," where he displayed extraordinary courage and leadership. His military awards and decorations include the Bronze Star with combat "V," Purple Heart with two stars, Vietnam Service Medal with one star, Presidential Unit Citation, Combat Action Ribbon and numerous other commendations for his service in both combat and humanitarian missions.

After retiring from the military, Bob continued to serve his community in various leadership roles, including positions with the City of Corpus Christi, where he was the Superintendent of the Marina, the Director of Parks & Recreation, and the Director of Solid Waste Services (honored with Department of the Year in 1991). He later co-founded Bruner and Associates, an environmental and management consulting firm, and founded ZipFly, a company specializing in fly-fishing supplies. Bob was also a mud engineer with Magabar-Dresser.

Bob was an avid outdoorsman who enjoyed fishing, shooting, golfing, tying flies and leather crafts. He was also a dedicated teacher, imparting his knowledge and skills to others with patience and humor. A proud Marine, Bob's commitment to God, country and family were always paramount. His quick wit, engaging storytelling and boundless energy will be missed by all who knew him.

He is survived by his wife, Gail Bruner, of Georgetown, Texas; his daughters, Blyth Swartsfager of Odem, Texas, and Tracy Yeary of Aransas Pass, Texas; his granddaughters, Ambra Sherrod of Jackson, Michigan, and Rachel Tysdal of New Braunfels, Texas; and his great-grandson, Kyler Tysdal.

In honor of his legacy, the family requests that donations be made to his charity of choice, St. Jude's or Shriner's, in lieu of flowers.

A celebration of Bob's life will be held at a later date at Memory Gardens in Corpus Christi followed by the inurnment with Military Honors rendered by the United States Marine Corps. His family takes great comfort in knowing that his memory will live on in the hearts of all who had the privilege of knowing him.

Rest in peace, Lieutenant Colonel Robert Thomas Bruner—an American hero, a devoted husband, father and grandfather, and a true friend.

TOM BUNO

From The Web:

56 Years ago today, along with another NCO, we left Khe Sanh by chinook to pick up two jeeps from Dong Ha that had been equipped with sound sensitive electronics, after arriving at Dong Ha our pilots told us we would be spending the night as weather had stopped us from returning to Khe Sanh. Although it was imperative to get this equipment back to the perimeter we were stuck overnight, so the question came up what to do?

Well after hot showers, really good chow, I found my closest friend stationed there and we proceeded to kill off a pint of Seagrams seven crown, and slept on a real mattress for the first time in forever in brick barracks, the honeymoon did not last long and at dawn we hit the officers mess again and chowed down before returning to Khe Sanh, upon our return the Seabees were waiting to install the sounding sticks for this essential equipment that could detect tunnels being dug towards our perimeter.

Once detected the B-52s took care of that problem and eliminated the tunnels just several days later, we arrived back in time for the start of the siege on Khe Sanh Main base, and along with our brothers endured that horrific pounding, the loss of our ammo dump, and the precious Marines that fell to the rockets, artillery, and mortar onset of the first day of the 77 day siege. I was one of the fortunate, to have served and survived that historic battle with my Brothers of the 26th Marines, we did not falter, we did not fall, we were battered, bloodied, and dealt death as we lost numerous Brothers in Arms, unlike the French at Dien Ben Phu, North Vietnamese General Giap would not succeed with his plan to overrun with his Divisions of hardcore soldiers and take Khe Sanh, as he had done 15 years before in indo China, this time the North Vietnamese would fall, and tired Marines would prevail,

JOHN "BUTCH" RAY LEWIS
USMC, 1ST TRANSPLACEMWN BN
OKINAWA 1959 , B/1/1
July 10, 1941 — March 17, 2024

On March 17, 2024, we bid farewell to John "Butch" Lewis, a beacon of strength, kindness, and service. His departure leaves behind a legacy marked by unwavering generosity, steadfast commitment to justice, and boundless courage.

Born on July 10, 1941, in Abbeyville, Louisiana, to Reba Vandaberg and John Lewis, Butch's family relocated to Wyoming shortly after his birth, where he attended Casper schools and later Natrona County High School. Butch left school, one month after his 17th birthday to join the United States Marine Corps, embarking on a global voyage that included service in Japan and Korea. It was during his tenure in the Marines that he imbibed the values of discipline, integrity, and loyalty, shaping his future endeavors.

Following an honorable discharge, Butch returned to Casper and enrolled in the police academy, commencing a distinguished career in law enforcement. Renowned for his tenure as one of the first motorcycle officers, Butch epitomized honor and protection, earning universal respect. His dedication to justice and compassion for the vulnerable marked him not only as an exemplary officer but also as a cherished colleague.

It was during his patrol duties at the Central Wyoming Fair and Rodeo that Butch encountered the love of his life, Judie Murphy. Their courtship culminated in marriage in late 1964, where they began their married life together in the basement apartment of the Casper Bandshell in Washington Park. Together they built a family, welcoming their son Johnny in 1967 and daughter Ashlie in 1969. Alongside family responsibilities, Butch pursued further education at Casper College, transitioning careers to join the Natrona County Sheriff's Office.

In 1977, Butch took a leap of faith, left law enforcement and purchased the Sage Club in Evansville, Wyoming. In 1988 he rebranded the Sage into Happy Days Liquor, then Butch's Happy Days in 2005. Thriving as an entrepreneur, he fostered camaraderie and warmth at his establishment, bringing his customers together, to form their own large and extended family. He extended his generosity beyond the doors of his bar, and opened his home to a wide and varying array of characters and kids alike. Butch and Judie never closed their doors to those in need, and were renowned for the kindness, grace and respect with which they treated all they encountered.

Butch is survived by his wife of 60 years Judie, his son, Johnny Lewis, daughter Ashlie (John) Schmidt, grandchildren Tim (Ashley) Lewis, Gage Williams, Sharayah Lewis, Challen Schmidt, and Hannah (Matt) Loucks, along with great grandchildren Scarlett and Quincy Loucks and a vast network of chosen family, friends, and individuals whose lives were touched by his selflessness and grace.

In honoring Butch's memory, let us emulate his spirit of generosity, courage, and compassion. May he rest in peace, secure in the knowledge that his legacy will forever endure in the hearts of those fortunate enough to have known him. Services were held at the Oregon Trail Veterans Cemetery on Monday, March 25th, at 1:00 pm, followed by a reception at The Eagle's Club, 306 N. Durbin, at 2:00 pm.

"A TERRIBLE FEBRUARY"

BY KEN ROGERS

I suspect that everyone who sees combat has terrible times, terrible days, or years. For me, at the Siege of Khe Sanh, the month of February stands out. Not only did the heavy incoming arrive on an almost daily basis, but combat on the ground, and in the air, took on a furious character.

When we weren't in the middle of it, we had ringside seats, and the evil stink of rumor crept among us, a whisper that added angst to every bite of the spare supply of C-rations we crammed into our mouths.

Some of my salient memories follow.

On the early morning of the fifth, the enemy assaulted Hill 861-A, manned by Echo Company, Second Battalion, 26th Marines. The NVA came through the perimeter wire and were on the hill. A vicious fight ensued, and the enemy finally withdrew. While this was going on, NVA mortars and artillery pounded the combat base below, to silence our guns that would help defend 861-A.

On the night of February 7, the NVA assaulted the Special Forces camp at Lang Vei, not far from Khe Sanh Combat Base. Using tanks, they broke through the defenses and the camp fell after a nasty fight. During the middle of the night, we got word that enemy tanks were in the area. Tanks. I remember thinking I heard the squeak and crank of tank tracks out in the night. Mostly my imagination, I suspect. We were taking heavy incoming fire to create more chaos, so all the noise added to our anticipation. Dark, and death, and fear, and a horrendous racket.

In our area, our squad leaders told us to saddle up in anticipation of relieving Lang Vei, but we never left the combat base. I think there is still, after fifty-seven years, some residual anger from the men who survived the fight at Lang Vei, as well as some residual guilt among the Marines who didn't come out to save them. I recall, about ten years ago, hearing an audio clip from the commanding officer of the Third Marine Division, explaining in graphic and direct terms why he refused to go out and save the camp and the men who didn't get out.

Continuing salvos of incoming killed men on the surrounding hills and men in the trenches and men in their bunkers. A plane was lost south of Lang Vei while bombing enemy tanks.

Alpha Company, First Battalion, Ninth Marines, had a platoon stationed on a location known as Hill 64. On February 8, the NVA, led by a bugle call, assaulted Hill 64 and an hours-long firefight went on. With the enemy in their trenches, the Marines of Alpha fought. Eventually a relief column from the company managed to fight its way onto Hill 64 as the enemy was driven off. To those Marines who fought on the hill, the subsequent call to abandon must have been a bitter pill.

On February 10, an incoming C-130, callsign Basketball 813, approached Khe Sanh, but at the last moment veered off the runway approach and flew low around the south side of the base and came in from the west. It was obvious to us, standing there on the ground watching, that something was wrong, maybe mechanical, maybe a wounded bird from the NVA flak constantly flying into the air. The plane came in hard and fast and veered off the runway and wrecked close to our lines. It ignited and men came dropping from the windows of the cockpit as the plane burned.

On 23 February, 1968, the NVA sent at least 1,307 rounds of incoming into the base. Mortars, rockets, artillery. Some of them big guns—152mm howitzers—and you learned to recognize the sound of the round leaving the tube—thump—and then you knew it was already in the air and on its way. They sounded like freight trains. If you survived long enough, you knew the fear they threw at you along with the hot metal and shrapnel that tore flesh and cut off legs and arms, and you learned the details of the thump and if the thump spoke in a very particular vernacular, you knew that where you lay in the trench would soon erupt. Despite the hell and mayhem and death, you got up and moved.

We received lots of new guys during the month of February. When the 152s fired, I would yell, "Move, a round is on its way," and many times the men gawked, mouths open, their fear refusing to let them crawl to a different place in the trench.

On 25 February, besides a debacle I will write about soon, NVA trenches were detected within 25 meters of our perimeter. If we didn't feel surrounded before, we did then. Marines with stethoscopes listened to the sounds of the enemy digging their trenches. We imagined tunnels beneath us, mined with tons of explosives to erupt and kill us all.

On February 28, The NVA launched a massive assault on the ARVN troops sharing the line with us. The din of combat sailed over the ground into our ears. Our bombers and artillery units pounded the attackers and the ARVNs bravely fought them off more than once, their courage under fire in stark contrast to so many of the disparaging rumors we had heard concerning ARVN troops. In this case, they didn't disappoint us.

DAVID T. LIND, USMC, KHE SANH VETERAN, H&S CO 2/4

The passing of David T. Lind Member of 2/4 and Khe Sanh Veterans Association

"Near the end of April 1968, one of the most fiercely fought but little-known battles of the Vietnam War pitted Marines of Battalion Landing Team 2/4 against the North Vietnamese 320th Division. It took place on a little piece of terrain approximately 1½ miles northeast of the headquarters of the 3rd Marine Division in the Dong Ha combat base. The fighting extended over a 3-day period."

This is the only engagement of the entire Vietnam conflict where a single reinforced battalion-sized Marine unit, with less than 1,000 fighting men, supported by intense naval gunfire, fought head-to-head with a division-sized unit of between 6,000 to 10,000 regular NVA soldiers who were augmented with 600 guerillas and who were supported by artillery on the demilitarized zone."...

PAUL GERALD BOULEY

Bouley, Paul Gerald age 76, of Elk River, died on Dec. 31, 2024 at Guardian Angels Care Center while under the care of hospice. He was born in Minneapolis on August 8, 1948, and was joined minutes later by a twin sister. Paul graduated from Golden Valley High School in 1966. In July of 1967, he enlisted in the U.S. Marine Corps. He left for Viet Nam in January of 1968. Paul saw some of the worst action of the Vietnam War, and on June 10, 1968, he was injured at Khe Sanh. The experience had a lasting impact on his life. He spent months in a hospital in Japan, and a couple more at the Great Lakes Naval Hospital. He was awarded a Purple Heart for his sacrifice, and he was a life member of the Disabled American Veterans. Paul was honorably discharged in February 1970. Paul overcame a lot in his life. He had multiple eye surgeries for his war injuries, and a significant hearing loss due to the blast when he was injured. For over a decade he dealt with shrapnel that would migrate in his body, and at times, find its' way out. A brief marriage ended amicably. He resolved an alcohol problem at age 27. He built himself an earth-sheltered home in Zimmerman where he lived modestly almost all of his adult life. It was the perfect home for a returning soldier. Earth sheltered on three sides, but full of sun and views of nature on the south side. Twenty five acres of land gave him the peace and privacy he craved. Paul had a successful career as a proud member of Pipefitters Local 539. He was preceded in death by parents, Emmett and Mabel O. Bouley. He is survived by sister, Janet (Denny) Miller; brother, Dean (Sandi) Bouley; and twin sister, Paulette (John) Cervenka. A private interment will be held in the Spring.

ROBERT PAUL BURDETTE 1947-2025

Robert Paul Burdette passed away on January 1, 2025, in Atlanta, GA. He lived a magical life of 77 years. He grew up as an outgoing young man on a farm in Delaware, Ohio. Bob displayed charisma and leadership from an early age. In high school, he played bass for the area's first and only rock and roll band. His popularity from that led him to become class president.

After graduating, Bob served as a Navy Corpsman dental technician embedded with the Marines during the Vietnam War. He experienced the harrowing events of Khe Sanh and took immense pride in serving alongside his military brothers. That experience led him to become a fearless warrior for peace. For his acts of valor and meritorious service in combat, he was awarded the Marine Corps Bronze Star Medal, one of the military's highest honors, recognizing exceptional bravery and performance under challenging conditions.

Following his military service, he found knowledge of inner peace through a Prem Rawat community that taught him the power of meditation. He pursued his passion by attending Life University's chiropractic school. As a chiropractor, Bob dedicated himself to healing the lives of those around him.

Dr. Bob, as he was known to all, left a written legacy of three books chronicling his lifelong journey toward inner peace and sharing "Clean Sweep" technologies-tools designed to free himself and universes from darkness to serve The Creator most appropriately. Link to the Clean Sweep: www.keystoascension.com/clean-sweep His writings reflected his deep commitment to achieving spiritual enlightenment.

He would marry and divorce twice while bringing three boys into the world. Despite facing health and financial challenges later in life, Dr. Bob maintained an enduring optimism exemplifying his resilient outlook. He was a very charismatic and unique individual loved by all who got to know him. His favorite catchphrase to say to anyone who ever asked him how he was doing is a lesson for us all to live by.
"Worst day I ever had was wonderful"

He is survived by his sons William Blayne Burdette, Travis Ryan Burdette, Derek Ian Burdette, and his sister Kathryn Ann Stults.

Dr. Bob's remarkable life touched many through courage, wisdom, and compassion. May his memory bring comfort to all who knew him.

He was in 81s platoon during the siege. Rest in Peace Ben. Benjamin H. Frye Jr. (Ben), Age 76, passed away on January 12th, 2025, in Vero Beach, Florida.

Ben was born in Altoona, Pennsylvania to Benjamin H. Frye Sr. and Dolores Diehl.

Ben served in the United States Marines from 1966-1970 where his last rank was Sergeant. He was a veteran of the Vietnam War. After the war Ben attended Penn State University in 1982 and graduated with an associate's degree in electrical engineering. He worked for and retired from the Buckeye Pipeline Company in 1999. Ben moved from Hollidaysburg, PA to Vero Beach, FL in 2003. He enjoyed riding motorcycles and spending time with loving family and friends. He also had a love for his country.

Survivors include son John Nebelski (Stephenie) of Duncansville, PA; daughters Lori Miller (Rob) and Jessica Ulery (Douglas) of Duncansville, PA; brothers Dennis Diehl and Bob Frye; sisters Karen Brown and Kayann Painter; grandchildren Erica Kennedy, Amanda Fleischer, Abbey Nebelski, Nathan Nebelski, Wyatt Ulery and Mara Ulery; great grandchildren Calle, Teagan, Braxton, Johnny, Bristol, Jake, Baylee, and Blair; and previous life partner Patricia Madden. He is also survived by numerous nieces and nephews.

Ben was predeceased by his father Benjamin H. Frye Sr., mother Dolores Diehl, son Benjamin H. Frye III, and grandson Benjamin Miller.

A burial will take place at Blair Memorial Park in Bellwood, PA at a later date.

Arrangements are by Thomas S. Lowther Funeral Home & Crematory, Vero Beach.

KHE SANH VETERANS IN THE NEWS

Charlton Blanks is affectionately known to Chester County veterans as "The Major." When you say 'I'm going to go talk to the Major,' everyone knows just who you mean.

Any Marine would count himself lucky to have survived during the Battle of Khe Sanh, a significant battle during the Vietnam War. Any Marine would have counted themselves fortunate to have survived the Tet Offensive, one of the largest military campaigns of the war. Any Marine would have thanked his lucky stars to have come through the evac before the Fall of Saigon.

CHARLTON BLANKS WENT THROUGH ALL THREE.

The N&R had a chance to sit down with Blanks almost a year ago as he told his story as part of the Veterans History Project, a partner project with the Louise Pettus Archives at Winthrop University for the Library of Congress national project. When some additional information was discovered about his tours of duty, The N&R went back recently for a follow up. Blanks was also recently named the Veteran of the Week by the S.C. Department of Veterans Affairs.

Blanks got his first taste of military life when he joined the ROTC battalion at Clemson University, which was still an Agricultural and Mechanical College. He was a member of the Pershing Rifles honorary military society while at Clemson. He later transferred to USC before graduating in 1961.

HE WORKED ON HIS FAMILY FARM BEFORE BEGINNING HIS MILITARY CAREER.

My twin brother, Carlton and my older brother Robert, neither one of them cared much for farming, but I did. I was a member of the FFA, the Future Farmers of America, while I was in school. I bought some cows and other livestock. I really got into it," he said. Blanks started out as a PFC in the U.S. Marine Corps until he graduated OCS, Officer Candidate School. "I had a friend who was in the Marine Corps, Donald Boulware, he was my brother in law; I was married to his sister. He went into the Marine Corps and then his father died and he got out on a hardship discharge, because he was the only male in the family. "He talked about the Marine Corps and I don't know, I just took to it. All services are good, patriotic and everything, but we all have our preferences," he said. Blanks tells the story that after he graduated from USC, he was in the student lounge contemplating his next move when a Marine recruiter challenged his and Blanks decided to join the USMC. Also, Blanks said he joined the Marine Corps because he thought he was "macho".

Blanks attended USMC officer candidate school at Quantico Marine Base in Virginia.

After graduating he was assigned to Camp Pendleton as an infantry officer with the 1st Battalion, 5th Marine Regiment, where he went through "Lock On" jungle training. "We spent a lot of time in the boonies," he said.

"The idea was back then, you trained as one unit – we were the 1st Battalion, 5th Marine Regiment, and when you went over to Vietnam, you know everybody in the regiment, because you had trained with them. I had a weapons platoon, and I knew every one of them.

"That was one thing that screwed us up during the war – they started drafting kids and they started putting soldiers and Marine in individually, and they didn't know each other in their units, didn't know what they were capable of. They started piecemealing the units," he said.

Blanks attended Intelligence Officer School at Fort Holabird, in Maryland. His MOS (Military Occupational Specialty) was intelligence.

When I was at Camp Pendleton, they cut orders for me and I got a trailer behind my car, because they were going to send me across the country to Fort Holabird. That as a mess: I had already sent my wife back to Chester earlier," he said. After intelligence training, Blanks' unit was sent to Vietnam

"The Army had more ships than the Navy. We headed overseas, stopping at Okinawa first. While we were heading there, John Kennedy was assassinated. This was 1964. We went to Japan first and then to Okinawa. That's where our unit debarked, and they put us in trucks and we went to the northern part of Okinawa," he said.

"There was training again on Okinawa, and the told us what to expect in the jungle, including about the different types of traps," Blanks said. On a brief stop in Japan, Blanks was introduced to sake, rice wine. "I didn't quite like it," he related.

Then the unit got orders to go into Vietnam. They loaded onto a ship and waited for two months for the order to disembark; the ship was occasionally served by tender ships while they steamed a zigzag course near land.

"Things were getting hot, and they had to make sure the area was secure. We were the landing team, the spearhead, you might say, if anything started getting bad.

"During that time the North Vietnamese shot at some of our ships in the Gulf of Tonkin – President Johnson used that as an excuse to escalate things," Blanks said. While they were in the Philippines on exercises, Blanks' unit backloaded their artillery, 105 and 155 mm cannons, got back on the ship and headed to the northern portion of Okinawa.

"My first job over there was as an aide to a South Vietnamese unit – I didn't even have any weapon with me. I came off that assignment and went back to the ship," he said.

When the unit landed on the beach and were met not by the enemy, but by a bunch of Vietnamese girls anxious to see the Marines.

"It was sort of like Hawaii," Blanks remembered." We thought we were going to make a landing sort of like the soldiers and Marines did during WWII at Omaha Beach, and then there they were – the girls with leis around their necks. It wasn't quite the same thing."

Blanks practiced his infantry officer skills and intelligence training from the DMZ (De-Militarized Zone) down along the northern part of Vietnam.
He came under fire at Khe Sanh Combat Base. It was while stationed here that the Marine learned an appreciation for the U.S. Air Force. "If it hadn't been for the Air Force, I would be dead right now. Up at Khe Sanh, B-52 bombers dropping those 250 and 500 lb. bombs.

"Khe Sanh was sort of an enclave, like Dien Bien Phu, they say President Johnson told the leadership 'I don't want any more Dien Bien Phus – y'all make sure you don't get overrun,' so the enemy dug these trenches and then they kept coming up closer (to the perimeter of the Khe Sanh Combat Base) and they would dig another trench, so they could get close enough to rush the compound. Those Air Force B-52s they saved us; they would carry out carpet-bombing on the enemy. We'd sit on the sandbags and watch them," Blanks said.

His first combat experience he said, "was nerve-wracking, because you'd be sitting there (at the base) and every 10 or 15 minutes, here comes an exploding artillery round," he said. Blanks made numerous trips in the jungle, setting up places to broadcast with his radio unit, often having to hack his way through the brush.

He remembers looking up one time and seeing a formation of three C-123 airplanes dropping the Agent Orange defoliant and being thankful they were clearing away some of the jungle along his path.

"We thought, 'Oh, thank God,' not knowing at the time the danger of the chemical. What we did know is if they took away the vegetation, the enemy couldn't sneak up on us," Blanks said Blanks completed his first tour in Vietnam as an advisor, went home and came back for his second tour in 1968.

Blanks completed his first tour in Vietnam as an advisor, went home and came back for his second tour in 1968."I got over there just in time for Tet (the Tet Offensive)," he said.

"It was supposed to be a holiday like our New Year holiday, and they broke it. That's when they started overrunning all of the bases. (The Tet Offensive was a series of surprise attacks against military bases throughout South Vietnam, during the Lunar New Year, when many of the Republic of Vietnam – ARVN soldiers were on leave). "But we beat that attack back," Blanks said. After that tour, Blanks was attached to the Pentagon, working in intelligence.

"I had all of these high level clearances, which is one reason why when I was in Germany later, they wouldn't let me go to Berlin," he said.

During his third tour of duty, Blanks was involved in the evacuation of the villages around Saigon (formally known as Operation Frequent Wind) when the capitol fell in 1975 near the end of the war. More than 7,000 people were evacuated by helicopter from various points in Saigon

Blanks' unit, the 9th Marine Amphibious Brigade, was stationed aboard USS Blue Ridge as part of Task Force 76, whose mission was the evacuation efforts.

"The ARVN and the NVA started coming further and further south, and they would take over this town and that town. They finally got down south as far as Saigon. I was there when the NVA tank came through the wall of the U.S. Embassy in Saigon," he said.

Those South Vietnamese who had fought along side and aided the Americans became worried, because they didn't know what their fate would be if the capitol fell. They began to make plans to evacuate the country and leave the Embassy by helicopter." They climbed up to the highest point in the Embassy they could and the helicopters would pick them up and fly them to different ships. I was on the Blue Ridge.

"As the helicopters came back, especially the ones flown by the South Vietnamese Air Force, they would drop the refugees off. So what were they going to do with the helicopters, because more were coming up right behind them? They had to have a place to land, so the Captain of the ship told them to pitch the helicopters over the side. They pushed several over the side, and as they did that, the rotors were still turning. The crews were told to fly the helicopter out over the sea and ditch when it was low to the water. After the crew got out of one, the aircraft came back towards the ship on its own.

"I was below deck at the time, and I heard a huge crash. What had happened was the helicopter, a Huey, had come forward and hit the side of the ship! I thought we were under attack. I was waiting for them to call General Quarters, but they never did. Good thing was not a soul was hurt," he said.

Following his military service, Blanks' civilian work included teaching high school in Chester County, where his classes included 8th grade science and 12th grade physics.

He continued to be interested and helped organize veterans events in Chester County until he recently had to retire from actively doing that. He is still a frequent honored guest at Chester County veterans events.

Veterans recall difficult days
Saturday, July 01, 2006
By GEORGE WERNETH
Staff Reporter—Leatherneck

Two former Marines and a retired Army colonel nicknamed "Bulldog" sat around a table Thursday in the Riverview Plaza Hotel in Mobile, reminiscing about their service at Khe Sanh in the Vietnam War.

Khe Sanh was a strategic Marine Corps base close to the border separating South Vietnam and North Vietnam when it was battered in a 77-day siege by enemy forces, starting on Jan. 21, 1968.

The base, manned by some 6,000 Marines and assorted other American forces, was surrounded by more than 20,000 North Vietnamese Army troops, according to official military estimates.

"It was an unbelievable experience," said David C. "Bulldog" Smith 74, a retired Army colonel who underwent the entire siege while a major at Khe Sanh. "We were attacked by rockets, mortars, howitzers -- by everything. Day and night, night and day. Seventy-seven days of it."

Smith, who now lives in Trinity, N.C., shared his memories of Khe Sanh with Dan Fisher, 59, of St. Paul, Minn., and Russell Turner, 59, of St. Louis, who had served as enlisted men in the Marine Corps at Khe Sanh.

The three were in the downtown hotel taking part in the annual convention of the Khe Sanh Veterans Association which will conclude Sunday. About 250 Khe Sanh veterans are in town for the convention.

Fisher and Turner served at the base for a period of some five or six months, just prior to the official start of the siege. But they noted the base often came under fire from the enemy while they were there. Both men spent much of that time rotating service in combat patrols on nearby hills, and at the base, where they were lucky if they got a shower once in a month. Smith said their association considers Khe Sanh veterans to be anyone who served at Khe Sanh before, during or after the siege.

All three veterans said they were wounded in Vietnam and Smith received three Purple Hearts in that war.

The NVA failed to take Khe Sanh and the siege officially ended April 8, 1968. Several months later, U.S. forces abandoned Khe Sanh because of a change in U.S. strategy, officials report. The base had originally been used as a point from which to disrupt the flow of supplies from North Vietnam down the Ho Chi Minh Trail.

According to Wikipedia, an Internet encyclopedia, the NVA sustained more than 9,000 casualties at Khe Sanh. Many of them were killed by American B-52 bombers.

Smith said he believes the B-52s were responsible for bringing the siege to an end and said he feels the NVA death total was substantially higher than official estimates.

Wikipedia reports there were 205 U.S. casualties at Khe Sanh, along with 443 wounded. The three veterans said they believe the U.S. casualties were higher, also.

There were 205 Marines killed between Nov. 1, 1967, the beginning of a Marine operation against North Vietnamese Army forces in the Khe Sanh area, and March 31, 1968, as the siege of the base was ending, according to general Marine Corps records. However, Navy chaplain Ray Stubbe, after extensively researching losses during the same period, put the number of Marines killed at 274. There are an array of tallies for the NVA deaths, ranging from 10,000 to 15,000, according to official public estimates. A once-classified report from Military Assistance Command, Vietnam, estimated 8,550, with 2,000 due to ground action and 6,550 from air and artillery forces. —Dick Camp

27 JAN 2023

PETTY OFFICER 1ST CLASS PREDRO RODRIGUEZ

ARLINGTON, VA --

This year the U.S. Marine Corps commemorates 55 years since the Battle of Khe Sanh, which lasted from January 21 to March 31, 1968.

In early 1968, Khe Sanh Combat Base gained world-wide attention as the roughly 6,000 Marines defending the base were encircled and besieged by three North Vietnamese Army regiments of about 20,000 troops. For 77 days, the Marines and their South Vietnamese counterparts, with support from an element of U.S. Army soldiers and U.S. Air Force bombers, would endure one of the longest and bloodiest battles of the Vietnam War.

Among the Marines defending the base was U.S. Marine Corps Sgt. Ronald Echols, who was serving with Company M, 3rd Battalion, 26th Marines, 3rd Marine Division on Hill 881 South.

"We had Marines at Hill 661, and we had Marines at a radio relay tower, which was on Hill 950, and my company was on 881S," said Echols. "There was two 881s, one 881 South and 881 North, we maintained those hills because we wanted to keep the high ground away from the North Vietnamese that overlooked Khe Sanh."

North Vietnamese forces conducted a massive artillery bombardments on Khe Sanh, located just 10 miles from the Sepon River, which marked the border between Laos and South Vietnam.

"I remember that during dawn it would still be foggy and as soon as the fog burned up, they would start hitting us with mortars and artillery. If there was daylight, we would get hit," Echols said.

Due to the constant attacks from the PAVN, Marines at Khe Sanh faced significant supply challenges, but their training helped them find ways to capture water and overcome the lack of supplies.

"For the first 30 days they couldn't get us resupplied; seven helicopters got shot down bringing supplies into us," said Echols. "We went nine days one time without anything to eat. Fortunately, with the thick fog, we were able to spread plastic down the hill and catch condensation. We needed to have about two 12 oz. cans of water to last until the next morning, but guys were still dehydrated, they weren't getting enough to drink."

You get a bond with your fellow Marines that's indescribable. I've got two brothers, but I've never had with them the bond I had with the guys I was in combat with. They were my brothers." U.S. Marine Corps Sgt. Ronald Echols, who was serving with Company M, 3rd Battalion, 26th Marines, 3rd Marine Division

During the siege, Marines created an air delivery method called a "super gaggle" to provide supplies to areas cut off from land supply routes after several aircraft were lost during resupply missions. The super gaggle method coordinated air and artillery strikes to occur simultaneously during resupply missions, providing a shield for aircraft delivering much needed ammunition, food, water and evacuating the wounded.

"The airwing came up with the idea they could come in and bring jets in and bomb, then come around the hill, put up a smoke screen, and then the helicopters would come in five-at-a-time with the resupplies; they looked like geese coming through there, so they called it the super gaggle, and that's how they started getting us resupplied," said Echols.

Echols added that helicopters often had just 20 seconds to land, and evacuate the wounded and get airborne before the mortar attacks resumed. Echols also remembers the air support provided by American bombers and how close they were to his positions on Hill 881S.

We had a couple of North Vietnamese soldiers surrender. We asked them why they surrendered, and they just pointed up to the sky," said Echols. "You can't just imagine what these B-52s do. They called it an Arc Light, and they would just drop hundreds of bombs out of one plane, and there was three or four planes at one time. It was just devastating."

By the end of the battle, U.S. Air Force assets had flown more than 9,000 sorties and dropped 14,223 tons of bombs on targets within the Khe Sanh area.

It would not be until April 14, 1968, that Marines from 3rd Marine Division, soldiers from the US Army 1st Cavalry Division and South Vietnamese soldiers would be able to break through and push back NVA forces from the area. Khe Sanh would continue to see combat until the end of July 1968, after which the base was destroyed and abandoned by American forces.

"On April 14 my company moved off of the hill, and they had showers set up outside for us," said Echols. "You get a bond with your fellow Marines that's indescribable. I've got two brothers, but I've never had with them the bond I had with the guys I was in combat with. They were my brothers."

Echols received a battlefield commission and a Bronze Star for his actions during the Battle of Khe Sanh. According to his Bronze Star Medal citation, "on numerous occasions, Staff Sgt. Echols served as a platoon commander, a billet normally assigned to a commissioned officer, and repeatedly disregarded his own safety to maneuver his unit against the enemy. While his company was three deployed on Hill 881 South during the siege of Khe Sanh, he worked tirelessly to ensure the safety and welfare of his men despite constant North Vietnamese mortar and artillery fire."

KHE SANH UNDER SIEGE: A VIEW FROM THE 3RD BATTALION, 26TH MARINES

BY DICK CAMP 4/5/21

At approximately 4 a.m. on Jan. 21, 1968, I stood watch as assistant operations officer in the 3rd Battalion, 26th Marine Regiment's combat operations center at the Khe Sanh Combat Base shooting the breeze with Maj. Matt Caulfield, the battalion's operations officer. I remember handing him a C-ration cup of coffee when we heard heart-stopping words come over the radio speaker from a lieutenant on a nearby hill: "We're being overrun!"

Caulfield grabbed the radio handset and demanded, "What the hell's going on?"

The Khe Sanh base was on a plateau in the northwest corner of South Vietnam just south of the Demilitarized Zone dividing it from North Vietnam and about 6 miles from the Laotian border. The base was intended to block enemy infiltration from Laos and serve as the western anchor of a linear barrier containing manned fortifications, minefields and sensors stretching from the South China Sea to Laos, a line known as "McNamara's Wall," a reference to Defense Secretary Robert McNamara, the barrier's chief proponent.

The base's perimeter consisted of bunkers and trench lines that stretched roughly in an oblong circle surrounding a 3,500-foot runway large enough to land C-130 Hercules cargo planes. Several thousand yards from the perimeter, hills 881 South, 861, 861A and 558 figured prominently in the defense of the base. Approximately 6,000 Americans defended the base perimeter and the hill positions.

In January 1968, the North Vietnamese Army cut the overland supply route to Khe Sanh, leaving the base totally dependent on aerial resupply. At the same time, the NVA surrounded the base with upward of 20,000 battle-hardened soldiers, supported by heavy artillery, rockets and mortars.

The 3rd Battalion, 26th Marines, had been airlifted to Khe Sanh in mid-December 1967 and assigned an approximately 3,000-yard-long slice of the northwest defense perimeter, known as the Red Sector.

"They [the regiment] didn't have any room for us," recalled 1st Lt. John T. Esslinger, executive officer of the 3rd Battalion's Company M. "So they sent us outside the wire to the west a little bit...we build sort of an add on, an annex to the base. We extended the wire and dug our holes and that's where we lived."

The 3rd Battalion's combat operations center was in the only grove of trees in that portion of the base. The battalion logistics officer had been able to bribe a Navy Seabee into digging a rectangular pit with his front-end loader. The pit, some 12-feet deep, 8-feet wide and 20-feet long, was just large enough to accommodate the battalion commander, his staff and radio operators, together with about 15 to 20 men.

The operations center was "roofed" with 2-inch-thick perforated aluminum planks (intended to be runway matting), reinforced with crushed rock, expended artillery shells and layers of sandbags, making the overhead cover at least 5 feet thick. This would easily protect us from NVA mortar fire. Unfortunately, as the siege progressed the NVA brought in heavy artillery—122 mm and 152 mm guns, as well as 122 mm rockets—along with 120 mm and 82 mm mortars. A final layer of 2-inch plywood sheets was placed 6 feet over the entire roof area.

Once a 152 mm shell landed on the hardened crushed rock main road running through the base. I was told to survey the resulting hole to determine what the battalion should do to protect itself. I stared at the huge crater, 6 feet deep and 8 feet in diameter, compared it to our small entrenching tools and reported jokingly to the battalion executive officer that we should surrender!

As a further protective measure our battalion instituted a policy that no vehicles were allowed into the grove of trees—only foot traffic was permitted. We were concerned that NVA observers on the high ground might spot vehicular traffic and identify the area as a command post. Finally, a general purpose tent and camouflage netting were erected over the operations center.

From this underground bunker, the command group and staff—battalion commander, executive officer, operations officer, intelligence officer—directed the widely dispersed rifle companies. Company I and two platoons of Company M occupied Hill 881 South; 2 miles east Company K and two platoons of Company A, 1st Battalion, 26th Marines, held Hill 861; and 500 yards to the east Company E, 2nd Battalion, 26th Marines held Hill 861A.

Those three hills, along with the 3,000-foot-high Dong Tri Mountain, Hill 881 North and Hill 558, dominated the Khe Sanh Plateau and would enable the regiment to control the high ground overlooking the base. Company L of the 3rd Battalion defended the combat base's Red Sector, tying in with the 1st Battalion of the 26th Marines on the right flank and the U.S. Army's forward operating base on the left.

The battalion combat operations center maintained radio communications with the hill positions, as well as the 26th Marines regimental command post and supporting arms radio networks.

A hand-lettered sign was placed above the radio operators' bench. During the day, its wording was turned toward the dirt wall of the bunker and not visible, but at night the sign was turned over and revealed a tongue-in-cheek response to the imminent threat of an NVA ground assault: "Tonight's the Night."

Sometime around 1 a.m., Jan. 2, a Company L listening post reported six NVA had just crept by. A reaction force was sent out and, together with the listening post men, swept the area. They discovered five NVA and killed them. The five were officers and may have been performing a reconnaissance for a ground assault. An enemy captive later reported that an NVA lieutenant colonel was one of the dead.

The night of Jan. 21 several NVA "sappers," an elite assault force, attempted to breach the wire in front of Company L. They came under fire, and 14 bodies were observed being dragged away.

On Hill 861, as sounds of small arms and machine gun fire, explosions and muffled shouts filled the air in the pre-dawn hours of Jan. 21, K Company's executive officer, 1st Lt. Jerry N. Saulsberry (call sign Kilo 5), responed "What the hell's going on?" question Caulfield had asked from the combat operations center.

"We're being overrun!" Saulsberry shouted.

The regimental fire support coordinator, Lt. Col. John A. "Band of Steel" Hennelly, directed radar-guided planes to drop ordnance on suspected NVA assembly areas around Company K's hill position. Just before dawn two A-6 Intruder planes dropped.

56 500-pound bombs on a likely assembly area, which not only dampened the enemy forces' assault but also forced them to break contact.

At 5:30 a.m., on Jan. 21, just after the enemy had been driven from Hill 861, the NVA unleashed a terrifying artillery and rocket bombardment on the Khe Sanh base, beginning a 77-day siege. Enemy shells hit all around the operations center. Others hit the 1,500-ton ammunition dump on the eastern end of the runway, setting it off with a thunderous roar and sending unexploded ordnance hurtling through the battalion area.

The solid thud of a 30-pound shell striking the ground in the darkness was unnerving. Making matters worse, the regiment's supply of tear gas was blown up and the chemical saturated the air, forcing everyone to wear gas masks...at least those who still carried them.

In the following weeks, the entire combat base and the hill positions were hit all hours of the day and night by various combinations of mortar, artillery, rocket and recoilless rifle fire.

The NVA attacked Company E of the 2nd Battalion on Hill 861A at 4 a.m. on Feb. 5. A sapper unit armed with Chicom grenades (long-handled grenades modeled after those made by Chinese communists) and bangalore torpedoes (metal tubing filled with explosives) preceded an infantry attack by approximately 200 troops. Companies I and K of the 3rd Battalion supported Company E with 81 mm and 60 mm mortar fire, which helped disperse the enemy. By 6:30 a.m., Company E had beaten back the attack using small arms and aggressive hand-to-hand combat. Seven Marines were killed and 24 wounded, while the NVA lost 109 killed.

The major spoke to Saulsberry in an unbelievably soothing voice to calm him. However, things went wrong when Caulfield decided to finish his instructions with some football team rah-rah, saying, "OK, Kilo 5, take the ball and run with it!"

The lieutenant must have been still too anxious to comprehend Caulfield's use of the cliche or had trouble hearing amid the gunfire and explosions.

"Did I hear you say 'run,' sir?" Saulsberry asked.

Caulfield shouted into the handset: "Hell no! I was just trying to encourage you to hold on."

Saulsberry was in charge of Company K because the company's commander, Capt. Norman Jasper, had been seriously wounded by a rocket-propelled grenade in the first minutes of the attack and was out of action. The company first sergeant was also wounded by the same rocket. The company gunnery sergeant had been killed.

The artillery and air officers in the combat operations center requested assistance from the 26th Marines' Fire Support Coordination Center, in the middle of the combat base, which we called "downtown ground zero." Within minutes the regiment's direct-support artillery battalion, 1st Battalion, 13th Marines, was in contact with Company K's Cpl. Dennis M. Mannion, an artilleryman attached to the company to direct the support fire. "I started calling in target numbers [preplanned artillery targets] on the ridgeline 500 yards to the west...I pulled the rounds as close as I could get them...I fired as many rounds as the 105s [howitzers] at the combat base could give us."

Company I on Hill 881 South also began firing in support. "Our two 81 mm mortars fired several hundred rounds on that slope," Capt. Bill Dabney, the company commander, reported. "The mortar tubes became so hot that the gunners cooled them with water, then fruit juice, and finally by urinating on them. It smelled a bit rank in the gun pits!"

On Feb. 15, between 11 a.m. and 5 p.m., the NVA struck the base with 1,307 artillery and rocket rounds. A seemingly unending succession of casualties had to be evacuated to Company C, 3rd Medical Battalion, at downtown ground zero. For most of us, the only protection was to burrow deeper into the plateau's red clay.

Intelligence reported the North Vietnamese had placed heavy artillery, Soviet-made 130 mm and 152 mm guns and 122 mm rockets, across the border in the Co Roc Mountains of Laos.

Our operations center was on a straight line from the NVA fire, and the rounds came right overhead before exploding somewhere in the middle of the base. Occasionally a "short" round impacted the battalion area.

On one memorable occasion, the battalion tactical network came alive with the warning from Company I on Hill 881 South: "Arty, arty, arty, Co Roc Mountain, 220 degrees." Company I, some 4 miles west of the base, was first to hear the round and broadcast a warning over the radio network, which many units monitored.

Sirens and horns sounded all over the base, giving everyone several precious seconds to find cover—often the margin between life and death. The warning got to be Pavlovian. At the first note all hands scrambled for cover.

I wondered where that SOB was going to hit. Suddenly there was a terrific explosion, the generator lights went out, and thick dust filled the operations center. Everything went deathly quiet. The heavy stench of the shell's cordite explosive material permeated the air. Someone shouted, "Is everybody OK?"

After verifying there were no casualties, Caulfield and I went outside and saw a gaping hole in the operations center's tent covering, which was also perforated by shrapnel. About 4 feet of the center's roof was gouged out.

The bunker had taken a direct hit from a heavy-caliber round, which hit the plywood and exploded, then took out part of the roof. If the plywood had not detonated the shell, the round would have penetrated the bunker's roof—and everyone in the close confines of the space in the operations center would have been killed from shrapnel or concussion.

Two unconscious Marines lay just outside the entrance of the tent. Later we learned that they were about to enter when the shell exploded. Fortunately, the angle of the blast was away from them. Neither was hurt except for minor burns, scratches and headaches. Upon coming to, one looked up and remarked, "Don't mean nuthin," which was a standard sarcastic response to truly frightening combat experiences.

Others weren't so lucky. One day a radio operator had to make a "head call." Another man took his place. After a long interval, someone took notice and asked about the man who went to the latrine. It turned out the Marine had stepped out of the bunker just as an incoming round hit close to the operations center. He was wounded and evacuated before we even knew mortar round clipped several Marines close to the entrance of the operations center.

Everyone adopted what we called the "Khe Sanh Shuffle" or "Khe Sanh Two-Step." Just about anyone who was walking above ground held his helmet under an arm so it would be easier for him hear an arriving shell. All of us kept an ear cocked toward Laos in the west, where most of the NVA artillery was positioned.

Our senses were finely tuned. We would stand around talking with our helmets tucked under our arms until someone said, "Shhh" or "Stop talking." If nothing more was heard after a few seconds, the conversation resumed. If there was "something" in the air, everyone suddenly dashed for cover. It was automatic. If someone started running, everyone joined in.

As a result of the close calls, the battalion executive officer and I established a second combat operations center in an old above-ground bunker some distance away. We remodeled it, adding more sandbags and digging it deeper—much deeper! We occupied the bunker at night, but during the day maintained watches in the primary operations center.

As the siege developed, the NVA blockaded the road into the base. Supplies could be delivered only by cargo aircraft. Initially, the supply planes were primarily C-130 Hercules and C-123 Provider transports. However, in mid-February the runway closed after a Marine KC-130 was struck by anti-aircraft fire and crashed, killing six Marines onboard.

Using an alternative delivery method, the Air Force air-dropped containers into a zone in front of the battalion lines. Every morning, a team from the 1st Battalion, 9th Marine Regiment, swept the drop zone to ensure the NVA hadn't moved in during the night. We could see the drop zone from the operations center.

Supplying the outlying hill positions required an innovative approach because the NVA ringed them with anti-aircraft weapons. After several helicopters were shot down, the 1st Marine Air Wing instituted "Super Gaggle," an air task force consisting of eight to 16 resupply CH-46 Sea Knight helicopters, accompanied by about a dozen A-4 Skyhawk attack aircraft and four Huey gunships flying cover, a Marine KC-130 to refuel the aircraft and a TA-4F Skyhawk with a "tactical air coordinator" in the back seat to orchestrate the entire affair.

In a typical "Super Gaggle" mission, a TA-4 flew first to Khe Sanh on weather reconnaissance. When it reported favorable conditions, the other aircraft launched from various bases in northern South Vietnam. The A-4s took off from Chu Lai en route to Khe Sanh. The helicopters departed Quang Tri, en route to Dong Ha, where supplies waited.

After picking up their loads and carrying them underneath in especially designed cargo slings, the helicopters began the short trip to Khe Sanh flying on instruments and then letting down through a hole in the cloud cover.

Just before the helicopters arrived, four A-4s struck enemy positions with napalm and two others saturated anti-aircraft positions with tear gas from spray tanks. About 30 seconds before the helicopters' final approach to the designated hills, two A-4s laid a smoke screen on both sides of the planned flight path. As the helicopters flew in behind the smoke, four more Skyhawks carrying bombs, rockets and 20 mm cannons suppressed known and suspected North Vietnamese gun positions.

As soon as smoke was laid, helicopters from Marine Medium Helicopter Squadron HMM-364, the "Purple Foxes," would appear with the sling loads brought from Dong Ha—10 birds in two strings of five just above the smoke. They flew parallel to the hill, usually to the south since wind was usually from the north. They came into five zones on the hill, released their loads and beat feet. One bird in the second echelon was designated to land in a zone that we would have ready, drop off mail and replacement Marines, and pick up casualties. Only two CH-46s fell to enemy fire during the "Super Gaggle" missions. In both cases, the Hueys picked up the crews immediately.

On April 8, Operation Pegasus, an overland and air assault mission involving the Marines, U.S. Army and South Vietnamese troops, broke through the North Vietnamese encirclement and lifted the siege.

The 3rd Battalion, 26th Marines, had some unfinished business, however. On April 7-8 the command group and Company L were airlifted to Hill 881 South to prepare an attack on Hill 881 North. Shortly after midnight on April 14, all four of the battalion's companies advanced against the hill under a massive 2,000-round artillery barrage. At 2:28 p.m., the Marines raised the Stars and Stripes over the smoking hilltop. The capture of Hill 881 North was the 3rd Battalion's last battle in the Khe Sanh area. V

Dick Camp retired from the Marine Corps in 1988 as a colonel after serving 26 years. He served in Vietnam 1967-68 as an infantry company commander and aide de camp to Maj. Gen. Raymond G. Davis. GENERAL ORDERS:

CITATION:

The President of the United States of America takes pleasure in presenting the Silver Star to Corporal Thomas J. Eichler (MCSN: 1838959), United States Marine Corps, for conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity in connection with operations against the enemy in the Republic of Vietnam, while serving as Weapons Platoon Sergeant with Company E, Second Battalion, Twenty-Sixth Marines, THIRD Marine Division. During the early morning hours of 5 February 1968, two companies of North Vietnamese regulars attacked Company E's defensive position on Hill 861A near Khe Sanh with grenades, mortars, automatic weapons, and small arms fire. Realizing one of his gun emplacements had gone silent, Corporal Eichler moved through the heavy enemy fire first to bring up and emplace another machine gun team, and then assisted in moving the casualties out of harm's way. With complete disregard for his own safety, he made several sprints to the forward edges of the perimeter to evacuate critically wounded Marines and reposition his teams into more effective firing positions. When the enemy breached Company E's perimeter, Corporal Eichler played a vital role in the successful counterattack. He brought ammunition to Marines in the front line positions, engaged the enemy in close quarters combat, and repeatedly exposed himself above the trench line to direct the actions of his fellow Marines and personally hurl grenades on the enemy with devastating effect. By his undaunted courage, bold initiative, and unwavering devotion to duty in the face of intense enemy fire were an inspiration to all who observed him and were in keeping with the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and the United States Naval Service.
